The whole evening was one of intense excitement and novel sensations to Isora; and the worst of it was that she had not even the safety-valve of a confidante. Neither sister, mother, nor "dearest friend" was at hand; and when the poor lonely child in search of sympathy with her emotions during a very trying scene, glanced around timidly at her uncle, she was shocked to perceive that worthy personage sound asleep. She woke him instantly, that he might not lose the treat.

Though the fact I have mentioned would tend to prove that the uncle did not enjoy opera-going much, for its own sake, he delighted to give pleasure to his niece, nor did he see anything amiss or suspicious in her vehement entreaties to be taken every night while the opera lasted. He therefore went and slept, and Isora went and felt—or thought she felt, which answers as well sometimes—herself in love.

The season was a long one, and things went on till the silly little thing, carried away by all sorts of sentimentalities and delusions, was firmly convinced her heart was lost beyond recall.

This topic filled her head so completely, that having, as I have said, no female confidante, she one day, in utter inability to keep such a secret pent up any longer, hinted the state of the case to her uncle himself. The good man was aghast. Such a contingency had never presented itself to his imagination.

"In love with Signor Ricco Rocco, indeed!" he exclaimed, half amused and half enraged.

"Yes, indeed, uncle. So much in love—that—that I don't know what to do."

"In love! Bah! Do you know what will cure you?"

"No, uncle," she replied.

"An ounce of sense!" said he. And thoroughly vexed and annoyed, the uncle left the niece alone to ponder on the prescription.

As to whether this remedy was applied or not, uncle and niece differ. At all events, it was not successful.

Isora began to "peak and pine." All her merry ways, her girlish gaiety, deserted her. She moped—grew sallow—almost ugly; a very common effect of moping, gentle reader, believe me, though novel writers never mention it.

This state of things forced itself on the attention of the uncle, who might otherwise have never again recurred to the absurd confession of his niece. As it was, he was constantly reminded of it.

He missed the life and gaiety which had swept like a breeze of spring through his musty old house when Isora first entered it. He hated to see a pale, lackadaisical girl poking languidly about, instead of the fresh, lively, saucy thing who had amused him a few weeks before. He was one of the gentlest and kindest of men, but he was a man after all, and therefore it is probable Isora might have fretted herself to death without opposition, if she could have done so without diminishing his comfort or enjoyment; but as the case was, he felt the necessity of effort, and he bent his vigorous and practical mind to a removal of the difficulty. The result of much intense study and deliberation was an invitation to Signor Ricco Rocco to dine with him.

Isora was informed of this arrangement, and after thanking her uncle from the very depth of her fluttering little heart for his great and delicate kindness, ran off to choose betimes the dress in which to array herself on the momentous occasion.

The day and hour came. (Isora began to think they never would.) She had been consulting her mirror all the morning, and was now dressed with simple elegance, walking up and down the drawing-room with her uncle, awaiting the arrival of her distinguished guest.

In her innocent delight she could not help telling her only confidante how handsome and interesting she thought the Signor, and her opinion that all the world must see his very great resemblance to the noble and chivalric Sir Walter Raleigh.

To all this the wily uncle said little or nothing, though his shoulders would shrug a little, and a mysterious grunt, which puzzled Isora, now and then escaped him.

A ring at the bell. Isora dragged her uncle to the door to listen, and then back to the farthest corner of the room, as she heard the step of the visitor approaching.

A moment more, and she was in the presence of her hero. He was shaking hands with her uncle—her uncle was introducing him to her. Without finding courage to raise her eyes, she could only blush deeply and bow her head before him.

For the first few moments she desired nothing more. It was enough to know herself in the presence—to know that the cherished object of her girlish adoration—her hero—her ideal—was near her—in the same room. But as it is a law of the human heart always to make an attained happiness the step by which to mount to another higher yet, Isora in time overcame her timidity; she raised her eyes, and saw—a middle-aged gentleman, red-faced and fat.

It was our heroine's instantaneous conviction that an impudent hoax was attempted to be played off on her.

That the elegant lover! the chivalric hero! the brave soldier, with whose appearance she was so familiar from her seat in the boxes! No, she could not, would not believe it! It was only through her uncle's somewhat ostentatious iteration of the name of "Ricco Rocco," that she could in any way connect the impostor before her with the princely person she had heretofore known under that title.

The belief that her uncle was attempting to play off a trick upon her was confirmed at dinner-time, as she observed the guest's half-bred manners and voracious appetite. It ripened into certainty during a conversation she had with him after they had returned to the drawing-room.

Her uncle had been called away for a short time by a business visitant, and in the short tete-a-tete during his absence the Signor became so confidential as to inform Isora, in broken English, that he had probably broken more hearts than any man living, and, at the present time, nearly twenty young ladies were doomed victims to his dangerous attractions.

Perfectly disgusted with his overweening vanity, and embarrassed by a confidence so unsolicited and undesired, Isora was thankful for the reappearance of her uncle in time to obviate the necessity of a reply which she knew not how to frame.

Ere long the guest departed, and the uncle immediately demanded, "Well, Isy, what do you think of your Signor Ricco Rocco now?"

"Ah, uncle," answered Isora, smiling reproachfully as she patted his cheek with her fan, "do you think I don't see through you and your plans?"

The uncle changed countenance visibly, and with rather a conscience-stricken look, asked what she meant.

"Why, of course, uncle, I am only a silly girl, and not hard to outwit, I dare say, but your trick is rather too palpable to impose even upon me. That red-faced man Signor Ricco Rocco, indeed! He was more like Daniel Lambert!"

The uncle suddenly recovered his spirits.

"Oh! that is the view you take of it, my little darling, is it?" he cried, rubbing his hands gleefully. "Then I'm all right, for I can tell you, on my word of honor, that our visitor was Signor Ricco Rocco himself in propria persona, as sure as I am the best of uncles."

But Isora was still unconvinced. She could not doubt her uncle's word; but neither could she realize any identification of the two widely different individuals claiming the same name. She had still the impression that some deception was being practised upon her.

Her uncle, perceiving her doubts, wisely proposed another visit to the opera, assuring his niece that though she could not discern Signor Ricco Rocco in their guest, she would not find it so difficult to trace their guest in Signor Ricco Rocco.

To her amazement Isora found this prediction true. The next night, in spite of disguise, paint, and stage illusions, their fat guest of the previous day stood constantly before her. She was cured.

Some years afterward Isora married a plain, sensible man, with nothing of the hero about him except a noble, loving heart, but whom she managed to love devotedly, notwithstanding.

Her uncle made one of her household, and exercised a great influence over her; for it was observable that whenever anything did not go as he approved, or his niece was about to act in any way he considered foolish, he had but to pronounce the mysterious words, "Ricco Rocco!" to reduce her to instant obedience to his wishes.

HOW CERTAIN OPERAS CAME TO BE COMPOSED.

—At the time when Auber, (younger than he is now) reigned almost supreme at the Grand Opera, Mlle. X— was the principal danseuse, the bright, particular sun, around which moved vocalists, composers, critics, &c., &c., as if living in the light of her smiles. Auber also was found among her devotees, but the charming danseuse, despite his attentions, treated him with the most marked coolness. One evening, behind the scenes, he became more urgent and pressing than ever for her favor, and she replied: "If ever you compose an Opera, in which I fill the first role, I shall then begin to consider whether so insignificant a person as I am may be worthy the love of a great composer." Surely this was "giving the sack" in the best possible style. At least so thought the lady, for to her it seemed an impossibility that a danseuse could have the first role in an Opera. But nothing seemed impossible to love and Auber. The next work produced by him was "Le Dieu et Bayadere" and Mlle. X— danced the Bayadere.—Whether she afterwards listened to the devoted composer's vows, we cannot state, but this is certain, that he wrote another opera, "La Muette de Portici (Masaneillo), in which she appeared as Fenella.—N. Y. Dispatch.

AN ORGANIC DIFFICULTY.—A parish in the west of England, after much effort lately purchased a self-acting organ, warranted to play twenty tunes, and a larger congregation than usual met to inaugurate it. The first psalm had been successfully brought to an end, when after a short pause, the organ choose to commence psalm-tune number two. In vain the officiating person endeavored to stop it; in vain the church wardens left their own pews to stifle its noises; still the organ, as though uncontrollably pleased with its own execution, kept on with the new air. What was to be done? The service was suspended, in the hope that the musical stranger might be content when the second tune was played out. Vain expectation! It commenced number three! and nothing remained but to carry the instrument into the churchyard, and there to cover it with the vestry carpet to choke its voice, for on and on it went till the number of twenty had been played out, much to the edification of the less attentive part of the congregation, who could only hear half smothered melodies.—London Times.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 17.—The chief and indeed only musical event of the past few weeks, has been the Musical Festival at Jones's Woods. It was ushered in with much advertising and considerable pomposity, and, as far as I can learn, the results have been peculiarly satisfactory. As a strictly musical affair but little can be said about it. Fireworks and lager bier preponderated over Mozart and Beethoven, and though some of the Sing-vercins competed for a silver goblet, yet, as a general thing, our musical societies had little participation in the Festival. The afternoon concerts were fair, but presented no feature of special novelty, and, indeed, did not attract as much as the dance music.

In the evening it was worth something more than the twenty-five cents admission to visit Jones's Woods. The sylvan grove was illuminated with calcium lights, while innumerable stands for the sale of lager, fruit, candies, and soda ornamented or encumbered the grounds. Then there were establishments where for three cents you could get a ride upon one of a company of stump-tailed revolving horses; there were places where you could win a pint of peanuts by engaging in shooting a pop-gun at a target, for a cent a shot, together with divers other contrivances for passing away time and making money. Then there was (and this seemed to be the great centre of attraction) a huge platform for dancing, with overhanging trees, and calcium lights, and a little moonlight feebly struggling through the foliage. The orchestra was excellent, and everybody danced with everybody, and there was much fun, and a vast amount of jabbering in Dutch. Indeed it was difficult to say whether the Teutonic or Anglo-Saxon element predominated.

As a heartily enjoyable affair—a mixture of mirth, music, moonlight, and lager bier—the Festival was a decided success. But as a musical event it does not really deserve more than a passing notice. Music was quite a subordinate thing. Those that came, did so because they wanted to enjoy a pic-nic, and though the music was undoubtedly an attraction, it was not a much greater one than the fireworks and the dancing.

The musicians also viewed the affair in the same light, and enjoyed themselves as much as anybody, besides making some money out of the affair. MAX MAREZEK figured bravely as a gipsy Vulcan, pounding one of the anvils in the "Anvil Chorus" with an energy worthy of a Hercules,—a light, agreeable pastime for hot weather.

I see no glimmering of musical intelligence until the opera season opens at the end of the month. The Harmonic Society have offered to sing the chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work," at the Atlantic Cable celebration at the Crystal Palace. They will also sing an ode written by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens; who is to set it to music nobody knows.

TROVATOR.

BERLIN, JULY 1.—A refreshing contrast to the dull and dragging monotony of our Court Theatre, and at the same time a reward for the wonderful contentedness and patience of our public, has been found in the engagement of Frau BUERDE-NEY, Fräulein GUENTHER and Herr TICHATSCHKE. Frä. Günther, for several years a favorite of the Prague public, appeared for the first time as Elizabeth in Wagner's Tannhäuser. Her organ—an alto voice, which has acquired by practice a considerable portion of the soprano scale—has a tender, sympathetic sound, which would gain in power by a more free and open forming of the tones. With this she unites distinct enunciation, pure intonation, and soulful, live expression, in which all that remains to be desired is greater variety of nuances and transitions. In the first scenes she evidently had to contend against her own anxiety; for Berlin is her native city, and she had to satisfy the very high expectations of her many acquaintances here. In the beautiful second act she gained more assurance, and she gave, especially, the splendid Arioso, in B major, which by the noble flow and poetry of its expression far surpasses all the other numbers, in a style to carry every one away. Equally successful was she in the prayer of the third act. In Verdi's hotly overspiced "Troubadour" she met also with the most favorable reception, and it was a cause of general regret, that our blundering management neglected to re-engage a singer of such promise, thereby allowing much good to slip through their hands.

TICHATSCHKE, the Dresden hero tenor, for many years the king of German tenors, began his engagement with Spontini's Cortez. This opera, in pure musical worth and symmetry, is inferior to the Vestale and Olympia; but in originality and power for the exalted form and for heroic expression it surpasses them. We find in it the strongly stamped national and individual characteristics, not only of two peoples, as the representatives of culture and of barbarism, but even of single persons, who in Spontini's music always move in their peculiar, sharply distinct spheres. This characterization is found already, sketched in brief, but well-marked outlines, in the overture, which, like all of Spontini's introductions, moves in his most favorite key, D major. Tichatschke may place himself at the head of all heroic tenors. Singing and expression stamp the artist as a genuine dramatic representer. If the representation of heroic and impassioned moments outweighs tender lyrical expression, yet in the first, at least, the true, the right are given perfectly. His style of recitative, in spite of the provincial dialect and the staccato way of shooting out his words, is masterly, a model of distinctness, often wonderful. He so dexterously covers up the defects of his voice, which has suffered for years and lost its freshness of tone, that they are almost wholly overlooked. His playing was truly conceived, though frequently too hard and violent, faults which may be especially objected to Spontini's music. You miss the dignity, which never should forsake the Spaniard. This passionate manner was in far better keeping with the outbreak scene in the second act, the admirable representation of which was disturbed by the unfortunate addition of the very obligato trampling of horses. The royal Kapelle accompanied, under TAUBERT's direction, without artistic discretion and without higher intention.

Frau BUERDE-NEY we heard in Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," the operatic text being by Mosenthal. How the intelligent Nicolai (too soon removed!) could choose such ineffective material, dramatically, as this disfigured work of Shakspeare, with its double subject and its anything but drastic mystification of a love-cracked fool and an every-day love story, in which the inclinations of father, mother and daughter cross each other, I can only explain from the desperation in which he could write: "I am very ill-humored and I have a right to be so. It is impossible for me to find an opera text, or even the material for one, although I have at great and for me burdensome expense offered a prize for one; but nothing came from it which I could use. It is incredible how rusty the inventive fancy of the Germans has become." As to the music of the otherwise skilfully put together text of Mosenthal, the composer himself, who has often been charged with presumptuousness and excessive self-esteem, speaks of it with the greatest frankness in a letter to his father, thus: "My new opera has already given me much pleasure in the composing. The artist's happiest hours are those spent in creating; if I had more invention, more genius, I would boldly place myself in the very first rank; for in the writing down, in instrumentation, in the application of all the vocal and instrumental means I have extraordinary power." And it is, in fact, the routine work of composition, which has created charming numbers in this opera, with the aid of the composer's accurate acquaintance with the Italian manner of singing, which he has sought to unite with the German.

Mme. Ney's part, which poet and composer suffer to subside almost entirely after the first act, is not of enough importance, musically, to be called her best. This the singer seemed to feel herself, or she would not have resorted to such outré means, which she could well have dispensed with, having a voice of such wonderful power and compass. In the first aria, and in the trivial piece introduced from Balfe, we heard the incredible thing, the D sharp in alt, pearl forth with metallic purity in the embellishments. These, with the trill, which she employs with taste, lend to the uniformity and characteristic coloring of her infallibly pure voice a charm, which fits her peculiarly for German-Italian song; and only so can we explain why her "Frau Fluth" (Mistress Ford) should outshine all her other performances.

Fräulein TRIETSCH sang her part of Anne (which seems not to have been treated as a favorite by the author) with purity, grace, and natural enthusiasm, to be highly prized. We could wish that Frä. GEY had a part of these qualities. Herr KRUEGER sang his episodic romanza in the first duet admirably; the serenade in the second act was less successful. Herr KRAUSE (Fluth) and ZSCHIESCHE (Falstaff) deserve thanks for their exciting representation, especially in the comic duet. On the contrary, the other performers, and especially the fine fairy chorus at moonrise, where a single violin, playing probably by heart, strayed back into the overture, left much to be desired, as did the solo-playing of the concert-master RIESS.

Of newly studied operas we must be most grateful to the management for Cherubini's Lodoiska. Among the three prominent spirits, who, although not Frenchmen, followed and developed their artistic career especially in France, namely Gluck, Cherubini, and Meyerbeer, Cherubini is perhaps the most subordinate, yet he is unsurpassed in the well-considered, wise calculation and employment of his means. Organically sprung from the school of Gluck, Grétry, and Mehul, when he left his native Italian direction, Mozart and Haydn became his models and gave him an impulse upon new paths. The Lodoiska, which marks a similar turning point in Cherubini's creative activity, to that of the Orfeo in Gluck's, contains much of the dramatic beauty of Don Juan, and certain intimate relations of the two works may be traced even into minute details. In the book of Lodoiska, with all the weakness of character, the passion is to be prized, united with Cherubini's extremely individual conception of the romantic. Hence the frequent gloomy brooding, the intensely glowing coloring, the grand situations, the short, quick energy, which often startle us, because we hear seemingly fragmentary and abrupt ideas, while all stand in close connection and even the accessory details have received most careful treatment. At the same time the fundamental character of the melodies is mingled with a dash of melancholy softness and a tender, melting feeling. Often bright and witty, still he cannot suppress his earnestness as the execution of the work goes on; often too he modulates as sharply, as suddenly almost as Beethoven, but he feels too tenderly to dare, like him, to seize the hearer too unexpectedly and leave him floating over an abyss. The performance was satisfactory in general, although it might have gained by changes in the cast.

Of our concert performances decidedly the most interesting was that of the Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles, in the Greek language, with music by H. BELLELMANN, performed by pupils from the first classes of the Gymnasiums. The chief merit of the composer in this work is the fidelity and discretion with which he has reproduced in his music the noble Greek rhythms of the choruses, especially the truthful expression of the situations, and of the subject altogether. In the broad and polyphonously constructed overture, in which only the trumpet is urged to a shrill height, he prepares us worthily for the fearful fate of Oedipus. Moreover, he has, in a very happy manner, spread melodramatic music as a foil under the passages which are controlled by feeling; and, although in many choruses the uncommonly thought-laden poetry of Sophocles has proved almost insuperable to music, and opposed great obstacles to any freer musical development, still on the other hand, we are most satisfactorily compensated by all those passages in which feeling reigns; especially successful, through this excitement to the feelings offered by the text, are the last scenes, for example. The execution of the choruses by the healthy and fresh voices of the scholars, as well as of the orchestral part by members of the royal Kapelle, brought this highly meritorious composition generally into clear understanding. It was also a rare pleasure to hear the noble Greek language once more in all its euphony and power.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—The Praise of Friendship, a Cantata for two Tenors and Bass, or for two Sopranos and Contralto.

The Great Event.

There are events, triumphs of the divine intellect and energy of man, which suddenly lift communities, whole nations, into a higher plane and atmosphere of feeling; liberating the grander instincts, which had shrunk within us to a cowardly half-consciousness in this low work-a-day and selfish world; renewing Faith; ennobling the tone of thought and general remark, so that the most vulgar newspaper discourses in a high, humanitarian and religious vein, and low diplomacy forgets itself in large international greetings, (or creeps in with an ill grace only at the tail end of a message). Such a glow of higher, holier sentiment, such an electric thrill of conscious unity and brotherhood with all the races of mankind, is now called forth by the completion of the Atlantic Cable. That electric chain between two hemispheres, wonderful as it is, is nothing in comparison to this more wonderful electric chain which it reveals within us all, bridging the gulf between one spirit and another by quickening what is spiritual in each. In such seasons language fails; words are but poor and lame instruments of thought; every utterance climbs unconsciously towards a lyric form; prosaic editors write poetry. And here it is that all men feel the need of just that freer and more spiritual language, the proper universal tongue of what is infinite and highest in the soul's experiences, Music. If there is ever a great event which should be celebrated by great Music, this is one.

The celebrations and rejoicings of the past week have been general and spontaneous, and to a great degree appropriate and inspiring. A more orderly and quiet tone, a tone of more sincerity of joy than has been usual in our noisy, vulgar, empty so-called patriotic jubilees, has pervaded all and lent a finer charm. Speaking for Boston alone, it is an event worth chronicling, that for the first time the wonderful capacities of our paradise of a Common for the most beautiful and artistic kind of a fête of the whole population have been illustrated to us. The experiment was for the first time tried, on Tuesday evening, (suggested to us a few years since, we remember, by the artist Hammatt Billings,) of for once fairly lighting the Common, and letting that pass for the whole unsatisfactory fuss of guns and fire-works. This idea was to some degree carried out. The noble elms which arch the malls, all round the Common, were hung with Chinese paper-lanterns of all colors, which looked like myriads of glow-worms, or, as you came nearer, like transparent fruit of gold and purple, and blood-red, in gardens of enchantment. Under these fairy-lit green arches the whole city could perambulate to the sound of music, and really enjoy itself. The fountain played, the water sparkled in the moonlight, rockets burst in the distance against the misty sky, the "big elm" was covered, thick as mulberries, with the luminous fruit of this feast of lanterns; and what was seen was but a mere suggestion of what might be realized there upon a grander scale. There should be Drummond lights upon the hill pouring great floods of light over the vast moving crowds, and bringing out the very greenness of the trees; and there should be a general illumination of all the stately residences that surround the Common, and there would be a scene of such enchantment, and so universally enjoyable, get-at-able by all, that it would once for all establish the true method of a united festal demonstration of the whole community. The Common is the pride of Boston; the whole people's place, uniting in itself and its surroundings more of luxury and beauty than princes can command. If we mean to show a patriotic feeling on the nation's birth-day and on other great occasions, why will not all unite and concentrate their efforts and their decorations upon the Common, light up all the houses round it, and make it so attractive that it shall draw together the whole people for a feast as orderly, as refined, and as artistic, as any for which selector crowds seek theatres and concert halls?

But we have wandered away from music. Music there was, of course, such as it was, in great abundance on that day and evening. Think of the thousands of brass bands, that helped, in the whole length and breadth of our great country, to proclaim the wedding of the hemispheres by the electric cable! This was all well, — as well as brass could make it. But why no higher intervention of the art of Music in so high and proud a celebration? Why no great Handel choruses, no symphonies, nor oratorios, nor Chorals by great multitudes of voices. One of the New York societies offered, we see, very properly, to sing Haydn's chorus; "Achieved is the glorious work." We should have had — we might yet have — a high musical festival in our Music Hall, in which that chorus might bear a part; and also, with equal reason, and with more inspiring grandeur, Handel's announcement: "Peace on earth, good will to man," with the Hallelujah and the Amen chorus. Many are the odes, and the poetic jubilees called forth by the Cable. But there is one, which, although written for the Fourth of July, in the little village of Concord, deserves, as it has been well said, to be sung everywhere as the ode for this occasion; it is worth all the poetry that has been written about the cable, for it contains the inspiration and the higher sense of all, and rises to the ecstasy of full expression of it in verses fit and few: It should be set to music by a Handel, and become the ode of liberty and peace among all nations. We mean the ode by EMERSON:

O tenderly the haughty day
Fills his blue urn with fire,
One morn is in the mighty heaven,
And one in our desire.

The cannon booms from town to town,
Our pulses are not less,
The joy-bells chime their tidings down,
Which children's voices bless.

For he that flung the broad blue fold
O'er mantling land and sea,
One third part of the sky unrolled
For the banner of the free.

The men are ripe of Saxon kind
To build an equal State;
To take the statute from the mind,
And make of duty fate.

United states! the ages plead,
Present and Past, in under-song —
Go, put your creed into your deed,
Nor speak with double tongue.

For sea and land don't understand,
Nor skies without a frown
See rights for which the one hand fights
By the other cloven down.

Be just at home, then reach beyond
Your charter o'er the sea;
And make the broad Atlantic pond
A ferry of the free.

And, henceforth, there shall be no chain,
Save, underneath the sea,
The wires shall murmur thro' the main
Sweet songs of Liberty.

The conscious stars accord above,
The waters wild below,
And under, thro' the cable wove,
Her fiery errands go.

For He that worketh high and wise,
Nor pauses in his plan,
Will take the sun out of the skies
Ere freedom out of man.

MR. JULIUS EICHBERG. — Many of our readers will remember the rare pleasure they received last Spring, at a Sunday evening Concert of the "Orpheus Glee Club," from the violin playing of a young artist, who appeared there for the first and only time before us, Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG. The pieces he selected upon that occasion, a Chaconne by Bach, and a Sonata ("Il trillo del diavolo") by Tartini, were as uncommon for this latitude, as the style of his performance was solid, chaste, expressive, masterly. All about him seemed to bear the stamp of an intelligent, earnest, high-toned artist. It was our privilege, a few days since, to make his acquaintance here in private, and both to listen to his firm, broad, true rendering of more music of the same classical stamp, and to converse with him on schools and masters, new and old, especially the old, — old as Palestrina and Orlando Lasso, for whom he has peculiar love and reverence. Mr. E. is a pupil of the elder Fétis, and appears to have caught his spirit of eager and reverential exploration in the earlier periods of the modern art of music. We have had among us musicians of all schools, classical and modern virtuoso, but not before one who was a representative of this peculiar phase of music. Mr. E. played here before a few friends one evening, several sonatas by Corelli and Tartini, the Chaconne of Bach again, and the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven, all in a masterly manner, accompanied by Mr. Trenkle. His partiality, perhaps, to those old Italians is more than many here will know how to sympathize with; it is common to set them down as the "old fogies" of the art; but that man has a sure hold on our sympathies, in spite of any antiquarianism, who can so well appreciate and interpret Bach and Beethoven. Such genius is of no age.

Mr. Eichberg has spent a number of years in Geneva, Switzerland, as a professor of music in an important institution. He has a brother established as a merchant here in Boston, and for that reason, among others, would be glad to settle here, if he should find encouragement. He would be an invaluable accession to our small corps of violinists, both in orchestra and chamber music. But he is a thorough musician, and a composer of considerable success, as well as a violinist. He is learned in the theory and history of music; and it is one of his ideals to form around him a choral society, not large enough to compete or interfere at all with our oratorio societies, for the special object of studying the music of old Italian and Flemish masters, of Palestrina and Orlando, Durante, Marcello, and the rest. Here would be an opportunity which certainly a few scores of earnest musical inquirers in our city would be eager to secure. Mr. Eichberg, who is now residing in New York, hopes to visit Boston in the autumn and perhaps give an evening of the music of his favorite masters, at Chickering's rooms. We cannot doubt that such an introduction, in addition to the occasion above referred to, will stimulate to an effectual desire to secure his residence among us. We always need intelligent and high-toned artists.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our young Boston singer, Miss ANBY FAY, whose fine voice warbles with such ease through the most florid and birdlike strains, will give a concert at Nahant, this evening. Signors BRIGNOLI and AMODIO, too, will sing, and Signor BENDELARI, the teacher of Miss Fay, will preside at the piano. Here will be a tempting opportunity, both to hear music and enjoy a moonlight trip by water, as the Nahant steamer will run back to the city after the concert. . . . The citizens of Worcester are to have a concert from Miss MARIA S. BRAINERD, of New York, who is universally spoken of as one of our finest native singers. Dr. CLARE W. BEAMES, her instructor, will assist. The Courier and Enquirer says of her:

Miss Brainerd is the happy possessor of a voice to which no one can listen without being touched; and she sings whatever she undertakes to sing with a sympathetic appreciation and expression of its beauties. Her taste has led her to the study of the higher order of classical music, French romances and English ballads, and in these she always charms her hearers by the purity of her method, and the simple and touching grace of her style.

"Trovator's" brief but vivid picture of the great Open-Air Musical Festival at New York, is doubtless all the notice it deserves; but some of our readers may be interested by a more minute account of one of its features, the prize singing, which we borrow from the Tribune:

The principal feature of interest yesterday was the singing by four German Sang Vereins in competition for a mammoth silver goblet, about 20 inches high, of beautiful design and workmanship. Each society sung two pieces, one comic and one serious; which, with the performances of instrumental music, formed a grand concert, commencing about 2 1/2 o'clock, in the following order:

A Fest Overture (composed for the occasion), played by the Band.

"Castles with High Walls and Battlements," and "When I see the Pretty Flowers," sung by the Confraternita, with Theo. Thomas as leader.

"The Electric Telegraph," played by the Band.

A Hymn from Zoeller and A. B. C., sung by the Vierblättriges Kleeblatt, or Four-Leaved Shamrock Society, with E. Grill as leader.

March and Chorus (Tannhauser), played by the Band.

"Under all Trees is Peace," and "The Peasants' Dance," sung by the Amphion Society, with C. Prox as leader.

Grand Pot Pourri, played by the Band, with Max Maretzek as leader.

"Dost thou hear that Mighty Chorus?" and "Blue Monday," sung by the Quadrinimum Society, with C. Prox as leader.

March, from "La Prophete," played by the Band.

Grand Chorus, "This is the Lord's Day," sung by the four Sang Vereins, with Mr. Thomas as leader.

"Wedding March," played by the Band.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. Maretzek introduced the four leaders of the Committee of Prize-award, consisting of Mr. Henry C. Watson, of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, Mr. Krüger, Mr. Carl Wolfson, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Shatté, with the remark that they were gentlemen well known to the musical profession, whose decision in the matter, he believed, would be received with satisfaction. Mr. Watson, on behalf of the Committee, then addressed the several societies, and, after alluding in complimentary terms to their respective performances, stated that they had decided in favor of the society under the leadership of Mr. Grill. The announcement was responded to with rapturous applause. Mr. Schilling then communicated to the German portion of the audience the same fact. The prize goblet was then handed to Mr. Grill, who soon filled it with wine, and handed it round among his competitors, creating considerable amusement. The audience was then favored with "The Anvil Chorus" from "Il Trovatore," which was encored and received with great applause.

HRR MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The regular season was brought to a close Saturday, July 17, with Il Trovatore—(small end of the horn!) The National Anthem was sung, Milles, Tietjens and Alboni taking the solos. The Musical World sums up the season thus:

The season commenced on the 14th of April, and concluded on the 17th of July. When we consider that there were several series of performances after the theatre closed last autumn, and that another "season" is immediately to follow (at reduced prices), the period allotted to the "subscription" will not be found short. Formerly the "season" before Easter, although included in the subscription, was a mere preliminary, in which subscribers had little or no interest. "Reduced prices" are now a necessity of the times, and will, no doubt, in the end become a rule instead of an exception. A guinea for a stall, and a half a guinea for a seat in the pit, must restrict the privilege of attending performances at the Italian Opera to the wealthiest classes. These may support the establishment for eight or ten weeks in the summer; but, if the period is to be extended, the tariff must be lowered, and the support of the general public solicited.

The feature of the season just terminated was the engagement of Mlle. Theresa Tietjens, who, on the opening night, as Valentine in the Huguenots—performed, for the first time, at Her Majesty's Theatre—established her claim to be regarded as a singer and an actress of the highest order. This new prima donna has created a far greater sensation than any other artist in her particular line since Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli. Madlle. Tietjens, in short, gives us some hope of a legitimate successor to Giulietta Grisi in lyric tragedy—that is, if the "Divia" ever means to repose upon her well earned laurels. Madlle. Tietjens was equally fortunate as Leonora (Trovatore), Donna Anna, and Lucrezia. She also appeared as the Countess in the Nozze di Figaro, but with less marked success. The acquisition of such a dramatic singer, however, is of incalculable consequence to the interests of the theatre.

The only absolute novelty of the season (the Huguenots being so well known to London audiences) was Verdi's Luisa Miller, an opera which had never attained any high degree of favor, either in Italy or elsewhere. It was necessary, however, that Madlle. Piccolomini should have a new part, and she had played Luisa in one or two theatres on the Continent. Moreover, Signor Giuglini was to be well suited in the hero, while Alboni had consented to assume the most insignificant character in the piece. Luisa Miller, nevertheless, was a failure, in spite of the clever acting of Madlle. Piccolomini, the excellent singing of Signor Giuglini, and the perfect art of Alboni.

One of the happiest incidents of the season was Alboni's resumption of the part of Maffeo Orsini in Lucrezia Borgia, which she had abandoned for several years. The success of the brindisi was greater than ever, and Alboni was compelled to repeat it twice every evening. The other operas in which Alboni appeared were the Barbiere (one night only!—Signor Belart being the Count, and Signor Belletti, Figaro), the Trovatore (Azucena), and La Zingara (Queen of the Gipsies).

Signor Giuglini added two new characters to his repertory—Raoul in the Huguenots, and Rodolfo in Luisa Miller. He lacked the chivalric bearing of the Huguenot leader, but sang much of the music with remarkable effect. His Rodolfo was a highly finished performance.

As usual, Signor Belletti proved himself one of the most useful and industrious members of the establishment. His histrionic talent was occasionally open to criticism, but his singing was always irreproachable.

Madlle. Ortolani did good service as Marguerite in the Huguenots, and Elvira in Don Giovanni; but as Cherubino in the Nozze di Figaro she was hardly so successful. Madlle. Specia, so much extolled last season, appeared only once—in Verdi's Nino, as Abigail. Why only once is a mystère de coulisses.

The extra season, at reduced prices, commenced the following Tuesday with the Huguenots. Don Giovanni and La Traviata followed.

DRURY LANE.—The series of Italian Operas closed, July 17, with Don Giovanni, in which Mmes. Persiani, Rudersdorff and Donatelli, and Signors Naudin, Badiali, Rovere, &c. appeared. Our brave old baritone, Badiali, is greatly admired. Persiani, too, in spite of age and wear, is praised for her artistic florid execution in Linda.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—'Otello,' an opera

dubbed as "heavy" by those who find Signor Verdi's music "passionate," was revived on Tuesday with so much success, as to warrant a fancy that even "the world of quality" is coming to its senses, and beginning to set a right value upon better, worse and worst music.—Rarely, however, has 'Otello' been given so finely, since the days when Madame Grisi, Signori Tamburini and Ivanoff, Rubini and Lablache were grouped on the stage of the old house—days that might seem almost like a dream, were not the Desdemona of the cast still singing, still efficient. Assuredly, we never heard Madame Grisi in fuller energy and possession of her voice as Desdemona, than on Tuesday; and never saw the part—formerly not one of her best parts—played by her with so much melancholy tenderness and delicacy. Her third act—which is very trying, from its absence of any screen or shelter for the singer—was remarkable in freshness, finish and force.—Signor Tamberlik is welcome back again from America. His roamings seem to have altered his voice little; perhaps it is less powerful, but then it is, generally, less tremulous than formerly; perhaps he throws himself more frequently than formerly on his topmost notes—being invited so to do by the triumphs of his c sharp in Paris. As an artist he stands where he stood;—is sympathetic rather than complete—not equal to Otello (the noblest tenor part in the Italian repertory); nevertheless, makes himself acceptable by a certain warmth and earnestness, without coarseness, which are not to be resisted. He was warmly received, and his duett with Iago (Signor Ronconi) was re-demanded. Signor Neri Baraldi, who always takes pains, was Rodrigo—Signor Tagliafico, the Elmoro. On the whole, the concerted music—and how delicious it is!—was very well sung.

But the justice of the world of Fashion to 'Otello' will not bribe us to connive at its follies;—will not make us fancy M. von Flotow's 'Martha,' produced on Thursday last, other than an insipid opera—a work not wise in story, not strong in music. The former is too well known to require dissection anew, the latter has little vigor or character to bear it up through such process. We have no contempt for fan painting—none for filagree jewelry, but the one must have Coppel's daintiness of touch, and the gold of the other must be pure, its traceries, too, new in pattern. M. Aubert delights us—we have a corner of indulgence for Adam—because they are "French of Paris," whereas M. von Flotow, as a composer, is French after the school of Stratford-atte-Bowe, spurious and spiritless in comparison with his originals, without redeeming solidity. This character includes his 'Stradella' (which, for a time, was the opera throughout Germany), his 'L'âme en peine,' and his 'Martha,' with slight instigations. We may return to the opera for the purpose of illustration; and because its performance at Covent Garden is noticeable for its picturesque richness, and for this week we can only state that English Fashion appears to have given 'Martha' a first place in its affections,—that Signor Mario sang his aria, 'M'appari,' as no one else could sing it,—that Madame Bosio's 'Last Rose of Summer' might have been warbled by the "first rose of spring" (could the flower take the nightingale's part), so freshly tuneable was it,—that Signor Graziani, who is Plunketto, an English farmer, was as little like any such character as possible,—that Madame Didiée was piquante as the lady's lady in attendance,—and Signor Tagliafico preciously absurd as the old courtier, Tristano.—Athenæum, July 3.

Otello was repeated twice, Fra Diavolo, Martha, and Il Trovatore, too, indefinitely. Don Giovanni and Zampa were announced. On account of the absence of Herr Formes, Ronconi was to play Leporello for the first time. Mario would make his first appearance as Don Giovanni; and Grisi, Bosio, and Marai were to take the parts of Donna Anna, Zerlina, and Elvira.

Paris.

The engagements entered into by M. Calzado for the approaching season of the Theatre Italian comprise, it is said: M. M. Mario (though this is questioned), Tamberlik, Galvani, and Graziani (brother of the baritone), tenors; Graziani and Corsi, baritones; Zucchini and Angelini, basses; Mmes. Grisi, Alboni-Penco, and Rosa de Ruda, sopranos; and Mme Nantier-Didiée, contralto. A new ballet pantomime, in two acts, called Pacountala, has been produced at the Grand Opera, with great splendor and success. The story is from an old Indian drama, by M. Théophile Gautier; the music by M. Ernest Reyer, who composed Selain and Maitre Wolfram; the principal part danced and acted by Mlle. Amalia Ferraris, who is highly praised.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal.

Matrimonial Jars. Comic Duet. S. Heath. 25

A dialogue between husband and wife, of very comic effect. The music is light and sprightly. The piece may be performed as a Song, without losing any of its points, as the two conversing parties never join voices. The whole is a good-natured farce, which will make everybody laugh.

Sweet Remembered Music. Song. S. Glover. 25

A Song in praise of the charms of old familiar music. The melody of "Home, Sweet Home" has been ingeniously introduced in the accompaniment. This is a very happy idea, and one which will make this Ballad a favorite.

O Think no more of Me. S. Glover. 25

Another light and pretty Ballad by the same popular author.

O were I but a Moonlight's Ray.

German and English words. A pathetic Love-Song, which is very much admired in Germany. A fine melody, only supported by a few chords, leaves everything to the singer.

Somebody is Waiting for Somebody. Ballad.

L. V. H. Crosby. 30

One of Charles Swain's prettiest Songs—the music easy and very pleasing. Cannot fail of being a success.

Instrumental.

The Atlantic Telegraph Schottische. A. Talery. 50

One of the most spirited and pleasing of the compositions of this eminent author. Illustrated in colors by Bufford, with a view of the Niagara and Agamemnon at the moment of parting to lay the cable. A representation of the landing at Trinity Bay and Valentia is also presented, with a lithographed fac simile of the cable, and a view of Windsor Castle and the Capitol at Washington; the whole forming a very pleasing memento of the occasion.

Ocean Cable March. Handel Pond. 25

A very pleasing March, of moderate difficulty, containing some excellent bits of melody. It will find many admirers.

Valse d' Amitié. H. A. Pond. 25

A very graceful composition, which will prove highly acceptable to young players.

La Sonnambula (Revue Melodique.) Four Hands. Beyer. 1.00

Another number of this popular set of Duets. As operatic Four-Hand pieces these pot-pourries are now played in preference to all other arrangements.

Elements of Velocity. Part Third. Bayers. 50

It will be agreeable news to the many teachers who have selected this work for introduction into their classes, that the third part has been issued. This work is destined to occupy a high position among the books for early instruction.

Books.

The Golden Harp. A Collection of Hymns, Tunes, and Choruses for the Use of Sabbath Schools, Social Gatherings, Pic Nics, and the Home Circle. By L. O. Emerson. 25

The sixth edition of this early day after its first publication, is good evidence of the rapidly attained popularity of this book—a popularity based wholly on its merits as a Music Book for Sabbath Schools. It has been introduced into many large schools, and has in every case given the fullest satisfaction. This is not surprising when a hasty glance at its pages discloses to us such a numerous collection of old favorites, interspersed with so many new pieces that must become equal favorites with the public as soon as known. Individuals whose interests are enlisted in the cause of Sabbath Schools cannot do a better deed for the good of that cause than by examining this work, calling the attention of their friends to it, and introducing it into use in their respective localities.

Nobody can have seen it.

From the German of O. F. GRUPPE.

Fast down the staircase swinging,
With flying feet I past;
Quick up the staircase springing,
He came, and caught me fast;
And the stairs are dark and dim,
Many a kiss I had from him,—
And nobody can have seen it.

Down into the hall demurely—
The guests were assembled there,
My cheeks flushed hot, and surely
My lips did their tale declare.
I thought they looked at me, every one,
And saw what we together had done,—
Yet nobody could have seen it.

The garden its sweets displaying Beckoned me out of doors;
The welcome call obeying,
I hastened to look at the flowers,—
There blushed the roses all around,
There sang the birds with merry sound,
As if they all had seen it.

"Don Giovanni" arranged for Sig. Mario.

The recent performance of Don Giovanni at the Royal Italian Opera, London, (July 29 and 31,) has called out curious comments from the critical press. The Musical World says:

What changes were made by Donzelli, Brahnam, and the rest, we have no means of ascertaining; but if as many as Signor Alary finds necessary for Signor Mario, it must have been a sad thing for Don Giovanni. We feel convinced that one hundred per cent. less meddling with (and muddling) the music of Mozart, would have suited Signor Mario infinitely better. There is no reason why the whole of the introduction should not be sung in the same key—whether that key be F, the original, or a note higher, in which latter case Mad. Grisi would be obliged to strain a point or two. Anything would be better than the introduction "after Signor Alary"—anything would be better than the transposition of the last ten bars in the overture, the rush (or rather tumble) back into the right key, after "Notte e giorno" has been sung in G—than the clambering (or scrambling) a note higher, when Signor Alary is desirous of once more finding himself at G (minor) in the trio for basses—than these and other such barbarities. Anything would be better. A passage or so out of Nino, Luisa Miller, or the Tre Nozze, would be better. But then Sig. Alary would not have touched £300—and Sig. Alary would have been worse, not better, for that. These are indeed commercial times. Money can command anything, even to the mutilation of a chef-d'œuvre that has been honored and revered for well-nigh three quarters of a century. Sig. Alary, however, has acted magnanimously in signing his handwork, which otherwise might have been attributed to Mr. Costa—no, not to Mr. Costa—to Mr. Alfred Mellon—no, not to Mr. Alfred Mellon but to Mr. Horton, an unoffending gentleman, whose worst crime was that of copying out the parts—Sig. Alary's parts—and sticking them into the music books for the orchestra.

"Transpositions were indispensable." Good—but surely not so many. "Alterations were inevitable." True—but surely not such alterations as those which disfigure the quartet in B flat (Act I.) and the trio in A (Act II.). About the recitatives there may be conflicting opinions. Ours is, that for the most part they have been awkwardly accommodated to the voice of Sig. Mario, who is often restrained by them where fluency is most desirable.

To leave this part of the subject, however, (which we shall re-consider on a future occasion), and to be purely and briefly historical—Don Giovanni was presented on Thursday (and will be repeated to-night) with the following cast:

Don Giovanni, (first time,) Sig. Mario; Leporello, (first time,) Sig. Ronconi; Zerlina, Mad. Bosio; Donna Anna, Mad. Grisi; Donna Elvira, Madlle. Marai; Don Ottavio, Sig. Tamberlik; Masetto, Sig. Polonini; Commendatore, Sig. Tagliafico.

The house was crammed to the ceiling—as might, indeed, have been anticipated. The excitement was very great, and augmented as the opera went on. There were six encores: "La ci darem" (Bosio and Mario), "Batti, batti" (Bosio), the trio of masks (Grisi, Marai, and Bosio), "Deh vieni alla finestra" (Mario), "Vedrai carino" (Bosio), and "Il mio tesoro" (Tamberlik).

For the present we would rather suspend our opinion of the new Don Giovanni and the new Leporello, both of whom must get accustomed to their parts before they can do full justice to themselves, to the music, and to the drama; but we are much mistaken if Sig. Mario and Sig. Ronconi do not in the end far more than realize all that was expected of them. The other characters were unexceptionable. Mad. Bosio sang deliciously. Madlle. Marai very cleverly, and Sig. Tamberlik superbly. Sig. Tagliafico and Sig. Polonini should have medals struck in their honor, as the very acmé of perfection in their respective characters of the Commandant and Masetto. Mad. Grisi's Donna Anna, (although, unfortunately, "Or sai chi l'onore" was transposed a tone,) could hardly be surpassed in grandeur. The orchestra was magnificent (in spite of the brass and the cymbals); and the chorus every thing that could possibly be desired. But why not Mozart's score, instead of three trombones at the "wings," in the scene of the cemetery? And where was the chorus of demons when Don Giovanni is dragged away to punishment?

To-night will, in a great measure, decide what Thursday has left undecided. To-night will either fulfil or disappoint expectation. To-night will show whether (thanks to Sig. Mario,) Sig. Alary's Don Giovanni is to become a fixture in the repertory, or to be abandoned as "perfunctory." But of that, the general "getting up" of the opera, and several other matters connected with it, more—much more—in our next.

The same paper casts a glance or two around, during the performance, to see how its neighbor critics look, and pleasantly reports as follows:

THE "DON GIOVANNI" CONTROVERSY.

We may as well call it so, for controversy it is sure to be. All who swear by Her Majesty's Theatre will be deeply offended at the liberties taken with Mozart's text by the singers of the Royal Italian Opera. A classic fit will seize on everybody, from Mad. Puzzi to Mr. Fish. And so it should be. What we hope from the result is, that the indignation hurled against the murderers of Mozart will have not only the effect of purifying Mr. Gye, but that Mr. Lumley himself may profit by it—since he also has a murder or so to answer for.

The press has not yet—with the exception of the Advertiser and the Telegraph, the first of which is cautiously, the other furiously "classic"—declared itself in full. The rigid Post, however, and the bending Herald have issued short paragraphs, which are so strongly opposed that we cite them both, as signs—not of the "Times," but of the "Post" and "Herald."

POST.

"Last evening the opera of Don Giovanni, with Mozart's music altered and arranged by Sig. Alary, was performed at the above theatre.

"The transpositions of key were as under: 'La ci darem,' from A to C. 'Or sai chi l'onore,' from D to C. 'Fin ch' an dal vino,' from B flat to D. 'Deh vieni alla finestra,' from D to G (only a fourth)—'O statua gentilissima,' from E to G. To the overture two horns, three trombones, and an ophicleide were added. To the finale to the original first act the same instruments, invigorated by the grosse caisse and cymbals. Where the keys of Don Giovanni's music were not altered, the notes were. The opera was also divided into four acts, another entirely novel arrangement. To compensate, however, for additions, several pieces, namely, 'Ho capito,' 'Dalla sua pace,' and 'Non mi dir,' were omitted. The encores, notwithstanding, were numerous, and the applause throughout warm, if not violently enthusiastic."

HERALD.

"The production of Don Giovanni, with Signor Mario in the character of the dauntless libertine, and Signor Ronconi in that of his faithful attendant, has been long looked forward to as an event of unusual interest, and its fulfilment, last night, was witnessed by the most crowded audience that has been seen within the walls of the new theatre. For the present we can but record the complete success of the performance. Those who expected to see in Signor Mario a Don Giovanni unprecedentedly handsome and gallant, and noble in bearing, were not disappointed; and those who anticipated a want of due effect in the music, through the changes necessitated in order to de-barytoneize the part, were mistaken in their previsions. The usual encores occurred in the usual places, and the reception of Signor Mario, who was called forward between the acts and at the fall of the curtain, was most enthusiastic."

The Post, in the fulness of its classicism, might have added "Notte e giorno" (from F to G), and the trio for Giovanni, Leporello, and the moribund (from F minor to G minor), to the transpositions.

The Advertiser is, as usual, a model, sui generis. Annoyed, as an amateur so keenly alive to the gradations of tone would naturally be, the critic, nevertheless, resigns himself (after declaring that "the overture was the perfection of instrumentation") to the desecration of Mozart, on the following philosophic grounds:

"The first scene, with its 'Notto e giorno,' convinced us, and every subsequent one confirmed the conviction, that we must content ourselves with a compromise, and give up the music and the bass-ground of the concerted pieces, vide an extra-comic reading and an exuberance of humor—in voice, manner, and gesture—in the representative of Leporello. Those not present who have heard Ronconi's 'Largo al factotum,' can imagine 'Notto e giorno,' which was its counterpart."

The startling information of "Notte e giorno" being a counterpart of "Largo al factotum" is succeeded by an equally philosophic apology for Signor Mario:

"Mario's entrance was greeted, despite the incongruity of the scene with such an interpolation. He played admirably in the brief contest, and delivered the lines, 'Ah! già cade il sciagurato,' with a clear ring that, for an instant, reconciled us to a tenor Don Juan."

Remark that neither "incongruity" nor "interpolation" has been hinted at before. The "clear ring," however, may reconcile us to that seeming inconsequence. Madlle. Marai is praised for her singing "to the asides of Mario and Ronconi," and the latter for his "very curious version of 'Madamina'"—the curiosity of which escaped us, since he sang every note of it, and in the right key. The following is not less "perfunctory":

"Viva la libertà" was certainly not above average, and the finale to the act was better historically than musically; that is to say, more justice was done to Lorenzo da Ponte than to Wolfgang Mozart."

The truth is that the first finale was never more magnificently executed; but the Advertiser has evidently been used to the political version of "Viva la libertà," in which (for the sake of an encore,) the singers vociferate "Pray make yourself at home," as if it was a revolutionary pœan. Sig. "Tamberlik sang 'Terzi il ciglio' earnestly." What, may we ask, is "Terzi il ciglio"? To have done, however, here is the summing-up of our conscientious and much-perplexed contemporary:

"We should like to witness, at least once again, this version of the greatest opera extant. Our veneration for Mozart renders us tenacious of this return to a system of dealing with the works of great composers, which we had hoped had passed away. We are bound, however, to admit, that, compared with the enormities of "adaptation," as it was called, perpetrated by Bishop, M. Alary has held his hand remarkably. The Covent Garden Opera has too great resources, and Mario and Ronconi too high a reputation, to necessitate such a mode of dealing with the great works of great authors. So much of the opera was rendered in a manner to do honor to any stage, that it is with regret we record our unfavorable impression of the effect of this change in the vocal proportions of the opera, as it came in its perfection from the hands of its composer."

This is, at least, courteous, and for one of such fierce classical prejudices, conciliating.

The Telegraph is savage beyond measure, besides being wholly forgetful that sad shortcomings have been visited with urbane indulgence—not to say downright eulogy—in another place.

We shall return next week to the subject, which will doubtless supply abundant room for comment up to the end of the season.

The Athenæum (July 31) does not care to have "classicality" run itself into the ground, and thus remarks in advance of the performance:

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The late period of the week at which the long-talked-of revival of "Don Giovanni" took place, and the remarkable interest attaching to it, render inevitable the postponement of a detailed account of its performance till next week. But a study of its "cast" may, meanwhile, be offered as prefatory. It required no sibyl to foresee the stir sure to be excited by the changes necessary to render "Don Giovanni" possible by the artists engaged in it at the Royal Italian Opera; and Mr. Gye doubtless considered beforehand that he must prepare to strike a balance betwixt the admiration sure to be at the service of Signor Mario as the Don, and of the astuteness and comicality of Signor Ronconi as Leporello—and the groans of the classicists affronted and afflicted at the hands of irreverent adaptation laid on Mozart. That the latter, when over-puritanical, are anything rather than classical, we have said often and again; nothing can be more puerile or ignorant (for instance) than their crusade against singers' ornaments in music which it was intended that singers should ornament. We know, also, that the present arrangement of "Don Giovanni" is not altogether new, as a piece of sacrilege (if such it is to be considered), since Garcia and Signor Donzelli and other tenors, whose voices had power in their lower register, have already ventured it. We may thirdly point out that the one only basso cantante who, for the last quarter of a century, has been acceptable as Don Giovanni was Signor Tamburini—the part requiring the combination of qualities, natural and acquired, which is among the rarest things in opera. Perhaps, therefore, until some courtly, chivalresque, handsome, rakish southern, with a bass voice both long and light, complete as a musician and as a vocalist, and lively without coarseness as an actor, shall arrive—such a performance of Mozart's opera as should be given implies a choice of evils. But one evil is not, therefore, to be overlooked—especially by those who protest the loudest against Art being trammelled by prudery. Change of passage is one thing—change of texture another. Not all Malibran's wondrous fire and audacity—not all the life and passion with which she animated the stage, could avert an important loss of force and brightness, to the music of "Fidelio," when she was the Leonora. The inspiration was there—often the precise notes—even the modifications were effected with an ingenuity admirable in itself; but the quality of sound required was wanting. A preternatural viola leading a quartet would not be satisfactory as replacing a mediocre violin. So again, in spite of all Signor Ronconi's stage genius and ability to make the most of every quarter of a tone of the limited voice with which Nature has endowed him, it is impossible to avoid feeling how perilously the music of "Guillaume Tell" is weakened, and how some of its greatest effects are utterly lost when he sings the principal part. In "Don Juan," it must be felt, that the score rests on two basses beyond what is common. Not merely have the Libertine and his familiar to keep the scene alive by their action; but the amount of musical weight and responsibility devolving on them will be seen at a glance by any one who looks no further than the opening scene—or at the first finale—or at the sestet "Sola, sola"—or at the cemetery duet. In all these (and they are four of the most dramatically and musically important portions of the opera), substitution not of notes only, but even of one tone for another, must be attended with loss. We must consider, when we record what happened and is happening at Covent Garden, how these difficulties, which there is no evading or denying, have been met.

Truth about Music and Musicians.

Translated from the German by SABILLA NOVELLO.

II.

ON MODERN GERMAN COMPOSERS IN GENERAL.

"Nous avons des produits, nous n'avons plus d'œuvres."

DE BALZAC.

The culminating point to which creative tonal art has, as yet, been carried (I do not say to which it may be carried), was attained by Beethoven. This giant spirit has been succeeded by no composer who, for genius, may be compared to, or preferred above him. Should any individual claim such distinction for some modern master, you may confidently tax him with impudent puffery or blind idolatry. I have detailedly proved my assertion in my letters on the most remarkable composers who have succeeded Beethoven; and now it only remains for me to speak generally of the weaknesses and deficiencies discernible in the newest school, and of those which are, to a certain degree, its characteristics.

Most of our modern composers are deficient in clear, ascertained, and intimate knowledge respecting the aim and resources of their art.

Every musical piece should induce particular sentiments in an audience, and express particular ideas; but every thought should and must be depicted in a certain form, and, indeed, in the form best adapted to it. Form is the salver, so to speak, upon which thought may be gracefully presented and easily discerned. All those things which are defective in form are unbeauteous, for they contravene the desire of human nature for order, law, and regularity. He who should assert that a musician need not restrain himself to given forms, or need not observe any form at all, would speak as nonsensically as he who should declare monsters to be idealized creaturines.

Unfortunately, in many modern works we miss regular and therefore beautiful form, and find, in its stead, formlessness—that is, a heap of ideas thrown wildly and promiscuously together, without order and without meaning. Why is this? Some know not what form should be; they have, if I may so express myself, no musical logic in their heads. Others, on the contrary, consider absence of rule and form to be novel (this it is, but it is not good), or to denote genius, and to be an opening "to new paths."

When listening to modulations roaming into every possible key, on every possible occasion, I can but suppose that he who misemploys these is not aware that modulation of key is merely an echo to modulation of sentiments, and should only represent and reflect back the varying emotions of the human heart.

Consider Papageno piping his cheerful song, and, in juxtaposition, Don Giovanni, when visited by his supernatural guest. Examine, in both pieces, the harmonic and modulatory treatment, and you will be struck by the propriety, the faithfulness, the consistency of the chords and modulation employed by Mozart. You will find in Papageno the greatest simplicity—in Don Giovanni, on the contrary, complex harmonies and rugged transitions. Examine, in comparison, any work of one of the lauded modern composers, and you will not require to search long before you find the simplest emotions described by intricate harmonies and modulations.

This ignorance of appropriate musical coloring is also displayed in the extravagant use of instrumental masses occasionally, as a general habit, and occasionally for inappropriate passages. The introduction, in equal portions, of contradictory colors, is as great a defect as the employment of false colors; a masterpiece will only result from contrast skillfully adjusted.

Should a painter place a blooming rose-bush in a winter landscape, or should he paint a green sky and red water, everyone would be shocked at his ignorance or madness; but is it not as outrageous for a composer (you may hear this and similar effects often enough, at present,) to accompany the pathetic lamentation of a tender virgin with blasts of trumpets and trombones? Do not think that I exaggerate. In Kreutzer's Nachtlager von Granada, for instance, the complaint of the maiden for her lost dove is accompanied by trumpets, drums, and trombones!

Why do the moderns err so constantly in like manner? I will answer you by a sentence from Lessing: "All rules were then confounded, and it was generally declared pedantic to dictate unto Genius what it ought and what it ought not to do. In short, we were on the point of recklessly throwing aside the experience of past ages, and of demanding, in preference, that each man should re-create Art for himself!"

This is perfectly applicable to our music. All wish to be free, and consider every rule as a shackle. Not only are ancient theories suppressed (against this I have nothing to object), but the eternal laws of truth and beauty, that alone can satisfy, are rejected, and thus ensues, not freedom, but license.

Perhaps it must be confessed that Hegel's philosophy, which so long reigned in Germany, has influenced our German music, at least some composers, with regard to manner. For, as many imitators of Hegel imagined they had said something very sapient and profound when they disguised their insignificant thoughts in strange phrases, insulting to Man's understanding, so that no one knew what they meant—thus, also, many composers think to elevate themselves above others, by straying from the traditional language of Music, and forming gibberish phrases from which nobody can glean sense, and which cause me to ask: "Musique, que me veux-tu?"

A crying defect, which accounts in great measure for the above evil, is the want of earnest and comprehensive study.

Glance backward to our great masters? How long, and with what zeal, did Haydn labor through the works of Bach, and, especially, through the severe exercises of Fux's Gradus ad Parnassum! How diligently did Mozart pursue the study of counterpoint in all its divers branches! And what mastery did he thus obtain over the disposition of inner parts; with what ease and charm did he know how to employ the most scientific combinations belonging to our Art! It is no wonder that he succeeded in whatever he attempted, and had the power of presenting each theme in the best and purest form. "Perfected strength alone can give perfect grace."

On the other hand, assemble living composers, and demand from them proofs of their skill—of their facility in the use of contrapuntal art; demand from each, for instance, a fugue—a double or triple fugue—which cannot be produced without the knowledge and practice of canon, and of the different double counterpoints;—you will find that only one in ten can write a fugue—a double or triple fugue—and that will be a bad one; only one in a hundred will accomplish it without fault.

Such ignorance of technical knowledge and technical practice is incompatible with the creation of a great musical masterpiece; we might as reasonably expect that a mason's apprentice should build a palace, or that a color grinder should paint a Raphael-esque Madonna. The result of this want of technical knowledge and practice is an infinity of ballads, etudes, pot-ponrris, fantasias, or whatever else such frothy ware may be titled, which overwhelms us in the present period. Composers shrink from the grander forms of the symphony, the sonata, or the quartet; for these require consistent treatment and thematic development of musical phrases. When these composers, notwithstanding their deficiencies in science and experience, attempt greater works, these must be meaningless, empty productions, that flit like shadows across the public mind, and disappear for ever.

The want of earnest study accounts for the superficiality which forms a salient feature of the new school. As none are fitted, by severe and constant study, to produce lasting works, application is absent; thus writers are incapable of devoting themselves with requisite perseverance to one work, and of laboring unceasingly to obtain the proper and faithful pre-sentiment of their ideas, which should be altered and improved until the whole creation be really perfected in all its details.

In the biographies of Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, every student may read how long these masters sought after a theme—how long they altered and improved it, until they judged it worthy of treatment. That which the ancients sought for during weeks and months, the moderns demand in an instant, and take the first which occurs for the best.

The greatest masters in all arts have held superficiality of study to be a principal cause of the dearth of solid works. Not a single immortal production exists which was not completed by arduous industry. Schiller says: "For years and years a master toils, and yet can never satisfy himself;" and on another occasion he even speaks thus: "Genius is industry," as, before him, Buffon had said: "Genius is patience." Rellstab adds: "And all those who have endeavored by the sturdy exertion of their whole powers, to develop the artistic capabilities lying dormant within them, will appreciate the truth of these apparently strange words." Goethe says: "By continuous research we may raise the Imperfect to the Perfect." Lessing declares: "I am more suspicious of 'first thoughts' than were ever De la Casa and old Shandy, for even though I hold them not for instigations of the wicked Enemy, real or allegoric, yet I always opine that 'first thoughts' are merely 'first,' and that the best hits do not always swim at the top of a soup. My first thoughts are assuredly not a whit better than anybody else's first thoughts, and—ANYBODY'S thoughts need not be printed and published!" Carl Maria von Weber speaks thus: "Strenuous industry is the magical conjuration which summons to our aid the subtle spirits of Imagination. How foolish is it to believe that severe study lames the powers of the soul!" and thus Lichtenberg: "It has been asserted that men have existed who, in penning down an idea at once found the best form for its representation. I scarcely believe this. The question will always remain, whether the expression might not have been improved by re-considering the idea itself; whether a more condensed sentence might not have been preferable, whether some words were not superfluous, and so forth. It is not in human nature to write, for example, like Tacitus, in an off-hand, dice-throwing wise. Careful purification and polish are as essential to propriety, in the presentation of an idea, as of the human body." And thus Börne: "If there be a talent, which may be cultivated by industry, it is that of style. No one should immediately write down all that pops into his head, and no one should immediately print all that he has written down."

It was reserved for the modern hurry-forward school to throw overboard these old-fashioned views, to raise up the exact contrary into a rule, and to conceive rapidity in composition to be a sign of genius, because Schiller says (but ironically): "The gift of genius is bestowed in dreams." But—lightly come, lightly gone! The evanescent creations of an hour are like the ephemeral myriads, which buzz and dance for a short day, in order—to die; while the works of our masters endure in inexhaustible vitality and eternal beauty.

Besides other evils two extremes disfigure our modern music. Firstly, it is too heavy and unmelodious. Beethoven, in his latter days, became deaf, melancholy, suspicious, and misanthropic; and his works, as naturally ensues, are influenced by his gloomy imagination and his disturbed equanimity of mind: now, as these identical works have been, and are extolled by critics, as the most excellent and profound creations of his gigantic spirit, poor imitators fancy that their works will resemble those of Beethoven, if they, like him, become melancholy, or, at any rate, compile melancholy, gloomy, and inexplicable works. This feeling has prevailed so long that the best of the moderns do not dare to raise a cheerful strain, or publish a simply-constructed, naturally flowing, and generally intelligible melody, because they fear that critics will denounce them as unscientific and frivolous.

"Life is serious, let Art be gay." Many of our modern German composers seem to have forgotten that Art must procure enjoyment for mankind; and we may unfortunately class among novel inventions, the use of music as a means of filling the soul with dark and dismal dreams, and of oppressing the mind with Alp-like heaviness. Agreeable melody is contemned, and therefore many modern symphonies contain not one single melodious phrase to which the sensations of a listener's breast may respond.

Besides agreeable melody, some moderns contemn unsophisticated human feelings, such as peace, pathetic emotion, &c., and throw themselves exclusively into a frenzy of the wildest passions, which ought to be seldom displayed, and then, merely as a means of contrast.

In the meanwhile, the public enjoys surreptitiously, so to speak, that which it really loves. It is to be hoped that a prediction which I have somewhere read, will soon be verified: "At length, however, the million must discover that, with the exception, perhaps, of some popular dance-tunes, the music written for its entertainment consists of nothing but a thick fog of tones."

As every extreme calls forth its opposite, so, many of our modern musicians are too inconsiderate and frivolous. This is mostly evinced in piano-forte music, under the shape of countless "pot-pourris" from new Italian and French airs; but all these concoctions are greedily bought, which clearly proves that lovers of music yearn after melody.

Up to Beethoven's epoch, the language of sound became more and more distinct, more defined, and therefore more generally intelligible. But Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, knew clearly what they wished to say, and rested not until they found for their thoughts the aptest and most intelligible expressions. Many of the moderns do not really know what they would say or express in their compositions; they are not thoroughly conscious of their aim, and therefore clutch, at hazard, among musical phrases. Can we then wonder that the public cannot tell what such works signify—that it hears them without enthusiasm, or even prefers not to hear them at all? When originally-powerful and heart-stirring ideas fail, it is the fashion to be striking by force of blows, on cymbals, drums, and kettle-drums, and to impress the ear, if not the heart. If some of our composers had no brass at their command, sadly would their music be wanting in effect.

Another evil is the mania for originality, which causes writers, deficient in all which constitutes true originality, to substitute for it unnatural, harsh modulations, violent and unconnected phrases, unheard-of harmonic combinations, and an utter disregard of all rule. But a noble idea makes the deepest impression in a natural form; only worthless ideas need decking out, to look like something.

Evils, again, are the desire of being in print as soon as possible, which furnishes the world with much unripe stuff;—and the ease with which transitory fame may be obtained by the hot-house process of newspaper puffery and party-spirit adulation.

I will continue this subject in a future letter. For the present, adieu.

From the New York Tribune, Aug. 20.

German Student Celebration in New York.

Love for Alma Mater—the sad longing and yearning that attends us throughout our whole life for the scene of our first manly joys and triumphs—is one of the nobler sentiments that is felt by college students and graduates of all countries and nations alike. But especially does the German student carry this feeling to a sentimental pitch. So delightful are his reminiscences of the jovial, riotous Burschen Leben, that ever afterward he is accustomed to denounce the day of his being graduated as the saddest one of his life; and scarcely a single individual of them leaves his university for the last time, to enter anew into Philister life, without shedding bitter tears. During his career as a student, however, there is little evidence of this feeling which is to sadden and embitter his existence; for a more practical, matter-of-fact personage than the German student is seldom seen. He is practical in his dress and accoutrements, his friendships and his quarrels, (which latter are made capable of scientific adjustment) his scores and his settlement; and, above all, he is practical in his pursuit of pleasure. "Physiology and statistics," says a writer on this subject, "are the principal branches to which the student directs his attention during the earlier years of his academical life. He confines his exertions to that portion of the former science which treats of the growth of hair on the upper lip and chin, while with regard to the latter he devotes himself with the most intense application to the study of the number and accommodations of the different places of amusement and houses of entertainment in the town where he resides." He is a firm believer in the philosophy contained in that famous couplet of Martin Luther:

"Who loves not Woman, Wine, nor Song, Remains a fool his whole life long."

and equally zealous in the service of Venus, Bacchus, and Apollo, it would be difficult to say which of the three qualifications for wisdom contained in the verse occupies the most important place in his affections.

Whenever the operation may have been performed in the flesh, the German is first born in the spirit when he enters a university. Minerva-like, he comes in booted and spurred, with a sword dangling by his side. It is long, however, before he adopts the olive-branch for his symbol. In the mean time there is a peculiar life before him, of which we in this country know very little. An unceasing succession of intrigues and feasts; friendships formed, and, what is better, adhered to; duels fought, and countless scars given and received; beside a mighty consumption of tobacco and lager beer—mark the course of life pursued by the German student, until he unfortunately—as he himself describes it—graduates, and, covered with the fig-leaves of a successful examen, sees the flaming sword of Eternity interposed between him and his Paradise. What wonder, then, that in whatever path he may direct his course through the world, his mind clings with unflinching affection to the scene of his early pleasures—to the spot where he embraced, for the last time, his associates, "mossed over" with the accumulations of many semesters? Whether his life is marked with happiness or full of care and trials, his fondest thoughts are sure to be those connected with his Bursch life in the University.

Accordingly, when it was announced that the University of Jena, whose history is linked with that of Klopstock, Fichte, Schlegel, Schiller, and a host of lesser lights, intended to celebrate on the 15th, 16th, and 17th of this month her three hundredth anniversary—when it was understood that Humboldt and several other octogenarian graduates of the last century were to honor the celebration with their presence—and particularly when the news arrived that the town rulers had decided to present the students with two entire brewings of beer, although with praiseworthy economy they refused to add to the gift seidels to drink it from—those of her proud graduates who, whether from reasons political or ambitious, had taken up their abode in this city, determined to have a celebration on their own account simultaneously with their friends at home. Months ago a committee was appointed to take charge of the matter, and finally it was decided to have a grand Commerz or Beer Festival, in which all the parties above-mentioned, except a few who went to Europe expressly to attend the celebration at home, pledged themselves to participate.

On Tuesday night the festival came off in the Constance Brewery in East Fourth street. The hall in the second story of the building was decorated in the most elaborate manner, the walls being hung with wreaths, in the midst of which appeared the colors and arms or circuli of the various student associations of Germany. These were shields bearing the initial letters of each association or Verbindung, traversed by a letter C, representing Circulus, and beneath, the letter V, for vivat. Thus the letter W, with a C through it, implied Circulus Westphalia vivat. Between the shields, of which there were a large number, were arranged in rows, the weapons used by the students when giving vent to their duelling proclivities. In the front of the room was a large transparency, representing a student and a knight—emblematic of the Burschenschaft and Chorburschen—shaking hands across the coat of arms of the German empire. Above was inscribed, "Semper floreat Jena," and beneath, the figures 1558—1858. On each side of the transparency were inscribed, in alphabetical order, the names of all the German universities. At one end of the room were engravings of the town of Jena and portraits of many of her students.

So much for the decorations, which were merely incidental, and had nothing to do with the ceremonies of the evening. In the centre of the room were ranged two tables, on each end of which lay two broadswords with basket hilts, such as are used in the duels at Jena. About one hundred ex-students were present to participate in the festival, some of them young, the majority middle-aged, and some, again, old and silver-haired, but all of them merry and full of glee at the prospect of once more enjoying one of the favorite festivals of their youth. It was a reproduction, on a smaller scale, of exactly the same scenes as were taking place at that very moment in Jena; and we doubt whether a more truthful picture of at least one phase of German student-life has ever been witnessed in this city. Nearly all the persons present wore the self-same little, flat, vari-colored caps which they had worn while in the University; and although the dresses were thoroughly American, and evidently selected with a view to the warmth of the evening, still a few peculiar costumes were to be seen, among which the short blue blouse, with two silver crossed hammers on the shoulders, worn by some mining students from Freiberg, in Saxony, were most conspicuous. The appointed hour approaching, they all took their seats at the tables, and proceeded to make preparations for remaining where they were, by laying before them their snuff-boxes, papers of smoking tobacco, and their cigars, and as the smoke began to rise in clouds above their heads, cries of "Beer!" rose wildly in the air, and drew a timid echo from the crowd of wondering urchins outside.

At nine o'clock the band opened the festivities by playing a German national air, which had no sooner ceased than order was called by the Presiding Committee, members of which, standing at the head of each table, struck violently upon it with the swords we have mentioned, until the clatter was so great that it was impossible to converse, and order being thus compelled, the opening speech was delivered by Dr. Rittler, the oldest Jena student in the city, a gentleman of venerable gray locks, who has seen thirty-seven years slip by him since he retired into Philister life. He dwelt at some length upon the object of the celebration, and after thanking the representatives of other Universities and the strangers for their presence, he declared the festival to be opened. Rapidly emptied mugs greeted this announcement, and the band struck up the first song:

"Beloved brethren, welcome here,
With heart and hand we greet ye."

After each verse the rattling of the swords prevented all other interruption, and the company remained silent, or fortified themselves with draughts of beer for the exertion of singing the next stanza.

At the conclusion of the song Dr. C. Schramm was announced as the next speaker. He spoke for some minutes, drawing a picture of what was then taking place at home, leading his hearers from one locality in Jena to another, describing the festivals in "Paradies," and the neighboring hamlets, until finally the pent-up feelings of his listeners could no longer be restrained, but burst out in a prolonged shout that shook the building. His speech was the longest of the evening, and was followed by a drinking song, concluding with the following philosophical sentiment:

"When our strength has left us,
And God of Wine bereft us,
Then, old Charon, we will follow thee."

The beer drinking was now at its height, and the distracted waiters ran frantically to and fro in the vain attempt to supply all at once. A vapor like that which exhales from the mouth of Erebus filled the room, and made a perceptible, almost tangible darkness. Around the room, in kaleidoscopic groups, the old affectionate Burschen caressed each other with the fondness of girls, as they went over, in imagination, the scenes which, years before, they had shared. Not the least pleasant feature of the evening was the fact that several recognitions took place between friends who had separated forever, as they thought, in the fatherland, but who had all been brought by the mysterious dispensations of Providence to the New World, where they had lived some time in the same city without knowing of each others' presence here. The pleasure of such recognitions, made on such an occasion, can only be appreciated by those fully conversant with the deep sentimental spirit of affection that pervades the Teutonic character, and which Emerson is pleased to attribute to the Anglo-Saxon also, and to all the races which ramify from that mighty parent stock.

We must pass hastily over the speech delivered in Latin by Professor Fuster, from Vienna, which was greeted with appreciative applause, though a company of American students would scarcely have understood a single sentence contained in it—as well as over the speech in English by Mr. Parker, of this city, and the eloquent address of Dr. Rothe, which was received with great enthusiasm. A Dr. Bergmann endeavored to get a hearing, but his words took such a political sanguinary hue that he was put down, after a combat in words that, had the company been composed of Americans, would have resulted in a fight and ended in the station-house. These we pass by to say a few words concerning the singing of "Der Landesvater," which concluded the ceremonies. The company, being seated vis-à-vis, sang the Weihelied, or Consecration Song, and at the concluding verse the persons standing at the head of the tables proceeded along the sides, placing in each individual's left hand a sword, and in the right a seidel of beer. This sword the person receiving it struck as though fencing against that of his opposite neighbor, and at the last line of the stanza, taking off his hat, ran the sword through it up to the hilt, and drank off his beer to the "welfare of the fatherland." This was repeated with each person in order, and when the swords were entirely covered with hats, the ceremony was repeated and the hats were returned to their owners. In doing this they were taking oaths of fidelity to Germany and the German institutions, especially that of Burschendom.

This concluded the order of ceremonies, and now, according to the programme, the "feast ended and the pleasure began." The hand of time was on the stroke of one, and our reporter, regardless of the maxim,

"Drink to a certain pitch, and then give o'er, Lest tongue and feet should stumble drinking more," left the gay party growing merrier every instant, and lighted by the burning of City Hall, wended his solitary way homeward.

(From Aris's Birmingham Gazette, July 26th.)

Mr. Leslie's "Judith."

This work, which we have reason to expect will be a highly interesting feature of our approaching Festival, is from the pen of a young composer, Mr. Henry Leslie, who, though educated as an amateur, has gained a distinguished position among the musical artists of the day. His reputation for several years has been gradually rising. His oratorio of Immanuel has been received as the first fruits of a genius destined to high achievements; and his second work of the same class, about to see the light in the Town Hall of Birmingham, will, we doubt not, more than fulfil the promise given by the first.

Having had the opportunity of examining the score of this oratorio, we feel ourselves entitled to speak with some confidence of its merits and probable success.

In respect to subject, Judith has greatly the advantage of its predecessor, Immanuel, which, with all its musical merit, creates an impression of heaviness; being too much of the nature of an exposition of abstract religious truths. Judith is a dramatic poem, full of stirring incidents, calculated to excite strong interest, and affording ample room for musical expression and effect. The story of the poem is told by its title; for who does not know the Jewish heroine, whose arm, by a single blow, delivered her country from the Assyrian yoke? The subject, strictly speaking, can scarcely be termed sacred, as the Apocryphal books are not admitted by our Church into the canon of Scripture. Yet, though we deny their claim to inspiration, we receive them as trustworthy portions of Jewish history; and history contains few things grander or more beautiful than the noble stand made by the Jewish people, under the Maccabees and their other heroic leaders, against the gathering storms which surrounded them on every side, and at length swept them from among the nations.

The poem is by Henry F. Chorley, a gentleman of well-known literary ability. In constructing it he has adopted the language of the original narrative, intermixed with appropriate passages from other parts of Scripture.

It is in three parts, or scenes. The first, entitled "The Beleaguered City," paints the internal condition of Bethulia when Holofernes and the Assyrian host sit down before its walls. While the people are distracted by fear and disunion, Judith appears among them, rebukes them for their want of confidence in the Most High, announces her design to attempt their deliverance, and departs, followed by the prayers and blessings of the priests and people. The second part, called "The Camp of the Assyrians," describes the arrival of Judith and her attendant in the camp; her introduction to the Assyrian chief; the blandishments wherewith she captivates him; the banquet to which he invites her; and the orgies in which she pretends to join, while she watches for the moment when she may strike the blow. In the third part, "Night and Daybreak," we have the completion of the enterprise, and the deliverance of the city, celebrated by songs of praise and thanksgiving.

We may now point out a few remarkable passages in the music. An instrumental introduction, well calculated to awaken attention, is followed by a chorus of the people of the beleaguered city, in the gloomy key of F minor, commencing in a suppressed and scarcely audible murmur, indicative of dismay, but gradually rising to an expression of firmness and resolution. This chorus at once shows the facility and clearness with which the composer manages large masses of humanity. It leads to a duet for a soprano and tenor voice, "Spare thy people, O Lord," remarkable for the graceful flow of the solo parts, and the soft, subdued harmony of the accompanying chorus. A brief recitative describes the suffering of the besieged people, dying of famine. They rise in their despair, and clamor violently for peace. This scene is graphically represented by a succession of brief impetuous choruses of the people mingled with the replies of Ozias, the chief of the city, who endeavors to calm and encourage the multitude. Suddenly Judith appears among them, and in a recitative of great energy reproves their violence, and exhorts them to trust in the Almighty. They answer in one voice, "Pray for us, for thou art a godly woman!" The prayer of Judith, in answer to this appeal, is an air of great beauty and deep solemnity, which, as delivered by Madame Viardot, will be one of the most impressive passages in the oratorio. A brief chorus of the people concludes the first part.

The scene now changes to the besieger's camp, and the second part opens with a monologue of Holofernes—an air in a pompous and grandiose style, characteristic of the leader of the Assyrian host, and admirably calculated to display the powers of a fine barytone voice. Judith and her attendant appear in the camp, and are surrounded by the soldiers, whose hasty questions, with her brief replies, are treated in that terse and dramatic manner of which we find such remarkable instances in St. Paul and Elijah. The soldiers escort her to the general's tent, and while she is waiting for admission, her attendant, Amital, addresses her in words of counsel and encouragement; a situation which introduces a magnificent air by the principal soprano (Judith's part being a contralto), "The Lord preserveth all them that love Him." It is the bold and open key of A major, and full of brilliant passages demanding a voice of great power, compass, and flexibility. They are then admitted into the presence of Holofernes, and the interview assumes the form of a trio between the general and the two females,—a concerted piece equally dramatic and beautiful, in which the characters of the different persons are finely discriminated and sustained. It is elaborated with masterly skill, and contains several striking effects of modulation, especially a transition from the principal key G, at once to E flat. This trio will be one of the most marked features of the oratorio. The finale to this part is a remarkable piece of sound-painting. The shouts of Holofernes and his joyous company, "Come, drink, and be merry with us!" the gay rhythm of the music, accompanied by the barbaric clang of brazen instruments, suggesting the idea of martial pomp mingled with songs and dances—while the two Jewish women, apart from the rest, are heard from time to time to utter ominous words to each other; all these things unite to form a picture which brings, as it were, the whole scene before our eyes.

In the third part, the sounds of the revel continue to be heard, but they are waxing low. The feasters are still singing their bacchanalian choruses, but in faint and drowsy murmurs, while the two Jewish women are repeating to each other the legend of Jael and Sisera, their suppressed voices mingling with the dying choruses. At length Holofernes is left asleep upon his couch, with Judith alone in the tent. She implores the Divine aid in a short air or cavatina, for the composer appears to have wisely judged that this situation could not be protracted; but the air is beautiful and full of the deepest expression. The deed of blood, rendered heroic by patriotism, is narrated in recitative, accompanied by the orchestra in agitated chords and modulations. The recitative goes on to relate the escape of Judith, and her return to the gates of Bethulia. Her call, "Open now the gates! God, even our God, is with us!" is a grand piece of musical declamation, quite suited to the great performer to whom it is destined. The gates are opened, and the heroine enters amid fanfares of trumpets. She is welcomed by Ozias, the chief of the city, in a great and highly-wrought air, full of energy, demanding a tenor singer of the very highest order. Then follows a trio for Amital, Judith, and Ozias (soprano, contralto, and tenor), which leads without interruption to the first great chorus, the first three solos being continued to the end. It is a strain of joy and thanksgiving, in which the composer has put forth all his contrapuntal strength. We observe that he, like Mendelssohn in his latest works, does not adhere to the scholastic form of fugue-writing. His counterpoint is free and unembarrassed by those technical restraints, while it is strengthened by all the legitimate resources of art. The different parts are of the most skilful and masterly texture, while the solo voices, with which the masses of harmony are blended, stand out in bold and brilliant relief from the choral back-ground. This noble chorus, in short, is a climax worthy of the great work which it brings to a close.

THE "FREE AND EASY."—In whatever condition of life a man may be, if he is at all disposed to ruin himself, he will find society very well disposed to help him. There is, therefore, a 'finish' for the poor as well as the rich. This institution is generally known under the title of the 'Free and Easy.' As you pass down one street you may perhaps read an announcement which runs as follows:—"There will be a Free and Easy at the Cat and Bagpipes every Saturday and Monday evening." It really is a very captivating invitation. I have a great many engagements of which I should like to shake myself 'free.' I have many troubles and anxieties, and it would be a delightful thing to feel 'easy,' if it were only for half an hour. Suppose, then, we look in at the 'Cat and Bagpipes.' Well, here we are! Nothing to pay—walk in. What a horrid smell of bad tobacco there is! There is such a smoke that one can scarcely see the other end of the room; and what a villainous odor, composed of the combined fumes of porter and gin, beer and brandy! Let us sit down for a few minutes at this table. 'Waiter, take away these dirty glasses, and brush off these cigar ashes.' There, it is a little better now; only some one has been eating nuts, and one can't put one's feet to the ground without cracking the broken shells. 'Silence, gentlemen, if you please,—the celebrated tenor will now favor the company with "Life on the ocean wave." Puff puff, rises the tobacco smoke, keeping time with the notes of the celebrated singer, who resumes his seat amidst loud cheers. Then up start a couple of waiters—"Your orders, gentlemen, give your orders." Presently one comes to our table—"What shall I get for you, sir?" "Nothing, thank you." "But every gentleman is expected to take something, sir." "Oh, indeed! we thought the admission was free." "So it is, but every gentleman (laying emphasis on the last word) is expected to spend a shilling when he comes here." Well, as we are disposed to see a little more of the Free and Easy, we are obliged to submit. So we order our hot with, or our cold without, as the case may be. At the next table to us are three or four very young men. Indeed, one would have called them boys, if we had not been told that no boys were admitted. Partly because they wish to seem quite at home and used to it, and partly because they are afraid of the waiter, and think that whenever he looks at them they must order something, they have already got more than they can carry, and will have some difficulty in finding their way home. However, silence is called again, because the orders are only coming in slowly, and the company needs to be refreshed with another song. This time it is Madam Squallini, from Her Majesty's Theatre and all the principal concerts in Europe. What a condescending lady must this be to come away from the presence of royalty to amuse the people at the Cat and Bagpipes—in yellow gauze and dirty white kid gloves! However, she takes to it kindly, and there is more applause. Then the same thing goes on over again. More brandy or gin is ordered: the lady gives place to a gentleman who sings a comic song, which every now and then contains some allusion which amazingly amuses the audience, and the more it borders upon indecency the more they are amused. But the place becomes unbearable. Let us go into the fresh air. Look up at those quiet stars; see how in their sublime order and beauty they sail across the nightly sky. Try to lift up your thoughts to that immortality of which they seem to us to be the types, and to the sudden contrast between you stinking hell and these glorious heavens; ask yourself whether any man with an immortality before him can ever be the better for attending a 'Free and Easy.'—From the Rev. H. W. Parkinson's Lecture in the Public Hall, Roehdale, Eng.

Beethoven's Symphony in A.

This symphony was written when Beethoven was in the zenith of his power, and contains within itself distinctive marks of his transcendent genius in almost every feature that can give sublimity and beauty to instrumental music.

It dates about 1813, having been first performed at a concert given at Vienna, in December of that year, for the benefit of the Austrian and Bavarian soldiers wounded at the battle of Hanau.

The symphony opens with an introduction of great grandeur, in which the melody, the modulations, and the orchestral features successively dispute the interest with each other. It commences with one of those effects of instrumentation of which Beethoven is uncontestedly the creator: the full orchestra strikes a strong and sharp chord, leaving suspended, during the silence which succeeded, a single hautboy that has entered, unperceived, in the preceding crash, and which goes on to develop a sustained melody.

It is impossible to conceive a commencement more original. Repetitions of the sharp chords ensue, again and again; after each of which, the legato theme grows, by added parts, till it attains a full harmony, when it gives place to a new feature, namely: a series of staccato scale passages in semi-quavers for the stringed band, accompanied, or interspersed with fragments of the melody first heard, and modulating by various gradations into the key of C, where it is interrupted by a plaintive, touching theme, simple in itself, but richly harmonized. The stately staccato passages of scales again march suddenly in, with fuller accompaniments than before, and again give way to a repetition of the plaintive melody in the key of E, ending, after a prolonged and tantalizing crescendo on the tonic chord of this key, on an E, struck fortissimo in unison by the whole band. This note, subsequently kept very prominent, is first ornamented with fragments of the original melody, and then becomes the subject of a jeu de timbres between the violins and wind instruments, analogous to that in the finale in the Sinfonia Eroica. It is tossed about from one band to the other for six bars, changing its aspect every time, until at last, retained by the hautboy and flute, it serves to connect the introduction to the allegro, and becomes the first note of the principal theme, of which it gradually defines the rhythmical form. We have called particular attention to this magnificent introduction, as it is in movements of this character that the power of great composers is frequently most displayed. The one here referred to, and the opening largo to Mozart's piano-forte and wind instrument quintet in E flat, may be instanced as standing at the very pinnacle of musical excellence—worthy rivals to each other, but altogether unapproached by any efforts of less gifted minds.

The theme of the Allegro has often been reproached for its rustic naïveté and want of dignity. This probably would not have been the case, had its author written in great letters on his page, as in the pastorate, "Rondo of Peasants." If there are some critics who dislike being pre-informed of the subject treated by the musician, there are others, on the contrary, always disposed to receive ungraciously everything that is presented to them in a strange dress, unless they are told beforehand the reason of the anomaly.

The phrase in question has a rhythm strongly marked, which, passing afterwards into the harmony, is reproduced under a multitude of aspects, scarcely ceasing its measured march until the end—a determined employment of rhythmical form which has never been attempted on such an extensive scale elsewhere; although in minor pieces—as, for example, in Schubert's songs—the idea frequently appears. This allegro, of which the extensive developments run constantly upon the same idea, is treated with such incredible skill—the changes of key are so frequent and so ingenious—the harmonic and other technical features so novel and often so bold—that the movement finishes before the attention and lively emotion which it excites in the audience have at all abated.

An instance of the wonderful manner in which true genius can triumph over rule, is furnished by the daring resolution, near the end of the first part, of the chord A, C sharp, E, and F sharp, upon A, C natural, and F natural, and which, though it is impossible to find any satisfactory warrant for it on theoretical grounds, offers no unpleasant effect to the ear. Probably, however, this is, in a great measure, due to the skilful change of instrumental coloring that accompanies the transition.

The symphony is peculiarly celebrated for its Andante. The principal cause of the profound sensations excited by this extraordinary movement lies also in the rhythm—a rhythm as simple as that of the Allegro, but of a form perfectly different. It consists merely of a dactyl followed by a spondee, and repeated incessantly; sometimes in several parts, sometimes in one only; sometimes serving as an accompaniment, sometimes concentrating the attention on itself, and sometimes forming the subject of a fugue. It appears first, after two bars of sustained harmony, on the low strings of the violas, violoncellos, and double basses, nuanced by a piano and pianissimo full of melancholy; thence it passes to the second violins, while the violoncellos and violas sing a pathetic lamentation of an inexpressibly touching character.

The rhythmical phrase, ascending continually from one octave to another, arrives at the first violins, which pass it, by a crescendo, to the full force of the wind instruments of the orchestra, while the plaintive theme still accompanying it, but now given out with extreme energy, assumes the character of a convulsive, heart-rending wail. To this succeeds an ethereal melody, pure, simple, sweet, and resigned.

The basses alone continue their inexorable rhythm under this melodious howl in the clouds; it is, to borrow a citation from the poet,

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike o'er our joys and our woes."

The violins finish by a few pizzicato notes scarcely perceptible; after which, suddenly reviving like the flame of an expiring lamp, the wind instruments breathe the same mysterious harmony they commenced with, and—

"the rest is silence."

It is not improbable that this wonderful, pathetic movement may have been intended by Beethoven to portray his own feelings under the terrible calamity that afflicted him: the only part of this symphony that its unfortunate composer ever heard, was the roll of the drums!

The Scherzo modulates in a manner altogether new. Its original key is F; and the first part, instead of passing, as is usual, into a key related to this, terminates in A major. The Scherzo of the pastoral symphony, also in F, ends somewhat analogously in D major, and there are other affinities between the two.

The trio is one of the most remarkable and original morceaux which ever proceeded from Beethoven's pen. At the close of the Scherzo, on a unison passage in F, an A, occurring quite naturally, and without any appearance of design, is suddenly held by the whole band; transfixed, congealed, as it were, like the sleeping beauty; and is retained through the whole of the following movement, one hundred and thirty bars long, without cessation. After four bars of the single note, a lovely melody in D major creeps in, the time being considerably slackened to give the change more effect; this is repeated with a slight reinforcement, after which a second part is introduced leading to a repetition of the first part fortissimo. The management of the retained A throughout this time is effected with consummate art; the composer knew well that so long a retention would be apt, after a while, to pall upon the ear, and lose its effect, unless the auditor were occasionally reminded anew of the presence of the note; and this is effected by making it play on a few neighboring grace notes in the intervals between the various phrases of the accompanying melody. Again, the note is at first taken for some time in octaves by the first and second violins; but in the second part a low A is added on one of the horns; and, oddly enough, this added note does not remain steady, but throbs occasionally—winks, as it were, every other bar—upon the G sharp below it, signalling, as plainly as if it spoke, to the audience, "Mark me well."

After the end of the second part, where a crescendo interposes to pass to the forte da capo, this throbbing becomes accelerated, and takes a most extraordinary form, beating a binary rhythm against the triple time of the other parts, and strongly accentuating the accidental G sharp instead of the essential note itself, as if apparently to throw the latter into the shade; but, in reality, with such marvellous skill as to draw attention to it more forcibly than ever.

Meanwhile the other parts make a crescendo by a series of bold chords, and the original melody bursts out with the full band—the never-ceasing A being now thrown with startling effect upon the trumpets and drums. This extraordinary feature never fails to command the astonishment and delight of the audience. The theme of the trio, simple as it is, furnishes a striking example of a melody whose character may be entirely changed by the manner in which it is taken. When first played, smoothly and softly, it is sweet, beautiful, pastoral; when repeated by the full orchestra, it is grand, majestic, sublime. The same remark has been justly made of the fine passage, "The kingdoms of this world," in the Hallelujah Chorus of the "Messiah."

The Finale is not less rich than the preceding movements in novel features, in piquant modulations or in charming fancies. The commencement, a sharp chord of E, struck by the strings, answered instantaneously by the wind instruments, and followed by a dead pause, appears to be designed to call attention to the unusual form of the principal subject, commencing on the same chord.

This theme has some relation to that of the Overture to "Armida;" but it is in the arrangement of the first notes only, and for the eye more than the ear; for, in the execution, nothing can be more unlike than the two ideas. The rhythm here again is peculiar, consisting of an accentuation of the second beat of the bar, so frequent as to form the rule, instead of, as commonly, the exception.

The finale abounds in points worthy the study of the musician. One is the graceful and unexpected effect produced by the frequent sudden transition from the key C sharp minor to that of D major. Another is the daring introduction of a B natural, strongly accented and doubled upon the chord F sharp, A, B sharp, and D sharp, with C sharp as a pedal bass.

A third is the unwonted close of the first member of the movement in C sharp minor instead of in E, as rule would prescribe. But the greatest marvel is the coda. After the first or preliminary cadence, a few chords prepare the way for a most elaborate working of the first phrase of the theme, repeated in every bar for fifty-six bars together, and accompanied by combinations of the most striking originality.—After a few introductory imitations, on simple harmonies, the basses, taking the subject on the upper E, commence a long descent, continued first diatonically through a twelfth to the low A, where the feature changes to a chromatic form; G sharp and E are taken alternately for a few measures; then G and A flat, then G and F sharp, and so on; the descent gradually progressing a semitone every three or four bars, till it reaches E and D sharp, which continue for a long time; the E forming a pedal note, embroidered, as it were, by the continued alternation of the semitone below in equal measure. All the while the violins keep up an increasing reiteration of the subject in various keys, accompanied in corresponding harmonies by the wind band, and gradually rising sempre più forte on the grand pedal point above named. Here the chord of the seventh frequently occurs, so that the D natural of the upper parts finds itself directly opposed to the D sharp taken by the basses—a daring harmonic experiment: yet so perfectly calculated, that not the slightest discordance results, each note performing its own office without interfering in the least with the other. Half way through the pedal point, the violins throw off impatiently the trammels of the figure that had so long bound them, and burst off into a series of the most brilliant passages; the basses still keep steady for some time to their E, but at last can no longer resist sharing in the jubilee of the rest of the orchestra; and the whole comes to a conclusion with an overpowering éclat—an ending worthy of such a master-piece of genius, imagination, feeling, and technical skill.

In the present age of musical taste and discernment, when it is difficult to listen to this symphony without a feeling akin to worship of the genius that could create such a series of gigantic conceptions, how strange does it appear to be reminded, that when it was first produced, a man no less great and true than Carl Maria Von Weber wrote "that the extravagances of genius had reached their non plus ultra, and that the author of such a symphony was fully ripe for a mad-house!" And yet we do not think a whit the worse of Weber for his judgment; it only proves to us how much Beethoven was in advance of his time. —New Philharmonic Analytical Programme.

BOSTON, AUGUST 28, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: The Praise of Friendship, by MOZART. This beautiful composition is a true musical inspiration of the social sentiment, and suited to many a happy gathering of friends. So far as we are informed, it has been until now, like many other noble works of Mozart, wholly unknown in this country. The first four pages of it got into last week's paper prematurely, by mistake, and therefore without editorial introduction; we had intended to continue the Lucrezia Borgia arrangement last week, and commence the Mozart Cantata this week. One more instalment of four pages will complete it, when we shall again address our selection to the Italian side of the house.

The Cantata: Praise of Friendship consists of a chorus, written for two tenors and bass, but practicable for soprano and contralto; recitatives and two arias for tenor (or soprano), and a repetition of the chorus at the end. The bass part is printed in the G cleff, like the others, which will make it the more readable for a contralto. We have translated the German words as faithfully as we could, but it has involved some awkwardness in the recitative portions, which a good recitativist will know how to tutor to some sort of grace. There is nothing which requires more taste and judgment than to deliver a long piece of recitative expressively.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We suspend, for the present, our translations from HENRI HEINE's musical notes in Paris, hoping to give another course of them at some future time. They are a strange mixture of good and bad, but all original and bright and readable, and characteristic of the man, who did not have such wit and sharp acumen save at the expense of too much acid in his nature—or rather in his acquired morbid temper, for he was a true poet, one of the sweet singers from the heart, and therefore we are bound to believe him good at bottom. The most delicate and sympathetic natures, those peculiarly strung for finest harmony, are just those which in false circumstances are most easily and cryingly thrown out of tune. Many things which we have so far translated we do not like at all, so far as opinion and tone of feeling are concerned. That melancholy, and we must say cruel picture of Spontini in his morbid last days, would be too bad without an offset, showing the composer of the Vestale on his bright and truest side; and such an offset we intend to give. Then, too, that last, about Jenny Lind, was altogether flippant and in a sneering and unworthy tone, which made it an act of self-mortification to translate it; but we thought it best to complete what we had begun, and let the bright, cold satirist flash all his colors under a musical sun. As to his sins against Mendelssohn, we turn him over to the London Musical World. And we take this occasion again, for the hundredth time, to remind our readers, especially all sensitive musicians—Germans, Italians, natives, psalm-book-makers, or what-not—that our miscellaneous selections in this paper are not by any means confined to views that we in all respects endorse; and above all, that whatever we may copy, because it happens to be a bright or clever statement of one side of a matter, we have nothing whatsoever to do with any personalities that may chance to lurk in it. We publish much that is not intended to advise or to direct, but only to inform the reader, leaving it to his own sense and experience to judge about the right and wrong of it.

The musical drought continues, here in Boston, as every where else, except in London, where the deluge is beginning to subside. The concert at Nahant, last Saturday evening, given by Miss FAY, filled the large hall of the hotel full of delighted listeners, judging from the reports that come to us. Mr. BENDELARI's "Echo Song," written expressly for his pupil, seems to have given especial pleasure. The other selections were from the well-known Italian operas of the day, in which Signors BRIGNOLI and AMODIO bore part acceptably as ever. The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall still attract the crowd. Mrs. MOZART, the singer, lately from Chicago, sang on Monday evening. No doubt the brass bands play well, and some of their pieces come out as well in the bronze form as in any other, but we had rather hear them in the open air. And in the open air we did hear one the other night, under circumstances that made the music highly edifying. We chanced to be sitting with friends in Jamaica Plain, on an airy, rocky height, among the hemlocks, under the fall moon, when from a neighboring height, about half a mile off, came suddenly the sounds of a brass band,—a richly-harmonized and animated quickstep; the tones were finely blended and in perfect tune, and sank and swelled upon the air, with magical effect. After a pause, in softer tones, came the ever delicious Minuet and Trio of Maskers from Don Giovanni (that is the music for a band by moonlight!); then a galop, or a quickstep, clearly and daintily staccatoed; then Schubert's Lob der Thränen (Praise of Tears), quite feelingly discoursed. What more we cannot say, as the inexorable train came to bear us back among our native bricks, not altogether so romantic as those Roxbury plum-pudding rocks by moonlight. It was our Boston Brigade Band that made the music, and the people of Jamaica Plain do well to secure to themselves a series of such entertainments for the summer nights.

We ought to have "a solemn music"—not in the sense of mournful, but of noble, grand, and edifying—as a part of our part in all-the-world's Atlantic Cable celebration on the first of September. Perhaps we shall have, but we do not hear of any marshalling of orchestral or choral forces. Brass bands, of course, will do their part. But certainly at such a time we ought to be prepared to have the Choral Symphony of Beethoven—that great Symphony of Joy, which sings of the embrace of all the myriads of mankind; and we ought to have Haydn's Chorus: "Achieved is the glorious sun" and some of the great choruses "of Handel," to say the least, besides what may be achieved in the open air on our illuminated Common. We will not go so far as our brethren in England, who doubtless will not be content without several courses of whole oratorios; but something of the grandest that the Art of Tones has given us for an inheritance ought surely to be brought out with swelling hearts on that day. We see that in New York the Harmonic Society are to take charge of the musical exercises upon that occasion: will not our Handel and Haydn Society do likewise?

Two of our most valued musicians and pianists, OTTO DRESEL and J. TRENNLE, took passage by the Niagara, on Wednesday, for Europe; and both, we regret to say, for the same cause, ill health. It is their intention to be gone but three months, spending most of their time in Leipzig and other musical cities of their Fatherland, and to return to their Boston friends and pupils by the first of December. May they come full of new life, for we cannot spare such as these! . . . We have just a line from our friend, A. W. T., written August 6th, on board ship, off the coast of England, after a month's passage by sailing packet. He was well, and our readers will soon hear from him in Germany.

We receive a great many programmes of musical exhibitions of seminaries and academies—mostly of the monster order—in which a great parade is made of tinkling, trifling pieces played on six or ten pianos at once, as if a fly seen through a forty-fold magnifier were still anything but a fly. It is pleasant to see any thing so much in contrast with this ambitious nonsense as a programme sent us of the music performed at a recent exhibition of the Williston Seminary at East Hampton, in this State. These were the pieces: Turkish March, from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (for Organ); Four-part Song, "On the Sea," Mendelssohn; Do., "Student's Song," Mendelssohn; Duet, "While the Dew," &c., Weigl; Four-part Song, "The Nightingale," Mendelssohn; Five-part Song, "Life's Pleasures," F. Hiller; Four-part Song, "May Song," Robert Franz; Allegro from Mendelssohn's first organ Sonata; Chorus, "Then round about the starry throne," from Handel's "Samson." Mr. E. S. HOADLEY, who is at the head of the musical department at the Seminary, must have the credit of this. We are told that the programme does not vary much in character from those of several years past.

Would not the New York Atlas have done well to inform its readers where it got the translation from Henri Heine about Meyerbeer, which it was "compelled from sheer lack of musical material to scissor" for their benefit this week? This ex-scissor-izer, by the way, endorses Heine's estimate of Vienxtemps, which is more than we can do. . . . Mr. J. R. MILLER proposes, in the course of a week to bring out, in this city, the new juvenile Cantata, called "The Haymakers," composed by GEORGE F. ROOT, in the same simple and graceful semi-dramatic style with his very popular "Flower Queen." A numerous and well-selected choir of fresh young voices are in training for it, and it will be given in the Music Hall in a manner to charm the eye as well as ear. . . . A new work, by Mr. G. W. STRATTON, the Manchester (N. H.) composer, has been performed four times lately in that city, to the general satisfaction. It is a children's Cantata, called "The Fairy Grotto," and consists of songs, duets, and choruses, to the number of thirty-five.

A rather peculiar anecdote is told of Vivier, the horn player and friend of Rossini. It is said to be of very recent occurrence in Lisbon. Count de Farrabo a rich grandee, requested the artist to play at a private soirée given by the Count, and accompanied his request by a rich and valuable present. The next day, Vivier inserted the following notice in one of the journals: "M. Vivier never accepts presents, however beautiful they may be; his price for playing at a private party is 1,000 francs." On the day following, in the same journal, appeared this note: "Count de Farrabo has sent a check for 1,000 francs to M. Vivier, the horn player, and would now request the latter to transfer the present to his servant." It is said that M. Vivier's laugh changed to the other side of his embouchure.

Musical Review.

One Hundred Songs of Scotland. Music and Words. Boston. O. Ditson & Co. pp. 64. 8vo.

The dry musical soil, especially where the hot Verdi sun has parched it, needs perpetual re-moistening from fresh springs of melody. The wild people's melodies are always refreshing, and none more so than the melodies of Scotland. We are glad to see a hundred of the best of them collected here in a cheap, convenient, popular form, and presented just as they are, in their naked original shape, nothing but the pure melodies, without accompaniment or harmony, and with the genuine lyric words, mostly from Burns, with which they have become indissolubly associated.

New Songs by Francis Boott.

We had intended sooner to express our pleasure in the receipt of a second number of "Florence," and gladly give place to the following communication:

Will you allow an old friend of Mr. Boott's to express his pleasure at seeing a second number of "Florence," (a collection of six songs by him,) published and for sale by O. Ditson.

Mr. Boott's ballads are particularly well adapted for parlor music, the words being always well selected, and married felicitously to the melody, and (rather a rare virtue in English songs,) never offending against taste. We were sorry to find the Cavalier song published without the chorus, which is not only a dashing and loyal outburst of cavalierism, but, being in the stile fugato, is according to the canons of counterpoint. At the concert, given not long since, at Cambridge, by the Pierian Sodality, this was sung by the fresh, manly voices of the students with great spirit and effect. The "Three Fishers" is very dramatic.

Miss Cushman, who gives great effect to the "Sands of Dee," suggested to Mr. Boott to set these remarkable words to music. "Winter" is a very lively air, with very lively words by S. G. Goodrich. "The Mahogany Tree" is an excellent college song. "Flow, freshly flow," is a beautiful tenor song; the air is sweet and harmonious, and the words—by Meredith—very musical.

The "Black Friar" is a most effective bass song, the accompaniment being rather more elaborate than Mr. Boott's usually are.

We wish our countryman success, and do not doubt that in time, and in spite of the little encouragement given in America to native talent, his charming songs will find their way into our New England homes, where they must be welcome for their sweetness, delicacy, and moderate difficulty.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, AUG. 23.—By the Arabia, last week, came Mons. and Madame GASSIER, with a new tenor named PIERINI, all engaged by MARETZKE for the season that opens on the 30th. Madame Gassier, I am sure, will please our public, and I shall be on hand on the occasion of her debut.

The Jones's Wood Festival has dragged its slow length along, and at last expired, yesterday, in a blaze of glory, with a series of grand Sunday concerts, the programmes of which may not be uninteresting:

PROGRAMME OF FIRST CONCERT.

Commencing at 2 1/2 o'clock.

Overture, L. van Beethoven. Air—"Stabat Mater," (Washington Band, leader, Mr. ATHENS.) Chorus—"The Heavens are Telling," (Creation.) Haydn. Air—"Pro Pecentes," (Stabat Mater.) Rossini. Mr. Weinlich. Chorale—"A Firm Rock is our Lord," Martin Luther. Grand Polymelos, Zulehner.

PROGRAMME OF SECOND CONCERT.

Commencing at 4 1/2 o'clock.

Priest's March, Mozart. Air, with Chorus, Mozart, Mr. Weinlich and Chorus. Miserere, (Shelton's Band, leader, Mr. Grafulla.) Verdi. Air, (St. Paul,) Mendelssohn. Chorus, "The Lord's Day," Kreutzer, the Singing Societies. "Hallelujah," (the Messiah,) Handel.

PROGRAMME OF THIRD CONCERT.

Commencing at 6 1/2 o'clock.

Priest's March, (Athalie.) Mendelssohn. Chorus—"The Chapel," Kreutzer, the Singing Societies. Preghiera, (Mose,) Rossini. Chorus—"Good Night," Marschner, the Singing Societies. Grand Finale, Zulehner.

The daily papers are teeming with the advertisements of Marezek's new opera troupe. We are to have German operas given by resident artists, and the musical season promises to be brisk.

TROVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, AUG. 24.—What think you, most worthy Journal,—we, too, have hedged in a romantic tract of woodland, and have worshipped, simultaneously, Gambrinus and the sacred Nine, beneath the foliage-canopy of time-honored oaks and elms.—George Hood, formerly an attaché of the Academy of Music, and a tall, gaunt specimen of the genus homo, with a luminous pair of optics, having "fared sumptuously every day" at Jones's Woods, New York, (whereof pleasingly and ably discoursed your talented "Trovator," last week,) imbibed, amid sundry glasses of beer, the idea of a Fête Champêtre for his own city. Alas! it grieves me to be compelled to term it a Fizzle Champêtre, for even so it has proved.

In essaying to follow in the wake of your Troubadour, with a description of this sylvan humbug, I beg you humbly,

If, perchance, I fall below
Your "Trovator" or Cicero;
Don't view me with a critic's eye,
But pass my imperfections by.

To "Price's Woods," then, with me, Mr. Dwight, for in that shady grove, hard by the terminus of the West Philadelphia Passenger Railway, was your humble correspondent, Manrico, in company with about two hundred and seventy-five other noodles, Hood-winked in the most amusing manner. The grand entrance to the grounds consisted of a high, exceedingly rough board fence, the splinters whereof ripped apart erinoline, and (let me whisper this into your editorial ear,) in some cases even pierced the delicate limbs of the Teutonic maidens who followed the handful of Turners to the spot. Poised above the enclosure, stood two immense daubs on canvas, representing severally the Niagara at Trinity Bay, and the Agamemnon at Valentia ditto—splendid specimens of that peculiar style of Art which seems to be especially fostered in our own America, and which furnishes us with classic heads, rampant roosters and sly coons, in our political processions.

Inside of the grounds, upon two distinct, hastily-erected platforms, sat a brace of brass bands, which alternately and inhumanly butchered Donizetti and Stephen C. Foster, until the very police twitched their stars nervously, and seemed disposed to end these cruelties by the arrest of all the "blowers."

Suddenly a handful of linen-roundabouted Turners entered the wood, with the measured tread of men who seemed desirous of displaying their superior discipline to an anticipated crowd of great immensity. Spirit of Momus! When the acrobats gazed over the beauteous grove, and in lieu of the masses which their own enthusiasm had led them to expect, and the mammoth posters had promised, beheld the diminutive groups fringing the bases of the trees, they exchanged glances of unqualified surprise, stroked their beards facetiously, disbanded, and were soon perceived to be zealously worshipping at the shrine of Gambrinus. Now, too, did the clerk of the weather frown upon the undertaking, for, as each hour of the afternoon winged its way into the past, the breezes, which came wafted through the woodland, became more October-like, freshening the ruddy complexions of the German damsels, and quickening the motions of those who had cast themselves upon the sward for an Arcadian lounge—"sub tegmine fagi." Then the Turners mounted a platform, and vocalized one of their stirring choruses; but alas! their wonted precision and proverbial enthusiasm paled before the general disappointment. Some of the visitors amused themselves by firing at target, to the infinite peril of those who interestedly looked on, standing in lines ten or twelve feet apart from the range of sight, little realizing how soon a shot from some Winkle might pierce and deface their physiognomies.

A few of the females took to the dancing floors, and wooed Terpsichore with as much zeal as their lovers and brothers had manifested toward Gambrinus. Gradually little knots of persons were to be seen leaving the grounds, glancing at the ticket-seller with looks, which seemed unmistakably to say, "I wish I had my quarter back." Your correspondent, Manrico, and two Southern gentlemen who accompanied him, at this juncture, also vacated the premises, admiring the endurance of those who seemed disposed to remain longer. The Bills also announced a grand pyrotechnic display to come off between 8 and 10 P. M. A friend at my elbow declares this feature to have consisted of three ordinary rockets, which served no farther purpose than to light up, momentarily, a few leaves, as the sparks whizzed through the dense foliage.

Supper, too, on a grand scale, constituted a prominent feature in the promises of the posters. Shade of Epicurus! there was nought provided but a few leviathan junks of cold ham, trimmed with what may perchance have been parsley, but what in reality seemed more akin to diminutive pieces of green ribbon, cut into fantastic shapes.

To-day, the leading Journals display the following in huge type:

"Immense success of the Fête Champêtre!
"Price's woods!"

"Over 10,000 persons present!"
"To be continued for two more days."

You should have seen my mouth grow wider, when I perused the above.

Decidedly the most unique and pleasing musical feature of the whole affair, to me, was a quasi symphonie naturelle, à la Midsummer Night's Dream, which was improvised in the fields adjacent to the woods, by multitudinous beetles, grasshoppers, frogs, bees, and birds, varied ever and anon by the bray of some overworked mule or donkey on the railway hard by. I heaved a profound sigh to the memory of the illustrious Mendelssohn, and returned to bricks and mortar. MANRICO.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The extra season, at reduced prices, closed Saturday, August 7. The operas of the week were Lucrezia Borgia, Il Trovatore, La Zingara (Balfe's "Bohemian Girl"), La Figlia del Reggimento, and La Traviata. The principal singers were Mlles. Titjens and Piccolomini, Mme. Alboni, Signors Giuglini, Belletti, Beneventano, Vialetti, Rossi, and Aldighieri. The preceding week was somewhat better in the quality of musical pabulum it offered: viz., Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, and La Serva Padrona, in addition to the Trovatore. Mlle. Titjens had left for Vienna; Piccolomini and Giuglini went to Dublin.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Don Giovanni, with Mario as the Don, and a great cast altogether, was the one event of the last week in July. A fuller account of it will be found on our first page. Zampa was announced for the week following.

The English Festivals.

BIRMINGHAM.—The great triennial Festival will be held on August 31, September 1, 2, and 3. The principal vocalists are Mme. Clara Novello, Mlle. Victoire Balfe, Mme. Castellani, Mme. Alboni, Miss Dolby, Mme. Viardot Garcia; Signors Tamberlik, Ronconi, and Belletti, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, and Weiss. Organist, Mr. Stimpson; Conductor, Mr. Costa. The programme for the day and evening performances offers about as rich a four days' full as one could wish, to wit:

Tuesday Morning—Elijah; Mendelssohn.

Wednesday Morning—Eli; Costa.

Thursday Morning—Messiah; Handel.

Friday Morning—Judith, (A New Oratorio), Henry Leslie. Lauda Sion; Mendelssohn. Service in C; Beethoven.

Tuesday Evening—A Miscellaneous Concert, comprising Overture (Siege of Corinth); Rossini. Acis and Galatea, (With additional Accompaniments by Costa); Handel. Overture, (Der Freyschütz); Weber. Selections from Operas, &c. Overture, (Fra Diavolo); Auber.

Wednesday Evening—A miscellaneous Concert, comprising Symphony, (Jupiter); Mozart. Cantata, (To the Sons of Art); Mendelssohn. Overture, (Guillaume Tell); Rossini. Selections from Operas, &c. Overture, (Zampa); Herold.

Thursday Evening—A miscellaneous Concert, comprising The Scotch Symphony, (in A minor); Mendelssohn. Serenata (Composed for the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal); Costa. Overture, (Alchymist); Spohr. Selections from operas, &c. Overture, (Euryanthe); Weber.

Friday Evening—A full dress Ball.

LEEDS.—Here the Festival (in aid of the General Infirmary) will be held in the New Town Hall, four days, commencing Sept. 7. Principal performers: Clara Novello, Mrs. Sunderland, Mme. Weiss, Mme. Alboni, Mlle. Piccolomini, Misses Whitham, Walker, Palmer, Freeman and Crosland; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Inkersall, Cooper, Weiss, Santley, Winn, Hinchcliffe; Signors Giuglini, Rossi and Vialetti. Solo pianist, Miss Arabella Goddard. Organists, Henry Smart and William Spark; Choral master, R. S. Burton; Conductor, W. Sterndale Bennett.

The programme for the week is even richer than that for Birmingham; as follows:

Tuesday Morning: Elijah—Mendelssohn. Wednesday Morning: The Seasons (Spring and Summer)—Haydn. Organ Performance. Israel in Egypt (with Organ accompaniments by Mendelssohn)—Handel. Thursday Morning: Stabat Mater—Rossini. Selections from the "Passion Musik" (According to the text of St. Matthew)—J. Sebastian Bach. Organ performance. Mount of Olives (Engedi)—Beethoven. Friday Morning: Messiah (with Mozart's accompaniments) Handel.

Tuesday Evening—Miscellaneous Concert: Symphony (C major)—Mozart. Selections from operas, chorals, pieces, &c. Concerto for Piano-forte (G minor). Miss Arabella Goddard—Mendelssohn. Selections from operas, &c. Overture (Tempest)—Hatten. A Pastoral, "The May Queen," M. S. (the poetry by Henry F. Chorley, Esq.)—W. Sterndale Bennett. Solo, Violin. Selections from operas, &c. Overture (Jesonda)—Spohr.

Wednesday Evening—A Miscellaneous Concert. Overture (Zauberflöte)—Mozart. Selections from operas, &c. Caprice, piano-forte, with orchestral accompaniments, Miss Arabella Goddard—Bennett. Selections from operas, &c. Symphony, the Scotch (A minor) Mendelssohn. Overture (en Suite), J. Seb. Bach. Selections from operas, &c. Solo, piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard. Selections, &c. Overture, (Oberon), Weber.

Thursday Evening—A Miscellaneous Concert. Symphony (), Beethoven. Selections from operas, &c. Concert Stück, piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard, Weber. Selections from operas, &c. Overture (Isles of Fingal), Mendelssohn Overture (Guillaume Tell), Rossini. Selections from operas, &c. Septet, by the Principal Orchestral Performers. Beethoven. Selections, &c. Fantasia, piano-forte. Overture (Jubilee), Weber.

HEREFORD.—The 135th meeting of the three choirs (Hereford, Gloucester and Worcester), comes off Aug. 24, 25, 26, and 27.

At the service on Tuesday, the following musical pieces will be introduced: Overture, Last Judgment, Spohr; Preces, Responses, and Chant La Venite, Tallis; Psalms, Chant, G. Townsend Smith; Grand Dettingen te Deum, Handel; Jubilate, G. Townsend Smith; Anthem, from Last Judgment, Spohr; Psalm XLII, Mendelssohn; Anthem, "The Lord is the true God," Rev. Sir F. A. Ousley, Bart. The sermon will be preached by the Rev. Archdeacon Waring. On Wednesday morning, Mendelssohn's oratorio, Elijah, is to be given; on Thursday morning, a selection from Mendelssohn's Athaliah, Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Haydn's oratorio, the Creation. On Friday morning, according to invariable custom, the Messiah.

The evening concert, as heretofore, will be held in the Shire Hall. The programme of Tuesday evening, among other less important pieces, contains the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, selections from La Clemenza di Tito, and the overture to Guillaume Tell.

Wednesday evening, will bring the overtures to Oberon and Zampa, and selections from Lucrezia Borgia.

Thursday evening, a selection from Rossini's Semiramide, including the overture, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

On Friday night a dress ball at the Shire Hall will bring the Festival to a close.

The principal vocalists comprise Messrs. Clara Novello, Weiss, Clara Hepworth, and Viardot; Misses Louisa Vining and Lascelles; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, T. Barnby, Thomas and Weiss; Conductor, Mr. G. Townsend Smith, organist of the Cathedral.

Paris.

The London Athenæum gleans the following musical news of the gay metropolis:

An Indian ballet on the subject of Sakontala, with music by M. Ernest Reyher, has just been produced at the Grand Opéra of Paris. 'Sapho' (we are told, with reconsiderations of the libretto,) was revived there on Monday last. We trust that such revival will imply the publication of the music. Meanwhile those who have from the first believed in M. Gounod as a composer, are justified in asking those who are hot and hasty in denial of his ever becoming one, what is to be made of such a fact as this? and in referring them to times past, when we ventured from history to say—in defence of our belief—that the first failure of 'Fidelio' on the stage did not imply the utter annihilation of Beethoven's first and only opera. 'Le Moulin du Roi' is the title of M. Adrien Boieldieu's new opera, which has just been given by Benazet to the frequenters of Baden-Baden, the part of the heroine by Madame Miolan-Carvalho. It may therefore, we imagine, form one of the novelties of the Théâtre Lyrique during the coming season, though the report grows that the lady absolutely intends to transfer herself to the Grand Opéra (a dangerous measure, be the temptation ever so golden), taking there with her M. Gounod's 'Faust,' in which she will be the Marguerite. The difficulties of "the Last Judgment" as the subject of a grand opera (which by the way, it is stated, was originally suggested by Michael Angelo's Sistine picture) are said to have been overcome by converting its story into "the Last Days of Heracleum." The novelty of the time at the Opéra Comique, a theatre in a most sickly plight, is a coming (if not come) revival of Grétry's 'Les Méprises par ressemblance,' a work not played for these thirty-six years past, and in which Madame Cassimir, who took leave of the Opéra Comique some twenty years ago, is to re-appear.

Those "simmerings" may be heard which are used to prepare the public ear for the bubbling, boiling, and final projection of a novelty from M. Meyerbeer's enchanted cauldron. It is stated that he has not opposed (as he has been credited with doing) the production of 'Les Blancs et les Blancs,' a coming work by M. Limnander, until his own work (which is analogous in point of scenery) has been disposed of. They manage some matters more honorably in France than we do here,—for instance stage-remuneration. The extraordinary success of 'Le Nozze' at the Théâtre Lyrique has been duly recorded. Our contemporaries now state that the Society of Dramatic Authors has claimed Mozart's rights to profit from the performances, and has forwarded the sum accruing to his surviving son, who is now resident at Milan.

WEIMAR.—The Grand-Ducal Theatre, which closed on the first of July, will open on the third of October, with Gluck's Alceste, under the direction of Liszt.

VIENNA.—The operas announced in the programme of the coming German opera season at the Karntner Thor Theatre are Herr Wagner's Lohengrin; Mozart's Schauspiel Director; Mendelssohn's overetta, Son and Stranger; Adam's Chalet; and La Reine Topaze.

ZURICH.—The Federal Musical Fête, which has just taken place here, drew together an immense concourse of people. The Choral Society of Strasburg was received with acclamations, and, as well as the Swiss Harmonic Society of Paris, received a first class prize.

MUNICH.—Musical libraries seem to be in the market. That of Prof. Thibaut of Heidelberg, well known to students of the art, has lately been secured by the Royal Library at Munich,—a capital which, for some twenty years past, has had small musical importance in Germany. Among other Munich news, however, is the death of Pellegrini, a singer attached to the theatre for something like half-a-century, and who (if we mistake not) was among that memorable company brought hither by Mr. Monck Mason, who did so much towards making London acquainted with German opera. Lastly, we are apprised that the seven-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the town is to be celebrated in the capital of Bavaria in September, and in part by grand concerts fixed for the 25th and 29th of that month. This, let us note for the guidance of autumn tourists, will fall out a few days before the Folkfest of October (one of the most characteristic gatherings to be seen on this side of the Alps) falls in. But who will answer for the tourist, be he fanatico, hearing a note of German music on such an occasion? We observe that the close of the theatre in Dr. Spohr's capital of Cassel this year was marked by performances of M. von Flotow's "Stradella" and A. Adam's "Postillon de Longjumeau." So much for nationality, past, present, or future!—Athenæum.

PESTH.—Liszt is engaged to write a religious composition in honor of Saint Elizabeth, of Hungary, to be executed by the Stephan Society.

PRAGUE.—The performance of Louis Spohr's Jesonda at the Jubilee, under the personal and admirably energetic direction of the talented composer, proved in a truly enthusiastic manner how much Prague appreciates and honors him. Immediately he took his place at his desk, which was adorned with laurel, in the midst of the members of the orchestra, all in full dress to do honor to the occasion, a thousand welcomes and huzzas broke out in the house, which was crowded to suffocation. Every opportunity, however slight, that the performance offered, was seized on with the greatest avidity to express the extraordinary sympathy of the audience for this father of German music. After almost every scene Spohr's name was heard. The Salam duet had to be repeated, and from that point the enthusiasm increased. After the second act the composer was called forward, and was also obliged to appear at the conclusion of the opera, in obedience to a summons which lasted several minutes. The ovation reached its culminating point when Herr Thomé advanced and placed a wreath of laurels on the composer's head. The opera was given in its entirety, and the management is deserving of all praise for having done everything to insure a perfect mise-en-scène.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

Vocal.

The Way to Paradise (Le Chemin du Paradis.)

Jacques Blumenthal. 25

A fine Ballad, by this eminent Pianist, in a kind of melo-dramatic style, which has won for Signor Mario most of his laurels in his late concerts. It is finely adapted for a mezzo-soprano voice or a high baritone, with French and English text.

O, changed is the Scene round my own Loved Home. Crosby. 30

A simple little song of much beauty, by the author of that charming favorite, "Minnie Clyde."

Old Red Cent. Ballad. Alice Hawthorne. 25

One of the best efforts of this popular song writer.

My sister, smiling, passed away. Song. T. H. Howe. 25

This is a charming little Ballad, which should grace the Piano of every lover of Song.

The Spirit Messenger. Song. S. Bernhard Huebner. 25

Bright are the Stars. Serenade for Four Voices. G. W. Stratton. 25

Highly recommended to quartet clubs. Rather easy.

My Heart Beats Quick. Aria. "The Buccaneer." 25

An elaborate Song, in Stratton's new Opera. It is a very fine effort, and will be readily appreciated by all who are familiar with the modern Italian Opera style.

The Adieu. (L' Addio.) Duet. Donizetti. 25

Italian and English words. One of the most charming parlor duets for two female voices that was ever written to Italian words. It is here for the first time presented with an English version. Only moderately difficult.

Beautiful Moonlight. Duet. S. Glover. 30

Melodious and easy. This Duet ranks with Glover's best, and will be as popular as any of them.

Little Dorrit's Love. Macfarren. 25

A simple, little Ballad; and winning melody to touching words.

Instrumental.

Darling Nelly Gray Quickstep. G. B. Ware. 25

A brilliant and effective Military Quickstep, the trio of which is founded on the melody of the popular Song, "Darling Nelly Gray."

Camptown Hornpipe, Silver Moon, My Love is but a Lassie yet, Gordon Blue, Long, Long Ago, Bowld Soger Boy, arranged in an easy manner by T. Bissell. 25

Designed particularly for the Melodeon, but can be used as excellent recreative pieces by the young beginner on the Piano.

Books.

The Masonic Harp. A Collection of Masonic Odes, Hymns, Songs, &c., for the Public and Private Ceremonies and Festivals of the Fraternity. By George W. Chase, K. T., Editor of "The Masonic Journal," &c. 60

The editor of this work has for several years been engaged in collecting materials for a volume that would serve as a complete and practical compilation of Music for the various public and private ceremonies and festivals of the Order, and the result is here presented in a very neat and convenient book of one hundred and sixty duodecimo pages. Every one who examines it will admit that it is far superior to all previous works of the kind. It contains a much larger variety of Odes and Hymns of a devotional character than has heretofore been given; while the complete "Masonic Burial Service," and a "Burial Service for the Orders of Knighthood," will be found not only convenient for such occasions, but to add much to the interest and general effect of such services.

WHOLE No. 335. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1858. VOL. XIII. No. 23.

Fifty and Fifteen.

From the Atlantic Monthly.

With gradual gleam the day was dawning,
Some lingering stars were seen,
When swung the garden gate behind us,—
He fifty, I fifteen.

The high-topped chaise and old gray pony
Stood waiting in the lane :
Idly my father swayed the whip-lash,
Lightly he held the rein.

The stars went softly back to heaven,
The night-fogs rolled away,
And rims of gold and crowns of crimson
Along the hill-tops lay.

That morn, the fields, they surely never
So fair an aspect wore ;
And never from the purple clover
Such perfume rose before.

O'er hills and low romantic valleys
And flowery by-roads through,
I sang my simplest songs, familiar,
That he might sing them too.

Our souls lay open to all pleasure,—
No shadow came between ;
Two children, busy with their leisure,—
He fifty, I fifteen.

* * * * *
As on my couch, in languor, lonely,
I weave beguiling rhyme,
Comes back, with strangely sweet remembrance,
That far-removed time.

The slow-paced years have brought sad changes,
That morn and this between ;
And now, on earth, my years are fifty,
And his, in heaven, fifteen.

Spontini in Berlin.

A REMINISCENCE BY A. B. MARX.*

Some thirty years ago, it was, when the approach of the Carnival season was looked forward to (in Berlin) with more eager and elated expectation than it now is. To be sure, the voluptuous Carnival atmosphere of Catholic and southern lands, the Parisian extravagance, the naive intoxication of the Romans and Neapolitans could find no place here ; to us the richly wreathed cup of intellectual enjoyment seemed better suited. And for this the Opera House opened its wide spaces.

The house itself (we must recall it for the benefit of our juniors,) was a different thing ; only the outer walls are left. There were none of these convenient corridors, these comfortable velvet seats, these hundreds of kinds of triangles and lozenges, medallions, and other sorts of arch-pieces, which, with their carved and painted gold frames now afford covering and curtain to true hotel-garnis for all sorts of winged children, middle-aged personages, water phenomena, and artists in stout burgher costume. There was none of the splendor of broad proscenium boxes, with their ont-gard of freezing goddesses, behind which the most festal decoration of the stage retreats into subdued and quiet beauty. Then, from the slenderly vaulted proscenium box on the right to the other on the left, the galleries, with their fine Moorish arches, enclosed the wide auditorium, opposite to the equally wide stage, to which all eyes turned unobstructed. Curtain and ceiling, each in quiet, grand expanse, presented a single great picture, the gods of Greece, priests offering incense before the altar. That, just that alone, was wanted and intended, and not this or that indifferently, any way and every way.

Year out, year in, in rich succession, it was the creations of Shakspeare and Calderon, of Schiller and Goethe, that, together with the medley of more evanescent pictures, filled the house. During the Carnival, the Opera had precedence ; besides Mozart's and Beethoven's, we had the compositions of Gluck and Cherubini, and, more favored than all in respect to frequency of performance, those of Spontini. These were the festival operas par excellence ; in these, especially in Nurmahal, Aleidor, Agnes von Hohenstaufen—all peculiarly court operas—the court feasts opened themselves, as it were, on the side of the great public.

Leader and central point in these stage splendors, was the Italian, SPONTINI. When, before a house full to overflowing, his fine but not large form, thoroughly courtly, distingué, almost stiff in bearing, with the small, high head, the hair most carefully laid in waves, the dark green frock adorned with a wreath of very small orders (of which he made much account), stepped quickly and softly into the orchestra, the musicians all stood motionless, all the bows upon the strings, all the mouth-pieces at the lips, waiting for the wink. For, however rebelliously disposed many an one may secretly have been, then, before unfavorable constellations had begun to show their evil machinations from below, then his thoroughly Napoleonic, absolute supremacy stood firm beyond a question. When, the instant after stepping upon the conductor's platform, his dark eye, flashing round from left to right, caught every one's attention, and his baton arm rose and stretched itself forth, and, resting a moment, seemed to turn to steel : then everybody felt that here his will was unconditional, and that all the coöperators were exclusively his organs, all together formed one body, and he its animating principle. We have known, during and since his time, finer, freer, perhaps more intellectual directorship, but none that moulded all at one cast more decidedly.

What gave this man such a controlling energy ? Was it his position, his fame ? Both coöperated, but were not the determining influence ; the man makes his reputation and gives importance to his position.

The controlling energy of Spontini lay in his own personality. It already showed itself in the fact that he—strongly in contrast with most German opera composers—embraced in his mind all the moments of the drama, and not merely the composition and musical direction ; with a strong hand he tightly grasped the reins of the hundred co-working forces, and controlled them all. This was instantly felt, even by the uninitiated spectator. In his Olympia, when the marriage of the daughter of Alexander is to be solemnized in the temple at Ephesus, and the wide room, shimmering with gold, is filled with people, with troops of warriors and princes, with priests and virgins of the temple, and clouds of incense roll up from ten flaming altars ;—when the high priest calls "the seeress," (it is Statira, the widow of Alexander, who believes the betrothed of her daughter to be her husband's murderer,) forth from her concealment to the altar ; when the throngs that fill the whole space of the temple crowd more close together, to leave a narrow passage through, and a low mournful song gives utterance and intensity to expectation, and, unseen, the seeress raises her song of lamentation (it was the bell-like tones of the high-priestly Milder,) and slowly staggers forward till impatiently the priest commands that the nuptial ceremonies "between Olympia and the prince Cassander" proceed, at the hated name the widow, in dismay and with imperious rage exclaims, "Cassander !" till the terror-shriek of the whole orchestra, with all its trumpets and trombones, dies away like a shadow before flames, and now the murmur of the choruses in arms increases to an all-bewildering tempest : then there was not a step made, there was not a line in the rich, great picture which was not fitted to the others, and to the measures of the music, into one unique whole ;—however much was contributed by Schinkel, who had reproduced the temple, however much by that unsurpassed pair of artists, Bader and Mme. Milder, and the rest, and by the orchestra, all melted into one, like Corinthian brass, it all had its central point in the mind of Spontini.

To be sure, he came from the high school of the drama, from Paris. In Italy he had (I have studied the scores myself,) long before Rossini, practiced all the arts of this creator of the new Italian opera,—what could one offer to Italians without a country, except sweet oblivion ? In France he found a nation, and truly the most stirring and most active, and consequently the most fitted for the drama, a nation whose own life was all a spectacle, a people made for the stage in every sense. This nation had long since stamped its tragedies in firm, simple, constantly-recurring forms, unseduced by the imaginative breadth, the richness in ideas, the spiritual depth of the Germans and Britons,—and had thereby laid a favorable groundwork for the opera of Lulli, of Gluck, of Spontini ; for the fugitive art of tones requires a firm support to save it from going to pieces, or from dragging lifelessly upon the stage. And this theatrical nation was at that time completely full of Napoleon ; this late successor of the Roman Cæsars had set his stamp beyond dispute upon the whole of life.

* From the Berliner Musik-Zeitung Echo, May 16, 1858.

This decided Spontini's path. Roman imperialism, stamped in the form of a Napoleonic revival on the French; military and courtly pomp in inexhaustible splendor; heroism, la gloire de la grande nation; rulers and conspiracies and court intrigues; and coupled with the hero, or offered as a prize to him, the daughter of a prince, or other lady-love of lofty rank,—we say l'amante, for it was not what we Germans call love; it was an arrangement of convenience, tendresse, and perfumed grace, in contradistinction to the natural, spontaneous love of the German or British poet, like the grace of a ballet dancer in comparison with a Greek Hebe: add to this the representation of a high priesthood, and the foil and background of an ever-wondering, admiring people; transport the scene occasionally (as the old Romans, too, were fond of doing,) into the fabulous Orient, and allow the French audience the gratification of fancying that Frenchmen can see themselves and implant themselves everywhere: and you have the whole substance of the Spontini drama before you; in this he lived; it was the highest that the age, that his native or his adopted country could offer him; and to this day they have reached nothing higher. This was Spontini's task, and he took hold of it with fire, with eminent ability, with the musical nature of an Italian, and with a perfectly French Napoleonic impetuosity. His marches, his warlike choruses, had a world-conquering tread, and became current in all armies, although not world-conquering; his ballets sparkled and floated up and down in endless coquettish allurements, and in military bravadoes, like the Napoleonic court festivals; his clergy (of whatsoever religion,) performed the sacred rites with all the unction, the official consequence, and the obsequious dignity, which the artist had copied from the life around him. The hero, the priest, l'amante,—these were characters so strongly stamped in the composer's mind, that each was unmistakably indicated in the first bars of the prelude. But throughout the whole—in the march, in the sharply measured rhythm of the dance, in the biting forzandos of the violas, in the scream of the piccolo, with the brass instruments, in the impetuous incessant fragments of incidental recitative, everywhere you felt the everlasting "en avant!" of the Napoleonic generalship. We Germans—we, who had broken the yoke, could bear the echo of it for some time longer, while the French had to seek rest upon the lazy couch of the operas of the restoration.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Characters of the Musical Keys.

NEW YORK, AUG. 20, 1858.

Mr. Editor,—In your issue of July 17, under the head "CHARACTERS OF THE DIFFERENT KEYS," you, to a certain extent, appear to endorse the "peculiar expressive characteristic" idea, although you limit your own positiveness upon the subject to the keys of C major, D major, F, (you do not mention whether major or minor, although I suppose you mean the former,) and C sharp minor.

While, however, you for a brief moment appear in the light of a limited partizan, the majority of your remarks seem to be somewhat skeptical.

By the by, in italicizing the word natural, in speaking of the "broad noon-day C major," did you really intend it to be particularly emphasized, or were you unable to resist the temptation to a sly satire by the perpetration of a pun?

But seriously, Mr. Editor, am I to understand you to really believe that a major or minor musical scale, whose first or fundamental sound is expressed by a character in notation whose name may be any one of the seven letters used, be they sharp, flat or natural, is inherently, according to the principle of its construction, either more "martial," "serene," "vague," or "noon-day like," than another major or minor musical scale, whose first or fundamental sound is formed upon some other degree of pitch, and represented by some other of the seven sharp, flat or natural letters? If you do, permit me to say, in very common, but none the less expressive language, "I don't."

Having, then, by the use of these two little words, assumed a position hostile to the doctrine, I conceive myself in a measure bound to advance something in support of this hostility and unbelief.

If, however, the peculiar characteristics sought to be established are maintained to be so simply in a circumstantial point of view, and not as an inherent principle, I am willing to acquiesce;—that is, so far as to admit that, according to the nature and circumstances of an animate body, or of an artificial instrument, the production of scales formed on certain degrees of pitch, may be better adapted for the expression of the various qualities mentioned, than if formed upon certain other degrees of pitch; but, if it be asserted that a scale formed upon any given number of vibrations, if produced indiscriminately upon any instrument, or by any voice, or in any manner, is either more martial, vague, serene, &c., &c., than a like scale formed upon some other given number of vibrations, then, I say, I believe that those who so assert have arrived at their conclusions on a false hypothesis.

In commencing, then, an exposition of my own views upon this doctrine, I should feel inclined to believe that if it be true of any one key, it must be true of all, and not only so of the degrees of pitch in acknowledged use, but of all that numberless variety which the concert-pitch standard excludes from a place in the named list, but which the accidental variation from this standard brings into play. Such being the case, the twenty-four paragraph exposition of qualities exhibited by SCHUBART would have to be extended over an amount of pages, compared to which the largest cyclopedia would be insignificant.

It appears to me that if the sounds used in any particular key exhibit sentimental qualities different from those exhibited in other keys, such difference must be in consequence of one or more of the following:

- I. That all, or some of the sounds used in any particular key, are different in sentimental quality from those pertaining to some other key.
- II. That the succession or connection of the sounds used in any particular key, differs in sentimental quality from the succession or connection of the sounds used in another key.
- III. That the pitch register of the sounds used, taken as a whole, exhibits a different sentimental quality in a particular key than in another.
- IV. That the necessitated manner of utterance or delivery of the sounds in one key differs in sentimental effect from that of another.

The above enumeration may not cover the whole ground, but it appears to me to be sufficient, and I shall next proceed to consider the truth or untruth of each proposition in the order in which it stands, as one of the four appears to my mind a consecutive and legitimate inference from the principle or doctrine of "Characters of the Different Keys." At the same time, if the peculiar character of one key from another is supposed to be the consequent of some other hypothesis, I shall be equally happy to consider it, if some one will suggest it.

Firstly, then, as to the truth or untruth of sounds—all, or part—being of different sentimental quality, in one range of tones or keys, from what they are in another, separately considered. I think it will be found that a sound, separately considered, has but one specific, unchanging, and independent quality, and that is its pitch, or the number of vibrations taking place in a given time. It is, of course, impossible that this independent and unchanging quality can be exhibited without being connected with some other quality, but the other qualities are circumstantial. For instance, the sound of a certain known number of vibrations, called in musical notation A,  may be produced from a tune-fork, a pitch-pipe, a flute, a violin, piano-forte, human voice, &c. &c. In each case, according to the nature of the material from which the sound is produced, so will it partake of the nature and character of that material. A minute description of the effect produced in each of these cases, would necessarily be varied; and that which would be true of the one would not be true of the other. Yet they all coincide in one point, and that is the pitch, or the number of vibrations. Again, the sound spoken of might be continued for a longer or shorter period; it might be given abruptly or gradually; in a mournful or joyous manner; but this would be at the will or caprice of the producer, and we could not with any propriety assert as a characteristic of the sound called  A, that it was a long sound, or a short sound, or a mournful sound, or a joyous sound, or a bell-like sound, or a trumpet-like sound, any more than we could assert, indiscriminately, of the period of time called a "day," that it is a sunny day.

[Having filled my sheet, I must defer until a future time the remarks I propose to continue on the subject, if these are considered interesting.]

J. J. CLARKE.

Welsh Music.

The Athenæum runs small risk of being accused of undue predilections for Welsh antiquarianism, the puerility and obsolescence of which in the forms clung to have again and again afforded justifiable matter for remark. Yet we shall not be astonished if touchy minstrels, belonging to the Land of Cakes and the Emerald Isle, both resolute to assert the supremacy of their national music, may feel offence and surprise when we say that to our apprehension the airs of the Principality are more beautiful than the airs of either Scotland or Ireland. That they have been so thoroughly overlooked as they have been by trained composers may be ascribed to the insulation and exclusiveness which the gentry and people of Wales seem to court as among the best heritages of a long pedigree. Yet "The Queen's Dream," and "Ar hyd y Nos," and "Merch Megan," and the "Ash Grove," and twenty more that we could name from the elder collections (without approaching the wilder, more curious, yet not less beautiful specimens in the collection of Miss M. J. Williams) would furnish capital and tractable motifs to any opera-maker in these exhausted days,—when, as in the case of M. Von Flotow's "Martha," "The Last Rose of Summer" can rescue a feeble score from insipidity and neglect. The fine and musical lyrics written for some of the tunes in question by Mrs. Hemans have been too much forgotten, and are worth suggesting to any singer in search of a national ballad less worn than "Bonny Dundee" or "Rory O'More." Here, to point the moral of what has been said, is a collection of Welsh Melodies arranged for the Harp, by John Thomas, (Boosey & Son). The name of the editor is guarantee for its goodness as harp music. In No. 1, "The Ash Grove," we have been used to a different version of the second part of the melody. Has Mr. Thomas tamed it? No. 2, "The Bells of Aberdyfi," is a less symmetrical, but still grand tune from the Aberpergwm collection. No. 3, "Sweet Richard," has a touch in it of the old-fashioned Allemande. No. 4, "The Rising of the Sun," is an ancient harp tune, with a fine specimen of those unisons of which the Welsh melodists were as little afraid as is Signor Verdi. No. 5, "The March of the Men of Harlech," is better worth taking up by any Meyerbeer than the poor Des-sauer March, on which the triple military finale to "L'Etoile" is based. No. 7, "Morva Rhuddlan," is a stately melody in a minor key. No. 8, "The Allurement of Love," is elegant, alluring (as it should be), and still within the regular bounds of propriety. No. 9, "The Rising of the Lark," owes its peculiarity to its rhythm: the first part consisting of six bars; the second, of three four-bar phrases. The form of refrain, too, in it may be paralleled by more modern examples,—for instance, in the air in E flat, with variations, by Mendelssohn. "Of a noble race was Shenkin," No. 10, (again mark the unisons) was one of the few Welsh airs which reached Beethoven at Vienna,—and those who look at his arrangement of it may take a lesson from the penetrating intelligence with which, in his easy variations, as duet for piano and flute, or violin, he contrived to draw out and distinguish the unisonal feature aforesaid. "Mereh Megen" No. (11), with its second part alla Rossini, is another of those melodies of the Principality which are the most familiar. Mr. Thomas, it must be repeated, though he has shown small research (wise, perhaps, in confining himself to what is best known), has done his duty well by his own instrument, in his preludes and variations. Nos. 6 and 22 are fantasias on tunes of his own,—tunes, too, not ungracious. But, as the rhyme-ster said, and the melodies of Mr. Thomas, however suave, have neither the elevation, character, nor originality of the noble old harp-music of Wales.—London Athenæum, Aug. 7.

A FEMALE VIOLINIST.—(From Punch).—We have heard Mdle. Humler. She plays on the violin with a most charming grace. We split a pair of spotless gloves (lavender—4s. 3d.) in applauding her. It was more than we could do to keep our hands quiet; and yet it is not once in a hundred weeks that we do applaud. The temptation occurs so seldom. Mdle. Humler must send us the address of her gambier; for, listening to her we became reckless. She made that stupid-looking bit of wood appeal, cry, laugh, whisper, scream, fall on its knees, tumble head over heels, sing, talk, persuade, charm, convince, make love, do everything that man and woman generally do, and generally do most indifferently. Mademoiselle has no need to talk to express her thoughts. The violin is her conversation. It talks and sings at the same time, your ears all the while being held, as by a loving hand, to catch every little touching word. She is an instrumental Bosio, warbling just as sweetly with her fiddlestick, that seems to have a voice in it. We heard Mr. Distin (a great trumpet in his way) loudly apostrophize her as a "female Paganini." More than Paganini, she pleases as well as astonishes. With her it is not merely tours de force, but tours de plaisir, d'extase, de larmes, de délire, de Septième Paradis,—so to speak, in a musico-fanatico style. On most occasions we would rather walk over several muddy crossings to avoid hearing the violin, against which our excoiated ear cherishes a most hearty hatred; but to hear Mdle. Humler, we would wade any day through a Novemberish depth of mud to pay aural homage to the eloquent music she has the power of extracting from that instrument of torture.

MUSICAL PITCH.—The London Athenæum has the following remarks upon the French Commission on the subject of a uniform diapason, lately mentioned in these columns.

"Flat persons," who find "how to get up" a great difficulty, will receive with joy the news of a commission of inquiry just ordered by the Minister of State in France. The object of this is to moderate the excessive and increasing sharpness of pitch, and to establish an Imperial la, by which all trusty and well-beloved forks are to be made and all loyal orchestras tuned. Those appointed to hear testimony, to report, and to decide, are MM. Pelletier, Anber, Berlioz, Despretz, Doncet, Halévy, Lissajons, Mellinet, Meyerbeer, Monnais, Rossini, and Thomas. Far be it from us to question the practical efficacy of so solemn and official a proceeding as the above; or to deny that a disposition to exaggerate and "screw up" exists, caused by the concession made to players on stringed instruments. But, pondering as we have done again and again on this matter of pitch, a certain question has always remained unanswered, which, we submit, has value and curiosity as bearing on the subject. How came it to pass, in those days when the diapason (as persons of a flat disposition perpetually assert) was a full tone lower than it is at present, that the bass part was written a tone—sometimes, even, a third—lower than it is in our time? The E below the line—which, now with nine of our deepest basses out of ten, is hardly a note, any more than is the voice of the 32-feet bombard in an organ—must then have been D. The long-sustained D in Mozart's "Il Serraglio" must then have been a C—below the lungs, it might be fancied, of any creature less double-bass than a Russian contrabasso,—and that preternatural human instrument, we have understood, is only an opichleide, having four or five profound tones at command—a co-operating member of a band trained (self-wise) to bring out his few notes, but in no respect an artist, hardly even a singer. Speaking in such depths, at all events, must have been out of the question. There are living more soprani (instance Mesdames Goldschmidt, La Grange, Gassier, Miolan-Carvalho) who can now rise to the E altissimo, presumed to be the F of our grandmothers, than bassi, who venture to plumb the abysses referred to, even in their modern raised pitch. Can it be proved that the vibrations of the same piece of metal are immutable? that no change is wrought by Time in the tuning-fork? The question at least is worth propounding to the solemn folk who are about to sit on the orthodoxy of "la" in Paris.

Truth about Music and Musicians.

Translated from the German by SABELLA NOVELLO.

IV.

RULES OF ART.*

A well-known axiom of Goethe says: "Art remains Art for evermore; he who has not thoroughly studied it, cannot be termed an artist." And to Eckermann he once declared: "We should not seek for Nature itself in every great artist, but we should learn from him how he contemplates, how he artistically comprehends and represents Nature; we should try and learn what is significant in Nature and in Life."

Goethe, during his long career, continuously sought after the significant in Nature and in Life;—he assiduously studied Art, and therefore compassed such great things, in such perfect wise. All those who have excelled have acted in like manner.

How Shakspeare pondered on dramatic art, may be partly gathered from the instructions to players, which he gives in Hamlet. How Gluck ruminated the capabilities of Music, and considered how it might be made most effective,—how Mozart and Beethoven weighed almost every bar of their compositions, you know, or may learn, from my former letters on this subject.

The profound attention bestowed on our Art, by the greatest intellects, during the lapse of many years, has enabled us to discern the true path by which alone the aim of Art may be attained; and certain rules conspicuously stand forth, by which every work must be regulated ere it claim the title of masterpiece.

These Art-maxims must direct an artist in his creations,—must influence and determine his ideas; of course, I speak of such Art-maxims as are veritable and ascertained,—not of such as are false and deceitful, tending merely to lead astray.

Every student who would become worthy of his Art, must, before all else, make himself intimately acquainted with these correct Art-maxims. He will only meet with them in the works of acknowledged great masters, who owned the worth of such axioms, practically illustrated them, and impressed them with the stamp of genuine value.

The study of master-pieces is, and ever will be, the Alpha and Omega of proper artistic cultivation,—not blind and mechanical study, but diligent and analytical examination; without this mental winnowing, a student will imbibe from these works much that is unworthy and false, together with that which is worthy and truthful.

Our masters were but men, and, therefore, imperfect beings; each of them evinced some deficiencies, or committed some errors; each of them, in an hour of weakness, produced something defective; almost every one has a certain mannerism, or a slight peculiarity, which is not always worthy of imitation.

Spohr, for example, is, in many respects, an excellent model for students; but he is too fond of enharmonic modulation,—he employs it too constantly, and often introduces it when it militates against requisite, characteristic simplicity. The scholar who should implicitly imitate this master,—who, from the fact that enharmonic modulations occasionally excite unexpected pleasure and agreeable surprise, should form a conclusion, and found for himself an Art-maxim, that enharmonic modulation always produces a surprising and agreeable effect,—would misconceive and falsely apply a rule of modulation in itself perfectly true and ascertained.

Surprise, in many cases, is extremely effective; but when a composer,—in order to produce surprise by, for instance, an unexpected modulation,—introduces, previously to it, unusual transitions, he entirely fails in, or but half accomplishes his object, because he will have misapplied another Art-maxim which inculcates preparation. Should he, on the other hand, have properly introduced the surprise, so as to effect his purpose, yet, in case the subject he endeavors to describe should not demand surprise, he will have fallen into another error from ignorance or misapplication of a further maxim, which declares that every resource of Art should be employed in its appropriate place when expedient or suitable, and not wantonly lavished without end or aim.

You will not need to seek long before you discover many offences against this maxim committed by our modern composers; for we know well, that, at the present time, not only are ascertained, truthful maxims falsely interpreted, but that absolutely false rules are advocated. I remind you only of—overweening exuberance in instrumentation—of preponderance of instruments, which drown vocal melody—of neglected contrast, &c.

Unfortunately, experience—that is, Art-history—teaches us that for every Art a time arrives when great masters, who acknowledge all true Art-maxims, and exemplify them in their compositions, are succeeded by those, who, desirous of creating something new, seek to discover new maxims, and, not being able to find true ones, adopt those which are false, and therefore unused.

Thus begins the decline of Art. In order not to hasten it—in order to defer the fall of Art, and to sustain and elevate it—our only plan is, not even to glance at the moderns, with all their deviations from truthful tenets; not to seek example from them, but from earlier, and even the earliest masters. The voracious Art-maxims displayed in their works may, it is true, receive a new outward shape and semblance—they may appear in novel adornment—but they will remain intrinsically the same, and immutably true.*

* No. III., on "Modern German Opera Music," we have already copied. See Journal of Music, May 29, 1858.

For instance, a hundred years before Mozart and Beethoven existed, Euphony was different from what it was in their time; it was essentially different in the music of the ancient Greeks; yet, "Euphony must prevail above all else," remains an eternal law of music. Never will a period arrive in which Dissonance of instrumentation can be inculcated as a worthy rule of Art.

Should you detect, as you may often do, in modern works, harsh, dissonant instrumentation, you may deduce from it, with absolute certainty, that its composer has either never been impressed with the eternal law of truth and beauty, or that he has been incapable of impressing its image on his creations.

Again, never will a period arrive in which monotony, exuberance, indistinctness, artificiality, confusion of simultaneous parts, unfitness, want of characteristic individuality, wearisome lengthiness, dryness, neglected construction, undiscernible sectional division, too great diversity, or remarkable sameness, meaningless modulation, &c., &c., should be inculcated as worthy adjuncts of Art.

Unbelievable as it may appear, there exist, in our days, individuals who affirm the above-mentioned qualities to be true and excellent; ignorant critics and shameless partizans enter the lists as champions of their supreme merit, while modern so-called musical geniuses slavishly compose their works according to the false dictates of these monstrous oracles.

All these symptoms indicate the decline of Art,—they are the gnawing evils which consume it; they must be eradicated ere Music can regain its former glory, and arise, like the sun from out thick clouds, pure and bright in all its pristine splendor.

THE MUSIC OF THE FEELINGS.—"There are two degrees of pleasure perceived in music. The first is that which tickles the ear only with a chime of notes, which, having a sort of abstracted affinity to one another, like that of numbers in mere arithmetical proportions, but without meaning, that is, without reference to anything but the mere sense of hearing, communicates a small degree of pleasure. * * *

"Our modern music is mostly of this unmeaning and unaffecting kind. It is seated almost wholly in the ear, and hardly ever goes further, but through habit. The other degree in musical entertainment strikes deeper into the mind, and, while it carries with it all the mere auditory pleasure just mentioned, speaks to, and entertains our affections also. It is the object of an internal sense, as well as of an external. It is heard by love, by anger, by fear, by courage; or it is felt by the soul, as played on the strings of that instrument which is placed nearest to her perceptive powers; and perhaps ought to be considered as a unison or concert, executed at once between a violin without and another within. Somewhat of this we perceive in a few of Corelli's compositions, and in more of Handel's. But our musicians affect too great a variety of notes in each tune, and aim not, or but a very little, at a meaning. Their pieces jingle prettily, but seldom speak, as the much simpler music of the ancients undoubtedly did." * * * Philip Skelton.

A remark is to be made on Madame Bosio, which the lady's friends might wisely take to heart ere they encourage her to pass another winter in the Russian capital. Last season her voice, which had scarcely arrived at its maturity, already reminded us of a flower overblown. This year, to continue the simile, one or two leaves have fallen, and more seem "on the turn." Neither the compass, the quality, nor the power of the organ are what they were. How far rest might restore it cannot be told without trial: but further exercise of a voice so delicate in a climate so rude is to be deprecated. Rarely has artist improved so rapidly as did Madame Bosio during two or three seasons. Few have held place of higher regard in English favor. Never were improving or complete singers so rare,—perhaps because never was gain so easily won by the unimprovable or the incomplete. Bystanders who look forward, without any stake in the matter, save the pleasure they must lose, and the decay which must accrue to art, cannot see and hear such things without a word of friendly caution. Other of our most favorite singing birds have left England for a while, among these, Mesdames Viardot, Novello, and Lemmens Sherrington—the first two ladies to return for the Festivals. We are told that Mlle. Piccolomini has been engaged for America by Mr. Barnum, and that Madame Viardot intends to pass the close of this year in Hungary and Austria.

The Diapason—The French Commission.

"This high Commission, let us hope," says Le Ménestrel, "will not be called on to discuss the maintenance of the present diapason, which is about to be put on its trial, but to come to some understanding as to the reasonable basis by which it must be regulated, in order to render the voice its former longevity without interfering too much with the existing sonority of instruments. With regard to the latter point, it is to be regretted that some musical instrument makers and instrumentalists of merit, as well as several of the oldest members of the lyric stages, such as MM. Duprez and Levasseur, were not called upon to give their opinions on the projected reform. It is to be regretted also, if we may be allowed to revert to our idea of a European congress, that the Commission charged with the task of judging and reforming the diapason, has not been endowed with a semi-national character. Representatives of Germany, Italy, and England, such as M. Fétis for Belgium, would have consolidated the work of regeneration by generalizing it a little everywhere; this is a most important matter, for our singers, like those of Italy, are spread, so to say, over the whole surface of the globe. Now let us take the case of a tenor and bass, accustomed to sing in France, half-a-tone lower: "Les chevaliers de ma patrie," or "Simon la mort!" On crossing the Rhine or the Straits of Dover, they find themselves struggling with an orchestra which employs a system of sonority completely strange to them, with a diapason which has become an impossibility for their voices: Robert can no longer reach the height of his "patrie," while Bertram meets death half a tone too soon.

"If we are well-informed, the Minister of State has already directed his attention to this primordial difficulty, and it is said he intends communicating officially with the musical celebrities of neighboring countries. But why should this first step prevent the personal attendance in the Diapason Commission of M. Mercadante, for instance, as the representative of musical Italy, in his capacity of director of the Conservatory of Naples; of M. Benedict, in nearly the same character, for England; of MM. Marschner and Liszt, as representing Germany with our celebrated master, Meyerbeer; of M. Fétis, already mentioned, for Belgium, and lastly, of General Andrew Sabouroff, the successor of M. Guedéonoff, who would represent the imperial theatres of Russia, as General Mellinet does the military bands of France? All this is a mere observation which we submit to the enlightened solicitude of the Minister of State, who, we repeat, has taken with regard to the diapason a step for which the whole musical world ought to thank him.

"In fact there is a greater scarcity of vocalists with voices in our theatres every day. It was time to put a stop to this state of things. It has been demonstrated that the diapason of Gluck was nearly a tone lower than that of the present day. Our illustrious maestro, Rossini, told us, a few days since, that since 1823, the diapason had been raised half-a-tone, so that he himself could not tell in what key his works are now executed.

"It is not long since, in France, the diapason of the Salle Feydeau was believed to be higher than that of the Grand-Opéra, which exerted itself to the utmost to surpass its rival. We know that certain instruments have a great deal to do with this ambition to rise—no matter at what sacrifice. The piano, for instance, gains greatly in sonority from being tuned at the highest diapason. What is the general consequence of this in our saloons? A great many singers refuse to be accompanied on a piano called a "piano d'exercitation," while, in other cases, instrumentalists cannot manage with accompanying pianos. As we perceive, this is an important question, not only of sonority, but, also, of manufacture, for most of our orchestral instruments would have to be reconstructed on a new plan. It is for this reason that it would be useful to nominate some of our principal musical instrument-makers to the Diapason Commission.

"Besides, when we have arrived at a cordial understanding as to the number of vibrations allowed for the standard diapason, we must proceed to the manufacture of the diapason itself, and, on this head, we express a wish that, like the money struck in the name of the State, the diapason, in its modest sphere, should be established and manufactured under the auspices of the Conservatory. Without this, there will be no unity of vibrations, both on account of bad metal, and want of finish in the work. Left to competition, the same will be true of the diapason as of the metrometer; it will always be faulty. Both of these regulating instruments ought to be issued officially from the Conservatory, if not remain its exclusive property: they would thus be established on the best foundation, under circumstances which would render them most accessible to all. The Conservatory might find in this plan a perfectly natural subvention, which would assist in founding new scholarships, or, at least, in ameliorating its annual income. This is another suggestion which we submit to the consideration of the Minister of State, under whose direct control our Imperial Conservatory of Musical Declamation stands.

"We cannot terminate without addressing an humble petition to the celebrated composers summoned to take part in the Diapason Committee. It depends more particularly on them whether the diapason is reduced to its starting point, not only materially, but practically, by the manner in which they write their future compositions. Even if the Commission were to lower the diapason a tone, nothing would be gained, if our composers perpetuated their present mode of writing. It is they, perhaps, more than the instruments, who have contributed to raise the diapason. If singers' voices are not more seriously considered by the very persons who obtain their effects from them; if our lyric musicians cannot, by a greater vocal temperance, and a deeper study of the capacities of voices, insert the new, we mean the old, diapason, the Commission will have lost its time. This would be a most deplorable fact. In the name, therefore, of the vocal art, the last vestiges of which threaten to disappear, we call upon composers to render the certified diapason an actual truth."

Mlle. Piccolomini.

Here is what the London Illustrated Times says of the young lady, whom Ullman has engaged, and who, according to her New York trumpet-blowers, is going to excite another Jenny Lind fièvre. It does not differ much from the impressions of her, which we have from time to time copied from the Athenæum and other sources. But the lady is handsome, sprightly, young, impetuous, and all that: and these advantages, it is presumed, will go farther than artistic skill or genius. So sound the trumpets, Heralds!

The last 'novelty' of the regular season was the 'Lucia,' which was played for the first time this year on Thursday, for Giuglini's benefit. Giuglini's Edgardo is one of his best parts in a musical sense, but he scarcely acts it better than that of Gennaro in 'Lucrezia,' and in a historic point of view Giuglini's Gennaro is the worst but one we ever saw. The tameness of the Edgardo is rendered more apparent by the unnatural vivacity of Mlle. Piccolomini as Lucia. Mlle. Piccolomini is even more unlike the gentle, sentimental, melancholy heroine of Sir Walter Scott than she is to any other of the characters of her too numerous répertoire. This 'fascinating' young lady, as it is still to some extent the fashion to style her, seldom seems to understand the part she is playing. But there is certainly this to be said in her favor, that if she were to attempt to make herself like Lucia, she might fail; whereas, by adopting the easy method of making Lucia exactly like Mlle. Piccolomini, she is sure to succeed. This system of bringing the mountain to Mahomet instead of Mahomet to the mountain, is also observable in Mlle. Piccolomini's execution of the music of 'Lucia,' and indeed in that of nearly all the music she sings. In the air of the third act, some of the passages are too difficult for the vocalist. She does not omit the air, but she sings the air so slowly that half the difficulty of the difficult passages disappears. It is true that the music loses somewhat of its effect, but that is the affair of the late Donizetti, and not of the singer.

However, taking Mlle. Piccolomini's performance altogether, we think we may say that it exhibits some improvement since last season. Her acting is somewhat toned down, and the objectionable features are not quite so salient as formerly. Miss Ashton had certainly no right to be so affectionate as she was wont to be (under the auspices of Mlle. Piccolomini), in the scene with her lover at the end of the first act. When young ladies of Miss Ashton's position in society, and above all her temperament, allow themselves a lover at all, they, at least, do not give way to their feelings, and throw themselves round his neck as Mlle. Piccolomini was, and to a certain extent is now, in the habit of doing. Signor Giuglini, who is a lover of much propriety, feels the awkwardness of his position, and evidently endeavors by his very commendable coldness to keep the young lady at a distance, but unfortunately without success.

Mlle. Piccolomini is seen to most advantage in the scene with her brother, and in the finale to the second act. This admirable finale, the most dramatic piece of music Donizetti ever wrote, is far better executed, as far as the orchestra and chorus are concerned, than it was last year, and Mlle. Piccolomini still acts with considerable energy and feeling. It is, of course, on the side of energy that she errs, indeed it may be said, (in the Hibernian style,) that energy is her weak point. She sings with energy, acts with energy, above all, sobs and runs about with energy, and if she has to fall, she even falls with energy. When Edgardo, pointing to her signature, asks whether that writing is hers, and afterwards dismisses her with a gesture of contempt, she goes over like a nine-pin, as if her lover had actually knocked her down. Now, to knock a young lady down merely for infidelity, and 'that with extenuating circumstances,' is the sort of thing Signor Giuglini, as Edgardo, would never think of doing. In fact, he gives her the slightest possible push, and Lucia, by instantly falling, gives it all the semblance of a violent blow. Thus she does her best to destroy the sympathy which the audience ought naturally to feel for the lover, who by his apparent brutality forfeits all claim to pity.

In the mad scene, Mlle. Piccolomini does not exhibit melancholy madness, but some fantastic kind of lunacy, which is doubtless very sad, but not particularly touching.

MUSIC AND DRAWING.—The writer of "Suburban Letters" in the Worcester Palladium, is a true friend of æsthetic culture. In one of the last letters she says:

"A clerical friend who has a piano in his parlor and an easel in his study, says, 'I could not give up my love for music and painting. I sometimes wonder what I should be without it!' Into his active professional life—a life of mingled pleasure and pain, labor and care, these two arts shed beams of happiness so pure, so full of delight, as to be alone worth years of study and self-denying application. His ministerial duties are not the less attended to because his ears are open to harmony and his eye to color. Never does it make him less practically useful, less able to administer that food which it is his blessed privilege to give to mental sufferers. If he goes to-night to hear a symphony, to-morrow he will have new gentleness and grace by the sick-bed of some old and feeble parishioner. If, on Saturday, as he walked up the shaded street, the setting sun burst from behind a heavy purple cloud and lighted up the tops of the trees and here and there a protruding branch with those delicately intermingled hues which the eye of the artist can so quickly analyze—if he sees all this on Saturday night, there will be, in Sunday's sermon, a little extempore paragraph, which coming as from inspiration, stands out in bold relief from the ground work of the discourse, to be a bright star of thought to his people during the coming week. We would have every child taught something of music and of drawing; and yet, we question whether the public-school be the place for their instruction. School-life is too short and its requirements too many to admit of proper attention to these branches. Besides what is learned of these arts should be rightly learned, which is not possible unless the teacher stands in the first rank of his profession. Better a thorough knowledge of the rudiments of either art, gained from a competent instructor, than a little superficial glance over the field. The common-school teacher steps from his sphere when he leaves arithmetic and grammar to give a few hasty lessons to fifty or sixty pupils who cannot learn from him in a week what they might from a professional teacher in a single hour. This method of teaching, too generally adopted, is one of the results of our American way of grasping all things but taking firm hold of nothing."

Mario as Don Juan.

Mr. Dwight,—Is it possible that the lusty, daring, reckless, godless Don can, by any consistency with nature or art, be represented by the effeminate figure and sweetest tenor of Signor Mario? Form, face, figure, voice—are they not those of the sentimental and passionate lover, not those of the deliberate and heartless seducer, who laughs at sighs, and tears, and emotion, and employs them but as the instruments of his trade, to gratify the inordinate lust of a powerful physical nature? The very quality of the tenor voice is opposed to the idea of masculine vigor and power; the very idea of Don Giovanni is that of superabundant masculine vigor and power. The tones of the tenor are suggestive of truthfulness, serious devotion, and absorbing passion; Don Giovanni is a revelation of the cool heartlessness and infernal mirth of Mephistopheles. No doubt the sweetness and tenderness of such a voice as that of Mario may be apt instruments of dissimulation and heart-breaking; but that is not the character of the hero, whose fascination lay in his manly powers and all-defying impudence. Shall we expect the "new and improved" hero to make us tremble by attempting jollity and good-fellowship with the awful ghost of the murdered Commandant, and to struggle manfully with flaming devils? Shall we not pity his physical weakness, and urge him to make timely retreat, instead of feeling any satisfactory terror inspired by the triumph of supernal vengeance over Satanic effrontery and heaven denying self-indulgence? BEP.

Dorchester, Aug. 29.

Mario and Don Giovanni.

Correspondence of The Manchester Guardian.

The great success of the past season at the Royal Italian Opera has been the production of "Don Giovanni." The lessee of an opera house has this difficulty in bringing out a new opera—the greater part of the season is wasted in rehearsals. Thus "Don Giovanni," which always brings three or four crowded audiences, and would have filled the theatre for twenty nights with the cast at the manager's disposal, was not brought out until the far end of the season, when many subscribers had already left town. Every one knows that the part of Don Giovanni was written for a baritone, and that every baritone of mark has tried the character and failed, with the single exception of Tamburini, who is said to be little likely to re-appear upon the London stage. It may be maintained with some show of reason that Mozart committed a mistake in giving the love music of this part to a baritone, when all tradition and the fitness of things point to the sympathetic tones of a tenor as most expressive of the tender passion. Be this as it may, Mario is fortified by the example of several great tenors in undertaking this arduous character. It is also whispered that he is not sorry to obtain possession of a part in which little demand is made upon him for those high notes which are somewhat impaired by time and use, while the rich, sweet, and full middle and lower notes of his voice are constantly heard with moving effect in the charming songs and concerted music of the great composer's masterpiece.

In order to enable a tenor to sing the music of a baritone, it is of course necessary that it should be transposed. A more delicate, difficult, and unthankful office could scarcely have been confided to Signor Alary, who might have expected that the virtuous and simple-minded critic of the "two standards" would raise a frightful clamor about the reverence due to Mozart—the iniquity of omitting the last dozen bars of the overture, and of singing a song well in one key which is usually sung ill in another. So favorable an opportunity of showing his technical knowledge, and at the same time of writing down the Royal Italian Opera, was not to be neglected. Luckily, however, the general public was not so critical, and your readers will entirely misconceive the sentiments of the connoisseurs if, relying upon the critic of the "two standards," they should dream of the Metropolitan public as outraged and disgusted by the transpositions of keys and the change from F to C. What they saw was the finest performance of Don Giovanni since the palmiest days of Tamburini. Imagine a cast which includes Grisi as Donna Anna, Tamberlik as her lover, Bosio as Zerlina, Mario as the Don, and Ronconi as Leporello! How handsome Mario looked, and how like a noble Spaniard just stepped out of a picture by Velasquez, it is unnecessary to say. His costume was perfect. In the early scenes he appears upon the stage carrying a gold-headed cane, which, as Mario is a great historical authority upon points of costume and equipment, was, we may be sure, worn by the hidalgos of the period in which the scene is supposed to be cast. The gentlemanly and unaffected bearing, the consummate taste and ease with which the music was sung, the exquisite phrasing and delivery of "La ci darem" and the serenade, have never been surpassed, and cannot fail to render "Don Giovanni" one of the most admired parts in the repertory of the great tenor. The critics are not far wrong when they say that in the scenes with the statue Mario is too much occupied in remembering music not familiar to him to throw himself with abandon into the tragic and supernatural horrors of the situation. But the lyrical drama affords us more finished and yet energetic acting than that of Mario in the "Huguenots," "Lucrezia," and "Il Trovatore," although in the first and greatest of these operas he began by giving us a stiff and colorless outline, which he has gradually filled in with flesh and blood. So we may well afford to wait until the artiste has had time to develop and mature his conceptions of stage effect in his new part, being content meanwhile to hear the music infinitely better sung, and the character better played than by any Don Giovanni at present in possession of the stage.

What shall we say of the other characters in this remarkable cast; the Donna Anna of Grisi, with that fine outburst of natural feeling, as she throws herself upon the body of her murdered father, and the thrilling pathos with which she afterwards describes the scene to her lover? What of Tamberlik, who sings "Il mio tesoro," as no one but Mario ever did sing it, and whose highest praise is that Mario can be spared without loss to fill the more prominent personage of the opera? What of the Zerlina of Bosio—the refined, the lady-like, the exquisite Bosio, who sings "Batti, batti" and "Vedrai carino" with such enchanting grace, with such freshness of voice and purity of style and execution that the critic is dumb, holds his breath for fear of losing a note and cannot help joining in the murmur of admiration and delight? What of Bosio, indeed, the prettiest Zerlina ever witnessed, in the prettiest costume, against whom nothing can be said except that she is naturally too graceful and lady-like for a peasant girl? What, lastly, of the Leporello of Ronconi, for whom no allowances need be made, but who acted and sang the part of Leporello on the first night, in a manner which the oldest opera-goer had never seen surpassed. With a full recollection of the great Lablache, I must affirm that Ronconi gives us a more true and dramatic, and not less amusing, interpretation of the character. His terror in the last act has its comic side of cowardice and selfishness, but his horror at the fate of his master is tragic in its intensity. Lablache, too, often made us laugh in the last act, when the great composer was lavishing all the resources of his dramatic genius in the attempt to inspire us with awe. Ronconi, on the contrary, not only makes the terror of Leporello a tragical element of the catastrophe, but disguises and diverts attention from the comparative tameness of Mario. In the scene between the statue and Don Giovanni he is for a few moments the master of the situation and the leading figure on the canvas—a situation which he owes to his genius and to the perfection both of his singing and acting.

Rosa Bonheur.

Rosa Bonheur is an indefatigable worker. She rises at six o'clock and paints until dusk, when she lays aside her blouse, puts on a bonnet and shawl of most unfashionable appearance, and takes a turn through the neighboring streets alone, or accompanied by a favorite dog. Absorbed in her own thoughts, and unconscious of everything around her, the first conception of a picture is frequently struck out by her in these rapid, solitary walks in the twilight.

Living solely for her art, she has gladly resigned the cares of her outward existence to an old and devoted friend, a Mme. Micas, a widow lady, who, with her daughter—an artist, whose exquisite groups of birds are well known in England, and who has been for many years Rosa's most intimate companion—resides with her, relieving her of every material responsibility, and leaving her free to devote herself exclusively to her favorite pursuit. Every summer the two lady artists repair to some mountain district to sketch. Arrived at the regions inhabited only by the chamois, the ladies exchange their feminine habiliments for masculine attire, and spend a couple of months in exploring the wildest recesses of the hills, courting the acquaintance of their shy and swift-footed truants, and harvesting "effects," of storm, rain and vapor, as assiduously as those of sunshine. Though Rosa is fully alive to the beauties of wood and meadow—as we know from the loveliness she has transferred from them to her canvas—mountain scenery is her especial delight. Hitherto her explorations had been confined to the French chains and the Pyrenees, but in the autumn of '56 she visited Scotland and made numerous sketches in the neighborhood of Glen-fallock, Glencoe and Ballaculish; and struck by the beauty of the Highland cattle, selected some choice specimens of these, which she had sent down to Wexham Rectory, near Windsor, where she resided, and spent two months in making numerous studies, from which she has already produced two pictures: "The Denizens of the Mountains," and "Morning in the Highlands." The Alps she has not yet visited, though constantly intending to do so. Her preference being for the stern, the abrupt, and the majestic, instead of the soft, the smiling and the fair, Italy, with all its glories, has hitherto attracted her less powerfully than the ruder magnificence of the Pyrenees and the north.

Among the mountains the great artist is completely in her element; out of doors from morning till night, lodging in the humblest and remotest of roadside hotels, or in the huts of wood-cutters, charcoal-burners, and chamois hunters, and living contentedly on whatever fare can be obtained. Two years ago, being furnished by families of distinction in the Bérnaïs and the Basque provinces with introductions to the rare inhabitants of the region, the party pushed their adventurous wanderings to the little station of Peyronère, the last inhabited point within the French frontier, and thence up the romantic defiles of the Vallée d'Urdos, across the summit of the Pyrenees. Thanks to the letters they carried, the travellers were hospitably received at each halting-place, and furnished with a trusty guide for the next march. In this way they crossed the mountains, and gained the lonely posada of Canfan, the first on the Spanish side of the ridge, where, for six weeks, they saw no living souls but the bourriqueros (muleteers) with their strings of mules, who would halt for the night at the little inn, setting out at the earliest ray of morning for their descent on the opposite side of the mountain.

The people of the posada lived entirely on curled sheep's milk; the sole article of food the party could obtain on their arrival. At one time, by an early fall of snow, they were shut out of all communication with the valley. Their threatened starvation was averted by the exertions of Mlle. Micas, who managed to procure a quantity of frogs, the hind legs of which she enveloped in leaves, and toasted on sticks over a fire on the hearth. On these frogs they lived for two days, when the hostess was induced to attempt the making of butter from the milk of her sheep, and even to allow the conversion of one of these animals into mutton for their benefit. Their larder thus supplied, and black bread being brought for them by the bourriqueros, from some village a very long way off, the party gave themselves up to the pleasure of their wild life, and the business of sketching. The arrival of the muleteers, with their embroidered shirts, their pointed hats, velvet jackets, and leathern breeches and sandals, was always a welcome event. Rosa paid for wine for them, and they, in return, performed their national dances for her; after which they would throw themselves down for the night upon sheepskins before the fire, furnishing subjects for many picturesque corquis. As the posada was a police station, established there as a terror to smugglers, the little party felt perfectly safe, notwithstanding its loneliness.

With her Scotch tour Rosa was so much pleased that she will probably revisit a district from which she has brought away many agreeable associations, and a wonderful little Skye-terrier, named "Wasp," of the purest breed, and remarkably intelligent, which she holds in great affection, and for whose benefit she has learned several English phrases, to which "Wasp" responds with appreciative and grateful waggings of the tail.—The Englishwoman's Journal.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, AUG. 31.—Last evening, our Academy of Music was re-opened by MARETZKE, for the season, and amid the immense crowd of course was the inevitable Trovator. It was only a few months ago I had the pleasure of witnessing the debut of Madame GASSIER at Rome, where she was welcomed with frenzied enthusiasm; and last evening, I had the pleasure of witnessing the debut of the same lady in the metropolis of the New World, in the Queen of the Western Hemisphere! (vide Gagg's oration in the County House of Buncombe).

Mme. GASSIER appeared smaller than she did when I first saw her, for two reasons—one that the Teatro Argentina, at Rome, is a very little pigeon hole of an opera-house, the stage of which would be quite filled up by one ordinary sized person—the other that she has grown slightly more Alboni-like—indeed I heard a savage monster who sat next to me, say that she was dumpy!

She is not very pretty, nor graceful in figure, but has fine dark hair, and glorious Spanish eyes. Then she acts with intelligence, and at times sings with considerable feeling; yet, I believe her chief forte is in her vocal execution, and had we not so recently heard the inimitable LA GRANGE, we would say that Gassier was unrivalled. Her voice is fresh and of extensive compass, and she occasionally uses a delicate staccato with excellent effect. The role of Amina in Sonnambula, chosen for her debut before an American audience, is considered one of her very finest personations, and her rendition of it last evening was a very great success. The ronde finale, with the brilliant variations introduced by the prima donna in the repetition, was received with the very greatest enthusiasm, and the curtain rose again to allow an encore. On the whole Madame Gassier has succeeded. Though by no means the greatest singer we have had here, as some puffers assert, she is excellent in her way, and that way is a very good one.

Talking about puffing, reminds me, that it is claimed for Madame Gassier, that she appears before the public, without any "preliminary puffing." This is to a great extent true, as far as regards the management, but there is a certain class of newspaper scrawlers who are giving her gratuitous puffing of the most disgusting style. For instance, they descant not upon the prima donna's voice, style or execution, but upon her physical appearance. She is dashing, they say, has beautiful feet, and will set the hearts of all Young New York fluttering, and make all the fair ladies desperately jealous. There is a great deal of this disgusting twaddle in some of our city papers, and does it not strike you as being not merely disgusting, but absolutely immoral? Almost every young singer that appears before our public, is subjected to such equivocal compliments. For instance, when Vestrali appeared in male characters, some journalists praised her limbs more than her singing, and even already the penny-a-liners are heralding Piccolomini in a similar strain. Is not this whole style of criticism unfit for a respectable newspaper, and community?

The tenor who supported Madame Gassier last evening, was Mr. PERRING, a gentleman who has sung considerably in concerts and oratorios, but had never before appeared in opera. Mr. Perring is the tenor of the choir of Calvary Church, and possesses a sweet flexible voice, without great power or compass. Every allowance should be made for a first appearance, and after every allowance having been thus made, Mr. Perring should be considered as a very pleasing concert singer, but as yet hardly capable of the position of first tenor in a first class Italian opera company. He was very nervous, however, as might have been expected, and will undoubtedly do better on another occasion. It is but fair to say that his efforts were generally applauded, and the press of the city, with a few exceptions, give him the credit of having made a very promising debut.

Mr. GASSIER was welcomed back with the most friendly applause. Was it not a pleasing coincidence, that the first air he sang to our public, after his return from Europe, was the "Vi ravviso, luoghi ameni?"

We are to be overflowed and deluged with opera this fall. Two English companies, one with LUCY ESCOTT as prima donna, the other with Miss ANNIE MILNER, will shortly commence operations, while we shall have an uninterrupted course of Italian opera, by various troupes. Besides these, there are to be French and German operas given, of which you shall hear further from

TROVATOR.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., AUGUST 31.—It is now some time since our good people began to talk about building an Opera House, and so far but little progress has been made towards the accomplishment of this very desirable and laudable object. No doubt the idea of an Opera House in Brooklyn may seem very absurd to most of your readers who live in the country or in cities remote from us, but to those most interested and the best capable of judging in the matter, the idea is not only a very sensible one, but a very feasible one.

Here, we have a city containing about the same number of inhabitants as the city of Boston, without a music Hall capable of holding over 1200 persons, without a Theatre or any place of amusement worth naming, and consequently entirely dependent upon New York for every thing we enjoy in this line. Last winter we established a Philharmonic Society and a Mercantile Library, both of which were a perfect success in the fullest, largest sense. There is but one thing more we need to place us on an equal footing with other cities of equal size and importance, and that is, a large, commodious, elegant place of public amusement,—a building that shall contain a Music Hall capable of seating at least 2500 persons—also another auditorium where Operas can be brought out, or that can be used for a first class Theatre.

No practical steps have as yet been taken towards the consummation of this object, but something will be done the coming fall, and I hope before long to chronicle the beginning.

In New York an opera season of two months commenced last night at the Academy,—the indefatigable MAX MARETZKE as Manager and Conductor. As your regular correspondent "Trovator" has promised you a complete report of the debut of Madame GASSIER and of the new tenor, PIERINI, (who is Signior Pierini?) I will say nothing on that point.

The programme for the fall business in the way of opera and other amusements, is now pretty well developed. It is positively announced that PICCOLOMINI is engaged by Napoleon Ullman at $4,000 per month, and all expenses paid.

The ESCOTT Troupe I spoke of sometime since as coming here this fall, are announced for a season of English Opera at Burton's new Theatre, to commence next week. Another company is announced to give English Opera at Wallack's, to be composed of Miss MILNER, soprano, Mr. MINANDA, tenor, Dr. GUILMETTE, baritone, and Mr. RUDOLPHSON, basso. Two new American operas are to be produced, so that the light of musical "Young America" is to be hidden under a bushel no longer.

The coming of PICCOLOMINI, however, is the event that is most wished for and talked about by the Potiphars, McFlimseys, and Firkins of upper-tendom. "Senora Pepita Gassier may do for the common people, but then, you know, she is entirely without style and decidedly passée, so it is hardly worth the trouble going to the Academy until Piccolomini comes." So discoursed the lovely Arabella Fanstina Bullion, as she entertained me this morning with various items of fashionable news, and with her opinion of the performance of Sonnambula at the Academy last night in particular.

BELLINI.

WORCESTER, MASS., AUG. 26.—Miss MARIA S. BRAINERD, of New York, sang at Mechanics' Hall on Tuesday evening, affording us the best concert to which our citizens have been invited for several months. She was to have been assisted by Signor MORINO, but as he failed to appear, Mr. CLARE W. BEAMES, conductor of the concert, after several vain attempts to obtain a substitute, accepted the kindly offered assistance of ARBUCKLE's orchestral band. By the Signor's non-appearance, some of the best selections on the programme were of course omitted, which naturally occasioned some disappointment on the part of the audience—not so large, by the way, as it ought to have been, or as it may be at some more favorable season. Miss Brainerd's singing gave unqualified satisfaction. She has a soprano voice of much compass, power, purity, and sweetness; and while its higher tones are brilliant and clear, its lower ones have a richness seldom found in soprano voices. The grand feature of the evening was her singing of the aria and scena from Der Freyschütz—of which she gave an English version—"How near I came to slumber." It was a triumph in Art! We forgot the difficulties of its execution; we forgot the singer who had mastered them. We heard only the music as Weber wrote it. Such moments are rare in any one's life; but surely they came to the six or eight hundred who listened almost breathlessly to the beautiful aria. A bouquet, and an earnest encore from the hearts and hands of the audience, were the fair singer's reward. Very sweetly and truthfully were her songs and ballads given; and without that tinselly of ornament with which many singers seek to "paint the rose."

Mr. Beames filled very acceptably the post of conductor and accompanist, and won "golden opinions" for his efficiency. He has the modesty of merit; and his pupil's attainments are sufficient evidence of his excellence as a teacher. We hope for another concert from the same performers.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of MOZART's Cantata: "The Praise of Friendship." Owing to a miscalculation of its length, as reduced to the measure of our pages, this piece will run over so as to occupy a couple of pages more next week.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We hardly know whether it is worth the while to agitate so vague a topic as the alleged characteristic feeling or expression of the various keys in music. There are hints of meaning in it which continually tempt philosophic music-lovers into new pursuit with hope to seize it definitely and finally, but it eludes the grasp. Yet what composer will say, even apart from the conveniences of range or compass of the instruments or voices to be employed, that it is a matter of entire indifference in what key his song, or overture, or symphony, or fantasia shall be composed? What composer likes, even supposing the difficulties of execution to remain the same, to have a work which he conceived in one key transposed to another? Surely there is something in it. A contributor, on a preceding page, takes the bull by the horns with such a determined and exhaustive shake, that we are curious to see what he will make out. We do not undertake to answer his questions, put to us, until he shall have got out his whole statement. He is an unbeliever in toto; but his four categories, under one or more of which he thinks the alleged "characteristics" must be conceived of, if at all, do seem to us to cover the whole ground. Will he be able to dispose of them all as easily as he does of the first? That one we readily grant him. No one, of course, can find a fixed and positive character or expression in the notes, taken singly, that compose a scale. If there be any characteristic and peculiar expression in a given key or scale, it must be by correspondence. Now there is no such thing as correspondence between isolated individuals, as such; there is no correspondence between one tone and one color; while between a series or scale of tones, and the prismatic scale, so to say, of colors there may be, and doubtless is some correspondence. It is only the great law running through all being, both the world of matter and the world of mind.

A correspondent in another page asks if we can conceive of a tenor voice, the fine, sincere, true voice of love, as singing effectually in so coarse a character as that of Don Giovanni. We answer there are different theories of Mozart's Giovanni. Taking Mozart's music for the interpreter, together with the whole spirit of the drama, and it will hardly seem that there is no love, no fine spiritual element in his nature, and constituting the real secret of his magnetic power, however recklessly he is supposed to have abused it. Following this writer's query, we have copied another view of the matter from an English paper.

By referring to our resumé of musical news abroad it will be seen that nearly 5,000 children recently sang chorals in the Crystal Palace, London, with programme and effect quite similar to what we have lately witnessed, on a smaller scale, in Boston. * * Our friend the "Diarist," has been wandering about in London for a week, hearing the Cathedral music, both Episcopal and Catholic, and we shall soon hear from him in Germany. We have from him another of the "Brown Papers," which will perhaps appear next week. He means to go to Ludwigsburg and let us know how the great Organ for our Music Hall is getting on.

A musical convention will be held at Worcester, on Tuesday the 28th of September, concluding on Friday evening, Oct. 1st, with a Concert. Worcester seems to be the place for all great gatherings, whether political or moral, and it is fit that music should find an important centre there. A large attendance is expected. We understand that the exercises are to be conducted by Mr. B. F. BAKER, of this city, and by Mr. EDWARD HAMILTON, of Worcester. . . . Mrs. EMMA A. WENTWORTH, the favorite vocalist, is reported as being recently in London, receiving lessons from Costa; but she expected to return to Boston about the middle of September. . . . They have a new attraction at the Boston Museum in Miss SHAW, a pretty, natural, fresh-voiced singer and actress in light and lively operettas. There is a certain charm of individuality about her singing, without any very high degree of school or execution.

Twenty-four new Etudes for the piano, by STEPHEN HELLER, are announced as shortly to appear in Europe; they will be hailed with pleasure by all lovers of the best piano-forte music. . . . A new Symphony, by LINDBLAD, the admirable Swedish composer of songs and operas, was performed a short time since in Stockholm, and another composition by the same master, entitled "The Dreamer," is expected.

MARETZKE's Opera troupe commenced in New York with La Sonnambula; see correspondence. This was twice played, and followed last evening by Verdi's Rigoletto! It would seem that the attraction is supposed to lie in the singers and not in the operas themselves. The characters were Sig. LUIGI STEFANI (tenor, first appearance), Duke of Mantua; ASSONI (buffo), the hunchback; Mme. GASSIER, Gilda; ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Magdalena; Sig. GARIBALDI (first appearance), Sparafacile; Sig. GASPARONI, Count Montemore. * * * Mr. H. C. COOPER, the admiral violinist, announces his newly formed English Opera Troupe, consisting of Miss ANNA WILNER, prima donna; Mrs. G. HOLMAN, seconda donna; Mr. D. MIRANDA, "the great English tenor," (first appearance in America); Mr. G. HOLMAN, second tenor; Dr. CHARLES GUILMETTE, baritone; Mr. F. RUDOLPHSEN, basso; Mr. COOPER, conductor. * * * Of Mme. GASSIER's New York debut, the Courier and Enquirer says:

From that joyous outburst the "Come per me sereno" of the first act, to the agonizing "Rea non son" at the conclusion of the second act, and thence on to the jubilant finale "Ah! non giunge," she held through all the varying tide of feeling the close attention and genuine admiration of her crowd of hearers, and again and again drew down enthusiastic applause. Her voice is extended in range, rich in feeling, and of no common flexibility. Her artistic execution is often truly surprising; though she did not attempt much at ornament, what she did essay in the bravura line she accomplished with perfect ease and in admirable taste. Nature has not been so bountiful with physical gifts to Signora GASSIER as to some of her contemporaries, and her acting, though always appropriate and expressive, yet cannot be called of a superior order. It is as a vocalist that she challenges admiration, and no one can withhold it who once hears her. It is true that her vocalization is rather of the French style—neat, facile, and at times florid and brilliant; and is not marked by the largeness, force, and impassioned vigor that have distinguished some of the prima donnas who have visited us. But no style can be better adapted than hers to such a charming lyric pastoral, in the sentimental line, as La Sonnambula. It could not but please. Signor GASSIER executed the part of the Count with good effect, but Signor PERRING as Elvino was hardly so successful. His mezza voce is agreeable, but his higher notes are somewhat thin and strained. His acting, too, might admit of some improvement. Yet, as a whole, the Opera afforded almost unmixed satisfaction from first to last, as was attested by the frequent applause and repeated calls before the curtain. The spirited exertions of the orchestra and chorus were deserving of praise.

Mme. COLSON, the favorite prima donna of the New Orleans Opera, Signor JUNCA, the great basso profundo of the same, Mr. LABOCETTA, the tenor, and Mr. & Mrs. STRAKOSCH, are among the passengers by the North Star from Europe.

"Who is Madame COLSON?" asks Harper's Weekly, "and who has ever heard her sing?" Perhaps the New Orleans habitués will think the question could only come from the farthest outskirts of opera-dom. But Harper, well says:

Who wants to succumb to an advertisement—and above all, a theatrical advertisement? Let us remember Musard and be wise.

Musard perished (popularly) of aggravated puffing. Now, advertising is good—but only for good wares. People think, sometimes, that Barnum succeeded by advertising; but it was by advertising something worth the pains and the expense. Suppose Jenny Lind had been a poor singer, could any conceivable quantity of skilful puffery have helped the matter long? Think how we were peppered with Musard before he appeared! How we were shot at from windows—how all the papers flung him in our faces—how he squeezed under the front door—how he came hidden in envelopes—how he was placarded on dead walls and painted on opera programmes! Alas, and alas! he is placarded on a dead wall now, in good truth! Certainly Musard's action should lie against Ullman, for Ullman's actions lied against Musard. He was literally blown up. He died of wind and printer's ink!

A London paper gives us an unexpected piece of news, to-wit, that Ullman has engaged not only Piccolomini, but JOHANNA WAGNER for this country. We fear it is too good news; since the same sentence states that Ullman has engaged the Gassiers, whereas we know that Maretzek has got them. Offers have been made, too, it is said, to Mlle. POINSET, of the Paris Opéra. . . . THALBERG has arrived in Paris. There he will pay but a flying visit; after which he will make a tour in Germany, and then "retire" to Naples, shutting himself out from the world of music, or as a Paris journal has it, "loin des concerts et du piano." He is still engaged in his Art du Chant. VIEUTEMS intends passing the winter in Paris.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

A mass, the composition of M. Benoist, written for soprani, tenors, baritones, and basses, with organ and harp, was performed at the church of Saint Eustache, in Paris, on the 25th of last month. On the same and preceding day a Festival was held at Rochefort. The principal works performed were M. David's "Eden," (in which M. Maubert, an infantry soldier, is said to have distinguished himself as The Creator),—a grand overture "L'Inspiration," by M. Grieve,—the "Hallelujah," from the "Messiah,"—Mendelssohn's Symphony in A,—the overture to "Guillaume Tell,"—and the finale to the third act of "Moise." There has also been a musical congress of part-singers and military bands at Dijon.

Signor Rossini is said to find himself so well at Paris, as to have determined on giving up Bologna, and establishing himself for the rest of his days at Passy, where he is about to erect a mansion.—Athenæum.

Germany.

Among other news from Germany is a rumor of a coming opera, by Herr Cornelius,—at present residing in Munich,—on a subject from "The Arabian Nights,"—and the approaching performance at Hanover of "Ilka," a Hungarian opera, "the first," add the journals, "which has passed the frontier." A concert of Russian music, comprising sacred compositions by Borntianski, Lamakin and Davidoff, and a selection from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Czar," is said to have lately made a sensation at Dresden.

VIENNA.—On the 27th June, after having been closed for a long period, the Casino on the Kazlenberg was re-opened. In it is the well-known Mozart-Room, which, for many years, was totally neglected, but has now been restored. The entrance is remarkable for the inscription, "Mozart-Zimmer, 1783" (Mozart-Room, 1783). The room contains three portraits, namely: those of Mozart, the Emperor Joseph, and the Empress Maria Theresa, and a great many statuettes, among which are those of Mozart, Handel, Gluck, Weber, Beethoven, Donizetti, Rubens, Michael Angelo, Van Dyck, Rafael, Titian, Göthe, Pilgram, etc. The furniture is in the rococo style, probably in accordance with the fashion of 1783. There is a small table which Mozart himself is said to have used, and on it a Strangers' Book. It is gratifying to find on the first page several groups of names, some of the writers subscribing themselves expressly "admirers of Mozart."

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Herold's Zampa is not likely to prove an acquisition to the repertory of the Royal Italian Opera. Although brought out with extreme carefulness and splendor, its success on the first night, Thursday, was by no means decided. The solitary encore of the evening was bestowed on the overture, after which there was but little applause for the music, and there were no recalls. The performance, indeed, can hardly be termed a fiasco; but the opera certainly created no excitement, and the general impression at the conclusion was one of disappointment. It was hardly wise to produce Zampa directly in the wake of Don Giovanni. Comparisons are inevitable, and which of the two operas suffers it is needless to insist. Zampa, in fact, is a sort of parody of Don Juan, and, like the original, with a stone statue for his Nemesis. The subjects of the two operas are differently treated, but the heroes of both are reckless and daring, submitted to supernatural influences, and brought to perdition by the same means. There is no ghost-music in Zampa, since the statue does not speak, and the incidental music, when the statue appears or makes a motion, is of the pure melodramatic order. Herold was most happy when attempting least. His natural flight was that of the thrush; when he endeavors to rise with the lark, or soar with the eagle, his pinions droop and he falls to the ground. The lighter portions of the music of Zampa are melodious and graceful, and in several instances original and beautiful. At present, however, we must confine such brief remarks as space will allow to the performance—observing, en passant, that Zampa is not a new opera, but one which for nearly thirty years has been stamped with the approving verdict of musical Europe.

The cast of the dramatis personæ was as follows:

Camilla, Madlle. Parepa; Rita, Mad. Didiée; Zampa, Sig. Tamberlik; Alphonso, Sig. Baraldi; Dandolo, Sig. Ronconi; Daniel, Sig. Tagliafico; Chief Corsair, Sig. Pierini.

Madlle. Parepa appeared last season as Elvira in the Puritani, without producing any effect. Her second essay on the present occasion was not happier. There is nothing to say against her voice, and but little against her singing; but the misfortune is that neither leaves any impression. Madlle. Parepa, as visitors to the Crystal Palace know, is a very good concert-singer; but on the stage she is a non-entity. The music of Zampa does not suit Sig. Tamberlik so well as that of the great opera seria of his country, in which he is so accomplished a proficient. It is arduous and fatiguing, without often being effective. Nevertheless, Sig. Tamberlik, who looked and acted the part of the libertine corsair capitably, exhibited his accustomed zeal, and in the scene where he recounts his amours, in the two barcaroles, and in several other instances, his singing was admirable. Sig. Neri Baraldi, in Alphonso, displayed the same qualities as Sig. Neri Baraldi in Lorenzo, and Sig. Neri Baraldi in Gennaro. Mad. Nantier-Didiée's Rita (Camilla's attendant) was perfect. Sig. Tagliafico's Daniel (Rita's husband and Zampa's confidant,) unique, and Sig. Ronconi's Dandolo (the bellman), incomparable. The comic trio and duet cum trio (acts I and 2,) in which these three artists were engaged, charmed alike by the beauty of the music and the exquisite humor of the performers. Ronconi's assumption of fright in the first scene, when Dandolo has encountered Zampa, was in his raciest manner; and the florid execution of Mad. Didiée, in the trio above-mentioned, was so excellent as to make us long to hear her sing the music of Isabella, in Rossini's Italiana. It is our conviction that only half the talent possessed by this lady is recognized by the public.

The "triumph" of the evening, as we have hinted, was gained by the band, in the overture, which was never more superbly executed. It is not often that the orchestra snatches laurels from the vocalists; but for once, Mr. Costa's pet regiment carried everything before it; and this supremacy the instrumental performers seemed desirous of maintaining all the evening, for at times they played so loud (Herold having supplied them with ample opportunities), that, although the lips of the singers were seen to move, and their mouths to open, not a sound they uttered could be distinguished. It should be remembered that Zampa was composed for the Opera-Comique, and that the band of the Opera-Comique is not the band of the Royal Italian Opera.

The mise-en-scène was complete and splendid; but there was only one new tableau—that of the second act, in which Mount Etna rears its smoking crest from the other side of the sea-shore. This one, however, was "beautiful exceedingly"—a host in itself. The costumes were all that could be wished; but the incidental ballet might have been both graced and improved by the presence of Madlle. Zina Richard.

On Saturday, Don Giovanni was given for the second, and on Tuesday for the third time. Zampa was produced on Thursday.

To-night, Martha will be repeated, and on Monday Don Giovanni for the last extra performance—à propos of which occasion we shall have some further remarks to offer about the performance of Mozart's chef-d'œuvre at the Royal Italian Opera.—Mus. World, Aug. 7.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The second of Mr. Benedict's "Festival Concerts" took place on Friday, the 30th ult., and attracted an immense concourse. The following was the programme:—

PART I.—Overture (Guillaume Tell); Rossini. Motet, "Salvum fac Regem"; Dr. Loewe. Aria, "Dove sono," Madame Weiss; Mozart. Martin Luther's Hymn, Mr. Sims Reeves and Chorus. Air (The Crown Diamonds), Miss Louisa Pyne; Auber. Choral Fantasia, pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard; Beethoven. Ballad, "Who shall be fairest?" Mr. Sims Reeves; Frank Mori. Quartet, "Alziam gli evviva" (Euryanthe), Madame Rudersdorf, Miss Stabach, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Weiss; C. M. von Weber. The Music to Shakespeare's Macbeth, solos, Miss Stabach, Madame Weiss, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Weiss; Matthew Locke.

PART II.—Triumphal March, (Macbeth); Benedict. Air "Robert, toi que j'aime," Madame Rudersdorf; Meyerbeer. Duet, with chorus, "To arms," "Britons strike home," Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Weiss; Purcell. Prayer (Mose); Rossini. Song, "Where the bee sucks," Miss Stabach; Arue. Air, "Rage thou angry storm," Mr. Weiss; Benedict. Duet on Themes from the Huguenots, two pianofortes, Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Benedict; Osborne. Serenade, "Blest be the home"; Benedict. Hebrew Morning Hymn; Mebul.

The chorus and band, as before, numbered nearly one thousand singers and players.

On Wednesday the children of the Metropolitan Charity Schools, to the number of 4,600, assembled in the "Handel Festival Orchestra," and gave a performance sui generis. The following was the programme:

PART I.—Voluntary on the Organ, Old 100th Psalm; Martin Luther. 118th Psalm, (Anniversary); Ganthany. Chorale, (Luther's Hymn), Trumpet obligato, Mr. Haupt; Luther.

PART II.—Voluntary on the Organ, 119th Psalm, ("London New"); Dr. Croft. 104th Psalm, ("Hailover"); Handel or Croft. The National Anthem, John Bull.

The singing was, for the most part, admirable, the precision and unanimity of the children being extraordinary. A note appended to the programme advised the audience that "the singing of the children was not intended as a musical display, but rather as a performance of simple psalmody." No such extenuation, however, was necessary. The voices of the youthful choristers sounded clear, fresh, and powerful. Nothing, in short, could be more agreeable to the ear.

The National Anthem was encored in a tumult of applause, and repeated. The emphatic manner in which the lines—was given, created an immense effect. Mr. George Cooper played "Worthy is the Lamb," and the "Hallelujah" chorus from the Messiah, on the organ magnificently, besides accompanying all the Psalms in a masterly manner. On the whole, the concert was in the highest degree satisfactory, the only fault found being the extreme brevity of the selection—the first time, we believe, such a charge was ever brought against a musical entertainment. The success of this meeting was not inferior to that of the meeting of the National Schools, or that of the Tonic Sol-fa Association. Such exhibitions are peculiarly suited to the Crystal Palace. The number assembled on Wednesday amounted to upwards of 27,000.—Musical World.

"Scatter her enemies
And make them fall"

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal.

Oh, thou sweet cheerful bird. Louisa A. Denton. 25

This is a charming Song in the style of a Waltz. It is very well suited for a concert piece, as it is brilliant, yet its ornaments are of the kind that even the untutored voice will succeed in them, with a little perseverance. The practice of this Song will be a good introduction to the more florid Italian style.

The May Breeze (Das Mailüfterl). Kreipl. 25

An old favorite from "German Land," with text in both languages.

The Merry Bells. Duet. S. Glover. 40

Glover's musical ideas seem to flow the freest and prettiest when he treats merry subjects. Everything comes easy and graceful, and cannot fail to please. The arrangement is somewhat out of his usual line, being for a mezzo-soprano and a tenor voice.

The Mother's Soft "Good Night." Ballad. T. H. Howe. 25

A nice little Song for the parlor.

Day Dreams; or True Love never Dies.

G. W. Foster. 25

Touching, with a pleasing melody.

Wishes. (Wünsche.) Franz Abt. 25

This is the first number of a series of Juvenile Poems set to music by one of the best living song-writers. There is such a charm in these little songs, treating of nothing but flowers, birds, Spring, and Winter, and similar objects, and such a freshness and originality in the simple music added to them, that they are treasured as rare and precious gems by all who like what is genuine and heartfelt in poetry and music. They are by far too pretty to be left to the young people alone. Many who are tired of the sickly tunes and ballads of the day, will find in these echoes from the "Spring of Life," a well full of the pure and refreshing water. They are earnestly recommended to every lover of music. Everybody can sing them, and it takes but little fingers and little practice to accompany them on the piano.

Instrumental.

The Mormon War. Grand March. Ricksecker. 25

A pleasing composition; rather easy.

Basket Cotillon, Campbells are Comin', Girl I left Behind Me, Blue-Eyed Mary, White Cockade, and Kinlock of Kinlock, arranged in an easy style by T. Bissell. 25

Amateur players on the Melodeon or Seraphine will find this a superior collection of good tunes, useful as instructive pieces, pleasing for recreative lessons, and adapted excellently for reed instruments.

Haimonskinder Quickstep. Burditt. 25

A lively Quickstep on Melodies from Balfe's Opera, "Four Children of Ayrton," which has been made familiar to Boston music lovers by the fine performances of the Boston Brigade Band.

Charlton Schottische. G. A. Patz. 30

A well-written, pleasing Schottische, with an elaborate introduction.

Books.

Mendelssohn's Four-Part Songs. Complete.

With English and German words. The English version by J. C. D. Parker. 1.25

The same, for Men's Voices only. 75

This volume contains the whole of these charming compositions of Mendelssohn, being forty-three in number. Of these, twenty-eight are for mixed voices—soprano, alto, tenor, and bass—and the remaining fifteen for male voices, two tenors and two basses. The numerous glee and quartet clubs throughout the country will rejoice to be in possession of so convenient an edition of some of the best and most lovely four-part pieces ever written.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 336. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1858. VOL. XIII. No. 24.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A New Acquaintance.

(From the Brown Papers.)

In the Spring a fine young fellow of some twenty-five years came into the village to make sketches for a popular pictorial journal. He was an acquaintance of our music teacher, and she sent him to me for information upon certain historical points connected with the subjects of his drawings. I conceived a great liking for him, and he has been much in the habit of spending his afternoons with me, chatting over his work or a cup of coffee and a cigar. He has the true artistic spirit, as is clear both from the poetry he throws into his drawings, and from the lofty and truthful principles which underlie his conversation.

I like him, too, because, trusting his genius, he has struggled bravely along, overcoming all obstacles, and is by degrees achieving success through hard labor and unconquerable perseverance. He devoted himself to Art in opposition to his father's will, who was willing to afford the necessary funds to enable him to go into any business which he would choose, but looked upon artists as a sort of genteel vagabonds. So he has had to work his own way. His name is Cary.

"I rather got the better of father, in the argument," he said, when telling me the story. "The old gentleman had been urging me to give up the crazy plan, as he called it, of abandoning all my excellent prospects of an honorable career and a competency, for the doubtful chances of a poor beggarly limner, and concluded by quoting for my benefit, 'Children, obey your parents, for this is right,' and putting the question to me whether my duty to him did not outweigh all that I had urged in favor of devoting myself to Art. 'But, father,' said I, 'haven't you omitted rather an essential part of that passage?' 'How so?' 'Why, I think it was thus, 'Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right.' Now, it strikes me, that the Lord would not have given me my taste and talent for Art, to be buried in a napkin." The governor laughed, and said, 'Well, perhaps you have the argument; but, my boy, I have the bank stock.'

"We have always been as affectionate as one could wish; but not a cent from him to oil my wheels, however hard they have run. So I have had to get along as I could, without proper instruction. But I begin to see indications in plenty, that the old gentleman is, on the whole, not a little proud of his boy. It will all come right in the end, I have no doubt."

The great object, the longing desire of his heart is, and long has been, to visit Enrope and study in her noble galleries; and certainly neither Mrs. Johuson nor myself are likely to cool his ardor in this regard. I have no doubt that he will accomplish his wish, nor, if he does, that he will make a name.

The other day I lent him some of my manuscripts—"Signor Masoni," &c. Upon returning them, yesterday, he said that there was one short episode in his own life, that, he thought, by dressing up a little, might be quite a story. Unluckily, however, there seemed to be no grand catastrophe at the end of it.

"Well, then," said I, "we will have some coffee under the big elm, and you shall tell me the story like an oriental professional tale-teller."

So as we sipped our coffee, and he wrought on a sketch in the shade, he told me the story, which I note down to-day, leaving the "dressing up" for a more convenient season.

"I suppose you remember nothing of the small sign of a couple of wood engravers, not far from your office, at the time you were upon that great New York newspaper?" he began.

"No," I replied.

"Well, I was one of them; for, getting discouraged in Boston, I accepted an offer to go on to New York, into the office of a capital fellow, who was married there, and doing a very good business. Our room stood high in the world, in one sense—say four flights—and under my window was a sort of court—a receptacle for old hogs-heads, boxes, and rubbish of all sorts, such as is collected by grocers and small traders—an enlivening picture, and well adapted to arouse and strengthen the sense of beauty in an artist.—Across this space I looked down a story, into the back room of a building fronting upon another street, where a platoon of girls were employed by an extensive wig and hairwork establishment. There proved, after a few observations, to be nothing very attractive to me there, and sitting with my back to the window, sometimes for days together I did not look out.

"One morning I was busy discussing some topic or other with my friend, and as we paced the room, we came to the window, and glancing down both exclaimed at once, as our eyes fell upon one of the most beautiful creatures that I have thus far seen in life. She was sitting at the window opposite, engaged in hairwork. She was of the dark-eyed, dark-haired order of beauty, with the very richest of complexions, her features not a little like those of the Dresden Murille Madonna, judging from the engraving in your room.

"At our exclamation she glanced up, and her eye lingered a moment upon me with a sort of half recognition, as if she thought she ought to know me, although I was sure I had never seen her before. This was afterwards explained.

"Up to this time I had been heart-whole, my mind having been engrossed by my art, and my beau ideal never having appeared to me in the flesh. At this moment, as my eye met hers, I experienced that of which I had often read with a smile as being absurd. The sudden passion of Romeo and Juliet was now true to nature. Like the gasses in a receiver, all changed and combined by an electric shock, so it seemed to me as if, in the instant, all my hopes and ambition, all my thoughts and feelings, all within me, intellectual, artistic, moral, or æsthetic, was transformed and combined into one all-absorbing, longing, yearning, burning love for that beautiful creature. Thousands have no doubt felt the same, but I do not believe that any one but he who possesses a very sensitive nature can feel it to that extent. She at that moment was all the universe to me!

"I look back at myself then, sometimes, with a smile, oftener with a shudder. When I read of the horrible crimes perpetrated by desperate lovers—men who have not the moral and religious principle to guard them in such moments of frenzy—from my heart I pity them. Why, in that one moment, all things in heaven and earth became of no account to me, in comparison with the delight, the joy, the all-surpassing happiness, which, as it seemed to me, even the commonest acquaintance, just sufficient to admit of formal social intercourse, with that girl would have afforded.

"For some days I could not work. My friend joked me upon my sudden transformation from a steady laborer, at my desk, into a 'lover sighing like a furnace.' But I was in no humor for joking. Who she was, what she was, whence she came—of all this I knew nothing—could think of no means of knowing. I knew merely, that plaiting hair, at that window, sat, day after day, a lovelier being than, in my wildest flights of fancy, I had ever conceived.

"At last I could bear it no longer. I had learned at school to talk with my fingers. I will try her with that, said I. A week, perhaps, had passed. I was early at our room, and saw her as she came with her work to her usual seat. She glanced upward, and I bowed. She returned the salutation very slightly, but with that incomprehensible look of half recognition in her face. In such a state of agitation that I trembled from head to foot, I raised my hand and began to spell out a question, the absurdity of which makes me laugh to think of it: 'Are you capable of loving?'

"From this time our conversations were frequent. I told her who I was, what my business, &c., but received no such confidence in return. I urged my request for an interview, but four weeks passed before she consented. Then, at last, she gave me a name and an address, and appointed an evening.

"However ridiculous it may seem—but I was very young then, and lonely there in New York, and very much in love—I had looked upon it as a thing of course to become acquainted with her and offer her my hand. But now, when I was to meet her for the first time, to hear her voice, be with her, and talk with her, a reaction took place in my feelings. A thousand suggestions of prudence came rushing into my mind—stories of syrens and soul-murdering maidens—doubts of her, natural enough, perhaps, but why not before? She smiled and nodded to me as she left her work, both encouraging me and filling me with new doubts. After my supper I sat long discussing with myself the question: 'To go, or not to go.' At length I started up, with the old saying: 'Faint heart never won fair lady,' put a loaded revolver in my pocket, and soon rang at the door. What folly I had been guilty of! The result of the visit was in the highest degree in her favor, and thenceforth I was much with her. My wild passion assumed a rational form, as I learned to know her better, for I found her possessed of fine qualities, which caused me to respect as well as love her.

"In due time—or rather undue time—for I hurried matters, I suppose, I offered myself. She was violently agitated, turned pale and red, and at last, after a long and severe struggle, informed me that she was already engaged!

"What I said, as soon as the shock allowed me to speak, I have forgotten; but she buried her beautiful face in her hands, and with tears besought my forbearance.

"O, listen to me," she said. "You already know that I am from your own part of the country, a stranger without friends or acquaintances, laboring with my hands for my daily bread. Is it strange that I should have cherished your friendship, when I tell you that your extraordinary resemblance to him who has the promise of my hand, first led me to answer your communications from the window? Those conversations with our fingers, begun on my part more for a frolic than from any other motive, became a delight as varying the cruel monotony of my daily existence. How much more delightful has been our acquaintance since we met, I need not say. I saw your feeling, and have not had the courage to banish you and condemn myself to my former loneliness. You have seemed to me like a brother, and—mercy upon me—have become to me nearer than one. Oh, forgive me!"

"Whether I was the victim of artifice, or not, I cannot even now decide; but I left her with the understanding that, could she honorably release herself from her engagement, she would be mine. I had so strong a feeling of honor at that time, that when she told me, afterwards, that we must part, or, at all events, that she could not meet my wishes—and when I read her lover's letter, and saw in it his all-absorbing affection, I resisted all temptation, and, regardless of consequences, I had strength to do to another as I would have had him do had our positions been reversed. I gave her one burning kiss, bade her 'good bye,' and left the house as in a dream. But I awoke by degrees to a consciousness of a misery, an utter loneliness, a despair, so acute in its agony, that I shudder now to think of it. The world was to me one great blank. Since that time I have never spoken to her—have put eyes upon her but once."

Carey stopped here, turned to his drawing, and began to hum an air.

"Why, man, that is not all your story, is it? I am just getting interested. I want to know how you got over it; whether the girl married Number One, and all that," said I.

"The fact is, Brown, in telling the story it does not seem to amount to much after all; and yet it was of an immense import to me. As to myself, on leaving the house, I was, as I said, in perfect despair—the world a blank. I could not again go to my work. I could not remain in New York. Where to go? What to do with myself? California! Ho, for California!

"I rushed like a crazy fellow to a relative, borrowed a few dollars, ran to my lodgings, paid my bill, packed up a few clothes, and thence to the boat, which I knew was to sail immediately. I reached the wharf, and saw her slowly steaming down the bay. It would be a week before another left.

"I crept slowly back to my office. I dared not look out of the window. I did not, although I had no reason to suppose that she would be there, having left her at home so recently. I sat down again, as in a frightful dream. I was alone, and the question went over and over in my mind: "And now, whither? whither?" I could not think; I could only feel. My mind was full of her beauty and my despair and the conviction that I must fly, as for my life. I sat brooding over the coal fire in the grate, and mechanically picked up a cigar from the table and a bit of newspaper to light it.

"'Wanted! Draughtsman, &c., &c., for a Western city,' caught my eye. The address was in Wall street. Down went the cigar. I caught my hat—down Nassau street—into the office—and in fifteen minutes I was under bonds for a year's service in a great civil engineering establishment a thousand miles away. A hurried visit home to Boston, for I was too restless to stay any where long, and then away for the West, night and day, fast as the wings of steam would carry me. Pale, thin, haggard, with purgatory in my breast, I entered upon my duties. Work, work, work—every moment not occupied with labor was torture. Happily I was free from any tendency to strong drink, and abhorred gambling in all its forms—else, in my condition then, I had been lost. Week passed after week, and no relief. Would a time ever come—could it ever come, when the wound would even superficially heal? Could I ever again be at peace? Oh, those nights! Tossing and tumbling upon my sleepless bed until I could bear it no longer, my imagination calling up all that had passed in New York, and presenting me ten thousand foolish schemes, not one of which would bear the cool reflection of the morning; then leaping from my bed, dressing, and hasting away to the lake shore, where I would walk back and forth upon the sands until sometimes daylight appeared in the East—then back to bed for an hour or two of restless sleep, then up and away to my work. Night, night, night within me. Oh, will it never be day!

"But I was not to be allowed even the poor satisfaction of being far away, and thus freed from the danger of seeing or at least of hearing of her. The cholera was daily drawing nearer, and I comforted myself with the thought that I was bound to stay where I was, could not fly from the danger, and had a secret satisfaction in the thought that I should very likely be among the first victims, in my disordered state, and so be at rest. The horrid pestilence came, but it avoided me. Oh, that I could die, was a vain aspiration. Men, women, and children, all around me fell—young and old, rich and poor, good and bad, the drunkard and the abstinent. I was with the dead and the dying. I took my turn in the temporary hospitals, as waiter and nurse. I saw sights dreadful beyond description—but like a shadow, as I had almost become, I walked amid the pestilence unharmed. Thus some three weeks passed away, and the suffering and misery

I had seen in others had a favorable effect upon my own.

"Now my employer was taken sick. He sent for me. To remain there, he said, would be certain death. Whether he lived or died he could not have the blood of his assistants required at his hands. He discharged my bonds, set me free, and ordered me to return home. All business had ceased; the destroyer's hand was upon everything. Work I must have, both for subsistence and as occupation for my mind; and so, hardly had three months elapsed from my departure, when I was again in my father's house—wretched, miserable beyond the imagination of any one who has never felt the same in kind if not in degree. But I must work. As nothing else offered, I took a room and began to draw portraits, sketch upon wood—anything which would give me work, work, work. I took pay when I could get it—wrought for nothing when I could do no better.

"As I look back now upon those six months, from my first sight of her at the window to the time when I was again at work in Boston, they seem like so many years—long years, too. This constant occupation, with the reflection that grief was useless; that what was done could not be undone; that the past could not be recalled; that indeed all was over—began to have its effect upon me, in relieving and restoring my peace of mind.

"Now, the desire to see him who was before me, and had been preferred before me; to know how he prospered, and to learn something of her, began to make me restless and unhappy. I knew his name, and that in person we greatly resembled each other. But where and how to find him!

"In want of subjects, I had painted my own woe-begone phiz, and hung it upon the wall.

"'Hallo,' said a visitor, one day, as he entered my room and cast a glance upon the pictures about; 'you have been painting Bigelow.'

"'Do you know him?' I asked eagerly, for he was that other self whom I so much wished to see.

"'Know him! We board together.'

"'Well,' said I, 'that is not his picture—it is my own.'

"'By Jupiter! so it is. But the likeness is astonishing. When he comes back to town I'll bring him up. He is in Worcester county, somewhere, but is coming down in the morning train on Tuesday.'

"On Tuesday morning I was also in the train. I passed through the cars, and at length saw my man. Accustomed as I am to study faces, I was almost startled to see the remarkable resemblance between us. I sat down by him. How I introduced the conversation I do not recollect; but I surprised him by calling him by name, and afterward confounded him by talking upon his own affairs, until, as he has since said, he thought the devil must be in me. I soon saw that she had never told him of me, and therefore of my acquaintance with her nothing was said. Some days afterward he came to my room. During the interval he had written to her, and told her of the strange occurrence in the car, which had drawn from her some part of my story—but how much of it? I know not how or why, but as I became intimate with Bigelow, and gained his confidence, the thought, vague and indistinct, arose in my mind, that he too might find himself deceived. There was, perhaps, something in the tone of her letters, of which he read me passages, which gave rise to this suspicion. Well, one evening I was walking down Washington street, near the theatre, just as the doors opened. The pang that passed through and through me, told who that beautiful creature was, so elegantly dressed, leaning upon the arm of a rather foppishly dressed stranger, and just entering the vestibule. I stood transfixed. For a moment, all my love, all my despair, all my agony, returned. Then I thought of Bigelow. I went into the theatre; found their seats, and obtained one near them. Of the play I heard nothing. I have not the faintest conception what it may have been, for all my thoughts, during the hour I sat there, were upon the sketch of that stranger's features, which I was making in my drawing-book.

"She saw me, and, poor girl, I knew by a hundred indications that her misery during that hour was as great as mine. She dared not allow her companion's attention to fix itself upon me, and by various means succeeded in preventing him from noticing me. When finished, I put it up, to her evident relief, and taking one 'long, lingering look'—the last—of that beautiful face, I retired, and left her to enjoy, as she might, undisturbed, her company and the play.

"The first time I saw Bigelow I handed him the sketch. 'Do you know the man?' He turned pale, and fairly trembled, nor shall I soon forget the anguish of his tone as he said, 'John Homans! That man will be the death of me.'

"In a few words, she, whom we had so loved, was poor, was beautiful, was vain, and loved show. That she had cherished a sincere affection for Bigelow and for myself, I believe; but a very deep one it could not have been. Such as it was she sacrificed it, to marry a man, who, as she supposed, was a man of fortune. In temperament, as in looks, Bigelow wonderfully resembles me; and we have both, by degrees, recovered from the blow. Doubtless the experience is for our good; but it was a hard—hard and cruel lesson to learn. Bigelow is engaged to a very lovely girl, not at all, though, like the old one; but still he feels, as I confess I do, that it would be a severe trial to our equanimity to meet Mrs. Homans, as her name now is. The last news we heard of her was to the effect that her husband, so far from being a wealthy man, is but an agent, with a moderate salary, and an indulger of expensive habits. Poor girl! if this is so, how sadly in the end will she be punished for the agony she inflicted upon us!"

I have not seen Cary for some weeks, at which I marvel, until this afternoon, and then only for a moment. I was at the post-office, when the carriage, which runs to the railroad station in the next town, drove up to take the mail in, and there he was. He hailed me.

"I have been up to see you," he said, "and was greatly disappointed not to find you at home. I have something good to tell you."

I stepped up to the carriage, and he, leaning down, whispered in my ear, "Brown, I am going to be married!"

"Ah ha!" said I, "another grande passion?"

"No, indeed," he answered; "that was a flame—a consuming fire—more the offspring of an artist's imagination, than of the heart. But now, my love is calm, pure, soul-satisfying beyond expression. Why, I am just the happiest man living, and I want to talk it all over with you. My governor is all right now, and is to give me the means of spending two, and possibly three, years with my wife in Germany and Italy. I shall be off in a few weeks, and you must be sure and come to the wedding."

"But you have not told me who the bride elect is," I began to say, when a neighbor cried out, "Look out, there!" and another caught me away from the carriage just in time to save me from the wheels.

I am too feeble to walk much now, so I have bought me a Dobbin. He is a steady old goer, and has a remarkable talent for standing. I asked the jockey, "Will he stand?"

"Stand!" said he, "he'll stand to all eternity."

Seeing me smile, he corrected himself: "He'll stand till all is blue," said he.

This being satisfactory, I bought him. I have a nondescript vehicle also, low-wheeled, and with an entrance at the side; and Dobbin and the nondescript vehicle form my equipage, and I ride out in high state and grandeur. Leaving the post-office, I turned old Dobbin's head over the river, and made a call upon Mrs. Johnson, our music teacher. I loosened the check-rein, that the animal might crop a mouthful of grass; and strictly enjoining him not to overturn the vehicle, to which he replied by a wink of the eye and a whisk of his stumpy tail, I went into the house.

"Well, well, what is to pay now?" was my salutation, for Mrs. Johnson's face was half smiles and half tears; little Phoebe was sobbing, Sister Peters looked very grave, and Lizzy Smith, who was present, was both smiling and weeping more than all together.

"What under the canopy has happened, or is going to happen?" I continued. "You appear to be engaged in a feast of smiling and a flow of tears, as somebody does not say. Is this a house of mourning or of rejoicing? Just give me a clue and I will join in either? What is the matter?"

"We are going to lose Lizzy," said Mrs. Johnson.

"Lose Lizzy! Better blot out sun, moon, and stars! Lose Lizzy! No, no; it isn't so, is it, Lizzy?"

"I am afraid it is, Mr. Brown," said she, with a blush and a smile.

"The truth is, Mr. Brown," said our music teacher, "some one has been pilloining that dear little heart of hers, and she is to be married."

"And who is the culprit, the criminal, the—well, there is no adequate term to express it!"

"You must ask a certain young artist, who has crept into our paradise, and stolen our loveliest flower. But he will return her again to us in two or three years, after she has exhausted the music and Art of Germany and Italy. And God grant them," added she, solemnly, "all the joys my husband and I had, a thousand fold, and keep them free from all the clouds which shadowed our path."

"Amen and amen!" said I.

A REMINISCENCE BY A. D. MARX.

(Concluded.)

Such had SPONTINI become, and such was he entirely. One cannot say that he remained true to his mission; he was absolutely one with it, it was his whole life and soul. That there existed at the same time quite other directions, and of a deeper import, was a thing as difficult for him to apprehend, as it is (in the bottom of their hearts) for all Frenchmen. It was not from vanity, but from the necessity of his point of view, that he once said to RICHARD WAGNER: "What is there that you would still compose? Would you have Romans? there is my Vestale; Greeks? there is my Olympia; Spaniards? there I have forestalled you in Cortez; in the fairy kingdom you find my Aldidor; in the Middle Age, Agnes von Hohenstaufen." In all this he was as little able as any other Frenchman to perceive that he was at bottom the same Frenchman under all these forms. During our, I may say, intimate and confidential relations, I had sent him my "Art of Song," in which among some characteristic sketches of composers, I had made highly appreciative mention of his own Napoleonic stamp; he answered me evasively; "Why do you compare me to Napoleon? Is it in allusion to the disastrous end of that great man?" So remarkably were self-consciousness and self-reliance in him blended with suspicion.

In Paris he enjoyed the favor of Josephine; he was commissioned by Napoleon to compose Fernando Cortez; the Spaniards on entering under a Napoleonic dynasty would be inspired by recollections of their old heroic era, a thought soon abandoned when they raised themselves to a new one. When Josephine had to give place to another wife and retire to Malmaison, Spontini ventured, contrary to the will of the emperor, to seek to pay his court to her in faithful devotedness. Suddenly (so he has told me repeatedly himself) Napoleon stepped out from a side door into the ante-room, where Spontini waited alone. Que faites-vous ici? he asked in an imperious tone; Sire, answered Spontini, que faites-vous ici? Napoleon turned away at this allusion to his own inextinguishable feeling. Were the story nothing but a fancy of the composer, it would still be characteristic.

But now he had come to Berlin, invited and received with royal favor, richly endowed, distinguished by other princes and noble families, received with enthusiasm by the public, especially in his first works, and even honored in his last, Aldidor and Agnes. He stood now in a high position, one of important activity, and yet free enough for great creations and for the comfortable enjoyment of life. He found the position suited to himself, and him to it; he also found fruits (at least in the happy first ten years) quite corresponding with his self-appreciation. Was he contented and happy? I scarcely think so. In the midst of all his activity and favor he remained a stranger, and that was felt.

Above all, one must say it was not his own fault. No Frenchman becomes a German, comes to feel at home in our language, in our Art; these remain strange to him, and their depth, like their excess of wealth, immeasurable. But least of all can so strongly stamped a character as Spontini come out of himself, as easily as those pliant half men, who know how to make their way in and through everywhere; even Napoleon never could go outside of himself. Probably this strangeness was the ever vibrating string, which, most of all, disturbed the harmony between the artist and the new world into which he had stepped.

He was celebrated, honored, found enthusiastic admirers, often carried away the full house with storms of applause; not a military parade, not a concert, not a court ball could take place without the melodies of his operas;—only into domestic intimacy he did not penetrate; there it was evident he was a foreigner, a stranger. And quite naturally. What was peculiar to himself, the seat of his power and greatness,—the broadly laid out warlike splendor, the pathetic choruses, the scenic declamation of his recitative, was excluded by its subject; his love arias (and what associates itself with them) estranged by their thoroughly French turn of feeling. As the Frenchman has no word for Gemüth (soul), so with him tenderness, love, enthusiasm are differently shaped and colored, more fine and elegant, but at the same time more external and unconsciously prepared for exhibition; tenderly breathing even to weariness, nervously affecting even to sickness; but there is no wholesome heart-beat of a heart all inspired and quickened by an emotion; one may recall in Chopin, Liszt, Berlioz (not to think of the cold, prim Auber, who never had such aim in view) hosts of examples of that national tone of feeling. Spontini, too, imbibed it, and it remained the ground-tone with him for this side of musical expression. Only in single passages did he raise himself (as Liszt has done also) far above the national limitation; as in the aria: Wüste von Grauen, in "Alcidor," and especially in a never to be forgotten passage in "Nurmahal." Nurmahal and her lofty spouse Dschangir, are present at the feast of roses, upon separate thrones, both noble-hearted, mutually in love, but now divided by the secret torture of jealousy. Between them floats in airy dance the young, light-hearted, unobserving court, while they, each isolated in the festal whirl, give vent to their suffering in half-heard sighs. And still wider swells the tide of the dainty dance, shimmering through the whole room; gradually the choruses grow softer, they are mute, the orchestra is mute,—upon that primitive sound of infinite yearning (the seventh—e, d) lingers and trembles the last sigh of the loving pair—and then, in malicious opposition, storms and crashes in the song of joy renewed with the wild outburst of the full music. It is just these deeper traits which have remained most unobserved in comparison with the mere showy masses.

It has been objected to Spontini, that he was no friend and furtherer of German Art. I could produce various evidence at least of his admiration for GLUCK, whom he praised as his forerunner, and from whom of course he deviated—as an Italian and a Napoleonides. But what resemblance could we expect to find between the great German, who could devote himself so pure and in quiet to his Iphigenia, a Spontini, into whose life the echoes of the Revolution and the blaze of the imperial time had struck! In that reverence and sympathy he was entirely naïve. With right good will, and (considering his direction) with noteworthy forbearance, he added instruments to Armida; Gluck, he thought, would have added them himself, if he had had them in his time. He gave me afterwards, in all innocence, a letter from a high (though not the highest) hand to read, alluding to the matter with this simile: the beryl is indeed a pleasant stone, but not to be placed beside diamonds. Spontini, with the strangest innocence, enjoyed the mark of attention without feeling the sting, or he would never have shown the letter.

Did he understand and love German music as we do? What Frenchman or Italian can do that? What understanding is evinced by those performances of Beethoven's symphonies in the Paris Conservatoire, where they interpolated into the D major Symphony the A minor Allegretto of the Symphony in A major, because it was more "interesting"? Could we expect an élève of the Parisian stage to overlook the scenic deficiency of so many German operas, or the want of striking characteristic, for the sake of the finer and (with himself not current) richer elaboration of the music, and other excellencies strange to him, as to all Frenchmen? Have the German musicians ever forgotten his weaknesses but for the sake of his excellencies? Why had they called in a foreigner, if they wanted what was German? Surely, when a young composer of a rich and respectable family brought him (accompanied by his very intelligent father) a firstling opera, and he seized the young man by the wrist, and led him to the window (he lived on the Place des Gens-d'armes) and, pointing to the church tower, said: "Mon ami, il vous faut des idées, grandes, comme cette coupole!" (My friend, you want ideas, grand, as this cupola!), it did not contribute to his favor in the great circle of that house. And when, after the Freyschütz had been used, with the consent of the leaders, as a party manoeuvre, he resisted the production of Euryanthe (whose dramatic defects must have been more obvious to him than its great beauties), who will judge him too severely, considering how he had the great school of rivalry in all its forms before his eyes in Paris, and how he had felt its pressure on himself? Are then the German musicians so magnanimous and full of help to one another, when they have to encounter dangerous competitors?

All that is past; whatever else he was, he surely was a strongly moulded character. His departure seem intended to disgrace him, through an ostracism wholly foreign to artistic matters, sprung from misunderstanding and intrigue;—he could not bow to it and still less change it. But it behoves the people of Berlin, who have so often surrounded him with jubilation, to hold his memory in high respect.

Violin Music.

Different Pieces selected from the Works of the famous Violin Composers of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries; with Concertante Parts added to the original Text of the Authors, and arranged for Piano and Violin. By E. M. E. Deldevez. Op. 19.—Paris, Richault; London, Schott.

It is long since a book so interesting as this has come before us. It is long since we have seen the promise of a prospectus better fulfilled than by M. Deldevez, who here proves himself a conscientious student of the old masters, taken in hand. During late years there has risen up into the world the ingratitude of disowning our obligations to Italy, as the fountain of instrumental Art no less than of vocal charm and contrapuntal science. This collection reminds us how the great violin players of the last century were trained, since the absence of a name, which every one might have expected to meet in such a book—that of Sebastian Bach—amounts virtually to the exception which proves the rule; and Bach's violin music (let it be added) is not so much music for the student to form himself upon, as for the proficient to conquer.

The title of this work will go far to explain the amount of editing and amplification permitted to himself by M. Deldevez. Most that he has done seems to us well done; and as strictly permissible as the piano-forte part added by Mendelssohn to the Chaconne of Bach, or (to take a widely different example) our own Mr. H. Smart's accompaniments to Handel's Chamber Duets. Since the art of playing for a figured bass has, comparatively speaking, fallen into desuetude—since the science of ornament, formerly thought an essential part of every executant's education, is now disdained by the bald pedantry of modern formalism—we must allow for the individualities—for the too little or too much of those who note down the glosses and decorations, which every thoroughly trained musician ought to be able to make for himself—and, possibly, never twice alike. With this preamble we shall take leave of M. Deldevez, and go hastily through his specimens and selections.

The volume opens, as such a volume should, with a Sonata, No. 1, Op. 5, by the sweetest, the most serene-tempered of musicians—Arcangelo Corelli—followed by fragments of his 5th Sonata (the tomb-stone Gigue included), and by the 7th Sonata from the same series. Rococo this music sounds, no doubt, to ears that prefer the freer forms of modern Art, yet its exquisite proportion and stately beauty are no less remarkable than the variety of the ideas, if they be stripped of their old Italian clothing. Such a melody, for instance, as the Sarabanda, in No. 7, would be fresh in any age of the world's music,—must have been little short of daring when it was written; and some quarter-of-a-hundred more, equally clear and delicious, could be cited from works which are not here. We pass the Invenzione by Bonporti, the Triestine amateur Aulic Counsellor of the Emperor of Austria, for Geminiani's first Sonata, Op. 1, sixteen years later in date (1716) than the Corelli specimen,—sixteen years more enterprising, perchance, as regards display,—sixteen years weaker, certainly, in point of invention. Far more to our taste (in spite of all the trills which authenticate its parentage), is Maestro Porpora's 11th Sonata—a truly grand solo in the old-fashioned style. Next we come to something yet more curious, the Aria by Scaillé, (date 1726). This was one of the four-and-twenty fiddlers got together by Lulli for Louis Quatorze (whose number has passed into a by-word)—a Frenchman truly in this, that his music, though national, might never have been, save for foreign influences. The movement is tuneable, elegant, and graceful, of the family (though even more winning in melody) of the best harpsichord movements by Couperin. When we reach Tartini, however, we have, of course, something nobler and more definite, as befits one of the royalties of the violin. His 1st Sonata, Op. 2, and the varied theme from his 12th Sonata, Op. 1, are among the crown-jewels of the collection; the latter better worth taking up by any violinist in want of a solo (and essentially newer) than the Rhapsodie of the moment's frenzy, or the stale theme from 'La Traviata,' dressed up with sixty-times-told double-stops and arpeggi. Piano-forte players will understand us, if we call it a 'Harmonious Blacksmith' for the violin. Locatelli's 5th Sonata, Op. 6, (1757), is more freakish, but also more feeble. We are at issue, too, with the taste of M. Deldevez, who in this, as in another excerpt or two, goes out of the way to distress the accompanist's nerves, by supporting a 12-8 movement in common tempo. The idea may have been to give an air of freedom and tempo rubato to the solo; but put into execution by average players, it must work badly. The Allegro to the 9th Sonata, Op. 1, by Somis (1722), might have been written with the design of its being accompanied with full orchestra, bearing, as it does, no small resemblance to similar movements in the Concertos of Handel. There is more fancy in the Sonata, No. 6, Op. 5, by Leclair, the pupil of Somis, who died, by an assassin's hand, at Paris, 1764, and who is referred to by all annalists and lexicographers as an artist having largely influenced French music. 'La Gavotte' and 'Le Tambourin' are excellent movements, both of them—interesting, as illustrating the inherently rhythmical tendencies of all French composers, whose school of music is built on the ballet, rather than on the poem. The "Tina Nonna" (Lullaby), of Barbella, the Neapolitan, already transcribed (as the modern phrase is) in Burney's 'History,' is charmingly quaint—a movement which may pair off with the popular 'Romanesca' brought into favor by M. A. Batta's violoncello.

We merely name Mondonville, Stamitz, Zimmermann, Guerini, Cupis de Camargo (a Belgian, brother to the famous dancer La Camargo) in passing: also the Adagio by Nardini (which, to our fancy, M. Deldevez has overloaded in his accompaniment). The 1st Sonata, by Gaviniès, is more to our taste, because more distinct in its features than any of the above, and because indisputably French. When we arrive at Pugnani, Sonata 2, Op. 3 (date, betwixt 1727 and 1770), we find something like the florid adagio and allegro of modern concertos. A Sonata, by Aubert, another French violinist—an Allegro alla Marcia, by Nofrieri—so stately as to make us wish for a better acquaintance with its writer—an Adagio and queer Rondo, by Lolli—an Aria, by Martini, lead us on to the last, and twenty-sixth, composition included in the series—a Sonata, by Viotti. Here we are on the ground of to-day; in the world where condiment is to be considered, rather than the fare to be dressed—where ingenious brilliancy of passage is brought forward per se, as the main object of interest, and where the humor of the singer is introduced into the instrumental melody. Graceful, delicate, brilliant, and reasonably well knit as this Sonata is, it is, at the same time, so much more flimsy as music, as to mark the point at which thought and executive display began to part company. This makes the name of Viotti a proper point of farewell and finis for a collection such as this by M. Deldevez.—Athenæum, Aug. 14.

The reign of Verdi, according to the European journals, is about over. No composer ever went up so much like a rocket, scintillated and flashed into a thousand stars, and afterwards came down into cimmerian darkness, so much like a stick. The world fifty years hence will scarcely believe that we, the originators of ocean steamers, sub-marine telegraphs, builders of big Opera houses, and otherwise 'posted' on matters and things in general, should have ever endured his excruciating music. There are periods, occurring at long intervals, when a sort of disease seizes society. It runs five, ten, or fifteen years, when a healthy reaction takes place, and we come back to primitive sanity and common sense first principles. Such appears to be the movement which now agitates the musical world. Donizetti and Bellini, aye, even Rossini, so long shelved in favor of Verdi and Meyerbeer, are at length exhumed and pronounced worthy of production and admiration. Certainly this is a step in the right direction, and if we go farther back still, even to the days of Gluck and Piccini, we will find operas that equal, if not excel, anything of these modern times. Why not fight over again the battle of the Gluckists and Piccinists? Those who are well read in the history of music, know that original composition has not advanced as rapidly as science with its ocean steamers and ocean telegraphs; that music is the poetry of sound and the revelation of thoughts too deep for words; that its origin is coeval with the origin of man—perhaps even before man made his appearance on this little globe. Nearly a quarter of a century ago, one Mozart wrote "Don Giovanni," at which Italians have invariably laughed because he was a German, but which, by some hook or crook, still preserves its place even on the Italian stage, and will, for aught we know, till the end of time. Old things are not to be despised, and music is full of rich antiquities, which must some day or other see the light. An enterprising musical Ledyard, we trust, will soon turn up, who will dig away the black soil of forgetfulness which has so long covered these precious remains of ages more gifted in poesy and art than our own.

No sagacious opera manager in America will often attempt to place Meyerbeer on the stage. His operas are written for rare voices, and without such they are miserable failures. Basso profundissimus, like Formes, can alone sing Marcel in "Les Huguenots," and Bertram in "Robert le Diable." Five acts of common tragedy are weary enough, but five acts of tragic music are enough to set any one crazy. Besides, it costs (and impresarios well know what we mean by this word,) a plum to mount properly one of his operas. The orchestra and chorus must be doubled. Scene painters, scene shifters, and supernumeraries innumerable must be called into requisition. After all, what is it but a grand spectacle—something in the nature of an extraordinary display of fireworks, or a capital parade of the Seventh Regiment? Music plays second fiddle to tableaux, thinking people are disgusted, children are delighted, and the manager is ruined. Bravo! Kick Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti into kingdom come, and let Meyerbeer rule the roast.

Mr. Ruskin has labored very hard during the last ten years, to prove that Turner excelled all the ancients and moderns in painting; and still dogmatically persists in endeavoring to cram down the throats of the people, at the point of the quill, the idea that Raphael was a boobey, Michael Angelo an ass, Titian a ninny, Murillo a flat, and Poussin an idiot, in comparison with his bean ideal. The throat of the world has a marvellously small orifice, and Ruskin's quill has not altogether succeeded in cramming over a morsel or two down our contracted gullets. High art belongs to no century, whether in painting, sculpture, or music. The compositions of the last twenty years have sent us back a considerable distance, which we can only recover by recurring to first principles, and the sooner we do so the better. Any quantity of thievery and knavery will be unveiled, and much of the supposed originality of modern musical composers will turn out to be, after all, but plagiarism, a dye darker than Erebus. The music of the Present seems to be in a decline. The music of the Future we cannot pretend to understand. So, the music of the Past is all that is left us.—New York Atlas.

Bosio in Boston. (1849.)

(From an article about the Opera Singers.)

And, first, of the "bright, particular star," Signora Bosio, or "My lady Beaux-yeux," as some New Yorker wittily and aptly bath it. For, those dark, speaking eyes, at once innocent and arch, are full of soft light and beauty as a gazelle's. The lustrous, massive, jet black hair reminds you of Milton's "smoothing the raven down of darkness till it smiled." The face, small-featured, pure-complexioned, beaming with intelligence, and changing with the quick and subtle play of feeling; the light and slender figure, at once lady-like and fairy-like, graceful, harmonious, spiritual in every motion; combine with a rare dramatic talent, and a voice fine, pure, penetrating, flexible, and of a most vital quality in all its tones (it is a high soprano), to make a prima donna such as we Americans have not before heard on the stage. The refinement of the woman and the versatility of the actress are equalled by the thorough vocal schooling of the artist. Her vocalization is faultless, her execution remarkable for ease and finish. Her economy of her voice is indeed consummate; in itself it seems but a fine, silvery thread of melody, yet, without overstraining, it is always ready for the most trying passages, and, as if by a spiritual reserved energy, it tells in the strongest and most impassioned bursts. Bosio is evidently a musician, and not, like many a prima donna, a clever singer by rote, with a dramatic turn. You feel entire reliance, therefore, on her artistic acquirement, as well as on her judgment and her feeling. All this completes and justifies the charm she exercises through certain of the higher and transcendent qualities of genius. She possesses the rare gift of imagination. You feel it in the versatility which enables her, like Madame Bishop, to enter into the very spirit and individuality of so great a range of characters, impersonating each to the life, be it a Zerlina, or a Lady Macbeth, or a Lucy of Lammermoor. We first saw and heard her, quite unprepared for what we were to witness, in the Machetto of Verdi, and what was our delight and astonishment to recognize, in that slight and delicate woman, the real spiritual conception of Shakespeare's terrible heroine, as we had never done in any more masculine actress of the spoken drama! In her Luzcrezia Borgia, it was the same sort of power, rendered the more interesting from the contrast of the demoniacally strong and wicked character with the delicately strung instrument that represented it. It was a spiritual creation; it seemed like magnetism; where the flesh seemed weak, the will was superhuman, and the visible weakness measured the invisible energy. As mere musical art, too, nothing could have been more complete and harmonious; it would have satisfied the composer. Again in another sphere of tragedy,—the sentimental and pathetic,—nothing on our stage has ever equalled her Lucia. Here it was not the harmony of contrast, but of identity, between the assumed and the real person. The native delicacy and slight form of the actress, were just what was wanted. The maidenly, sweet, mournful music of the character was embodied both to eye and ear. When it came to the mad scene, which had been a failure and a maudlin exhibition with most of the operatic Lucias, she rose to a pure height of art and genuine pathos. It was beautiful and real; there was method, music, in the madness; the sweet delirium was without drivelling and over-action. Here again you felt the spiritual element, the true poetic imagination; it was like enchantment; it had the strange fascination of a fine thing dreamed, but vanishing at the rude touch of most attempts at representation. And now, hear her in Mozart's dear little little peasant bride, Zerlina! Here the innocent, arch eyes are set in just the right head, and their timid, wandering, gazelle-like gaze is just in place. It would have drawn tears out of Mozart's eyes, to have seen and heard so perfect an impersonation of this little pet character of his. A nature of the utmost refinement, in peasant life and garb;—just what the music of the part indicates it to be; just that did Bosio represent and sing. And how exquisitely sweet and true and expressive was her singing of that music! It was the express ideal, the audible soul and vibration of the insinuating, pleading Batti, batti, changed to rapture with the success it felt quite sure of, and of that purest outpouring of the tranquil ecstasy of love in Vedrai Carino. Hear Bosio sing them, and you will know why these two simple melodies are immortal. And here we recognize in her another test of a true artist. Unlike Italian singers generally, she can subordinate herself entirely to the music, and find her highest artistic pride and happiness in the precise intention and spirit of the composer. Mozart and Mozart's work, absorbs her, and she is too deeply, conscientiously, and fondly occupied to be striving for effect with ornaments and common-place cadenzas, as if the prima donna were the main thing, and the music secondary.—J. S. D.

THE SENSE OF BEAUTY.—Beauty is an all-pervading presence. It unfolds in the numberless flowers of the Spring. It waves in the branches of the trees and the green blades of grass. It haunts the depths of the earth and the sea, and gleams out in the hues of the shell and the precious stone. And not only these minute objects, but the ocean, the mountains, the clouds, the heavens, the stars, the rising and setting sun, all overflow with beauty. The universe is its temple; and those men who are alive to it, cannot lift their eyes without feeling themselves encompassed with it on every side. Now this beauty is so precious, the enjoyments it gives are so refined and pure, so congenial with our tenderest and noblest feelings, and so akin to worship, that it is painful to think of the multitude of men as living in the midst of it, and living almost as blind to it, as if, instead of this fair earth and glorious sky, they were tenants of a dungeon. An infinite joy is lost to the world by the want of culture of this spiritual endowment. Suppose that I were to visit a cottage, and to see its walls lined with the choicest pictures of Raphael, and every spare nook filled with the statues of the most excellent workmanship, and that I were to learn that neither man, woman, or child ever cast an eye at these miracles of art, how should I feel their privation; how should I want to open their eyes, and to help them to comprehend and feel the loveliness and grandeur which in vain courted their notice! But every husbandman is living in sight of the works of a divine artist: and how much would his existence be elevated, could he see the glory which shines forth in their forms, hues, proportions, and moral expression! I have spoken only of the beauty of nature, but how much of this mysterious charm is found in the elegant arts, and especially in literature? The best books have most beauty. The greatest truths are wronged if not linked with beauty, and they win their way most surely and deeply into the soul when arrayed in this their natural and fit attire. Now no man receives the true culture of a man, in whom the sensibility to the beautiful is not cherished; and I know of no condition in life from which it should be excluded. Of all luxuries this is the cheapest and most at hand; and it seems to me to be most important to those conditions, where coarse labor tends to give a grossness to the mind. From the diffusion of the sense of beauty in ancient Greece, and of the taste for music in modern Germany, we learn that the people at large may partake of refined gratifications, which have hitherto been thought to be necessarily restricted to a few.—W. E. Channing.

A NEW PRIMA DONNA.—(From the Moniteur.)—The last competitions both in comic opera and grand opera singing, has shown that the Imperial Conservatoire has trained some beautiful voices; a few still crude and hardly free from their native roughness; others sufficiently cultivated to evoke ere long the plaudits of our leading theatres. First of all, we must congratulate Professor Révial, whose unprecedented triumph is well earned by his unremitting labor, indefatigable zeal, and unsurpassed efforts. Two first prizes, awarded unanimously, a second prize, worth as much as a first one, and an accessit, equal to a second prize: such are the results of this glorious campaign. In the ladies' class, the first prize has been gained by Mademoiselle Augusta Thomson, whom the Opéra is sure to lose no time in securing. She has a magnificent soprano voice, of excellent tone, great flexibility, purity, and vibration. She is said to be of Scottish origin, and has studied for twenty-seven successive months in Professor Révial's class, to whom the success of this pupil is pre-eminently due. Madlle. Thomson sang, in a most admirable manner, the grand scena from the Huguenots, "O beau pays de la Touraine." In the Gentlemen's Classes, the first prize was awarded to M. Hayet, also Monsieur Révial's pupil, who gave the air of "La Fiancée" with great expression. In the Female Classes, next to Madlle. Thomson, who toto vertice supra est, a second prize was divided between Madlles. Brenille and Litschener. "We understand," adds the North British Daily Mail, "that Madlle. Thomson is the sister of Mr. James Thomson, the well-known Glasgow professor of the pianoforte, and that she has already been offered a handsome engagement at the Grand-Opéra, Paris."—Lond. Mus. World.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 6.—STEFFANI, the new tenor imported by Maretzck, has appeared in Rigoletto, with the most complete success. He is a noble fellow, in every respect—with a splendid figure, a fine expressive face, a rich, robusto voice, and an excellent method. In the duet of the second act, in the well-known La donna è mobile, and in the quartet of the last act, he was honored by enthusiastic encores. He is a treasure, indeed, and it is a rich luxury to listen to his full, manly tones, after having so long been accustomed to the sweet, effeminate pipings of Brignoli.

The entire opera was well given. Mad. GASSIER, as Gilda, exhibited more dramatic power than she has hitherto shown here. Signor ASSONI made a passable Rigoletto; and Miss PHILLIPPS, in the insignificant role of Maddalena, was better than any other representative of the part that has appeared before a New York audience. How much this charming young singer improves, and what a treasure she is to both public and manager!

In a previous letter I mentioned a Sig. PIERINI, as a member of the new opera company, but attributed to him a tenor instead of a bass voice. This mistake the Musical Review of this city notices in the patch-work of weak paragraphs which form its leading editorial, and like those learned commentators that journal assumes that Trovator had mistaken Mr. Perring for Sig. Pierini, and more than once alludes, with a sarcasm intended to be wonderfully withering, to the supposed blunder. The Review further remarks that both the news of the arrival and the name of this Signor Pierini, are of Trovator's own manufacture, which assertion only proves how little the Review knows of the matter; for a Signor Pierini did arrive a few days ago, and sings to-morrow night at the Academy of Music, taking the role of Basilio in Rossini's Barbiere. In mentioning this artist, in a previous letter, I fell into the error of attributing to him a tenor voice, but certainly never confounded him with Mr. Perring. So the blighting sarcasm and blasting irony of the astute Review are quite thrown away—quite so.

— that view
In Homer, more than Homer knew,

The new English opera troupe, conducted by Mr. H. COOPER, commences operations this evening at Wallack's theatre. The operas already announced are "Bohemian Girl," "Lucia," "Love Spell," and "Sonnambula." The tenor who rejoices in the singular name of Mr. MIRANDA, has been much puffed, but it is said that he will justify it.

AMODIO, who, since he has married an American wife, has almost settled down into a regular New Yorker, is in town, and promenades most indefatigably up and down Broadway. He is rehearsing with Mme. COLSON, of whose artistic abilities he speaks in the highest terms. LANOCETTA will be the tenor, and JUNCA the basso of the troupe, of which Colson and De WILHORST are to be prime donne.

TROVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 7.—PARODI'S "Farewell Concerts"! Parbleu! how often already have those deceitful words, upon the huge yellow posters, cajoled us into the fond hope that the ponderous prima donna was about to close her professional career in this city. How frequently, at stated intervals, have the wicked, cruel newspapers hypocritically bewailed her departure from our shores to fulfil some lucrative engagement in foreign climes! And voilà! when we pictured her to our mind's eye, vocalizing the Marseillaise for the edification of a cockney audience in London, at that moment we are undeceived by the cruel posters, and discover her nearest to us. She may be in St. Petersburg, by report, but surely hovering near Philadelphia in reality.

Parodi loves the Quaker City; she kisses the very cobble stones upon its highways; she smiles enthusiastically upon the orphans of Girard College; sighs pensively within the romantic nooks of Laurel Hill; sings gratuitously for the inmates of the Blind Asylum; rates the Academy of Music a ne plus ultra; and vows Chestnut street to be the most magnificent thoroughfare in America.

Eh, bien! Why not? All capricious Italians anthropomorphize or glorify temporary places of sojourn, in proportion with their success therein. Believe me, most worthy Journal, I, poor beggar that I am, would be thankfully content with but a tithe of the golden harvest which she has reaped in this same city of broad-rimmed hats and shad-bellied coats. Small wonder, then, that Parodi should regard this latitude as the veritable land of Beulah!

When, some years since, Parodi left the flickering foot-lights of the opera, and, by way of a concert repertoire, strung together some half-dozen Italian tit-bits, her lucky star at once shone forth with unwonted brilliancy. Fate threw her into contact with MAURICE STRAKOSCH, a very respectable pianist, and an exceedingly shrewd man of business, who engaged her for the varied fortunes of itinerant concertizing. The success of the two was positively wonderful! For nine weeks, at the rate of four performances per week, was the Musical Fund crowded with the élite and fashion of this city. Season upon season witnessed the same results. It was their wont (oh! infinite tact!) to be here, invariably, early in the fall, and to open the regular musical season at a time when the ultra-fashionable world, satiated with watering place dissipation, gladly patronizes a more refined and less exciting species of amusement,—and when those whose avocations have kept them pent up in the scorching city throughout the summer, pine for edifying entertainment as well as for cool weather. Then, at the time of the falling leaf, the troupe was accustomed to wend its way toward the sunny South, and, after luxuriating amid the warm influences and gay pleasures of New Orleans, and other cities, until after the ides of March, they would return with the early swallows, and tender to us another series of concerts prior to the summer solstice. Once, indeed, the dear public grew rebellious, and vowed itself unwilling to endure any longer the same repertoire, limited as it was to "Jerusalem! thou that killest," "Ah! mon fils," "Qui la voce," and a few other cavatinas. What, then, did her manager? Shrewd Strakosch! He appealed to that same patriotic and martial American spirit, which ever causes a gaping crowd to follow the stirring drum and fife, as the popular instruments squeak and rattle forth "Yankee Doodle," "Hail to the chief," &c., in the streets. In other words, the adroit manager, in lieu of placing a drum and fife upon the stage of the classic Musical Fund Hall, made use of a brace of Italian lungs, and used them to the same purpose. Identical was the effect. Crowds rushed to Locust street to hear their favorite Prima Donna shout forth "Allons enfans!" or "Home of de free!" in the Marseillaise and in our own "Star-Spangled Banner." What distinguished these crowds from the gaping boys and the regiment of loafers who follow the drum and fife in the street, but position in life and a little odd jewelry!

"Heavens!" said to me an enthusiastic individual, who then held high official position in the State House Row,—"Heavens! how that woman did fire me up with the last strain of the 'Star-Spangled Banner!' I shall take my whole family to-night! Such music inculcates the right feelings, and expands one's love of country! It makes us better Americans." And so he went on sputtering, prating, and belching patriotism until you would have thought that his stomach held ten kettle drums and fifty fifes.

Nor was this man solus in such absurdity. Thousands shouted with him, and paid their dollars with blind enthusiasm for the stale Marseillaise and the much-worn "Star-Spangled Banner." Lucky Strakosch! how fascinatingly he was wont to smile over the sea of up-turned faces, as he sat down at the grand piano, prior to commencing "Lilly Dale, Tremolo." Well might he smile; and how natural to select that self-same Lilly Dale upon an occasion when clap-trap reigned rampant! And then Madame STRAKOSCH, whilom dark-eyed PATTI of the earlier Italian Opera troupes, even caused the waves of applause to surge still higher when, half-demurely, half-roguishly, she sang "Comin' thro' the rye," and "Within a mile of Edinboro." But, pardon me all this badinage, most worthy Journal! My business, at the outset, was to mention that Parodi and her troupe are about to open the regular season here, on the 14th, to continue five nights. HARRISON MILLARD is also announced. We shall welcome him warmly, if he does not deem it a sine qua non to sing "Then you'll remember me." I have not the slightest doubt of the full success of the troupe; and I wish them all of it, for, even if I never become nudely excited by Parodi's singing, myself, I know them all to be a rather "clayver" sort of people, and indefatigably enterprising in their endeavors to cater acceptably to the tastes of the public. On dit,—that Parodi has grown rich; if so, allow me to say, in conclusion,—happy they whose genius lodges in their throats!

MANRICO.

ROCKLAND, ME., AUG. 30. — "The Divine Art" is flourishing among us. Within the past three years, quite an advance has been made in Rockland, musically. As the rush and din of an overdone business has subsided, time has been afforded for more genial employments, and the flow of sweet sounds, the attendant of a wise and wholesome leisure, forms a very agreeable change to the former state of things. The love of music has roused and strengthened, and a higher style of music is becoming popular. The Mozart Society, composed of many of our best musicians, have performed very creditably some of the productions of the great masters. There are several promising musicians in the bud among us, whose musical capabilities are being developed under the care of GEO. D. SMITH, teacher of the piano, organ, voice, &c. We have voices of fine capacity and of good cultivation, and the choir performances of some of our churches are worthy of mention. The Rockland Regimental Band, perhaps the finest field band in Maine, through their own enterprise, aided by the liberality of our citizens, have recently supplied themselves with a full new set of elegant and costly instruments at an expenditure of near $2,000. Remunerated by a voluntary and generous subscription, this Band has given us a series of out-of-door summer-evening concerts, attended by large crowds of both sexes. Mr. Smith has afforded to our people several choice concerts, vocal and instrumental, of which the performers were all his pupils and amateurs. He recently brought out with great success Root's cantatas the "Flower Queen" and "Haymakers." Mr. Smith is not only a gentleman, but an accomplished musician, and a very successful teacher. Music is progressing rapidly in Maine, and, as philanthropists, we rejoice in it.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—1. Conclusion of the Cantata: Praise of Friendship, by MOZART. This beautiful piece, consisting of chorus, recitative and arias, should be very useful in little musical clubs and circles. We commend it especially to college glee clubs, as it was meant originally for male voices (first and second tenor and bass); although it will answer well for female voices.

2. A charming little "Song without Words," for the piano-forte, from our friend ALFRED JAEHL, who sends it to us as a greeting from the midst of his European successes. It is one of Jaell's happiest little efforts; but we do not quite fancy its long caudal appendage of a cadenza; that is where the fingers get the better of the brain.

Musical Review.

Among the recent publications by Oliver Ditson & Co., are the following:

Spring of Life: a collection of Juvenile Songs, by FRANZ ABT, English version by E. WIEBE.

Judging from the first number, which is called "Wishes," and which is a very bright and taking little thing, with a dash of child drollery, Abt has hit a true vein in these juvenile songs. It is quaint, original and pretty. The subjects of the forthcoming ones are "Snowball," "Postillion," "Spring Morning," "Boatman's Song," "The Charmed Violin," "The Parrot," &c., &c. Some of The Germans make good songs for children; they seem not to have outlived the fresh sense of wonder and drollery. We trust these little songs of Abt will prove so popular as to indicate a demand for some of the admirable ones by Taubert, which are at once childlike and artistic; that is, they are poetic.

Germania: New Vocal Gems from eminent German composers.

These are short and simple melodies, mostly of a sentimental character, judging from the three before us, which are: 1. "The May Breezes," by T. KREIPL; 2. "The Tear," by GUMBERT; 3. "O were I but a moonlight ray," by KUECKEN. These are all of the semi-Italian order of German melody, not particularly original, but tuneful and agreeable.

Forget me not: being No. 3 of Six Songs, by WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

Refined, delicate, and choice in melody and in accompaniment, as we should expect from the author.

The Flower Greeting: by CURSCHEMANN, being No. 5 of Select Trios for Female Voices, pp. 7.

A flowing sustained melody is passed from voice to voice, the others accompanying, in the manner of many operatic trios. An agreeable and not difficult piece for concerted practice, and kept within a moderate compass.

Le Chemin du Paradis, (The Way to Paradise): a Ballad, music by JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

This thoroughly French and sentimental ballad, here given with French and English words, had an immense popularity as sung in France and England by Sig. Mario, and is of a class sure to find many admirers; one of those things that admits of being sung with great pathos and "effect." We have spoken of Italian Germans in music: but here is one who, for the time, at least, seems to have been translated into a Frenchman.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The musical drought continues. The Promenade Concerts wind up their successful season in the Music Hall, with number twenty-five, this evening. Nothing looms in the immediate distance but Mr. Burditt's monster brass band and cannonade concert, which is to take place on the Common on the 17th, that being the anniversary of Boston and of the erection of the Franklin statue. We have received from a friend, who resides in Florence, a curious memorial of ROSSINI, in the shape of a sheet of music paper, which was sold with a quantity of others at the disposal of his effects, last year, at auction, he having decided to change his domicile to Paris. It was the remains of a quantity which an admiring nephew had had manufactured expressly for the composer, putting his portrait upon one side, as a water-mark, and on the other an inscription: All' immortale maestro, &c. . . . The New York Atlas made haste to correct its oversight, in neglecting to credit the translation from Heine to our columns, even before it could have seen our reminder, in which we assure our neighbor there was no "spleen" at all, nor any slight meant in the allusion to the "ex-scissor-izer," thanking him at the same time for his complimentary recognition of our poor labors.

A letter from Newport to the New York Tribune, bearing Fry's initials, has the following:

We have had several concerts here. The Brignoli, the Amodio, singing of Italian angels and tempests in their cors, the eminent pianist, Mad. Graever Johnston, have all been at work. Madame Gazzaniga, whom grief, in opposition to the Falstaffian theory, has reduced in size, is also busy here with increased success. Albites, looking genial as usual, and of customary weight, has been assisting. Miss Abby Fay, a Boston young lady, with a voice equal to any part in an opera as regards power, and with much execution, gave a concert. The Catholic chapel, whose prominent pews are essentially diplomatic, has been illustrated by the operatic artists. Signor Brignoli sang exquisitely the intensest part of the mass—an "Agnus Dei"—"Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us!"—last Sunday to the delectation, and I trust spiritual edification of a highly intellectual and brilliant auditory. If this were the place, I would describe what the mass is, viewed as a spiritualistic-aesthetic symbolism, and how the efforts of great artists can set it off.

Of the sea—of that immortal and infinite principle of purity which it enforces; of the loveliness and strength which it affords to its loving disciples; of the sublime beatings of its great heart, throbbing with the grandeur of the Creator—a molten world in motion—a heaving universe of awful grandeur—let me not speak.

They had just one taste of German Opera in New York last week; but "one swallow does not make a summer." Willis says of it:

The new opera company have opened under favorable auspices at the Metropolitan Music Hall. A French opera, translated into German—Boildieu's admirable La Dame Blanche (Die Weise Frau)—was given on the opening night. French melody of the choicest kind, wedded to a German perfection of detail and orchestration, renders this one of the most attractive of all operas.

The audience was large and the performance beyond expectation good. The Germans sang music that they liked and in their own language—of course, therefore, con amore. The heartiness of the performance, indeed, was a little overdone, causing the music sometimes to be a little more boisterous than necessary. The spoken parts of the performance required rather more rehearsing. The orchestra was very fair, needing a few more violins perhaps. The overture was admirably played. The choruses were given with admirable precision by a fine body of voices. Mr. Pickanesser, the tenor, has a good organ which deserved better training than it seems to have received. Madame von Berkel sang and acted very well. We regret, however, that she forces her voice so much. Weinlich is an excellent basso; he also needs some subduing; in the sextet of the second act there was some evidence of this. Herr Graff has a voluminous voice and Herr Lehman possesses a good tenor, round and steady. Madame Pickanesser, by forcing her voice, sang somewhat out of tune. These blemishes, however, were slight compared with the merits of a first performance in which occurred no serious mistakes, delays, or failures. Alternatingly with German opera a French company performs in the same place, affording excellent opportunity to the New Yorkers to ventilate their knowledge of the French language.

—Since writing the above the new enterprise has been abandoned.

At the quarterly meeting of our School Committee this week the semi-annual report of the Committee on Music was presented. The Courier gives the following abstract:

From it we learn that more than one-half of the teachers are capable of instructing their pupils in as much of the elements of music as is required by the rules of the Board; and when the number of changes which are constantly occurring, by resignation or otherwise, is taken into account, and the understanding that in all future selections of teachers, their musical qualification shall be duly considered, the time cannot be far distant when the exceptions already alluded to will cease to exist.

But one opinion is expressed by the teachers as to the influence of music upon school discipline. Their united testimony is to the effect that it could not be dispensed with without a corresponding increase of disciplinary regulations, and that it exerts a soothing and healthful influence over every grade of scholars, from the youngest to the oldest; over the vicious, as over those well disposed.

The Committee have corresponded with instructors of schools in other cities, in order to inform themselves of the success of the systems there taught. In reviewing this correspondence, the Committee say that one striking fact appears to be prominent, viz., that wherever music as a branch of common school education has been fairly tried, popular sentiment, which is after all the only basis upon which the superstructure of common schools rests, is entirely in favor of it; and although its introduction, from ignorance or other causes, may have been opposed at first, the experiment once fairly tested, its strongest opponents have become its warmest friends, and most anxious for its permanence. Its importance as a branch of common school education seems also to be recognized in almost direct proportion to the degree of attention paid to it among the other studies of the school.

The Committee recommend no change in regard to the present course of instruction in our schools. They say that they have not been able to find anything in the methods pursued in other places, which they think can, with benefit, be engrafted on that which has been authorized by this Board. Indeed, they find that in those cities where the greatest results are attained, the lessons of the music teacher are given in the same way that is followed here.

We like to publish every example of the cultivation of a higher taste for music in social circles. By a right combination of means, with a high aim, and a little earnest perseverance, how much may be done in almost every village! A little club of young ladies and gentlemen in Hingham have been in the habit of making a concert once a week, at one another's houses, through the summer; each contributing at the piano, or with voice, her or his part to the programme of the evening, which is always regularly prepared. The selections are quite miscellaneous, but contain always a fair share of the best kind of music, such as must tend to mutual improvement. Here are three of them.

July 22. PART I.—1. Symphony, by Haydn, (arranged for 4 hands); 2. "Invitation to the Waltz" (piano), Weber; 3. Extract from Lucia di Lammermoor, Donizetti; 4. Extract from La Straniera, Bellini; 5. "Spirit Waltz," Beethoven; 6. "La Source," Blumenthal.

PART II.—7. Wedding March (4 hands), Mendelssohn; 8. Mazurka, &c., Goria; 9. Minuet, Mozart; 10. Sonata, op. 26, Beethoven.

Aug. 12. PART I.—1. Overture to Zampa, (4 hands), Herold; 2. Marcia Gioiosa, F. Hiller; 3. Prayer from Mose, Rossini; 4. From Don Giovanni, Mozart.

PART II.—5. Weber's "Last Waltz"; 6. From "Daughter of the Regiment", Donizetti; 7. Airs de Ballet, from Rossini's "William Tell"; 8. Il Desiderio, Cramer; 9. Andante from Sonata, Op. 14, No. 2, Beethoven.

Aug. 26. PART I.—1. From Belisario (4 hands), Donizetti; 2. Fille du Regiment, Donizetti; 3. D'un pensiero, from "Sonnambula", Bellini; 4. Gondola Song (without Words), Mendelssohn.

PART II.—6. Sonata, Mozart; 7. Aria from Marino Faliero, Donizetti; 8. Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia; 9. Sonata, op. 10, No. 1, Beethoven.

These selections are nearly all instrumental. To make the thing complete there should be a choir or Glee Club also organized in such circles, in which Mendelssohn's part-songs, and such longer pieces as we have been publishing in this Journal, could be studied and performed to the general edification.

The New York Mendelssohn Union commenced this week their rehearsals for the season with the oratorio "St. Paul." At the Palace Garden, so called, they have music every night, under the direction of Mr. THOMAS BAKER, the great feature for this week, now that there seems to be a prospect of a new "heated term," being a gigantic "Drum Polka," by the Drum Corps of the 71st Regiment. . . . It seems there is a Signor PIERINI in Maretzek's Italian opera troupe, after all, and "Trovator" was so far right, and Signor PIERINI has not parted with his birth-right of an English name like other foolish tenors; only it is as a basso, and not as a tenor that the said Pierini comes. He has appeared this week in the serio-comical part of Don Basilio in Il Barbiere; Mme. GASSIER being the Rosina, Sig. GASSIER, Figaro, and Sig. LABOCETTA, Almaviva.

Amateurs and artists of the violin will find the way to something good in their line in an article which we have copied from the London Athenaeum in another column. Organists also will see something to their advantage in an announcement which we clip from Novello's Musical Times:

HANDEL'S ORGAN CONCERTOS.—Mr. W. T. BEST, organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, has advertised his intention of publishing the first set of six organ Concertos composed by Handel, adapted as solos for that instrument. In this edition the figured chords are to be filled up, and the claviars marked, so as to indicate practically the manner in which the editor, after diligent study, has considered that these concertos should be performed.

Music Abroad.

London.

CLOSE OF THE OPERA SEASON.—Both opera houses are closed for awhile, after a season of bustle rather than of eminent musical interest. The last cheap nights at Her Majesty's Theatre showed, by their empty benches, that the attraction of Mlle. Piccolomini has passed its zenith. This must always happen when a false popularity has been wrought up, and we imagine Mr. Lumley will find it difficult to sustain another early campaign at low prices, unless he manages to find some new or real musical attraction. Of Mlle. Tietjens we spoke last week. Meanwhile, the Royal Italian Opera has kept itself up well till the last, in spite of the difficulties belonging to a first season, and of the hiatus in its company caused by the defection of Herr Formes. On the novelties given at either theatre—'Luisa Miller,' 'La Serva Padrona,' 'Martha,' and 'Zampa,'—there is no need to descant anew. It will be enough to record that Signor Verdi has made small progress in England's good graces this season,—and that our disposition to try French opera is on the increase. To sum up, it is clear that what is most characteristic as music, or else, what is the best performed, wins the day, whether at dear or cheap prices of admission. The more moderate these can be made no doubt the wiser, but that one good performance is better worth frequenting than half-a-dozen bad ones, is a truth of which our opera-goers are more sensible than some have fancied.

It is said that an attempt at opera in English may possibly be made during the autumn and winter season in the new Covent Garden Theatre.—Athenæum, Aug. 14.

Paris.

We are indebted for the following to the Paris correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune, dated July 29.

Ullmann is here, keeping his agents (the Franco-Italian office) busy ferreting out good voices. Heaven only knows what success he has, for the musical market is a present proof of the folly of political economists who tell us the supply is invariably equal to the demand. There are unfilled demands here now for a whole regiment of tenors, and none are to be found in the market. There are more black swans here than tenors. Here is the company engaged by the Italian opera for the next season: tenors, MM. Mario, Tamberlik, Galvani, Graziani (brother of the baritone); baritones, Graziani, Corsi; basses, Zucchini, Angelini; donne, Alboni, Penco, Grisi, Nantier Didié, Rosa de Ruda, de Vienne. The new ballet at the Grand Opera, "La Sacountala," proves a failure; people don't go to see ballets for the purpose of studying Hindoo mythology, and seeing the "Old Hundred" and the "Dead March" danced by girls in short petticoats.

The Grand Opera is very busy making preparations for the winter. It has secured Mme. Carvalho (Mlle. Miolan of the Opera Comique) at the rate of 80,000 francs ($16,000) a year, but for how long I cannot tell you. I shrewdly suspect, for no long period, as the composers and critics say she has not above six months of voice left her. The Strasburg geese died of dropsy, and the opera songstresses who attempt to make the human voice rival the violin and the flute, die dumb. Great luxuries are to be obtained only at great sacrifices. Mlle. Miolan's voice was too thin to fill the Opera Comique; I cannot conceive what she will do with it at the Grand Opera, unless the audience like homeopathy practiced in music. She will make her first appearance at the Grand Opera in M. Gounod's new opera, "Faust," she being Margaret. They intend bringing out M. Felicien David's long-talked of opera after the New Year's Day; they would bring it out before, but it seems the treasury of the opera has just enough money left in it to enable the opera to reach the 31st December, and it is desired to avoid a deficit. This new opera is now known as "Le Dernier Jour d'Herculeaneum," but it has a great many aliases, having been known as "Le Jugement Dernier," "La Fin du Monde," "Le Dernier Jour de Pompeii," and, I believe, the Fin or Dernier Jour of something else.

The Opera Comique is quite fortunate. It has discovered two new tenors in the Medical School here, and another in one of the Brussels Theatres. And as the latter (his name is Montaubry) receives 40,000 francs a year, the former thinks it much more profitable to pour music into people's ears than medicine down people's throats. Dissecting seems to have an excellent effect on the voice. This theatre has almost in its hands a new opera, by M. Meyerbeer, "Le Pâtre de Cornouailles"; The Cornish Shepherd. MM. Babier and Cordier wrote the "book." I question whether he will reap any advantage from breaking with M. Scribe. The latter, by the way, is angry with him on another score. M. Scribe wrote some months ago a Cornish "book" for M. Limmander, the composer, and it was about being given out to the artists of the Opera Comique, when M. Meyerbeer heard of it, and by accident came to Paris, and by accident dropped into the office of the manager of the Opera Comique, where he heard of M. Scribe's new piece. "You will, of course, have no objection to its being played?" said the manager. "As for dat," dryly replied the composer in his broken French, "I never gives advice; but den I forewarns you dat if one Cornish piece is played before mine, mine won't be played in dis theatre." Of course M. Limmander was put aside for the author of "L'Etoile du Nord." M. Duprez, once so celebrated for his ut de poitrine, gives every year about the middle of July, a concert at Isle Adam, a village north of Paris, of which he is the Mayor. It brings in to the poor some 1500f or 1800f, which proves more than enough for the purpose to which it is devoted, there being but four paupers in his village, and they live quite sumptuously on the four hundred francs a year he gives them by his concert.

At the Opéra Comique, Grétry's comic opera, Les Méprises par Ressemblance has been revived. This comédie à ariettes, as it is entitled by the Revue et Gazette Musicale, was brought out at Fontainebleau, before the Court, November 7th, 1786, and was introduced to the Parisian public on the 16th of the same month. It was very favorably received. Six years later, in 1792, when public opinion had declared in strong terms that the incidents of the libretto were not well adapted to music, the Méprises par Ressemblance was translated from an opera into a comedy, and produced at the Théâtre Montansier, under the name of Les Deux Grenadiers; ou les Quiproquos. This version of the original work held possession of the stage for more than thirty years. The Opéra-Comique restored the music in 1822, since which time it has not been performed in Paris. Its present production, if not likely to make the fortune of the theatre, will serve in the character of a novelty, of which the Opéra-Comique stands in great need just now. Although Grétry was in the zenith of his fame and powers when he composed the Méprises par Ressemblance, that work does not exhibit the same grace and facility as his Richard and the Tableau Parlant. At the Grand Opéra M. Gounod's Sappho has been reproduced, "revised, corrected, and considerably diminished." The three acts have been condensed into two. The principal parts were sustained by Mlles. Artot, Ribault, Sapin, and M. Aymés. We cannot see anything in this to justify the tone of triumph assumed by certain critics who regard M. Gounod as a genius of the first water. If Sappho in its original form had been good, it would never have been degraded into a "lever de rideau."—Lond. Mus. World.

ZURICH.—The London Athenæum says: A friend just returned from a midsummer holiday confirms the accounts in foreign musical journals of the success and interest of the Singing Festival which was held at Zurich, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of last month. The societies from many towns (some as remote as Strasburg and Innspruck) made up a chorus of 4,000 men, and met in a large temporary hall, which, besides accommodating such a formidable battalion of tenors and basses, contained space for an audience of 12,000 persons. Many of the German kapellmeisters were present. Some of the idyllic singing was very good. The men of Berne got the first prize, those of Basle the second; but our friend particularizes 'Les Montagnards,' of Chaux de Fonds, as having "pleased the public the most," marking especially in the programme before us 'Le Chant des Amis,' by M. Ambroise Thomas, who, if we are not mistaken, is of Alsatian origin. "The popular singing," continues he, "was more or less a thorough failure. At the combined performance, well directed by Herr Heim, an amateur, the most striking piece was a Motet, by Bernhard Klein, although the fugue became very monotonous owing to the absence of other than male voices. The order was perfect," concludes our friend, "the splendid weather, the decorated streets and houses, the firing of cannons, the ringing of bells, all helped to give liveliness to the festival; and when I shall have forgotten all else, I shall never forget the tremendous noise of gaiety in the Hall at the supper after the concert—a fortissimo more merry and vehement than I had imagined possible."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal.

Franz Schubert. 25.

One of Schubert's choicest melodies. A Song full of pathos and dramatic expression, set to a beautiful little poem of H. Heine.

Karl Merz. 25

Pretty and touching.

I am dreaming, darling, dreaming. C. P. Rodifer. 25

Malibran. 25

In the palmiest days of this distinguished vocalist she penned a few light pieces, with which to respond to the nightly "Da Capos" of her transported audiences. They are few, but they are gems. The "Rataplan," with which Parodi and others have sufficiently familiarized us, was one of these encora pieces. This is another: a light, brilliant Tyrolienne, concluding with a long, echo-like, mezza-voce passage, sure to bring down the house. The piece is not difficult.

Instrumental.

Guipure Waltz.

H. A. Pond. 25

An easy and pretty piece for study or amusement.

Kacerowsky. 25

The form of the Polka puts the fancy of the composer into such strict and narrow limits, that it is very rare, now-a-days, after Polkas have been written for nearly ten years, that anything turns up which has an air of freshness about it, and still is nothing but a Polka, made for people to dance by. This Polka has this something about it, this flow of life, and sparkling and light wreath of melodies which will make it known and popular as an "original Polka again." The arrangement is of medium difficulty.

The Dripping Well. A Revery.

Gollmick. 30

It is related that Gollmick, one night in summer, was very much annoyed and irritated by an old well in his court-yard, which kept on running and dripping obstinately, all the time—now ritardando, then accelerando, now forte, then piano, changing time, tempo, and melody with a restlessness which was quite excruciating to the tired pianist. At last, as he lay there, and could not help listening and counting each drop, as it were, there began a melody to make itself heard in this trickling of the water, a quaint, capricious melody, gentle and strict sometimes, then starting off at a quick gallop, never ceasing, never resting. It went on a long while, and nobody to hear it but the restless composer on his couch. Of a sudden it stopped, and with it the well ceased to drip. The tone-poet started; he had been chasing that melody all the time, with all his senses. It did not escape him; he threw it on paper that very night. This is the origin of that charming tone-chase, "Dripping Well," as Gollmick relates it himself.

Books.

The Classic Glee Book. A collection of standard Glees, Madrigals, &c., from the works of Calcott, Horsley, Webbe, Stafford, Smith, Attwood, Danby, and other celebrated composers, ancient and modern.

This compilation has been made from the works of the most eminent composers. The music has not suffered from the mutilating spirit of this progressive age, when every novice recognizes in himself the embodiment of all musical art, and undertakes to polish sunbeams and point lilies. In this collection it is pure, unaltered, and such as its composer intended it should be; and will doubtless be duly appreciated by admirers of the genial, hearty melodies of Old England.

Cecilia.

BY FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

I.

Through the long night of time, thy pure life-story
Streams like the moonbeam in thy virgin glory,
Fair pearl, encrusted in a missal quaint,
Sweet maid, or sweeter saint,
Cecilia!

II.

From dewy hawthorn hower, when morning-blushes
Redden the air, song-shaken odor gushes;
So rose thy life's heart-incense, prayer and song,
When Christian Art was young,
Cecilia!

III.

Singing thy pious matins, softly walking
Through woods where wind and leaf, together talking,
Told how the bright earth bloomed, and man was blessed,
'Mid Eden's vanished rest,
Cecilia!

IV.

With rose-crown shading eyes, serene and holy,
Thou wast more fair, oh, meek maid melancholy,
Than Rafael, Titian, Dolci, picture thee, Embodied melody,
Cecilia!

V.

As o'er a tomb, the silv'ry lily slender Sheds a soft radiance, a quiet spiculet,—
So doth thy gentle memory illumine
The cloister's antique gloom,
Cecilia!

Four Letters from Beethoven to Carl Czerny.

That Carl Czerny, from his boyhood, to the 26th of March, 1827, a day that excited universal and profound mourning, lived on terms of uninterrupted friendship with the hero of music, is a well-known fact. During this long period, extending over about twenty-six years, he received a great many letters from him. The earliest of these are, unfortunately, all lost; of the later ones, Czerny gave away the greater number to friends of his who were desirous of possessing a specimen of the handwriting of the celebrated deceased, and thus, as far as I know, he had only nineteen left. These he preserved as a precious treasure.

Of these nineteen letters, the following four will probably possess a very great interest for the musical public, especially for the numerous friends of Beethoven and Czerny, for which reason I now communicate them.

The explanations which, for the better understanding of them, I have thought it advisable to give, I had from Czerny's own lips.

I.

"Dear Czerny,—I cannot see you to-day, but I will come to your house to-morrow, for the purpose of speaking with you. I blurted out so yesterday; I was very sorry afterwards, but you must forgive an author, who would have preferred hearing his work just as he wrote it, however beautifully you played it in other respects.

"I will, however, publicly atone for this, when the violoncello sonata is performed. Let me assure you that I, as an artist, entertain the very best feelings towards you, and will always endeavor to prove it.

"Your true friend, BEETHOVEN."

Czerny received this letter the day after his performing (1812) in Schuppanzigh's band, the E flat major quintet, with wind instruments, on which occasion, out of mere youthful thoughtless-ness, he had taken the liberty of introducing several alterations; of increasing the difficulties of certain passages, of employing the higher octave, etc., etc. For this he was, immediately and justly, reprimanded with great severity, by Beethoven, in the presence of Schuppanzigh, Linke, and the other performers.

One alteration only—namely, the taking the ascending triplet-passages in the first movement in both parts, with both hands in octaves—Beethoven subsequently approved.

The violoncello sonata, mentioned in the second paragraph, was the one in A major, Op. 56, which Czerny, in conjunction with Linke, played the following week to Beethoven's entire satisfaction.

II.

"My Dear Czerny,—Let me beg of you to treat Carl with as much patience as possible; though he may not, at present, get on as well as you and I could desire, he will, otherwise, do still less, for (but he must not know this,) his powers are too severely taxed by the bad arrangement of his lessons.

"Unfortunately, this cannot be immediately altered, therefore, meet him as much as possible affectionately, though seriously. Things will then go better, under the circumstances, which are really unfavorable for Carl. With respect to his playing with you, may I beg you, as soon as he has got a proper system of fingering, and keeps time, as well as plays the notes tolerably without mistake, then first to direct his attention to style, and when he has got thus far, not make him leave off on account of trifling faults, but to point them out to him at the end of the piece. Although I have given few lessons, I always followed this method; it soon forms musicians, and this, after all, is one of the first aims of Art, and is less fatiguing for master and pupil.

"In certain passages, such as g a, f g, e f, d e, c d, b natural e, etc., I should like him, at times, to use all the fingers, as also in the case of d g, e e, d f, e g, f a, etc., etc., g e, f e, c d, b natural, etc., in order that d g may be slurred. Certainly d g sounds, as they say, 'pearled,' (played with a few fingers,) or resembling a pearl; but people like, now and then, a different kind of ornament. More another time. I hope you will receive all this with the love with which I intend it to be said and thought. I have been, moreover, and still remain, your debtor.

"May my sincerity serve you, as far as possible, as a pledge of the future payment of the same.

"Your true friend, BEETHOVEN."

III.

"My Dear Czerny,—Please give this to your parents for my dinner, the other day; I cannot, on any account, accept this for nothing. I do not, either, require your lessons for nothing, even those already given shall be reckoned up and paid you, only let me beg you to have patience for the moment, since I cannot yet ask anything from the widow, and I have had and still have heavy expenses. For the present, it is so much lent. The youngster is coming to you to-day, and I likewise, shall do so later.

Your friend, BEETHOVEN."

Both these letters bear the date of 1815, in which Czerny began giving lessons to Beethoven's nephew, Carl.

Czerny protested, naturally, against receiving any payment, not on one, but on several occasions, so that Beethoven's sensitiveness may have been excited; hence the strange notion, contained in letter III., of wishing to pay for a dinner, of which, with his nephew, he had partaken at the house of Czerny's parents (who then resided in the Hohermarkt, near the Breiter Stein).

In how many instances Beethoven manifested a similar feeling of irritability towards his best friends is already sufficiently known.

That Beethoven's idea, contained in letter II., concerning the propriety of not stopping the pupil during the lesson, however correct on the whole, is liable to very many exceptions, since much depends upon the natural capabilities of the pupil himself, and that it was not carried out by Czerny, are a mere matter of course.

IV.

"My Dear Czerny,—I have this moment heard you are in a position which I really never suspected. Only have confidence in me, and tell me in what way many matters may be rendered more favorable for you (without any mean seeking for patronage on my side).

"As soon as I can take breath again, I must speak with you. Be assured that I prize you, and am ready to prove this, every instant, by deeds. With true esteem, your friend,

"BEETHOVEN."

In 1818, Czerny was requested by Beethoven, in a letter which the former gave, many years ago, as a present to Mr. Cocks, the music-publisher, of London, to play, at one of his last concerts in the Grosser Redouten-Saal, the concerto in E flat major, Op. 73.

Czerny replied, in strict accordance with the truth, that, having devoted himself exclusively to tuition, as a means of livelihood, and having for many years given more than twelve lessons a day, he had been obliged to neglect his own playing so much that he could not venture to perform the concerto with only a few days' notice (as Beethoven required). Hereupon, he immediately received the touching proof contained in the preceding letter of the interest Beethoven took in him.

He discovered subsequently, moreover, that Beethoven had exerted himself to procure him some permanent appointment.

Ballet Literature.—M. A. Venua.

To the frequenters of the Opera form, we can hardly say when commencing, to some thirty odd years ago, and especially to the admirers of ballet and ballet music, the above-named gentleman will yet be well remembered. At the period to which we refer, Mr. Venua was the young and able leader of the ballet orchestra. He had studied music under able masters. At the Conservatoire he was the pupil of the celebrated violin player, Baillot; was subsequently instructed in composition by Peter Winter; and he early became known as a skilful composer, and an able and graceful executant. There was a time when the "King's Theatre" rarely produced a ballet the music for which was not supplied or arranged by Mr. Venua. Among these may be named, "Aline," "La Paysanne Supposée," "Le Prince Troubadour," "Le Père et l'Hamadryade," "La Forêt aux Aventures," but, above all, Didot's Anacreontic ballet, "Zephyr Inconstant, puni et fixé," the sparkling, graceful, and expressive music of which, composed by Mr. Venua, had an European reputation throughout theatres and drawing-rooms, and may still be occasionally heard in the same ballet, under its name of "Flore et Zéphyr." The earlier days to which we now refer were days in which constructors of ballets, like Didot, Hulin, Armand Vestris, Deshayes, and their light-limbed and imaginative brethren, assumed rank as though they were the benefactors of mankind. A glance back at old-fashioned ballet literature shows to us again these pleasantly-arrogant personages writing prefaces to their dancing stories and dramas, with a grave, earnest profundity worthy of volumes on the longitude or essays on the different calculus. In most cases these introductory documents or manifestoes are signed after the style of the Peerage,—a single name giving force and dignity, as it were, to the perplexing wisdom and magnificent use and abuse of words in the preceding preface. How proudly modest, so to speak, is the assertion of "HULLIN," in his wonderful preface to the "Sultan Gécéroux," that "jaloux de satisfaire la noblesse, les souscripteurs, et le public, je désire sortir du cercle banal où roulent les idées de Ballet, et produire des scènes analogues à l'esprit de la nation." How finely discriminating is this division of aristocracy, subscribers, and the public, of whom, it is thus gently hinted, that they do not form a part! How impressive the observation of Hullin, that he is about to tread out of the vulgar circle in which ballet-ideas roll, and produce matter "analogous to the national spirit!" And then, this analogy is illustrated by the very original conception of a shepherdess attracting the love and winning the hand of the disguised son of a sultan, who is uncommonly angry, in a pas d'action, at the news, cuts off the young couple with a shilling, in an indignant pas seul, and at last, learning the virtues of the lady, and convinced of her worthiness of being elevated near the throne, by the graceful way in which she faints at the foot of it, joins in a touching pas de trois of reconciliation; and thus exquisitely terminates a scene supposed to be analogous to the spirit of the British nation, in the year 1819!

As writers, there was as much difference between Hullin and Didelot as there was in their character of ballet masters. The former mixes up a vast amount of affected modesty with his pretensions; the latter, conscious of his grand genius, dares to assert it without reserve, and is not only bold enough to exhibit the caprices of an astounding genius, but also to magniloquently justify them. We pass over Didelot's allusion, in the preface to his Anacreontic ballet, to his invention of an entirely novel aerial "flight" of Zephyr, but we are compelled to pause, with a certain respect, while the incomparable master touches on the subject of his having reproduced in his new piece some "ideas" which he had employed in a ballet of earlier date. He has repeated himself, certainly, he says, and he hints that he is very condescending in making any reflections at all on this subject,—"but," adds the splendid creature, "in repeating myself, I have only resembled men of great talents in more than one class of composition. Besides," he adds, "would it not be better to fall into this defect than to be guilty of plagiarism," (or "que de vivre de rapine," as the French text, en regard, more forcibly puts it,) "like so many inferior authors ('talents médiocres') who enrich themselves by the productions of authors while their own are of no value?" How witheringly this must have been felt by the "inferior" English ballet masters, whose stolen ideas were put into gauze and white tights on the stages of the Olympic and the Sans Pareil! Decidedly, Didelot had, at least, the confidence of genius; and Angiolini and Armand Vestris, the one coy and the other ardent, when they met in a pantomime of passion in a "bois agréable et une campagne riante," must have felt that they had been sent thither, wings, flowers, and all, by an unapproachable master in his art.

We will only further notice in connection with ballet literature of the old days of the King's Theatre, that from the original French and translated programmes of what was passing on the stage, not a few of the audience took lessons in language. That they were exposed to take little by their lessons may be seen by an example which presents itself in one page on casually opening La Double Épreuve—"Recevez cette écharpe," dit Mathilde, "comme un gage de matendresse." "El vous aussi, Joconde, ce médaillon, sous appartement." "Le Bailli s'approche en trambulant,"—four errors in three lines. The French of Stratford-atte-Bowe could not have been of worse quality.

But whatever the quality of the letter-press, a man with memories of the gay and somewhat dissipated old times will not be able to turn over his collection of ballet-books without the feeling expressed in the half-foystering, half-melancholy song of Captain Morris:—

"There's many a lad I knew, now dead,
And many a lass grown old;"

and yet a reference to the persons of the drama registered at the head of each ballet of from thirty to fifty years ago, reminds us, that if the curtain has descended finally on many of the actors, there are not a few still living, and daily to be met with on the highways of London and Paris. We look over a heap of these books, and we see them set down as youthful gods and slender nymphs then, who are very corpulent old gentlemen and excessively rotund old ladies, with swelled legs and a shakiness of gait. In times gone by, these waited to exhibit the graces of their forms and the mute eloquence of their pantomime, upon the arm and bow of Frederic Venna. What says the rhymester, on opera wonders?

"And I have seen a troop of gods,
(It really was a sight entrancing.)
All mute and motionless, like clods,
Till Venua's archet set them dancing."

The years are many since Mr. Venna withdrew from the public eye that used to greet him at the Opera; but they have not been unprofitable years either to others or to himself. Since he retired from the ballet orchestra he has been actively engaged, chiefly as a professor of music, in the county of Berks and its vicinity. Occasionally we have heard of him playing in the presence of Her Majesty, at Windsor, and at all the celebrated musical festivals his name has appeared among the leading executants. His public career, as a professor, Mr. Venna brought to a close on Monday last, by two farewell (morning and evening) concerts, given in the Town Hall, Reading. This career is worth noticing in connection with our subject of ballet literature, because of its great success. Many a renowned professor has made wanton shipwreck of his fortunes; but here we see a modest but able man realizing a fortune by industry and perseverance, and rallying around him, at his leave-taking with the public, a host of patrons, from Royalty downwards, whose names or presence attested their estimation of the integrity and worth of the beneficiare. On the occasions alluded to, Mr. Balfe conducted, and the principal members of the tuneful choir who are to perform at the approaching festivals appeared, and sang or played their best. We do not pretend to report these concerts; but we avail ourselves of the opportunity to congratulate the bearer of a name which is on the title-page of so many ballets, that his long and modest public career has been brought to so gratifying a close, and that health as well as fortune and good name are with him in pleasant companionship.—London Athenæum, Aug. 21.

The Footprints of Music.

From the earliest antiquity to the days of the great king Solomon.

BY IDA BERRY.

The progress of music, to one who was clever,
Might be a fit topic for rhyme;
Its date we can't tell, but have no doubt whatever
That Tune is as ancient as Time;
For the angels rejoiced, at the primal foundation
Of earth, as the clouds rolled away,
And showed the fair face of the infant creation,
Lit up by the newly born day;
They shouted for joy to behold what was done—
While, in transport at seeing fair weather,
The planets commenced a brisk waltz round the sun,
And the bright morning stars sang together.

The folks, as we learn, were in Paradise leading A mighty harmonious life,
When the Serpent, while Adam his carrots were weeding
Essayed a duet with his wife:
This produced some harsh chords, and (of course with good reason)
The blame was laid off upon Eve,
And having debated the case for a season,
The lady was ordered to leave;
But to part from her, Adam was not such a fool,
So he gave up his nice situation—
And hence, we conclude, has arisen the rule
To let discords prepare modulation.

As people increased, it might well be expected
That trouble and strife would begin,
And we find that where music was scorned or neglected,

They quarreled and acted like sin;
But the singers in harmony still held their way on,
And one day, to help them along,
Tubal Cain made a harp for his brother to play on,
And symphony thus joined with song:
The oldest of instruments, then, we may say,
Was the Jew's-harp—though Sawnee supposes
The bagpipe was first, and he swears to this day
"By the piper that played before Moses."

When wrong and oppression of sundry descriptions
The Hebrews had suffered, at length

They got discontented, and left the Egyptians,
Who after them marched in great strength:
They passed through the sea, and, intent on pursuing,
Their foes followed after, we're told;
But, before they well knew what the deuce they were doing,
Got shockingly wet, and took cold.
The Israelites then—who at first view had thought
All was lost, and were frightened to see 'em—
Beholding the mighty deliverance wrought;
Joined in chorus, and sang a Te Deum.

When the Hebrews advanced to lay siege to the city
Of Jericho, that was so strong
That the citizens mocked them, and said 'twas a pity
They'd have to lie round there so long:
They'd no powder, nor cannon; but Joshua, knowing
The science of sound, gave command
To make seven trumpets of ram's horns for blowing,
And got up a sort of brass band;
They marched round the city each day, and full soon
The pride of the scoffers was humbled,
For they played "Yankee Doodle" so much out of tune
That the walls couldn't stand it, and tumbled.

The land being won, as their chronicles mention,
Of plenty and quiet possessed,
They then to advancing the arts turned attention,
And music along with the rest:
King David the pious bestowed, it is stated,
On psalmody much of his care;
While Solomon, wisest of all men created,
Wrote love-songs, and sang to the fair.
And having traced music thus far on its way
So plainly, 'tis hoped none will doubt it,
We here leave the subject for some other day,
And for minstrels who know more about it.

The Cable Day at "Trinity."

From the N. Y. Musical World.

We were among the probably very few persons whose steps were tending away from the city on the day of the cable-celebration. We had seen so many grand festivals of various kinds that the quiet charms of the country seemed to have far greater attraction. But, as we rode down Broadway with our travelling satchel, we gradually caught the enthusiasm of the day to such an extent, that, before crossing the ferry to the railroad dépôt, we determined to persuade a congenial companion, there awaiting us, to remain over and witness the show. Succeeding in doing this, we left our luggage in charge, re-crossed the ferry, and were soon in the whirl of Broadway again, the gay banners dancing brightly over our heads, and the grand tower of old Trinity looming superbly in view, with its English and American colors.

"No possibility of getting a seat in the church after half-past nine," remarked a gentleman to us; and it was then after ten. Still we stopped at the church, and saw the imposing procession of clergymen in white surplices. We hurried forward, and were fortunately successful in getting close to the end of the clerical line. The pressure of the crowd behind was almost crushing, but we were among the fortunate few who were swayed into the inner vestibule just before the order was given by the police to shut the doors. We were now, however, almost in entire darkness; but chancing to know the geography of the place, we felt carefully about for the handle of a side-door we knew of, which we soon found, and urging our companion hastily through the opening, we closed the door behind us and commenced ascending a narrow, winding staircase. In a moment more we had entered the organ-tribune, and the whole grand display was suddenly before us. Around us on every side was the choir, and very near we soon espied our well-beloved Dr. Hodges himself, who welcomed us, intruders as we were, with kindest hospitality, giving our lady companion an excellent seat. The scene before us was pompous. In front of the chancel was a huge, gothic flower-screen, reaching nearly to the ceiling, surmounted by a cross, beneath which was the inscription, "Glory be to God on high" (we wished it had read, "in the highest"), while behind the screen were the two hundred clergy in their surplices, a dense mass of human beings crowded every other part of the church.

Dr. Hodges had devolved the subordinate parts of the musical service upon two of his former pupils,

Mr. Walter, of Trinity Chapel, and Mr. Huntington, of St. Thomas, in order that they, too, might have some participation in so memorable a celebration. Mr. Walter (who has imbibed so much of the organ style of his distinguished preceptor) was concluding the voluntary as we entered. Thereupon an opening anthem was sung, composed by Dr. Hodges on the occasion of the consecration of Trinity in 1846, to the words, "the Lord is in his holy temple," &c. The Venite was a familiar one, by Jones, concerning which a contemporary states that it "was much admired by Haydn when he heard it sung by three thousand children in St. Paul's Cathedral, London." Of the Gloria, the same journal states, "that it commences with an ancient Jewish chant, supposed to have formed part of the Temple ritual; the main points of the music, however, were by Dr. Hodges." The Te Deum was also a composition by the Doctor, composed shortly after his appointment as director of the music in Trinity parish, and styled "The New York Service." The concluding anthem was by Dr. John Clark Whitfield, to the 133d Psalm of Psalter.

The vocal performers of the occasion were the united choirs of Trinity Church and Trinity Chapel, with volunteers from "Calvary" and other choirs. The solos were sung by Miss Gellie, Mrs. Bourne, Mrs. Hutchings, Dr. Guilmette and Mr. Deane. The ladies sang firmly and expressively, nothing apparently being attempted but a plain and chaste enunciation of the text. Dr. Guilmette distinguished himself by a very forcible and manly delivery of his solos. To a very fine voice, Dr. Guilmette adds the charm of a clear and distinct articulation, free from all mannerisms and blemishes of pronunciation—such as disguise and mar the English of too many singers.

On this occasion we had fresh opportunity of valuing and weighing Dr. Hodges' peculiar handling of the organ. The Dr.'s style has a marked cathedral quality, possessing that breadth which is absolutely essential to effect in a grand, sonorous locality like Trinity Church. The Doctor, too, has a certain decided aplomb—he carries a very steady helm, so to speak, which equally prevents his being carried away by the natural excitement of a long-continued service, and is a barrier to all trivialities and improprieties consequent upon a little loss of musical equilibrium. This is partly habit, we suppose, and partly constitutional. Naturally mercurial men would find it difficult to retain sufficient steadiness for cathedral effects. Two good points in the Doctor's playing are his very effective management of the swell and a peculiar art he exhibits in his cadences: the "dying fall" of some of his musical conclusions being exceedingly appealing.

At the close of the service we observed the Doctor winding his way through the labyrinth of seats, holding in his hand what looked very much like Mother Trim's money-pouch, from which he dispensed a series of gold pieces to the singers—doubtless the good Mother's rewards-of-merit to well-deserving choristers.

Harriet Hosmer.

(From the Englishwoman's Journal.)

Born at Watertown, in the State of Massachusetts, in the year 1831, Harriet Hosmer is the only surviving daughter of a physician, who, having lost his wife and child by consumption, and fearing a like fate for the survivor, gave her horse, dog, gun, and boat, and insisted upon an out-doors' life as indispensable to health. A fearless horsewoman, a good shot, an adept in rowing, swimming, diving, and skating, Harriet Hosmer is a signal instance of what judicious physical training will effect in conquering even hereditary taint of constitution. Willingly as the active, energetic child acquiesced in her father's wishes, she contrived, at the same time, to gratify and develop her own peculiar tastes; and many a time and oft, when the worthy doctor may have flattered himself that his darling was in active exercise, she might have been found in a certain clay-pit, not very far from the paternal residence, making early attempts at modeling horses, dogs, sheep, men, and women, any objects, in short, which attracted her attention. Then, too, both here, and subsequently at Lenox, she made good use of her time by studying natural history, and of her gun by securing specimens for herself of the wild creatures of the woods, feathered and furred, dissecting some, and with her own hands preparing and stuffing others. The walls of the room devoted to her special use in the "old house at home," are covered with birds, bats, butterflies, and beetles, snakes and toads, while sundry bottles of spirits contain subjects carefully dissected and prepared by herself.

Ingenuity and taste, too, are shown in the use to which the young girl applied the eggs and feathers or the nests and birds she had pilfered. One instand, in particular, a very early production, evinced mechanical genius and artistic taste. Taking the head, throat, wings, and side feathers of a blue-bird, and having blown a hen's egg, she set it on end, forming the breast of the bird, as it were, by the oval surface of the egg, while, through the open beak and extended neck, entrance was gained to the cavity of the egg containing the ink.

In fact, no one can look around this apartment, occupied by the child and young girl, without at once recognizing the force and individuality of character which have since distinguished her. So true is it that the child is father of the man.

Full of fun and frolic, numerous anecdotes are told of practical jokes perpetrated to such an excess that Dr. Hosmer, satisfied with the progress towards health and strength his child had made, and having endeavored, without success, to place her under tuition in daily and weekly schools near home, determined to commit her to the care of Mrs. Sedgwick, of Lenox, Massachusetts. Thither the young lady, having been expelled from one school, and given over as incorrigible at another, was accordingly sent, with strict injunctions that health should be a paramount consideration, and that the new pupil should have liberty to ride and walk, shoot and swim, to her heart's content. In wiser or kinder hands the young girl could not have been placed. Here, too, she met with Mrs. Fanny Kemble, whose influence tended to strengthen and develop her already decided tastes and predilections. To Mrs. Kemble we have heard the young artist gratefully attribute the encouragement which decided her to follow sculpture as a profession, and to devote herself and her life to the pursuit of Art.

Justly or unjustly, an anonymous squib upon Boston and Bostonians was, about this time, attributed to Miss Hosmer, while a practical joke upon a physician of Boston was the immediate cause of her being sent away to Lenox. Her health having given her father some uneasiness, the gentleman in question, a physician in large practice, was called in to attend her. The rather uncertain visits of this physician proved a source of great annoyance and some real inconvenience to his patient, inasmuch as they interfered with her rides and drives, shooting and boating excursions. Having borne with the inconvenience some time, she requested the gentleman, as a great favor, to name an hour for his call, that she might make her arrangements accordingly. The physician agreed, but punctuality is not always at the command of professional men. Matters were as bad as ever. Sometimes the twelve o'clock appointment did not come off till three o'clock in the afternoon. One day, in particular, Dr. — was some hours after the time. A playful quarrel took place between physician and patient, and, as he rose to take his leave and offered another appointment, Miss Hosmer insisted upon his giving his word to keep it.

"If I am alive," said he, "I will be here," naming some time on a certain day.

"Then if you are not here," was the reply, "I am to conclude that you are dead."

Thus they parted. The day and hour arrived, but no doctor made his appearance! That evening Miss Hosmer rode into Boston, and next morning the papers announced the decease of Dr. —.

Popular, both in his public and private capacity, half Boston and its neighborhood rushed to the physician's house to leave cards and messages of condolence for the family, and to inquire into the cause of the sudden and lamentable event.

In 1850, being then nineteen years of age, Harriet Hosmer left Lenox: Mrs. Sedgwick's judicious treatment, and the motive and encouragement supplied by Mrs. Kemble, had given the right impetus to that activity of mind and body which needed only guiding and directing into legitimate channels. She returned to her father's house, at Watertown, to pursue her Art-studies, and to fit herself for the career she had resolved upon following. There was, at this time, a cousin of Miss Hosmer studying with her father, between whom and herself existed a hearty camaraderie. Together the two spent many hours in dissecting legs and arms, and in making acquaintance with the human frame, Dr. Hosmer having erected a small building at the bottom of his garden to facilitate these studies. Those were days of close study and application. Lessons in drawing and modeling—for which our young student had to repair to Boston, a distance of seven or eight miles—and anatomical studies with her cousin, alternated with the inevitable rides and boating, on which her father wisely insisted. The river Charles runs immediately before the house, and on this river Harriet Hosmer had a boat-house, containing a safe broad boat, and a fragile poetical-looking gondola, with silvered prow, the delight of her heart and the terror of her less experienced and unswimming friends. The life of the young girl was, at this period, full of earnest purpose and noble ambition, and the untiring energy and perseverance which distinguish her now in so remarkable a degree, were at this time evidenced and developed. Having modelled one or two copies from the antique, she next tried her hand on a portrait bust, and then cut Canova's bust of Napoleon in marble, working it entirely with her own hands, that she might make herself mistress of the process. Her father, seeing her devoted to her studies, seconded them in every possible way, and proposed to send her to his friend, Dr. McDowell, Professor of Anatomy to the St. Louis College, that she might go through a course of regular instruction, and be thus thoroughly grounded for the branch of art she had chosen. The young artist was but too glad to close with the offer; and in the autumn of 1850 we find her at St. Louis, residing in the family of her favorite schoolmate from Lenox, winning the hearts of all its members by her frank, joyous nature and steady application, and securing, in the head of it, what she heartily and energetically calls "the best friend I ever had."

Her independence of manner and character, joined to the fact of her entering the college as a student, could not fail to bring down animadversion, and many were the tales fabricated and circulated anent the young New Englander, who was said to carry pistols in her belt, and to be prepared to take the life of any one who interfered with her. It was, perhaps, no disadvantage, under the circumstances, to be protected by such a character. The college stood some way from the inhabited part of the town, and in early morning and late evening, going to and fro with the other students, it is not impossible that she owed the perfect impunity with which she set conventionality at defiance to the character for courage and skill in the use of firearms which attended her.

Dr. McDowell, charmed with the talent and earnestness of his pupil, afforded her every facility in his power, giving her the freedom of the college at all times, and occasionally bestowing upon her a private lecture, when she attended to see him prepare dissections for the public ones. Pleasant and encouraging it is to find men of ability and eminence so willing to help a woman when she is so willing to help herself. The career of this young artist hitherto has been marked by the warm and generous encouragement of first-rate men, from Professor McDowell to John Gibson, and pleasant it is to find the affectionate and grateful appreciation of such kindness converting the temporary tie of master and pupil into the permanent one of tried and valued friendship. "I remember Professor McDowell," writes Miss Hosmer, "with great affection and gratitude, as being a most thorough and patient teacher, as well as at all times a good, kind friend."

Through the winter and spring of 1851, in fact during the whole term, Harriet Hosmer prosecuted her studies with unremitting zeal and attention, and at the close was presented with a "diploma," or as we in England should call it, a certificate, testifying her anatomical efficiency. During her stay at St. Louis, and as a testimony of her gratitude and regard, Miss Hosmer cut, from a bust of Professor McDowell, by Clevenger, a medallion in marble, life size, which is now in the museum of the college. It is, perhaps, worthy of note that Clevenger and Powers both studied anatomy under this professor.

The "diploma" achieved, our young aspirant was bent upon seeing New Orleans before returning to her New England home. It was a season of the year not favorable for such travel, and, from one cause or another, she failed in inducing any of her friends to accompany her. To will and to do are synonymous with some, and so Harriet Hosmer, having set her mind upon an excursion down the Mississippi to the Crescent City, embarked herself one fine morning on board a steamer bound for New Orleans. The river was shallow, the navigation difficult; many a boat did our adventurous traveller pass high and dry. But fortune, as usual, was with her, and she reached her destination in safety. The weather was intensely warm, but, nothing daunted, our young friend saw all that was to be seen, returning at night to sleep on board the steamer as it lay in its place by the levee, and at the expiration of a week returning with it to St. Louis. Arrived there, instead of rejoining her friends, she took boat for the Falls of St. Anthony, on the Upper Mississippi, stopping on the way at Dubuque to visit a lead mine, into which she descended by means of a bucket, and came very near an accident which must inevitably have resulted fatally; a catastrophe which, as no one knew where she was, would probably have remained a secret forever. At the Falls of St. Anthony she went among the Indians, much to their surprise and amusement, and brought away with her a pipe, presented by the chief in token of amity. She also achieved the ascent of a mountain, never before undertaken by a female, and so delighted were the spectators with her courage and agility, that they insisted upon knowing her name, that the mountain might thenceforth be called after her. In a visit to St. Louis, last summer, Miss Hosmer found that her rustic admirers had been as good as their word, and "Hosmer's Height" remains in evidence of "the little lady's" ambition and courage.

On her return to St. Louis, where her prolonged absence had created no little uneasiness, she remained but a short time, and, bidding farewell to her kind friends, retraced her steps homeward.

This was in the summer of 1851. No sooner had Harriet Hosmer reached home than she set to work to model an ideal bust of Hesper, continuing her anatomical studies with her cousin, and employing her intervals of leisure and rest in reading, writing, and boating. Now followed a period of earnest work, cheered and inspired by those visions of success, of purpose fulfilled, of high aims realized, which haunt the young and enthusiastic aspirant, and throw a halo round the youthful days of genius which lends a color to the whole career. As Lowell wisely and poetically says:

"Great dreams preclude low ends."

Better to aspire and fail than not aspire at all. Better to know the dream and the fever, and the awakening, if it must be, than to pass from the cradle to the grave on the level plane of content with things as they are. There may be aspiration without genius, there cannot be genius without aspiration; and where genius is backed by industry and perseverance, the aspiration of one period will meet its realization in another.

To go to Rome, to make herself acquainted with all the treasures of art, ancient and modern, to study and work as the masters of both periods had studied and worked before her, this was now our youthful artist's ambition, and all the while she labored, heart and soul, at Hesper, the first creation of her genius, watching its growth beneath her hand, as a young mother watches step by step the progress of her first-born; kneading in with the plastic clay all those thousand hopes and fears, which turn by turn charm and agitate all who aspire. At length, the clay model finished, a block of marble was sought and found, and brought home to the shed in the garden, hitherto appropriated to dissecting purposes, but now fitted up as a studio. Here, with her own small hands, the youthful maiden, short of stature, and delicate in make, anything but robust in health, with chisel and mallet blocked out the bust, and subsequently, with rasp and file, finished it to the last degree of manipulative perfection. Months and months it took, and hours and days of quiet toil and patience, but those wings of genius, perseverance and industry, were hers, and love lent zest to the work. It was late summer in 1852 before Hesper was fully completed.

"Now," said its author to her father, "I am ready to go to Rome."

"And go you shall, my child, this very autumn," was the reply.

Anxious as Dr. Hosmer was to facilitate in every way the career his daughter had chosen, there was yet another reason for going to Italy before winter set in. Study and nervous anxiety had made their impression upon a naturally delicate constitution, and a short dry cough alarmed the worthy doctor for his child's health.

October of 1852 saw father and daughter on their way to Europe, the St. Louis diploma and daguerreotype of Hesper being carefully stowed away in the safest corner of the portmanteau, as evidence of what the young artist had already achieved, when, arrived at Rome, she should seek the instruction of one or two masters, whose fame, world-wide, could alone satisfy our aspirant's ambition. So eager was her desire to reach Rome that a week only was given to England, when, joining some friends in Paris, the whole party proceeded to Rome, arriving in the Eternal City on the evening of November 12, 1852.

Within two days the daguerreotypes were placed in the hands of Mr. Gibson, as he sat at breakfast in the Café Greco, a famous place of resort for artists.

Now, be it known as a caution to women not to enter lightly upon any career, to throw it up as lightly upon the first difficulty which arises, that a prejudice existed in Rome against lady artists, from the pretensions with which some had repaired thither, and upon which they had succeeded in gaining access to some of the best studios and instruction from their masters, to throw these valuable opportunities aside at the first obstacle that arose. Mr. Gibson had himself, it was stated, been thus victimized and annoyed, and it was represented to Miss Hosmer as doubtful in the extreme if he would either look at the daguerreotype or listen to the proposal of her becoming his pupil. However, the daguerreotypes were placed before him, and, taking them into his hands, one presenting a full and the other a profile view of the bust, he sat some minutes in silence, looking intently at them. Encouraged by this, the young sculptor who had undertaken to present them proceeded to explain Miss Hosmer's intentions and wishes, what she had already done, and what she hoped to do. Still Mr. Gibson remained silent. Finally, closing the case,

"Send the young lady to me," said he, "and whatever I know and can teach her she shall learn."

In less than a week Harriet Hosmer was fairly installed in Mr. Gibson's studio, in the upstairs room we have already described, and where she still is, though rapidly outgrowing the space allotted to her. It is difficult, however, for master and pupil, or, we should rather say, for the two friends, to part; for, spite of the difference of years, or perhaps in consequence of it, a truly paternal and filial affection has sprung up between the two, a source of great happiness to themselves, and of pleasure and amusement to all who know and value them, from the curious likeness, yet unlikeness, which existed from the first in Miss Hosmer to Mr. Gibson, and which daily intercourse has not tended to lessen.

The first winter in Rome was passed in modelling from the antique, Mr. Gibson desiring to assure himself of the correctness of Miss Hosmer's eye, and the soundness of her knowledge, Hesper evincing the possession of the imaginative and creative power. From the first, Mr. Gibson expressed himself more than satisfied with her power of imitating the roundness and softness of flesh, saying, upon one occasion, that he had never seen it surpassed, and not often equalled.

Her first attempt at original design in Rome was a bust of Daphne, quickly succeeded by another of the Medusa—the beautiful Medusa—and a lovely thing it is, faultless in form, and intense in its expression of horror and agony, without trenching on the physically painful.

We have already spoken of the warm friend Miss Hosmer made for herself, during her winter at St. Louis, in the head of a family at whose house she was a guest. This gentleman, as a God-speed to the young artist on her journey to Rome, sent her, on the eve of departure, an order to a large amount for the first figure she should model, leaving her entirely free to select her own time and subject. A statue of CEnone was the result, which is now in the house of Mr. Crow, at St. Louis and which gave such satisfaction to its possessor and his fellow-townsmen that an order was forwarded to Miss Hosmer for a statue for the Public Library at St. Louis, on the same liberal and considerate terms. Beatrice Cenci, exhibited at the Royal Academy last year, and which won so many golden opinions from critics and connoisseurs, was on its way to St. Louis, in fulfilment of this order.

The summers in Rome are, every one knows, trying to the natives, and full of danger to foreigners. Dr. Hosmer having seen his daughter finally settled, returned to America, leaving her with strict injunction to seek some salubrious spot in the neighboring mountains for the summer, if indeed she did not go into Switzerland or England. Rome, however, was the centre of attraction; and, after the first season, which was spent at Sorrento, on the bay of Naples, Miss Hosmer could not be prevailed upon to go out of sight and reach of its lordly dome and noble treasures of art. The third summer came, and, listening to the advice of her friends, and in obedience to the express wish of her father, she made arrangements for a visit to England. The day was settled, trunks were packed, she was on the eve of departure, when a letter from America arrived, informing her of heavy losses sustained by her father, which must necessitate retrenchment in every possible way, a surrender of her career in Rome and an immediate return home. The news came upon her like a thunderbolt. Stunned and bewildered, she knew not at the moment what to do. An only child, and hitherto indulged in every whim and caprice, the position was indeed startling and perplexing. The surrender of her art career was the only thing which she felt to be impossible; whatever else might come, that could not, should not be. And now came into play that true independence of character which hitherto had shown itself mostly in wild freaks and tricks. Instead of falling back upon those friends whose means she knew would be at her disposal in this emergency, she despatched a messenger for the young sculptor who had shown the daguerreotypes to Mr. Gibson, and who, himself dependent upon his personal exertions, was, she decided, the fittest person to consult with as to her own future career. He obeyed the hasty summons, and found the joyous, laughing countenance he had always known, pale and changed, as it were, suddenly, from that of a young girl to a woman full of cares and anxieties. "He could scarcely credit the intelligence, but the letter was explicit, the summons home peremptory. "Go I will not," was the only coherent resolution he found; so the two laid their heads together. Miss Hosmer was the owner of a handsome horse, and an expensive English saddle; these were doomed at once. The summer in Rome itself, during which season living there costs next to nothing, was determined upon; and during those summer months Miss Hosmer should model something so attractive that it should ensure a speedy order, and, exercising strict economy, start thenceforth on an independent artist career, such as many of those around her with less talent and training managed to carry on with success. No sooner said than done; the trunks were unpacked, the friends she had been about to accompany departed without her, her father's reverses were simply and straightforwardly announced and she entered at once on the line of industry and economy she and her friend had struck out.

The summer passed away, and neither fever nor any other form of mischief attacked our young friend. She worked hard and modelled a statue of Puck, so full of spirit, originality and fun that it was no sooner finished and exhibited than orders to put it into marble came in. It has since been repeated again and again, and during the past winter only, three copies have been ordered for England alone; one for the Duke of Hamilton. Thus, fairly started on her own ground, Miss Hosmer has met with that success which talent, combined with industry and energy, never fails to command.

The winter before last, while the Cenci was being put into marble, she was engaged in modelling a monument to the memory of a beautiful young Catholic lady, which is destined for a niche in the Church of San Andrea della Fratte, in the Via Mercede, close upon the Piazza di Spagna. A portrait full length figure of the young girl, life size, reclines upon a low couch. The attitude is easy and natural, and the tranquil sleep of death is admirably rendered in contra-distinction to the warm sleep of life in the Cenci.

Miss Hosmer has been engaged, during the winter just past, in modelling a fountain, for which she has taken the story of Hylas descending for water, when, according to mythology, he is seized upon by the water nymphs and drowned. Hylas forms the crown of the pyramid, while the nymphs twined round its base, with extended arms, seek to drag him down into the water below, where dolphins are spouting jets which interlace each other; a double basin, the upper one supported by swans, receives the cascade.

At the present moment, this talented and enterprising young artist is working upon a half life size statue of Zenobia, in preparation for next winter, when it is to be modelled even larger than life, and is already bespoken for America. She is also just finishing a pendant to Puck, Will-o'-the-Wisp, which is wholly indescribable, and is said to be superior even to Puck.

Prof. De Morgan on Tuning.

Our musical readers are aware that when the two notes of a simple consonance are a little out of tune, though only to the extent which common temperament allows and requires, a beating pulsation is heard—a wow-wow-wow-ing kind of performance—which keeps itself within decent bounds on the piano-forte, but becomes rather an annoying defect on the organ. The theory of these beats, as very obscurely laid down, though with perfect correctness, by Dr. Robert Smith in his Treatise on Harmonics, has received but little attention. The beats themselves have been used in tuning, and they furnish the only method known, except the unassisted judgment of the ear, for tuning on any given system. The subjects of beats has been recently treated by Prof. de Morgan in a paper which has just been printed as a part of the Cambridge Philosophical Transactions, Vol. X., now in the press. On the simplification of the theory of beats which this paper points out there is no occasion to say anything; but a postscript contains some suggestions on the subject of tuning, which we think it worth while to lay before our readers. All tuners begin by properly adjusting an octave, or a little more than an octave, which contains what are technically called the bearings. The rest of the scale is then tuned from the bearings. These bearings are obtained by taking one standard note from a tuning fork, and then tuning fifths upwards and octaves downwards, making the fifths a little too flat, as required in the system employed, usually that of equal temperament, in which all the fifths are made equally flat. This the tuner generally does by the ear; and if, as he comes towards the end of his bearings, he finds that he has overflattened or underflattened the earlier fifths he has to try back. Every new chord which comes into the adjusted part is a new test of the success of the process so far. An adroit tuner does this well; and there are some who have not often to fall back. That is, there are some who soon please their own ears, and others who are much longer about it. But there are no tuners who precisely agree with one another, and few, if any, who at all times agree with themselves. It is the experience of the organ-builders, with their best tuners, working on different compartments of the same organ, that though each can make his compartment pleasant enough by itself, the compartments are frequently not fit to work together. Prof. De Morgan proposes that the hearings should consist of one octave, each of whose twelve semitones is obtained from a separate tuning-fork. But who is to answer for the tuning-forks? The manufacturers are to adjust them by making the consonances beat the number of times per minute which it shall be calculated from the system of temperament chosen that they ought to beat. Supposing the manufacturer to have a good standard set of his own, on any given system, it will be easy enough to make copies by unisons. Nor should the manufacturer object to a proposal which will, if carried out, make the demand for forks just twelve times what it is. The alleged advantages of the proposal are as follows:—First, the saving of time in obtaining the hearings; it is easier to get unison with a fork than to make the unassisted ear give a fifth too flat by two per cent. of a semitone. Secondly, the certainty of attaining the end proposed: for the system to be attained is stereotyped on the forks, independently of the state of the tuner's ear, temper, or indigestion. Thirdly, the practicability of making a true trial of different systems of temperament; the tuner's ear being wholly insufficient to discriminate the minute differences between one system and another. Prof. De Morgan considers equal temperament as an insipid dead flat; and prefers the variety which exists in passing from key to key under varied temperament. He has given the requisite table of beats in each of four different systems. First, equal temperament, as commonly used. Secondly, gradual change of temperament, first upwards and then downwards, in passing dominantly through the twelve major keys. Thirdly, major thirds everywhere equally tempered, with the greatest change of temperament in passing from key to key, which this condition admits of. Fourthly, the same extreme variety with the minor thirds everywhere equally tempered. The calculation of beats for a given system is of little difficulty; but as there are many practical musicians to whom, in calculation, great difficulties and little difficulties are all one and the same thing, we should recommend any organ-builder who seriously meditates trying any system of his own, to ask Prof. De Morgan to furnish him with the table of beats.—Lond. Athenæum, April 17.

Some Considerations Touching Organ-Grinders,

AND THE LAWFULNESS AND PROPRIETY OF PUTTING THEM TO DEATH.

The origin of organ-grinders justifies their extinction, as does also the doom with which they are threatened. This race is derived from Jubal, the sixth in descent from Cain, who was "the father of all them that handle the harp and organ"; (here note the accuracy of description in the word handle.) The seed of Cain, who destroyed his own brother, may with justice be destroyed in turn.

Later in history a trace of the race is detected in the patriarch's pathetic outcry against the "instruments of cruelty" in his sons' tents. In Egypt, and in Pharaoh's time, they seem to have been swept away. Egypt was a wisely-governed country. Had they existed, that prince might have been spared nine of the plagues, since an hour's infliction of this one must have softened the rock of his hard heart, and forced him to send the tribes trooping forth to the desert, with their minstrels at the head, playing the rogue's march of the period. In that age, surely, organ-grinding was one of the lost arts. There is hope, then, that it may again become so strengthened by the cheerful prediction, that in the latter days "the sound of the grinders shall wax low." The law permits the destruction of a nuisance. Organ-grinders are a nuisance. It is therefore lawful to kill them.—[Vide Judge Shaw's Decision ad fin.]

Public policy requires their extinction. The race consists chiefly of Italian refugees, banished for turbulence from their own country, making a trade of revolutions here, and revenging themselves by the murder of Music, for their inability to destroy Order. It is, therefore, courteous and polite in us, as a nation, to kill them.

Humanity pleads for their abolition. They are a wretched people, born out of time, who rear a wretched progeny. It is, then, generous and merciful to themselves to kill them.

Political economy demands that they should perish. They are wholly useless, never doing a hand's turn of work, though many a hand's turn of play. It is, therefore, prudent for society to kill them.

Upon this foundation of reasoning may be built a strong tower of authorities in favor of their extirpation. That rigid and moral generation, the Puritans, regarded the organ with horror, as the Devil's box of pipes, even when used for sacred services. How much more would they have been moved with holy zeal for the destruction of his wandering emissaries, who bear the abomination from door to door!

Shakespeare makes the practical genius of Othello speak with contempt of hearing "a brazen can's tick turned," in evident allusion to grinding organs.

It is true that Lord Bacon composed a work known to scholars as the Novum Organum, or New Organ. But this only proves the hatred of that great and wise man for old organs.

The French style them "orgues de barbarie," or barbarian organs. To banish them and their barbarian supporters is one of the first duties of a civilized people.

Having settled the lawfulness, humanity and prudence of ridding the world of organ-grinders, it should be considered how this may best be done.

Not, perhaps, by individual efforts. The remembrance of suffering might darken an act of justice into revenge. Nor would it suffice merely for the State to put a stop to organs, seeing that the addition of a stop to those they have already, would but increase their power of mischief. There are wiser plans, too, than that of execution upon the scaffold, which might create a morbid sympathy. For example, make them the instruments of their own destruction, by setting them, in some secluded place, to play each other to death. Or they might simply be exiled to Tunis.

The public ear is large and patient; the need of this reform once forced into it, a proper plan will not be wanting. Then will discord be driven from the land, and peace and quietness return; while the grinding-organ shall decorate museums, and be wondered at by our descendants as the last and most cruel of the instruments of torture that disgraced an age calling itself refined.—N. Y. Eve. Post.

The Opera in English.

The performance of Opera in English, with a new company, is an event fitted to excite much musical attention. The troupe at Wallack's now is composed of Annie Milner, prima donna; Mr. Miranda, tenor; Mr. Guilmette, baritone; Mr. Rudolphsen, base. The opera presented on Thursday evening, Bellini's Sonnambula, gave prominent employment to the three first-named artists.

Annie Milner has hitherto been known only in the concert-room, but during some months she has been studying hard for the stage, and now we have the fruits. The lady has very great aptitude for the theatre, else she would not have achieved so much in so short a time. She is generally easy in her action and gesticulation, and a little more time will certainly show improvement. Her voice is a fresh, beautiful soprano, with great facility in the upper notes, much flexibility, and capabilities for a sustained slow movement equally with rapid, florid passages. She is prodigal, too, of the trill, so often eschewed for its difficulty by artists. In appearance she is intensely Saxon; fair complexion, light hair, and sweet expression. She looks Amina, supposing what sometimes happens—that the Italian contadina has these light-toned characteristics. In all that has been written of Bellini's Sonnambula, we have yet to find an adequate analysis of the merit of the declamation and voice-writing, which in certain respects was a new school, and an improvement on all the vocal music which preceded it. It has more than any of the old music continued elasticity of expression. Of course, in deep combination of parts, orchestration, and some other requisites, it has few claims to admiration—but its individualities of melodic-talk are immense. It would require a worse translation than that vouchsafed—which we consider, however, as bad as possible—to destroy the efficacy of the melodic-phraseology: neither can the inappropriate secondary orchestral motives which Bellini, Italian-like, indulges in, upset the virtue of his solo declamations, nor yet the stereotyped endings of the pieces. The music, in a word, carries the singer, and hence the auditory, along with it, and hackneyed as it is, when well done, it rouses the house. The first act dragged somewhat, and indeed, like the second and third, needed more rehearsal. The passionate quality of the second act required all the efforts of the artists. They were duly appreciated by the audience, who vehemently called the singers before the curtain at the close of the bed-chamber scene. In this Annie Milner particularly distinguished herself, and moreover stuck to the text, which other sopranos do not do, but appropriate the tenor's work. We perceive in this the germs of an excellent dramatic artist, if duly cultivated. In the finale of the third act the donna was equally successful, and excited the general enthusiasm of the auditory.

The new tenor has happy moments. At first his voice began and ended in the roof of his mouth. Enlarging the area of vocal freedom, he sang afterward in chest-voice, in the second and third acts, and was peremptorily encored. His voice is sweet; not loud, but portant. He is impassioned, too, and pronounces his words well. His intonation is excellent. Heard often, he would grow in favor, especially if he would sing more equally well.

The baritone, Guilmette, is a favorite with the public, always singing intelligently, earnestly, and effectively. The little he had to do he managed to render important.

We perceive that a fresh opera is advertised for every successive evening. This may be a good plan, but we doubt it. Under such a desperate regimen the pieces cannot be adequately well done; and a success achieved in a well-composed opera may not attach to a second or third-rate one of the repertory. We think it might be well, therefore, to repeat the Sonnambula. It would go much better at the repetition, and ought to excite additional curiosity after the decided success of Thursday evening.

Mr. Cooper, the most effective of passionate players on the violin, led the orchestra with a stick. If occasionally he would drop the latter, and take up his violin for a solo bit, it would enhance much the interest. It seems a pity that so fine an artist should remain mute throughout the entire performance.—N. Y. Tribune.

ACQUISITION OF AN ESTATE BY ROSSINI.—Upon the proposition of M. Haussman, senator and prefect of the Seine, and in accordance with the report of M. Alpland, engineer-in-chief of the Bois de Boulogne, the Municipal Council of Paris have unanimously agreed to the concession made to Rossini by the city of Paris, of a plot of wooded ground, situated close to the Grille de Passy in the Bois de Boulogne—adjoining the Boulevard Beauséjour, including views of Auteuil, Meudon, and Bellevue. The price offered by the illustrious composer—who at the same time declared he had no intention of turning it to speculation, but meant to fix his summer residence there—was accepted without a division. The price offered and accepted, it may be stated, was far from inconsiderable. The new estate, by its size and situation, is worthy the illustrious guest the Bois de Boulogne is about to receive. We may add that the city of Paris was disposed to make the rent-charge for life purely nominal; but Rossini would not listen to this. "I should not fancy myself at home," he replied; "and moreover I am not sufficiently rich nor sufficiently poor to accept such a gift."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 13, 1858.—The opera at the Academy of Music has been a decided hit, and there was a perfectly enormous house at the first appearance of STEFFANI, the great tenor, in Trovatore. Of course he was successful, his powerful, telling voice being peculiarly adapted for the music of Manrico's role; after the Di quella pira, at the close of the third act, he was thrice called before the curtain. The Azucena of Miss PHILLIPS was greatly applauded, and Madame GASSIEN made a fair Leonora. BERNARDI, in Amodio's great part of the Count, was almost a failure. "Trovatore" will be repeated to-night, and it is rumored that "William Tell" will be the next opera.

STRAKOSCH gives us, this week, a short operatic season of three nights at Burton's theatre, with Madame COLSON, AMODIO, BRIGNOLI, LABOCETTA and JUNCA—the latter a celebrated basso. The opening opera is La Figlia, to be followed by Traviata. STRAKOSCH, with his troupe, which includes also PARODI, Mme. de WILHORST, Mad. JOHANSEN, and Miss ANNIE KEMP, of this city, will make a provincial tour, and return to New York in November.

The English Opera Company, at Niblo's, is generally acknowledged by the press to be the finest English troupe we have had lately, and the tenor with the queer name—Mr. MIRANDA—who had been very absurdly and injudiciously puffed, has turned out to be a really good singer. He is a young man, with a superb voice, and will some day take a first rank in the profession. This evening an English version of Trovatore will be produced. This otherwise satisfactory troupe needs a good contralto. The part of the gipsy, in Trovatore, is undertaken by Mrs. Holman, a lady with a soprano voice, wholly unfitted for the part.

The Harmonic Society, in accordance with an invitation from a number of distinguished citizens, gave a grand performance, last Friday evening, at the Crystal Palace, repeating the music they performed at the Atlantic Cable Celebration. The following was the official programme:

PART I.

1—Overture, "William Tell," Rossini. 2—Chorus, "Achieved is the Glorious Work," Haydn. 3—Ode, "The Cable," (words by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, expressly for the Cable Celebration, to the air, "Star Spangled Banner.") 4—Porter Song, from opera of "Martha," Flotow, by Carl Formes. 5—Ode, "All Hail," (words by Mrs. Stephens, expressly for the Cable Celebration.) 6—Grand Hallelujah Chorus, Handel.

Between the Parts the Drum Corps of the 71st Regiment will (by permission of Col. Vosburgh,) give the "Drum Polka."

PART II.

1—Overture, Fra Diavolo, Auber. 2—Hunting Chorus, from "Seasons," Haydn. 3—Trumpet Song, "Messiah," Handel, by Carl Formes. 4—Chorus, "Awake the Harp," from "Creation," Haydn. 5—Duet, "The Lord is a Man of War," from "Israel in Egypt," Handel, by Carl Formes and Mr. Nash. 6—Chorus, "The Heavens are Telling," Haydn.

In addition to the selections, FORMES sang a "Hymn of Peace," the words written by John Brougham, the actor, and the music composed by CLEMENT WHITE, an English musician who has recently taken up his residence in this city. Between four and five thousand people were present.

There is every probability that the coming winter will be, with us, one of the most musical we have had. The Ullman Troupe will undoubtedly be successful, with such singers as JOHANNA WAGNER, Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, and others engaged. In addition to operatic novelties, the little Napoleon intends to produce oratorios, and for that purpose a free singing school has been opened at the Academy, under the tuition of CARL ANSCHUTZ, an excellent teacher, who speaks shocking English and indulges in amusing fits of irascibility when the raw, green pupils sing out of tune.

HOTEL SAN MARCO, LEGHORN, AUG. 13, 1858.—

* * * * *

The Doctor gave me permission to attend a concert which was given at evening, in the Teatro dei Floridi, which was almost opposite the hotel. I was too much fatigued to remain after the first piece of the second part.

It has a very handsome interior, and is called one of the finest theatres in Italy. There are some five rows of boxes—each box a small drawing room by itself, partitioned off and handsomely finished. The horse-shoe pattern is followed in the shape of the house. The front of the boxes is painted in fresco, in compartments, the subjects taken from the Iliad, and the composition very fine. The ceiling is also painted in fresco. Opposite the stage is the royal box, two tiers in height, which, last evening, was empty; but the private boxes were filled with the beauty and fashion of Livorno—the ladies all in exquisite toilet. I saw some very beautiful women, which would be called so anywhere. Half a dozen rows of seats in the parterre, next the foot-lights, were raised, and the seats sold by number, and here it was that I sat. The house presented the most brilliant sight I ever saw of the kind. The orchestra was composed of about one hundred pieces, with a very large preponderance of strings, many of the violinists being from Florence. The overtures were played magnificently, as I think you would have acknowledged. I never before heard so many first-rate violins playing in harmony.

The instrumental solos that I heard were all very finely performed—that on the clarinet most particularly—the performers being all members of the large military band here.

But as to the vocal music, neither the choruses nor the solos were at all to my satisfaction, and I thought this part of the performances very mediocre indeed, although they seemed to please the audience, which applauded, noisily, at least. My physician, who seems to understand music, fully agrees with my opinion. C.

Lucrezia Borgia.

In the music of our present number we return to the piano-forte arrangement of Lucrezia, which has been for several weeks interrupted; and it may not be amiss to say a few words of this opera, which is perhaps the most popular and meritorious of all the works of Donizetti.

It was written for the theatre at Milan, in the year 1834, and on its first production, from a variety of unfortunate circumstances, seems not to have made the most favorable impression; but subsequent performances have made it one of the favorite operas of the modern stage, so that at the present day, after an existence of twenty-four years, there is hardly an opera upon the stage that proves more attractive to an audience, whatever may be its degree of cultivation; and the general verdict of the musical public of the civilized world would probably concur in the judgment that it is the chef d'œuvre of Donizetti, a title to which, from brilliant and effective music, and intense dramatic interest, demanding the exercise of the highest powers, both in singing and in acting, it may fairly lay claim.

In a former number of our Journal will be found a complete list of the works of Donizetti, which reach the astonishing number of sixty-four operas, composed between the years 1818 and 1848, the year of his death. It cannot be surprising, then, that in the works of a mind so wonderfully prolific, great inequalities should be discovered, and great imperfections; but it is not a little astonishing that so many of them should have retained their hold upon the public mind, so as to be still ranked among the most attractive and popular operas of the present hour.

Fétis, in his account of the life and works of this composer, remarks that, "Donizetti's abuse of his facility, and the negligence that is to be noticed in his works, are the result of the position in which he was placed during a part of his career, and of the fatal usage of the theatres of Italy of not giving to composers such a price for their productions as will permit them to labor for their reputation and for the cause of Art. During many years, Donizetti, by an engagement with Barbaja, the manager of the theatres of Naples, was bound to write two serious and two comic operas every year, receiving for so great a labor a price scarcely sufficient for the very first necessities of life.

Hence arose the necessity of writing, at the same time, for other theatres, and, in order to accomplish so many labors, the necessity of hurrying his work. Little of the artist could survive such a situation. Donizetti has frequently been known to instrument the entire score of an opera in thirty hours, a time hardly sufficient for the mere writing, notwithstanding the abbreviations in use in Italy. Nothing really good can result from such hasty work, and one must be astonished if mere traces are discovered of indisputable talent and of the splendor of genius."

Faculties so overworked, brilliant as they must have been, could not but succumb to labors so enormous; and there is nothing in the biography of artists sadder than the latter days of Donizetti, who passed from grief to melancholy, and from melancholy to fatuity, from which at last, death was a grateful release.

His name and principal operas are known and welcomed wherever modern music has a place. From London to San Francisco and Australia, the beautiful melodies that flowed from his facile pen have become familiar as household words to all who have a voice or an ear. After a quarter of a century they have lost little or nothing of their first charm, and multitudes will yet listen with delight to the results of the painful toils that brought the unfortunate Donizetti to an untimely grave that was only too welcome after years of despondency, melancholy, and unceasing trials.

Lucrezia Borgia has been often heard in Boston, and has been as finely performed by as great artists as we have ever had among us, so that perhaps no score has been more adequately rendered upon our stage. From the first performance by Truffi, Benedetti, and Beneventano—through the triumphs of Grisi, and Mario, and Bosio, it has invariably attracted the largest audiences, and has become widely known, so that very many of our readers will gladly welcome the means now presented of recalling the memories of the music and of the artists who have made it familiar to them.

BOSTON MUSIC SCHOOL.—We would direct the attention of persons who desire to receive instruction in music to the advertisement of this institution. The names of the teachers will be sufficient guaranty to all who know their reputation that the instruction given, will be, in every department, thorough and systematic.

HOWARD ATHENÆUM.—ENGLISH OPERA.—A few lines in the daily papers announce to the operahungry public, a season of English opera at the Howard. We have no particulars from Manager Barrow, but rumor says that it is to be the troupe of which Miss ANNIE MILNER is prima donna.

THE THEATRES were all opened for the season this week, but we are equally in the dark as to their programmes and purposes.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Annual Meeting of the NEW YORK HARMONIC SOCIETY was held at their rooms at Dodworth's, on the evening of the 6th instant, when the following gentlemen were elected as the board of officers for the ensuing year. F. M. Carrington, President; J. Warren Brown, H. P. Marshall, Vice-Presidents; James H. Aikman, Secretary; A. W. Hoffman, Financial Secretary; Archibald Johnston, Treasurer; William Wild, Librarian. Standing Committees; Tenor — William A. Cummings, Charles Tucker, J. P. Brouner, W. B. Taylor; Bass — W. H. Livingston, Augustus N. Smith, John H. Wood, Geo. C. Stone.

Annual Reports of the Secretary, Financial Secretary and Treasurer were read, showing the Society to be in a flourishing condition. Handel's greatest choral work, the Oratorio "Israel in Egypt," is in rehearsal, under the direction of their Conductor, Mr. G. F. Bristow, and will be produced during the season, together with several other large choral works.

The New York Times says of the new tenor in Mr. Cooper's English Opera Troupe, Mr. MIRANDA: "We have had no such voice in this city for very many years. Compared with the ordinary run of English tenors, he is as Tamberlik to the three cent paper man. His voice is manly, clear, sympathetic, and of unusual power. In this opera he knows how to use it to advantage, not only in the solos, but in the concerted pieces. His success was unequivocal and deserved." This is certainly high praise. Mr. Rudolphsen is a very clever vocalist, as those who attended the farewell series of Germania concerts in this city will remember. He was for a time hornist in the Boston Theatre orchestra. Of the general artists the Times says: "A finer quartet it has not been our good fortune to bear for many years. The voices are perfectly fresh, of good quality, and in some instances of very superior cultivation."

We arrest the following which we find going the rounds among our exchanges:

Hon. ROBERT C. WINTHROP once spoke of the Atlantic Telegraph as the grand ocean harp. Wideswarth thus writes:

"Oh grandest miracle of Time
What mighty joy will spring,
When men of diverse tongue and clime
Shall listen to the heavenly chime
That sounds the strains of peace sublime
Upon a single string."

Old Roger, on reading the above, asked the Professor if he knew the key-note upon which that string was tuned. He allowed that he did not. "Why, it is very plain," said the jolly old fellow, "that it must be on the lower C." As this joke is about fifteen hundred feet deep, all are not expected to fathom it.

Mme. La Grange and Impressario Ullman in a Paris Court.—The Gazette des Tribunaux, of August 22, has a memorandum of a suit brought by Mme. Anna La Grange against B. Ullman. The parties, as our readers are aware, recently sustained the relations of artist and director at the Academy of Music, in New York. It seems that Mme. La Grange claims to be a creditor of Mr. Ullman, and under that claim procured an order under which his effects and moveables at his hotel in Paris were seized. Mr. Ullman proposed that the order should be dissolved and the matter settled by a court of reference. It was urged by counsel for defendant that the French courts have no power to adjudicate between foreigners upon matters which originated in a foreign country; that Mme. La Grange became a foreigner by marrying a Pole, of the name of Stankovitch, and that in any event a French court could not decide the case. Therefore the order of seizure should be rescinded, and the matter sent before the courts where it belongs. The referees decided in favor of Mr. Ullman, whose effects were consequently released from seizure.

Burton's Theatre, New York.—Mr. Burton has engaged Strackosch's Italian Opera Company, including Mad. Colson, Signora Brignoli, Amodio, Barili, and M. Juncia, for three evenings. To-night will be performed Donizetti's opera of "La Figlia del Reggimento"—the Child of the Regiment.

ART MATTERS.—A correspondent of the Albany Morning Times says: Art matters flourish. Very few of the landscape painters are at home in their studies. They all love the gorgeous foliage of September and October and keep up their ramblings until cold weather. Church is at Niagara, sketching for a mate to his famous picture, painted from the English side. Palmer is still at his cottage on Cayuga Lake, where his pleasant summer has been turned to sadness, by the sudden death of his youngest child, a very interesting boy, nearly two years old. His friends will sympathise with his sorrows, as they have done with his glorious success as the sculptor of modern times.

Boughton has made his first trip to Lake George, and is as enthusiastic of its beauties as your humble servant. He has made sketches enough for forty pictures, and many studies of water, rock and tree, which show most rapid strides in art. What Martin, Gay and Loveridge are doing with themselves, we know not, but we expect everything good.

Our citizens will be sorry to know that Mr. Lancelot Thompson (a pupil of Mr. Palmer, of whom we have spoken most rapturously, more than once,) is going to New York the first of November, at which place he will open a studio. Admirers of his exquisite cameos, who wish to secure the likenesses of dear friends, rendered in such a charming manner, should not delay in giving him their orders. Success to him always; he has been an ornament to our city and we shall miss him very much.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The first appearance in this city of Madame Colson was the signal for a large and clever auditory. The piece was The Daughter of the Regiment. There are certain facial signs which indicate peculiarities of a style of speaking and of singing. A very well defined mouth, and clear, elegant outline of countenance, are apt to be connected with precision of vocal delivery. There is eminently this concordance in the prima donna of last evening. Her profile is particularly good and distinct, and all her vocal efforts are agreeable thereto. Her voice is not a large soprano, nor yet thin. In quality, it is medium; but the power of the singer in claspings her notes and launching them spiritedly give the effect, so far as the ability to make herself heard is concerned, of a much more powerful voice. In extent, it is a high soprano, ranging up to and above C. The opera in question is quite as much of a tearful as a joyous inspiration, so the singer had adequate opportunities for displaying the sentimental cantabile—the passionate adagio. This severe—and indeed final test of the merit of an artist—was sustained to the delectation of the audience, who were redundant in their applause. In her method of attacking her notes, Madame Colson is a little different from any other artist we have had among us. This is partly school, but mostly grows out severally of the labial, dental, and physiological exactness of her organs of utterance and her temperament. Parisian precision, elegance, finesse, characterize her method. So, too, the economy of means which she habitually displays. We have not heard the part better done; and, indeed, now considering her age—for she is young and fresh—her undeniably good looks and carriage, saucy and elegant by turns, we suppose she has no equal in this particular character. Her success with the audience was complete, as she was called out after each act. Her execution of the final air showed great command of rapid execution, in marked contrast to the well-sustained notes, carefully shaded, of the slow pieces. Her toilet, which should not be forgotten according to the exigence of artistic unities was unexceptionable. A pretty woman, well-dressed, and a fine singer, certainly constitutes a fair combination to make captives. —N. Y. Tribune.

Music Abroad.

COLOGNE.—The fifth Niederrheinisches Sängerkunst festival took place at Neuss, on the 8th and 9th instant. Everything connected with the material arrangements was admirable, not only for a town of about eleven or twelve thousand inhabitants, but for any place. The appropriate and tasty manner in which the new music hall is fitted up, and its position in the town gardens, where the visitor finds, in the immediate neighborhood of the building, refreshing shade, broad walks and green lawns, at different points of which were erected eating-rooms, besides wine and beer shops, so that all the creature comforts could be satisfied outside the concert-hall—all this reflects great credit on the festival committee and the authorities of the town.

On the other hand, however, the kernel of the festival, the musical portion, was far less admirable than the outward shell. As a rule, the greater number of the assembled singers—who, by the way, scarcely reached the half of the thousand announced—displayed a lamentable indifference to the artistic importance of the festival. The rehearsal on Sunday morning was very scantily attended, while that on Monday did not deserve the name, not more than twenty or thirty persons being present! And yet the place fixed on for the festival—that is to say, the gardens—was constantly filled with singers, indulging in wine, beer, and low songs—nay, some of them, horribile dictu, continued the latter after their own fashion in the open air during the concert itself in the hall! Under such circumstances, the Niederrheinische Vocal Association cannot further exist without getting rid of such coarse, unartistic elements.

The directors, Herr F. Hartmann, of Neuss, and C. Reinecke, of Barmen, were in despair; and, really, a great deal of resignation was requisite to hold the conductor's baton, and exhibit as much perseverance and devotion as they did, and by means of which a tolerable performance of the orchestral pieces and at least, a supportable one of the vocal compositions was obtained. The latter, however, were executed with anything but precision and expression; they were rudely and coarsely sung, as was particularly evident in the gentler pieces, such as Mozart's "Ave verum," and Kreutzer's "Dir möcht' ich diese Lieder weihen." The only concerted piece which produced a favorable impression was a wonderful motet by the old Italian composer, A. Lotti. Even in the pieces with orchestral accompaniment, it was evident that the different associations had not studied conscientiously; the voices were often uneven, and sometimes began separately, besides being nearly always flat, at least in proportion to their numbers. It was, perhaps, these circumstances which prevented Carl Reinecke's new composition—the Schlachtlid by Klopstock ("Mit unserm Arm ist nichts gethan"), for two small choruses, and full orchestra—from producing the effect it otherwise would have done. This composition is very industriously and skillfully treated, and at the commencement according to strict canonic style; but that so severe a form is suited to a Schlachtlid (battle-song) we feel inclined to deny. The work has some brilliant points, but, on the whole, is deficient in the dash which the spirited words require.

The orchestra, principally composed of Landenbach's regimental chapel of Cologne, was pretty numerous (although we could have wished for more violins), and very good. Julius Rietz's overture (in A major), conducted by Hartmann, went admirably, and that to the Abencerrages, by Chernbini conducted by Reinecke, very well. On the other hand, however, the tempo of the allegro, in Rossini's overture to Guillaume Tell, was too slow.

The execution of the vocal pieces by the Liedertafeln of Neuss (Hartmann), of Crefeld (Wilhelm, whose song "Waldlust," is a charming composition), and of Aix-la-Chapelle (F. Wenigmann), was highly meritorious and artistic, and made up for much that was defective. The several associations were, with justice enthusiastically applauded, especially that of Aix-la-Chapelle. The prince von Hohenzollern, with several members of the court, were present.—Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

VIENNA.—The season just concluded has again proved that Italian opera has outlived itself. Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Così fan Tutte, with Rossini's best works, constituted the life and soul of the three-monthly attempt. Il Trovatore and Rigoletto, it is true, were brought out to satisfy the uneducated and badly educated portion of the public, but it was impossible to rummage out anything new in this line. Verdi's Aroldo, and Perelli's Clarissa Harlowe were two wretched failures, while Così fan Tutte lent a freshness and charm to the season. Where, then, is the influence of the Italian element, conjured up in vain at such an expense.

Of the 75 operatic performances, 22 were devoted to Verdi (Il Trovatore, 11; Rigoletto, 6; Ernani, 3; Aroldo, 2); 20 to Rossini (Il Barbiere, 10; La Cenerentola, 4; Mose, 4; Gli Italiani in Algieri, 2; 16 to Mozart (Così fan Tutte, 6; Figaro, 5; Don Giovanni, 5); 10 to Bellini (La Sonnambula, 5; Norma, 3; I Montecchi e Capuletti, 2); 5 to Donizetti (Lucrezia, 4; Don Pasquale, 1); 2 to Perelli (Clarissa Harlowe, 2). Herren Proch, Esser, and De Barbieri conducted in turns. A total of seventeen operas by six different composers was given during the season.

Great hopes are entertained of the German operatic season. Eckert's career, although it commenced last winter, may be dated from July, 1858. He commands the good wishes of very many persons, but time alone can prove what he will and can do. There can be no doubt of the ability and intentions of the new directors of the Opera-house. The fact of Wagner's Lohengrin opening the season is laudable only inasmuch as that the work is by a German composer. It is to be hoped that Marschner's Hiarne will follow, at least, although we do not hear much about it. We have yet to learn whether we shall have Idomeneo, and Titus, Die Vestalin, Templer und Jüdin, Hans Heiling, Cherubini's Medea, Gluck's Armida, Iphigenia, and Orpheus, which for us are nearly as good as new. It is impossible to do everything at once.

On the 29th July, the distribution of prizes to the pupils of the Conservatory took place in the rooms of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. It was preceded by a concert, opened by Robert Schumann's symphony in D, performed, under the direction of Herr Joseph Hellmesberger, with as much precision and force as could be expected from the youthful orchestra. Among the solo performances of the pupils, we may particularly mention the execution of Mendelssohn's violin concerto by Herr Leopold Auer, and of the grand air from Norma, by Mlle. Gabrielle Krauss. Mlle. Katharine Baner, too, in the aria from Fidelio, proved she possessed a fine voice, especially in the higher notes, but that a pupil of the Conservatory should have already contracted the defect of broadly pumping out the lower notes, does not say much for the correctness or strictness of the method pursued there.

It is very satisfactory that Gesang-Vereins for full chorus—the Singverein, under the direction of Herr Herbeck, and the Sing-Academie, under that of Herr Stegmaier—have at last been established again here. Neither of these associations has been able to withstand the temptation of giving a public performance only a few weeks after its foundation, a proceeding which, for two reasons, we consider premature: Firstly, because they have not acquired sufficient certainty, although they possess admirable material; and, secondly, because such haste satisfies vanity more than it forwards the object of institutions of this kind, and is only too liable to make people exert themselves more for outward show, than for a revival of a lively feeling for music and its noblest works. The able and excellent critic on sacred music in the Wiener Monatschrift speaks of both performances in the following terms:

"The Singverein of our Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde has taken its first step in the way of publicity by performing Palestrina's mass, 'Iste Confessor,' composed about 1590. The selection is emphatically deserving of praise. This mass was a perfect novelty for Vienna, and, looked on from the point of view of an æsthetic church style, is a perfect gem. In the 'Et incarnatus' the simple and lofty three-toned web soars upward, even to the level of a certain dramatic spirit. Thanks to the zealous exertions and dramatic intelligence of Professor Herbeck, the performers—although, on account of the short time the association has been in existence, somewhat premature—grasped with spirit and tolerable certainty this beautiful composition, especially as regards the devout intonation of the pure points of feeling and dramatic effect contained in it. In the 'Gloria' and first part of the 'Credo,' however, the chorus—which, though full and powerful enough in the higher and lower notes, is not sufficiently intense and effective, nay, not numerous enough in the middle ones—fell into the fault unfortunately too common in this case, of merely singing the lapidary notes, beneath which, however, a profound and glowing feeling mostly slumbers. The new portions introduced by Herbeck, Pertinax, and Hauptmann, although invariably impregnated with the spirit of our own time, and, therefore, not quite adapted to the original work, stood out very favorably, partly on account of their powerful expression, and partly on account of their delicate and harmonious character. The former decidedly laudable quality belongs to the compositions of Herbeck and Pertinax, and the latter, no less effective one, to Hauptmann's wonderfully feeling 'Benedictus.' We regret however, its indescribably confused execution, swarming with faults of every description. We hope the association will soon think of this composer's Vocal Mass. Herr Bibl, jun., distinguished himself as a modern organist, in Mendelssohn's style, as much as ever, but his scales, which were nearly all chromatico-enharmonic, formed the most glaring contrast to Palestrina's mass, which is treated in a strictly diatonic manner.

"The Sing-Academie has, also, adopted the motto: 'Omnia ad maiorem Dei gloriam,' by selecting the performance of a mass as the first sign of its public existence. It has been more careful in its programme than Herr Herbeck's association. Whether it has been more artistic is another question. Following our own conviction, if we do not answer this by a complete negative, we can only give an affirmative conditionally. Friederich Schneider's Vocal Mass, like almost everything written by its composer, who, in many respects, was a meritorious musician, belongs to that period between Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, which we may justly designate as a deplorable one, destitute of godlike inspiration, and founded merely upon a sort of mechanical musical understanding, or, at most, on the period of the so-called filligree taste. With the exception of the correct 'Kyrie' and the single ray of dramatic-musical life which flashes through the 'Crucifixus,' Schneider's mass offers us nothing more than dry passages skillfully copied from the long naturalized masters of the South-German church style. We meet too many old acquaintances from the time of Haydn and Mozart, whose features are only too easily recognizable in spite of the borrowed mask. Schneider's work is well adapted for singing, like all the creations of his models, each of whom was so great in his own way. The effect of such music upon a certain class is unfailing. The compositions of the Dessau master—like those of the illustrious Rohrau* and Salzburg minstrels†—are full of the spirit of unadorned nature. The mass in question was most carefully studied in its minutest details. With the exception of a few blunders, it went admirably. The tempo was generally good, and there was a proper distribution of light and shade. The voices were fresh and vigorous, and ennobled, moreover, by real enthusiasm. Rotter's additions, composed expressly for the occasion, and consisting of an 'Asperges,' 'Graduale,' and 'Offertorium,' were remarkably effective."—London Musical World.

PARIS.—Some of the Parisian journals appear surprised at the earnestness with which the London critics treat the alterations in the music of Don Giovanni, as performed at Covent Garden Theatre. It is not unlikely that Mario may try the experiment at the 'Italiens.' Gratuitous representations were given at the principal theatres on the occasion of the Emperor's Fête, or festival-day, the 15th of August. The Favorita was performed at the Grand Opera, and Fra Diavolo and Les Méprises par Ressemblance at the Opera-Comique. The new opera, Le Dernier Jour d'Hercule, by MM. Méry and Félicien David, is in active preparation at the Académie-Imperial. The principal characters have been entrusted to MM. Roger, Bonnehée, Obin, Mesdames Borghi-Mamo and Gueymard. Mlle. de Meric, the contralto, (formerly of the Royal Italian Opera,) is engaged, and will make her debut as Azucena in the Trouvère. The receipts of the different theatres, concerts, balls, and café concerts at Paris, for the month of July, realized the sum of 718,911f. 25c.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The 135th meeting of the three Choirs of Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester, was held at Hereford, on Tuesday, the 24th day of August, and three following days. The pieces performed in the morning on the first day consisted of Handel's Dettingen Te Deum; a Jubilate by Mr. G. Townshend Smith, the Conductor; Mendelssohn's As the Hart pants; and an anthem, 'The Lord is the True God,' (bass solo and chorus,) composed by the Rev. F. G. Ouseley, Bart., Precentor of the Cathedral. The principal parts were sung by Madame Weiss, Mrs. Clare Hepworth, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss. In the evening, a Miscellaneous Concert took place at the Shire Hall, at which, in addition to the artists already named, appeared Madame Clara Novello, Madame Viardot Garcia, Miss Louisa Vining, and Mr. Sims Reeves. The programme was varied and interesting, comprising in the instrumental parts, Mozart's Jupiter Symphony and the Overture to Guillaume Tell, (both admirably played by the band, which was led by Mr. H. Blagrove,) and in the other parts an excellent selection from Mozart's Clemenza de Tito, together with a choice assortment of Duets and Solos, which were admirably sung.

Wednesday morning was devoted entirely to Mendelssohn's Elijah, the principal parts being apportioned between the whole of the vocalists engaged for the Festival. The Oratorio was admirably sung, the principal singers and the chorus seeming to vie with each other in the struggle for perfection. In the evening another Miscellaneous Concert took place at the Shire Hall, which was followed by a ball.

On Thursday morning the performances at the Cathedral comprised a selection from Mendelssohn's Athalie, Rossini's Stabat Mater, (English version,) and the first two parts of the Creation; and on Friday morning was performed the Messiah.

Vocal Music.

Leonora Leigh, Song and Chorus. Henry Tucker. 25

A very pretty Ballad, of a popular cast, which will be eagerly bought by all the friends of good minstrelsy. The Choruses of the Composer, among which those of the 'Star of the Evening,' and its later, but not less agreeable companion, 'The Star of the Morning,' stand foremost, have always some original traits, which favorably distinguish them from a host of others.

Winter Evergreens. Stephen Glover. 25

A very pleasing, light Ballad.

Through the Eye the Heart does speak. Gumbert. 25

Ferdinand Gumbert is one of the most popular German Song-writers of the present day. His melodies are eminently pleasing to the multitude, and many of them are real fire-side gems. The present ballad, of which there is another not less celebrated musical version by Franz Abt, ranks with his best. German and English words.

The Fireman's Child. Song and Chorus. H. Tucker. 25

A touching Ballad, with a highly effective chorus, destined to become very popular.

Here in Deepest Sorrows. Song, from "Martha." Flotow. 25

Since this Opera has been brought out in Italian, simultaneously in Paris, London, and Petersburg, and has everywhere met with the most astonishing success, a reissue of its vocal beauties becomes necessary. This fine soprano song is printed here for the first time, with the Italian words added. Other numbers will immediately follow.

Instrumental Music.

Le Papillon d'Or. Morceau de Salon. Lefebure-Wely. 35

This graceful new composition of the fashionable composer, bears its name, 'Golden Butterfly,' with much propriety. There is a light, airy, flighty motion throughout the piece, sustaining a resemblance to the movements of the light-winged creature. Moderately difficult.

La Traviata Waltz. Jean Weber. 50

A brilliant Parlor Waltz, on favorite themes, from Verdi's popular opera. The title page is adorned by a life-like portrait of the fascinating Signora Piccolomini, whose name will soon be forever linked in this country with 'La Traviata,' as it is already in England. The Waltz is sparkling and bright, and has all the gems of the opera.

La Belle Waltz. M. Aschaffenburg. 25

Josephine Waltz. " 25

Johnson's Harmony. Practical Instructions in Harmony, upon the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System; teaching Musical Composition and the Art of Extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1.00

This work is designed for the class of person designated in the language of music teachers as 'new beginners.' It imparts a knowledge of Harmony, by exercises which the student is to write; or, so to speak, by a progressive series of problems which the student must solve. The utmost simplicity of language has been used in the explanations, and an attempt made to guard against misapprehension, even on the part of an undisciplined mind.

Cottage Song.

BY JOHN S. ADAMS.

We've a cottage clothed with roses,
Near a wood
Where the singing birds of summer
Nest and brood;
There in early spring the daisies
Gem the sod,
Looking up to heaven above them,
And to God.

There in holy calm we worship
One above,
Through his works that all around us
Speak his love;
Read we there his will in every Rock and tree,
While his blessings fall upon us
Rich and free.

Beautiful the morning sunlight
Cometh there,
Crowning Nature at her early Morning prayer;
And at evening, when the twilight
Closest round,
Still, devoutly at her worship,
Is she found.

We are not alone, for angels
Come and go,
Walking often through our cottage
To and fro;
Promising to guide and guard us
With their love,
Till we go to live among them,
Up above.

Simple life is ours, we follow
Nature's way,
Learning of her truthful lessons
Day by day;
Striving to fulfil our mission,—
Doing good:
Living happy in our cottage
Near the wood.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 11, 1858.

Mr. Editor,—There is, after the expenditure of a considerable amount of thought upon a difficult subject, a peculiar feeling of satisfaction when the result of this mental exertion appears in that clear and intelligible form which the art of the printer supplies. This feeling I experienced upon seeing the first portion of my article duly ensigned in the columns of your "Journal;" and the pleasure was enhanced by the perusal of your editorial allusions to it. There is, however, much to consider before I can satisfactorily answer the significant question, "Will he be able to dispose of them all as easily as he does of the first?" It rather startles me to think that, in the enthusiasm of a moment, a bull has been seized that may presently exhibit, not the proportions of a single bull, but of a whole herd, in the shape of musical mathematicians, philosophers, enthusiasts, &c., who would trample me to death by a ceaseless demand for the explanation of sensations and impressions, not only that have been actually felt, but also of a mighty host, the origin of which may be traced to an over-fertile imagination. But, risking all, and everything, we will "on to the charge."

Having, by the fact of addressing my questions directly to you, Mr. Editor, invested you with a sort of temporary championship of the doctrine, I believe that I may consider your concession of the first point as rendering further evidence, so far as the fact is concerned, unnecessary; but there are one or two considerations in connection with it, which I think would not be out of place. I believe that the absence of any fixed character to a sound, except that of its pitch, is an advantage, instead of a disadvantage. For, while the fixedness of pitch establishes its identity, yet the necessity that other qualities be associated with it at the time of its production, and these associates being circumstantially varied, every sound can become the medium of exciting in the mind any of the emotions of which that mind is susceptible. In this sense a sound may, perhaps, not inappropriately, be compared to water, which, possessing no particular color itself, is all the more perfect a medium for its exhibition. Neither does the multiplicity of its adaptation deteriorate the quality of its representations. Is the reflected flash of the lightning upon the water's surface, less vivid or beautiful, because, the next moment, the black and threatening clouds which enshroud the face of the heavens are equally well depicted?

It frequently happens that the same sound, uttered at the same time, in the same place, and under the same circumstances, produces opposite emotions in the minds of the hearers, from being differently associated. As an example of this, suppose that a steamboat bell, which should be like in pitch, associated qualities, &c., to the bell of the unfortunate "Atlantic," one of the Long Island Sound steamboats which was wrecked some few years since, and which bell is reported to have pealed with every motion of the waves after she had struck; suppose, I say, that one of the survivors of the "Atlantic," having a mind sensitive to tonical impression, should hear this like bell, would not that identity of pitch and associated quality very possibly bring to mind the horrors of that scene, and create a corresponding painful emotion? But, to the ordinary listener no painful excitement is produced; and in some, if associated with other circumstances, the highest feelings of joy would be produced! Again, there are instances in which the same sound, used to give emotions opposite to those which have been most generally associated with it, in a great measure fails of success from the fact that old associations are too strong for the new ones attempted to be imparted. I felt an instance of this kind, myself, quite recently. On the day after the Queen's message was received by means of the telegraph cable, guns were fired, church bells rung, &c. The church bell of St. George's, (a church standing next to a building which I was in at the time,) did its part towards the general joy! But, although the bell was rung with a presto movement, this was not sufficient to do away with the "Dearly beloved brethren, the Scripture, &c." impression which previous association had given. It seemed as if the bell still called the people to church, but the sexton being angry at their tardiness, increased his speed with the rise in his temper.

In spite, however, of all attempts to consider a sound by itself, as such, even with regard to its fixed quality, in practice it is impossible; an involuntary comparison takes place as to its position in the average range of tones in general use, and most frequently heard; and it is set down under the general terms "high," "rather high," "middling," "low," "rather low," &c. But this generality would give no fixed character to a single word.

From the foregoing considerations I think we may conclude there is no inherent tendency to a difference of sentimental quality in any of the single tones used in one key from those used in another.

I will now proceed to examine proposition II., whether the succession, or connection, of the sounds used in one key, exhibits a different sentimental quality from those used in another.

While, with regard to a single sound, comparison is involuntary and incidental, the very nature of succession institutes and compels it; and by this means we arrive at the proportions of the thing considered. In regard to a single sound, velocity of vibration is that which gives the fixedness of its character, but it is not necessary that any other velocity be given, or that its velocity be known; the velocity itself possesses an innate and fixed power to fasten just its own peculiar property upon the ear. A succession of sounds, and more particularly a succession of musical sounds, require one sound to be given, in order to determine what the succession is. To render a succession of sounds musical, the sounds in such succession must bear a certain proportion to each other; and it is necessary to our purpose to serve:

- 1—The proportion itself.
- 2—The character that such proportion imparts.
- 3—If the proportion be the same in one key as another.
- 4—Being the same, if the sentimental or emotional expression of such production will be different.

Firstly, then, with respect to the proposition itself. It has been found necessary in gradually ascending (increasing the velocity of vibration,) or descending (decreasing the velocity of vibration,) from any given sound, that we do so by certain fixed proportionate amounts, in order to render the succession such as a musical ear demands, and is perfectly satisfied with. These amounts, in music, are called intervals, and these intervals are named according to the position they occupy in relation to a given sound. From any given sound to its octave (double the number of vibrations, it ascending, and half that amount, if descending,) seven intervals or proportionate amounts of increase or decrease are used. These seven degrees are generally called tones and semitones, the semitones representing half the amount that the tones do. A gradual progression of this kind is called a scale or key. Simply calculated, the intervals from 1 to 2, 2 to 3, 4 to 5, 5 to 6, 6 to 7, are equal, while from 3 to 4, and from 7 to 8, (the octave of one,) the interval is but half as much as from 1 to 2. It does not affect my argument that this simple calculation is not strictly correct. The manner in which this tone and semitone division is produced is different on various instruments, but the most perfect division can be obtained on a string stretched upon a violin or violoncello, or, in fact, a string stretched upon anything. According to a table now before me, a string, the whole of which being used, will give, when strained to a certain tension, say the sound in musical notation called A.

Eight-ninths of the string will produce the second sound in a scale formed upon A, called B.

Four-fifths will produce the third sound, called C sharp.

Three-fourths will produce the fourth sound, called D.

Two-thirds will produce the fifth sound, called E.

Three-fifths will produce the sixth sound, called F sharp.

Eight-fifteenths will produce the seventh sound, called G sharp.

One-half will produce the eighth or octave sound, called A.

It matters not whether this calculation is exactly correct; we will suppose it to be so, and that the fingers placed upon the string, in this proportion, will give a major scale in its purest form. On the production of these sounds, the ear distinguishes, by means of comparison, the peculiar character imparted by the proportion. If we proceed from 1 to 2, called, in our example, A and B, we have what is called a major second; from 2 to 3, (B and C sharp,) likewise a major second; from 3 to 4, (C sharp and D,) a minor second, and so on. Let us try the effect of moving from 1 to 3, 2 to 4, 3 to 6, &c.; then from 1 to 4, 2 to 5, &c., &c.; then 1 to 5, 2 to 6, &c., &c.; then 1 to 6, 2 to 7, &c.; in short, let us examine the effect thoroughly, by all the means that changing from one sound to another will give. In this way we may become thoroughly acquainted with the nature of a major and minor second, a major and minor third, a perfect and sharp fourth, a perfect and imperfect fifth, a major and minor sixth, and a major and minor seventh. The fixed character of each having been practically examined, until it is perfectly remembered, so that its identity is established in the mind, let us ask the question, "Is the peculiarity thus exhibited the result of proportion?" If you are doubtful, destroy the proportion, and you will destroy the peculiarity, which is the identity of the interval.

When you are satisfied that it is proportion that gives the peculiar character of each interval, we will give the violin peg a turn, and instead of the sound called in musical notation A, we will have the one called B flat, and the first question we will ask, is, "Will it now require different propor- tions on the string to give this new scale or key, from the one just considered?"

[Fearing to take up too much space, I will again pause, and develope further at a future time.] J. J. CLARKE.

Mozart's Piano-Forte Works.

The pianoforte of Mozart's day had established its superiority over all keyed instruments of the quill-and-wire tribe by the roundness and sweetness of its tone, the fine gradations of power which it yielded to the hand, and its freedom, without hardness or dryness, from all offensive vibration. The harpsicord, patronized by Handel and Scarlatti, and organ players in general, was not without a certain grandeur; but no one could make it sing a melody, or produce upon it those melting effects of decrescendo, or harmonious blendings of intervals, to which many of us have listened 'all ear' when a J. B. Cramer sat at the pianoforte. Touch became on this instrument a peculiar art, developing the finest feeling. It was distinct from the elastic digital power which brings out passages with clearness on the harpsicord or organ, and might rather be compared to that gentle pressure of the bow, or enforcement of the breath, with which the accomplished violin player or singer gives prominence to a beautiful idea. The expressive mystery of a fine touch, it is easier for the musician to feel than to explain; the attack and retreat of the fingers, the hokling down of notes their full time, and the degree of force with which the keys are struck, may all be well accomplished, yet shall we not be greatly moved by any performance in which the soul of the artist does not animate his finger tips. A little prelude—a careless arpeggio of half-a-dozen chords, serves mostly to reveal the qualities of a player, and to announce him either as a musician or a musical mechanic.

Not only did Mozart devote himself to the legato style, but Beethoven prized it so highly, that while he possessed his sensibility of ear and touch, he never played in any other way; and it was this which made him say in one of his conversations with Ferdinand Ries, 'that of all the pianoforte players he had ever heard, he preferred J. B. Cramer.' This interesting testimony, by the way, which is published in Ries' Notizen respecting Beethoven, should not have been excluded from Moscheles and Schindler's biography of that composer.

Towards the middle of the last century every house in a certain class of society in Germany possessed its pianoforte; and in the Southern districts, Stein of Augsburg was a manufacturer of these instruments in great repute. The cultivation of music was at this time merely a means of introducing an elegant pleasure at home. It gave an occupation to the young, which, as the simple, earnest compositions of the day evince, was as yet untainted by the vanity of display. Music pleased for herself alone. But good teaching in respect to mechanism was very rare; and the steps by which a finished artist is raised to perfection, from childhood to full maturity, were almost undiscovered. Mozart's father was one of the first who comprehended the true principles of the modern execution—kept the arm in complete stillness, and moulded the hand into that rounded position in which the fingers seem to grow to the keys. Leopold Mozart and his daughter were much occupied in teaching, and, as we learn often talked themselves out of breath, in the conscientious discharge of their employment. While they were explaining the mysteries of fingering, and showing how passages of great apparent difficulty could be neatly and elegantly brought under the hand, it was the business of the young composer, even from eight years of age, to form and train the soul.

From this early period the solicitations to compose for this or that individual talent, which beset him throughout life, had their origin. Whatever related to capacity in his own art, its exact degree, its character, and importance, was known to him in any individual with whom he conversed, as if by intuition. The tone of a voice, the air of a countenance, the social vivacity of a young person, seem to have enabled him to read with facility whatever nature had imprinted of the musician. The mere shape of an exquisitely-formed hand, without a general repose and harmony of character in the whole human structure, would, perhaps not have satisfied him; but both together made him more certain of his subject than either Gall or Spurzheim could have been by any investigation of the musical bumps which enter into the system of phrenology.

Even in his moments of deepest abstraction, when playing extemporaneously, Mozart was able to preserve a part of his mind free to notice the effect of his music upon others, to inform himself how far he might pursue one track of invention, or when it was time to strike into a new one. He had his own prepossessions in point of taste; and there is no master in whose works we can place a finger on a passage, a bar, or even a note, and say with greater confidence, 'this the composer enjoyed.' But though he gently led the way, and insinuated his own preferences in melody in strains of tender and melancholy grace, he appears rarely to have approved his own first conceptions until he had tried their influence upon others. This practice, which he early commenced among the visitors who listened to him occasionally at his father's house, became so strong in him by habit, that he was able at last to carry it out in public among the numerous audiences collected at the theatre, where—

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

The dramatic poet and musician are the kings who proverbially have 'long arms.' The chief element of their being is knowledge of the world within and without; they multiply themselves, and extend their own identity into all the infinite forms and varieties of the human family, and strike chords of passion which vibrate by sympathy through the whole. In Mozart's mystic language of inarticulate sounds there may be discovered a perpetual process of reason, as well as of imagination. The precision with which, as a minister of pleasure, he adapted the means to the end—hitting the mark always, restraining the luxuriance of his fancy amidst all its roving temptations, and preserving himself just within the limits of the object to be accomplished, exhibits the logical composer in an aspect in which he is unequalled among musicians.

Not any writings which Mozart has left show the man and the musician more interestingly than these collected pianoforte compositions. They are, for the most part, living witnesses to the amiability of his disposition, being mostly free gifts to one and another of his acquaintance of all ages and talents; sometimes evidently costing him no more trouble to write than that of moving the pen; at others, displaying the exertion of his greatest powers in design and construction. To one who can enter with full sympathy into the day-dreams of the charming artist-family whose abode in Salzburg near a century ago renders that locality still a shrine of musical enthusiasm and devotion, it is pleasant to travel once more into the past on the wings of these compositions. Images of happiness and hope will surround us while we witness the content of the yet youthful father and mother of Mozart in the opening genius of their son; and so we have resolved to write our Salzburg 're-visited.' Glancing a little to our right as we ascend the broad staircase of their dwelling, we discover in the deep vista of a warehouse, fragrant with the scents of Italian edibles and culinary merchandize, Mozart's landlord, that immortal drysalter, M. Hagenauer. The ladies, the officers, the ecclesiastics, the musicians, who from time to time mount to the drüter stock (third floor) to talk about or hear music, thus need not forget in going or coming where to renew the exhausted Parmesan or stock of maccaroni. But we quit these sensualities and enter the apartments of the Mozart family. In a room well stored with musical instruments and books, and ornamented with prints, busts, and flowers, a boy sits at a table composing. That is Mozart. A canarybird chirps in a cage at the open window; and a favorite cat, who has established herself on the table near his music-paper, looks the picture of domestic quiet and content.

'Wolfgang,' exclaims the boy's sister, 'the young countess, my pupil, is just returned from Paris. She has been taking lessons of Schober, and is much improved. You remember how well she promised, what a nice clear finger she had, and what a graceful feeling for melody. You must write something for her, either variations or a rondo; but, whatever it is, I must take it with me next week.'

'Well; I'll think of it. I have just finished the processon march for Haffner's sister's wedding, and the new minuets for the ball in the evening. This afternoon we drive out to the Nonnenberg, and to-morrow I must practise my concerto, to play to the archbishop's Italian friends at the palace. What a lazy thing that is,' he adds, contemplating puss. 'I wonder when I shall find time to enjoy being lazy?'

'Oh, there will be plenty of time,' interposes the father.

'For what?'

'For composing the piece which your sister wants. And, Wolfgang, you know that M. l'Evêque, who has been in Italy, and talks to us so much about Italian fugues and counterpoint, will be sure to stand beside the little countess as she plays; so let your music be a rondo, in which you can bring in the subject in the bass, and make some of the passages move in canon. This will strengthen the young lady's left hand, and give the gentleman an opportunity of displaying his science when he speaks of the construction of the piece.'

The scene changes. The Mozarts are in London, in their modest lodgings in Frith-street, Soho. A German friend of theirs whose visage beams with delight and admiration, congratulates them on the pleasure which they gave to the king and queen at Windsor, a few nights before. It is the queen's music-master, J. C. Bach.

'His Majesty was delighted with the sonata, which he heard played off-hand by two great hands and two little hands alternately. It was a novelty; and here in England'—addressing the boy—'they like nothing so much as novelty.'

'Have they ever heard four hands on the pianoforte together?' asked Wolfgang.

'Never; no duets for a keyed instrument have yet been published in England. But do you try your hand at some, and we will play them together to some musical friends, whom I intend shortly to collect at my house.'

The duets in D and B flat (Nos. 43 and 57 of the catalogue thematique, Potter's edition) are quickly produced and played. A Berlin professor of counterpoint, well versed in Marburg, fidgets a good deal in his chair, and then rises to criticise.

'The adagio of that second duet is certainly a heavenly melody, M. Bach; but I observe that, in the second line, there are about thirty-three consecutive octaves in succession in the middle parts.'

'They accompany the melody very well,' said Bach, laughing.

'But, my dear friend, such counterpoint—'

'I was not thinking of counterpoint; I was thinking of pleasing,' interrupted the boy. 'The second violins and tenors sound very well so in an orchestra.'

'And I notice more octaves still in the andante cantabile of this duet in D,' said the professor.

'There I meant to imitate the bassoons.'

'So you turn the pianoforte into an orchestra, and place pleasure above counterpoint! What is to become of music if composers at your time of life set up taste and emotion as supreme guides? It must be quickly reduced to a chaotic jargon.' The professor was waxing warm.

'My revered father, John Sebastian,' said M. Bach, quietly, 'was wont to compose in what you call the strict style; and yet he would break a rule at any time rather than injure a good melody, or spoil a neatly-constructed passage.'

Mozart's wonderful childhood is passed, and he is not a little pleased to see himself wandering from Munich to Mannheim and Paris in quest of a permanent settlement. His pianoforte playing is in great request at the houses of musicians whom he visits; he engages with young people in parties of pleasure, dances, and excursions, ready at any time of day to make the candid confession of youth—

Full many a lady I have eyed with best regard.

And so, as Carl Von Weber tells us, that German girls much delight in new waltzes and musical keepsakes (MSS.), which they pay for by a squeeze of the hand, Mozart, as a matter of course, was obliged to dispense his services and take the usual wages. Sonatas by the dozen, full of elegant Italian melody, and of the neatest construction for fingering, attest what he has given away at the solicitation of the fair; nor could even mama be denied if her little favourite longed for a pretty air with variations. The language of refusal was scarcely in the vocabulary of the compliant and obliging man.

Mozart is walking one morning in the English garden at Mannheim, with a musician belonging to the Elector's chapel. 'Nothing,' says the composer's friend, 'ever surprised and pleased me more than what you did yesterday when we went with Holzhauser and Cannabich to the pianoforte warehouse to choose the new instrument for the palace. To play on five or six instruments in succession, on each in a different manner, with a perspicuous design in every improvisation,—that I call the test of masterly invention and readiness. It is extremely embarrassing, when in walking from instrument to instrument, with great hearers, one is reduced to show one's poverty, to repeat oneself, or become quite vapid.'

The idea of such a situation made the composer smile. 'A peculiar fantasia,' he returns, 'is necessary when one would try a pianoforte. I have thought much of this impromptu music, and I sent my conception of such a fantasia in notes the other day to my sister. It should differ from the orchestral fantasia, in which we may blend adagio and allegro, sweet air, solemn modulation, and various rhythm, within the compass of one prelude; and also from that in the bound or organ style, which usually ends with a fugue. I intend some day to make designs of these different fantasias.'

Last winter, when we met in London M. Neidhardt, of the Berlin choir, we were well reminded that Mozart had kept his word. The fantasia in C minor, arranged by him for a large military orchestra, forms a splendid piece, and we have heard it ourselves in Berlin with much pleasure.—Frazer Magazine.

Congregational Singing.

From the Christian Examiner for September.

The scriptural idea of public worship is that the public are the worshippers. The choir in Solomon's temple, though larger than the largest modern congregation, did not monopolize, but only led, the service. All Israel assembled must lift up the chant responsive as the noise of many waters.

Throughout the Bible, commands to sing praise are addressed, not to the select few, but to the many. 'Let all the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee.' 'Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth; both young men and maidens, old men and children; let them praise the name of the Lord.'

Yet though this is plainly the true scriptural idea of public worship, and though many laudable efforts have been made to realize it, the results thus far have been far from encouraging. Except in Germany, congregational singing hardly exists, save in name. Public worship is merely nominal. Nay, too often in our churches it may with truth be said, the worship stops when the musical performance begins.

To bring on a true performance by the people of the people's work, to make it general, hearty, good and enduring, is a vast labor, demanding incredible toil, and beset with almost insuperable difficulties. If music were taught in our public schools as thoroughly as reading and writing, the case would be different. The same multitude that hesitate not to read the hymns in their hymn-books, could read at sight the tunes in their tune-books; and then choirs might use their liberty of selection ad libitum, without excluding the populace.

Again, if our churches were built for singing purposes, the difficulty would not be so great. It would seem to be a first principle of common sense that a public building should be constructed with reference to its special uses. Every edifice is the embodiment of some idea. When the sacrificial idea becomes thus embodied, it gives us a cathedral, with the altar specially developed and prominent, and the pulpit dwarfish and thrust aside. Enter such imposing fane and everything reminds you that sacrifice, not doctrine, is the grand idea; that sensuous impression, not appeals to reason and conscience, is the architectural law.

Hence the extreme Puritan reaction from Romanism incarnated itself in a church without an altar, without sensuous appeals, and with a pulpit as the prominent feature, because doctrine, instruction, appeals to purely spiritual powers of the soul, was the enthusiastic purpose. Not only, however, was sensual appeal eschewed, and justly, by the Puritan reaction, but unfortunately the idea of worship was, if not eschewed, yet undervalued.

The Puritan loved psalmody indeed, but abhorred organs and choirs.

But such congregational singing, deprived of instrumental aid, and unsustained by the choir of trained voices, speedily degenerates into the worst description of solo performance,—a solo voice here, and a solo voice there, uncultivated, discordant, and wholly abominable. From this to choirs the reaction was inevitable. If we must have solos, duets, quartets, let them be at least cultivated ones; and if we must have an organ, let it not be the nose.

But as choirs arose, so did the question what to do with them. Architecture had provided them neither local habitation nor name. If there be a gallery, let them go up thither. * * * * *

Having thus the choir in the worst possible place to be found for it, and the organ so disposed as to make the least possible disturbance, let the people sing if they can. The people will not attempt it; first, because they cannot, and second, because the cultivated choir do not wish to have them. So the people are dumb, and public worship becomes a Sunday opera.

But of all causes fatal to popular participation in sacred song, the most radical has been the principle of singing the same hymn to different tunes. The principle is universal in this country and in England, and so unquestioned, that it possesses all the sanction of an intuitive truth. A common-metre hymn is sung to-day in Mear, to-morrow in Dundee, the day after in St. Martin's, or in any other tune of that metre.

If the truth were known, the true philosophical secret of German congregational singing is that in Germany a hymn is married to its tune, and is never divorced; so that the tune, instead of being named Akrahim, Bangor, or China, is named from the first line of the hymn that is wedded to it.

We have only to consider a moment the natural result of the opposite principle. The effect is, that tune-books, being a separate article of merchandise from hymn-books, begin to multiply. American genius is fecund. The greater the variety the better the selection. Every year brings forth new collections by the score. Every choir will cull from the pages of from two to half a dozen, until a given hymn will hardly chance to be sung twice to the same tune in a lifetime. Now under such a system the people do not learn the melodies by heart,—melodies often unmelodious, ever-changing, evanescent. They form no heart attachment then to the tune; no affectionate association between a favorite hymn and a favorite air. All is perpetually new, cold, and purely scientific. And as association and sympathetic emotion are the strongest of all popular forces, it follows inevitably that the people soon know nothing and care nothing for the whole business, except to listen, to be amused, or to criticise.

On the other hand, the same cause nourishes exclusiveness in the choir. Having unlimited range and well-exercised vocal organs, they are tempted to choose new and difficult pieces, to gratify their own taste, display their power, and prevent popular intrusion.

Thus it happens that the whole service is corrupted and perverted in its inmost spirit and feeling. Worship expires. The love of applause becomes paramount. Everything in the existing system tends to foster approbation. In the concert-room or opera we know how human nature is affected. Why must not similar causes produce similar effects in a church? The audience in either case listen to a finished performance. Can they escape the instinctive tendency to criticise? The singers know what the audience are thinking about. Can they in turn resist the temptation to propitiate criticism and elicit approval? Both parties, in the church as well as at the opera or concert-room, are thrown into the same relative mental attitudes, and the temptation is exquisitely adapted to develop the result. The organist exhibits his skill of finger and toe; the choir display their execution; the audience are entranced with delight, and God, whom all should adore, is nearly forgotten—forgotten it is to be feared, more entirely here where directly addressed, than in any other part of the services. Viewed in this light, it cannot be accounted a paradox to say that what we call sacred music is too generally the most profane thing in existence. If there is any department of practical duty in which the churches "are carnal, and walk as men," it is here. Nor can congregational singing possibly thrive while all these causes operate in combined activity.

To obviate such causes, as before intimated, must be a work of time. Yet not the less for that should we attempt the enterprise. Let children be taught to read music as early, and with as much necessity, as to read their mother tongue. Let every family be a singing-school, and at the home altar let children learn the hymns of Zion. In public schools of every grade give music a place as a daily exercise. Require of all pupils as thorough mastery of the gamut as of the multiplication table. Music is practically as valuable to men as either grammar or arithmetic. It promotes health, cheerfulness, good order, and piety; it refines and purifies the disposition. Let it be with ours as with Prussian schools, an indispensable qualification to the office of teacher, that one both sing and play well on some instrument.

Furthermore, in all churches to be built henceforward, let it be a problem to be solved, how to adapt them for uses of praise as well as of instruction. On this point we have much to learn. A few suggestions may be offered towards the true result. But that true result, that grand ideal of a house of worship is, we fear, known only to the Infinite Architect and Master Builder.

One thing may be laid down as settled beyond controversy; and that is, that the best place for the organ is on the ground floor. The principles of acoustics make this as certain as any general rule can be made. And as where the organ is, there the choir must be, it follows that the choir seats must not be in the gallery, but on the audience floor.

The question resolves itself to this, then, whereabouts on the ground floor to place organ and choir so as not to mar the symmetry of the interior, and yet to give to both preacher and people the best use of the voice in their respective parts of the public service.

Having thus marshalled the forces, and organized the host, it remains to provide them with suitable arms. Place in the hands of every man, woman, and child a book containing both the hymns and the tune which the people are to sing. The choir, of course, will possess its own library, for there are compositions which cannot be executed by the people, and may be sung for them by the choir, as at the opening and closing of service, during the rite of baptism, or on any special occasion.

But the main staple of worship is that in which the people participate, and that is to be found in the people's book. Here let the people's taste be consulted, rather than the taste of choir or leader. Give the people such tunes as they like, and do not think, because congregational singing flourishes in Germany, where they sing slow-moulded chorals, therefore we must sing slow-moulded chorals to make it flourish here. The reason why congregational singing flourished in Germany was, that the words were indissolubly linked to those chorals. Therefore, so long as the hymns lasted, the chorals must last. Moreover, there were reasons peculiar to European civilization why Protestant chorals should have a tinge of sadness not appropriate to our circumstances. Zion has been for the most part in captivity in the great European Babylon, and her harps hung on willows.

Of course we shall sing those grand old chorals; in part, because we sometimes feel life to be but Babylon and we ourselves captives by the streams. But if any imagine we are to be shut up to those severe strains, we who live in freer climes and more millennial anticipations, they are very much mistaken. When they can reduce our free limbs to the suits of mail hanging up in their old castles and museums, and our free thoughts to the catechisms of Westminster and Geneva, equally antiquated and rust-eaten, they may expect to imprison our exuberant worship in those prison dirges of dynastic middle age, but not before.

Give us, indeed, a few tunes with the mould of kirk and cathedral on them, we will not object. But give us also the inspiring melodies of the revival and the camp-ground. Call them methodistical, pennyroyal, nay, even Choctaw, we shall not care. They come from the people, the people love them, and the people shall have them.

Moreover, establish the unchanging law, (a revolution in itself,) that the hymn given is always to be sung to the tune accompanying. The people will know what to expect. Then it will be of some use for them to try to learn. Then they can form associations of ideas. Children will love tunes for their fathers' sakes, and there will be something permanent in our worship from generation to generation.

Then let the congregation sustain one weekly meeting for practice. Of course the choir will have the best drilling we can give it. But the people must meet. And if there is no other way, give up half a day on the Sabbath to the business, and let pastor and people take hold with a will, the choir at the helm, to learn the high praise of God.

Finally, we need repentance for sin the matter. If the church only could become suddenly conscious of her adultery in this thing,—how we have sung to man, and not God, how, in the act of addressing his majesty, we have thought of our own flattery,—she would be in sackcloth and ashes in a moment. For surely the indignity we offer Heaven is most gross, the insult most keen and cutting. God is real. He is the living God. True praise from us gives his heart true joy. Insult under the form of praise wounds his heart most deeply. And not only does it grieve him; it robs him of one of his choicest instrumentalities for blessing us. He could bless this service to a degree now unknown through our guilty profanation—a degree almost miraculous. In Christian souls he could take deep hold on emotions, reveal and express such heavenly raptures as are now unobeyed. Music, too, might be His sharp sword to convince of sin and lead to himself. When man feels himself lost, and trembles at his own ruin, music is the angel voice that leads him to Jesus, and souls may be born to God by the songs, as well as by the prayers and tears of the Church. There is a contagion in those holy raptures, when multitudes full of emotion sing with all the soul, by which the rudest natures are affected. When the waves of song rise and swell around them, when they float in that sea of sound, all instinct and tremulous with emotion, does not then some secret power unlock the fountain too long sealed, of their own better nature, and do they not experience strange, unwonted promptings? And when they feel the bondage of sin, and yearn for deliverance, why should not the singing of some hymn of consecration be to them like the opening of a door in heaven?

THE PICCOLOMINI FEVER IN DUBLIN.—After the opera of Lucia, on Saturday night last, a large crowd collected at the Theatre Royal stage entrance, where Mademoiselle Piccolomini's carriage was waiting to convey her to the Gresham Hotel. On her issuing from the stage door and entering her carriage the cheering of the assemblage became most vehement and enthusiastic. The fair donna smilingly acknowledged the compliment paid her. But she was hardly seated in the vehicle, when the horses were unyoked from the pole in a twinkling; about a hundred young gentlemen collected round the carriage, and drew it at a rapid pace to the Gresham Hotel, followed by an immense crowd, cheering heartily all the way. On the carriage being drawn up to the hotel door Mademoiselle Piccolomini alighted, amid a dense throng of enthusiastic admirers, and renewed her expression of thanks for this manifestation of popular regard. She retired within the hotel; but there the cheering recommenced with redoubled vigor, by way of conveying the general desire that the much admired donna should present herself at the window. She at length came forth upon the balcony in front of one of the drawing rooms of the hotel. Lights had to be held at each side of her to assure the crowd of her identity. The huzzaing, shouting, waving of hats, etc., became immense. Again and again the fair cantatrice had to gratify her worshippers by coming forth and bowing. She was led forth by Signor Giuglini, and had to remain for several minutes, while the vast breadth of Sackville Street echoed with cheers and vivas. Such a decided manifestation of public admiration and regard we do not remember to have seen conferred on any of the eminent actresses and prima donnas who have visited Dublin.—Freeman's Journal.

MALAPROPOS STAGE INCIDENT.—A few members of the company usually took a stroll on the Sunday forenoons. It was generally the "painter" the "heavy man," and myself—when they retailed stories of their wondrous adventures and stage experiences. We had only one incident to talk about personal to the company, and it was a laughable one. Walls, the prompter, who was useful on the stage, happened one evening to play the Duke in the tragedy of "Othello," having previously given directions to a girl of all-work who attended on the wardrobe to bring him a gill of the best whisky. Not wishing to go out, as the evening was wet, the girl employed a little boy who happened to be standing about to execute the commission, and the little fellow (no person being present to stop him), without considering the impropriety of such an act, coolly walked on to the stage, and delivered his message—the state of affairs at this ridiculous juncture being exactly as follows: The senate was assembled, and the speaker was—

Brabantio.—So did I yours: Good, your grace, pardon me,
Neither my place, nor ought I heard of business,
Hath raised me from my bed; nor doth this general care
Take hold of me; for my particular grief
Is of so floodgate and overbearing nature,
That it engulfs and swallows other sorrows,
And is still itself.

Duke.—Why, what's the matter?

Here the little boy walked on to the stage, with a pewter gill-stoup, and thus delivered himself: "It's jist the whusky, Mr. Walls, and I couldn't get ony at fourpence, so yer aw'n the landlord a penny; and he says it's time you was paying what's doon i' the book." The roars of laughter which followed are indescribable.—Confessions of a Strolling Player.

Longfellow's New Volume.

"The Courtship of Miles Standish, and Other Poems," by the author of "Hiawatha" and "Evangeline," will be published next month, by Ticknor & Fields. From the smaller poems of this eagerly expected volume we are able to give our readers the following beautiful verses.

CHILDREN.

Come to me, O ye children!

For I hear you at your play,

And the questions that perplexed me
Have vanished quite away.

Ye open the eastern windows,

That look toward the sun,

Where thoughts are singing swallows
And the brooks of morning run.

In your hearts are the birds and the sunshine,

In your thoughts the brooklet's flow,

But in mine is the wind of Autumn

And the first fall of the snow.

Ah! what would the world be to us

If the children were no more?

We should dread the desert behind us

Worse than the dark before.

What the leaves are to the forest,

With light and air for food,

Ere their sweet and tender juices

Have been hardened into wood,—

That to the world are children;

Through them it feels the glow

Of a brighter and sunnier climate

Than reaches the trunks below.

Come to me, O ye children!

And whisper in my ear

What the birds and the winds are singing

In your sunny atmosphere.

For what are all our contrivings,

And the wisdom of our books,

When compared with your caresses,

And the gladness of your looks?

Ye are better than all the ballads

That ever were sung or said;

For ye are living poems,

And all the rest are dead.

AMERICAN BEAUTY.—The Newport correspondent of the Boston Courier, whose initials "G. S. H." vouch that he is one of the most competent of judges as well as the most graceful of writers to treat of such a subject, writes thus of the characteristics of American female beauty:

* * * * *
But there was something that outdid them all; and that was a beautiful face I had the pleasure of sitting opposite to. I shall not give you the least intimation of the name or whereabouts of the owner of this face; suffice it to say that she was a wife and a mother, and thus wearing on her brow the perfect crown of womanhood. Vain would it be for me to attempt to convey to you the charm of this countenance by any enumeration or inventory of its features—by telling you of the rich dark hair, so massive and yet so soft, and braided as Raphael would have braided it—of the steel gray eyes, spirited and sweet, under such eye brows and eye-lashes as would have made any eyes handsome—of the clear, pellucid complexion, as delicate as it is possible to be and not lose the charm of health—of the pure and sculptured lines of the cheek and chin—of a mouth gently grave in repose, but easily rippling into the most dazzling smiles. All this gives you no notion of the sweetness, the purity, the refinement, the gentle-heartedness, the ethereal peace, that breathed from this lovely face and threw over it a charm not borrowed from form or color. And her dress, of simple white muslin, high in the throat, with purple ribbons, could not have been improved if a committee of artists had prescribed it.

I have been somewhat about the world, my dear C., and as you know I have an eye in my head; and I assure you there is nothing on earth so fine as American beauty in its rarest and highest type—such as was here before me. Its leading and characteristic trait is that of extreme refinement; of fineness in its literal and exact sense, as opposed to coarseness. In no country so often as in our democratic America will you see faces that look as if they were the perfect result of many generations of the most select and fortunate influences. This peculiar charm is often found in such excess, as to become almost a defect; from its so inevitably suggesting fears of evanescence and early decay.

Why should I not be permitted to rave a little, in this absurd way, upon the subject? Why should beauty gather all its tributes from lovers, poets, and boys? Why may not mature age, long tried and trained by life, lay an offering on this altar? What beauty is there like that of the human face? Milton in that pathetic passage in which he sums up the deprivation of his blindness, puts last, and as the climax of his bereavement, his losing sight of the "human face divine;" no lightly-considered or chance-gathered epithet. Had the light of day again visited those dim orbs, can we doubt that their first glance would have sought some human face! It is one of the compensations in growing old, or at least ceasing to be young, that our sensations if less strong are finer; more ethereal if less tumultuous. The serene emotion which the sight of beauty now awakens within me I would not exchange for the more impetuous fervors, the coarser thrills, of twenty-five. Certainly I never looked upon a new-blown rose with a more passionless admiration than upon this fair young creature who had crossed my path but for a moment, and yet thrown upon it a perennial satisfaction; for if a "thing of beauty" be "a joy forever," how much more is a being of beauty.

Dr. Arne.

Thomas Augustus Arne, Mus. Doc. was the son of a celebrated upholsterer, of King Street, Covent Garden, and was born in the month of March, 1710. He had a good school education, having been sent to Eton by his father, who intended him for the profession of the law. But his love of music operated too powerfully, even while at Eton, for his own peace or that of his companions. By means of a miserable cracked common flute he tormented them night and day, when not obliged to attend the school; and, when he left Eton, such was his passion for music, that he was frequently known to avail himself of the privilege of a servant, by borrowing a livery, and going into the upper gallery of the Opera, at that time appropriated to domestics. At home he had contrived to secrete a spinet in his room, upon which, after muffling the strings with a handkerchief, he used to practise in the night, while the rest of the family were asleep.

He was at length compelled to serve a three-years clerkship to the law; but, even during this servitude, he dedicated every moment of leisure he could obtain to the study of music. Besides practising on the spinet, and studying composition by himself, he contrived, during his clerkship, to acquire some instructions on the violin from Festing. Upon this instrument he made so considerable a progress, that soon after he had quitted his legal master, his father accidentally calling at a gentleman's house in the neighbourhood, was invited up stairs, where there was a concert, in which, to his great astonishment, he observed his son in the very act of playing the first fiddle. Finding him more admired for his musical talents than his knowledge of the law, he was soon prevailed with to forgive this unruly passion, and to let him try to turn it to some account. No sooner was the young musician able to practice aloud in his father's house, than he bewitched the whole family. Having discovered that his sister was not only fond of music, but had a very sweet-toned and touching voice, he gave her such instructions as soon enabled her to sing in the opera of Amelia for Lampe; and, finding her so well received in that performance, he prepared a new character for her, by setting to music, though at the time only eighteen years of age, Addison's opera of Rosamond. This drama was performed for the first time on the 7th of March, 1733, at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Field, and was repeated ten successive nights with great applause. Our young musician next tried his power at a burletta, and fixed on Fielding's Tom Thumb. This, under the title of the Tragedy of Tragedies, having met with great success in 1734, he now transformed into the Opera of Operas, and setting it to music, "after the Italian manner," had it performed at the New Theatre in the Haymarket. His opera of Comus was played for the first time in the year 1738. Comus is, on the whole, a light, airy, original, and pleasing production, wholly different from the works of Purcell or Handel, whom many preceding English composers had occasionally either pillaged or imitated.

Arne married Miss Cecilia Young, a singer and pupil of Geminiani; and, in 1744, was engaged as composer to the theatre in Drury Lane.

In 1762, he furnished Vauxhall, and thence the whole kingdom, with such songs as tended greatly to improve and polish the national taste.

The melody of Arne, if analysed, would perhaps appear to consist of an agreeable mixture of Italian, English, and Scots. Many of his ballads were indeed professed imitations of the Scots style; and, in his other songs, he frequently dropped into it, perhaps without design. In the science of harmony, though he was chiefly self-taught, he betrayed, in his scores, neither ignorance nor want of study.

The oratorios he produced were so unfortunate, that he was always a loser whenever they were performed. And yet it would be unjust to say that they did not merit a better fate; for, though the choruses were much inferior to those of Handel, yet the airs were frequently admirable. But, besides the great reputation of Handel, with whom he had to contend, Arne was never able to have his music so well performed. His competitor had always a more numerous and select band, a better organ, which he played himself, and better singers.

None of this ingenious and pleasing composer's capital productions had full and unequivocal success except Comus and Artaxerxes, at the distance of twenty-four years from each other. None of them were, however, condemned or neglected for want of merit in the music; but too frequently the words as well as the music were his own production.

This composer died of a spasmodic complaint on the 5th of March, 1778. Though, upon the whole, he had formed a new style of his own, yet there did not appear that fertility of ideas, that original grandeur of thought, or those resources upon all occasions, which are discoverable in the works of his predecessor Purcell, both for the church and stage; yet in secular music he must be allowed to have surpassed him in ease, grace, and variety. This is no inconsiderable praise, when it is remembered that, from the death of Purcell to that of Arne, a period of more than fourscore years, no candidate for musical fame among our countrymen had appeared, who was equally admired by the nation at large.

The principal works of Dr. Arne now in print are, "Artaxerxes," "Elfrida," "Comus," "King Arthur," "Guardian Outwitted," "Aechilles in Petticoats," "May-Day," "Shake- speare's Ode," "Alfred," "Thomas and Sally," "Choice of Harlequin," "Syren," and "Vocal Grove."

The Voiceless.

For that great procession of the UNLOVED, who not only wear the crown of thorns, but must hide it under the locks of brown or gray,—under the snowy cap, under the chilling turban,—hide it even from themselves,—perhaps never know they wear it, though it kills them,—there is no depth of tenderness in my nature that Pity has not sounded. Somewhere,—somewhere,—love is in store for them—the universe must not be allowed to fool them so cruelly. What infinite pathos in the small, half-unconscious artifices by which unattractive young persons seek to recommend themselves to the favor of those towards whom our dear sisters, the unloved, like the rest, are impelled by their God-given instincts!

Read what the singing-women—one to ten thousand of the suffering women—tell us, and think of the griefs that die unspoken! Nature is in earnest when she makes a woman; and there are women enough lying in the next churchyard, with very commonplace blue slate-stones at their head and feet, for whom it was just as true that "all sounds of life assumed one tone of love," as for Letitia Landon, of whom Elizabeth Browning said it; but she could give words to her grief, and they could not. Will you hear a few stanzas of mine?

THE VOICELESS.

We count the broken lyres that rest

Where the sweet wailing singers slumber,—

But o'er their silent sister's breast

The wild flowers who will stoop to number?

A few can touch the magic string,

And noisy Fame is proud to win them;—

Alas for those that never sing,

But die with all their music in them!

Nay, grieve not for the dead alone

Whose song has told their heart's sad story,—

Weep for the voiceless, who have known

The cross without the crown of glory!

Not where Leucadian breezes sweep

O'er Sappho's memory-haunted billow.

But where the glistening night-dews weep

On nameless sorrow's churchyard pillow.

O hearts that break and give no sign

Save whitening lip and fading tresses,

Till Death pours out his cordial wine

Slow-dropped from Misery's crushing presses—

If singing breath or echoing cord

To every hidden pang were given,

What endless melodies were poured,

As sad as earth, as sweet as heaven!

Musical Correspondence.

DOBERAN, AUGUST 14, 1858.—MR. DWIGHT:

Dear Sir,—Remembering my promise to write you about Wagner's Tannhäuser or Lohengrin, should I have an opportunity, in the course of my journey in Germany, to witness a performance of these famous operas, I am happy to inform you of a representation of the Tannhäuser, which took place here last night. But first I must tell you something of Doberan, as I doubt whether any of the readers of your Journal have ever heard of this town. Nevertheless, it is one of the most famous watering-places in Germany. Belonging to the Grand-dukedom of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, (my native country), it is situated near the Baltic, and offers the finest conveniences for sea-bathing. With the beginning of the season the Grand-duke takes up his residence here, and with him comes the court-theatre, connected with which is an excellent opera-company and a fine orchestra. At the head of this institution stands F von Flotow, the well known composer of Stradella, Martha, etc., the "Intendant," as he is called. The conductor of the opera is A. Schmitt, a son of Aloys Schmitt, of Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, who, in his time, enjoyed a high reputation as a composer for the pianoforte. Not to mention many of the singers or players who deserve to be named as among the ornaments of this institution, I will only say that the present Grand-duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, as well as his predecessors, have always striven to place both opera and orchestra on a footing equal to the best in Germany. Hence, I had a right, so far as regarded execution, to expect an extraordinary enjoyment, as I went last night to hear the Tannhäuser. My curiosity was raised to the highest pitch, after the overture (in the performance of which I took part myself years ago in Boston) was finished, and the action began. How much has been written and spoken pro and contra Wagner as a reformer of the opera! With what pertinacity is the warfare between both parties still carried on! Now, my impression of the "Tannhäuser" after this single performance is, that Wagner has given to the musical world a most interesting work in this opera; that his course will ever find its advocates among true artists; but that his powers are not, (at least in the "Tannhäuser") equal to his will. One is more interested than affected by his music; it bears more the stamp of a reflective than of a productive genius. One is seldom warmed and carried away; but one must continually admire the care, diligence and labor which the composer has bestowed on his work. Yet there are, especially in the grand finale of the second act (the grandest finale of any opera), passages of overwhelming effect; as there are also some in which the melody rises to an inimitable grace and beauty. Generally speaking, however, the opera is poor in rounded, smooth melodies, a bad defect in any work, the essence of which is based on the human voice. In the opinion of many, melody and song are synonymous, hence singing without melody is something like nonsense; one may bear it for some moments, but soon it becomes monotonous and at last intolerable. This observation, however, I do not apply in its full force to the "Tannhäuser." I have found more melody in it than I had expected from the cant of Wagner's opponents, who pronounce him wholly devoid of melodic talent. Wagner, say what you may, has the highest claims to the regard of all true musicians. It is enough—if he had done nothing else—to have roused, with his thunder-voice, the present musical generation from the idle, enervated state into which it has been beguiled by the dull, over-sentimental jingling of the modern Italian opera composers. I would give anything to hear Lohengrin, in which his individuality is said to be far more decidedly displayed than in the Tannhäuser; but I fear I shall have no chance before the first of October, when I shall bid farewell to Germany and sail for Boston. I intend to be in Berlin these days; should I bear anything worth a place in your Journal, you may expect to hear again from your Ad. K.

From a Teacher.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Having noticed on several occasions that you take some interest in what is done for musical education in schools, I take the liberty of sending you several of our programmes.

In this country, men, as a general thing, do not cultivate music; this art is confined to the ladies. Hence ladies' schools are of importance for the culture of musical taste. Now, as far as my knowledge goes, very little is done in these institutions, besides drilling the girls to perform some "brilliant" pieces and letting them off at occasional soirées. In my opinion, these soirées ought to be more than merely an opportunity to show off the progress the pupils have made in playing or to accustom them to play before others. Their principal object should be the education of taste, and this is what we endeavor to do in our school.

For this purpose we often perform classical works, not only original piano-compositions, but also arrangements from symphonies, quartets, quintets, &c.

A good deal of the best orchestral music is arranged for two pianos and for eight hands. These arrangements have a double advantage, a pedagogical and an artistic. The original is thus rendered in a very complete form; indeed I prefer a symphony, played by four good players, after a careful study, to a careless orchestral performance,—as I would prefer a good engraving of a picture to an indifferent copy in oil.

For the better understanding and enjoying these larger works we have them preceded by the reading of an analysis,—for which the earlier volumes of your "Journal" have been of great service; (I long have wished to express to you my admiration of your critically correct and poetical analysis of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.)—for more miscellaneous Concerts I write programmes with critical and biographical notices; as a specimen I include one of our next soirée.

PART I.—Beethoven; Allegro, 1st Symphony, 8 hands. Mosenthal; "I saw thee weep," for Soprano with Violin obligato. Chopin; Nocturne. Schumann; Andante con Variazioni, for 2 pianos. Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violin, (Mr. Mosenthal).

PART II.—Mozart; Overture to Magic Flute, 8 hands. Marschner; Song. Mayer; Galop militaire. Proch; The Stranger. Weber; Festive Overture, 8 hands.

From time to time we manage to get artists of merit to give us concerts; at which, as our limited means do not allow us to have a full orchestra, we confine ourselves to chamber-music. And of this kind of music I flatter myself that you will not find programmes more chaste and unexceptional than ours. The artists themselves enjoy playing what they consider the most refined, to the exclusion of clap-trap pieces, before an uncorrupted and thankful audience.

It would be of inestimable service in the cultivation of taste to give lectures on the history of music. But this is a difficult task,—most of the music teachers being foreigners and not sufficiently masters of the language,—and most of them being (alas!) too ignorant of the subject themselves. It would be a great service to the musical community if some able person would undertake to write such a work, to be used as a text book in schools. C. K.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

BIRMINGHAM, SEPT. 2, 1858.—I am here at the great Festival, and have heard Elijah performed this morning, which, as a whole, was a grand performance. I never heard such a chorus in my life. Two societies joined for the Festival—all young, fresh voices. The precision with which they sing, and their pianissimo and crescendo, is wonderful. They practiced for nine months before the Festival, Mr. Costa coming several times to witness their progress. The societies are under two chorus masters. Mr. Weiss was the Elijah. He is a more refined singer than Formès, but has not so powerful a voice; his pronunciation is better than that of Formès, but there is a certain grandeur in denunciation and invocation of the latter, which I sadly missed in Weiss. As a whole, Formès is my Elijah. I am disappointed in Clara Novello, finding her a cold singer with a voice very clear, telling, and beautiful, but not touching. She might sing forever and not make you shed a tear; you cannot understand a word she sings; she can sing softly and make fine cadenzas, but she has no passion, and never thrills you like Grisi. I think that all the solo singers, excepting Miss Dolby, are deficient in devout or religious feeling; they stand up and sing this holy music and words as they would a drinking song, without seeming to care for or understand its meaning, but merely to show their voices and some fine cadenza or flourish of their own adding. Miss Dolby sang "O rest in the Lord," in a thrilling manner, making many shed tears, and receiving the great compliment of the only encore, excepting the great chorus, "Thanks be to God." They do not applaud here, but if the President is pleased with anything, he holds up a baton and directs a repetition.

In the evening was a miscellaneous concert of twelve pieces in the first part, and the whole of Acis and Galatea for the second. I was delighted with the last part, but was very tired, the music lasting till a quarter of twelve.

The next morning, Wednesday, Eli was performed, and a very grand performance it was, Belletti being the Eli. His voice is magnificent, and pronunciation quite perfect, so that I was intensely gratified. In the evening, twenty-four pieces were performed, the performance ending at midnight. To-day the Messiah was given. I feel that I have enjoyed this oratorio as well in Boston. The orchestra and chorus left nothing to desire. Costa took the tempo so fast in some parts that the words were sacrificed as well as all the pleasure of hearing the music. Belletti sang the great songs splendidly; Sims Reeves' voice satisfies in every respect, he only lacks religious fervor; Mr. Arthursen, with his delicate voice, in this respect, impresses an audience much more. Mr. Reeves takes those A's in "Thou shalt dash them" with so little effort or desire to make effect, that, as you listen to the song, you wonder why tenors make such a fuss over it. Miss Dolby sang her songs with great expression. I shall come home quite satisfied with our native singers and feel that our good Handel and Haydn Society is something to be proud of. The Hall is very beautiful and the organ magnificent, but the seats the poorest I ever sat upon, very narrow and very hard. It seats the same number as our Music Hall, but ours is comparatively luxurious, and there is no crowding in our Hall. The choruses are perched up nearly to the top of the organ on each side, (as we were once in the Melodeon, only much higher), then comes the orchestra, from side to side, the whole width of the Hall, and a space in front for the solos and Costa. A thick gilt front comes nearly to the waists of the solo singers when they are standing. The audience stand through five or six choruses of the Messiah.

I go this evening and again to-morrow morning, and that closes the Festival. I shall return to London in the afternoon. When this reaches you I shall be on the ocean, as I sail in the Niagara in one week.

Adieu. E. A. W.

BROOKLYN, SEPT. 21.—Our Philharmonic Society have issued their circular for the second season of Five concerts instead of four as last season, the first of which is to take place on the 10th of October, when the following Orchestral pieces will be performed:

"The Four Seasons" Symphony in D Minor, Spohr. "Egmont," Overture; Beethoven. "Vestale, Overture, Spontini.

From the sale of tickets so far, and the spirit in which the matter is taken up, the second season promises to be as great a success as that of last year, which is all we can ask.

To night we are to have another grand Floral Promenade Concert, similar to the one I sent you an account of which came off the latter part of June last. It promises to be a very elegant affair, but I fear it will not be as well attended as the other as many of our people are still out of town, and those who have returned are hardly ready for a grand turnout so early in the season.

In New York they are nearly taken by storm with Opera, both in English and Italian. Two Italian opera companies in full blast, one English opera company, "the best ever in the country," (so the bills say) and another English company expected in October. However, I suppose you are to have the Cooper Troupe this week in Boston, and no doubt they will meet with excellent success with you, for they really deserve it. Mme Pauline Colson, a new candidate for public favor, is attracting considerable attention and much comment from the press. In most cases, the notices I have seen greatly overrate her, both as a singer and actress. Mr. Fry of the Tribune, in his article on Mme Colson and her performance of "Maria" in the Child of the Regiment, says: "We have not heard the part better done." As Mr. Fry is supposed to have seen the best artists of the day in this, as well as other leading characters of the modern operas given, we may consider this sufficiently high praise to satisfy a new beginner. But in my opinion it is simply absurd.

The acting and singing of Mme Colson in the part of "Maria," is no more to be compared with that of Mme Sontag in this part, than the Piano Forte playing of Strakosch can be compared with that of Thalburg.

Mme Colson has a splendid voice, sings most decidedly well, and no one can listen to her without great pleasure, but such extravagant criticism can only do her harm in the end. BELLINI.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 21. 1858.—Mr. Cooper's English Opera Company has left New York, and probably before you receive this, will have appeared in your city. They did not meet here with the success they deserved, owing, perhaps, to the strong counter attractions of the two Italian operas of the Academy of Music and Burton's; but they certainly deserved success, for they formed the best English opera company we have had here for a long time.

The prima donna, Miss Annie Milner, is gifted with a rich, powerful voice, beautiful features, and a commanding presence. Indeed, as far as personal appearance goes, she is one of the finest looking women on the stage. Her histrionic abilities are above the average, while her attitudes are in many instances the very personification of grace. In the Miserere scene of Trovatore her play is a study in itself. Those who have seen Madame La Grange on the stage will form some idea of Miss Milner, when I say that in grace and elegance, the English songstress is almost, if not fully equal to the French cantatrice. Miss Milner's voice is very clear and telling, the upper notes being powerful, and not at all shrilly. In concerted pieces she is extremely effective—more so than in florid solos, and yet there are many Italian prime donne who, with much less claim to merit than Miss Milner, have won a more extended reputation. Why it is so, I cannot tell, but it is certainly the fact, that Miss Milner has not received half the attention from our public that she deserves.

Mr. Guilmette, the basso of the troupe, is too well known in Boston, to render it necessary for me to allude to his merits and his faults—for he has both.

Mr. Miranda, the new tenor, who, before his arrival was most injudiciously puffed, has a noble voice, a good stage presence, and acts with animation and intelligence. Yet he is far, very far, from being a finished artist. He requires great care and study to bring his really magnificent organ fully under his control. Even as it is, he is the most effective English opera tenor we have had here since the palmy days of Frazer and the Segnins.

On the whole, this English company produces operas in a very satisfactory manner—and had the same performers appeared at the Academy of Music under Italian names they would have been as much praised as, under the circumstances, they were neglected.

Italian opera promises to flourish here this winter like a green bay tree. Before this you have learned that Strakosch and Maretzek are now in open competition; the former having brought out Gazzaniga, who is a strong attraction. By the way, this lady, out of courtesy to Mme. Colson, will not appear this season in her great role of La Traviata, but will confine her representations to Lucrezia, Favorita, and Trovatore. It is said this is her "final engagement"—but of course, nobody pays the slightest attention to these stereotyped phrases. If Gazzaniga, or any other prima donna, now here, can get profitable engagements in this country, there is no danger of their leaving for another.

TROVATORE.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 21, 1858.—PARODI gave three concerts here, last week. These were all Farewell Concerts; but to-night we are to have another Farewell Concert. "Quousque, tandem, Parodi, abutere, &c.;" (vide Cicero's Oration against Catiline.)

Your correspondent, Manrico, has been deterred from attending these entertainments. However, the Evening Bulletin, our best musical authority, declares them to have been successful and satisfactory. It places Mr. JUNCA, the new Basso, in an enviable light, but eschews, very properly, the reckless spur-of-the-moment enthusiasm, which has incited some of its contemporaries to rate the man above Formés.

Between ourselves, dear Journal, there are some melancholy donkeys inditing quasi musical critiques for the Press of Philadelphia, who, unable to distinguish a quaver rest from the leg of a beetle, "go off" into the wildest paroxysms over every new candidate for popular favor, quite ignoring the artists who have gone before, and who, practically and theoretically, may have been far in advance of the singers whom they so extravagantly and assiduously extol. Millard (Puer formosus!) and his sweet voice seemed to please; Mollenhauer and the violoncello between his knees, ditto, in an increased ratio. Miss Kemp has fallen short of public expectation, for I fail to find her specially noticed in any quarter. Parodi vocalized, as usual, with much force, but sans exécution, sans flexibilité, and sans goût.

Satter enjoyed an applause d'estime. We have not gone wild over your Boston pianist; for he attacks his instrument in a wild, cannibalistic, uncertain, impulsive manner, which displays a great lack of that æsthetic, keen perception of the beautiful, without which no soloist can be truly great. MANRICO.

The English Opera.

The opera troupe under Mr. H. C. COOPER, consisting of Miss ANNIE MILNER, soprano; Mr. MIRANDA, tenor; Dr. GUILMETTE, and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, bassi, with Mr. and Mrs. HOLMAN, opened on Monday evening, at the Howard Athenæum. English opera, as it is called, or the Italian opera in English, which it usually and actually is, is such a queer compound of incongruous things, half serious, more than half burlesque, with ingredients variously proportioned of everything, from the almost sublime to the quite ridiculous, that it is difficult, almost impossible, to write about it seriously and earnestly.

But, to be serious, the present troupe, in its principals, will compare well with any company that has in past time undertaken to present us with English opera. We doubt whether it is not the best we have had. Miss MILNER made a most favorable impression on the public by her performances here in oratorios, last spring, and established her reputation among us as one of the most pleasing English singers whom we have listened to. In this new and untried career of the lyric stage, she shows herself worthy of the good opinion we then formed of her; and we can do no more than repeat the opinion which we expressed of her on the occasion of her last appearance in this city—that she has a clear and rich voice, an artistic style, and an unaffected manner. She meets and overcomes, like an artist, the difficulties of Bellini's music, which become even more difficult in this stiff, ungracious, English dress, than they are in the smoothly-flowing Tuscan. She has acquired wonderfully soon a fair degree of ease upon the stage; and while wanting in the entire abandon which perhaps is necessary to the actress, she invariably appears to be a refined and graceful lady. Her spoken parts, from their very simplicity and unlikeness to the conventional twang and rant of the stage, have to us quite a new and unaccustomed charm. If opera singers must speak instead of singing, give us the lady-like simplicity of Miss Milner. Her voice impresses us much more favorably than when we heard her in the larger Music Hall. It is fresh and sweet and true, as few voices are. She is blonde in complexion, with a graceful figure and sweet expression, so that we need not say that she also looked well the fair Amina of La Sonnambula.

Mr. MIRANDA, the tenor, as an actor, greatly resembles most tenors; while, as a singer, he presents strong claims to public favor, comparing well with many Italian tenors. His voice is sweet, (save the detestable falsetto,) and he has a good dramatic style. On the opening evening he appeared to be suffering from hoarseness, and apparently did not do himself entire justice.

Dr. GUILMETTE sang admirably the music of Count Rodolfo. His resonant, clear voice, and excellent articulation, commanded much applause from the audience. His spoken remarks were almost tragic in the solemnity of their delivery; and this naturally leads us to the ridiculous division of our subject—the substitution of spoken dialogue in the English version, for the recitative of the Italian opera. Accustomed as we now are to the conventional recitative of the Italian stage, no one can help smiling, at least, when the musical thread of the drama is so harshly snapped by the intervention of the spoken dialogue; while the judicious grieve at the coarseness of the jests with which it is thought proper to season the natural insipidity of the conversations. We admit that it is all in the libretto, but it were better omitted in the performance. Mr. and Mrs. HOLMAN assumed the characters of Liza and Alessio, upon whom the burden of entertaining the audience chiefly falls, and the satisfaction which one might have taken in them was seriously diminished by the nature of the dialogue put into their mouths.

The chorus was small and bad; the orchestra small and many degrees worse than bad, being incomparably the worst we ever heard in Boston. Mr. Cooper's violin supplied, at a moment's notice, the awful gaps made by the utter incapacity of several players to perform the music of their parts. We should like to see Mr. Cooper, with violin in hand, throughout the performance, though, obviously, the conductor's baton cannot for a moment be spared.

On Tuesday, Balfe's Bohemian Girl was sung to a full and enthusiastic house. The first act of this performance was irredeemably bad, while the many beautiful melodies and concerted pieces of the latter part of the opera were so admirably rendered by the principal singers, that the delight of the audience was freely, loudly, and constantly expressed. As a whole, the opera passed off with considerable élat.

Mr. RUDOLPHSEN made his first appearance under that name and in the character of Devils-hoof. He has been well known as an admirable horn player in the Germania society and in our orchestras; as well as a concert-singer under the names of Signor Rodolfo and Herr Rudolph. In all he has won good opinions; his last experiment is eminently successful, so that we consider him quite an acquisition to any English troupe.

Mrs. HOLMAN gave the Gipsy Queen very well indeed. Her voice is a soprano of considerable power and good execution. Mr. Holman also was more pleasing in this opera than as the Alessio of the evening before.

The promised orchestra had not arrived from New York, as was expected; but large posters in the theatre assured the indulgent audience, and (we hope) the suffering conductor and distracted singers that it would positively take part in La Sonnambula, which was announced for repetition on Wednesday, and the Bohemian Girl for Thursday. For Friday Lucia di Lammermoor was announced, and next week, we presume, the English version of Il Trovatore will be presented. On Sunday evening, we are told that an oratorio will be given in connection with one of our choral societies, but what one we are not yet informed.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS at the Music Hall were brought to a close on Saturday night by a union of several of the bands that have played during the series, the concert being given for the benefit of the projector and manager of these entertainments. We are glad to learn that a crowded house rewarded their efforts, and that it is proposed to continue these concerts on Saturday evenings, so long as the public shall patronize them.

MRS. WENTWORTH.—All our concert-goers will gladly welcome one of the best of our sweet singers who is expected to return in the Niagara this week, from her European tour. Many of our readers will be pleased with an account of the Birmingham Festival given in another column, and perhaps may guess the writer's name.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.—If the Hughes instrument prove to be the successful medium of communication for submarine telegraphs, as its inventor confidently expects, it may be of interest to the musical world to know that Music has her claim to put on record, in the perfecting of the great wonder of the age, as appears from the following account of the construction of the Hughes Instrument. The Albany Journal thus sketches the principal feature of this new invention:

"The Hughes Instrument is a combination of the Morse and House inventions. In the Morse instrument, two or three pulsations of the electric current are required to indicate one letter. In the House instrument, it requires from one to twenty-eight pulsations. In the Hughes instrument, it requires but a single pulsation for each letter. The mechanism by which this is accomplished is simple, though the principle on which it is based is complex. The type wheels at the respective stations revolve to print the message, and their revolutions are governed by vibrating springs. These springs cause them to revolve in exactly the same time. There is an acoustic principle involved, viz.: that two springs which give the same musical tone, while vibrating, vibrate the same number of times per second. The springs are therefore chosen and regulated by sound. This instrument, it is evident, economizes both time and electric power. Its exceeding sensitiveness to the least perceptible pulsation of the electric currents, adapts it especially for long lines and submarine cables. It is capable of writing forty words a minute, with about one-tenth of the battery power of other instruments, and sends messages both ways at once! At least, so its inventor claims, and it is to be tried on the Atlantic Cable."

AN ELECTRIC QUINTET.—A Hungarian, Mr. LEON AUMAR, has, according to a Brussels paper, made a new and curious application of electricity. In a public concert at the National Theatre, he played by means of electric wires, on five different pianos at the same time. The electric battery which worked the wires was in an adjacent room.

NEW ORLEANS.—The Picayune gives the following details concerning Mr. Boudousquie's French operatic troupe:

At last dates, he had succeeded in securing the services of M^{lle} Lafranque, who last year obtained one of the chief prizes at the Paris Conservatoire. She will divide the leading roles with M^{lle} Paola. She is said to have a fine voice, much dramatic expression and a handsome person and features.

Mr. Boudousquie's great card was the engagement, signed and sealed, for $1,000 per month, with M^{lle} Cordier, who is also a pupil of the Conservatoire, and obtained this year its first prize in grand opera. Mr. Roqueplan, manager of the Opera Comique at Paris, was also desirous of securing her for his theatre, and insisted on her making an engagement with him. As she is a pupil of the government school of music, and government there meddles in art as imperiously as in police matters, the Minister of State has interfered and ordered M^{lle} Cordier to break her engagement with Mr. Boudousquie, and sing, will ye, will ye, at the Opera Comique.

It is most probable that M^{lle} Cordier will come here, in defiance of the Minister's orders. She is described as a first rate singer, intelligent, distinguée, pretty, graceful, and full of dramatic enthusiasm.

Mr. Boudousquie's other new operatic artists are Lout, first tenor; Lucien Bourgeois, leading light tenor; Taste, basso; M^{me} Petert Vade, dugazon; Mesmer, third light tenor; and six chorus singers,

AUDIENTES AND CRITICS.—The New York Athenaeum has some sound and sensible remarks touching some evil tendencies of good-natured audiences and of some evil practices of the musical critics for the daily press that are not limited to New York in their application.

The greatest evil at present existing in the musical world is the tendency of a good-natured audience to mistake vigor for artistic excellence and roaring for true genius. Now and then it will do, perhaps, to applaud a singer who gives an extraordinary note, whether above or below the staff. His success, however, is either to be attributed to the beneficence of nature, who endowed him with superior vocal organs than to any exercise of talent. It is not the accidental possession of a gift that deserves praise, but the way that gift is used. A basso may give a very low note, lower, perhaps, than any other basso, but unless he does it well, and with expression, he cannot claim superiority. Throwing double distilled force into a musical passage may elicit wonder, but never commendation. We admit that audiences may be astonished at such displays, but that is no reason why they should applaud; and yet how common it is to see a whole house rise en masse, over an explosive outburst of purely physical vigor. The artist who counts on success by the use of such means makes a grievous mistake. He apes trumpets and trombones, when, perhaps, he should imitate the deep and sympathetic passion of violins. If this erroneous rule should be carried out, a manager's first inquiry of a new singer should be, "Have you got a good pair of lungs? How loud can you bawl? Can you drown the orchestra? Can you slap your breast terrifically, and throw your arms wildly about like a crazy windmill? If you cannot do all this, I cannot engage you. The people want this, and the people must have what they want, or I shall lose money. I know the people are wrong, but that is their business, not mine. They pay for it, and, therefore they ought to have it."

Suppose the popular voice approves of such reasoning, into what degradation would not the artistic profession soon fall? Perhaps Tom Sayers, or the Benicia Boy, or Morrissey, can make more noise than Formes. Who knows? Perhaps they have not tried. Why not give them a chance, oh, misguided public! Let us have, by all means, champions of the heavy weights and middle weights and light weights on the operatic stage. Let the shade of the immortal Tom Crib be invoked, and the singer with the greatest vigor and the least music in his soul be invested with a lyrical belt indicative of his prowess. Let us have set-tos with and without gloves. Let the stage be made circular, and neatly roped in, and let the fashion be introduced of every singer shying his castor gracefully into the arena, before he is allowed to utter a note. Let bottle-holders be on hand to revive his flagging spirits after a tremendous encore, and if he does not come to time, let him be ingloriously banished from the Academy of Music.

Critiques for the daily press are generally written an hour or two before the opera is ended, after the writer has got an idea of the whole by the performance of the first act. Imagination and stereotyped phrases complete the article, and it is hurried off to the printer. If the prima donna should be struck with lightning, and fall dead as a dead herring before the close, the description of her finale aria, and her brilliant execution of it, would nevertheless appear the next day, after the usual fashion. Now there is not the slightest occasion for this intemperate haste in noticing opera matters in the papers of the next morning. Such criticism is always unreliable, must be necessarily brief, and, in many cases, may be utterly untrue. Most of the leading European journals only notice musical matters once a week, and we commend this plan to the editors of this city. It is a great tax, both physical and mental, on a writer to be "bobbing around" from one theatre to another every evening, staying perhaps five minutes in each, in order that he may get up an article for the issue of the next morning.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal Music.

We Parted when the Purple Vine. Miranda Almy. 25

The Light of a Loving Eye. O. B. Brown. 25

Two pretty parlor Songs, of moderate difficulty.

Senerade from Hiawatha. Louis Selle. 30

This charming episode in Longfellow's last poem has here received a well-fitting musical dress from the hands of a composer who has already made himself favorably known by a number of minor works. This Song of his will do more towards establishing his reputation than anything written by him before. The song is set for a soprano or a high tenor, and to voices of that character offers but little difficulty.

My Mother's Gentle Word. Ballad. Wrighton. 25

Look Up! " 25

Two new Songs by the popular English composer.

Alice Lee. Song and Chorus. Thompson. 30

Another of Thompson's sweet melodies, which count already innumerable friends, and are still gaining new ones every day.

The Burning Ship, or the Lost at Sea. Descriptive Ballad. L. W. Wheeler. 30

A Song for Baritone, well adapted for Concert use. Rather easy.

I Breathe Again this Joyful Hour. Duet. "Buccaneer." 35

Gentle Nettie Moore, or Little White Cottage. Bishop. 25

Arrangement of a well-known melody for guitar.

My Heart is Steele. Song from "The Buccaneer." Stratton. 25

Instrumental Music.

My Lodging is on the Cold Ground. Var. Grobe. 50

A new set of variations from the pen of this favorite composer, on a sterling air.

Illustrations of "Martha." J. Ascher. 70

This is a clever fantasia on the finest airs of this Opera for advanced players. Ascher is too well known to need any more recommendation. This fantasia does not betray any of the hurry and lack of care which are discernible in some of the later works of this author, but appears well conceived and nicely finished. The finale on the chorus, "Heaven may grant pardon," is the climax of brilliancy.

Fraser River Gold Mine Schottische. F. Langguth. 25

Jenny Louise Schottische. M. Aschaffenburg. 25

Henrietta Schottische. T. Boettger. 25

Good and easy Dance Music.

Books.

Modern School for the Violin. A Thorough and Systematic Arrangement of Easy, Progressive Studies, adapted to the wants of Schools in every degree of advancement. Added to which is a large selection of Popular Songs, Polkas, Waltzes, Dances, Marches, Quicksteps, &c. By L. G. Fessenden. $1.50.

The author of this work is a teacher of the violin, and gives this School after a long experience in its use. As exercises and examples, selections are taken from Sargino, Labitsky, Pleyel, Moriani, Czerny, and others of like celebrity as teachers and composers. The second part of the book is intended to meet the wants of those who are desirous of well-arranged Airs, Quadrilles, Polkas, Waltzes, &c.

The Diarist Abroad.

BERLIN, SEPTEMBER 1, 1858.

Here again, at last! True, in another room, for my old landlady has moved, but I am with her, and now write sitting upon the same sofa, at the same table, and my eye rests upon the same bed, washstand, bureau, clothes press, and so on, as it glances round the chamber, that it did two years and a half ago. It seems like a dream, that I have been for two years so actively moving in the musical world of Boston—and have made such a fortune out of it! The time elapsed seems more like two weeks than two years and over. Perhaps, had I not found the very ship which I should have chosen of a thousand—the Athena, built in Boston, owned in Bremen, and commanded by an old friend of mine—ready to sail via London for Bremen, I should not have taken such French leave of so many friends, and should now feel more fully the length of my visit home.

But the ship was ready, my companion was anxious to be off, a delay of a day might cost us a month—and so, on the 7th of July, at sundown, we were already beginning to feel the Atlantic swell down by Sandy Hook—which, roughly or gently, mostly the latter, was to rock us for four weeks. And what a delightfully lazy, loafing, sleepy, good-for-nothing month it was! No study, no writing, hardly any reading; eating, drinking, sleeping, watching the motions of the seamen, the ever-changing surface of the water, speculating upon a distant sail occasionally, chatting indolently with the captain, mate, and passengers, and so letting day glide on after day, careless, and enjoying to the full the "sweet doing nothing." What little things became great events! Two things I learned, which had escaped me in four previous passages across the Atlantic—one, that the fish which the sailors call the dolphin, is not the dolphin, and that which they call the porpoise is; and, the other, that the "Portuguese man-of-war," of which we must have seen thousands, is not the proprietor of the nautilus shell which one finds so often in the collections of conchology of our friends. The idea of being obliged to learn these two things at this time of day (or life) is rather mortifying—but it was so.

The sailors' dolphin I saw caught, and admired its beautiful evanescent colors, years ago; on this passage I saw the real dolphin, as the steed of Arion—the queer-nosed animal of old sculpture and painting.

Our captain, Schilling, is a capital fellow; kind-hearted in the highest degree, shrewd as a Yankee, full of fun, and always ready to do any thing for our pleasure and amusement. We had several periods of calm. One day when the ship lay floating like a swan at rest, he had the boat lowered, and took all who desired it for a row out upon the great ocean. It gave me a new experience. On shipboard, I, for one, never feel the loneliness of mid-ocean as it is so often painted by poetic passengers. The vessel, if a large one, has so many souls on board, is so girt about with standing rigging, and spreads such large overshadowing wings—it soon becomes such a home for us, and one feels so secure of finding in her all that is necessary for his comfort and well-being, that the thought of being so far away from land, of floating on the surface of the water, at the mercy of wind and wave, is but a thought—it is nothing that you feel. But as we descended the ladder into the boat, one after another, and were tossed about by waves which, in the ship, we could not feel, and then our oarsmen pulled us away from the vessel, the horizon being narrowed to half its breadth, as seen from the vessel, and within the limits of vision no object to arrest the eye, save the Athena, and she lying there, huge, dark, and motionless, but with all sails spread, as if ready at any moment to catch the breeze and leave us in our solitude—then, perhaps, more than ever in my life before, came over me what that solitude on the vast bosom of ocean is. As we moved away, perhaps a mile or more, my thoughts were occupied with this idea. I pictured to myself Captain Bligh and his crew, from the ship Bounty, making their way across the South Pacific, but more distinctly the twenty-four men in the long-boat of the Lyonnais—for that same long-boat had been purchased by our captain, and was lying now on the forward house of our good Athena. After indulging this mood for some time I turned my thoughts to the vessel. Our captain is proud of her, and well he may be, for a more beautiful specimen of naval architecture one does not often see; and I was proud of her, too, as being a Boston "notion." Often as I have seen vessels of all shapes and sizes, out in mid ocean, it was a totally different thing, I found, to row around one, and see it from all points, from a small boat. How grandly beautiful she loomed up there, our home! Scattered about the surface of the water were the little Portuguese men-of-war. We dipped up two or three. Look out how you allow their long, streaming tentacula to touch your hands, for the spot will smart and ache by the hour afterward.

As Montaigne's beggar said: "Did you but know how lazy we were!" Now, one thing the laziest can do—he can open his eyes—and in the want of other studies I took to studying my fellow passengers. Well, there was a good-humored Philister of a German grocer, from Brooklyn, with wife and three children, on his way for the second time to pay a visit to Fatherland. The man is rich, and his boy—a fine one, of some fourteen—is to be educated in one of the best schools. The little girl was quite the general favorite.

Then there was a young Englishman just returning to London. I liked him, and with reason—for had he not come directly from the West Indies, and did he not give us those exquisite pine-apples which he had intended for friends at home? Then there was the still man, who used to say, when we were becalmed, "Ein schöne Gegend!" (a beautiful country,) with an expression which spoke a whole article. He proved to be a German, going home after ten years, mostly spent in our western cities in printing offices. Ten years—ah, he will find changes!

Then there were three boys, of German parentage, on their way to Bremen, to enter school there—their parents naturally enough thinking school "at home" better than in New York. Our jolly captain had infinite fun and frolic with these boys, making them climb ropes, practice gymnastic exercises, and that sort of thing. If old Ocean did not smile sometimes of an evening it was not because our "broad grins" and shouts of laughter, at "capers cut," were wanting as an example. N. B.—A good deal of fun can be got out of boys.

As to "John"—no matter about him.

There was a tall, slender woman of some thirty-five, with a certain ladylike air, and also a certain precision in manner and in speech, both in English and German, which, as in Peter's case, "bewrayed" her. You saw the governess at once—at least, you thought so. And so it proved. She was one of that class which always excites my sympathy. Necessary appendages in certain families, they hold a position somewhere between the kitchen and parlor, with small salary and few joys, victims of stupid children, and owing their positions, such as they are, to that very culture and those mental endowments which make those positions hardly endurable. After years of service, in which she has crossed the Atlantic again and again, she now was making her sixth passage, taking her small savings with her, in the hope of rest with her old mother in the little Rhine city of her birth.

During the passage she told me some queer histories. At one time she had charge of a little orphan girl, in poor health—heiress to a million! But somehow—nobody knows how such things are brought about—the lawyers had fastened the chancery clutches upon the property, and there were times when this little millionaire and her governess actually suffered for the want of suitable food!

Our fraulein governess brought on board at New York, one little pet, a beautiful canary bird, who, the first few mornings, awoke us by his melodies. When about a week out, our unlucky steward let the cage fall. The bystanders sprang to it, raised it—the bird lay in the bottom, dead! Good bye, little pet of six years. She knew nothing of it. The cage was taken below, and hung up in its usual place. No one said any thing, but left fraulein to find it out for herself the next morning. Some time next day I saw her, with a sad face, go behind the wheel-house alone. The cage disappeared. She spoke not of her loss, but some time afterward I accidentally saw, nicely folded in clean, white letter paper, a little bunch of yellow feathers. The tears which the poor governess had shed had fallen over the stern of the vessel, and no one was the wiser. This little incident seemed to me to betray long years of loneliness, during which both her joys and her sorrows she had learned to bury in her own bosom.

With one other passenger I could never be free and careless. And this was the reason. She was a thorough North German girl, born and reared in a small country town, the daughter of an old lieutenant, formerly in the army of Hanover. I suppose she was thirty years old, but as innocent and as open as a child. Just before the Athena sailed from Bremerhaven, on this voyage, the lieutenant brought his daughter to the captain, with whom he was on intimate terms of friendship, and gave her into his charge, that her health might have the benefit of the sea air to New York and back. The other sister remained at home. Before we left New York the captain had received letters from Bremen—the lieutenant was dead! We had been out but a few days when the captain told me the story, and read me the letters of the sister to our fraulein Minna. They were so hearty, so full of feeling, yet so comforting in character, in every respect so touching, so throughout breathing the deepest sisterly affection, and so expressive of love and reverence for the father, that I could not hear them without tears. "Minna knows nothing of it yet," said the captain. "Our friends in New York have all thought it best to wait until we reach Bremerhaven, before we make known to her her loss. Why deprive her of all the benefit of the voyage by unnecessarily telling her?" I thought it the right course—but from that time onward, as I said, I could not talk with her without a feeling which imposed a restraint upon me in spite of myself.

Once in conversation something led her to say that her father often expressed his belief that he should die by apoplexy. To which she added some idea conveying the idea that of this she had no fear. Ah, thought I, if you but knew that your father's presentiment is already fulfilled!

On a beautiful Sunday morning, the day before we reached Bremerhaven, the captain told her all. Quietly and composedly some hours afterward she appeared among us from her stateroom, but the marks of a great grief were visible on her face, and this grief was for us—even down to the boys—a holy thing. The Captain's wife had joined us in London, and to her and our kind-hearted governess she turned for consolation and sympathy, and they were freely given. Upon casting anchor in Bremerhaven the boat was lowered and she was first cared for. To all but her it was a day of gladness, and yet our gladness was tempered by the feelings with which we answered her "adieu" as the boat left the ship.

The pleasure of these dreamy, lazy weeks was but slightly marred by sea-sickness. Curiously enough, in my own case, it was not until the twentieth day out that I was overtaken. We were then just on the edge of soundings, before the opening of the channel. We had had a cold disagreeable wet day, caused by the extreme end of a south-easterly wind, which must have been very strong down in the Bay of Biscay, for the next morning, when we came upon deck, we found a heavy sea—even the log-book admitted this—directly against us, while the clouds had all disappeared and a strong northerly wind at right angles to the rolling billows—just such a wind as the Athena liked best—was driving her along finely with but half her sails spread. Then and there was a plunging, and, like Paddy's horse, an "old kicking up before and rearing up behind," under which, by eventide, I succumbed. No; resistance was useless. I believe only our printer-man, who favored us several times with his remark "Schönen Gegend"—beautiful country—found no other fault with the sea than that it hindered progress. No vessel that we saw on this day carried anything like the sail that the Athena did. One fine ship which we saw away in the distance, and for which our captain changed his course a point or two, proved to be, when we at length, about sundown, came up with her, the "Kate Dyer," of Portland, to the no small delight of "John," a Portland boy.

But what was Kate Dyer to me or I to Kate Dyer, just then, suffering a calamity more dire than forty Kates?

However, during the night the sea went down on the one hand and the wind on the other, and it took us a week to make the next seven degrees! But they were made, and the last two and a half days were but the most delightful of pleasure trips. The afternoon of August 3d we ran along the south side of the Isle of Wight, the wind favorable, the sky clear, and purposely for our pleasure the ship was steered close in shore, giving us full and fair opportunity to see for ourselves how beautiful is Old England. All day, on the 4th, we were constantly occupied in admiring the moving diorama of the coast from Beechy Head onward, passing Hastings, Folkstone, Dover, and finally, as night set in, casting anchor outside the mouth of the Thames.

We have nothing at home, which can serve as a standard of comparison for the superb beauty of this part of the English coast, not to speak of the interest with which history from the time of Caesar clothes it. Nature has done her share in building up those grand cliffs, rounding off and smoothing into soft outlines the hills which rest upon them, and opening here and there little valleys and ravines, or more extended bays and harbors, while cultivation from a period beyond the reach of our annals has been continually at work and beautifying the rough gem as it left Nature's hands. I had seen it all before, three or four times, and yet the charm was no less—it was greater even than when I first passed along in 1849.

On the 5th we were towed slowly up the Thames. As on the day before, so on this, our attention was never allowed to flag; here was some spot made familiar to us in history or fiction; there a town of which we had read all our lives; then some beautiful villa or nobleman's residence, surrounded with parks and gardens, groves and meadows, making good the reputation of England for the depth and beauty of her garment of green;—finally Tilbury fort, seized by the Dutch in the shameful times which followed the grand old Protector's death; Gravesend, Woolwich, with its acres and acres of arsenals—then a bend in the river and the entrance of the Victoria dock was before us. To avoid the trouble and the fuss with the English customs officers, which our friend the grocer and his family had, for they took a steamship here for the continent—we concluded to make the ship our home during our stay,—especially as we expected to remain but a few days. The "few days" became, in fact, two weeks; but though we were thus cut off from being in London evenings, we usually were weary enough when evening came to be glad to find ourselves again in the dock on our good Athena. There was little, however, to call us up to London in the evening—a few Italian operas were given, it is true—but not one of us cared enough for the Piccolomini or any of the others to spend six or eight dollars, which it would have cost us to hear them.

Palestrina.

Close at the feet of the Appennines, hardly ten miles from Rome, lies the old town well known by the ancient Romans for its splendid site, Præneste, now called Palestrina. Cool mountain winds there chase away the heat in summer, and the wooded height protects it in the winter from the rough blasts of the North. In calm, clear weather one can perceive there the last vibrations of the morning bells at Rome, the only sign of all the stir of "the eternal city" that penetrates to this seclusion. Plantations of mulberry trees, their branches interwoven with wild grape vines, screen the little town as with a wall of leaves and blossoms. Thus, as if buried in the memory of those distant times when a resplendent genius dawned thence on the world, lies Palestrina, the birthplace of the great PIERLUIGI, of the man, whom his contemporaries called "il principe della musica." May the following sketch contribute somewhat to raise the works of this high master out of the oblivion, in which the false taste and imperfect culture of musicians has too long suffered them to rest.

Here, in the year 1524, was born to poor parents a son, who received the name Joannes Petrus Aloysius, and who afterwards called himself GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA PALESTRINA, by which last name he is known in the world of Art. We have but little and exceedingly uncertain information of the circumstances in which his early youth was developed. But we must assume that a fine feeling for tones and their relations dwelt in him from an early age; for one day when he sang as a boy upon the square before the church of S. Maria Magdalena in Rome, the pure expression of his song so moved the chapel master* of the church, who happened to pass by, that he took him under his instruction.

At the time when Palestrina began his studies, the most and best of the composers in Rome were of Flemish origin, who held public schools of composition, much frequented, under the protection of Roman nobles. The most celebrated among them are: G. Arcadelt (died 1560–61); Adrian Willaert (died 1563); and finally the great Claude Goudimel (died 1572—beheaded in Lyons on account of Protestantism). This last is held by the most reliable historians to have been Pierluigi's teacher. The abstract subtleties of the theorists of that time must have seemed dry enough to the boy Pierluigi; but, like the boy Beethoven, two centuries and a half later, he had an iron persistency which never forsook him in a study recognized as necessary.

The incomparable skill with which he moves in the deepest forms of Art, speaks for the artist-like earnestness that animated him during his years of study.

In the year 1551 he was appointed teacher of the boys (magister puerorum) in the Vatican, and he wrote at this time his first book of Madrigals, which won for him the favor of Pope Julius III., who bestowed on him the title "Maestro della ca- pella della basilica Vaticana." In this capacity he published (Rome, 1554) four Masses, for four and five voices, of which the Mass: Ecce sacerdos magnus shows how far he already soared beyond his Flemish predecessors.

* Or, rather, singing master; Palestrina was the first who bore the title maestro di capella.

The reputation which these works brought him caused his reception into the rank of the papal singers. But when Paul IV. ascended the throne he revived an older ordinance, requiring the members of the papal chapel to remain unmarried. Accordingly, Palestrina, who had long before taken to wife Lucrezia, a Roman lady, was dismissed with one month's salary of six scudi ($6.50.) Neither the most bitter necessity which now came upon him and his numerous family,* nor continual bodily sufferings, had power to bend the spirit of this great artist. We see him as industriously occupied as before, in banishing the last traces of Flemish awkwardness from his style.

In the year 1561 we see him in the service of the principal church, Santa Maria Maggiore. About this time, too, occurred that memorable event which will never be forgotten in the history of church music. For the better understanding thereof, I permit myself a few preliminary remarks here on the state of church music at that time.

In those remote times, when the first rays of reviving civilization shed a faint light on mankind, the boundaries between the morally beautiful and the low, nonsensical, and trivial, were less appreciated by the general popular feeling than they now are. Even that which is most holy and worthy of the deepest veneration, seemed to the masses not so glorified, but that much that was rude and vulgar crept into the acts of worship rendered to the supreme being. The Narren or Esels-Messen (fools' or asses' masses) which were celebrated down into the fifteenth century,† the biblical dramas called "Mysteries,"‡ the innumerable grotesque ornaments,§ which are still beheld with wonder in the most venerable cathedrals,—all this leads us to suspect that the moral culture of the people in those times was but little or not at all higher than that of the rudest periods of antiquity before Christ. In the religious music of those centuries, too, we meet at every step with a like mixture of the pure and the frivolous. In the epoch before Palestrina the composers showed their contrapuntal skill in making profane popular songs the ground of their masses, motets, &c. These melodies were sung by one voice, while the others sounded the sacred texts in the most artificial melismas and intertwinings of parts. Fétis has preserved a number of such songs for us in his fine introduction to his "Biographie des Musiciens, &c." The following songs, according to Baini, were used by many composers for their masses: Il villane geloso; L'amico o Madama; Adieu, amours; O Venere bella: Des rouges nez; &c.

* His four sons, the first three of whom devoted themselves to music, were named Angelo, Rodolfo, Silla, and Igino.

† Festivals, similar to the ancient Saturnalia, which were celebrated in the churches every year, with the most fearful wildness and indecency, under the sanction of the theologians of Rome and of the Sorbonne.

‡ Dr. Forkel, in his great historical work, cites some verses out of such a Mystery, which, although put into the mouth of God the Father, are devoid of all sense of shame or decency.

§ For instance, the portal of the minister in Bern, St. Rombaud in Malines (Belgium), and innumerable other churches of those epochs.

Bitter complaints were uttered in the first Council at Trent against this impropriety, and the Council resolved (1562) to name a commission of eight cardinals, who should adopt the necessary measures for the improvement of the church music. Through the influence of a member of this body, and a warm admirer of Palestrina, the Cardinal Rudolfo Pio, of Carpi, Palestrina was commissioned to write a mass, in which he should have an eye especially to the clearest possible significance of the words, leaving out all mere note- reckonings, unnecessary verbal repetitions and simultaneous singing of different texts. Penetrated with a high sense of the responsibility in which this honorable commission placed him towards the musical world of his day, he wrote three masses, of which the one called Missa Papa Marcelli, and dedicated to Philip II. of Spain (1567), would alone have secured his immortality. This canonical work, which came out whole at one cast, is an eternal model of clear polyphony, never reached in its conduct of the voices, never surpassed in high psalmodic flight.

On the first performance of this work it was declared by pope, cardinals, Rome, and all the world, to be the most perfect of all religious compositions. From this time forward Palestrina's fame flew through all lands; the farthest provinces of Germany sent him their artists for instruction; even the Netherlands, seeing perhaps in him another scion of their own great school, willingly acknowledged his supremacy. Pope Pius IV., out of gratitude, appointed him compositor to his chapel, a title conferred only upon him.

[Conclusion next week.]

Four Recovered Pieces by Handel.

Four pieces of Music by Father Handel have just been fished out of his early and forgotten works and newly published. A critic makes the following allusion to them:

"Per obbèdìr" (Recitative) and "Leggi" (aria), from Handel's "Almira" (date 1705), were originally written to German words, and have been here fitted with Italian text, by Signor Maggioni. Our Italian friends accuse us of being hard on Signor Verdi; let them compare this specimen of melody from a young man—written under an operatically semi-barbarous dispensation for "Almira" was composed for Hamburg, ere "Il Sassone" went to Italy)—with "Di Provenza," or the most delicious tune, by the new writer, whichever that be. Handel's melody lies within a small compass, but is a thoroughly fine one—a song to pair off with the solo from his "Passion Musik" (another early essay) mentioned not long since. A French pair of movements also by Handel "Vous ne sauriez flatter" (Recitative), and "Non, je puis plus souffrir" (air), are, (we are informed by a note) originally disconnected—possibly disjointed members from the same cantata. These are curious rather than winning, but are worth studying in one point of view. No land, no language, are so inexorable as those of France—so constant in their requirements on all who, whether native or foreign, contribute to the art. There is little of the Handel suavity and grandeur here: had the song been signed Lullu or Rameau, we should not have questioned its parentage. But compared with "the Giant," how does every one else dwindle! Jomelli holds his own, as a smaller man, in the aria from "Attilio," "Benche l'angel" (with what now seem to us its queer passages of renplissage), since the leading prose is stately, and the structure is honest and good. But the air and minuet "Fortunate," from the "Artaserse" of Hasse, are, as compared with the two songs commented on, poor and stale as music. They were written, it is true, for a limited mezzo soprano (in no less compass than Handel's "Verdi prati," or "Dove sei"), but there is little in them besides the old-fashioned singer. Handel was both singer and composer, yet La Faustina (this very composer Hasse's wife, who had sung under Handel's opera-management, and does not seem to have been an ill-natured woman) complained to Burney of Handel's cantilena as having been often "rude." This is greatness rated for "a time," but not by Time. Which has now, the best of it, Hasse or Handel?

Miss Arabella Goddard.

The Illustrated News of the World (London) gives an excellent steel engraved portrait of the celebrated English pianiste, Miss Arabella Goddard, with the following sketch of her life:

Miss Arabella Goddard, the celebrated pianiste, in her early and already brilliant career, presents a noble and encouraging example of the true beauty and dignity of art, earnestly and devotedly pursued for its own sake. Richly gifted by nature with uncommon faculties and graces above the ordinary measure, unspoiled by the exuberant eulogies of admirers, and undisturbed by the jealousies which usually accompany a rising reputation, this young lady, in her vernal years, has reached the very summit of a profession crowded with celebrities, and, at the present moment, she may be said, without a boast, to take rank with easy pre-eminence among the first performers of Europe. As such, she is, to use the language of a weekly cotemporary, "a perfect prodigy of deep and various learning." All forms of composition, the severely classical and the conventionally brilliant, are equally within her power; and in all alike the mechanical difficulties are conquered with the same force and flexibility of hand; in all alike her touch is round, rich, and soft, her expression stamped with strength and grace, and her reading bright with intelligence. She is the more especially to be honored as being one of those who have dedicated themselves with enthusiasm to rescue the profound conceptions of the poet-musician, Beethoven, from the charge of being rhapsodical or obscure, and has come before the public more frequently than most of her cotemporaries with that end in view.

Arabella Goddard is the younger daughter and child of Thomas Goddard, Esq., of Welbeck-street, Cavendish Square, London. She was born at St. Servan, a small village not far from St. Malo, in Brittany, on the 12th day of January, 1836. Though she inherited from her parents no great amount of musical talent, still, from her earliest years and almost from infancy, she showed an extraordinary and almost enthusiastic taste for music, which happily was fostered and cherished by those by whom she was surrounded in her infancy and childhood.

She was little more than four years of age when she first appeared in public. This was at a concert given for some charitable purpose in her native village of St. Servan, when she played a fantasia on themes from Mozart's "Don Juan." At this time the promise of future celebrity in the child was so great that her parents thought it desirable to remove with her to Paris, where they spent several years, during which time their daughter was receiving lessons under the celebrated composer, Kalkbrenner.

Returning to London soon after the Revolution of February, 1848, of which they were passive spectators from their windows in the French capital, Mr. and Mrs. Goddard entrusted the cultivation of their daughter's musical talents to Mrs. Anderson, Her Majesty's pianiste, and the instructress of the Princess Royal. She was only eight years of age when she was called upon to perform, at Buckingham Palace, before Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, who highly complimented her on her exhibition.

For some time it was the intention of the parents to place their gifted child at the Royal Academy of Music, with the intention of entering her as a competitor for the King's Scholarship; but circumstances compelled them to abandon their design, and it was resolved to entrust the finishing of her musical education to Thalberg. Under his able tuition she rapidly progressed, and in a short time she could play the most difficult passages at sight; in addition to which her musical memory was most surprising.

On her first appearance in public, at a matinée d'invitation at the residence of her parents, March 30th, 1850, Miss Goddard was thus mentioned in the columns of a cotemporary:—"At the matinée musicale on Saturday last, we heard Miss Goddard, of whom there has been lately considerable talk in musical circles. From a pia- niste of fourteen years of age the prodigious feats of a Liszt or a Pleyel are not to be expected; but if Miss Goddard, with increased strength, continues to progress, she will soon rival any living pianiste. She has remarkable facility with both hands; indeed, her mechanism is marvellous while her musical sensibility is evidently acute. She performs in all schools—the elaborations of a Bach fugue, the intricate combinations of themes by popular composers, the reveries of David in his 'Desert,' the melodious meditations of Mendelssohn, and the inspirations of Beethoven, are each and all as familiar to her as 'household words.'"

Nor was the above prophecy long unfulfilled. In the following October she made her debut at the Grand National Concerts, when she played the "Elisir" fantasia, and the "Tarantella" of her master Thalberg, with marked success. From that date she appeared frequently in public, and soon established the permanent fame and popularity which she has since continued to enjoy, by her performance of the "Masaniello" and "Don Pasquale" fantasias of her master Thalberg, Prudent's "Lucia" and "Puritani" fantasias, &c.

The first performances of Miss Goddard at those concerts, which were given at her Majesty's Theatre, were chiefly confined to works of the modern romantic school, the great characteristics of which are wonderful mechanism and poetic feeling; but, having received the valuable advice of Mr. J. W. Davison, she soon became equally distinguished as a pianiste in the classic stores of high art.

Miss Goddard subsequently became the pupil of Mr. G. A. Macfarren, under whom she studied harmony.

In 1854 Miss Goddard left England with her mother for an extensive tour on the Continent, during which she visited Paris, Leipsic—where she played at the far-famed Gewandhaus concerts—Berlin, Vienna, Florence, and nearly all the principal cities of France, Germany, and Italy; giving concerts everywhere, and everywhere, it may be added, achieving the greatest success. When she returned to England in May, 1856, her friends and admirers (which is but another term for the public at large), found not only that she had lost nothing by her travels, but that, on the contrary, change of scene, familiarity with persons and things hitherto unknown, and contact with the most distinguished of foreign professors, had proved of the greatest service to her. The truth is, that her voyage was one not merely of pleasure, but of study and reflection. What she saw and heard seemed to supply her with new resources for the attainment of that perfection in her art which no young aspirant ever sought with greater assiduity. She was not led away by the "modern romantic school," which is in such high favor abroad, to forget the common sense which governs musical taste in this country. She did not abandon for more dazzling and superficial subjects the works of those great masters, her familiarity with whose productions contributed so much to her early reputation. On her first re-appearance in public, at the Hanover-square rooms, May 16th, in that year, the musical critic of the Times thus expressed himself:—"We must applaud the judgment which has induced Miss Goddard to reject every ad captandum means of display, and to rely for effect solely on Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. Miss Goddard never was an ordinary player, and is now less so than ever. The two years that have passed since she was last heard in England have not so much added to her mechanical proficiency as they have developed her mental resources. If we may so express ourselves, her mind is a more despotic ruler of her fingers than before. She now both thinks and executes like a perfect mistress of her art. It was the master who spoke to us from first to last, not the pianist, who, modest and retiring, was but too happy to shine by the reflection of so great a light. In Mendelssohn's Rondo, one of the most sparkling and animated emanations from a genius as impulsive as it was inexhaustible, Miss Goddard was equally happy, her performance being as marvellous for its accuracy as it was eminently graceful."

During the last two or three seasons Miss Goddard, as the solo instrumentalist, has been the great feature in several provincial concerts, and more especially at the Philharmonic Concerts in Liverpool. The local press of every town that she has visited are unanimous in praising her purity of style, her power, her evenness of touch, her delicacy, and her absence from all affectation as contributing to place her in the very foremost rank of pianists.

During the London season of the past and present year, Miss Goddard gave a series of soirées at her private residence in Welbeck-street, which were attended by nearly all the musical world of London, and were uniformly commended for their recherché character. Owing to the crowded audiences who attended, she was forced to give her last series at Willis's Rooms. She has also recently performed at the concerts at the Crystal Palace, together with Messrs. Jules Benedict and Lindsay Sloper, (where she executed Bach's triple concerto in a truly superb style), and, indeed, at all the large concerts in the metropolis.

By the pupils to whom she has given instructions on the piano in private, she has been uniformly appreciated; and her simple, unaffected manners have gained her a large circle of friends in private life.

The Leed's Musical Festival.

The first great musical festival ever held in Leeds, England, began on the 8th inst. The magnificent town hall, in which the performances took place, was inaugurated with appropriate ceremonies on the 7th, by the Queen in person, and in the evening a grand banquet was given by the Mayor of Leeds. Besides the Queen, the Prince Consort, the Princesses Alice and Helena, several members of the household, and the Earl of Derby, were present at the inauguration.—The royal party proceeded, after the ceremonies, on their way to Balmoral.

The orchestra numbered 95, and was composed of the whole orchestra of the London Philharmonic Society, reinforced by several select performers from the principal Yorkshire towns. The chorus, consisting entirely of Yorkshire people, was thus divided: trebles, 65; contraltos, (female) 16; altos, (male) 43; tenors, 60; basses, 60; in all, 244. The whole orchestral and choral force thus amounted to 340. The leader was Mr. Sterndale Bennett, the Cambridge professor of music, and a Yorkshireman himself. He was honored by a most enthusiastic reception.

There were about 1800 present, and the coup d'œil at the commencement of the oratorio, when the magnificent hall was completely filled with an assemblage of the rank, fashion, and beauty of Leeds, and the surrounding district, was extremely imposing. A notice, in the following terms, was distributed throughout the hall before the performance commenced, and we are happy to say the request was strictly complied with:—"The committee request that no audible expression of applause may interrupt the performance of the oratorios or other continuous works; and that no encores may be called at the evening concerts, in order that parties residing at a distance may be enabled to avail themselves of the arrangements made with the several railway companies for special trains at the conclusion of each day's performance. No person will be permitted to enter or leave the room during the performance of the piece; and it is earnestly requested that the audience will support the stewards in carrying out this important regulation." For once, and for the first time, we believe, "Elijah" has been performed without interruption from applause or encores, and we hope that the good example set by Leeds will not be without its effect upon other musical communities. It was a delightful treat to be able to listen, from beginning to end, without being disturbed every now and then by an uproar unsuited to the sacred character of the music; and we are glad that it has, at last, been practically demonstrated that a silent but hearty attention to this glorious oratorio is perfectly possible. This is a grand fact in the first musical festival at Leeds.

On the morning of Wednesday, the first day of the festival, Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah was performed in a very satisfactory manner. The London Times says that the people of Leeds were in great glee at the success, and divided the palm of merit between the architect of the town hall and the professor of music. The principal parts were performed by Sims Reeves, Clara Novello, Mr. Weiss, and Miss Palmer. In the evening there was an unusually long miscellaneous concert, which was enjoyed by from 1700 to 1800 persons. It began with Mozart's first symphony in C major, which was listened to with much attention, and applauded as warmly as it would have been in London. A miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music followed.

On the next morning, Thursday, the sacred music consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater, a part of Bach's Passions Musik and Beethoven's Mount of Olives. In the evening the second miscellaneous concert took place, in which Piccolomini, Giuglini, and other artists from Her Majesty's theatre, were to assist. On Friday morning, Haydn's Seasons and Handel's Israel in Egypt, and on Saturday morning the Messiah was to be performed. The prospects for the festival were very bright at the last accounts, and the Leeds General Infirmary would be benefitted correspondingly. The members of the chorus receive great praise for the excellence of their voices, and the audiences are said to have been as enthusiastic as in London.

Dr. Arne's "Judith."

We are indebted to a contemporary for a list of old Oratorios on this Apocryphal story, which seems—as was mentioned in the Athenæum not long since—to be tempting modern composers simultaneously to an unusual degree. Mattheson, we perceive, speaks of a "Judith" written by Handel during his Hamburg period. There is a "Giuditta," too, by Marcelllo. Then there was a luckless oratorio performed in London in 1740 (the year of the "Frost Fair" on the Thames), by Defesch, an Amsterdam organist, who had relinquished Holland for England. The one memento of its performance, beyond the tradition of its utter failure, is Hogarth's well-known print of an oratorio chorus singing these words:

"The world shall bow to the Assyrian throne."

There was another "Judith,"—we learn from the same authority,—written by Handel Smith, but which was never produced. That Oratorio to which we are now coming, by Dr. Arne, is the only work on the story, in England, which may be said, as yet, to have kept its ground. It was performed at the Lock Chapel, in 1764—at the Gloucester music-meeting in 1766—and (this seems an odd choice) at the Stratford Jubilee in 1769. The manuscript score of it is in the British Museum: some slight account of which may be interesting.

The manuscript—belonging to Dr. Kitchiner's Library—in which there is Bartleman's signature, also a warrant for the great beauty of the work copied from Dibden's Life—is in three parts.—The first two are complete (including an interpolation said to be in Dr. Arnold's handwriting). The third part can hardly have been looked at ere it was bound—since we find in the manuscript such irrelevant matter as Dr. Arne's well-known "Hymn of Eve,"—while the final chorus in score, on a paper of totally different form, has therefore (in true Procrustean fashion) been bound in sideways. The names of the singers—the principal ones of which are those of Mrs. Bartheleman, Mrs. Baddeley, Miss Brent, Signor Tenducci, Mr. Champneys, are prefixed to the songs, but so mixed up with the names of other more obscure persons (one "Vernon" among the number) and interchanged as to destroy all unity of character, and to suggest that they may refer to distinct performances of the music. The book is by Isaac Bickerstaff, written in verse—one shade better, perhaps, than Dr. Morell's books, but without the slightest biblical color. That was hardly the fashion of the times. The catastrophe of the sacrifice of Holofernes seems (we use this caution in reference to the dislocation of the manuscript of Part III.) to have been evaded—since it is dimly commented on by a chorus, which is nevertheless one of the severest, most elaborate numbers of the work.

A perusal of the score will raise the reputation of Dr. Arne with those who principally know him as England's best Shakspearian melodist, or as the writer of the showy, yet superficial "Artaxerxes." Such persons will hardly (any more than ourselves) have been prepared for the amount of constructive science and variety of device which "Judith" reveals. The first movement of the overture (a con spirito in G 3-4) is well developed; fully scored, and not rococo—the period and the place considered. The Oratorio includes some good, if not great choruses: an opening one of supplication in a minor—a pastorale chorus in G major, "When Israel wept," where the same tone seems to have been tried as that which was so incomparably used by Handel in his chorus from "Israel," "But as for his people." The fugue in triple tempo D major, which closes Dr. Arne's first act, owes something to Handel's "Fixed in his everlasting seat." But those, we think, are almost the only traces of influences, imitation, or coincidence from, of, or with—the giant, which "Judith" contains. What may be called the profane third of Dr. Arne's Oratorio—its music devoted to the camp of Holofernes—is, to us, its most feeble portion—being treated in a frivolous style, semi-Arcadian, semi-operatic. In a case like this, we find the greatness of Handel by a simple comparison. How much lower in tone and weaker in situation than the scene referred to is the greater portion of "Solomon,"—yet who can undervalue the loveliness without frivolity of his "Nightingale Chorus,"—the loftiness without pedantry of his court music with which "Sheba's queen" is regaled? It is curious to find a composer strongest in his secular music—as was Dr. Arne—weakest in the most secular portion of this work, and capable of producing a Holofernes little stronger than a Comus. On the other hand, the chorus indicative of doom (to which we have adverted) rises to the height of the words and their import; and is a fine, grave, well-developed movement, such as we had hardly credited Dr. Arne with power to work out. Meritorious care, too (the state of Art in England a century since considered), seems to have been bestowed by him on the instrumentation. The stringed quartet is written with due solidity, especially in respect to its viola, to which more than ordinary interest is given. The songs, too, are scored with an ingenuity regard to figure and variety; and without that leanness which wearies in the Italian writers, the Hasses, the Galuppi, Ciampis, Lampugnani, towards whom, as a school, the Doctor obviously inclined. Of the songs themselves a less decided judgment can be given: inasmuch as these are matters never to be disposed of by the eye: but to be enjoyed by the ear and answered by the heart—music dependent not on the composer only, but also largely on his interpreter. The airs allotted to Judith contain such antiquated passages expressive of courage and heroism as were found effective in the mouth of Mandane. Abra, her maid, has a bravura with harps nicely disposed, and with triplet diversions, such as we have long tired of in "The soldier Tired." There is nothing very salient for either tenor or bass. A "Sleep Song" (by the way, how generally do composers succeed in their "Sleep Songs"!) allotted to "Master Brown," promises well: and might prove worth disinterring.—Athenæum.

THREE OPERAS IN NEW YORK.—The musical critic of the Tribune, (Sept. 22), in his own peculiar way, says:

We have had three Opera Companies—two in an unknown tongue, and one in the familiar Anglo-Saxon. Three operas in our town is enough; perhaps too much, for one at least has decided to quit. The English has departed and left the Italians master of the field. This seems rather hard, that a nice little English opera, with good singers, should not longer prosper. Different this from the days of Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Wood and Mrs. Seguin, when the house overflowed, and people listened to their mother tongue set to dulcet sounds. Why not now? It is a vulgar su-perfinery which neglects the vigorous English language for any other, come whence it may.

The Academy has novelties. The new tenor Stefani is such. He has good stuff in him. A manly voice—fair action and much vigor. In finish he has yet to make progress; but he is young and enthusiastic, and may achieve all that is desirable. His second performance of Edgardo was the most satisfactory, and the last scene he gave with much intensity of feeling. A fine scene it is. Moonlight, towers, romance, hot blood, despair and death—and all set to music. What more could be asked to fill up the circle of the luxury of woe, and the yearnings after we know not what? Mia Lucia! How the broken-hearted fellow rings it out! Grief in the opera is popular. To sympathize with its mock woes strung in sweets costs no effort. There are no solid agonies, no mourning attire; no coffin to pay for. Comedy in opera is not popular. We may except the scenes of two such comic actors as Ronconi and Formes. But as an average thing, few care for it. We think here the comedy had better be served up on one dish, and the music on another. Madame Gassier is a bright little artist. Little birds have big throats. She did the scene where she withers under her Edgardo's curse beautifully. A curse can be so much more prolonged in music that it becomes perfectly blasting. At least Lucia seemed to think so. Madame Gassier keeps up an aviary business with the flute in her last solo, where the voice and the instrument appear to be in friendly rivalry as to which shall rise highest and come down softest. She was much applauded. Signor Gassier is one of the best artists on the stage. He is always well up to his work—never uncertain; never deficient. Among the musical knowing ones especially, he ranks high. The Academy thus is richly endowed.

The opera at Burton's is prospering—not wonderfully but moderately. The company is Mesdames Gazzaniga and Strakosch, (who will appear to-night), Mad. Colson, (who will appear on Thursday), Brignoli, Amodio, Barili—a strong party. How it proves the size and resources of our city, after we leave one great company at the Academy, to find in an acting theatre such another as this. All these are celebrities to New York except Mad. Colson, and she, as a new comer, is making a name fast. Her performance of Traviata was received with fervor as general as unlooked for. Brignoli and Amodio are in fine voice after their summer repose. Brignoli has the voice of a lover; Amodio of a lover too, only that he makes love at a lower pitch. Fine organs, all of them. A few years since one such voice would draw, for a time at least, good houses. We have grown critical and exigent. Mr. Hackett complained that when he told Americans that he had engaged Grisi and Mario, they asked "whom else?" What is enough in fortune? What in art? More than we have. Considering that Americans do all in their power to break down their own native art and manufacturers, and turn themselves into the beggarly porters and pedlars of foreign wares, they should be a little modest in their claims on what has to come from afar.

The Trials of Genius.

Being the outgushing lamentation of a Boy who practises the Piano-Forte.

BY TROVATOR.

I.

Who is it says I "must not thump"—
That on her head the notes do bump,
As though each was of lead, a lump?
My Mother.

II.

Who will not have his "lazy boy"
Spend hours o'er that girlish toy,
Strumming away with senseless joy?
My Father.

III.

Who does "abominate those scales,"
Who, when I practise, always rails,
And in fault-finding never fails?
My Brother.

IV.

Who knows full well that brother John
Will, by his drumming, very soon
Get that piano out of tune?
My Sister.

V.

Who oft pathetic tears does shed,
And says "that noise goes through her head,"
And sends her nearly wild to bed,
And certainly will drive her dead,
And that she would wish to be led Unto the stake (these words she said)
Rather than thus be distracted?
My Aunt.

VI.

Who really wonders, for his part,
How any but a fool could start
To study music,—senseless art!
My Uncle.

VII.

Who all unanimous declare
My practising they will not bear—
And then at me do grimly stare?
My Family.

VIII.

Who is that sad unfortunate,
Who loves that which all others hate,
Yet feels it is his woful fate,
And can't that direful love abate,—
Who moans about his wretched state
Yet practises at any rate?
Myself.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 28. The Handel and Haydn Society held its initiatory stated meeting on the evening of the 21st inst. Upwards of one hundred members promptly responded to the call of the secretary, and proceeded, with much cordiality and amid mutual congratulations, to select a managing corps for the ensuing year. The following gentlemen were thereupon chosen; they are a coterie of active and responsible business men, in whose hands the best interests of this popular organization may be expected to be profitably fostered:

President—D. W. C. Moore. Vice Presidents—John I. Heisler, Gilbert Combs, A. M. Treasurer—A. W. Rand. Secretary—Jos. S. Sparks. Librarian—John A. Pelouze. Directors—A. R. Paul, I. C. Paynter, Geo. W. Hazelwood, I. G. Umsted, A. G. Heston, C. B. Barrett, Wm. Chapman, Jr.

Mr. DeWitt Clinton Moore, President, has held his present office for several consecutive years—a just and appreciative tribute to personal worth, energy of purpose, and intellectual merit. His administration has constantly evinced that suaviter in modo and fortiter in re which constitute the veritable germ of successful management. Mr. Moore is a partner in the well-known firm of F. V. Krug & Co., of this city. Mr. John I. Heisler, Vice President, and his colleague in that office, Gilbert Combs, A. M., are also well worthy of the confidence reposed in them. The former has for some years enjoyed the enviable reputation of possessing the richest basso-profondo voice in the city. Not less worthy are the gentlemen who fill the remaining offices of Treasurer, Secretary, Librarian, and the Board of Directors. MICHAEL H. Cross, unquestionably one of the most brilliant concert performers in the country, has been almost unanimously chosen Organist for the ensuing year. This selection has caused the most unqualified satisfaction among the active and honorary members of the Society, and may serve to afford to the outside public an earnest of the future endeavors of the association to confirm its already well-established reputation.

I learn that the "Messiah" is to be placed in active rehearsal immediately, with a chorus which, with the customary accessories, as the season progresses, will probably approximate to the number of two hundred vocalists.

The "Seven Sleepers," Spohr's Letzte Dinge, the

"Creation," and several other grand oratorios are also underlined, as the play-bills have it.

There can be no doubt of the correctness of the course hitherto pursued by the Handel and Haydn Society toward developing a correct musical taste in our community. Its good fruits have been apparent in the marked encouragement and pecuniary reward bestowed upon all the concerts of the Society, which contained classic works of celebrity, such as the "Hymn of Praise," and others. Quite naturally, and in common with other societies, the managers have been compelled to interlard such attempts with lighter works, balladic and operatic; for among their numerous subscribers, as well as among the public, there are vast numbers whose limited musical education has not reached the truly appreciative point.—Still, thanks to the untiring efforts of our musical societies, there is a glorious change, slowly but surely developing itself; the announcement of a "Messiah," or a "Hymn of Praise," howbeit only a few years ago deemed calculated to damn, at the outset, the pecuniary prospects of the daring entrepreneur, now serves to create quite a respectable quota of interest, and serves to do considerable service in the matter of drawing an audience.

The Harmonia Sacred Musical Society has advertised its primary rehearsal for the coming season, for Thursday evening, the 30th inst. I shall endeavor to attend, for the purpose of taking a note or two for your valuable Journal.

A Mr. HOPKINS, son of Bishop Hopkins, of New York, gave an organ concert at the West Arch Presbyterian Church, gratuitously, last week. A large array of connoisseurs assembled to hear him; and as far as I am able to glean, seemed well pleased with his achievements—barring a few mannerisms, and a disposition to take the time of his several performances somewhat too rapidly. MANRICO.

BOSTON, OCT. 2, 1858.

NEW VOLUME.—The present issue commences the Fourteenth Volume of our Journal of Music, and, as the musical season is just opening everywhere, we would suggest this as a good time for those who desire a weekly organ of musical culture, news, and criticism, to subscribe. All the back numbers of the present year can be furnished, and also the back volumes, bound or unbound.

The selections of printed music in each number of the Journal, add much to its value. How much may be seen by a glance at the musical contents of the last six months, as follows:

- MENDELSSOHN—"Hear My Prayer," hymn for Soprano and Chorus. 20 pages.
 " Duet and Chorus, "I waited for the Lord," from "Hymn of Praise." pp. 8.
 " "The Forest Birds," and "Serenade." Four-part Songs. pp. 4.
 " From Lauda Sion: 1, Soprano and Chorus; 2, Quartet. pp. 12.
 MOZART—Ave Verum, for Choir. pp. 2.
 " Selections from Don Giovanni, for Piano. pp. 4.
 " Cantata: "Praise of Friendship." (Chorus and Solos.) pp. 14.
 SCHUBERT—Psalm for two Soprano and two Contralto voices: "The Lord is my shepherd." pp. 10.
 J. S. BACH—Two Chorals. pp. 2.
 BELLINI—Chorus of Villagers, from La Sonnambula. pp. 8.
 R. WAGNER—Chorus of Pilgrims, from Tannhäuser. (Two Tenors and two Basses.) pp. 4.
 GLUCK—Solo and Chorus, from Armida. pp. 4.
 DONIZETTI—Lucrezia Borgia. The entire Opera, arranged for Piano, is in course of publication in this Journal.
 A. JAEHL—Song without Words. (Piano.) pp. 2.

Music for the Public Library.

The directors of the Boston Public Library have secured for that institution an excellent nucleus of a musical department, consisting both of valuable scores and of the literature of music.

One of the last of the good works of the late Prof. Dehn, of the Royal Library in Berlin, was to collect for our library twenty-eight large volumes of manuscript music, in which the best productions of the old Italian masters, Palestrina, Caldara, Allegri, &c., as well as of Orlando Lasso, and others of the Flemish school, are largely represented. Much of it is music which cannot be obtained in print. These volumes are in fact designed to form a good substantial nucleus of such a complete representative historical exhibition of the productions of musical genius, as every great public library ought to contain, and as our city library, following up these good beginnings, doubtless will ere many years contain. We await with eager expectation the arrival of this precious purchase, which does honor to the large and liberal policy of those who have in charge the stocking of our fine new library building. For the first time, in this country, does "Frau Musica," as Luther calls her, bid fair to be duly represented in a library along with her sister Muses.

Besides these MS. scores, quite a full list—two or three hundred volumes—of books relating to music, histories, biographies, scientific and æsthetic treatises, &c., some of which are rare and costly, has been ordered, and in great part already purchased for the library.

The directors have a right view of the matter. What is a library for, if not to aid the student in whatsoever department of science, literature, or art, by placing within his reach the results of all the labors of his predecessors? It has long since been recognized that libraries are bound to do this for the student of law, of theology, of natural history, of mathematics, of mechanics, and why not for the student of music quite as well?

Trovatopera.

Our palmy days of Opera are passed. Grisi, and Mario, and Bosio, and Badiali, and the large companies in which they shone conspicuous, are but remembered splendors. Nothing better, nothing half as good, appears to take their place. The hope of one complete and all-sufficient organization, with its three centres in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, with ample orchestra and chorus, as well as admirable principals, and, above all, with a rich repertoire of the best operas, seems as far from realization as it ever did. All the interest and all the managerial and artistic energy are frittered away in half a dozen little separate, cheap enterprises, which go about with hum-drum repertoires, waging an internecine warfare.—These little companies have pretty much for their whole stock in trade just the three or four articles which they can manufacture cheapest, and which command a tolerably sure market on the strength of some mere fashion of the day. Opera we have not; but we have Trovatore companies, plentiful as mosquitoes, and (literally) piping hot. Trovatore is almost the only opera; it stands for all. To that pitch all the opera companies are screwed up, as if they were so many barrel organs. There are just one or two modulations into closely related keys, called Traviata and Rigoletto, with cheap and common remplissage for the intervening or "off" night, by way of relief, or foil, of two or three of the most familiar and hacknied works of Donizetti or Bellini. This is all that is now meant when we see an Italian opera announced. At least, this is all that Boston gets of it.

We have had one Trovatore troupe for two weeks, singing in English, at the Howard Athenæum. Three successive nights the bill was Trovatore, of which we can say nothing new, except to repeat our wonder at its strange popularity. For, in the first place, its horrible baby-burning plot is disgusting and absurd,—the more glaringly so when sung in English. In the next place, there is not a real, a natural, an interesting character in it; the persons are all puppets, leaving no impression beyond the action of the moment; as impersonations of passion they are as coarse as the dullest caricatures in the cheapest wood-cuts. Then again, sentiment, anything that can be called such, is utterly wanting in the opera, as a whole, with only here and there a maudlin reminiscence in a strain or two. The music is accordingly; if there is an ingenious melody, it may please, but it does not speak to you, sing to you, as the native and intrinsic music of a sweet soul or character, as does the music of Mozart's Zerlina. It is music everywhere straining for effect, and sometimes producing it, externally, superficially, but not internally or deeply. It is not pathos, but a coarse imitation of its most conventional and common forms. It lacks all fine and subtle touches. It says more than it means or feels. It is not the music of fine natures; it is not refining or elevating in its tendency. The sphere of life or sentiment into which it strains itself so spasmodically to transport you, is fortunately a very unreal one, or it would be a bad one. It is therefore not strange that the general impression of the Trovatore, as a musical whole, is distracting and unedifying. This music lacks the sovereign quality of geniality; it is mechanical; it relies upon dynamic means, and knows not the true secret, the true key to open human hearts. Its appeal is really to something else than heart or soul; to those who seek excitement, recklessly, for mere excitement's sake, and not to those who live sincerely and in earnest. Plot and music, all together, make up a wearisome glaring picture of a strangely monotonous, burnt-out, brick-dust hue. No, this is tragedy too fierce to be tragic; this is passion too demonstrative to be genuine; this is music too effective to be genial or expressive. Aod yet the Trovatore is popular!

As to the performance, Miss MILNER manages her clear soprano finely and looks charmingly; Dr. GUILMETTE gives a carefully studied, finished rendering of his music, while his voice is rich and manly. The tenor, Mr. MIRANDA, has considerable power and sweetness, but strains his voice in high passages, or takes refuge in a puny falsetto. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN uses well a fine bass in his secondary part, and bears (as a contemporary says) the principal burden of the chorus, which for the rest is miserable enough. The orchestra is better than last week, and Mr. COOPER shows admirable powers as a conductor, which are evidently taxed to their utmost in holding together so uncertain an ensemble.

Next week another Trovatore troupe, under the auspices of STRAKOSCH, are to sing at the Boston Theatre, for four nights only. They will begin with Traviata and end with Trovatore, the alternations being Lucrezia Borgia and Fille du Régiment. Mme. COLSON, new to us, admired in New Orleans and New York, is to be the prima donna in the first and last named pieces. GAZSANIGA, the charming, does not come, (we would give much to hear her once more in the sparkling and genial music of L'Elisir d'amore); instead of her we have the muscular PARODI, whose Lucrezia will be bold and masculine enough. BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, &c., will of course be welcomed.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY announce their first rehearsal for the season at the Messrs. Chickering's rooms, for to-morrow evening. Here is at last a hope of some good music. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB are pretty sure to follow; but they commence their season with a concert tour in the north, and possibly also in the west, before they settle down upon their regular series of Chamber Concerts at home. All true lovers of good music are impatient for them. . . . Mr. JULIAS EICHBERG, the accomplished classical musician and violinist, of whom we have before spoken, is to succeed Mr. ECKHARD as director of the music at the Boston Museum. Boston will thereby gain a high-toned excellent musician. Of Mr. Eckhard's future movements we are not informed, but hope that we are not to lose him. . . . There is to be a performance of the "Creation" at the Music Hall to-morrow evening by Mr. COOPER's English Opera Troupe. . . . "KARL FORMES' Grand Mammoth Concerts and Oratorios" are announced in Cincinnati with all the eloquence of Ullman. . . . The Maretzek Opera troupe in New York, have put aside burnt babies, Trovatores, &c., this week, and actually given a true work of genius, "William Tell," with much éclat.

Among the passengers of the ill-fated "Austria" were several highly respected German musicians, residing in this country, who were returning from their summer visit to their old homes in Vaterland. Mr. THEODORE EISFELD, the popular conductor of the New York Philharmonic Concerts, about whom there was much anxiety, is happily in the list of those who were saved and taken on board the French ship Maurice. Mr. Eisfeld is of a nervous temperament and his physical powers for some years have not been overstrong, since his severe illness; it is to be hoped that he will have safely borne the exposure and excitement of this terrible experience. We doubt not he will meet with a right warm welcome at the first "Philharmonic" at which he makes his appearance. Mr. THORNECKE, a distinguished classical pianist of Philadelphia, is, it is feared, among the lost. The Bulletin speaks of him as "an efficient and popular teacher. He was a native of Hanover, and aged about forty-five years. He came to this city fifteen or twenty years ago, a poor young man. By great perseverance he had become most successful in his profession. He was married to a daughter of J. N. Scherr, Esq., of this city, and they have several young children. He went with his family to Europe last spring. He left them in Germany, when he started to return on the Austria, intending to continue at his business another season, and then to retire and live on his ample means in his native land. Mr. Thorbecke was very highly esteemed among his acquaintances and stood high in the musical profession."

The same journal says: "Mr. G. KUNZ, another Philadelphian, and also a teacher of music, is known to have been on board the Austria, although his name does not appear in the foregoing list. He also was a native of Germany. He resided in West Philadelphia, where he was held in high estimation." Our own townsman, Mr. ADOLPH KIELBLOCH, had also intended to return by the Austria, but his stay has been prolonged a few weeks by the providential event of taking unto himself a German wife.

The musical Convention at Worcester, Mass., under the direction of Messrs. HAMILTON & BAKER was to close last evening with a concert at Mechanics Hall, consisting of Mr. Baker's Cantata: "The Burning Ship," (painfully apropos just now), selections from "The Sanctus," choruses from the "Messiah," "Creation," &c.

Mario, the singer, has written to one of his Paris friends, complaining of the dearth of everything in that capital. He says: "I received only $23,000 for singing at the Italian opera last season, and my expenses were $35,000." Poor Mario!

(Crowded out last week.)

THE MUSIC ON THE COMMON.—In commemoration of the foundation of the city, a monster brass band Concert was given on the Common, Sept. 17. The windward position which we took, to avoid the smell of "villainous saltpetre," had an unfortunate effect upon the music, so that we borrow the account of the Courier:

"The concert on the Common, Friday afternoon, under the direction of Mr. B. A. Burditt, was attended by probably as many as twenty thousand people. The Brigade, Brass, Germania, and Metropolitan Bands, numbering seventy-two performers, furnished the music in concert. They occupied a temporary platform between the two hills, the people occupying the sides of the hills and a large portion of the tract between the hills. The platform was decorated with the American, English, French, and other national flags. The programme commenced with Yankee Doodle, with cannon accompaniment, the guns of the Light Artillery furnishing the sounds explosive. The effect of the guns was novel, rather than harmonious; the cannon is a brass instrument which is yet hardly needed in orchestras. We have heard John Phoenix, alias Squibob, tell of "the soft note of the pistol," but we have never heard any one tell of delicious warblings from the brass throat of a cannon. However, if the audience were pleased, and they appeared to be, we shall not complain. Novelty always excites interest. Thousands look up nightly at Donati's comet and reflect in awe upon the wonders of the heavens, but the glorious beauty of sun, moon, and stars has never excited them to any such feeling. But to recur to the concert. The selections of music comprised a variety of national and patriotic airs, which were frequently applauded by the immenso audience. "God save the Queen" was played twice with the assistance of Capt. Nims's Artillery, and "Hail Columbia" was played once."

Music Abroad.

BERLIN.—At a grand entertainment given at the Palace in honor of Her Majesty Queen Victoria's visit, the Dom choir performed some of their vocal pieces before the Royal party. M. De Bulow also played several pianoforte solos.

VIENNA.—The Thalia Theater, at Vienna (one of the minor establishments of that capital), has been producing an opera, The Orphan, by Herr Stolz. The principal musical work performed at the great concert at Baden, on the 27th of August, was the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of M. Berlioz. We observe with pleasure that the local societies of the smaller towns in Germany are beginning to bestir themselves towards the completion of the Handel monument, by giving concerts. Samson is going to be forthwith produced with this intention in the picturesque old town of Halberstadt, where (by way of further invitation to any autumn tourist in want of a halting place) are churches well worth seeing, and in one of these is an organ well worth hearing,—a town moreover, on the hem of the Hartz country.

ITALY.—The Italian journals announce the production of two new operas. The most important is that of Ferrari—Il Matrimonio per Concorso—the powerful rôles of which were confided to Madame Boccabadati, Crivelli, and Zucchini. It does not appear that any great success attended the opera. At the San Carlo of Naples, Maestro Miceli produced an opera called La Fidanzata, also accompanied with doubtful success. We continue to look in vain for any new composer likely to add any work of real merit to the musical library of the Italian lyrical drama. Verdi is said to have a couple of new operas in his portfolio, but no one knows when they will be produced.

LEEDS FESTIVAL.—The third in order of the great English musical festivals of this year commenced on Tuesday, Sept. 7th, in the new town hall. We copy from the Musical Gazette:

The Great Hall is one of the largest of the kind in the kingdom, exceeding in size the Town Hall at Birmingham, Exeter Hall, and St. James's Hall, in London. Its dimensions are 162 feet by 72 feet, and 75 feet in height. It has a semicircular ceiling, divided into five bays or compartments, by massive ribs, which are supported at the sides of the Hall by coupled Corinthian columns and pilasters. It is lighted by ten fanlights (stained glass), immediately above these columns: they are filled with beautifully coloured glass, giving a very brilliant, but yet subdued effect to the architecture.

The north end of the Hall is occupied by the orchestra. At the south end is a glass screen, separating the Hall from the vestibule, or principal entrance. The vestibule is in fact the lower part of the tower, and is upwards of 70 feet in height, and 48 feet square. The floor is covered with a tessellated pavement. In the centre is a statue of Her Majesty the Queen, in white marble, which, with its polished granite pedestal, stands 18 feet high.

The performance of Elijah, with which the festival opened on Wednesday morning, was one of the finest in every respect, if not the finest, that has taken place in this country. Assuredly such a choir has never been assembled, and never have the magnificent and varied choruses, with which the work abounds, been given with such delicacy or force—according to their requirements—to say nothing of the precision with which they were sung, and the perfect intonation throughout.

Constantly did we expect to hear the little unpleasantnesses with which we are regaled when Elijah is done at Exeter Hall,—the foggy D sharp for the sopranos at the end of the choral recitative, the ditto ditto at the end of the minor portion of the "earthquake" chorus, for instance,—but no more constantly did we expect them than we were disappointed; everything was in tune. Then, the gigantic volume of tone in the more massive of the choruses, the towering ferocity of "Woe to him," the delicacy of "He watching over Israel," the buoyancy of "After the fire," the grandeur of the "Holy, holy," and "But the Lord," which last was given with the most unusually grand effect; our goodness! it was a performance. The principals on this memorable occasion were Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Helena Walker, Miss Palmer, Miss Freeman, Miss Crossland, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Inkersall, Mr. Standley, Mr. Hincliffe, and Mr.

Weiss. Miss Dolby was announced, but an apology was tendered for her absence on the score of indisposition, and Miss Palmer undertook to sing the music which had been assigned to her. This promising artist acquitted herself extremely well in everything but the part of Jezabel, for which she is not physically qualified. Miss Palmer's reading thereof was sufficiently energetic and dramatic, but this only served to betray a want of power which renders this peculiar music unsuitable to her. In "Woe unto them that forsake Him," Miss Palmer was everything that could be desired, also in "O rest in the Lord," with the exception of an unjustifiable suspension just before the resumption of the melody, or, rather, the return to the key of C. The young lady thought to produce a little effect by hanging on the G at the last syllable of the word "patiently;"—she succeeded, but it was an unpleasant one. There is scarcely anything to particularize amongst the other pieces allotted to the principals. We must, however, record that the performance of "Lift thine eyes," by Madame Novello, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Palmer, was the best to which we ever listened; that the quartet, "O come ev'ry one that thirsteth," was especially well sung by Mrs. Weiss, Miss Palmer, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Standley; that Mrs. Weiss distinguished herself in the short recitative, "Behold, God hath sent Elijah the prophet;" that Madame Novello has got into a most objectionable habit of saying (or singing) Israel in the grand air which opens the second part of the oratorio; and that Miss Helena Walker gave evidence of a very pleasing voice and good method in the duet, "Zion spreadeth," albeit she had the disadvantage of a not overrefined second in Miss Crossland.

Dr. Bennett's reading of the work was in nearly every respect unexceptionable. The overture was hurried a little too much towards the close, or rather the point in which it leads into the chorus, "Help, Lord," which, by the way, was also a shade too fast; "He watching over Israel" was also open to the same objection, with the further disadvantage of a rallentando towards the close, which should never be allowed. The last of the Baal choruses might have been quickened with advantage, as also "Is not his word;" but everything else was what the most fastidious person would have desired.

This performance set all doubt at rest as to the adaptation of the Hall for musical purposes. The sound was beautifully distributed, and the combined power of hand, chorus, and organ (the latter of itself no trifle) was never oppressive, while the softest passages for any voice or instrument were distinctly and equally audible throughout the room. The absence of side galleries is a point in favour of this distribution, while the improvement, as regards appearance, is unquestionably great. We say improvement, because we believe there is no building of the kind in England that does not labour under this disfigurement. There was a very large attendance, and the prospects of the first Leeds festival were decidedly encouraging.

The evening concert was yet more fully attended, and the display of our favourite plant, the pulchra puella splendens, which was very poorly represented at the inauguration, was abundant. The first thing on the programme was Mozart's symphony in C (not the Jupiter), which was admirably played, but did not meet with a cordial reception. We did not quite approve the choice. To enlist the attention of the audience at a first evening concert, the E flat symphony would have been far better. Mrs. Weiss followed with the same composer's "Dove song," a very chaste and careful performance,—and Mr. Santley gave a tolerable version of a weak dirge from Rossini's Moimetto. The other vocal solos in the first part were Rode's air with variations (exquisitely sung by Albani and encored), "Robert, toi que j'aime" (sung with plentiful and very ineffective departure from the text by Madame Novello, the merit of the performance being left to Mr. Nicholson's delicious corno inglese and Mr. Trust's harp), and the grand tenor scena from Oberon, sung by Mr. Sims Reeves. Miss Dolby was to have given a song by Duggan, but she was still obliged to keep house, to the great disappointment of her admirers and the audience generally. Miss Palmer and Mr. Santley sang the greater part of a long and somewhat tedious duet from Donizetti's Pia di Prolomei remarkably well, and the choir distinguished themselves in Mr. Henry Smart's "Spring" part-song and Hatten's "Ah could I with fancy stray." Of the former we have already remarked that it is unpleasantly reminiscent of Mendelssohn, though certainly very charming. The latter is rubbish. A man of Hatten's talent ought not to have allowed such a morsel to go into print. Mendelssohn's first pianoforte Concerto was played by Miss Arabella Goddard in her usual manner; that is to say, the first and last movements were taken at "high pressure," whereby many a passage was rendered indistinctly audible, and the andante was played to perfection in every way.

It is not exaggerating to assert that, whatsoever be the musical capacity, fastidiousness, or fatigue of the listener—let him have run the gauntlet even of singing, playing, or hearing—through so tremendous a London season as the one just over has been, there is an over-ruling "spirit and vivacity" (to quote quaint Lady Strange) about a Birmingham Festival which is to be found nowhere else in England—a completeness in execution and organization—in the manners as well as the music of the meeting—which will compel his enjoyment. In certain points of selection we are at issue with the managers. They make too little of the Birmingham organ, and "too nothing" of solo instrumental music. It would be invidious to point out where we fancy the pruning-knife might have been applied to the list of vocal engagements for 1858,—but this could have been judiciously done so as to "make play" for Miss Goddard, or Herr Joachim, M. Halle, or M. Sainon, or Signor Piatti. A local audience, we know, is ill to deal with; but it may, and should, be led; and the Birmingham management is strong enough to lead it and sagacious enough to do so without vexatious pedantry. Every three years, we may remark, in all its musical provisions, a greater regard for the general excellence and interest of the music produced than for the fashions of the hour, whatever those may be. This year it has further shown its liberality, by affording to an English composer such an opportunity as English composer was never before indulged with. We shall be glad, three years hence,—and so, we believe, will be the audience, now trained so highly,—to have some retrenchment of ballads and opera-music from the concert-schemes, in favour of a nightly Concerto. We now proceed to offer a note or two on the performances of the several days. The first part of 'Elijah,' brilliantly as it went off, gave occasion for comment and caution. It would be a pity should the perfect acquaintance of every one concerned with that magnificent work,—the splendour of such an orchestra and chorus as was collected at Birmingham (this year more splendid than ever), and the admirable disciplinal power of the conductor,—lead to the execution, on every repetition of the oratorio, being overdone. Yet something of the sort was the case on Tuesday. With a view, possibly, of exceeding the memorable performance of 1855, the majority of the choruses were taken at tempo so much too rapid, as just that much to deprive them of due effect. A superabundance of spirit (which, however, is a fault on the right side, our sluggish national taste and temperament especially considered), may produce results resembling fever or levity. There is neither the one nor the other in Mendelssohn's music anywhere. The performance of the second act was far finer. The singers, one and all, did their best; but Mr. Weiss, the Elijah, would be wise were he to give his voice a little rest, if he means it to retain its once fine tone for a few years to come.

In the miscellaneous act of the first evening concert, among the items claiming remark was, Miss Balfe's singing of Pacini's cavatina, "Il soave e bel contento," as a piece of execution superfluously and indiscreetly elaborate. Signor Tamberlik gained honours, in the War Hymn from 'Le Prophete.' Madame Viardot was in her fullest force in the scene "O mon Fernand," from 'La Favorita.' The Overture to 'Le Siege de Corinthe' (Signor Rossini's best overture) was magnificently played. The cardinal attraction of the evening, however, was Handel's delicious Serenata, 'Acis and Galatea.' We have now (referring to what was said a fortnight ago) to speak in high praise of Signor Costa's additions to the score. Those by Mozart—it was pertinently observed in the book of the words—are too delicate for a force so large as the five hundred players and singers at Birmingham. These by Signor Costa are enriching and supporting—nowhere intrusive, in nowise contradictory of the design, but completing it for performance on a scale of which its maker never dreamed. We should enjoy to hear 'Acis' given, as it may have been originally, with a small and sweet chorus, and a player at the pianoforte as able as Handel to fill the gaps and to cover the nakednesses of the score; but Handel (as we said on the occasion of the Sydenham Festival) is elastic. His outlines are so grand, his designs are so clear, his colours are so pure, that his creations will bear a magnifying as well as a diminishing glass, and 'Acis,' as was proved at Birmingham, is capable of being presented on a grand scale, so as to excite great interest. The choruses went superbly, and the singers were up to the mark of the choruses. In better hands the solos could not have been placed. Mr. Sims Reeves is peculiarly excellent in "Love sounds the alarm,"—no one in our memory having sung the tenor bravuras of Handel so well as he. Madame Novello gave "Heart, thou seat of soft delight," deliciously, and Signor Belletti was a Polyphemus, at once as agile and brutal, but without a tinge of coarseness, as it is possible to imagine. The skill with which this great vocalist gets the utmost out of his voice without ever forcing it, should be taken as a lesson by every singer who hears him. Mr. Montem Smith, the best second tenor of our acquaintance, was steady and efficient as Damon.

The repetition of 'Eli' on Wednesday morning, was in all respects satisfactory, and confirmed every opinion conceived of the genuine qualities of the oratorio, as music alike sterling and characteristic, without strain or eccentricity. Some portions were better wrought out than they were three years ago—among them, the Chorus of the Revellers in the Temple. The concerted music was excellently ripe and finished. Most welcome, too, was the exchange of Herr Formes for Signor Belletti. Though the part of Eli lies too low for the Italian artist's voice, he is so consummately an artist, that not a note nor phrase was overlooked in which there was any possibility of his making a legitimate effect. The execution was as complete as the conception was dignified. The oratorio seemed to please more even than it did on its first performance, and this, not only in those simpler portions which have already become household music, but in its more complicated numbers.

Wednesday's concert was less interesting than its predecessor: inasmuch as it was more miscellaneous. Among the choice things in it were Rossini's Overture to 'Guillaume Tell,' played incomparably,—Madame Viardot's rondo from 'L'Italiana.' This lady has been singing throughout the week as she has never before sung in England, with a uniform force, evenness, and expressive grandeur of style and variety of fancy, which during former visits never failed to be indicated, but, sometimes, were but incompletely exhibited. Miss Balfe, too, sang better than on the Tuesday: but execution so profuse as hers demands regulation. Among the novelties were Mendelssohn's Cantata, 'To the Sons of Art,' for male quartet, male chorus, and brass instruments. This we like less than most of his late compositions; and the right effect of it was lost, inasmuch as a chorus of two thousand singers is bound together by the brass instruments which accompany it,—whereas a chorus of two hundred is out-brayed by them. Mr. Sloper's duet 'Old Memories,' produced at his Concert, has been since scored by him, and proves more effective with orchestra than with pianoforte accompaniment.

We must reserve, for another week, our notes on the remainder of the Festival performances, adding merely a miscellaneous remark or two. This year's Birmingham Festival will probably prove the most productive in point of musical receipts which has till now been held in the town. For Thursday's 'Messiah' every ticket was disposed of by Monday, and some days earlier an announcement was put forth that owing to the run without precedent on guinea admissions to that Oratorio, it was found necessary to do away with all the half-guinea, or unreserved seats. The audience on such occasions it does the heart good to observe. Its sincere enjoyment and appreciation of twenty-three days' work by a battered man aged fifty-nine, who did some hundred years ago, but whose "name liveth for evermore," have something in them ennobling and inspiring. They should act as a spur to every one with a spark of poetry in his soul who thinks of his art rather than of its immediate results.—Probably a larger number of healthy, intelligent, open faces and well-grown forms could be found in no other assemblage. We were struck more than ever this year by the comeliness of the inhabitants of this comely midland county—for comely is Warwickshire, in spite of the forges, chimneys, and cinder-heaps, which here and there blot the fair face of Nature by bringing up treasures from its depths. We were struck the more with this, it may be, because a late Festival experience tempted us to comparison. Not long since [Athen. No. 1596] we registered the impressions during a rapid flight across Belgium into the Rhineland for the Whitsuntide Festival at Cologne. The Rhinelander would have no reason to complain of a route less picturesque and characteristic than that one if, after reaching London (perhaps by the Thames) he took Windsor, Oxford, Compton (with its old house), Warwick and Kenilworth Castles, on his way to our greatest English Festival. He must, however, we fear, find something to envy in such a general musical excellence and (latterly) earnestness of execution as a Birmingham music-meeting affords him.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal Music.

Snowball Song. Franz Abt. 25

The second juvenile song of the "Spring of Life" series, the first of which has deservedly found so many admirers. Boys' sport is treated with quaint drollery, like men's serious conflict on the battle-field. The music is thoroughly martial and highly animated, yet simple and child-like.

Where Hast Thou Gone, my Mother? Song. L. W. Ballard. 25

A little sentimental ballad, neat and pleasing.

The Husking of the Corn. Song. H. H. Hawley. 25

A Plantation Song, which has all the appearance of genuineness.

Vocal, with Guitar Accompaniment.

Gentle Nettie Moore, or Little White Cottage. Arranged by Bishop. 25

Nellie Gray. Arranged by C. J. Dorn. 25
A Guitar Arrangement of these two favorite Ballads has long been asked for, and will be eagerly bought by many.

Instrumental Music.

The National Orchestra. A collection of Polkas, Quadrilles, Airs, &c., arranged for small orchestras or string bands. In numbers, each 50

No. 1.—Do They Miss Me at Home? and, Thou art Gone from my Gaze.

No. 2.—Lilly Dale, and Katy Darling.

Amateur clubs, quadrille and other small bands, will find this a very useful collection. The arrangement is for five or six instruments, including two violins, flute, clarinet, cornet and bass. A few additional parts, if wanted, can easily be added.

Martha Waltz. (On Melodies from Flotow's Opera.) Burgmüller. 50

It is well known that in serving up the gems of a good opera, in the form of an elegant and pleasing Waltz, highly acceptable to all lovers of the brightest jewels among the light literature of the day, Burgmüller has not his equal. This set of "Martha Waltzes" is one of his best. Moderately difficult.

Books.

A COLLECTION OF CATHEDRAL CHANTS; including the Gregorian Tones. Adapted to the Canticles and Occasional Services of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Also, Services for the Holy Communion and the Burial of the Dead. With an easy Morning Service in E, consisting of Te Deum and Benedictus. By S. Parkman Tuckerman, Mus. Doc. $2.50

This valuable work, which has been for some time in preparation, is now ready, and will be found superior to anything of the kind heretofore issued. The system of Chanting adopted in it, though new to a majority of our Choirs, has been in daily practice in the English Cathedrals for more than a century, and its evident superiority to the many faulty and objectionable methods in use in this country, will, it is hoped, be apparent to the American church. A full description of this system will be found in the Explanatory Preface. This work also contains the Canticles of the English Prayer Book, thus rendering it available in the Canadas and British Provinces of North America.

A separate Book of Words accompanies this Collection, thus enabling Choirs to adapt such Chants to the Canticles as they prefer, instead of conforming, in all cases, to the selections made by the author.

The Diarist Abroad.

II.—A FORTNIGHT IN LONDON.

BERLIN, SEPTEMBER 1, 1858.

"And how did you amuse yourself in the great city?"

In a variety of ways, some of which offer matter for a few notes. Let me begin with an attempt at a picture of our two weeks' home.

Imagine 80 or 100 acres of water held in place by a huge dyke, so that its level is ten or twelve feet above the broad fertile meadows, which spread away to the north and east like a prairie, with here and there a house, a village, roads and railways traversing it in all directions, and herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, giving them life. Into this basin project from the northerly side several wharves, at one of which the Athena lies.

Come up to the mast head with me. In the dock comparatively few vessels, perhaps not more than seventy-five or a hundred, so that the large basin gives one no idea of being hived and stifled as would be the case in any of the older docks in the city. As we look from our lofty position the view is one, which repays us well for coming back from the city before nightfall, and we really have no desire to leave our cool airy "home" for the close quarters of a city hotel.

North we have the meadows, bounded in the distance by low ridges of pleasant looking hills. Eastwardly we have the river winding along to the sea. Just where the entrance to our dock lies, the river makes a sharp angle. We follow it with our eye a mile or two down the stream, and there is Woolwich, with its immense arsenals, and, just beyond, Gravesend.

Both towns run up to the top of a ridge of hills, beautiful with gardens, groves, and fine residences. We follow this ridge westerly, and, hardly separated from the outskirts of Woolwich, the eye rests upon Greenwich Park, below which, at another bend of the river, rise the domes of Greenwich Hospital. Beyond Greenwich a lovely country opens to the eye, rising gradually, until at its highest point — can it be more than six or seven miles away? — we see the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, brilliantly lighted by the setting sun.

Directly west of us, a mile away, rise the masts and chimneys of the dock at Blackwall. Beyond these, forests of masts and wildernesses of houses, away, until a never-lifting cloud of smoke limits vision. There lies London. Morning and evening we are where all is still and calm — in the day we are drops tossing about in the ocean of human life beneath that cloud.

From our dock and Blackwall we are in communication with a net of railroads, which lies like a huge spider's web all along the east and north of the city. We take one of the early trains, or we go to the Blackwall dock and take a steamboat, and in half an hour by railroad or an hour by boat, are in the heart of London.

Broadway, blocked by traffic and omnibusses, is a sight — here are fifty Broadways! You know how small Boston seems after you have spent some time in New York. We rode around, and through and across London, by steam, by omnibus, by boat; we walked miles upon miles, and the city continually grew and extended itself to our imaginations. We looked down upon it from St. Paul's and from Primrose hill; and by degrees became able to comprehend its extent; and now New York and Brooklyn are to London, what Boston is to them. It impressed me more than I expected — my reminiscences of a former visit had left my imagination below the reality. Huge as it is, London has not reached her full growth. The architect and builder are adding street and square and terrace to street, square and terrace. Places that, eight years ago, I remember as open fields with cows and sheep, are filled with dwellings. Two great enterprises already begun in 1851 — the clearing away of the filthy, miserable quarter near Westminster Abbey, and a similar operation in the heart of the old city — seem to have come to a still-stand. But around the city the growth is marvellous.

But what is all this for a "paper of Art and Literature?" One day — pity but one — we intended to make it two or three — we spent at Sydenham. There are no words that can be used to describe it. Are you interested in any science or art — go there and study. No, it is useless to endeavor to speak of any particular attractions, — architectural, sculptural, archaeological, historical, botanical, zoological, — and the whole list of —cals and —logicals. I should like, however, to move that room from the Alhambra to America — or, would I not, on the whole, choose that Pompeian house? Either would do. There was music from an orchestra, and also upon the organ. The orchestra music was of the lightest character; the organist gave the following programme:

Coronation Anthem; Handel.
"In native worth"; Haydn.
March from "Eli"; Costa.
Selections from "Freyschutz"; Weber.
Airs Extempore.
Wedding March; Mendelssohn.

A fine performance — organ large, but not strikingly fine.

To the National Gallery, two days, where, in spite of Ruskin, I enjoyed Claude, and where I felt the greatness of Turner in certain of his works. I lingered long in the Turner collection; in some of the rooms, not because the pictures gave me pleasure, but to see if I could find out their great excellence. Those last pictures, with their dim outlines, but gorgeous dashes of color, affected me precisely like the "music of the future." I neither believe in mere orchestral effects, where no theme can be followed, nor in dazzling colors, where the draughtsman's share in the work is undistinguishable. What beautiful pictures are some of those by Gainsborough!

Of course Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's were points of special pilgrimage. Two or three times, daily, regular service is performed, and in both temples we heard it several times. On the first and second hearing, naturally enough, we felt more its novelty than its legitimate end; not more so, however, than the novelty of the ordinary Episcopal service, when, years ago, I first heard it.

Imagine yourself in the Abbey. You have been walking round and seeking those monuments and tablets, which for the American or the music-lover have peculiar interest. High up on the wall of the northern aisle you found a female figure in a mourning posture, and read: "The Province of Massachusetts Bay, in New England, by an order of the Great and General Court, bearing date February 1, 1759, caused this monument to be erected to the memory of George, Lord Viscount Howe," &c., and your thoughts went back to the "Old French War," and the march to Ticonderoga.

Another monument, a sarcophagus, with small figures in alto relievo, representing a flag of truce presenting a letter to Washington, carried your thoughts to the gloomy days of Arnold's treason, for this is to the memory of André; and you could not but contrast this care for the English spy's fame, with the neglect with which the memory of that young and far nobler martyr, Nathan Hale, has been treated on our side.

Sir Cloudesly de Shovel, in full flowing wig, and dressed like a beau of Queen Anne's time, recalled the Spectator's sharp criticism, and you lived over again the hours devoted to Addison in your younger years. On the opposite side of the building you have lingered a few minutes by the monuments and tablets of Dr. John Blow, the old organist, (and hummed over the Gloria Patri, a canon in four parts, sculptured there); of Dr. Croft, so many of whose hymn tunes and anthems you have sung at home; of Dr. Burney, whose History had so often made you weary and left you unsatisfied; and of that famous man in his day, of whom you read on yonder column:

"Here lies Henry Purcell, who left this life, and is gone to that blessed place, where only his harmony can be exceeded."

You have lingered before the reclining figure of Sir Isaac Newton, and the thin face, worn with thought, the strong and expressive head, have made you feel in the presence of a god-like intellectual power. You have glanced at the long array of monuments, statues, effigies, and tablets, to jurists, naval and military commanders, courtiers, men and women of mark and of no mark, erected here from every conceivable motive — have gone through the chapels where so many of England's sovereigns lie, Henry III., Henry V., (his sword, shield, and saddle, those of Agincourt, the guide tells you), Edward I. and III., Queen Philippa — and you remember the story of the six citizens of Calais — Richard II., Henry VII. — the Richmond of Richard III. — Elizabeth, and and her victim, Mary of Scotland, and so on, to the number of thirteen — and are again lingering in that divine spot of earth's surface, the Poets' Corner. "Oh rare Ben Jonson," there he is in marble high up the wall, and that is the only inscription. There is the pale, intellectual, but sadly touching face of John Milton. Chaucer and Spenser are here commemorated; farther up the transept, Dryden's bust stands out most conspicuously. The poets' corner is divided by a wall; those I have mentioned you see as you enter the door; on the other side the wall, lighted by the huge stained window, are Shakspeare, with that passage from the Tempest,

"The cloud capped towers, the gorgeous palaces," &c.;

Handel,

"I know that my Redeemer liveth;"

Gay,

"Life is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, but now I know it;"

Goldsmith, over the door, with a long Latin inscription; Addison, Campbell, Southey, Rowe, and many, many more.

And now one of the Vergers, in long black gown, comes to you and says that the hour of service is near, during which visitors — and rightly, too — are not allowed to be rambling about the edifice. If we wish to stop during the service we can find seats anywhere.

That part of the floor at the intersection of the nave and transepts is railed off with iron gates, and fitted up, as are also portions of the transepts, with seats; running down some fifty into the nave, on each side, are the stalls for a choir of priests, beyond which is a massive gothic screen across the nave, on either side of which rises the organ. We take seats within the railing and, while waiting for the service to begin, our eyes wander round the glorious old edifice, now resting upon the fine stained window, now peering up into the lofty vaultings, now turning down the long vista of the nave, or up toward the ancient chancel. We feel that Milton needed but to come here from Scotland yard, to find that "dim religious light" of which he speaks, for we too feel its influence; and altogether, we are in that frame of mind, that peculiar state of feeling, when we are most open to the poetic phase of the religious sentiment, if nothing deeper and better. Now through the passage under the screen and organ comes the choir, which is to intone and chant the service, its members, men and boys, dressed in white surplices. They come reverently in, dividing into two lines, one turning to the right, the other to the left, six boys taking their places on each side in front, and the men, tenors and basses, six or eight in number, stepping into the stalls behind them. A moment all bow themselves and cover their faces; the service books are opened, and a man's voice intones, that is, reads distinctly and clearly to a certain pitch, the opening sentences of the usual Episcopal service. It is not loud, yet every syllable is distinctly heard, and this recalls to your mind that principle of acoustics, which you learned years ago in "Pierce on Sound," that a musical tone penetrates much farther than a mere noise, though the latter be far the louder; thus you are led by the simplest induction to see how the intoning of the religious service, as it exists to this day in the Catholic church and in the Episcopal Cathedral, arose from the necessity of the case; a beautiful but simple means of overcoming the difficulty of a single voice making itself audible, through a long service, in the vast spaces of a cathedral, especially upon festivals, when the worshippers should be numbered by thousands. Here, or in St. Paul's, you feel how appropriate, how indispensable, is this form of worship, and, by contrast, how unnecessary, almost ridiculous, to introduce it in small parish churches, where words spoken in ordinary tones are distinctly heard in every part.

The order of daily service in the English and American Episcopal churches differs in nothing material — ours is a little shortened — and the performance of the service here in the Abbey differs in nothing from ours save that everything, — prayer, praise, psalms, responses, — except the lessons of the day, which are read, — are either intoned or chanted.

There is no musical display, whatever — no opening for any — except in the Te Deum, Gloria Patri, and the Anthem. After a few hearings, you begin to feel the limitations under which the English composers have written their services. Long passages of monotone, unassisted by the organ, broken here and there by chord responses, where chords may be used, form the greater part of the service; and, so far, are the only musical resources at their command. All this must be treated in the simplest manner; any attempt at musical effect, as such, is out of place. Changes of key, within a limited range, are allowable and necessary, and the art of the composer can only be shown in so using them as to add to the solemnity and dignity of the noble old English text of the service. More of musical effect may be sought in the chants, but here, as we all know, there is but little scope for the composer, and in one of these regular services they must be written to suit and correspond with the rest. When the choir and organ burst into the Te Deum, then for a moment the composer is freed in great measure from his trammels; but not until after the second lesson, near the close of the service, has he an opportunity to avail himself of the full resources of his art and science, in so far as this is possible with the organ and a choir in which boys sing the treble and alto.

There is a pause in the service. The auditor, who has attentively followed it thus far, needs something to vary its uniform course, and at this point, those who prepared the ritual have wisely introduced the Anthem.

One of the choir rises in his place and announces: "The anthem for the day is found in the book of Job, the 28th chapter, and 20th verse, 'Whence cometh Wisdom?' " or wherever it may be.

The chanting did not strike us as good — there was too little care taken to chant together — but the singing of the anthems was, in every case, fine, and seldom have we — myself and "John," a young organist — more thoroughly enjoyed pieces of sacred music than those thus heard. After the anthem, a few collects, intoned as before, and the responsive Amen in chords, close the service.

To me there is something very solemn, touching and appropriate in this English cathedral music, or rather, service, thus heard, and should the time ever come that the Episcopalians of Boston be moved to erect a church of really noble dimensions, then and there I should hope to find it again.

We had another and unexpected musical enjoyment; one, too, in very great contrast to that of which I have been writing. The following notice caught my eye in one of the penny papers:

ST. GEORGE'S CATHEDRAL, SOUTHWARK. NEXT SUNDAY (the 15th inst.) being the Festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, there will be SOLEMN

To tell how we "next Sunday" went up to the city, crossed over to Southwark, and were misdirected, over and over again, by policemen and others, who seemed utterly in ignorance of the existence of St. George's Cathedral, and how we heated ourselves to boiling point, and were cooled by a shower, but did, finally, from the doorkeeper of another Catholic church, get a direction which finally brought us to the place in season for the service — to tell all this would be a waste of time.

We did not expect much, as the organ loft filled with choir and orchestra, and we saw that the trebles and altos were boys. We were the more pleased, therefore, at hearing Hummel's fine mass really finely given, and when the preacher announced that on Thursday the funeral services of somebody or other would be held in that house, and Mozart's Requiem sung, the first thought was, I hope the Athena will not get off until Friday!

Happily she did not, and on Thursday we were early at the church. I have heard the Requiem under a variety of circumstances, as a concert-piece by hundreds of singers, and by small societies; as a mere mass for an individual, who had died far away; and now at last as a part of the funeral services, with the coffin in front of the high altar, surrounded with candles, ornamented with crucifixes, and black trimmings and drapery hanging about the chancel. The forms of the church have long since lost all novelty for me, and I find no difficulty — nay, I involuntarily for the time being, fall into a mood sympathetic with those about me. Hence I sat not as a critical auditor, as did a large number of others who were there with their copies of the Requiem, (Novello's edition) — some of whom quite offended even me by their careless demeanor — but felt sobered and in a fit frame of mind to let Mozart speak his repentance, sorrow and awful conception of the judgment, right from his heart to mine.

It is one thing to hear this music in our Music Hall, with great Italian singers and songstresses, and with the Handel and Haydn Society for a chorus; it is a very different thing to hear it as a part of the church ritual. It was useless to resist it. "John" soon had his face hid, and so was mine before half a dozen stanzas of the Dies Irae were finished. Neither could laugh at the other for his red eyes.

And yet the choir was not large, the orchestra not large, and there were no women singers. But the bass soloist sang well, the tenor very well — he had a really fine voice, with something in it, however, that spoke of Germany — the orchestra played beautifully — and as to that hoy who sang the soprano solos, he was wonderful! Do you remember my writing from Breslau about a boy there, whom I actually took for a fine female singer, until I stood where I could see him the Sunday after? It is not easy to compare singers heard at long intervals — so much depends upon the mood you are in, upon the music they sing, upon your position in regard to them, upon the acoustic qualities of the building, and the like: but I made up my mind that of all the numberless boys I have heard, in choirs famous, too, the world over, the Dom choirs in Berlin and Dresden, cathedral choirs in London and other places, all included — this stripling is at the head. True as the needle to the pole, voice full, clear, and strong, flexible to an uncommon degree, he stood there singing, easy as if it cost him no effort; and withal, breathing through every tone was that innocent effect, which always characterizes the voices of children when they sing. Thus sung I had never heard the Requiem, and an indescribable and touching charm was lent to it.

That was a pleasant visit which we made to the establishment of NOVELLO. One of the gentlemen took us through it. It has nothing pretentious and striking in appearance; on the contrary, the building is in a modest street and makes a most unassuming show. It was curious to see how, as from a small beginning, the business had gone on extending itself in all directions; keeping pace with it, room had been added to room, until at length the small court back of the original shop had been roofed in with glass. But below, what a mass of music and what a mass of plates! And what music! how cheap! especially for England. From one of the piles of music the gentleman handed me a small, thin octavo; it was the entire music to some great concert, I forget now what. "We sent 2,000 copies thither," said he, "and sold them all; we should have sold more if they could have been sent on in season." The printing is done in another building across the street. The office is not so extended as I expected — but that is no matter, so long as it can keep pace with the demands of the office of publication. Publishers have long been represented by disappointed authors as living upon other men's brains. Be this as it may, the great English public that loves solid and noble vocal music, has abundant reason to rise up and call the Novellos blessed.

One very pleasant hour I spent with Mrs. KINKEL, whose beautiful story, "Musical Orthodoxy," lately appeared in the Journal of Music. The professor, her husband, is as ever, busy with literature and Art. He has recently published a play in Germany, "Nimrod," which, from what I hear of it, must be a work of a good deal of importance; and had nearly ready a monograph upon the original "Mausoleum," which is among the discoveries of Layard. Mrs. Kinkel is busy as ever with music, and sunshine, full and free, has succeeded the dark days of 1849-51, when he sat in prison, wasting his splendid talents in spinning wool, and she was moving heaven and earth for his release, and "went mourning all the day long." Carl Schurz, to whom Kinkel was finally indebted for his escape from a confinement, which would soon have killed him, was republican candidate for the office of Lieutenant Governor of Wisconsin last year — pray Heaven that he be yet elected!

That the Prussian Government has not yet forgotten the professor, has been ludicrously shown quite recently. An English lady in May wished to take her two daughters to Germany, and invited one of Kinkel's children, a sweet little girl of thirteen years, to accompany her. A passport must be procured. But the Kinkels are not British subjects. Application was therefore made to the Prussian Embassy and refused! Mrs. Kinkel must send to Bonn — her native place. The English lady was willing to wait. The letter went to the burgomaster of Bonn. He could not grant it, he wrote, she must apply to the court. Application was then made to the principal judge. He referred her to the provincial government at Cologne. Application was made there, and she was told she must apply to the Minister at Berlin. So a letter was dispatched to Berlin, and, at length, from head-quarters, came in few words, a refusal. It was not directly stated that a little girl of thirteen years would endanger the existence of the Prussian monarchy — that is left to be inferred!

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Palestrina.

The compass of a mere sketch forbids mention of all the works produced by Palestrina from this period. The number of his compositions, among which there is not one that is mediocre or thrown off in haste, is astonishing, particularly when we consider that they all belong to the highest order of music, to the polyphonic style. The Abbate Baimi, Palestrina's most industrious biographer, names the following: 9 Books of Motets, for 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 voices; 15 Books of Masses; 4 Books of Madrigals; Several Books of Lamentations, Hymns, and Offertories, of which about one-third are still unprinted, in the possession of the Vatican library.

On the second of February, 1594, Palestrina died of an internal inflammation, and was buried at St. Peter's in the Vatican, before the altar of the apostles Simon and Jude. On his tomb stood the inscription:

JOANNES PETRUS ALOYSIUS PRÆNESTINUS,
MUSICÆ PRINCEPS.

Like most of the composers of his time, Palestrina has written chiefly for the church. His compositions are exclusively vocal, always in not less than four and not more than eight parts. His Missa Papæ Marcelli is for six voices; his Stabat Mater, for eight. The best way of performing these works is, with at least four voices on a part. The singers must avoid all overdoing of light and shade, ppp's, ff's, stringendo, ritardando, &c., as well as tremulousness of voice. Purity of intonation, distinctness in the coming in of voices, and a moderate play between piano and forte are sufficient for the rendering of these works with their fullest effect. All affected pathos, all prominence of single voices, are opposed to a right understanding of Palestrina's music. All assistance or support from any instrument (unless perhaps at the rehearsals) robs this music of its effect. Knowledge of respiration is indispensable. I would also advise the director to explain the meaning of the words beforehand to those who do not understand the Latin and Italian languages.

In the analysis of Palestrina's works, one must always keep in view two points that characterize this whole style; these are; 1. Depth and sincerity of feeling. 2. The reproduction of the same in tones.

In this way we recognize at once, wherein and wherefore Palestrina's music became the founder of an era. The industrious Netherlands, those pioneers of modern musical art, were the first who rightly classified the intervals, practically, if not theoretically. They had long since recognized and made their own what was essential in the contrapuntal art. From Wilhelm Dufay to Arcadelt (1560), that is to say for a century and a half, they stand there as furtherers and increasers of the technical part of the art of composition. Spiritual comprehension of the text, truth in its re-birth in music, were to them as yet unknown. They were the robust ploughers of the field which he of Præneste was to fructify. On the first appearance of Palestrina they cease to form a school and become merged in the great Roman school of which he is the founder.* With him, for the first time, counterpoint becomes the willing servant of higher ideas; he is the first to mistrust the rule, when it places itself between him and the idea. The old church tone system, by which centuries were deluded, scarcely resists the impulse of his genius in the Stabat. This system, in which the Netherlands built their neat cells, the breath of his spirit consigns already to decay. He is the last and highest step of pure vocal music; after him the art turns to instruments, which it fashions to the support and strengthening of songs. But the relation of Palestrina's music, as its first protectress, to the rise of dramatic music, belongs rather to the yet to be written history of this latter. Palestrina's mission was: to give importance to the individual mode of feeling of the composer, to æsthetic comprehension of the text, and perhaps also to melody in its special conditions. Thereby he paved the way for the Opera, that most complete of all Art manifestations, and with it, for modern music.

May these lines contribute to a more general recognition of the pure greatness of the great Roman, and to a more frequent performance of his noble works! PALESTRINA, BACH, and BEETHOVEN are the members of a strong chain that extends through centuries. Only one who knows them all, can have a clear idea of their collective influence upon Art, or a clear idea of Art itself. From the study of Palestrina even the friends and "musicians of the Future" might learn, perhaps, some patience for their long journey.

* Orlando Lassus, the Flemish contemporary of Palestrina, a creator in his way, cannot be regarded as the founder of a school, although his influence on the German school of organists can easily be shown.

N. Y. Philharmonic Society.

Notwithstanding the disastrous consequences of the commercial crisis, which occurred just at the beginning of the season, and in view also of the excellent concerts which were given by the manager of the Academy, under the name of "Philharmonic Concerts," during last winter, we have, under the circumstances, met with great and unexpected success, for both the rehearsals and the concerts of the Society were fully attended—a fact which proves that the general interest felt in our institution, on the part of the subscribing, associate, and professional members is more deeply rooted than has been supposed by many, and cannot as easily be undermined as may have been hoped by some. Our orchestra has been steadily increased from season to season, so that now we count from eighty to ninety performing members; while at the first concert of the society, on December 7, 1842, at the Apollo Saloon, only fifty performers constituted the orchestra. In point of ability, we are happy to state that nearly all the most prominent resident instrumentalists form now a part of the society, thereby insuring the production of orchestral effects which no other institution of the city or in the whole United States affords. The principal feature of our concerts, the performance of symphonies and overtures by the orchestra, has been faithfully carried out, as will be seen by a reference to the programmes of the season. We have performed standard works of the Old Masters, as well as those of more modern date, and among the names of the composers will be found those of Beethoven, Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hiller, Richard Wagner, Lindpaintner, Nicolai, &c., &c. In regard to the solo performers, we have endeavored to obtain the best talent available, both vocal and instrumental; but it must be borne in mind that we labor in this respect under great disadvantages, from the well-known fact that celebrated artists, who pass the winter in our city, invariably come here under a previous engagement with some operatic manager, by which they are debarred from appearing at any other than the manager's own public performances. For instance, during the last season the services of Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Thalberg, and Formes were promised, but could never be obtained when an opportunity for making good the promise presented itself. It is the intention of the Board of Directors not to spare any efforts during the coming season, to fill out the programmes with as interesting vocal and instrumental solos and concerted pieces as it may be possible for them to procure.

The number of subscribing members during the past season were 1490, who are classified as follows: 1254 associate members, 24 subscribers, and 212 professional members—a higher number than at any previous season, with the exception of the last but one. The dividend declared this year is $80 for each performing member, a remuneration not very considerable for attendance at four concerts, sixteen public, and eight private rehearsals, and eight business meetings.

For some time past, a wish has been expressed by many members that the society might give more than four concerts; in accordance with which the Board of Directors, ever desirous to please the patrons of the society, have concluded, with the consent of the actual members, to give during the coming season five instead of four concerts, with the usual number of rehearsals, without increasing the price of subscription. At the same time, it has been found necessary to pass a regulation to the effect, that henceforth all subscriptions must be paid in advance.

A matter of the greatest importance—the selection of a suitable hall for our performances during the coming season—is unhappily at the present moment not yet settled, but due notice will be given as soon as an arrangement shall have been completed. The lessee of the Academy having declared, that on no account will he allow the Philharmonic Society again to occupy the said building, for reasons which the reader must deduce for himself, as they are not known to us—our choice remains between Cooper's Institute, Burton's or Niblo's Theatre, and the City Assembly Rooms, one of which places will probably be selected until a regular Music Hall, so much needed in our city, shall have been built.

At a meeting of the actual members, held April 7, 1858, it was decided, in view of the constantly increasing labors of the Board of Directors, and in consideration of the much wider sphere of action of our association at the present time, to augment the board by adding four members to the present number of seven. The different officers will remain the same as heretofore, but instead of two Assistant Directors there will be six.

Finally, we should not leave unnoticed a fact which must fill with pride and satisfaction every one that feels an interest in the success of our society, as an institution to promote the cause of art, to create an intelligent appreciation of and diffuse a refined taste for the higher class of music among the people at large. We refer to the establishment of a Philharmonic Society, during the last year, in our neighboring city of Brooklyn, which undoubtedly owed its origin to the mother institution of New York, and which has our very best wishes. Similar societies have sprang up in many of our western cities, and have been established after the model, and with the tendencies of our own Philharmonic Society. All success to them! and may we not be found wanting in setting them the example, for many years to come, of a high-toned, truly artistic institution, ever progressing in the right direction.

"William Tell" in New York.

Rossini's masterpiece, Guillaume Tell, was performed last evening at the Academy in presence of a large and brilliant audience. The experience of this opera has been a singular one. So little satisfied was the great composer with its first reception in Paris, that he cast aside his pen in dudgeon, and resisted all inducements to produce another work. Thus he who was the champion of Italian Opera against the formidable rivalry of Weber, whose genius had raised that of modern Germany so high, retired from the field before he had attained his 40th year, when his invention was ripest and his fame in its meridian. For more than twenty years Rossini, the most favored son of Italy, the "land of song," has stood aloof from music, and though not ceasing to live has ceased to write, leaving that task to others less gifted than himself. When Guillaume Tell first appeared in Paris, it straightway seized upon the admiration of musicians: but did not take well with the public at large. A success d'estime was all that was accorded to it. From the very first institution of the Royal Italian Opera in London, in 1847, the promised production of Rossini's Guillaume Tell had been anticipated as an event of extraordinary interest. Here, it was calculated, would be an opportunity for displaying the choral, instrumental, and spectacular resources of the new theatre with unrivalled effect. After long expectation, it was actually brought out, with what success may be inferred when we say it was played, we believe, but once. Nevertheless the "Swan of Pesaro" has no good reason to be angry with the world for any failure in late years to appreciate his chef-d'œuvre. No one work of any great composer—hardly excepting Mozart's Don Giovanni or Beethoven's Fidelio—has been more lavishly praised by musicians; and while the adherents of a style which was not Rossini's have admitted that in Guillaume Tell he had surpassed the majority of their favorite models, the patriotic and exclusive worshippers of Italian music hailed it as a triumph of their countryman and hero—whereby they indirectly acknowledged that their own particular school was not the highest. It has been urged that Rossini's jealousy of the growing renown of Meyerbeer, the success of whose Robert le Diable followed close upon the quasi failure of Guillaume Tell, was a principal reason for his quitting Paris and abandoning his art. It is unnecessary to enter into a comparison of the respective merits of Guillaume Tell and Robert le Diable; but it will readily be granted that the vast superiority of Meyerbeer's libretto had a great deal to do with his success, and that the dull, and clumsily constructed poem which Rossini had managed was no insignificant drawback to his musical effects. Meyerbeer was fortunate in having Scribe for a partner. As with the play of Schiller, the dramatic interest of the opera of William Tell is centered in the meetings of the wronged and courageous Swiss. The culminating point is at the end of the second act, when the oath is taken and the war-cry raised—a scene which is described in the music with almost unparalleled magnificence. The third and fourth acts are anti-climacteric; and the incidents of the shooting of the apple and the escape of Tell, with the after conduct of Gesler, add nothing to the interest, and come too late to be of any use. This matter of the structure of the libretto has more to do with its popularity than is commonly imagined. Mozart himself complained of the difficulty of getting an effective poem, and writing to his father from Paris said, "The poem is here the sole thing which of necessity must be good, since the public do not understand music." The chief attraction of the early part of the Opera was Steffani. In the part of Arnoldo he sustained himself admirably in the well-known duet of the first act with Tell and in the recitative il mio giuro that precedes it. Nor was he much deficient in the trio of the second act, the best concerted piece of the Opera. But at the conclusion of the third act it was announced that by reason of indisposition he would be unable to appear in the next act which is the final one, and in which occurs the pièce de résistance in which so many singers have failed, the Ut de Poitrine [the C in alt] in the grand air Suivez moi, where Arnoldo incites his countrymen to advance to the liberation of Tell and the destruction of the tyrant Gesler. We were sorry not to see the range of Steffani's admirable voice tested in the trying passages of this final act. Through the indisposition of Signor Steffani no part of the last act was given save that portion of the third scene in which Tell is saved and Gesler shot. Signor Gassier entered fully into the character of Tell and the spirit of Rossini's music. He was in fine voice and gave every satisfaction. The part of his son Jemmy was nicely played by Mademoiselle Siedenburgh, who besides showed herself quite at home in the concerted music—a matter of no little consequence. Her vocalization was flexible even and agreeable; and she produced a decidedly favorable impression. Signora Bertucca Maretzek sustained the inherently feeble part of Mathilde as creditably as circumstances admitted. The picturesque and splendid finale to the second act produced its accustomed effect; and the chorus of the inhabitants of Uri: Guglielmo sol per te, was well executed and accompanied. The ballet by the Ronzani troupe was uncommonly good, but might have been advantageously curtailed. No operatic representation among us ought to be protracted at the very farthest beyond three hours. The melodies of the ballet charmed the whole house.

The Bobolink.

[From "The Birds of the Garden and Orchard," a very interesting article in the October number of the Atlantic Monthly.]

There is no singing-bird in New England that enjoys the notoriety of the Bobolink (Icterus agripennis). He is like a rare wit in our social or political circles. Everybody is talking about him and quoting his remarks, and all are delighted with his company. He is not without great merits as a songster; but he is well known and admired, because he is showy, noisy, and flippant, and sings only in the open field, and frequently while poised on the wing, so that everybody who hears him can see him, and know who is the author of the strains that afford him so much delight. He sings also at broad noonday, when everybody is out, and is seldom heard before sunrise, while other birds are pouring forth their souls in a united concert of praise. He waits until the sun is up, and when most of the early performers have become silent, as if determined to secure a good audience before exhibiting his powers.

The Bobolink, or Conquedle, has unquestionably great talents as a musician. In the grand concert of Nature it is he who performs the recitative parts, which he delivers with the utmost fluency and rapidity; and one must be a careful listener, not to lose many of his words. He is plainly the merriest of all the feathered creation, almost continually in motion, and singing upon the wing, apparently in the greatest ecstasy of joy.

There is not a plaintive strain in his whole performance. Every sound is as merry as the laugh of a young child; and one cannot listen to him without fancying that he is indulging in some jocose railery of his companions. If we suppose him to be making love, we cannot look upon him as very deeply enamored, but rather as highly delighted with his spouse, and overflowing with rapturous admiration. The object of his love is a neatly formed bird, with a mild expression of countenance, a modest and amiable deportment, and arrayed in the plainest apparel. It is evident that she does not pride herself upon the splendor of her costume, but rather on its neatness, and on her own feminine graces. She must be entirely without vanity, unless we suppose that it is gratified by observing the pomp and display which are made by her partner, and by listening to his delightful eloquence of song: for if we regard him as an orator, it must be allowed that he is unsurpassed in fluency and rapidity of utterance; and if we regard him only as a musician, he is unrivalled in brilliancy of execution.

Vain are all attempts, on the part of other birds, to imitate his truly original style. The Mocking-bird gives up the attempt in despair, and refuses to sing at all when confined near one in a cage. I cannot look upon him as ever in a very serious humor. He seems to be a lively, jocular little fellow, who is always jesting and bantering, and when half a dozen different individuals are sporting about in the same orchard, I often imagine that they might represent the persons dramatized in some comic opera. These birds never remain stationary upon the bough of a tree, singing apparently for their own solitary amusement; but they are ever in company, and passing to and fro, often commencing their song upon the extreme end of the bough of an apple-tree, then suddenly taking flight, and singing the principal part while balancing themselves on the wing. The merriest part of the day with these birds is the later afternoon, during the hour preceding dewfall, and before the Robins and Thrushes commence their evening hymn. Then, assembled in company, it would seem as if they were practising a cotillon upon the wing, each one singing to his own movements, as he sallies forth and returns,—and nothing can exceed their apparent merriment.

The Bobolink usually commences his warbling just after sunrise, when the Robin, having sung from the earliest dawn, brings his performance to a close. Nature seems to have provided that the serious parts of her musical entertainment in the morning shall first be heard, and that the lively and comic strains shall follow them. In the evening this order is reversed; and after the comedy is concluded, Nature lulls us to meditation and repose by the mellow notes of the little Vesper-bird, and the pensive and still more melodious strains of the solitary Thrushes.

In pleasant, sunshiny weather, the Bobolink seldom flies without singing, often hovering on the wing over the place where his mate is sitting upon her ground-built nest, and pouring forth his notes with great loudness and fluency. The Bobolink is one of our social birds, one of those species that follow in the footsteps of man, and multiply with the progress of agriculture. He is not a frequenter of the woods; he seems to have no taste for solitude. He loves the orchard and the mowing-field, and many are the nests which are exposed by the scythe of the haymaker, if the mowing be done early in the season. Previously to the settlement of America, these birds must have been comparatively rare in the New England States, and were probably confined to the open prairies and savannas in the northwestern territory.

THE O'LINCON FAMILY.

A flock of merry singing-birds were sporting in the grove;
Some were warbling cheerily, and some were making love:
There were Bobolincon, Wadolincon, Winterseeble, Conquedle,—
A livelier set was never led by tabor, pipe, or fiddle,— Crying, "Phew, shew, Wadolincon, see, see, Bobolincon, Down among the tickleups, hiding in the buttercups!
I know the saucy chap, I see his shining cap
Bobbing in the clover there,—see, see, see!"

Up flies Bobolincon, perching on an apple-tree,
Startled by his rival's song, quickened by his raillery.
Soon he spies the rogue afloat curvetting in the air,
And merrily he turns about, and warns him to beware!
"Tis you that would a-wooing go, down among the rushes O!

But wait a week, till flowers are cheery,—wait a week,
and, ere you marry,
Be sure of a house wherein to tarry!
Wadolincon, Whiskodink, Tom Denny, wait, wait, wait!"

Every one's a funny fellow; every one's a little mellow;
Follow, follow, follow, follow, o'er the hill and in the hollow!

Merrily, merrily, there they hie; now they rise and now they fly;
They cross and turn, and in and out, and down in the middle, and wheel about,—

With a "Phew, shew, Wadolincon! listen to me, Bobolincon!"

Happy's the wooing that's speedily doing, that's speedily doing, That's merry and over with the bloom of the clover!
Bobolincon, Wadolincon, Winterseeble, follow, follow me!"

Oh, what a happy life they lead, over the hill and in the mead!

How they sing, and how they play! See, they fly away, away!

Now they gambol o'er the clearing,—off again, and then appearing;

Poised aloft on quivering wing, now they soar, and now they sing:—

"We must all be merry and moving; we must all be happy and loving;

For when the midsummer has come, and the grain has ripened its ear,
The haymakers scatter our young, and we mourn for the rest of the year.
Then Bobolincon, Wadolincon, Winterseeble, haste, haste, away!"

Letter from Aptommas.

LONDON, AUG. 31, 1858.

To the Editor of the N. Y. Musical World.

The days of my rambling being now about to close, I am reminded of the place of destination—the New York of pleasant reminiscences. Since I left you, I have rusticated and domesticated among friends and relatives; not the most despicable event being that of a visit to my native town, in South Wales—Bridgend—where I had not been for twenty years. It was with no small gratification and emotion, I gazed upon the spot upon which I went on all fours before I learnt to walk. The simple, country-like aspect is disappearing rapidly before the business-like innovations of railway lines and the consequent pouring in of strangers, and so much that where the Welsh language, when I was a boy, used to be spoken in the streets by the inhabitants, little may now be heard but English.

Did you quote from the Times a notice of a musical demonstration at the Sydenham Palace, in August, by five thousand children? The music was sacred, and it was sung in unison. I never heard anything of the kind to surpass it in all my life. The astonishing precision with which the intonation was marked, and the huge volume of sound produced by so great a multitude of voices, together with the imposing appearance of the charity children, dressed in costume, were indeed calculated to raise any one, musician or otherwise, to the highest pitch of enthusiastic delight. There must have been, also, fifteen thousand auditors, which you may suppose could have contributed no little to the brilliancy of the occasion.

I was particularly impressed with the idea of the peculiar appropriateness of the voice of boys for soprano parts in sacred music. There is, I think, a rich medium to be found in them between the extreme voices of male and female adults. This impression was considerably strengthened in me by hearing the intoned service at St. Paul's Cathedral, the other day. I thought the boy's voices perfectly heavenly—but must add, that their faces were anything but that, for they giggled at each other during the whole of the performance, as though they were rehearsing for a concert! I took the liberty of moralizing a little, and came to the philosophical conclusion that that method of worship, in which so much importance is attached to the mere execution of the music (which is but the channel) must savor more or less of indecision. The very exercise of scrupulously observing the inflection of the voice in the service (thought I) has a tendency to lead one to disregard the sense, or important intention, of the words employed.

Another thing was forcibly evident to my humble stock of common sense, viz., their singing in unison being so admirably adapted as a method of rendering the sacred words of devotion. The simplicity of revealed truth seems to me to require a style of music bearing the same characteristic traits; and the unity of sentiment supposed to exist, suggests the appropriateness of the adoption of the unison. And (without pretending to say what has not been already respected by others) how exceedingly suitable such a style of music is to congregational singing; to a promiscuous mass of people, who, however uneducated they may be in regard to musical accomplishments, can join in a plaintive melody in one part. The neglect of this (don't you think?) must be attributed to the practice of limiting the execution of the music to the choir, the people meanwhile (as I have often seen them) gazing on, as if at a place of entertainment. I am reminded of an interesting conversation which took place between a young man and a choir musician upon the subject. The question was asked, if the inhabitants of the upper world would be content to transfer their vocal exercises to others; or whether they would not rather insist upon the privilege of expressing their devotional feelings with their own individual voices?

I arrived too late in the season for ordinary concerts. I was present at the Sydenham Palace though the other day, when Albani made her last appearance. She sang "Il Segreto," "Non piu Mesta," and a ballad or song by Hattori, (composed expressly for her,) with her usual exquisite finish. Her remarkably full, powerful and fascinatingly sweet voice, easily filled the spacious portion of the gigantic building which had been set apart for the concert. . . . With regard to myself, the blisters with which the tips of my fingers are covered bear abundant testimony to the manipulations of my hands on the harp strings. Every one is perfectly infatuated with the American melodies I play them. The harp makers thrive well in their peculiar craft, and therefore I may suppose the instrument is really progressing favorably in Europe. My brother, Mr. John Thomas, with others, is fully occupied with his minstrelsh avocations. May I be permitted to say, (though he and I were bedfellows in childhood and youth,) that he undoubtedly stands first in his profession in Europe, and I conceive it to be owing, not alone to his talent as a harpist and musician, but also to his position as a gentleman and a generous, kind hearted man.

Should it happen to afford you any pleasure to know how I am occupied, away from my labors in New York, it is somewhat variegated; now in the sea, bathing, (after which I may walk four or five miles by way of getting up an appetite for breakfast), or rolling about on the grass with my three little darling children, who regard their opportunity as a jubilee. Should I not go nutting in the woods, I would proceed to the British Museum for the purpose of collecting materials for the New work, in reading matter, which I am about to bring out for the harp.

I remain as ever,

Your most sincere friend,

APTOMMAS.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 4. — The past week has been one of unusual excitement in our operatic circles, for the rival impresarii, STRAKOSCH and MARETEK, have indulged in the liveliest competition. Strakosch one evening reduced his prices to 50 cents, and Maretzek immediately followed his example. Thereupon did Strakosch resume his old prices, and insert in his advertisements a cutting remark about the success of the opera at a theatre where people could see and hear — a bit of irony that is calculated to make the monstrous human-shaped caryatides of the Academy of Music hang down their heads, and blush for very shame.

The chief event of Strakosch's season have been the appearance of Mme. COLSON, and the farewell of GAZZANIGA. The former lady has met with a decided success, and is already popular. Her rendition of Traviata is much admired, especially by artistic people, and Maretzek himself confesses that she is superior in this role to Gazzaniga, who has hitherto been the best Violetta we have had. Gazzaniga made her farewell appearance in Favorita.

At the Academy of Music "William Tell" has been the chief attraction; but the new tenor, STEFFANI, has of course had "colds," on one evening could not sing at all, and on the other occasions the opera was given, was obliged to omit his great air in the last act. At the matinee on Saturday (when over two thousand ladies were present) he sang very well indeed — better than he has hitherto done in this opera — but yet did not create any very decided impression, and, on the whole, is not as good an Arnoldo as Bolcioni, a very excellent tenor, who sang here a few years ago. Steffani is by no means a finished artist, and though his hold striking style may attract at first, he does not wear as well as that delightfully-voiced, stupid oyster, Brignoli.

PICCOLOMINI is, according to all accounts, on the ocean now, and will probably arrive here on the 10th or 11th inst. The Herald almost daily devotes an editorial to her advent, and is evidently desirous of creating a fièvre in her favor. She is certainly a bewitchingly beautiful creature, and will be popular with the mass of opera-goers.

Mme. de WILTORST will be here soon, and will make her debut in I Puritani, when JUNCA, the new basso, will assist.

At Burton's, the new English Opera company, with LUCY ESCOTT as prima donna, and Mr. SQUIRES as tenor, have appeared in an English version of Traviata, and with moderate success.

The news of the safety of our esteemed citizen and musician, Mr. THEODORE EISEL, (who was supposed to have been lost on the Austria) has been received with great satisfaction by the musical profession here, by whom Mr. Eisfeld was justly held in the highest estimation.

The Philharmonic and the Harmonic Societies, and the Mendelssohn Union, are all busily preparing for the winter season, which promises to be the most attractive, musically considered, of any we have had here.

TROVATOR.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 9, 1858.

Italian Opera.

ANY one who looked round upon the brilliant auditorium of the Boston Theatre before the curtain rose on Tuesday night,—upon the decent, well-dressed audience, filling every seat not only in parquette and balcony, but up to top-most gallery and ceiling—upon the general aspect of refinement which so distinguishes an opera from a common theatre audience, and the expectant, cheerful look of the familiar faces on all sides, that smiled as good as new, (and better), it was so long since they had been blended in a scene of this kind—must have felt that the reaction so long waited for had come; that the dark days of opera and concert managers were over for at least a while, and that the public are again in the mood of seeking new excitement and delight in opera and possibly in other kinds of music. Surely Mr. STRAKOSCH and his company have no cause to complain of public this time. They have anchored on good fishing ground. The whole multitudinous music-loving or would-be music-loving shoal snap en masse at the bait, so long withdrawn, as if it would swallow at a meal the entire substance of this little opportunity of just four operas, even if the viands be not of the rarest quality. So far as the public is concerned there has been nothing wanting. It was such a house-full as the Boston Theatre has scarcely seen since the Grisi and Mario enthusiasm was at its height.

The piece the first night was Signor Verdi's Traviata, or the play "Camille" (La Dame aux Camélias) done into music—music for the most part weak, unnatural, forced and manneristic, even for Verdi; betraying a lamentable poverty of invention; a feeding as it were upon himself, that is upon his own past productions, ringing feeble changes, in mere fits and fragments, upon what once were happy moments of his fresher inspirations, until what was in some sense a felicity becomes a haunting soul-less habit. Yet we find it more enjoyable than Trovatore, perhaps for the very reason that it is an effort of far less pretention. Sketchy, trifling almost, as the music is for the most part, it lends itself not badly to the subject; it has a real human tale to tell (not a plot of unrelieved monotony, like Trovatore), and through the tones and movements of good lyric actors it contrives to tell it so as to enlist your sympathies. Then too it abounds in opportunities for gay and festive music, and Verdi's festive ball-room strains are generally happy: witness the masquerade in the last act of Ernani, a like scene in Rigoletto, and something of that kind (we recall it vaguely) near the beginning of I Lombardi. Of striking, highly wrought ensemble pieces the Traviata only offers one, the finale to the second act, in which principals and chorus (a chorus not large, but clear-voiced, true and finely blended) conspired to excellent effect on this occasion.

Madame COLSON, for several years the reigning and admired prima donna of the French Italian Opera in New Orleans was the Camille, or Traviata. Mme. Colson is indeed an artist, both as singer and as actress. Song and action seem completely one in her. She is unmistakably French, naturally a little awkward in figure and in gait, and plain, though attractive and intelligent in face. But she has so much animation, so much savoir faire, and such a realizing conception of her part, that the general impression is one of lady-like ease and grace, while her face, always expressive, glows with a positive beauty in the higher moments. From the playful, cordial gaiety of the first scene, to the moments of awakening higher aspiration and remorse in the experience of real love; from the bitterness of renunciation of that love to the beautiful abandon (reminding us of Truffi) with which she throws herself into the arms of her lover, too late restored, in the duet; Parigi, o cara, and to the rapturous wandering of her senses before she dies, it is all a beautiful, consistent, feeling impersonation of the part. We liked it the better that the progress was so gradual, that it was so even, that there was nothing overdone, that it won upon us steadily and slowly, instead of carrying us away by moments of spasmodic intensity. It was finer as a whole than Gazzaniga's, although the latter rose at times to greater heights of passion. As a singer Mme. Colson is entirely her superior; she cannot indeed be called a great singer, but she is a very highly finished, charming and expressive vocalist; a fine artistic charm pervades her whole performance. She makes the music expressive, in its least phrase and fibre, even in spite of itself. Her voice is not a great one or a very rich one; but it has a remarkably clear, elastic, penetrating quality, that always tells; pungent, but not harsh in the higher notes; with musical body in the low tones, that are husky in so many fine sopranos: very flexible, and leaping through the widest intervals with perfect ease and certainty. It is a bright, French kind of voice, but by no means hard nor unexpressive. There is soul in her tones. Her execution, whether in simple melody or florid vocalization and bravura, is eminently artistic, always true, in pitch and in expression, always genuine and without trick. Taken musically and grammatically Mme. Colson's Violetta was a beautiful artistic whole. Either we were mistaken, caught in the rose color mood, or it is a kind of excellence that will grow upon a refined audience.

Our old friends, BRIGNOLI and AMODIO, were warmly welcomed. The handsome tenor comes back plump as a fat partridge; his voice is as musical as ever, and passages of his singing were extremely beautiful, whereas in others he sang sadly out of tune, or relapsed into the old indifference. Amodio has lost none of his rotundity, and looked the "venerable parent" drolly. His baritone is large and generous as ever, and delivered with the same certainty and fervor that always made him popular. The chorus was good for its small numbers, and the orchestra, embracing the excellent theatre orchestra entire with some additions, was remarkably good. But the arrangement of the orchestral parts seemed sometimes of questionable authenticity, too thin and meagre to be Verdi; individual instruments standing at such wide intervals apart; at one time a single viola, with its quaint little phrase continually repeated, attracting the chief attention to itself for several minutes.

Of the second night we have only room to say that Lucrecia Borgia also filled the theatre from floor to ceiling; that Signor MURCEL JUNCA, the basso, is a gigantic, splendid fellow, and gave rare weight and majesty to the part of the Duke; that PARODI throughout was more subdued and pleasing than we have usually found her.

ENGLISH OPERA.—Mr. COOPER's company, before they left, relieved the dreary waste of Trovatora by a passable performance of Donizetti's sparkling and genial little comic opera, "The Elixir of Love," in which the four principals sang and acted quite enjoyably.

Relation of Artists and their Agents to the Press.

OUR Journal aims on the one hand to stimulate, instruct and elevate the public taste for music, while on the other hand it offers a portion of its columns as an advertising medium to artists, opera and concert managers, and others, who seek to catch the eye of just that class of persons that are supposed to read a musical paper. But it has ever been our principle and practice to keep these two functions of the journal wholly independent of each other. The tone of our criticisms must not in any way be governed by our advertising patronage. We know neither business nor favor when we write of Art and artists. He who buys a column of our advertising space, buys that, gets that, and is entitled to nothing more. If we write a notice of his opera or concert, we do it for the public, for the Art, and not for him. We have to explain this very obvious point of editorial morale so often that we are induced to reprint here what we wrote about it five years since, at a time when the whole press was excited to discussion of the subject by a charge of "bribery, black-mail, &c.," in connection with the Sontag concerts.

There should be no such thing as favours in the dealing between artists and the press. If we have praised a singer in our editorial columns, let the singer take it as no favor: we wrote in duty to our readers, to the cause of Art, and to our own convictions or our own need of expression, and not to confer or to return a favor. If the singer advertises largely with us, or sends us free admissions, we consider it no favor, but purely a matter of business. The advertising money pays for the advertisement, and for nothing else, and no amount of money can buy a flattering word in the editorial columns. The value of our notices, of our opinions, ceases to be worth a copper the moment that they are written in the way of personal exchange of favors. This is the principle with which we started, and so far, God be thanked, we have never yet seen cause to swerve from it. It is, to be sure, not the most paying principle, but it is sure to help us in the long run.

1. There are several ways, or kinds of "favours," by which musical agents, &c., are apt to fancy that they bind an editor to favorable notice. The most considerable and most common is by advertising in his paper. Newspapers depend upon their "advertising patrons" for their chief support; even a small weekly journal, like our own, does this to some extent. The idea is, then: We bring business to you, therefore we expect you to commend customers to us; we pay you so much for advertising our concert, or our new book, therefore you must urge your readers to go to the one or buy the other. (At the most, the equal return would be that the editor himself should buy the ticket or the book, not that he should drum up other purchasers.) But is this reasonable? is it right? Because you buy of us does it therefore follow that we can honestly send people to buy of you? Because our wares (our types, our columns) suit your purposes, does it follow that what you have to sell should suit our readers? By no means. If you advertise with us, it is because you think the simple advertisement worth to your business more than you pay us for it. The quid pro quo for what you pay us (viz. our stated, honest price) is the circulation which our paper gives your advertisement; that is the "value received," and you have no right to look to us for any more. We have no right to grant you any more, when by so doing we might idly or insincerely bias our readers as to the merit of what you advertise. Yet every editor knows how common a thing it is for advertisers to expect "a little word or two of editorial" in corroboration of the statements of the advertisement, just by way of "preparing the public mind" for the new book or the new prima donna. Perhaps the newspapers themselves, at least many of them, are to blame as being partly the creators of this expectation. It is the rule with many papers to notice only the performances or publications of those who advertise with them, thus seeming to countenance the inference that their editorial notice is to be taken as a premium upon advertising patronage: in which view of course the notice, or the general tenor of the successive notices of the advertising party, must be favorable. It certainly is a pitiful meanness to take advantage (as many do) of an editor's obliging disposition by making his gratuitous notice and commendation of you and your product save you the expense of an advertisement; wheedling or importuning a paper into doing your work at its own expense. But even this meanness, from which all papers sometimes suffer, is no justification of a practice which couples advertising with the hope of editorial favor.

2. Complimentary free tickets. This is another still more delicate matter to handle. There is a strange ambiguity and indefiniteness about the position in which an editor or critic is placed by the receiving of a free ticket to a public performance, and still more by the almost universal practice, which has caused such accommodations to be expected as a matter of course. Indeed so common is the practice, that it becomes a slight, almost an insult, to be overlooked in the distribution of these courtesies. The majority of intelligent and respectable concert-givers, and their agents doubtless hold and act upon the right theory of the matter, although the theory may never have been stated. But there are many small and silly enough to withhold the card of invitation from a paper which does not praise them and humor them "to the top of their bent" in its criticisms; who so far forget the dignity of their calling as to try to palm off their cards on editors as due-bills payable in "puffs" of them and their performances. Contemptible assumption! Of course every editor with any self-respect would infinitely rather stay at home or pay for his own ticket like his neighbors; (probably in most cases he would choose the former, ticket or no ticket.) This puny revenge on the part of managers for unfavorable criticisms, as well as the meanness sometimes shown in the accommodations for the press at the theatres and concerts, has led some respectable editors to decline such "privileges of the press" altogether, and insist on paying for their ticket when they care to witness a performance. Decidedly we say, let the entire press demand to be placed on the same footing with the general public in these matters, if the system of free or complimentary tickets really does imply an obligation on the part of the receivers to publish favorable notices, or any notices at all, of all they go to see and hear. Better waive the privilege, than have any ambiguity about it. If the editor or critic receive nothing, then he is not bound; then his relation to the artist is a sound, legitimate and honorable one.

But, we apprehend, experience has settled it to be for the general interest of all concerned, both artists, press, and public, that the public reporters or journalists, in any or in all spheres whereof it is their business to keep the public advised and enlightened, should have free, convenient, honorable access to all that is publicly going on in such spheres. This, we take it, is the true theory and rationale of the free ticket system. It is for the interest of artists that editors and true connoisseurs, who write about such matters, should be at all times free to witness their exhibitions, because without the journals it is not possible to arrest and hold the public attention to such things. It is for the interest of the whole exhibiting class collectively and in the long run, that this freedom of access be extended to the reporting class collectively and as a permanent system, and without weighing or questioning the benefit in any given instance. In other words, the independent, conscientious, and fair-minded musical critic views the matter thus: If Madame Sontag, or Max Maretzek, or Ole Bull, or Gottschalk, sends me a ticket to her or his artistic entertainment, it must not bind me in this especial case to notice favorably, or at all, unless I shall see fit; but it is sent me to increase the probabilities of my so seeing fit, and it pledges me (so far as it goes) anew to the whole general cause of Art and of my readers' interest in Art, which I am already pledged to serve, by noticing the works and deeds of artists at such seasons and in such measure as I shall feel truly moved and able. In accepting the ticket I have entered into no bargain with the sender, either to praise him or to speak of him at all. The test of my fidelity to my own proper function in this case is, the readiness and enterprise and fairness with which I seize upon and improve true texts of Art. But often silence is the truest comment; and often it is impossible amid the pressure of many things to speak of all, while I cannot properly discharge my duty to any unless I have the chance to know of all. By no other theory of the critical office is true criticism possible. Now is it, or is it not for the interest of artists altogether that there should be true and honest criticism? If it is (as in the long run who can doubt) then it must proceed from those who have every convenience to hear and know about not only such performances as the hearing binds them to praise, but all performances from which knowledge of the Art and its standards can be learned. In other words, the public only values the criticisms of those well booked up. Now will you destroy all criticism, will you invite none but favoring critics to your concerts, and thereby destroy all public confidence in newspaper notices of Art, because you, luckless virtuoso, may chance to get passed over or to fare hardly in the scales of criticism?

It is evident therefore that an editor or critic cannot enter a concert room in that unbiased state of mind which makes a criticism of any worth, if his admission there be construed as a pledge to write in any given manner or at all; and if it be for the general interest that editors have a free admission, then it must be with the fullest understanding that it implies no pledge in any given instance. The critic's duty is first and foremost to his readers and to Art, and then to the artist simply as an artist, and not as one who can retain him as an advocate in a pecuniary speculation; that is the business of Madame's agents and not of the editor or critic. We believe this (if we have clearly stated our meaning) to be the only sound theory and basis of the "complimentary ticket" system. We can conceive of no other understanding on which an editor can accept such accommodation (as an editor,—of course he is a man too, and a private individual sometimes) and preserve the purity of the critical function inviolate. At all events let it be one thing or the other; away with all this ambiguity; let the free admission of the press be a regular, honorable, unexceptional rule and system, or let it be abolished altogether. If it is retained, let it be wholly in the light of a facility, a means of knowing and of judging, which it is the interest and duty of the public in all ways to extend to the public reporters. If it cannot be retained in this broad and honorable sense, let it be given up, and let editors pay like other people, when they want to see and hear. By either of these two systems, and by no other, does the relation of the Press to public performers become a clear and unequivocal one. We cannot doubt, as we have said before, that most intelligent and honorable artists and editors do practically regard the complimentary ticket system in this only sound and reasonable light. It is only small and jealous people and pretenders, those who really are not artists, who would keep criticism at a distance and invite in only those whom they can hold committed to admire and praise them.

Musical Chit-Chat.

At length we have signs of movement in our musical waters. We shall no doubt have a lively season rich with interest, both for the lovers of Italian opera, of Oratorio, and of the higher kinds of instrumental music. Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, our excellent conductor, ever ready for good works, will not suffer us to languish without refreshing and soul-strengthening Symphonies, if any faith and energy on his part can prevent it. His subscription papers will be out in a few days for a series of Six Orchestral Concerts in the Music Hall, to be given at intervals of three weeks, so as to allow of abundant rehearsal. The orchestra to consist of about fifty instruments. The programmes to be wholly of the highest order and within the strict sense of a "Philharmonic" Concert, which undoubtedly will give the most satisfaction now that other opportunities of hearing Italian opera and lighter music bid fair to be plentiful. His plan includes the performance of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony" entire, with a chorus selected from the Handel and Haydn Society. Other pieces in contemplation are a new Symphony by Rubinstein, called "Ocean," and, for the opening night, either the Number Seven, or the "Pastoral," of Beethoven. Surely the music lovers will not fail on their part.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening the long summer's silence of the Music Hall will be broken by fine music. The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY have effected an arrangement with Mr. STRAKOSCH, whereby all the principal singers of the Opera troupe, will unite with them in a Sacred Concert, the first part of which will be miscellaneous, and the second will consist of Rossini's Stabat Mater. Mme. COLSON will sing Schubert's Ave Maria; Mlle. PARODI will sing Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, O thou that killest," &c., &c., and these artists, with Mme. STRAKOSCH, SIGS. JUNCA, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO and the rest will lend their voices to an effective rendering of the Stabat. Mr. ZERRAHN will conduct, and Mr. J. C. D. PARKER will preside at the organ. A full house is a foregone conclusion; and the success of this effort (be it remembered) will go far to encourage the Society to bring out other and grander works, such as Handel's "Israel in Egypt," during the coming winter.

CARL ZERRAHN has been appointed music teacher in the public Normal School, a natural consequence of the admirable manner in which he drilled the twelve hundred children for the School Festival. We are happy to learn that he has entered upon the duties of the new office with the same characteristic zeal that he displayed on that occasion. . . . We have received from Mr. C. H. Brainard, the publisher, a fine and life-like portrait of JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, the author of "Home, sweet Home." It is lithographed in the best style from a daguerreotype taken of him just before he left for Europe. Appended to the picture is a fac-simile of the author's manuscript of the first verse of "Home."

The New York Philharmonic Society commence their public rehearsals this afternoon at Niblo's Garden. Gade's Symphony, No. 5, with piano obligato, Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" overture, and Spohr's Quartet Concerto, op. 131, are the orchestral pieces. . . . Mes-srs. MASON & THOMAS's programme for their winter Matinées shows a rare and choice list of Quintets, Quartets, Trios, Sonatas, &c. by Schumann, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, a Chaconne by Bach, an Octet by Schubert, &c., &c. There is another English troupe expounding Truancy opera in New York, of which Mrs. ESCOTT and Mr. HENRY SQUINES, the tenor, both Americans, are the leading stars. This makes five operas which we shall soon have "in our midst," the others being the Maretzek troupe, the Strakosch troupe, the Cooper troupe, and presently, last not least, the Ullman troupe, with Piccolomini, Formes, &c.

Some of the pleasantest sights to be seen at a Birmingham Festival were mentioned a week ago. To these, if the chronicle is to be complete, should be added the outer audience to "The Messiah"—a dense crowd that surrounded the Town Hall, standing patiently for three hours (beguiling the time, however, by plain-spoken, but not ill-natured, personalities on any one presumed to be foreign who attempted to edge his way through it), to catch the choruses of the Oratorio, which were distinctly audible from the outside; a few of the patient standers armed with a cheap handbook of the music. Could not something be done, at the close of these Festivals, to satisfy the hungerers and thirsters after Handel belonging to a class unable, by reason of their fortunes, to enjoy performances so costly? The answer, we know, is, that such concession might be taken advantage of by those richer and shabbier than the persons for whose benefit it was planned; but the idea is worth stating, and to entertain it will not embarrass the proceedings of any direction. Those who were within the Town Hall will long remember how "The Messiah" went this year at Birmingham. The third and last concert was of the very longest. In Germany, a Symphony such as Mendelssohn's in a minor, would have had an act to itself. Here, it merely commenced the concert—Signor Costa's "Dream" closing its first portion. The latter, though virtually a pièce d'occasion, has the permanent value of graceful, unaffected, tuneful music. A sweet and tranquil solo for the soprano, —a fiery chorus, "exceeding delicately writ," (to use a phrase of Queen Elizabeth's),—and a charming love-song for the tenor (encored) may any of them become stock pieces. The final chorus, too, has the courtly sprightliness befitting a serenade to a royal bride, though the rhythm is not one of those which we like the best. The instrumentation throughout is dainty. The principal singers were Madame Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves. The rest of the concert was made up of music too well known to call for notice in detail.

Friday morning's sacred music consisted of Mr. H. Leslie's new Biblical Cantata, Mendelssohn's lovely "Lauda Sion," and Beethoven's Mass in c. Regarding the words of "Judith," which have been selected from the Apocrypha and Bible, by Mr. Henry F. Chorley, it must suffice to say that the legend is divided into three scenes—the first laid in the beleaguered city of Bethulia; the second in the camp of Holofernes; the third ("Night, and Day-break," devoted to the sacrifice of the invading chieftain, and the triumphant return of the heroine of Israel. Each scene is preluded by an instrumental movement, almost as much developed as the portion of a Symphony, the entire performance occupying as much time as a long single act of an Oratorio. The Cantata contains three or four elaborately developed choruses. The principal, or heroine's part, is written for a mezzo-soprano voice. Besides songs for the principal singers, there are also a terzetto of considerable extent, a duet with chorus, for tenor and soprano. The three instrumental introductions are in as many different styles—the first, strict—the second (which was received with applause in spite of Festival regulations), brilliant and martial—the third, picturesque and delicate. Thus, the amount of contrast provided for and attempted is considerable. The above specification, and our statement of the general impression that "Judith" will add to, not diminish, Mr. H. Leslie's reputation as a composer, must, at least for the present, stand instead of criticism.

With regard to the manner in which the Cantata was presented at Birmingham, we may speak with less restraint. Never, in our experience, has an English composer's oratorio come forth under chances of success approaching those of "Judith." The execution was in most respects excellent. The declamation, finish, and vocal power of Madame Viardot, as the heroine, were remarkable,—her prayer in the tent of Holofernes could not, as a display of sublime art, be exceeded. The tenor and bass parts could not have been in better hands than those of Mr. Sims Reeves (Ozias the priest), who was encored in the finale to the first part—and of Signor Belletti (Holofernes). Madame Castellan took pains as soprano. The orchestra and chorus were well prepared. That two slips, in two important moments of the Cantata, took place, and that the general execution of it became less and less confident as the work went on, are to be accounted for by its being in the hands of its composer. For a man under such circumstances to conduct an untried composition of his own, from first to last, with unflinching nerve and unflagging energy, must imply one of two things—long experience, or want of sensibility. The result in this case was, here and there, some loss of power, some slight confusion. The Cantata, however, seemed to please a large audience, whose silent attention has never been surpassed, and at the end its composer was greeted with much applause.

The second part of the last morning's performances consisted of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Beethoven's Mass in c—both excellently performed, and bringing the Festival to a glorious conclusion. It seems, however, that the expectation of its surpassing former meetings in its gross receipts, which was mentioned last week, has proved fallacious.—"The times," the exhaustion of a late royal visit, and the distraction caused by the "celebrity" at Leeds, may be given as the reasons for this;—certainly no falling off in the musical attractions of the "music-meeting" for 1858.

LONDON.—ENGLISH OPERA.—Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison have put forth their programme for the coming season, at Drury Lane. In this they announce a new opera, by Mr. Balfe, a version of "Martha," and Mr. Bristow's "Rip Van Winkle," as the novelties which it is their intention to produce. We have mentioned Mr. Patey as among their new engagements. The list includes, moreover, Mr. Gratton Kelly and Mr. Terrott, Mdlle. Pauline Vaneri,—and promises the return to the stage of Miss Rainforth. The orchestra is to number fifty players, conducted by Mr. Mellon, than whom there is no better English conductor;—the chorus is to consist of fifty voices. The season is to begin on Monday; and the version of M. Flotow's opera is to come out on the 16th.—Athenæum.

PARIS.—On dit, the Prince Poniatowski has just finished an opera intended for the Académie Impériale de Musique et de Danse. Mr. Roger's benefit at the Opera was a bumper. Many were attracted as much by curiosity as by any other motive.—Madame Ugalde sustained the part of Leonora, in the Trovatore, for the first time, and as the fair artist had undertaken to learn the music in eight hours, and as the character was entirely antagonistic to her powers and talents, her friends and admirers were anxious to see how she would get over the difficulties. Mdlle. Demerit-Lablache appeared as Azucena, and obtained the favor of the French journals, who descend lavishly on those qualities in which the lady was eminently deficient when she made her début at the Royal Italian Opera. Of course, Roger is praised to the skies in Manrico, while M. Bonnehée, of course, is magnificent as the Count di Luna. Wonderful! capital! where every thing musical, if French, is perfect, pure, and transcendent! Miss Thompson, the young English vocalist who carried off the first prize at the late examination of the Conservatoire, has been engaged for the Grand-Opéra, and will make her début as Mathilde in Guillaume Tell on the occasion of the rentrée of M. Gueymard on the 1st of October—that is, if the same influence be not exerted against her as was made use of against Miss Birch some years ago.—Musical World.

The 1st of September is the opening day of the Parisian musical and theatrical season. Of some of the novelties produced we may be able to speak shortly. Meanwhile, among events which have lately happened in the French capital, may be mentioned the passing appearances of Madame Ugalde and Madame Merie-Lablache (the lady known here as Mdlle. de Merie) at the Grand Opéra,—the success of Mdlle. Artot (M. d'Ortigue, of the Journal des Débats, being our warrant) in the revival, with mutilations, of M. Gounod's "Sapho." That opera, by the way, may possibly be shortly tried both in Germany and Italy. Among coming events are announced the publication (in score) of four Symphonies by that pleasing and thoughtful composer, M. Reber, and of three grand Pianoforte Trios by M. Litolf.—Athenæum.

BABEN-BADEN.—A grand concert was given here on the 29th of August, for the benefit of the Hospitals of the town, under the direction of Hector Berlioz. The orchestra was selected from the talent of Baden, Carlsruhe and Strasbourg. Among the noticeable pieces was the symphony with chorus of M. Berlioz, entitled Romeo et Juliette—or, more properly, the four first parts of the symphony—and the overture to Euryanthe. Herr Litolf performed, with the orchestra, the allegro, adagio and scherzo of his fourth Symphonie Concertante. Vivier executed some new morceaux on the horn with irresistible effect; and Mad. Charton-Demeur added largely to the attractions by her singing. In the favourite air from the Domino Noir, and the beautiful song from the Nozze di Figaro, "Deh vieni, non tardar," more especially, she was overwhelmed with plaudits.

THE SONG FESTIVAL: A Compendium of Music of every variety; Psalms, Songs, Ballads, Duets, Trios, Quartets, Glee, Sacred and Operatic Choruses, suited to the wants of Choirs, Singing Classes, Glee Clubs, Musical Conventions, Chorus Societies, and the Drawing Room. By Virgil C. Taylor. 50

Mr. Taylor is well known to the musical public by several books compiled by him and enriched by numerous compositions of his own. Of these the most prominent are the "Sacred Minstrel," "Golden Lyre," "Chimes," "Celestina," "Choral Anthems" and "Concordia." In the present work an effort has been made to meet the general wants of all classes, but more particularly of musical conventions.

In the original department, Mr. Taylor contributes the Chorus, "Tis Song makes Fresh the Weary," the Glee, "Moonlight on the sea," and other pieces. "The Song Festival" also contains selections and arrangements from the most approved works, including those of HANDEL, ROSSINI, VERDI, BENEDICT, WEIGL, BISHOP, and others, together with a number of beautiful pieces from Mr. H. D. MONSON, author of "The Child's Wish," "Revolutionary Tea," and other popular Sheet Music publications. The book contains thirty-nine Opera and other Choruses, Glee, Quartets, Trios, Duets, Songs, and Ballads, nearly any one of which if published in sheet form, would cost the price of the book. It cannot fail to prove very acceptable to those for whom it is prepared.

The First Piano-Forte.

From the French.

The two heroes of this little history present a complete contrast. They began, continued, and ended their worldly career, under nearly opposite circumstances. One, at first rich, became suddenly poor, through extravagance and dissipation; the other, originally poor, became all at once rich, by the force of ingenuity and industry. The one gloried in his high-sounding title; the other was proud of being simply an artificer. The glittering courtier revelled in the royal saloons of Versailles; the laborious operative passed his days in a Parisian workshop. One finished his life on the public scaffold, condemned in 1793 by a populace driven to excesses by the tyranny of their superiors; the other peacefully expired amidst the blessings of his family and friends, his honest industry rewarded by affluence, and honored by the favor of royalty. Finally, the first called himself Armand de Gontaut, Duke of Lauzun; the second was Sebastian Erard.

At the epoch when our tale commences, Sebastian Erard was a poor artisan whom reverse of fortune had driven from Strasburg, his native town, to seek, alone, without money or friends, his daily bread in Paris. He was well-educated; in his early youth he had studied drawing, architecture, and had devoted some time to scientific pursuits. He had dreamt, with the artless enthusiasm of youth, of one day distinguishing himself as an artist, a professor, or an architect. Conceive then, of his disappointment, when, at the age of sixteen, he found himself a journeyman maker of harpsichords. Pride and ambition unceasingly tormented him. In the obscure workshop, where he pursued his monotonous avocation, he frequently gave way to a certain degree of vexation. But, happily, Sebastian Erard possessed nobler gifts than fall to the lot of most persons in his humble grade. Even his melancholy was no misfortune to him, for it made him a thinker. His intelligence again turned his thoughts to good account, and his ambition made him act upon them. The presentiment, that he should some day materially better his condition, never left him; and, inspired by this hope, he seldom complained aloud, but diligently pursued his work; for well he knew that any advancement he should make must be by following the very path along which he was now travelling. Instead, therefore, of bolting off the course, as ambitious but thoughtless young men are apt to do, Erard reflected deeply on the nature of his art, and whether it might not be in his power to effect some important improvement upon it. With a critical eye and ear, he at length detected the deficiencies of the instrument it was his business to make—ill-toned, inharmonious spinets and harpsichords, with which the ears of the court and the town were content to be charmed. He remarked that, from their imperfect mechanism, it was impossible they could remain long in tune, and that even when their intonation was correct, the sounds produced were harsh and wiry. These imperfections, which constant use of the instrument prevented some of the best musicians from perceiving, became apparent to the inquiring mind and apt ear of the young artisan. But a remedy for them had yet to be discovered; and for that object Erard incessantly plied his invention. At length he became acquainted with the principle of an improved key-board, introduced by Silbermann, a German manufacturer, and that engendered in him a new and happy idea, the result of which the reader will presently learn.

moment in working out his new idea theoretically—for he had not the means of doing so practically—the other actor in our drama performed a very different part. Engaged in the useless employments and profitless pastimes of a man of fashion, the Duke of Lauzun sought to revive, at the court of Louis XVI, the dangerous gallantries and dissipated manners of the gay but brilliant court of Louis XV. and the regent. Nor was he ill-calculated to effect, by his own example, so evil an object: he was handsome, rich, and possessed a high flow of spirits, with a good share of intellect and wit. His conduct was not, however, always pleasing to Marie Antoinette, the queen; but so great a favorite was Lauzun with the king, that she never ventured to avow her dislike of him openly.

Amongst other things which displeased her majesty, was a courtship sometimes carried beyond the bounds of good breeding, which the duke had established with the Marchioness de Milleroy, a lady whose position as governess to the royal children ought to have induced, on her part, the most guarded conduct. As there was nothing positively improper in Lauzun and the marchioness forming a mutual regard, both took umbrage at the little checks which the queen thought it her duty on several occasions to give them. An opportunity to resent these supposed affronts soon occurred, and by a circumstance which brought Sebastian Erard most unexpectedly within the pale of court patronage.

Marie Antoinette, though surrounded by all the allurements of the French court, could not forget the land of her birth. "The Austrian," as she was currently called, would often retire to the solitude of her chamber, to call up from the depths of her memory scenes of childhood and of home. She gathered about her a host of objects, which served to remind her of Austria. The books, pictures, and sculptures, which adorned her private apartments, were all from Germany. But one article was wanting to make the collection complete. The young Queen of France was a proficient musician, and loved the melodies of her native land; but how could she give effect to them with the inharmonious spinet in her chamber? She resolved, therefore, to have a harpsichord from Vienna, and soon a magnificent instrument of improved tone and elegant form, well worthy of a royal residence, replaced the old spinet. That it should be displayed to the best advantage, the young queen determined to give a concert, at which she commanded her instructor and countryman, Gluck, the celebrated composer, to assist.

The new harpsichord was constructed by Silbermann, with his latest improvements, and won the admiration of all present. Amongst the guests were the Duke of Lauzun and the Marchioness de Milleroy. The praises bestowed upon the instrument made the latter envious of its possessor, despite the difference in their position and rank; and she demanded of the Duke de Lauzun a harpsichord of equal excellence and external beauty to that of the queen. The age of chivalry had not even then passed away, and the lover was bound to obey the wishes of his intended, be they ever so extravagant. But another and perhaps stronger motive prompted him. He saw, by complying with this request, a means of mortifying her majesty—of, in fact, lessening her popularity. He took care on every opportunity to point general attention to the readiness with which Marie Antoinette preferred the productions of her native to those of her adopted country. And he undertook to prove, in the present instance, that this preference was not guided by merit. "In a short time," he boasted, "I will produce an instrument of French manufacture superior in tone and in magnificence of appearance to the vaunted importation of the queen." He possessed wealth, ingenuity, and perseverance; his boast was therefore not an idle one.

The duke made the tour of all the eminent manufactories in Paris, but found no one who had enough of courage to undertake the seemingly impossible task he proposed; for all had heard of the marvellous harpsichord of Silbermann. After nearly giving up the pursuit in despair, he determined to visit the manufactories of a humbler grade. In one of these, a young and intelligent journeyman happened to overhear the offer made by the duke to his master, by whom it was declined. He started from his seat, and with a confident brow, declared he would undertake the commission.

The Duke de Lauzun at first took little notice of the young artisan; but won at length by his earnestness and enthusiasm, consented to listen to a detail of the improvements in the making of harpsichords, which, in addition to those of Silbermann, the new candidate for his patronage proposed. With the leave of his employer, Sebastian Erard (for it was he) hastened to his lodgings for the drawings and notes he had made of his new invention. An hour afterwards he was closeted with the duke at the residence of the latter. His explanations were so satisfactory, his plans so manifestly practicable, that Lauzun immediately engaged him to make the required instrument. A workshop was fitted up with an expensive collection of tools and materials in the duke's house, in which the young artisan employed himself early and late.

His perseverance and industry were at length crowned with success. When his work was finished, that of decoration began. This was the first instrument which had a moveable key-board, shifted by pedals, to modify its tones at the will of the player—which had a soft and a loud pedal. It was, in short, THE FIRST PIANO-FORTE. The Duke de Lauzun was delighted, and determined that no accessory of ornament should be wanting. He caused it to be enclosed in a magnificent case of gilded japan-work; the pedals were surmounted by a mythological group, exquisitely carved, from a design by the sculptor Houdon; whilst the profuse gilding was in many places relieved by exquisite paintings by Boucher, Greuze, and Vauloo, the most celebrated artists of the day. Finally, this triumph of art and mechanical skill was placed in the apartments of the Marchioness de Milleroy, who gave a concert, which the Queen condescended to attend.

The admiration lately excited by her majesty's new German harpsichord was now completely thrown into the shade by that expressed for the instrument of native manufacture. The tones it gave out from under the skilful fingers of Piccini, the Italian composer, who was the first to play upon it, blended exquisitely with the beautiful voice of the Princess de Polignac, whom he accompanied. The queen herself was no less enchanted than the rest, and unwittingly hastened on that triumph which the malevolence of the duke and the marchioness had prompted them to anticipate.

"Pray," inquired the Queen of Lauzun, as she broke up a group of detractors, of which he was the most active and sarcastic, "to whose skill are we indebted for this charming instrument?"

"To that, your majesty, of a Frenchman," replied the duke, with as marked an emphasis as he durst assume.

"His name?"

"Sebastian Erard."

"Indeed! that is a person I never heard of before," rejoined the queen.

"Unfortunately, the names of few meritorious Frenchmen," retorted the duke, laying a stress upon the latter word, "are known at the court of Versailles."

Without noticing this discourteous sneer, Marie Antoinette inquired to whom the piano belonged. Lauzun explained that it was made by his direction, and that he was the possessor. "You?" repeated the queen, with the good-natured archness by which she was always ready to conciliate the most undeserved ill-will. "And pray, what use can a colonel of hussars make of so elegant, so lady-like an instrument?"

The duke replied, with an affectation of sentiment, that music was his most cherished relief from the cares of state and the fatigues of military duty.

The truth was, Marie was so charmed with the instrument, that she longed to become its possessor, and demanded upon what terms Lauzun would part with it. This was exactly the result he wished: and, with every appearance of sorrowful humility, he assured her majesty it was not in his power to part with it.

"How so?" she asked, a little piqued. "It is your own, and —"

"It was mine yesterday," interrupted the duke, "but to-day it has become the property of —"

"Of whom?" impatiently inquired the queen.

"Of the Marchioness de Milleroy," answered Lauzun, with a low bow.

Where pleasure is the idol, and frivolity the pursuit, it takes but a trifling occurrence to create a sensation. This was the case on the present occasion. The queen, despising this equivocation, turned quickly from the now triumphant courtier and, quitting the saloon abruptly, broke up the party.

Enough, however, had been done to make the fortune of Sebastian Erard. Next morning he was sent for to Versailles, and presented to her majesty, who not only ordered from him a new piano-forte, but obtained from the king a brevet, or patent, for his ingenious improvements. Once honored with court patronage, the young artisan's early dreams of ambition were speedily realized.

Meantime a circumstance occurred which exercised an unfavorable influence over the career of the Duke de Lauzun. Extravagance had so impaired his fortune, that his union with the Marchioness de Milleroy—herself by no means rich for her station—was deferred till an appointment which he expected to receive at the death of a relation should become vacant. The command of the French guards had for a long period been vested in the chiefs of the duke's family, and his uncle, the Marshal de Biron, hitherto held the appointment. The Marshal died, and Lauzun believed that, as a matter of course, besides succeeding to the title (his uncle left no fortune), he would be invested with the vacant and lucrative command. To his mortification, however, he was disappointed, and through, as he afterwards learned, the influence of Marie Antoinette. From that moment he changed his side in politics. The first lowerings of the revolutionary storm, which afterwards burst with such appalling severity, had already clouded the political horizon. He joined the opposition, then headed by the Orleans family—he wrote pamphlets against the court—he wrote epigrams against the queen—he satirized the nobility. In short, he performed an active part towards exasperating the populace against their rulers—towards hastening the deplorable crisis, which had so fatal a termination.

During the progress of that terrible revolution, to so insane a pitch was popular indignation raised against the aristocracy, that to be nobly born was considered a crime punishable with death. The king and queen were early victims; their supporters and adherents followed. Lastly, even that section of the nobility who in the beginning led the popular tumult, were successively led to the scaffold. The Duke de Lauzun was one of the earliest sacrifices of the popular nobility. He ended his career under the guillotine, leaving behind him the record of only one meritorious action—and even that was performed by accident and out of pique—namely, rescuing from unmerited obscurity the talents and industry of Sebastian Erard.

The revolution had no other ill effect upon the latter, than that of interrupting the operations of a manufactory which had rapidly grown to be the most considerable in Paris. Sebastian Erard, respected by his fellow-citizens, was intrusted by them with a responsible municipal office. In executing it, a part of his duty lay in restraining, as much as possible, the wholesale pillage which was going on in all the residences of the king and the nobility. He had occasion to hasten to Versailles for that purpose, and found that most of the apartments had been already ransacked without mercy. Those formerly occupied by the Marchioness de Milleroy were, on his arrival, undergoing spoliation. The "first piano-forte" was still there. Rough hands had already been laid upon it. His threats and entreaties were for a time vain; but when the pillagers heard his name, and the story of the instrument, they desisted. The piano was unanimously ceded to him; and it is said that his descendants still possess several interesting relics of THE FIRST PIANO-FORTE.

An Imperial Pitch-fork.

The Emperor of the French is endeavoring to create that kind of organization which would constitute perfect national unity. Napoleon is the motive brain, the French nation the body, the public offices the limbs. In this sense every person administering to any function of the entire body is a public-administrator; the tradesman is a purveyor, as he sometimes politely calls himself here; the theatre is a department, and music is the subject of a special commission. For it is no doubt in this comprehensive view of his duties that the Emperor Napoleon has just issued a commission to ascertain the possibility of fixing upon a "uniform diapason" or pitch. The commission, which is admirably formed, includes amongst its members Rossini. The object is one which has often been desiderated, but has not been attained, if even any progress has been made towards it. For want of such a fixed standard, there is not only a constant confusion between the instruments of the same country, but there has been a progressive change in the pitch of instruments and of vocal composition, within the last century especially. Many of the vocal works of Handel and his contemporaries are now difficult to sing from, being "too high." The causes of this perpetual elevation of the pitch are tolerably well known, though they are not absolutely clear.

One may reside in the tendency of the musical scale itself, as it is formed from the bass, to extend the intervals upwards; inasmuch that the higher notes become "too sharp," and in the process of temperament are reduced to bring them into their general relations with each other. This confusion of the scale as it is formed amongst European nations—and Heaven defend us from adopting the Syriac or Chinese scale—is one amongst the millions of examples of that eccentricity in the mechanism of nature which forbids human systematizing. We cannot reduce nature to our narrow idea of "perfection."

It is, however, probable, that the progression of the pitch is principally due to a moral cause. The composer desires to make his work "brilliant;" he throws it rather high in the scale. The performer desires to produce a "brilliant" execution, and he tunes his instrument rather sharp. The audacious singer dares the instrumentalist to go as far as he can in that direction; and thus, in the ambition of brilliancy, the singer, the instrumental performer and the composer are constantly working upwards. "Concert pitch" is a phrase colloquially employed to mean a pitch higher than that which is considered generally desirable for instruments in our day.

To correct this tendency to aberration natural standards have been suggested. Instrumental tuners will produce their own "pitchforks" as a sufficient standard; the pitchfork itself, however, having progressively advanced, though somewhat in the rear of executed music; and the older pitchforks are flatter in tone than the modern.

The song of birds has sometimes been pointed out as a natural standard, but amongst the difficulties of employing it is that of reducing the note sounded by a bird to any part of our scale. Gardiner, no doubt, employs musical notes to imitate the natural tone of birds; but how different would these notes sound on the pianoforte, or even on the most beautiful violin, from that sharp, delicate chirp of the bird which eludes systematized reductions to our larger and more precisely divided gamut! We must seek the standard among ourselves.

Amongst all the nations of the earth, although they are not the most musical, the French, perhaps, are the very best to assist us in this particular search, especially with the aid of the great master of music, Rossini. The object would be attained if we could fix upon a piece of metal, with a given standard of purity—not silver, which proves to be one of the least sonorous of metals—and with an ascertained weight and dimensions. But, as Sir Robert Peel said, "What is a pound?" The standard of weight and measure itself has varied, and still varies amongst us English. "A pound" is equivalent to a pint of water, or nearly so; but what is a "pint" of water? What is a "foot" measure? The length of a man's foot—which varies, without any monstrosity, from nine to thirteen inches; as a "barley corn" varies with every grain in a field of barley. It was the French who first systematically based measurements upon a natural standard, in deputed Humboldt and the companion whom that philosopher has just lost, Bonpland, to measure a degree at the equator by a scientific process. Here probably is the nearest approach to a natural standard, corrected by large data, that human science can attain. Upon that datum the French have based their systematic measurement; they are a systematic people, and we see them, more hopefully than any other, engaged in the present enterprise.

The consequences are likely to be important, even for the higher branches of music itself; nay, even to composition. The same mania for "brilliance" which has beset the performer has attended the composer, and it has been uncorrected by the knowledge of anything like an accurate standard. It is possible that in a country like France, a gracious Emperor, strengthened by a sufficient reverence for music, might place restraints upon aberrant composers, and keep the wilder sort within something like bounds of decency. The great master who is in the present commission, although he has been copious in music which unpractised singers account difficult, is conspicuous for producing the largest amount of effect through each peculiar kind of voice for which the music is destined. In this sense, he is a composer whose works are easy to sing, though powerful and brilliant in their result; and it is because there have been few musicians who have evinced so keen a sense of the natural scale. A permanent imperial commission, such as we have imagined, to control the excesses of musicians, especially of composers, would prevent a Verdi from giving to the world those shouting orations, which are very impressive, for the hour, but do more than anything to break down voices. He has revived the manner of that French singer and teacher, Adrien, whose destructive method of exaggerated effort is deprecated by the accomplished Fetis.

"The emission of the sound never being made in a natural manner and the strength of the lungs being constantly exerted, the most robust voices were unable to resist the fatigue of a labor for which the Herculean strength of Adrien had been sufficient. Thus, for several years, voices which were free and of good quality, and which had not been procured without much difficulty, were destroyed before they were able to leave the Royal Court of Music."

Singers for Verdi's operas should have been taught in this manner, and they would last, as he permits singers to do, for two or three years.

But a permanent commission of music might exercise other useful checks upon abuse. In civilized countries commerce is the handmaid of music, as it is of most services in general demand; and even in music commerce cannot refrain from its adulterations or suppressions. We suspect an instance of this kind under which the public of our own country suffers, although unconscious of its privations. No instrument has hitherto been found so available for general use as the pianoforte; which has assisted in carrying the finest music into every home of the country. It has its imperfections, and the principal is the incapacity of the machinery to give forth a continuous sound. To amend this defect has been one of the problems of practical music. Various efforts have been made, and a good many years since, the plan invented by a working pianoforte-maker appeared to promise success. The man had the same name with an eminent Roman composer, Isouard; but we doubt whether there was any relationship, or even whether they were from the same country. The plan consisted in throwing a stream of air upon a string after it had been once vibrated by the percussion of the hammer. Another method of obtaining continuity in keyed instruments is exemplified by the "hurdy-gurdy", in which the string is vibrated by a circular bow, though not with the happiest effects. A very simple but ingenious application of the same principle, however, was exhibited in this country a few years back. We heard the instrument, though we had not an opportunity of seeing the mechanism. It consisted, we believe, of a silken cylinder, moving not transversely to the string, but longitudinally—parallel to the extension of the string itself. The effect was exceedingly sweet, adding to the brilliancy of the pianoforte the plaintive drawn-out sound of the violin, with a power of continuity ad libitum, and of crescendo; though it still wants of course that crowning beauty of the bow instrument, the power of giving accurate intonation to the leading notes.—This perfection of a pianoforte, we believe, was publicly exhibited only once, at St. Martin's Hall, before a very small audience; once again, privately before the Queen; and then, with its inventor and exhibitor, a M. Kaufman, it disappeared into space, and was never heard of again. Had envious pianoforte makers assassinated M. Kaufman, that unpretending, white-haired, elderly gentleman, who was so proud of his invention? The police have never reported such a crime, but we have before us the obvious fact, that if the invention had been successful, it would at once have thrown out of use all existing pianofortes, unless they had been adapted, and would have immediately lowered in value by 50 per cent. or more, all existing stock, representing no doubt, some hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling. A permanent commission, such as that of the Emperor Napoleon, would have fixed Kantian for the time, and would have exhausted experiments to ascertain the value of his invention; but could not M. Rossini and his colleagues re-discover for us the lost Kaufman?—London Spectator.

[From the Liverpool Mercury, of September 22d.]

This far-famed, romantic, and most "beautiful of vales" witnessed yesterday a sight that will not be easily forgotten by those who had the pleasure of being present. Great numbers arrived at Llangollen early by excursion trains from Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, &c., to witness the opening day of the great meeting of Welsh bards, Druids, and ovates—a meeting that occurs only once in seven years, the last having taken place at Rhyddlan Castle, Denbigh, in 1851. Of course we cannot undertake to classify the many objects of interest in and around this beautiful town.

The Gorsedd dates as far back as the time of Prydain ab Aedd Mawr, about a thousand years before the Christian era. The chair of Powis was founded by three royal bards in the sixth century.

The eisteddfod dates its origin from the time of Owain, at Maxenwledig (Maximus the Emperor), and it marks the era of British freedom from the Roman yoke and the restoration of the supremacy of the British language. Its object is, in the first place, to promote the study and cultivation of the poetry, music, and general literature of the Cymry (Welsh); to preserve the Welsh language; to encourage native arts and manufactures; and to rescue from oblivion the national usages of the Principality. In the second place, its object is to promote a spirit of loyalty and patriotism among the people: of mutual confidence and intercourse between the rich and poor; and of social harmony among all classes.

These literary contests are the national sports of the Welsh race; and a run for the best thousand lines on Immortality, or the best essay on the Celtic literature, is their "Derby" or "St. Leger." Deprive them of these national pastimes, and they will cease to have any incentive to the love of their fatherland.

At the present meeting, prizes to the amount of £500 are to be awarded to the most successful competitors.

The list of patrons comprises nearly every gentleman in the Principality, as well as the border counties.

Last evening a meeting took place in the marquée, at which speeches were delivered on subjects connected with the eisteddfod and the literature of the Principality. Several poems were recited, patriotic songs sung in the Welsh language, and national airs were performed on the harp by the minstrel of the eisteddfod, Mr. Ellis Roberts, harpist to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.

The morning was very fine, the sun shining forth in all its glory. At half-past ten, the procession left the Ponsonby Arms Hotel, for the bardic circle, situate about half a mile distant. The following was the order of procession:—The band of the Royal Denbigh Rifles, playing "the Druids' March"; the Druids having with them their white flag, inscribed on which was the word "Holiness," in Welsh. Female on horseback in ancient Welsh costume: the blue flag of the bards, with the Welsh word for "Peace;" the ovates, with great flag, closely followed by the bards and Druids; the committee men and a number of other gentlemen filling up the rear. Arrived at the bardic spot, a circle was formed, and the presiding bard, the Rev. J. Williams, rector of Llan-y-Mowddy, delivered a brief explanation of bardism and the ceremonies of the gorsedd. The minstrel of the eisteddfod played on the harp "Y Bardd yn ei Awen." The gorsedd prayers were then said, and after a few other ceremonies, the procession returned to the marquée in the same order.

The proceedings throughout were enlivened by the music of four harpists and the bands of the Royal Denbigh Rifles and Denbighshire Cavalry.

Premiums were awarded to the successful candidates—for the best poem on the "Transfiguration," of £10 and medal; "The Traitor;" the "Harvest Anthem." For a best orator of any nation, in any language, who shall deliver the most effective speech on the following subject:—"The neglect by a people of their nationality is the certain prelude to their debasement and extinction;" first prize, silver coronal; second, silver armlet. The best singer. Recitation of Caractacus's speech. Contest between the Royal Denbigh Rifles and the Denbighshire Cavalry. Best essay on "Mineral Resources"—a prize of £25 offered by the young men of Llangollen. Singing with the harp. "Bardism."

The proceedings of the day were brought to a close by the singing of the Welsh Anthem. During the latter part of the day there was a large attendance, it being estimated that there were not fewer than 4000 persons present.

In the evening a concert took place in the marquée, the conductor being Mr. John Owen, of Chester, assisted by Miss Williams, of the Philharmonic, Liverpool; Miss Sophia L. Brook and Mr. Jarvis, Manchester; and Mr. Ellis Roberts, harpist to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

MR. EDITOR.—I cannot, for one moment, entertain the supposition but that you, and in fact every one who is acquainted with the nature of the production of a musical succession of sounds from a string, will readily answer the question with which my last communication closed, by admitting that the divisional proportion necessary for the production of either a major or a minor scale, when the string is tuned to it, is the same as that required when tuned to B flat.

What shall we say then? If the identity or peculiarity of an interval or succession in music be the consequent of proportion, is it possible that like peculiarity will not be the result of like proportion?

The term "like" may, possibly, by some of your readers be interpreted differently from the construction intended by me. For the purpose of defining the kind of "like"-ness I mean let us have recourse to an illustration in which the eye is the judge instead of the ear, for there are some facts that are easier to be seen than heard, and vice versa.

Let these characters, M, N, O, represent three intervals of a scale, say the major 2d, major 3d, and perfect 4th, from the tonic or key-note.

Then let these: π , σ , \circ , represent three like intervals of some other scale of greater velocity of vibration.

The difference perceived by the eye, after examination, is, that the three last characters are smaller as compared with the first three; but the identity, peculiarity, or principle of the two sets is like. The impression made upon the eye in both cases is of the same three shapes and figures, distinguished from each other by the same differences of outline. 'Tis true, an associated quality may easily and rapidly be conceived, such, for instance, as that "the large set were intended for papa, and the small ones for the baby:" an idea, that in this connection may appear somewhat ludicrous, but by no means illogical, as shown in the reasoning of every day experience.

It has often struck me that the comparison: As size is to the eye, so is velocity of vibration to the ear, is about as good as can be made. For instance, size by itself considered will establish the identity of a greater and less quantity of the same material; so, likewise, does the velocity of vibration establish the identity of the sounds of greater and less velocity. The ear, like the eye, perceives the difference without having recourse to arithmetical figures, or measures. But, either to exhibit a geometrical or a musical figure a defined proportion of size to something given is necessary in a geometrical figure, and in a musical figure a defined proportion of velocity to some velocity of vibration given is required. Thus, musical tones that are such, separately considered, if delivered indiscriminately, and without reference to scale will not form a musical figure. So, a figure of irregular proportion, simply exhibit different velocities, but regular proportion, though in reality a figure, is not sufficiently defined and harmonious to be recognized and retained in the memory.

But, to return more closely to the subject of our proposition, is it maintained that like proportion does not, or should not exist between one scale and another; that the major third in one key should be less major than in another; in short, that the peculiarity or inherent property of the intervals should be lessened in one key, and retained in another?

"With all the regard that Mlle. Piccolomini professed to have for 'the dear Irish,' in her speech she made to the Dublin students the other day, when they drew her carriage in triumph through the streets, she does not seem to estimate them so highly as her own countrymen; for, under the same circumstances, some years ago, at Turin, she rebuked the outrageous enthusiasm of the populace, and insisted upon getting out of her carriage, saying, that she would 'walk with them, as friends, but nothing could induce her to make Italians beasts of burden.' Beasts of burden is good. New Yorkers will please make a note of the observation."

I confess I am not at all displeased at the publicity thus unintentionally given to an ovation, of which Mlle. Piccolomini has been the recipient in her own country—in critical Italy—and that, too, in one of the most important musical cities. But is it just and fair to appeal to New Yorkers "to make a note of observation!" when it has been extensively published in The London Times and other English papers, that Mlle. Piccolomini did attempt to prevent the Dublin demonstration, but could not do so for several very excellent reasons? In the first place, she could not leave the carriage, as the rain was falling in torrents; then she could not speak sufficient English to make the students understand her; and, more than all, it is not so easy—as Irishmen will agree—to restrain the Gown men of Trinity when they once have resolved to give vent to their proverbial enthusiasm.

Descending a step still lower on the scale, it is found that there are some writers who marry her (without previously consulting the interested parties) with an English Peer "as distinguished for his refined taste in les beaux arts as for his immense possessions and ancient pedigree," while others gravely assert that his (the Peer's) hand has been rejected by Mlle. Piccolomini, and amply discuss the reasons that prompted her to do so. A weekly paper takes great pains in proving that she is only a "Princess" from her maternal side, and a "mere Countess," through her father. Now, Sir, I have yet to learn whether it is of any consequence to the public whether an artist has a pedigree two miles long or not, whether she marries a lord or does not. Madame Sontag did not come here as the Countess Rossi; in the same manner, Piccolomini comes here as an artist, and not as a princess, which title she dropped on her first appearance in public, of her own free will, and not, as it is asserted, by command of Cardinal Piccolomini. I, personally, in speaking of her to the public, have not made the slightest allusion to her "princely lineage;" and I trust the public will not forget that, after all, she is a young and enthusiastic girl, who has undoubted claims upon the kindness and good will of everybody, including that of the disappointed dead-heads, and that she has every right to maintain her maiden name as long as she pleases.

I am the public's most obedient servant,
R. ULLMAN.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 16, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—We commence this week the publication of an exceedingly beautiful and, in parts, highly dramatic Cantata by FRANZ SCHUBERT, called "Miriam's Song of Triumph." It will occupy from thirty to forty pages. It is for Soprano solo with chorus and piano-forte accompaniment. Nothing could be much more interesting for practice in private circles, or more effective for short performances of choral societies, great or small. It is a composition which could hardly fail to delight an audience, if well performed. We shall give the remainder of it in alternation with the piano-forte arrangement of Lucrezia Borgia.

A Friend's Advice with Acknowledgments.

A writer in the Providence Journal, one of the worshippers at the brazen feet of the colossal Verdi—or rather (to borrow his own vivid and poetic image) one of those who go down on their knees when "Trovatore comes galloping on"—administers a mild rebuke to us, which, so very funny is it and so flattering to the tastes and prejudices of "the masses," we certainly expected to see widely copied. But since it is not, we give it the benefit of what circulation we can ourselves, for it is too good to be lost. The writer seems, by the heading of his article, to have gone frantically inspired at the sight of an uncouth, cabalistic name that coined itself in a careless moment to our mind as indicative of the peculiar stage into which Italian Opera appears to us to have just now degenerated. But inasmuch as he endorses and adopts the name, without defining, we may venture to continue for some time to use it.

TROVATOPERA.—Somebody will have to hoop friend Dwight of the Boston Journal of Music or he will burst with indignation. It seems that Strakosch has had the impertinence to go to Boston and advertise the performance of four Italian operas, after Dwight has been thundering away against Italian operas in his weekly sheet, and proving, as Shakespeare's clown did of the mustard, that it was nought. —Now as Dwight seems to aim at regenerating the musical world of Boston, of bringing the vulgar herd to the true blue creed of adoration of everything Teutonic and abhorrence of anything Iberian,—as he has couched his lance in emulation of La Mancha's Knight, and has rushed into the arena so many times and borne of the palm, (in his own estimation,) it does seem a little bold and insolent in Strakosch to come forward in this manner with sounding trumpets. Dwight has therefore let off a column of fine print in which he berates poor Italian opera most unmercifully. Perhaps "the flow of ink might save a blood-letting," or else he would certainly need an outlet for the fever that rages within. Dwight is like a bull which always goes frantic at the sight of a red rag. Put Trovatore before his eyes, and straightway he goes off into a savage fit and makes a terrible onslaught upon the image of Italian opera which he keeps ready to receive the attack, as Quilp kept the old figure head in his yard to be hacked and hewed in his belligerent moods.

It is very strange that the Boston people will not learn of Mr. Dwight to despise the wretched, empty, vapid, meaningless, tame, two-penny stuff which is perpetrated under the name of Italian opera! It is a very poor comment on his inductive and instructive powers that the Boston folks will go to hear Trovatore and Traviata, following therein the example of London and Paris and Italy. It is, perhaps, pardonable in Mr. Dwight to be a little sour and ill-natured and denunciative at finding all his admonitions thus disregarded, his theories ignored, his idols forsaken. It might be expected that the high priest of Teutonic worship would fulminate a little at seeing the hosts of heretics which assemble around the Italian altar. But alas! so it is. The Bostonians, it seems, are born to be free-thinkers—that is, thinking for themselves, and will not be whipped into any traces which they do not care to draw. Trovatore comes galloping on and down go the masses on their knees, while all alone on some granite point stands friend Dwight with upturned nose and darkling brow, scanning the motley herd which scorns his leadership and bends before the gallant knight whom he holds in hatred and contempt. It is of no use, friend Dwight! you can't write down, frown down, talk down, ridicule down Italian music. In spite of your theories, your rules, your musical mechanics, it is the music which pleases. You might as well stop that eternal outcry at what the world likes, if you do not; and, at least, spare those who take your journal for its original merit, the disgust of having to meet such unfair, ungenerous, one-sided, ill-natured philippics as that in your last Saturday's Journal.

Apart from the admirable wit of this production, we would call attention

1. To its magnanimous fairness in holding up to laughter something which we are supposed to have said, without letting it be seen what we have said. The reader will appreciate this fairness if he will take the pains to turn to our obnoxious article of two weeks back, entitled "Trovatopera," where he will be surprised to find that there is not one word against Italian music, or Italian opera, as such, nor one word of allusion to the German. On the contrary the starting point and key-note whence the article proceeds is an expression of regret that our good days of Italian opera seem to have past and yielded to a poorer fashion of the day, to smaller enterprises, which give us always Trovatore and almost nothing else, when we have glorious memories of Il Barbiere and of Tell, and Don Giovanni and I Puritani, and so many works more worthy of our admiration. Should we complain of such degeneracy if we despised the original stock itself? What we did animadvert upon was, first, the frittering away of all the lyric interest between numerous small rival operative enterprises, in the failure of all plans to establish Opera upon a permanent, broad, unitary basis: and, secondly, and more particularly, the low state of musical taste shown in the popular and fashionable admiration and almost exclusive patronage of such operas as the Trovatore, Rigoletto, and the like. We intimated that Italian opera now appears to mean Il Trovatore and nothing else, and that the opera troupes might properly be called Trovatore troupes. Plainly our witty "friend" agrees with us; he too regards Italian opera and Trovatore as synonymous, since he construes our dislike of the latter into treason to the former, and infers the treason wholly from that dislike in a special instance. Read our article and see.

2. Its high and noble theory of an Art critic's duties. We confess we had entertained a different theory; but we must be grateful for new light, the more so that the new way, so generously pointed out to us, promises to be by far an easier way than that we have been travelling. Why to be sure, why did we never think of it? Why have we stultified ourselves with the absurd notion that it was in any way the business of a musical journal or of a musical critic to try to raise the public taste, to point out the fallacy of popular idols, to lead those thirsting after beauty and poesy in tones or other forms of Art to the pure, genuine springs of inspiration? Why have we waited till this day, till we are laughed at by this funny "friend," before we have had the wit to recognize that the one proper aim and function of a journal of music is simply identical with that of the managerial big-letter posters on the corners of the streets, and that the height of editorial ambition should be to outdo these in the sublime art of advertisement? How much simpler, how much nobler were it to always praise what all are praising, and be loyal to the one absolute authority in Art, to-wit the popular standard, the reigning fashion of the hour! Surely it is "ill-natured" and "ungenerous" to hint that that is not the best, which takes the multitude at any given time, even if it be something quite the opposite of what the multitude admired the year before and may again admire the next year! In short, there is no other standard of what is sound and true and beautiful in music, but the success of any given work in drawing large, remunerative audiences; and we ought to have known it, and ceased referring to the Shakespeares and the Raphaels of the art, to Mozart, to Beethoven, and to Rossini, and the like, when it is a notorious fact that audiences prefer Verdi. Yes, let us endeavor to forsake our idols, for, lo! now "Trovatore comes galloping on, and down must we all go on our knees," reverently accepting the new dispensation in which brass reigns paramount, the new gospel of "effect" which has so clearly superseded that of beauty, feeling and expression.

3. We must thank our "friend," too, for his lesson of independence. Though couched in satire, his counsels have the true heroic ring. Where shall we get the courage to come up upon his high ground? It is so much better and braver to throw away all reverence for the past; to praise and condemn and set up our own judgments, as we are pleased, and as we please, in music, as in all other things, in spite of Rossini, or Beethoven, or all the master-spirits of the art combined. It is so American! so independent, so all-knowing. What is the verdict of the whole world in the long run, when weighed against to-day's impression of a New York or Boston audience? Does not the "Metamora," "Gladiator" style of drama draw far better houses than "King Lear" or "Hamlet," and does not this settle it that the former is the genuine article, and that there is no use in saying any more about it?

4. Again, we must admire the writer's clear perception and appreciation of our point in finding fault with Trovatore. He understands us so much better than we understood ourselves! It seems we meant to say, — classical pedants and old fogies as we are, we should have said, that Trovatore is an abomination because composed in violation of "the rules," of "musical mechanics," and so on. Whereas we actually did say: "This music lacks the sovereign quality of geniality; it is mechanical." Our quarrel with it, taking our article literally, was, that it lacked real sentiment and pathos, spontaneous, genial inspiration, naturalness, &c.; that it was forced, mechanical, and straining for effect. It seems we wrote the opposite of what we meant, for is it not as true as our "friend's" showing, that we admire by book and rule, and only condemn that which sins against the mechanical theory and grammar of the art! When we said that Trovatore wanted sentiment, we should have said it wanted learning. How fortunate we are to have a "friend" for an interpreter!

But, to be serious, O facetious champion of Trovatore, if you would not have us write against that opera, if you would not have us offer any variation from the general humdrum tune of praise, why is it that you will not give us now and then some other theme to write about? How shall a poor musical editor find any spice of novelty to give life to his columns, if there be no music known or heard but Trovatore, and if he cannot be allowed even the poor privilege of abusing that? If that really be all, if music henceforth is to be reduced to Trovatore, we will abandon with a good grace, and at least thank you for your felicitous motto, that sums up once for all the entire story of the music of our times: "Trovatore comes galloping on, and down go the masses on their knees." We shall have use for that, at any rate.

Italian Opera.

For the second night, the Strakosch Troupe gave us, as we have said, Lucrezia Borgia. It was a performance, as a whole, unworthy of an audience that overflowed the theatre. Chorus and orchestra were often careless and at fault, and the ensemble loose and shuffling. Sig. LABOCETTA, the tenor, made but an indifferent Gennaro with his sweetish sentimental voice and style of singing and of acting. Mme. STRAKOSCH was a picturesque, but musically ineffective Orsini; her voice is rich and musical in quality, but wanted power. But PARODI's Lucrezia offered much to admire; her intense, conventionally tragic manner was less exaggerated than it has been sometimes, and there was more of tenderness, besides power, in her tones. JUNCA, the giant of a basso, has a great voice, more peculiarly rich in the higher tones, which he delivers for the most part with artistic skill. He looked well as the imposing, terrible Alfonso.

We had never expected to find such enjoyment in the light and pretty military opera, La Figlia del Reggimento, as we did on Friday night. It was all due to Mme. COLSON's charming impersonation of the heroine, to her incomparable harmony of song and action. How could we have thought her movements awkward that first night? it was some accident of the first entrée, a mere first impression; for she is really all grace and harmony of motion, full of life and melody as any bird at sunrise. She is admirably fitted for that rôle; there was a rare refinement in her rendering of it; Alboni was, of course, too coarse. Mme. Colson nowhere over-did it; she omitted much of the military clap-trap, and did not strap a drum about her to bring down the gallery. The charm of her voice, although not rich in quality, still grew upon us, it was so pure, so true, so searching, and so flexible; so expressive within in all parts of its compass; and managed with consummate skill; a skill, too, which never exhibits itself as such, in a senseless bravura way, but always legitimately serves the dramatic intention and unity of the character and of the play. Mme. Colson, as a singer, has one fault; yet we could scarcely feel it a fault, for the time being, so expressive did she make it; we mean that tremolo upon sustained notes, which is a common affectation, but which sometimes in her use of it had almost the beauty of a trill. Yet it may easily degenerate into a weak habit, when its effect is quite unmusical, torturing the nerve of hearing, somewhat as the quick alternate interception and return of sunshine through a lattice fence, as you walk by, tortures the optic nerve.

Sig. LABOCETTA was the Tonio, and Sig. BARILLI the old Sergeant, for which part he lacked force and spirit. The general performance was of average excellence.

Handel and Haydn Society.

That was a very interesting performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater, on Sunday evening. The Music Hall appeared well filled. First came Mercadante's overture to the Stabat, quite well played by Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra, and then for a First Part some miscellaneous sacred selections by the Italian singers of the Strakosch Opera. The first of the "sacred" pieces, was the tenor romanza from the opera, Il Giuramento, sung with considerable expression by Sig. LABOCETTA. Ah! non fili, was chastely, musically rendered by Mme. STRAKOSCH. The charming COLSON's voice was hardly suited to Schubert's Ave Maria; the tremulousness was too perceptible, and yet there was a fervor and a beauty about it which deserved more recognition than it got. JUNCA's singing of Qui sdegnò, the great bass song (In diesen heiligen Hallen) from Mozart's Zauberflöte, was firm, correct and hard, without the life that Formes gave it. PARODI did her best in a very bold and impressive rendering of Mendelssohn's "Jerusalem, thou that kiltest," &c. Some of her tones rang out superbly, and there was no lack of expressive light and shade. A repetition was of course obligato.

There is much admirable music in Rossini's Stabat. How can the lovers of Italian music run after Verdi when they have such music as this? To be sure the music is not always quite in earnest; it drops away from its high theme unconsciously; its genial, careless author has confessed as much. The Cujus animam is altogether secular and martial, saying one thing, while the words mean quite another, — and there are other trivial digressions; and the Fugue finale finds Rossini out of his element, being so confused in its structure that it is hard to tell whether it is well sung or not. But the opening quartet and chorus, Stabat mater dolorosa, is almost sublime; so is Eia mater and the Inflammatus; while the Quando corpus is a miracle of beauty and expressiveness. Rarely have we heard that unaccompanied quartet sung in such good tune, and with such expression as it was that night. And generally we may say of the Italian part of the performance, that is of all the solos, that we have hardly before had any set of Italian singers do such justice to their parts. They were at least attentive, and save, perhaps in a single instance, correct.

Mme. COLSON's voice told splendidly in Et inflammatus. BRIGNOLI gave Cujus animam unequally, but for the most part expressively, and took that high note with an immense power of truly musical tone. AMODIO, to our taste, sang never better than in Pro peccatis; he was more moderate and unexaggerated than was his wont. Mmes. PARODI and STRAKOSCH, though not particularly well matched, sung Quis est homo finely; and the latter rendered Fac ut portem with true feeling and a rich, even beauty of voice. We sat too near to judge well of the orchestra and chorus; but thought the ensemble hardly up to the usual standard of the Society.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 5. — Madame COLSON is coming. Her name, upon blood-red posters, graces every brick wall, board fence, and old shed in the city. Not in Opera, though, are we to sit in judgment over this singing bird of the sunny south; for, with all the glories of our much vaunted Academy of Music, and two Thespian Temples besides, there is not a square mile in the city which could at this time be devoted to the Opera. The Opera House is nightly filled with delighted children of all ages and sexes, who go off into side-splitting paroxysms over the vagaries of François Ravel or the gum-elastic antics of his brother Gabriel. Under these circumstances, what will remain to us but to chew the cud of bitter disappointment, and to perambulate in a quiet, staid, sober manner to the Musical Fund Hall, for our musical entertainments. Ora pro nobis, worthy Journal; verily does it seem as though every lingering hope of engrafting the most refined of amusements here, had been flung out of the noble Academy, along with Maretzek and Torriani, last spring.

The untimely demise of HERMANN THORBECKE, on board the ill-fated Austria, has cast a gloomy shadow over musical circles here. He had identified himself to a remarkable extent with the development of good musical taste in this city; his classical soirées, given from winter to winter, had afforded undisputed evidence of his enthusiastic longing to render the works of the great masters intelligible, and therefore appreciated among us. Moreover, Hermann Thorbecke possessed a mild, genial, singularly amiable temperament; and ever followed the even tenor of his way, without turning aside to meddle in the many little internecine wars and petty jealousies, which alas! too often retard the progress in life of others, in various professions.

Intense application to the study and practise of music, as well as to the duties of his calling, had impaired his health very considerably, at various times; indeed his slender physique always seemed but poorly calculated to endure the many trials which beset the path of a music teacher. Little doubt, however, that his fatal trip across the Atlantic had materially invigorated all his faculties. Thorbecke possessed a keen æsthetic perception of the latent resources of the "divine art," and his admirable, brilliant, and correct execution, acquired by a long course of judicious labor, enabled him to develop these in a manner which nourished his enthusiasm, in an increased ratio with every step upon the gradus ad Parnassum. In fine, connoisseurs have ranked him as among the best resident classic piano-forte players in this country, and his violent death has left a void, socially and professionally, which will be sincerely regretted by his legion of friends.

SENTZ has returned to New York, and is now busily engaged in marking out his "Germania" campaign for this season. When he does marshal his hosts, be it sooner or later, you will feel the flattering of the ladies' hearts, and hear the rustle of silks and crinoline, even as far as Boston. Here, the spasms of joy, upon an announcement of the initiatory rehearsal, generally set the Musical Fund Hall to rocking like a cradle. Let Sentz be canonized!—for his orchestra and he have really contributed vastly toward a diffusion of healthy taste, and a familiarization with the higher walks of musical composition. Why I, myself, have beheld a radiant Belle struggling nobly with the Pilgrim's chorons from Tamkääser, after her return from one of the improving Germania rehearsals; she thought "those pompous chords so grand, so imposing, so replete with inspired feeling!"—and verily she had encompassed its movements and changes quite correctly when, subsequently, fate threw me into her society again. Two years ago, that very Miss regarded Dodworth's very best Polka as the ne plus ultra of musical composition.

Individual cases, analogous to the one just mentioned, unmistakably endorse the efficacy and utility of societies such as the Germania, and cheerfully point to the glorious change, which is slowly but very certainly developing itself in the musical taste of the public at large.

MANRICO.

NEW YORK, OCT. 12.—Our opera season is over. MAX MARETZK closed the performances of his troupe with a grand benefit, commencing at 2 o'clock Monday afternoon and ending somewhere about midnight. The day opera was Linda, with the GASSIERS and SERIGLIA, the new tenor, and in the evening Ernani was given, the principal novelty being the debut of a new basso, one Signor NANI, in the role of Silva. Besides these two operas, there were Spanish songs by the Gassiers, the Liberty duet of I Puritani by Signors Gassier and Nani, and a ballet by the Ronzani troupe. Altogether the benefit was quite a success, both artistically and pecuniarily.

Signor Striglia, the new tenor, has, since his debut in Traviata, appeared also in Linda and Lucia. Though he did not create the sensation that Steffani did on his first appearance, he is yet a very agreeable singer—young, handsome and animated:—gifted with a sweet, clear voice, he only lacks power to take first rank among the goodly fellowship of tenors. But this deficiency of power is fatal to his success, and the critics only say that he is fit for the concert room.

STEFFANI must be a most vexatious individual to the management. He is constantly indisposed, and for the last few weeks has only sung occasionally, being on those occasions too hoarse to be heard with pleasure. This partially results from our trying climate, and partially from the straining to which he subjects his voice whenever he does sing.

MR. ULLMAN announces the first appearance of PICCOLOMINI for (about) next Monday evening. During the present week, some slight changes will be made in the interior arrangements of the Academy of Music, calculated to increase the accommodation of visitors.

The LUCY ESCOTT opera troupe has failed to draw paying houses, and their performances have been prematurely suspended. They produced no novelties, it is true, but the artists deserved support, for they possessed considerable talent.

Efforts are being made to obtain another engagement for the company, and if unsuccessful, it is rumored that Mrs. Escott will appear in Italian opera. Noting the failure of this second English opera scheme of the season, one of our dailies, as preliminary to a puff of Piccolomini, makes the following remarks the truth of which I leave your readers to decide:

AN OPERATIC REVOLUTION.—One of the most remarkable changes in the taste of the public, not only metropolitan, but provincial as well—is found in the operatic events of the day. In the early days of the American theatre nothing was more popular than the old fashioned English operetta of the "No Song no Supper" or "Love in a Village" order. An actress who could sing tolerably and act well was always sure to make a sensation, and generally caught a rich husband. Encouraged by the public support which the old fashioned operetta received, the English composers went to work at something more pretentious, stealing rich and left from the repertoires of the Italian and the French comic Opera. Then we had the Woods, who were all the rage, and who made a great deal of money. Following them came the Seguius, who were also successful. Mme. Anna Thillon, who was more French than English, was a great public favorite; but there the record of triumphs must end. The Pine and Harrison company, though highly esteemed, failed to reap any pecuniary reward, and within the month two English opera companies have sought for the favor of a metropolitan audience, which would not take the trouble to go and hear them. Many ingenious persons have puzzled their brains in finding excuses or apologies for this frigidity on the part of the public, but none of them have hit the nail on the head. It is not that the artists are mediocre, or that they injudiciously pit themselves against the Italians in English versions of hackneyed operas. It is simply because the taste of the public has changed, and that nobody cares now-a-days for the English Opera when the Italian article can be had at the same price. Ten or twelve years ago it was hard work to muster an audience for Italian Opera sufficient to fill Palmo's old place in Chambers street or the Astor place establishment, while we have had two companies giving performances at the same time, and filling the Academy and Burton's theatre, either of which houses will accommodate more people than the two old places together. The Italian Opera is the fashionable amusement of the day, not only in New York, but in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the other provincial cities, when they are lucky enough to get it. Among the more refined classes it has to some extent supplanted the drama, which, if it is not absolutely on the wane, certainly does not keep pace with the progress of the country. Fashionable people think it is the thing to say they have been to the opera, but are not so fond of saying that they have assisted at the acting of an English play. Where they go everybody follows, so one meets everybody at the Opera. It is no doubt a very melancholy state of things for some of the old fogies that such a state of things should exist; but there is no resisting, as there is no accounting for the mutations of public taste. Just now the Italian Opera is "the thing," and nothing else will do, the audiences being popular as well as fashionable.

A Miss EMMA WELLIS, from Paris, announces a concert for Thursday evening, the chief attraction being her own performance upon the Orgue Alexandre. There is nothing else of novelty in musical circles to refer to.

TROYATOR.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., OCT. 12.—The musical season opens with most encouraging signs, and with every indication of our highest hopes and expectations being realized. Let me come at once to particulars, and you will see that I have good and substantial reasons for the "belief which is in me."

Our "Philharmonic Society" was inaugurated last season with 500 paying subscribers, and we considered it in every sense a perfect success from the opening to the close. We now, thus early in the season, have commenced the Rehearsals for the Second Season with 650 paying subscribers. The Orchestral pieces for the first concert I gave you in my last letter.

The first Rehearsal took place at the Athenaeum on Wednesday afternoon last, but owing to the non-arrival of Mr. EISELDE, MR. NOLL very acceptably filled his place as conductor.

There is much sympathy felt both in this city and New York, for Mr. Eisfeld. Of course your readers are all aware of his being among the passengers of the illfated "Anstria", and that he was picked up with others by the Bark "Maurice", and carried to Fayal. But it is feared that Mr. Eisfeld received some serious injuries in addition to those of exposure and the greatest fatigue, which may so impair his health as to make it necessary for us to supply his place as conductor of our "Philharmonic." No doubt his place can be well filled, as we have abundance of talent among us; and not a few good conductors; but we cannot part with Mr. Eisfeld without feeling that we have lost something more than a man of high musical culture, a most thorough and efficient musical conductor, one able and accustomed to furnish us with instruction and entertainment the highest, noblest and purest we are capable of receiving, but that we shall also lose in Mr. Eisfeld an accomplished, and courteous gentleman. No intelligence that I can learn has been received from Mr. Eisfeld, but we hope soon to welcome him back among us with restored health and renewed energies for his arduous labors among us the coming winter.

The "Brooklyn Harmonic Society" give their "First concert" for the season on Thursday evening of this week. The Programme is as follows:—

PART I.

- 1.—Symphony in B flat, No. 12, Jos. Haydn. a.—Introduction and Allegro. b.—Adagio. c.—Minuetto. d.—Presto.
- 2.—Quartet from "Requiem," "Tuba mirum", Mozart.
- 3.—Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's dream," Mendelssohn.

PART II.

The Lay of the Bell, Cantata, Andreas Romberg.

This society has met with great success so far, and their season for 1858-9 bids fair to be highly successful. It is composed of excellent material, and their conductor, Mr. CARL PROX, is a fine musician, and a person of great energy and perseverance.

The preliminaries towards the building of a new Musical Hall are now going on, and as I wrote you some time since, we shall before many days have a Music Hall worthy our beautiful city. BELLINI.

Musical Chit-Chat.

CARL ZERRAHN has issued his proposals for his third annual series of Philharmonic Concerts. He has modified the plan somewhat since he first stated it to us; but there will be nothing lost, if only the public will do their part. Instead of six concerts he announces four, and the success of these will surely bring a second series. The one practical first thing in order, then, is to subscribe to the four Concerts. The price for the series will be three dollars, and the concerts cannot be commenced unless six hundred subscribers are obtained, that number being absolutely necessary to cover the expenses of the undertaking. The orchestra will number at least fifty of the first musicians of the city, and the best available solo performers, vocal and instrumental, will be engaged for each concert. The programmes will be composed mainly of music of the highest order, with choice selections from the lighter music of the day, including a variety of compositions new to Boston. The concerts will be given in the Boston Music Hall, on Saturday evenings, at intervals not longer than three weeks, and will commence as soon as the subscription warrants.

We would call attention to the card of Mr. ZERDAHELYI, the Hungarian pianist, who is an accomplished artist, a gentleman of fine taste and culture, well versed in our language, and whom we can confidently recommend as an excellent teacher of the piano-forte. . . . Mr. MEERBACH, also, is one of the most experienced, intelligent, and well-read of the German musicians and piano-teachers who have taken up their abode in Boston. He plays with rare skill and taste, is at home in all the best music of the masters, and has made the art of teaching an object of very careful and critical study. . . . Mr. H. S. CUTLER, the excellent organist and director of the music for some years past at the Church of the Advent in this city, has accepted an invitation to become the organist at Trinity Church, New York, in place of the learned and esteemed Dr. HODGES, whose feeble health obliges him to seek retirement.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—Madame Marie Cabel has created a great sensation at the Opéra-Comique by her performance of Carlo in Auber's Part du Diable, revived expressly for her. It is in contemplation to reproduce Lesocq, certainly one of Auber's finest works. At the Grand-Opéra Madame Borghi-Mamo has appeared for the first time as Catharina in the Reine de Chypre with success.—M. Calzado has issued his prospectus for the ensuing campaign at the Italiens. The revivals and new operas promised are Macbeth, by Verdi; Anna Bolena, I Martiri and Roberto Devereux, by Donizetti; Il Giuramento, by Mercadante, and Zelmira, by Rossini. The last alone will be worth all the rest. Madame Frezzolini has arrived in Paris from London, and Mr. Vincent Wallace is also in the capital of the Beaux-Arts, which was never so dull as at present, nor had less to say for itself.

'La Harpe d'Or,' an opera by that excellent harpist, M. Godefrid, has been produced at the Théâtre Lyrique with moderate success. Perhaps the composer has waited too long for his opportunity, since we know that, some ten years since, he was expected ting his chance—having been engaged with apparent strictness and real random, by M. Jullien, to furnish Drury Lane with an opera every year.—It is now certain that M. Carvalho, and Madame Miolan—that most accomplished singer, his wife—will not quit the Théâtre Lyrique. The Lady is to be the Marquise in M. Gounod's 'Faust,' which is now in rehearsal. The accounts of M. Michot, a new tenor, who has appeared there, are good. He is said to have an "ut de poitrine" very nearly as striking as those of M. Duprez and Signor Tambrlik;—but this in nowise decides his accomplishments as an artist.

Something more has transpired in regard to the opera by Signor Rossini, which was promised to the Italian Theatre in Paris for the season 1857-8. 'Il Curioso Accidente,' we now learn from the French Correspondent of the Morning Post, resembles its luckless predecessor, 'Robert le Bruce,' in being a pasticcio made up by Signor Berrettoni, and authenticated by "a certificate from Signor Rossini." It was put into rehearsal last season, but not produced, in consequence of which Signor Berrettoni has been suing M. Calzado, the manager of the Italian Opera in Paris, with the hope of obtaining damages for the delay. These have not been granted; but the Tribunal of Commerce ordains that the opera shall be represented before the 31st of December, 1859.—Athenæum.

FESTIVALS.—During the first days of October there is to be held a Festival at Coblenz, in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Musical Institute. The Oratorio chosen (for on these occasions the Germans rarely execute more than one complete work) is to be the 'Samson' of Handel.—Ere this happens, a Festival of the Middle Rhine will be held at Wiesbaden, at which the one Oratorio is to be 'The Creation.' There is to be a popular Singing Festival at Innsbruck in the course of next month:—this we should imagine well worth loitering or turning aside to partake of. The Continent has few haunts more enjoyable, few people more frank and kindly, than those belonging to the Valley of the Inn.—Among the "Festivals," or grand concerts, which have taken place during the last few weeks, may be mentioned one at Spa;—also the annual concert at Baden-Baden, presided over by M. Berlioz, at which some of the conductor's music is always performed—this year, the earlier portions of his 'Romeo and Juliet' Symphony.—Dr. Liszt seems to keep his hold on the youth of the Universities, for we observe that at the three-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the University of Jena a 'Gloria in Excelsis,' from his pen, was performed.

England.

MANCHESTER.—The tide of music has left London and dispersed itself throughout the provinces. One of the good things in England is the practice of frequent exhibitions of fine Organ music. The Manchester Examiner thus describes the recent opening of the new organ at the Free Trade Hall in that town, and the wonderful playing of Mr. Best, the eminent organist of St. George's Hall, in Liverpool:

He was warmly welcomed on his appearance upon the orchestra, and commenced his performance with a Pastoral, by Bach, at the close introducing one of those pedal fugues by the same composer which are the great delight of connoisseurs of the organ. This Mr. Best played with that matchless perfection for which he is celebrated, the pedal passages telling out in a manner which proved that the builders had preserved a proper balance of power between this portion of the organ and the manuals. There was quite sufficient weight, and the tone was ponderous without being overbearing. The overture to the Last Judgment, by Spohr, we never heard so well played on the organ; all the points were capitally brought out, and the tremulous effect in the soft passages was most effectively introduced. Mr. Best introduced the clarinet stop in the adagio of Mendelssohn's sonata, in C minor, and brought in the tubas near the close with fine effect. But it was in his own "Air with variations" that he displayed to the general audience most strikingly his unrivalled powers of execution. The variation in which he plays rapid passages, as a solo on the pedals, was interrupted by applause which would not be restrained till the close of the piece.

The organ has 60 draw stops, of which 52 are sounding stops; several of these are modelled from the inventions of the most celebrated organ-builders of France and Germany. The höhl-flöte, gamba, harmonica, and posaupe (16 feet) are from the German; the voix-celeste, voix-humaine, flûte-harmonique, euphone, &c., from the French. The pedal posaupe, euphone, and harmonica are "free" reeds, and have hitherto been seldom seen in English organs. The organ is constructed on the "simplification system," invented by the Abbé Vogler, of Mannheim, and introduced into this country by Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine. By this system every pipe stands directly over the air chamber supplying it with wind. There are four wind reservoirs. These are supplied with air by six feeders, put in motion by means of two hydraulic engines. The various organs have different pressures of wind, and thus the desired intonation and tone character of the stops is more perfectly obtained. The pipes are sealed in accordance with the theory of Professor Topfer, of Weimar, and the instrument is tuned on the "equal temperament" system.

The evening concert was extremely well attended, and the performances were equally successful with those of the morning. Mr. Best's selection comprised one of the organ concertos by Handel, now in course of publication by Mr. Best, in which Mr. Best's dexterous use of the composition pedals may be noticed; prelude and fugue in E, by Bach; air, with variations, by Hatton, in which several points of the organ were displayed; and, in answer to an encore, the air, with variations, which Mr. Best played so finely in the morning; and, lastly, Handel's splendid chorus, "Fixt in his everlasting seat," in which the rolling bass passages played on the pedals were remarkably telling.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD.—The Musical World translates from a German critic, who writes of London concerts in the Musik-Zeitung of the Lower Rhine, with an enthusiasm about this young pianist that fully equals that of any Englishman. He says:

Dussek's concerto for the piano was even less known than Bach's sonata for the violin. We all heard it for the first time, and very few of us could ever have seen it or played it. It is a genuine concerto of its kind, with the first movement broadly designed and brilliantly worked out. The slow movement in E flat is melodious, though it displays no extraordinary invention. But the finale—a rondo in G minor, like the first movement—is a magnificent piece, composed in that characteristic, we may say genial style that distinguishes the bravuras of Dussek. The execution of this concerto is the reverse of easy; but Miss Goddard is no longer conscious of difficulties on her instrument. She is, moreover an artist in the true sense of the word, and the extraordinary success which she has recently achieved in England is not to be ascribed to the patriotism of her countrymen. Even the severest critics among the modern Germans have awarded to her the palm among all the lady pianists of the present day, not even excepting Mad. Schumann and Mad. Szarvady-Clauss.

What is effected by this young lady by dint of industry and perseverance, combined with genial intelligence and technical genius, is really incredible.

She gave the first series of soirées at her own residence; for the second she selected Willis's Rooms, which on each occasion were filled with an audience comprising every one who could lay claim to any rank in the domain of music. Most justly were these soirées termed "classical." Neither the wishes of titled ladies, nor the homage of worshippers, can lure this, in every respect, gifted lady from the true path of art; she never stoops to the mere amusement of her hearers. Look over her programmes, and you will be astonished when I tell you that all this has been mastered by a girl in the bloom of youth. Then you will find Hummel's grand sonata in D major (Op. 106), the last that he composed for the piano solo; Beethoven's sonatas in A major (Op. 101), and B flat major (Op. 106); Wölfl's sonata, Non Plus Ultra, in F, and Dussek's sonata, Plus Ultra, in A flat (Op. 71), both in one evening; C. M. von Weber's sonata in E minor (Op. 70); S. Bach's Fuga scherzando, fugue in A minor, fugue in G major, for the "Well-tempered Harpsichord;" Scarlatti's fugue in G minor; Mozart's sonata in E flat and B flat, with violin (M. Sainton); Mendelssohn's quartets in F minor and B minor; a duet with violoncello and the fugue in D major from the "Charakter-stücke," for the pianoforte, by the same composer. Add to these several others, as, for instance, Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, Dussek's concerto already mentioned, &c., and you will form some notion of Miss Goddard's studies. Those who have heard her performance of Beethoven's Op. 106 and Dussek's Plus Ultra can declare that there is no flattery in the title "Queen of the pianoforte." The terribly long and almost impracticable sonata (Op. 106) she first played before the public in 1853, when she was scarcely 17 years of age, and even then excited admiration. In the course of the last two seasons she has played it three times, and now, in her 22nd year, she so completely rules the spirit of the masters of all schools, that she can evoke it for our benefit from the greatest and most difficult of their works.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Qui sdegno. (Who treads the path.)

"Magic Flute." 25

This is the famous Air for a Basso profundo, in which the most excellent of Basses, Carl Fornes, pours out his deepest notes, and which has lately been brought back vividly to recollection by Signor Junca of the Strakosch Trombe.

Doh vieni. (Oh, linger not.) " " 30

Two of the best Songs in this charming, light opera of the genial Mozart, both for a medium voice, and easy, with a tasteful English Version by Dr. Wesley. The latter song is printed with the preceding short movement; Glense alfin il momento, (Yes, at length 'tis the moment).

Come, landlords, fill your flowing bowl. S. & ch. 25

A convivial song of olden times, to the French melody of the "Petit Tambour," which used to be universally popular at merry makings.

The lost treasure. Ballad. E. G. Spinning. 25

Simple, yet pleasing, and well calculated to get a share of favor from the lovers of song.

The Comet and the Telegraph. J. Blewitt. 25

A very funny illustration of the doings of the strange visitor on the sky.

A mother's guardian care. Song. Edw. Wiebe. 25

A neat, pretty little ballad.

Instrumental Music.

Songs without words. Alfred Jaell. 25

This is the same beautiful Nocturne, which appeared, a few weeks ago, in the pages of the "Journal," written expressly for it by the much courted and flattered pianist.

Romanza in "Traviata." Transc. by Goldbeak. 35

A superb arrangement of that strain, full of sad beauty; "Ah, forse e lui che l'anima" sung by Violetta. The transcription is rather difficult, but will repay study.

La Provenza il mar. For 4 hands. Nordmann. 15

Ah, fore e lui. " " " 25

Di miei bollenti spiriti. " " " 25

An excellent and rather simple arrangement of two of the Gems of "Traviata," for two performers. These are the first of a series which will comprise all the famous airs in this opera.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST: A collection of Opening and Closing Voluntaries, selected and arranged from the works of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Rink, Pleyel, Mendelssohn, Von Weber, Andre, Schmidt, Hesse, &c., together with original Compositions by the editor. The whole prepared with especial reference to the wants of beginners, and forming an excellent course of study for the Organ or Melodeon. By John Zundel. 150

This work is eminently a book for beginners. It is by the author of "Two Hundred and Fifty Voluntaries," and was produced in answer to numerous requests to furnish more and still easier pieces of that class. As its title imports, it has been the aim of the author to present easy and pleasing compositions of a desirable length and suitable for organs of the smallest as well as the largest class, and even for melodeons. One or two pieces of a more scientific character have, however, been inserted; and even a fugue will be found from Handel, though a very easy one. The few voluntaries by Rink here first appear in print in this country.

The Hidden Spring.

Hast heard the olden story,—
How once a fountain lay
In the jagged cliff of a mountain,
Deep hidden from light away?

In vain, with line and beaker,
They sought to reach or sound
The source and bed of the fountain;
Its waters they never found.

Unreached, untouched, untasted,
Flowed on the virgin wave,
And ne'er, to the lip of longing
Its liquid treasure gave;

Until, on a day in summer,
A man with the soul of a child,
Beloved of God! a poet,
Sat down by the fissure wild.

He strung his lute, and his fingers
Ran swiftly its chords along;
His heart, too full for silence,
Leaped over his lips in song.

Sang he of joy or sorrow?—
Of sorrow and joy, I ween;
For he had loved and suffered;
Else had he no poet been.

He sang of ill, so wrongly,
So dimly understood!
He sang, with prophet rapture,
Of ample after-good.

The song was true and human;
Great, wondrous, since 'twas so;
It seal'd the heights of being,
And touch'd with love the low.

Alive, afire, impassioned
With high imaginings,
From time and place divided,
It rose on sovereign wings.

Her own, in the voice of Music,
Transfigured Nature heard;
The wind, around the singer,
With throbbing pulses stirred;

"Hush," sighed the arid grasses;
Broad laughed the sun in the sky;
The distant trees, enraptured,
Threw out their arms on high.

It gave to the stony mountain
The living heart of a man;
The waves of the hidden fountain
To flow and to swell began,

And higher and fuller rising,
Cool, lucid, liberal, sweet,
The wealth of their secret treasures
Poured out at the singer's feet.

FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

The Character and Genius of Handel.

(From the Life, by Schœlcher.)

Although Handel was born when his father was sixty years old, he was a man of very powerful constitution, and of great muscular vigor. His contemporaries represent him as being endowed with a rare beauty of countenance. Burney thus describes him: "The figure of Handel was large, and he was somewhat corpulent, and unwieldy in his motion; but his countenance, which I remember as perfectly as that of any man I saw but yesterday, was full of fire and dignity, and such as impressed ideas of superiority and genius."

And in a subsequent paragraph—"Handel's general look was somewhat heavy and sour, but when he did smile, it was his sire the sun bursting out of a black cloud. There was a sudden flash of intelligence, wit, and good humor beaming in his countenance, which I hardly ever saw in any other."

Nichols, in his Literary Anecdotes, records it as an expression of Burney, that "Handel's smile was like heaven." Hawkins says: "He was in his person a large and very portly man. His gait, which was very sauntering, was rather ungraceful, as it had in it somewhat of that rocking motion which distinguishes those whose legs are bowed. His features were finely marked, and the general cast of his countenance placid, bespeaking dignity tempered with benevolence, and every quality of the heart that has a tendency to beget confidence and insure esteem." Thanks to the busts of Roubillac, and to the pictures of Thornhill, Hudson, Denner, Kyte, and Grafoni, we may say that we are familiar with the features of Handel. It is a fine, noble, and imposing countenance, oval in form, of a grave physiognomy, firm, but at the same time benevolent. Three characteristics are remarkable in it: the smallness of the mouth; the brightness of the eyes, which are very wide open, animated and bold, and which betoken a violent and resolute man; and, finally, the short and prominent eyebrows, generally a sign peculiar to profound and powerful thinkers. Such eyebrows had Bach and Beethoven.

Like almost all composers, he was extremely witty. In the Anecdotes of Handel we are told that "his affected simplicity gave to any thing an exquisite zest." Mattheson says that "he had a way of speaking peculiar to himself, by which he made the gravest people laugh, without ever laughing himself." Dr. Quin, of Dublin, wrote to Burney, in 1788: "Mrs. Vernon was particularly intimate with him; and at her house I had the pleasure of seeing and conversing with Mr. Handel, who, with his other excellences, was possessed of a great stock of humor. No man ever told a story with more effect. But it was requisite for the hearer to have a competent knowledge of at least four languages—English, French, Italian, and German, for in his narrative he made use of them." "All his natural propensity to wit and humor," adds Burney, "and happy manner of relating common occurrences in an uncommon way, enabled him to throw persons and things into very ridiculous attitudes. Had he been as great a master of the English language as Swift, his bon mots would have been as frequent, and somewhat of the same quality."

Once at a concert, Dubourg, the excellent violin player, having a Coda ad libitum to play, wandered about in different keys so long that he seemed quite bewildered, and to have forgotten his original key. Eventually he recollected himself, came to the shake, and concluded; whereupon Handel, with his usual coolness, cried out loud enough to be heard by the audience, "You are welcome at home, Mr. Dubourg."

Once he had a discussion with an English singer, named Gordon, who reproached him with accompanying him badly. The dispute grew warm (which it was never very long in doing with Handel), and Gordon finished by saying that if he persisted in accompanying him in that manner, he would jump upon his harpsichord and smash it to pieces. "Oh," replied Handel, "let me know when you will do that and I will advertise it; for I am sure more people will come to see you jump than to hear you sing."

When he heard the serpent for the first time, he was very much shocked by the harshness of the sound, and cried out, "Vat de tevil be dat?" He was told that it was a new instrument, called serpent. "Oh," he replied, "de serbent, aye; but it not be de serbent vat setuced Eve." I admit this anecdote, because it is a good one, but, at the risk of passing for a skeptic, I cannot accept it absolutely. The serpent was a hundred years old when Handel came into the world, and it is difficult to believe that they met for the first time in London.

It is related that, when Handel lost his sight, "his surgeon, Mr. Sharp, having asked him if he was able to continue playing the organ in public, for the performance of the oratorios, Handel replied in the negative. Sharp recommended Stanley as a person whose memory never failed; upon which Handel burst into a loud laugh, and said, 'Mr. Sharp, have you never read the Scriptures? do you not remember, if the blind lead the blind, they will both fall into the ditch?' Even in their most helpless misery, men of wit never deny themselves the consolation of a joke. The reader may recall to mind that Anaximenes bartered his life against the pleasure of indulging in a sarcasm. Having offended Antigonus, who was blind of one eye, it was reported to him that Antigonus had said, 'Let him come and excuse himself, and directly he appears before my eyes I will pardon him.' 'If' replied Anaximenes, 'I must appear before his eyes, he offers me an impossible pardon.' Whereupon Antigonus condemned him to death.

Unlike the greater number of witty men, however, Handel never exhibited any ill feeling in his jocularity. His sallies were inoffensive. He cut without wounding. "He was," says Burney, "impetuous, rough, and peremptory in his manners and conversation, but totally devoid of ill nature or malevolence; indeed, there was an original humor and pleasantry in his most lively sallies of anger and impatience which, with his broken English, were extremely risible."

In spite of his disposition for merriment, he was very proud and very reserved towards every body, the little as well as the great. This side of his character is illustrated in a remarkable manner in his MSS., where he generally indicated the names of the artists in the margin of the part which was confided to them. Upon no occasion did he ever fail to put "Mr." or "Sigr." before these names. During the ten years that Senesino and Beard sung for him, and in the tenth year just as in the first, he always wrote their names "Sigr. Senesino," and "Mr. Beard."

Hawkins pretends that, with the exception of music, he was an ignorant man; and all the hackneyed biographers repeat the assertion. I do not believe this. His letters in the French language, which remain to this day, prove that he not only spoke but wrote that language, although he had never been in France. He knew Italian well, and although he spoke English with a very strong accent, he had studied the idiom so as to be able to comprehend all the beauties of the poets. Such linguistic attainments, which are still not very common, were very rare in his time, and do not prove that his education had been neglected. His father, who, like all German doctors, was acquainted with Latin, had made him study the classics, and it is certain that he read Latin. Hawkins himself says—"He was well acquainted with Latin." In his MSS. are to be found some slight proofs of this. In the German Passion, instead of putting "da capo al segno," he wrote "usque ad signum;" and he never expressed the preposition de otherwise than by ex. It is not less certain that he worked upon several of the poems for his oratorios. There is nothing very precise about the part which he took, but a clause in his will leaves no doubt as to the fact. "I give," says he, "to Mr. Newburg Hamilton, who has assisted me in adjusting words for some of my compositions." All this does not certainly indicate an illiterate man; and if it be added, that Handel had the kind of mind which derives the full benefit of whatever it learns, it is difficult to believe that he was so uncultivated as has been pretended. But, after all, no great importance is to be attached to the question. Whether ignorant or not, he was, nevertheless, one of the most learned composers in the world.

That which above all distinguished Handel as a man, was the rare elevation of his mind. We do not admire him only for his genius, we love and honor him also for a sense of honor from which no critical circumstance could ever cause him to swerve. His conscience was severe, and he was always remarkable (to quote an expression of St. Simon) for "une grand netteté de mains" (the cleanliness of his hands). Every one praises his integrity, which was equal to his talents. He hated the lightest chains, even those which were the most gilt. At an age when artists lived in a sort of domesticity with the rich and powerful, he refused to be the dependent of any one, and preserved his dignity with a jealous care. The only exception to that rule which can be found in his life, was the eighteen months or two years spent with Lord Burlington when he arrived in England; but we must believe that he was there as a guest, since, in addition to all the operas which he was producing, he enjoyed already a pension of £200 a year from Queen Anne, and £400 which he received for his lessons upon the harpsichord to the princesses of the royal family. The reader will recall to mind that at Hamburg, when scarcely twenty years of age, when poor and very desirous of visiting Italy, he refused to accompany the Duke of Tuscany, who offered to take him with him.

In order to appreciate here the just value of Handel's conduct, we ought not to judge it by itself apart, but relatively to the ideas of his epoch. It is scarcely credible at the present day what a miserable place even the greatest musicians occupied in society. Haydn had already produced his first four symphonies, when, in 1759, Friedberg, the conductor of the orchestra for the Prince Esterhazy, employed him to compose one to be played at Eisenstadt, the residence of the prince. "When the day of the performance was arrived, the symphony commenced, but in the midst of the first allegro, the prince interrupted it, by asking who was the author of so fine a thing." "Haydn," replied Friedberg, presenting him to the prince, who cried—"What! such music by such a nigger!" (Haydn's complexion gave some foundation for such an exclamation.) Well, nigger, henceforth you are in my service. What is your name?" "Joseph Haydn." "Go and dress yourself as a chaplain-master. I don't like to see you so. You are too little, and your face is insignificant. Get a new coat, a curled wig, bands, and red heels; but let them be high, that the stature may correspond with your merit. Do you understand? Go, and every thing will be given you." Next morning he appeared at the levée of his highness, dressed up in the grave costume which had been assigned to him.

Twenty years later, Mozart, the divine Mozart, then organist to the Archbishop of Salzburg, was sent to eat with servants and cooks of "his prince." He felt all the humiliation of that unworthy treatment, but he thought that he was obliged to tolerate it. A letter by him to his father leaves no doubt as to the authenticity of the fact:

VIENNA, 17 March, 1781.

"* * * * I have a delightful apartment in the same house in which the archbishop dwells. Brunetti and Ceccarelli lodge in another house. Che distinzione! My neighbor, Herr von Kleinmayern, loads me with civilities, and is really a very charming person. Dinner was served at half-past eleven in the forenoon, which was for me, unfortunately, rather too early; and there sat down to it the two valets in attendance, the controller, Herr Zetti, the confectioner, two cooks, Ceccarelli, Brunetti, and my littleness. The two valets sat at the head of the table, and I had the honor to be placed, at least, above the cooks. Now, methought, I am again at Salzburg. During dinner there was a great deal of coarse, silly joking; not with me, however, for I did not speak a word, unless absolutely obliged, and then it was always with the greatest seriousness. So, when I had finished dinner, I went my way."

Eight days afterward, in another letter, Mozart, who was excessively hurt, made another reference to the cooks: "What you tell me concerning the Archbishop's vanity in possessing me may be true enough, but what is the use to me? One does not live by this. And then, with what distinction am I treated? M. von Kleinmayern, Boenecke, and the illustrious Count Arco, have a table to themselves; now, it would seem some distinction if I were at this table—but not with the valets, who, besides taking the head of the table, light the lustres, open the doors, and attend in ante-rooms."

Since Haydn and Mozart were so treated in the very flower of their genius, without daring to resent it, Handel must have had a lofty spirit to hold himself as he always did. These are the terms with which, in 1721, he dedicated to George the First his opera of Radamisto:

"SIR—The protection which your majesty has been graciously pleased to allow both to the art of music in general, and to one of the lowest, though not the least dutiful of your majesty's servants, has emboldened me to present to your majesty, with all due humility and respect, this my first essay to that design. I have been still the more encouraged to this, by the particular approbation your majesty has been pleased to give to the music of this Drama, which, may I be permitted to say, I value not so much as it is the judgement of a great monarch, as one of a most refined taste in the art. My endeavors to improve which is the only merit that can be pretended by me, except that of being with the utmost humility, sir, your majesty's most devoted, most obedient, and most faithful subject and servant,

"GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL."

All this is, doubtless, rather too respectful; but when we remember the revolting baseness with which the documents of this kind, which the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries have left us, were generally composed, we can not fail to perceive a certain tone of reserve, which is not to be found anywhere else.

It is to be observed, moreover, that, with the exception of Radamisto, and contrary to the universal custom, he did not dedicate his works to any potentate upon the earth. He begged for patronage from no one. That respect for himself from which he never departed, gives him a special position, apart from all, among artists and poets. Overcoming every obstacle by an inexhaustible energy, caring little for that world which tyrannizes so over the vulgar, he was all his life the same child of seven years old who went to Weisenfelds in spite of the resistance and scolding of his father. Being informed at Aix-la-Chapelle (where he was taking the baths) that the King of Prussia was coming, and wished to see him, he left the place a few days before the arrival of the disappointed monarch. Twenty years after Handel conducted himself thus with kings, Haydn permitted an Hungarian magnate to say to him, "Go and dress yourself like a chapel-master."

This spirit of independence was one of the causes of the animosity which the English aristocracy entertained against him. At that time they were so destitute of good sense and intelligence as not to perceive that all men are equals, when they do not abase themselves by dishonorable actions, or by the adoption of degrading profession, and they taxed with insolence the dignity of the noble artist. During long years he showed a bold front to the implacable war which they declared against him. He never surrendered, and, thanks to his perseverance, he gave his enemies time to triumph over their own prejudices. He had the inflexibility of all great minds. He was a true hero—a moral hero. Even the coolness with which his masterpieces were received did not discourage him. He was the first to console his friends for his defeats. Burney heard him reply intrepidly to some one who was expressing his regret at seeing the house so empty: "Nevre moind, de music vil sonnt de pefter." Vexation at defeat, ruin, bankruptcy, and all the sorrows which they bring upon a man so proud as he was, could not weigh him down: he recommenced again and again, and, by dint of activity, energy, genius, and courage, he finished by conquering Fortune.

Additional Reminiscences of Beethoven.

(From the N. Y. Musical Review.)

A German paper, Die Grenzboten, has recently published some communications on the later years of Beethoven's life, from the diary of a lady, which we deem so highly interesting that we translate them for the benefit of our readers. The author of them was at that time a young girl, daughter of a Mr. del Rio, who, in the year 1816, was the head of a large school at Vienna. The observations were written down evidently with no thought of their ever being published:

"As early as the year 1815, during the Vienna Congress, we made the acquaintance of Beethoven. At that time the private counsellor of the King of Prussia, Mr. Duncker, lived in our house. Mr. Duncker was very fond of music, and a great admirer of Beethoven. He had written a tragedy, Leonore Prokaska, for which Beethoven composed a few pieces—a short but most beautiful hunting chorus, a romance, and some music with an accompaniment for the harmonica, in the style of the melodrama. Besides these, the poet got Beethoven to score for him his grand Funeral March from his Piano-forte Sonata, Op. 26. Sister and I asked Mr. Duncker why he had not begged for a new march; but he thought a better one could not be composed. All the pieces, with exception of the Funeral March, are still in our possession. We had even the permission to publish them, with the name of 'Friedrich Duncker, but it never came to that. The splendid march, I believe, has been performed once a year in a private musical circle in Berlin. The tragedy has never been performed. Duncker had a great many consultations with Beethoven about it. Beethoven was not satisfied with the words to the Hunting Chorus; and even after they were altered, and altered again, he wanted the accent upon the first syllable.

"When Beethoven was appointed guardian of his brother's son, a new life seemed to come upon him. He was extremely fond of the boy, then about nine years old, and it seemed almost that the latter had the key to his humor to compose, or to be silent. It was in 1815, when he brought his beloved Charles to our school, which my father had conducted since the year 1798. Already at that time, it was necessary to be quite close to him in order to be understood by him. From this time we saw him very often; and later, when my father removed the school to the suburb, Landstrass Glacis, he also took lodgings in our neighborhood; and the next following winter he was almost every night in our family circle. However, we could seldom profit by his presence, for very often he was vexed with the affairs of his guardianship, or he was unwell. Then he would sit the whole evening at our family-table, apparently lost in thought, occasionally smiling, and throwing a word in, at the same time spitting constantly in his pocket-handkerchief, and looking at it. I could not help thinking, sometimes, that he feared to find traces of blood.

"One night, when he brought us his song, 'To the Beloved far off,' words by Jeleles, and father wanted me to accompany my sister, I got rid of it with the fright; for Beethoven told me to get up, and accompanied himself. I must say here, that to our great surprise, he often struck wrong notes; but then again, when my sister asked whether she was right or not, he said, 'It was good, but here,' putting his finger upon a note where the sign of a tie was placed, 'you must draw over.' He had missed that.

"At another time, I remember, that he played with us like a child; and that he took refuge from our attacks behind the chairs, etc.

"I very often wondered that Beethoven cared so much for the opinions of people; and once exclaimed, with regard to his nephew: 'What will people say! they will consider me a tyrant!' But this nobody could have believed, who had ever seen him for once with his dear boy, who was frequently allowed to clamber over him, and pull him almost from his chair.

"At one time, in spring, he brought us violets, saying: 'I bring you Spring.' He had been unwell for some time; he had suffered a good deal from colic, and said: 'That will be once my end!' When I told him that we could put it off for a long time, he answered: 'He is a poor fellow who does not know how to die; I have known it since a boy of fifteen years. It is true, for my art I have as yet done but little.' 'Oh! as for that, you can die with ease,' I said, upon which he murmured: 'There are quite different things floating before me.' At the same time, he brought us a beautiful composition, 'To Hope,' from Tiedge's Urania, whom he always called Tiedsche, and not in fun, either. Beethoven got easily vexed, and this is the reason why his friends often thought he had something against them, even when it was not the case. But he was in his manners so different, and seemed sometimes so unfriendly and cold, that one was obliged to think so, and to keep away from him. It frequently happened that he did not trust his best friends, and really grieved them. Sometimes he complained also about his pecuniary matters, which was his hobby."

Operatic Prospects.

"Of making opera troupes there is no end." So would Mrs. Browning be very likely to say if she lived in America, and witnessed the many vain and impotent attempts to establish here a permanent and creditable institution of opera. Failures all—some because they are too imbecile so deserve success; others because they are too extravagant to accomplish it. Five and forty times at least within the recollection of the past few years, have the leading operatic managers of the land been utterly undone, ruined, swamped and devoted to everlasting disgrace. Five and forty times, at least, have broken-hearted paragraphs been scattered through the newspapers, announcing the fatal fact that Maximilian Maretzek, B. Ullman, Esq., or some equally eminent master of the art of humbug has at length retired in a disordered mental condition to the seclusion of private life and the mortification of sackcloth and ashes. Experience lessens all great evils. It is said that cels become in time accustomed to the skinning process. Just so must it be with operatic managers—and the simile is not a bad one, for are not their slippery and squirming qualities notorious among men? The skinning, however, is usually performed, not upon, but by them. Never mind that. Familiarity breeds contempt, and so familiar have these worthies become with ruin and wretchedness, that the severest blows of merciless fortune fail to affect them in the least. Captain Cuttle tells us of his friend and counselor, Jack Bunsby, that his education had consisted mainly of raps over the head with a belying pin and that custom had so endeared him to that way of life, that he found it impossible to forego it in his later days. What was originally an affliction became in time a choice luxury. As with the hard-headed Bunsby, so with the indomitable impresarii. Without successive and repeated failures, their lives would now be a burthen to them. It is a question whether they could get comfortably through a season of unmingled prosperity. Two seasons of continued good fortune would undoubtedly reduce them to the lowest depths of despair. Three would produce suicide. For these reasons we cannot too cordially congratulate Mr. Maretzek on the sublime stroke of ill luck that has just befallen him. In order to thoroughly appreciate the entire length and breadth and depth and height of Mr. Maretzek's unhappy delight, or fortunate misery, we must look for an instant at the circumstances of the case.

He opened his season in New York, some weeks ago, at the Academy of Music with a very clever company. It is only just to Mr. Maretzek to say that, although he is a Jeremy Diddler of the first order, and notwithstanding the fact that he was never yet known to exhibit any sort of integrity excepting in moments of temporary aberration—he almost always has very capital companies. But companies are not everything, particularly in New York, where the rage for novelty is so unappeasable. Mr. Maretzek gave very little novelty, but contented himself with reproducing old operas, not in the very finest style, according to all accounts. Presently a rival, in the person of Mr. Strakosch, came along, and commenced a series of performances at Burton's Theatre. Here was an opportunity for excitement which young New York was not slow to avail itself of. The houses at the Academy began to decrease. Mr. Maretzek considered the expediency of bringing his season to a rapid close. Little cared he, however, for the result of his New York skirmish; his campaign was otherwise laid out. His grand battle was to take place in Havana, where the operatic fever rages to such an extent that business is neglected, and triumphal arches are erected whenever a steamer disgorges a cargo of melody there. But wo to the man who carries all his eggs in one basket. Unhappily for Mr. Maretzek's deep laid plans, a reprehensible powder-magazine has just exploded in the Cuban capital, and has not in its work of devastation spared even the opera house. Official announcements have been sent to the Max, that he must keep himself and his harmonious associates as far away as possible from Havana during the next three months. And this on the very eve of his departure.

Now, it is easy to conceive what a delicious state of desperation Mr. Maretzek must be in about this time. For the —th time he is a lost thing. What he will do we have no means of knowing; it is probable, however, that he will drink a good deal of champagne, for one matter, and amuse himself with the sufferings of his creditors for another. Beyond that, let us not seek to penetrate the veil. Let us rather turn from the setting to view the rising sun.

As Maximilian Maretzek goes out of the Academy, Bernard Ullman steps in. Mr. Ullman, though he luxuriates in disaster as much as any other man alive, is modest, and willing to experience a little success just now, for the sake of variety and healthful excitement. In point of fact, he has rather set his mind upon a temporary diet of prosperity. He means to open his season with Miss Piccolomini, a little Italian maiden, who makes up for the insignificance of her bodily proportions by the bulk of her name and her artistic weight. The manner in which Mr. Ullman has heralded her is worthy of his commanding genius. Columns of advertisements, with the name of Piccolomini ever predominant, have adorned the newspapers. Letters to editors, concocted with a skill that almost passeth understanding, have dazzled the eyes of the musical multitude. Everything has so cleverly been arranged that it will indeed be a matter of deep surprise if Mr. Ullman should meet with anything but unlimited success. If he should fail, however, he will have the unexpected satisfaction of such sympathetic companions as Maretzek, and perhaps one or two others.

Besides his great gun, Piccolomini, Mr. Ullman has a large and varied assortment of smaller artillery, which he purposes to bring forward at judicious periods during the campaign. As a special reserved force, he has Madame Laborde in waiting; and as a forlorn hope, he hints at Joanna Wagner, for next March. Whether that March will be an advance or a retreat, who can tell? But there is not much faith to be put in Mr. Ullman's announcements concerning distant futurity. His similar promises of last year were all unfulfilled. But, at any rate, he enters upon his work with vigorous energy, and with a stern determination to do or die, which cannot but impress all beholders with a profound sense of his devoted heroism.

A less brilliant, but rather more fixed, star of operatic hope is Mr. Strakosch. He is one of the most cautious of men. He knows not the hardships and reversals which have so often attended his rivals. It is even said that Mr. Strakosch has no fondness for financial distress and exhausted resources, and that he would look upon bankruptcy rather as a calamity than otherwise. It is evident that he must possess a different organization from those of Messrs. Ullman and Maretzek; but every man to his taste, we say. If Mr. Strakosch prefers shekels in his coffers and a clean cash-book to a vacant purse and an army of creditors, that is certainly his own affair. He, then, fixes his mind upon success, and takes no thought of other enjoyments. He has secured a tolerable company, with one or two shining lights that are well calculated to bewilder by their brilliancy. He relies upon their influence to carry through the weaker portions of his troupe. Perhaps they will do so. Madame Colson would compensate for a stage full of sticks. Mr. Strakosch has also engaged Mrs. Wilhorst, the pretty and popular New York songstress, who is intended to offset the allurements of the Piccolomini. There is indeed a similarity between them. They are both young; both pretty; both infinitesimal particles of humanity; both well born; both enthusiastic and dashing little actresses. Piccolomini is an Italian princess, or something of that sort; and Wilhorst is an American lady, which is better. The latter will appear this evening in Bellini's "Puritans," at Burton's Theatre. The former will wait until Wednesday, and make her bow in "Traviata."

Thus stand matters at present. How far Boston enters into the considerations of the managers it is impossible to say. Mr. Ullman expresses a horror of Boston, and has more than once declared his determination never again to come here: which is an afflicting fact, considering how scrupulously he is in the habit of fulfilling to the letter all his proclamations! Mr. Maretzek is, they say, afraid to enter Suffolk county, for reasons known best to gentlemen of the legal profession. Mr. Strakosch has just departed from among us, leaving not the best odor behind him. The musical magnates seem to regard Boston with the most appalling indifference. What shall we do? The best thing we can do is to await our destiny, fulfill all the duties of life, respect the opinion of society, and read the Courier with devout assiduity; and perhaps, in reward for all this well-doing, we may yet be visited by an opera troupe worthy of our support and affection.

MUSICAL PREJUDICE.—The following remarks from the London Musical World are instructive. The closing paragraph is as true of America as it is of England, and we shall do well to regard the matter in the same cheerful light.

The lover of music may congratulate himself that prejudice, that darkest foe to true appreciation, is dying a natural death in this country, and that the day is not far off when talent of every kind will meet with due acknowledgment. Time was—and that not very long since—when young England had very peculiar notions respecting the fine arts, and more particularly music; when Beethoven's later works were considered the effluences of a disordered brain, and when it was looked upon as an act of exceeding condescension to bestow praise on Guillaume Tell. Some members of the musical profession in London patted Rossini on the head and affirmed that his last opera was capital, making of course, all necessary allowance for want of learning, profundity, and sublimity. Before Guillaume Tell was written the author of the Barbiere was treated most scurvily; his very name offended the nostrils of the learned pundits, and when he was in London, his presence was avoided by them as a plague. "If certain musicians of that day," exclaims a writer of authority, "walking along Regent-street, happened to hear that Rossini was in Cramer's shop, they would have crossed to the other side." It is not many years ago, since we ourselves heard the term "disgraceful" applied to the introduction of Rossini's overture to The Siege of Corinth at the Old Philharmonic. No doubt this feeling against Rossini originated in prejudice. His extraordinary reputation, the reception of his works at the Opera, almost to the exclusion of every other composer, the idol worship of the aristocracy, the adulation of the public, and the infatuation of his admirers, naturally rendered him disagreeable to a class of men, sensitive to a fault, whose works were known to be neglected, and whose persons were considered to be overlooked. That the prejudice in this instance was tinged with jealousy is more than probable.

The appreciation of the French public differs widely from that of the English. French audiences desire to be entertained merely. Let their ears be tickled and their hearts touched—voilà tout. They go to theatres and concerts simply for amusement, and expect neither knowledge nor teaching in places of recreation. Hence oratorios, symphonies, and other large orchestral and elaborate works, generally bore them, while such operas as Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro and Fidelio, as demanding greater attention than "listening by the ears," are caviare to their understandings. We doubt even if Guillaume Tell, although performed so frequently at the Grand-Opéra pleases them entirely. It is too comprehensive and grave for those lovers of the brilliant and the dazzling. Fashion, however, in this instance, sways the public feeling, and an acquired love for the composer, who, by devoting the greatest effort of his genius to their national theatre, and by living among them so many years, almost naturalized, or denaturalized, himself, has exercised no little influence in recommending the work of the master. For the mere Parisian public, La Juive or La Favorite, possesses, we are inclined to believe, as many attractions as Guillaume Tell and the Huguenots or the Prophète more. There is, however, no affection in the likings or dislikings of our lively and impressionable neighbors; what they prefer they acknowledge, and what is displeasing they do not hesitate to repudiate. The public of Paris includes to a large extent the professional body. The people and the musicians breathe together, consort together, and think together. The expression of a public opinion is almost invariably that of the artistic confraternity.

Now all this is very different in England. Musicians and the public, in many instances, as far as regards opinions, are separated as wide as the poles. Crowds rush to the theatres to hear Verdi's operas. English musicians will not tolerate Rigoletto, the Traviata, or Travatore. Rossini's Stabat Mater enchants the multitude and is coldly received by the dilettanti. If the public were allowed their choice Verdi would reign supreme at the Italian houses; if the followers of the art had power to order matters, he would be banished altogether from the country. From this antagonism of sentiment, however, good arises. Frequent discussion and consideration compels the amateur to doubt the supremacy of his idol, and induces the connoisseur to be more generous in his strictures. Better far this clashing of impressions and judgments, which leads to such important results, than that conciliating and hand-in-hand indifference, which may tend to unanimity and good fellowship, but is hardly constituted to further the interests of good music. Better far prejudice with a fair prospect in view, than apathy and toleration from which no advantage is likely to follow.

To the Editor of the Boston Courier:

There is now on exhibition at Mr. Everett's, a small collection of Mr. Babcock's pictures; and in order that your readers may understand the possible value to them of this simple announcement, I will briefly state who and what, as an artist, Mr. Babcock is.

Possibly born and formerly a resident in Boston, and a brother to that well-known organist of the same name, he is now painting in Paris, where he has been at work during the past eight or ten years.

For special characterization, Mr. Babcock may be called a colorist. Endowed by nature with the color instinct, his studies have been chosen with a view to its fullest exercise and development, and in these works are displayed some very remarkable results. So far remarkable, indeed, that their very striking merits as works of color, will probably prove to be the greatest obstacle in the way of their being generally appreciated.

In a community like this, where the pursuit of art is yet looked upon as a comparatively trivial occupation, it is scarcely to be expected that the public taste should be sufficiently enlightened to engage in the rendering of critical verdicts upon the works of its professors. On the contrary, what they have produced, the public has naturally applauded—in its own self-complacent manner—and, since (with a few exceptions) it has been the misfortune of our painters to practically illustrate the value of color in art in constantly decreasing proportion of knowledge, power, and feeling, the popular indifference to color it is easy to account for. Because of this, and in spite of their deficiencies of drawing and the generally uninteresting character of their subjects, these works of Mr. Babcock possess a value which it would be difficult to over-estimate.

Their faults are due to carelessness and the classic conventionalisms of the school in which he has studied. The one he can easily remedy by increased care, and the other is of so little importance to my present purpose that it need not be dwelt upon. It may be said, however, in defence of a selection of such subjects, that they recommend themselves to artists of Mr. Babcock's individualities by their strongly negative characteristics in point of direct human interests, and especially by their peculiar aptitude for marked color treatment.

It is then in the use of color that Mr. Babcock's ability is chiefly conspicuous. His pictures all have the character of happily conceived improvisations, and bear ample evidence that painting is his true vocation. In this use of color, intuitive skill takes the place of scientific knowledge, and demonstrates its superiority in the genial freshness and apparent spontaneity of all his works.

He surrounds the subtlest flesh tints with the most powerful contrasts of color in draperies and backgrounds, yet always escapes erudeness, because he understands the art of producing truly harmonious relations between natural opposites.

What greater pictures than these Mr. Babcock paints, or can paint, I have no means of ascertaining, it is enough for the present that their excellence is rare and peculiar, in kind and degree; and that they form one of the most important collections now among us. They are a benefaction to the public generally, as protection against color-blindness; and it is to be hoped that they may prove to be one also to our artists, to whom they are hereby recommended as safe and reliable stimulants.

OPERA IN NEW ORLEANS.—The Picayune, of Oct. 8, informs us what the opera-goers of that very operative city have in prospect to console them for the loss of Mme. Colson and M. Junca.

ORLEANS THEATRE.—M. Boudousquie left Southampton on the 22d ult., and has arrived at New York on the Arago, as a despatch just received here announces. He is accompanied by five of the new artists he secured in France, who are Mlle. Cordier, first singer in opera comique; Mlle. Lafranque, first soprano for grand opera; Mr. Beauce, first baritone; Mr. Vadé, stage manager, and Mme. Vadé, dugazon, or second light singer.

Mlle. Cordier is the young singer that the Paris Opera Comique management endeavored to secure, even by force of law, but Mr. Boudousquie has managed to outwit the manager, and the French Minister of Interior, who had given positive orders for Mlle. Cordier to break her engagement with Mr. Boudousquie, and accept that of the Opera Comique.

Mr. Boudousquie's greatest trouble has been to get a good baritone. The news of poor Rauch's death reached him in France when all the leading artists had made their engagements for the year. "What is one man's evil is another man's good," and the saying proved true in this instance. The Havre theatre had closed its doors suddenly, and our manager lost no time in securing its baritone, M. Beauce. He was here over ten years ago, when quite a young man, and has since appeared in all the leading provincial theatres, and at the Opera Comique in Paris. He is described as being a good singer, and, especially, a very good singer in light and grand opera.

Of the other newly engaged artists for our French theatre, some left Havre on the ship Baden on the 6th September; the others on the Bamberg, on the 16th ult.

M. Vila, second basso, who was with Rauch, on the Pennsylvania when she blew up, also returned from France on the Arago.

We understand that Mme. Dulaurens, formerly dugazon at the Orleans, died at Mandeville a few days since of typhoid fever. M. Mazure, now of the dramatic company at the Orleans, is also stated to be very sick.

Mmes. Bourgeois and Paola have spent the theatrical vacation at Mandeville quite agreeably.

With four leading female singers, Mr. Boudousquie ought certainly to be able to furnish sufficient attraction at his favorite theatre this season. We trust he may do so, and with satisfactory results to himself.

Maretszek's Opera Troupe

From the New York Musical World, Oct 16.

Mr. Maretszek's season came to a close on Monday evening, when the chef was the recipient of a satisfactory testimonial in the shape of a crowded house. It was his benefit, and a double-barreled entertainment, beginning at two o'clock in the afternoon, and ending (we take it for granted that it did end) about midnight. New York owes a great deal to Mr. Maretszek—a great deal more than it will ever repay, we fear. No man has done so much for operatic music. He has pioneered an Art-way to the metropolis of America, and more fortunate men and managers enjoy the privilege of prancing on it. What a very fortunate thing it is that there is always some one to go first!

The management of the past season has been of a somewhat somnolent character. All the new operas that were promised at the commencement stand over sine die. Four weeks effort gave us "William Tell," and at the last moment the fair Linda, from the valley of Chamounix, was led up to the footlights for the purpose of being bawled at by the prompter.—We do not complain. Old operas, provided they are respectably given, are ever welcome. In a managerial point of view more bankable issues might have resulted if there had been a greater proportion of variety. It is nothing to us.—Let the dead season bury its managers and its losses.

Mr. Maretszek has rehearsed his Havana repertoire, and that is what he aimed at. The members of his company are nearly all here. A word or two of the personnel will not be an unbecoming way of taking leave. Madame Gassier has stood her ground well. Without extraordinary powers of any kind, she has proved that her ability is always equal to the emergency of the moment. Her best impersonations have been Amina, in the "Somnambula," and Linda, in the opera of that name. Where tenderness and graceful juvenility of style are important, she is admirable. Her fresh voice lends itself naturally to these phases. It is buoyant and jubilant; not deep and searching. Voice of any kind is heard to advantage in Verdi's music, and Madame Gassier, being a fair artist, is at least respectable. Still it is not in the works of the popular composer that she is the most enjoyable. Leonora and Violetta have been the least satisfactory of her performances. We hear that Mr. Maretszek has engaged Mad. Alaimo—a lyric artist of distinction—for the heavy modern roles. It is well—for Mad. Gassier is deficient in dramatic power. Of Signor Gassier, it is unnecessary to speak. He is always up to a high art standard, and has never failed to satisfy the audience. Decidedly, the success of the season has been won by the tenor, Signor Steffani—of whom nothing is known except that his repertoire is brief, like life, and his study long, like art. He is one of the many tenors that have been picked up by Mr.

Maretszek. In a few years he will be the master of a dozen operas, and then — fast horses and fifteen hundred dollars a month! Signor Steffani's voice is unquestionably magnificent. It is of remarkable fullness, even in the lower part where robusts generally get whispy. It runs up easily to B flat, but becomes apoplectic after that. Although Signor Steffani did bring out his C, we should be sorry to hear him do it more than once or twice a season. The note is in his voice naturally enough, but at present Signor Steffani is not sufficient of an artist to attack it in a way agreeable to the listener. He has much to learn. The most accomplished feat now within his reach is the mezzo-voice, which he uses with decided skill and effect. With the wealth of voice which Signor Steffani possesses, combined with an obvious talent for stage effect, it will be strange indeed if he does not attain the highest position. He has been heard to advantage in "Rigoletto," "William Tell," (particularly in the trio, where the fullness to which we have referred is very noticeable), "Trovatore" and (measurably) "Ernani."

Another tenor, named Sbriglia made his debut in the everlasting "Traviata." He has a small-sized, sleepy voice, not unpleasant in quality, but limited in quantity. It belongs to the robusto kind, but can be used in small grazia parts. Signor Sbriglia was mildly respectable in "Traviata," and not quite so acceptable in "Linda" — where defective phrasing exposed the imperfect artist. He is intended, we suppose, as the second tenor of the company, and as such is good enough.

In the way of basses, Mr. Maretszek may consider himself supremely blest. He has two — each of them good. Signor Gariboldi made his debut in a very unpretentious way early in the season, and beyond a kindly remark in these columns, scarcely attracted attention. Last week he was furnished with an opportunity in "Linda," and timidly availed himself of it. — Signor Gariboldi is a basso cantante of the best kind. His voice is of delicious quality, of good power, and of sufficient extent. All that it needs is use — the second nature of voices, as of everything else. Signor Gariboldi is said to be but twenty years of age. The other basso made his debut in the trying role of Silva — trying because so often and so well played in this city by Marini (who, by the way, is said to be rejuvenated), an artist not only great as a singer, but as an actor, in this part. Signor Nani (that is the name of Mr. Maretszek's basso) has a true profundo voice, and sings faithfully, persistently, and curiously out of tune. He was undoubtedly frightened, and this accounts perhaps for an occasional obliviousness of pitch, but not for numerous vocal vulgarities which might have been dispensed with. We regret exceedingly that we have had but one opportunity of hearing Signor Nani. His manly voice entitles him to much consideration, but his Silva need not consume another word.

This then is Mr. Maretszek's company, and it must be confessed it is promising enough. Youth, natural gifts, and art, are fairly blended in it and balanced. With such a company we should be content, especially when it embraces also the name of Adelaide Phillips — a contralto who combines in an extraordinary degree all the characteristics we have referred to. May Max Maretszek and his troupe have a prosperous and pleasant journey to the Antilles!

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 18. — The Strakosch Troupe is with us once more, and commenced on Saturday, a short season of three nights with Madame COLSON in Traviata. The house was crowded, and the prima donna received a perfect ovation. Last evening Madame DE WILTONST appeared to an immense audience, singing the role of Elvira in Puritani. Her success was decided. She has studied hard and improved much during her absence in Europe. She appears again in the same opera, on Thursday evening.

MAX MARETSZEK, as you have probably heard, has received an unexpected rebuff from Dame Fortune. He had engaged his troupe for Havana, and was all ready to start, when news arrived, that owing to a recent powder-explosion in Havana, the Tacon Theatre was in an unsafe state, and the city authorities had forbidden it to be occupied by Maretszek or any one else. So the valiant Max is left with his company upon his hands, and when they will get their salaries I don't know, nor do they either.

Last Saturday the North Star arrived, bringing the famous PICCOLOMINI, who with a suite of ten persons has taken up her quarters at the Union Place Hotel, but a few steps from the Opera House. Her debut is appointed for Wednesday, when the Traviata will be produced with new scenery, a vastly increased chorus, and an interpolated ballet. Signor STEFFANI, will appear for the first time as Alfredo, and Signor FLORENZA, one of Ullman's new importations, as Germont. Some alterations have been made in the interior of the house, the first circle having been remodelled, the seats removed, and their places filled by two rows of private boxes with passage way between to facilitate the interchange of visits between the nets. The prices of admission during the season will be two dollars, one dollar, fifty cents and twenty-five cents.

It is said that Madame GAZZANIGA has been engaged to sing at the first concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society; everybody had supposed she had gone back to Europe, but the erratic ways of musical artists who can fathom? Mr. NOLL, a good solid musician, will conduct the performances of this Society until Mr. EISFELD returns from Fayal.

TROVATORE.

PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 19. — The Ravels, whom I represented to you as tenaciously holding the Academy of music against all operative comers, have signed the terms of a capitulation to MAURICE STRAKOSCH, to take effect on or about November 1st. So we shall hear COLSON in opera, after all. The troupe cannot fail to be eminently successful, for we are languishing with ennui here in the Quaker City. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS announces a concert at the Musical Fund Hall for to-morrow (Wednesday) evening, but fails to inform the "dear public" what, in the way of attraction, apart from her own popular little self, they are to expect. Not so with a certain R. K. Spalding, who occupies an expensive square, per diem, in the daily papers, for the announcement of a grand concert arranged by himself. This youth, "to fame unknown," sports the names of GUSTAV SATTER, MME. JOHANNSEN, MARIA S. BRAINERD, W. H. DENETT (primo basso), J. F. TAUNT (American tenor), and Prof. CLARE W. BEAMES (conductor); and adds the following tempting paragraph: "In order to insure a large attendance, the Manager will distribute among the audience several hundred valuable presents; elegant furs, silver tea sets, chains, bracelets, &c." Between ourselves, worthy Journal, I think that the silver ware will serve no other purpose than to tarnish the prospects of this affair. The gift enterprise has been thrust into the ground, here in our midst, if any where; people are shy and wary of aught which appertains to such like seeming generosity. A well known music house here followed this dodge upon a grand scale, sometime since, but failed to reap the golden harvest for which the seed was sown. The artists engaged for this entertainment are all favorably known to the public of this city. Why not, then, have placed them upon their accredited merits? Certes, it would have been safer for Mr. Spalding to have acquainted himself with the past history of defunct gift enterprises here, before embarking upon the present adventure.

MANRICO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 23, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. Continuation of the Opera, Lucrezia Borgia, arranged for the piano-forte.

An Opera off the Stage.

The STRAKOSCH opera troupe, after a final dose of Trovatore, at the theatre, and a couple of nights at Providence, (we trust, for our "friend's" sake, of the Journal, that they played the Trovatore there,) returned and gave us a supplementary performance of a novel and peculiar character, on Thursday evening (last week) in the Music Hall. It was a variation from the "Trovatore" fashion of the day, a sort of lenten entertainment, which the manager perhaps thought might be wholesome for us after such rich surfeit, — in the shape of the "greatest musical masterwork ever composed," Mozart's immortal Don Giovanni, but Don Giovanni without scenery costume, or action, presented, or disfigured in the manner that we usually do oratorios. "All on a row" in the front of the stage sat the principal singers, the men in suits of solemn black, with white cravats, the gallant Don himself looking the soberest and meekest of the number, and the roguish Leporello (SIG. JUNCA) like a burly Methodist camp meeting parson. Behind them was a picked up apology for an orchestra, the usual handful of Italian chorus, and a plentiful sprinkling of Handel and Haydn Society singers, gathered in for the sole end of shouting the dozen bars or so of the peasants' "Liberty" chorus. Mr. Strakosch conducted in person.

Now the idea in itself of giving simply the music of a famous opera, where the music is intrinsically so full of charm as that of Don Giovanni, was not necessarily by any means a bad one. There is music enough in that masterwork which one may be thankful to get in any decent shape, whether in extracts or entire, provided the essential features of the music are preserved. Can we not enjoy a song from it in a parlor or a concert; a quartet or trio, sung or even through a representative arrangement for an orchestra, as we have sometimes been treated to whole scenes of it? And for our own part, have we forgotten, shall we ever forget, how for years we owed all our knowledge, all our love of the Don Giovanni music to a mere piano-forte arrangement, now torn and shabby, which we cherish out of grateful memory of the many sweet, delicious hours we have spent over it, getting possessed, as it were, with the soul, the essence of the music long beforehand against the time when we should hear and see the glories of the opera revealed in full upon the stage. Is it not pleasant, even after our best memories of Gris's Donna Anna and of Bosio's Zerlina, and the splendid ensemble, to recall parts or the whole of it through voice and instrument at home? Much more, then, should it be a real feast for the imagination to hear all the music sung by fine Italian voices, skilled and passionate, with a complete orchestra to render all those exquisite harmonies which it was feast enough in itself to listen to with closed eyes when things upon the stage went badly? For the worst performance of this opera was always in a great degree redeemed by a good orchestra, so much of the charm of the whole thing resides intrinsically in the music. We confess we should be very glad in the same way to make acquaintance with the musical essentials of many other noble operas, by Mozart, Gluck and others, which there seems little prospect of our ever witnessing as lyric dramas on the stage. Can we not learn and enjoy much of Shakespeare's plays by reading them alone, or in social circles with a distribution of the characters, or by hearing them read by good interpreters like Mrs. Kemble, quite as well, and even better than by seeing them as often murdered in the theatre? And why is not the same thing practicable in regard to the good operas? Let us at least learn to know and love their music, the real vital and imaginative part of them, which is the composer's work, if we cannot command an adequate stage representation.

Now this is what the shrewd, ingenious Strakosch promised us. He had conceived a bright idea; he would open a new path, a new field for managerial enterprise, a new source of profit by ministering to just this want, by gratifying the public curiosity to know about famous lyric works in a much more economical way than that of theatres. So we were promised by the flaming hand-bills that we should hear, for the first time in this country, the entire music of Mozart's master opera, with the best Italian artists to sing the music of the several characters, with a complete and perfect orchestra, a grand chorus, with everything essential to the music, only divested of dramatic show, that thus we might enjoy the music in its purity:—an opportunity which it was supposed would be peculiarly welcome to those whose squeamish consciences forbade their entering a play-house. The promise was good. But the fulfilment! Instead of Don Giovanni entire, we never knew a work of Art so murderously cut up. Not only were there the usual omissions of such fine airs as Non mi dir, &c., but much beside was left out which every opera troupe has given us, and the whole thing was cut short in the most senseless and inglorious manner in the very middle of the sublime retribution scene of the finale. The orchestra, as we have said, was thin and small and miserable, some instruments entirely wanting. The characters for the most part were filled by quite incompetent persons. The conducting was incompetent; whole movements being taken in the absurdest tempo; and generally the whole thing was slurred and scrambled through with in the easiest and cheapest manner. It was but new proof of the intrinsic power and beauty of Mozart's music that much of it was highly relished in spite of such maltreatment.

The orchestra failing, the principal interest of course centred in the solo singers, Mme. COLSON's bird-like voice and fervent grace and finesse of execution in the Zerlina songs, and the Zerlina music generally, formed the most redeeming feature, yet even this was far from faultless; the charming little prima donna was less at home than we had hoped in music of this kind. She marred the exquisite simplicity of Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino by far-fetched cadenzas from a wholly different sphere of music—those commonplace of the operatic foot-lights by which singers invite you to forget the composer, the character, the music, and to admire them. Then again there was an excess of that tremolo, which Mme. Colson surely does not need to lend expression to her native simple charm of voice. Yet she did sing charmingly and was obliged to repeat both airs. Mlle. PARODI had the large and telling voice and the declamatory energy, but hardly the refinement for the noble and impassioned recitative of Donna Anna. In the great song, Or tu sai, where she relates the outrage to her lover, there was more of fierceness than of soul's passion in her outbursts, and the loud tones became unmusical with a tigress-like ferocity, to say nothing of overstrained, false intonation. Mme. STRAKOSCH, as Donna Elvira, sung almost always sharp, which strikes an east-wind chill through any music.

The gentleman who took the part of Don Giovanni himself sang coldly and mechanically, and was scarcely heard at all in the concerted or loudly accompanied passages, so that it was really Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out. Leporello (Sig. JUNCA) was much better; at home in his music and effective throughout. Sig. AMODIO did the best he could with the part of Masetto; and Sig. LABOGETTA, who we understand has been a very superior tenor, and has had experience in German theatres, showed that he knew the music of Ottavio well, and sang it without notes; voice was wanting, more than feeling and conception.

On the whole the audience who two thirds filled the Music Hall, rose from their seats glad that the murderous work was over. The general severity of criticism on the performance, however, proved how deeply the Don Giovanni music is understood and loved by the great mass of our musical public. The thing needs only to be well done to become acceptable.

A Clap-Trap Festival.

About the most extensive piece of impudence that we have seen for some time in this land of musical clap-trap and humbug, is a pamphlet of thirty mortal pages, containing the order of arrangements, programmes, list of performers and grand getters-up, humbug "Professors," "Judges," bogus "Honoraries," &c., &c., of what purports to be: "The People's Grand Premium Festival of Vocal and Instrumental Music, to be celebrated by 300 performers from the three counties, Tompkins, Seneca, and Schuyler, of New York, conducted by Prof. J. H. HINTERMISTER, in Six Magnificent Concerts and three Practical Musical Lectures, Oct. 26, 27 and 28. Important Business Meetings, Prizes, pertinent Addresses and a Splendid Dinner in a Colossean Temporary Concert Hall, of brilliant decorations, capable of seating Thousands, entirely water-tight, &c., &c." All this is to come off at Godwin's Ferry (North Hector Landing), Seneca Lake. Then follows a whole page of names of the "Board of Conductors"; the "Board of Judges," to award the prizes, consisting of three "Profs." at the head of whom is one Covert (the associate of Ossian Dodge?). Then a "Board of Honorary Members" in which they have had the impudence to insert without authority what names they pleased, as for instance, the editor of this Journal, coolly sandwiched in between a couple of distinguished psalm-book makers! Then a list of premiums for all sorts of original productions, from a sacred chorus to a comic song or polka. Then a grand muster-roll of all the vocal train-bands, naming every member ("Orpheus Club," "Havana Choir," "Covert Choir," "Watkins Quartette," &c., &c.) Then the programmes of the "magnificent" concerts, where we have Handel's "Hallelujah" and "I know that my Redeemer" in immediate alternation with "American Ladies' Quickstep," "Mormon Quickstep," "Sensitive Coon," and other wonderful productions of our native composers and professors. And, finally, for the last Concert the following grandiloquent announcement:

William Tell, The Liberator of Switzerland.

A GRAND NATIONAL DRAMA OF MUSIC,

Written and arranged for this occasion, by Prof. J. H. Hintermister.

NOTICE.

In this National Drama we design to bring before the public mind in graphic style, vivid coloring and impressive musical language, the most tragic and thrilling historical scenes of a country and people, whose heroic struggles for Liberty and final victory over ambitious and cruel usurpers, encircled its name with a halo of glory; and indeed such a representation can hardly fail to receive an enthusiastic welcome from our American citizens, as it depicts to a great extent their own history, their own woes, oppression and convulsive but successful effort to burst a foreign goading yoke. Yes, these will find in our modest, deliberate, courageous, undaunting, self-sacrificing and pure-minded William Tell, their own dear, ever dear, George Washington; and in the ever commendable nightly council at Gruetli, in torch-light haze, a striking simile to their famous Declaration of Independence; and, finally the adoption of the ancient Swiss costumes by the performers in this drama, is expected to give the whole an appearance at once novel, animating and characteristic.

This is followed by a synopsis of the Drama, which Mr. Punch himself would find it hard to caricature, it would be like gilding refined gold. Truly this is melancholy business; it tells a sad tale of musical barbarism, that there can be interest enough in any part of our country to warrant even the printing of so expensive a programme of vulgarity and nonsense.

Diary Abroad.

Monday, Aug. 23d, noon.—A broad expanse of water, but no longer limitless to sight, save to the North. The anchor goes down with a heavy plunge and the loud rattling of the chain cable. A bark lies on our left, one of the fine new Bremen steamships—the Hudson—on our right. Across the still, level water to the west is the green line of the embankment, which says "thus far and no farther" to the stream and the tides, beyond which, far as telescope can reach, nothing rises above the horizon level but the tops of houses, church spires, and trees. In the other direction is a green open space—how long? a mile?—with a row or two of trees, and at the southern extremity, a large round battery belonging to Hanover. This is within hailing distance, and behind it lie the docks of Bremerhaven. A line of masts, rows of houses and other buildings beyond—and that is all there is to see, save the low, level meadows and plains extending away into the blue distance.

The boat is lowered, but only to carry our grief-stricken sister-passenger to friends, where she may find sympathy and love, and whence she may start upon that sad journey across these heathy plains to the old home—but the father is in the churchyard, and his bees, whom he so cared for and petted, sip honey from the flowers of his grave.

The adieu spoken to her, as she leaves us, by passenger, seaman and servant boy alike are spoken softly, and as the boat pushes off all look down for a few moments silently. We have been together more than six weeks—and we all feel the shadow of her great sorrow. Few of us will ever see or hear from her again. At 3 1-2 P. M., the small steamboat for Bremen comes along side, and we with bag and baggage are now transferred from our good Athena's deck to that of the boat. Good bye, noble ship! good bye all that is American—the first glance around makes me feel at home in Germany once more. A curious feeling that—that of being as much at home here, as if I were on the Bay State leaving New York for Boston. "John" feels himself in a strange land, and we, old acquaintances,—our fraulein Governess, and the man of the "hübsche Gegend", and the boys,—we all feel drawn together, by a sort of family tie, now that we are surrounded by a hundred strange faces. The girl who, after eight or ten years of absence, has come over with us, as a sort of assistant to the steward, has found an old acquaintance, and cries heartily to learn that her sister is in Bremerhaven—and she knew it not. Our Captain is shaking hands all round—everybody of the better class of passengers knows Schilling.

We move rather slowly against stream and tide, but in process of time the broad Weser is confined within embankments, here and there broken by passages defended by strong water gates, which lead into the small towns and villages, the roofs of which appear beyond the dykes. It is already dark, when we reach Bremen. There is little bustle and confusion at the landing place. We have had to point out our baggage to a licensed porter, then go ashore, enter the first unoccupied carriage, and so, through the still, quiet streets, whose tall gabled houses seem to look down a welcome, we ride to the "Stadt Frankfort", and by ten o'clock, are looking down from our windows upon the deserted Square.

Early next morning we were awaked by music. It was a noble German choral, splendidly harmonized, and played by a full band. How deliciously sweet the tones of the reed instruments which formed the bulk of the band—oboes, flutes, clarinets, bassoons—came up to us through our open window! After the choral, followed a selection of pieces in various styles, and at the close was Mendelssohn's 'Wedding march.' It was a pleasant thing thus to be welcomed upon our first morning to Germany. Upon enquiry, we learned that the commander of Bremen's little squadron of soldiers had rooms in the hotel, and the band had thus unexpectedly celebrated the fourteenth anniversary of his wedding day.

Like large buildings generally in Germany, our Hotel is built around three sides of a square, the fourth side being filled by a high wall, by a range of buildings, or by the side of the next edifice, as the case may be; and this square, or small court is very often cultivated as a garden, with vines, shrubs, flowers, a few trees and arbors. In the court of our hotel, thus cultivated, the band played. How large the number of members I do not know, but judge from the effect as compared with the effect produced by our large bands here in Berlin, that it was about thirty strong. I am not aware that the Bremen band is at all noted for excellence, and yet how exceedingly precise, in what perfect time, and in all respects how beautiful its performance was, even when thus heard early in the morning, when the ear is rested and doubly critical, and when no noise in house or street disturbed the flow of the music, I have no words to describe. Music is the business of these men. They are selected from an immense number of candidates. They practise daily. They are supported by the State. Is it any wonder then that such a band, almost every man of which might appear in Boston as a soloist, should so surpass anything that we can show except possibly in some half a dozen cases? It was an old story to me, who have spent so much time in Europe, but upon John it worked like magic. It was his first hearing of an European band. Could our blowers of bastard brass instruments—made of German silver, or something worse, only once hear such a band, with its pathetic oboes, its soft flutes, its shrill piccolos, its manly clarinets and its deep-toned bassoons, a new light would shine into their minds.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Mme CORA DE WILHORST, the New York prima donna, made her first appearance since her return from Europe, under Mr. Strakosch's auspices, at Burton's Theatre, on Monday night. The opera was I Puritani. Fry, of the Tribune, says of her:

The part of Elvira demands a capital singer, which Mad. de Wilhorst proved herself to be. In regard to method, style—school, in a word—she ranks with the great Italian artists. In voice she is wanting in some qualities. But, so far as nature permits her, she does the best. Her execution is clear and brilliant; her phrasing excellent; her declamatory points, especially towards the close of the strophe, are admirably intelligent. It shows great mobility of mind and of voice to display the rare penetration of the Italian school of singing which this lady exhibits. She is the first soprano from this city on the Italian stage who can rank in artistic ability with the natives of the singing country. There are greater voices in volume, and more comprehensive in sympathies, but in skill she takes a prime rank.

The announcements of the rival opera managers in New York this week are magnificent specimens;

they would bear away the prize among monster products at an agricultural fair. ULLMAN puts PICCOLINI in the foreground as central figure; her debut to be in La Traviata, at the Academy, on Wednesday (last) evening. The cast comprised also Sig. STEFFANI, Sig. FLORENZA (first appearance in America), "the grand and imposing chorus of one hundred singers, including sixty pupils of the gratuitous Singing School of the Academy, which has been established three months and has met with the most encouraging success," &c., &c.; "the Grand Orchestra, the largest and most perfect ever united for an operatic performance," numbering upward of sixty "Professors," under the direction of Signor MUZZO (his first appearance). Then, for the ball scene, the incomparable danseuse, Senorita SOTO, with a "corps de ballet of twenty young ladies; the mise en scene on a grand scale, &c., &c. Per contra, Mr. STRAKOSCH, in announcing his DE WILHORST, indulges in some broad and statesmanlike suggestions. He "would point out to the public that experience has proved that this country is equal to any emergency," (Mr. S. should be the next K. N. candidate for the Presidency), "whether in science or the mechanic arts; and now it is to be seen (he says) whether we cannot cultivate OUR OWN PRIMA DONNA." See, too, how manfully the manager stands up for the exercise of a "divine right:"

Mr. Strakosch reluctantly refers to the recent publications, in which his late Opera season has been referred to as a species of senseless opposition. It is not the intention of Mr. Strakosch to "oppose" any one; he simply competes. He has had the honor to give a series of performances which had a brilliant success. He believes that it will be the opinion of all who are qualified to judge, that he has the best artists, and, generally the best ensemble. Further, he does not recognize the principle that as an American citizen he is not entitled to pursue the business to which he has devoted his life, without interruption from any quarter. Certainly the divine right to perform Italian Opera does not rest in the hands of any single person or clique of persons. Mr. Strakosch claims simply that he has a right to give the Opera, and the public has an equal right to come or to stay away. Since they have chosen the former alternative, Mr. Strakosch considers that his course has been endorsed by them. The applause bestowed upon MADAME COLSON, who has been pronounced one of the BEST ARTISTS OF THE AGE, &c., &c.

ADELAIDE PHILLIPS announces a concert in Philadelphia this week. The Bulletin says, with justice:—She is "the finest of all our American vocalists; a faithful, conscientious, correct and most deserving artist, with fine natural gifts, and a most worthy ambition to improve them." . . . Mr. SATER, the pianist, is announced as the prime attraction at a concert in Philadelphia—that is to say next to the attraction of "several hundred valuable presents" which the manager (Mr. R. Spalding) will give to the audience "to insure a full house." And these gifts are to derive still further lustre from the singing of Mme. JOHANSEN, Miss BRAINERD, and other popular artists.

The subscription to Mr. ZERBAHN's series of "Philharmonic (Orchestral) Concerts," has taken a good start, and there is a good prospect that we shall have some fine Symphonies and Overtures this winter, rendered as well as they can be by the most select and best drilled orchestra of fifty musicians that can be got together in Boston. We shall trust to Mr. Zerbahn's tact and taste, too, for good selections of lighter music. But to make all sure at once, so that rehearsals may commence in season and go on in earnest, let no lover of such music who has not already subscribed hesitate to put down his name at once. . . . The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, under the energetic impulse of their new President, Mr. THOMAS E. CHICKERING, and with ZERBAHN of course for conductor, have commenced their winter's rehearsals with "Handel's Israel in Egypt," which glorious work, half mastered by the Society last winter and then dropped to make room for other work in connection with Herr Formes, &c., will we trust be brought out without fail before the season closes; and the more times the better, for those mighty choruses will lose no charm by any amount of repetition. . . . We do not hear of any meetings of the Mendelssohn Choral, or of the Musical Education Society; yet we wonder that those who have the gift to enable them take part in such choral bodies should not meet to practise noble Oratorios, Cantatas, Masses, &c., for the pure love of it, and for the benefit it must be to their own musical and intellectual culture, even if they have no encouragement to embark in public concert enterprises. . . . The German "ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB" continue as usual their meetings on two evenings of each week, for the social practice of part-songs, under the direction of Herr KREISSMANN; but they seem indisposed to give us another series of those delightful concerts during the coming winter. We trust, however, that they will yet think better of it; for they who can do so much for the cause of Art and refined enjoyment, really owe a public debt in the matter, at least so long as the public answers their appeals as promptly as it has done heretofore.

Mr. WILLIAM SAAR, a young pianist of New York, arrived there last week in the Hammonia, after an absence of four years spent in Germany, during which period he has pursued his musical studies with great perseverance under Moscheles, Kullak, Liszt, Hauptmann, the late Professor Dehn, of the Berlin Royal Library, and others. We understand that he will soon come out in public with several new compositions of his own, when we trust he will show that he deserves the support of the musical world.

Of the composition of Ullman's new opera troupe we learn as follows from the New York Atlas:

Madlle. Poinot, a French singer, from the Paris grand opera, Madame Laborde (who by the way is not equal to Lagrange or Bosio) Madlle. Johanna Wagner, of German and London notoriety, (and no doubt an artist of merit in certain roles), and Madlle. Ghioni, mezzo-soprano, from London, figure among the other dommas, both first and second. Tamaro, Lorini and Belart, (tenors), Florenza and Aldighieri, (baritones) and Karl Formes (basso) complete the vocal troupe, while Soto (who looks as charming as ever) with some twenty auxiliaries, represents the "light fantastic" department. Karl Anschutz and a Signor Muzio, are to superintend the orchestration.

A moody correspondent of the New York Courier & Enquirer makes fun of the learning and originality displayed in musical criticisms in the Boston papers. The satire is perhaps true enough, but not more so of newspaper critics in Boston than of those in New York, Philadelphia, and, in fact, all the cities, great and small. This is the way he talks:

But the Boston local journals shine with the most peculiar lustre in the departments of musical and theatrical criticism. Here they form a School independent of all other schools, (even of English grammar often;) they have invented new terminologies, in which not only new words are employed, but old ones with new meanings, known only (if known at all) to the disciples, until it is often difficult to find out what they mean (when they mean anything). For example, there is the word "register"—when you see that word in some of the Boston papers, you may be sure that the musical season has opened. That is what it means, as nearly as can be made out. Many brought some registers with him when he came there, and now the singers all have them. In a paper—a sound Republican paper—which came last night, it is stated that at a recent concert,

"The Germania Band played with their usual beauty and splendor. Mr. C. R. Adams sang quite nicely two common-place ballads. Mr. Adams has a voice excellently suited to a smaller hall, where nice phrasing and exquisite modulation of the various registers may be felt."

The registers here spoken of would seem to belong to the hall; probably some were shut and others opened by the singer till he got them adjusted, or in other words "fixed right," which seems here to be the meaning of modulated. Or else, "modulation of the various registers" may mean apparation of the vocal organs: Bottom we remember, in the play, could so aggravate his voice that he could roar like a nightingale. The sentence is a fine example of the Boston school in its use of common scientific words in an esoteric or private sense, intelligible only to the initiated. The general or exoteric meaning of the word "modulation," as used in music, may be found in a work by Dr. MARX of Berlin, on Composition. In that work is an admirable chapter headed thus: "On Opening New Roads;" a department which has been cultivated in this country with considerable success, and which might be recommended in its broadest sense to the musical critics here spoken of—if it were not for a French saying about a candle.

LONGFELLOW's poem, "Hiawatha," has been set to music by EMILE KARST, of St. Louis, and was lately sung at the hall of the Mercantile Library Association, in that city, by a troupe comprising a leading soprano, contralto, tenor, and baritone. The accompaniment was in part orchestral and in part upon the piano.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

M. Gounod's new opera, Le Médecin malgré lui, founded on Molière's comedy, has been performed at the Théâtre Lyrique. Chorley, of the London Athenæum, "assisted," and reports as follows:

Mention was made in the Athenæum a few months ago of the pianoforte score of M. Gounod's music to Molière's "Médecin malgré lui." That publication in no respect suggests an idea of the effect of the opera on the stage. We heard it, the other evening, at the Théâtre Lyrique with an amount of pleasure hard to overstate. It was then heard, too, under the difficulties of a temperature as oppressively torrid as if the heat had broken out to fulfil the much-talked-of prophecy of Lord Rosse. No matter what the thermometer told,—no matter how many times Sganarelle had beaten Martine, and caressed his bottle, and Léandre had sung his serenade,—no matter that "Le Médecin began late in the evening (after 'Les Nuits d'Espagne,' by M. Semet, a young French composer, in his less sterling style, deserving attention),—had the above drawbacks been double, M. Gounod's opera must have asserted itself as a masterpiece, to be ranged among the French musical dramas, which have travelled, and will travel, over Europe. Molière's comedy turns out excellent as the canvas for the composer, who has made of Sganarelle one of those brilliant buffo parts into which every new Labache or Ronconi that may attempt it will be able to put some new "pastime and prodigality" of his own. The principal soprani, Martine and Jacqueline, it is true, are both soubrettes: and there is no part in which a prima donna may make up for her dramatic humor by solitary display; but the occupation of Léandre is precisely such as loving tenors love: his two songs are delicious. Still "Le Médecin" is a French opera, one in which (as in Gluck's operas, Cherubini's "Les Deux Journées," and—by way of latest example—M. Meyerbeer's) the separate pieces, detached and deprived of action, lose flavor and interest. Then, to illustrate with another comparison, unlike M. Auber, M. Gounod cares nothing for the conventions of execution. There is not a note of show-music from beginning to end,—not a bar which time and change can make sound older than it now sounds,—not a single piece in which we have to forgive untruth for the sake of effect. It is vigorous, humorous, pure stage-music, having a way of its own, if ever there were such a thing. The instrumental writing, by its dexterity, its variety, its fullness, yet its simplicity, will satisfy those who (justifiably enough, as times go) complain of noise everywhere,—and who cannot abide Pyramus and Thisbe making sentimental love with three trombones to back them, or Lisette or Maid Marian ushered on the stage with a thump of the big drum. Lastly, there is a retrospective tone throughout, an indication of the stately debonair humor of the times of Le Grand Monarque, thoroughly in keeping, but never forced into extravagance. To sum up, "Le Médecin" is an admirable specimen of well-managed mirth in music,—owing nothing to stage-apointments, for the dresses and scenery are simple and not showy,—a little to its exponents, since the intelligent persons who act and sing it (and who have learned their duties thoroughly) are still merely the second best members of the troop at the Théâtre Lyrique. M. Mailliet, however, the Sganarelle, must be excepted. It would be hard to amend the mixture of stolidity, liveliness, and cunning thrown by him into every action and gesture. He sings the music, too, very efficiently. It is not wonderful that, after such encouragement as such a success affords, the coming "Faust," which (as has been mentioned) is in rehearsal, should be expected with great interest.

The Italian Opera opens with La Traviata on the 2nd of October. Madame Penco is the prima donna. The theatre has been newly decorated at a great cost. M. Calzado, the manager, is reported to have lost 300,000*f.* during his first season, and 100,000*f.* the second, whilst his third season was rewarded with again.

Tamberlik, Madame Bosio, M. Calzolari, and Mesdames Medori and Spezia have left Paris this week en route for St. Petersburg and Madrid. Madame Steffanoni has likewise just left for Barcelona, and M. Carrion for Spain.

At the Opéra Comique Auber's opera, La part du Diable, has been revived with considerable success, with the universal favorite, Madame Cabel.

"FUDGING" AN OPERA.—An Italian composer, named Berrettoni, brought an action before the Paris Tribunal of Commerce against M. Calzado, director of the Italian Theatre, under these circumstances:—He stated that in September, 1857, they signed an agreement to the effect that he, Berrettoni, should, in a fortnight, remit to M. Calzado an opera made up of morceaux taken from the various works of Rossini, entitled the "Curioso Accidente," with a libretto, and that Calzado should pay him 800*f.* on delivery and 500*f.* the day after the first performance. The opera was duly delivered, and 800*f.* paid. It was put in rehearsal, but never produced; and the plaintiff had consequently not received the remuneration to which he was entitled, and besides had been prevented from having the opera represented in foreign and provincial theatres. He therefore claimed 10,000*f.* damages, and that M. Calzado should be made to bring out the opera before the 1st of December next, under pain of 200*f.* fine for each day's delay. In support of his action he produced a certificate from Rossini that the opera in question was, with the exception of one cavatina, by him. M. Calzado contended that he incurred no liability to plaintiff, inasmuch as no period had been fixed for the production of the opera, and he prayed that the agreement should be declared null and void. The tribunal decided that there was no reason for declaring the agreement void; but that, no period having been fixed for the production of the opera, the plaintiff was not entitled to damages. It nevertheless ordered that the opera should be brought out by Calzado before the 31st of December, 1858.—Mus. Gazette.

MILAN.—At the Scala, they are playing the Due Foscari, where Corsi is much applauded.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The following is a list of the company of the Italian Opera for the forthcoming season:—sopranos—Mesdames Bosio, Lotti della Santa, Bernardi, and Dottini; tenors—Sigs. Tamberlik, Mongini, Calzolari, and Alessandro Bettini; baritones—Signors Ronconi, Debassini and Everardi; bassi profondi—Signors Marini and Polonini. Madame Ferraris will be premiere danseuse. Among the new operas to be produced are mentioned La Juive, by M. Halévy, and Simon Boccanegra by Signor Verdi.

CONLENTZ.—A second musical festival will take place at Coblenz, on the 9th and 10th of October, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Musical Institute, founded in 1808, and supported by the state. It was formerly under the direction of Herr Auschütz, but is now under that of Herr Lenz. Handel's Samson is the work selected for the first day. The chorus will contain 290 persons from Coblenz alone, and this number will be increased to 250, by amateurs in the surrounding places, especially Neuwied. The orchestra will consist of 130 instrumentalists. Samson will be preceded by Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The following is the programme of the second concert, on Sunday, the 10th October:—Part I.—1. Symphony No. 4, in D minor, by Robert Schumann; 2. Tenor air (not yet definitely selected); 3. Scene from the third act of Gluck's Orpheus (Madlle. Schreck, from Bonn); 4. Gesangs-scene for the violin, by L. Spohr (Herr Otto Von Königslow, from Cologne); 5. Second finale from Don Juan, with the concluding movements. Part II.—6. Four songs, by the Kölner Männergesang-Verein; 8. The overture to Euryanthe, by C. M. von Weber; 8. Tenor air (still undecided); 9. Bass air from the Creation; and 10. Mendelssohn's finale to Loreley.

The solo singers already engaged are Madlle. Shreck, named above, for the alto parts; Madlle. Augusta Brecken, for the soprano parts; Herr Ernst Koch, of Cologne, for the tenor part in Samson; and Herr Carl Hill, from Frankfort-on-the-Maine, as bass. Madlle. Derrtz, of Cologne, was also requested to lend her services, but was unable to do so in consequence of previous engagements. The assistance, likewise, of a former member of the Institution, now one of the finest tenors in Germany, is expected.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Welcome be thou light of heaven. Mendelssohn. 30

One of the finest of Mendelssohn's Two-Part Songs, appearing here for the first time with an English Version. It is needless to say anything in praise of it. Mendelssohn's Duets for Ladies' voices stand at the head of this class of musical literature.

Melancholy. (La Malinconia.) Rom. Campana. 25

A Boudoir Song of modern Italy, flowing smoothly and melodiously, without any of those highly-colored dramatic passages, with which late Italian composers like to spice their songs. The melody moves in an excellent compass for almost every voice.

Rose of the morn. Song. Frank Mori. 25

This is a capital song for a baritone voice. It is one of the best pieces on the repertoire of this rising English singer and composer.

Sailing on the summer Sea. Ballad. Cherry. 25

Come with me to Fairy Land. " 35

Cherry's fresh and pleasing strains are always welcome. It were strange, if so much prettiness should not meet with universal favor! There is no shadow of the sentimental in Cherry's ballads, they are bright, sunny, and refreshing. Let any one doubt this, after having heard the last of the two above named ballads.

Kiss me and call me your own. L. O. Emerson. 25

Words and music of a very popular character.

The Little Savoyards. Duet. (German and English words.) Lagoanire. 25

A touching appeal of two little strayed Savoyard boys, to be sheltered while the dreadful snow-storm rages, in which they come near perishing, with their queer instruments, and the small stock of "latest Ballads" which they bring back from Paris to their mountain home. It is a very effective composition, pretty done; especially the part in a minor key, with a remote resemblance to the quaint monotonousness of Savoyard lays, is quite charming.

Instrumental Music.

Snow Polka. E. Szechenyi. 25

Louise Polka. W. C. Glynn. 25

Cheer Boys, cheer. Quickstep. " 25

Practical Five-Finger Exercises; Op. 802. Czerny. 75

Czerny himself styles this work of his an "indispensable Companion to every Pianoforte School." Finger Exercises occupy a highly important place in modern instruction, and there are a number of compilations in the market, which offer to supply the want of a suitable book for the scholar, to guide himself by. Some of these, like Schmitt's "Pianist's best Companion" are very meritorious. Czerny, in his Collection, had the advantage of a vast experience in Teaching, and of a most excellent system of Instruction, which places his book above all others of the same kind.

BOCHSA'S INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE HARP.—A new and Improved Method of Instruction, in which the Principles of Fingering and the various means of attaining finished Execution on that instrument, are clearly explained and illustrated by numerous Examples and Exercises Composed and Fingered by M. Chas. Bochsa. 250

The plan of this method is entirely new, the author having brought the common harp and the Harp with double movement into a comparative point of view, and united all their relations—constantly treating the latter as a sequel to the former, and clearly proving that whoever understands the one will in a short time be perfectly acquainted with the other. The general principles of fingering, unfortunately omitted in some instruction books or treated of in a light manner, are in this work completely developed and illustrated by numerous examples. The various means of attaining expression, are also minutely explained and exemplified.

The Legend of the Cross of St. Francis.

BY TROVATOR.

[The famed Monastery of St. Francis of Assisi is in the Papal States not far from Perugia. St. Francis was accustomed to pray before a crucifix in a rude cell upon the side of the mountain near the convent, and after his death, this cell became a hallowed shrine to the devout Catholics. A traditional legend relates that the cross was once removed to the splendid Gothic church of the convent, but was taken back at night to its original resting place by the angels, while the monks were asleep. Upon this legend the following ballad has been constructed.]

On the side of the mountain bare there stands
An humble and lonely cell,
Where, sweetly mellowed by distance, you hear
The soft tone of the convent bell.

The cell is scooped from the solid rock,
And the floor is damp and cold;
A crucifix stands at the farther end
As it did in the days of old;

In the days of old, when that holy saint
Would come from the convent fair,
To kneel and pray by the holy cross
That stands in the cell so bare.

St. Francis had long since left this world,
But his name was cherished still;
And from far and wide the pilgrims would flock
To the Convent upon the Hill.

They came from Arno's gentle vale,
They came from the banks of the Po,
They came from Rome, where the rushing waves
Of the golden Tiber flow;

They poured from the sunny hills of France,
From the distant Briton isle;
To the shrine of St. Francis they joyfully toiled
O'er many a weary mile;

And they hastened to visit the lonely cell,
To pray on the hallowed spot,
To kneel at the foot of the self-same cross
That still stands in St. Francis' grot.

Then there came to the convent a Cardinal,
He was sent by the Pope of Rome;
And he hastened to visit St. Francis' cell
And to pray 'neath its humble dome.

But when he returned to the convent fair,
He called all the brethren around,
And he said it was wrong that St. Francis' cross
Should remain 'neath the damp cold ground.

"It is not meet," said the Cardinal,
"That beneath that humble cell
We should leave to moulder the holy cross
Of the saint that we loved so well.

"Let us place the cross on our high altar,
Where, beneath the Gothic nave,
It will find a fitter resting place
Than within that lonely cave."

And they placed the cross on the High Altar,
All with holy pomp and state,
And the censers were swung and the convent bells rung,
While the people around did wait.

And they placed the cross on the High Altar,
And the monks they chanted a hymn,

While the organ rolled from its pipes of gold
Fit music for cherubim.

And they placed the cross on the High Altar,
And they said a holy mass,
While the worshipping crowd responded aloud
Till trembled the painted glass.

And they placed the cross on the High Altar,
And with care they made it fast,
And they said it should stay, where they placed it that day,
As long as the church should last.

Then night came down on the convent and town,
And each monk retired to rest,
First saying a prayer with holiest care,
To the saint that he loved the best.

* * * * *
But what means that glare that now reddens the air,
And that comes from the church so old?
And what is that light that is streaming so bright,
Through the windows of gothic mould?

And what is that sound that is floating around,
Yet scarce heard by listening ears?
Its heavenly tone bears resemblance alone
To the harmony of the spheres!

That light so bright, on that blessed night,
Through the gothic windows that shone,
Is the play of a ray of that endless day
That encircles the Great White Throne.

And that music so sweet, that our senses greet,
As though it were Heaven that sings—
That music so rare that we hear in the air,
Is the rustling of angel wings.

On either side are flung open wide
The doors, late so firmly barred,
While angels of light, in their robes of white,
Before them are keeping guard.

But why this sight, on the dark midnight?
And why are the angels here?
And why at this hour do they show their power,
In the church so lonely and drear?

They have taken the cross from the High Altar,
Through the open door they have passed,
They have borne the cross to St. Francis' cell,
To the spot that he loved till the last.

Then the cell shone as day with a heavenly ray,
Like the glorious light that poured
When the angels, they say, rolled the stone away
From the sepulchre of our Lord.

They have taken the cross from the High Altar,
They have placed it once more in the cave,
And never again shall St. Francis' cross
Be seen 'neath a Gothic nave.

* * * * *
When morning came with its ruddy flame,
The monks they did hie to the church,
And they saw the loss of St. Francis' cross,
And they quickly made anxious search.

And they searched with fear and with inward pain,
And they found it once more in the cave,
But when they returned to the convent again
Their features were troubled and grave.

And then unto all spake the Cardinal:
"Most grievously have we erred,

And this miracle has been done, that well
We may bless our mighty Lord—

"For it teaches us that he hears our cry
As well 'neath the humble cave,
As when we kneel by the columns high
That support the fretted nave.

"We may make our prayer on the mountain bare,
Or beneath the frescoed dome,
Yet still by our side our Lord will abide—
Every place is to Him a home.

"While we worship here, we need feel no fear,
And none while we worship there,
For wherever we go we may truly know,
That our Father is everywhere."

The Diarist Abroad. No. 4.

OCT. 26.—In Wolfenbüttel. Yesterday we came from Bremen. At a station where I turned off to pay a visit to Minden friends, we parted from the last of our Athena associates our Fräulein Governess. It was her last connection with America, where she had had so much of both pleasure and pain. Her 'wander-years' are over—is it strange that tears accompanied her last "good bye?" God be with her!

In Hanover to-day I inquired after Joachim, hoping to see him, but he is still in England. How was it possible that, two years ago, the absurd story of his marriage with Bettina's daughter obtained currency? Nothing of the kind was ever dreamed of by the parties most interested.

In the afternoon we came hither—(Wolfenbüttel) and the rest of the day and evening was spent with Herr Ludwig Holle, who is doing in Germany in piano-forte music, what Novello has done in England with vocal.

We went through his establishment. In the main building on the square, so modest and retiring as not even to bear a sign to call attention to it, one flat is occupied by family apartments, his counting rooms, and the like. The others are fitted up, that below for forwarding of packages, that above for storage. If at Novello's I had feasted my eye upon his vast collection of vocal music, I had no less a feast in the long ranges of shelves, upon which lie heaped the piano-forte works of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Bach, Weber, Clementi, Kramer, and the like.

Back of the house, on the bank of the little stream, which flows through Wolfenbüttel, leaving a narrow court between, he has erected a new building in which all his printing and stereotyping is done. Here is the press-room, with half a dozen small power presses at work; here is another press-room with lithographic and engraver's presses in motion—for Holle has also a large business in maps and charts. In another, we saw a dozen stereotypers at work; in a fourth the compositors, one of whom was setting up "Der Freyschütz," another "Oberon"—for a fine stereotyped edition of Weber's operas is on the tapis. In other rooms we saw all the usual departments of a large printing establishment, fully represented, and finally, when we had finished all this, here is one more room. Holle enjoyed my evident surprise—for to me it was something new to find this department of the printing business represented in the establishment of a publisher—as I went in and found myself in a type foundry!

"I cannot afford to be always buying new type," said he in effect, "and I must have it continually, or it will be impossible to keep my plates up to the standard. I have therefore, to secure the final touch of perfection in my editions, put my own type foundry in operation, and you can judge for yourself of the excellence of the work."

Truly the work is excellent, as the new edition of his Beethoven Sonatas shows.

In the course of the afternoon and evening, I had opportunity of gratifying my curiosity most fully, in relation to his great undertaking. Great undertaking, I say. Here is a modest, retiring man, in a little city, of half a dozen thousand inhabitants, within from half an hour to six or eight hours ride by railroad, of Brunswick, Hanover, Bremen, Hamburg, Leipzig, Dresden, and Berlin, in all of which places you find music-publishing houses, some of which are among the most extensive in the world, who, at his own risk and in face of all the opposition of the princes of the music-dealers, has undertaken to place the greatest productions of the greatest masters within the reach of all classes of music lovers. He has been plagued and pestered by copyright suits, but has gained his cause in every case. He has worked his way along quietly but perseveringly—has conquered the position he holds by leaving his publications to speak for themselves. For instance, not a music-seller in Berlin would expose one of his volumes upon his counter. Very well, a few copies of the Beethoven and Mozart Sonatas were sent to Schneider and other booksellers, and they found immediate sale. People who already had the greater part of those sonatas, saw the price, as printed upon the covers of the volumes, examined them to see that the works were complete and correct, found that it would be cheaper to buy the whole in this form, than to complete their sets, and purchased. One purchaser made others. The edition of Beethoven and Mozart gradually went off, and Haydn followed.

The profits were exceedingly small, but it was a cash business, and he was able slowly to enlarge his sphere of operations.

By and by his enterprise began to attract the attention of musicians and teachers. The indefatigable Chrysander, exceedingly well fitted for the labor, by his long continued studies in old music, with Dehn and others, preparatory to his "Life of Handel," became interested in Holle and undertook the collection and editing from original sources the four volumes of Bach. Liszt lent his countenance to the enterprise, and when the publisher became dissatisfied with the appearance of his first edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, consented to edit Beethoven's piano-forte works entire.

When Holle told me about Liszt, I remarked with a smile, that it was a very good thing for him to have Liszt's name on the title pages; adding something, which implied the thought that the good pianist would not probably labor very hard in his editorial function. Holle understood me and without being offended, went into another room and brought me a proof-sheet of one of the sonatas for violin and piano-forte. My doubt needed no further answer. First Liszt has gone through the sonatas with pen and ink; then a second time carefully, making his corrections, which are in some cases of the minutest character, with a red pencil; and finally, a third examination has shown still a few errors, which are noted with a common lead one.

He allows of no metronomic marks. Beethoven himself gave none, and those which we find on various editions are by Moscheles or some other player, and necessarily give their ideas, not Beethoven's. No, says Liszt, leave tempos to the player. If he has Beethoven's spirit he will get them right; if not, he cannot be taught.

Holle wished to include in his edition of Beethoven, the Symphonies arranged for two and for four hands. But by whom? a grave and troublesome question. By accident he learned that a man named F. W. Markull, (I think a music-director away out here on the Baltic coast, at Danzig,) had sent a manuscript to some publisher, containing such an arrangement complete. The man was not much known, and the publisher for sundry reasons was very willing to return the manuscript. Holle obtained it and sent it to Liszt. Liszt was delighted with it, and Holle has printed it. The new edition of the sonatas is not disfigured by advertising pages, as was the first. Excellent as that was for the price, this is much handsomer.

Fortunately for Holle, his business was so conducted that during the crisis last year he met with but two or three trivial losses, and now that things are upon a better footing, he is gaining the reward of his enterprise and perseverance.

The Character and Genius of Handel.

Whatever touched his musical sense excited him like the Pythoiness upon her tripod. At the conductor's desk he used to warn the chorus by calling out "chorus;" and the three contemporary biographers concur in saying that his voice, when he uttered that word, was "most formidable." Miss Hawkins, in her Anecdotes, relates of him a circumstance, "which the Dean of Raphoe (Dr. Allot,) who remembers him, lives to tell: that Handel, being questioned as to his ideas and feelings when composing the Alleluiah chorus, replied in his imperfect English, 'I did think I did see all heaven before me, and the great God himself.'"

When he was composing, his excitement would rise to such a pitch that he would burst into tears: "It is said, that a friend calling upon the great musician when in the act of setting these pathetic words, 'He was despaired, and rejected of men,' found him absolutely sobbing."

"I have heard it related," says Shield, "that when Handel's servant used to bring him his chocolate in the morning, he often stood with silent astonishment to see his master's tears mixing with the ink, as he penned his divine notes."

The motion of his pen, active as it was, could not keep up with the rapidity of his conception. His MSS. were written with such impetuosity that they are very difficult to read. The mechanical power of the hand was not sufficient for the torrent of ideas which flowed from that volcanic brain. Mr. V. Novello, the learned publisher, who seems to have well studied the MSS. at the Fitzwilliam Museum, seeing a page on which the sand is still upon the ink at the top as well as at the bottom of the page, left in the book the following observation: "Observe the speed with which Handel wrote. The whole of this page is spotted with sand, and consequently must have all been wet at the same time."

Doubtless we must attribute to this mental ardor Handel's singular habit of employing three or four languages at a time, in speaking as well as in writing. He was a very impulsive man, and neither did nor said the same thing twice in the same manner. He had no habits, and was certainly one of the greatest improvisers that ever lived. He was improvising, so to speak, every moment of his life. He had three or four different styles of handwriting. Sometimes his notes have heads so small and tails so thin, that they are more like fly-scratches; sometimes their heads are as big as bullets, with tails of terrible thickness. His MSS. are quite linguistic curiosities, for they contain thousands of memoranda of which no two are alike. One day they are in English, the next in German, the day following in Italian, and on another day in French; afterwards, in all these languages mingled together, as in the last memorandum to Berenice:—"Fine dell' opera Berenice, January 18, 1738, Ausgefüllt;" and then "Geendiget den January 27, 1737." So that "End of the opera" is in Italian, "To fill in" and "Completed" in German, and the dates in English. In his orchestration, the instruments are designated in turn by their Italian, French, and English names. Not only do these memoranda offer an image of the confusion of tongues, but even their place is changed every day; to the right, to the left, at the top, and at the bottom of the page, sometimes before the date, and sometimes after. They seem like a perpetual defiance given to human nature, whose general disposition it is to contract fixed habits.

It is a strange thing that this man, so inflammable, so accessible to anger, and the transports of inspiration, had nevertheless very moderate tastes. He ate largely, but he seems to have had an exceptional and unhealthy appetite to satisfy. The following anecdote is to be found in that little chronicle which is attributed to every great man's life. One day, being obliged to dine at a tavern, he ordered enough for three, and being impatient at the delay, he asked way they did not serve up. "We will do so," said the host, "as soon as the company arrives." "Den bring up te tinner prestissimo," replied Handel; "I am de gombany." A triple dinner seems a great deal, even for a famishing man, and it may be that the fact has been magnified for the sake of the joke; but it appears certain that he deserves the reproach of having been a gourmand, and too fond of good cheer. This is the vulnerable side upon which his adversaries always attack him, and upon which none of his friends have attempted to defend him. Yet nobody has accused him of gross intemperance. Burney, it is true, relates the following story:

"The late Mr. Brown, leader of his majesty's band used to tell me several stories of Handel's love of good cheer, liquid and solid; as well as of his impatience. Of the former he gave an instance, which was accidentally discovered at his own house in Brook-street, where Brown, in the oratorio season, among other principal performers, was at dinner. During the repast, Handel often cried out, 'Oh! I have de taught;' when the company, unwilling that, out of civility to them, the public should be robbed of any thing so valuable as his musical ideas, begged he would retire and write them down; with which request, however, he so frequently complied, that, at last, one of the most suspicious had the ill-bred curiosity to peep through the key-hole into the adjoining room, where he perceived that 'dese taughts' were only bestowed on a fresh hamper of Burgundy, which, as was afterwards discovered, he had received in a present from his friend the late Lord Radnor, while his company was regaled with more generous and spirited port."

To this I do not attach the slightest credit; not only because it is ignoble, but because it is diametrically opposed to all that has been proved as to the liberality of Handel's character; because it would be impossible for the master of a house to leave the table every minute, under the pretext of an idea; and because it is impossible that a guest should follow his host from the table in order to spy out his proceedings through all the key-holes in the house. Handel was so proud a man, that he never could have given way to such a solitary indulgence. What must his domestics have thought of him, if they had seen him doing such a dirty trick? The anecdote is, moreover, self-contradictory, for we know that bon vivants do not like to drink alone.

Handel always lived a very retired life, and never married. Notwithstanding the love which he bore toward his mother, and his extremely charitable disposition, I must confess, not without regret, that the sentiments of affection do not appear (as the disciples of Gall and Spurzheim would say) to have been very strongly developed. Not one woman occupies the smallest place in the long career of his life. When he was in Italy, a certain lady named Vittoria, fell in love with him, and even followed him from Florence to Venice. Burney describes Vittoria as a songstress of talent. M. Fétis calls her "the Archduchess Vittoria;" but both agree that she was beautiful, and that she filled the part of the prima donna in Roderigo, his first Italian score.* Artist or archduchess, either title was enough to turn the head of a young man twenty-four years old; but Handel disdained her love. All the English biographers say that he was too prudent to accept an attachment which would have been the ruin of both. This is a calumny; for he was never prudent. The bold struggles of his life prove that for him. His refusal is only explicable on the ground of his indifference. I do not urge this in his praise, but I prefer that defect to the other.

But he had really no other passion than that for music. During the earlier part of his residence in London, he often went to St. Paul's when the afternoon service was finished. There, surrounded by some of his admirers, he delighted them by playing on the organ at that cathedral, which he preferred to all others. Night came, and then they retired to a neighboring tavern, the Queen's Arms, where there was a harpsichord, which he would play while he smoked his pipe and drank his beer.† These were all his pleasures. Gradually, as he became more absorbed in his compositions and by the cares of manership, he broke off all relations with society; he refused every invitation and only associated with three intimate friends, "a painter named Goupy;‡ one Hunter, a scarlet-dyer, who pretended a taste for music; and his pupil and secretary, John Christopher Smith." He had others in the city, but he seemed to think that the honor of his acquaintance was a sufficient reward for the kindness they expressed for him.

Hawkins says "that no impertinent visits, and few engagements to parties of pleasure, were suffered to interrupt the course of his studies. His invention ever teeming with new ideas, and his impatience to be delivered of them, kept him closely employed." He seldom left his house, except to go to the theatre or to some picture auction. He was a connoisseur of pictures, and possessed some valuable ones. His sole amusement was to go and see exhibitions of them. Alas! his blindness deprived him of that pleasure a long time before his death.

* At that period, and even later, it was not uncommon to find princes and princesses singing in the pieces which were produced at their courts.

† Hawkins.

‡ It would be curious to know whether there were two painters named Goupy, and whether this one was the caricaturist; for Handel was not the sort of man to be reconciled to one who had so outrageously ridiculed him.

§ Hawkins, in relating these peculiarities, says that Hunter, "at a great expense, had copies made for him of all the music of Handel that he could procure."

An English View of Piccolomini.

(From the London Musical Gazette, October 2.)

On Tuesday last no inconsiderable crowd of fashionable company was attracted to Sydenham by the announcement that Mdlle. Piccolomini would take leave of the English public in a special concert, in the programme of which she would be the chief figure. The popularity of this young and certainly gifted artist was never more completely attested than on this occasion, for London is at the present moment more than usually bare of occupants, yet was there as large an attendance as we have witnessed on some of the grand days in the height of the season. We should be loth to attribute this popular enthusiasm to the public admiration of Mdlle. Piccolomini as a vocalist, although it was in this character alone that she made her appearance on Tuesday; we would rather express a conviction that the flattering tribute paid to the young lady by the largeness of the attendance and the hearty applause of those who attended, was in recognition of her talent as an actress—a recognition willingly and generously accorded, though in her last English appearance she was not exhibiting in the line for which she is so peculiarly fitted. Artistically suggesting, Mdlle. Piccolomini should have taken leave at Her Majesty's Theatre, her talent being in the histrionic and not in the vocal line; otherwise, there is no place like the Crystal Palace for a "demonstration," and it was probably on this ground that a building in which Mdlle. Piccolomini had never before appeared, should have been selected for her last appearance in this country.

The fair Sicennese is now on her way to America, and we would particularly impress upon our transatlantic brethren that the demonstration of Tuesday last must not be taken as evidence of her talent as a vocalist, but as a token of reminiscent admiration of her powers as an actress. Any other interpretation of Tuesday's enthusiasm would be a libel on the perceptive capabilities of those present, for Mdlle. Piccolomini cannot be accused of being a good singer. Her voice is of a sympathetic character, and she is invariably in tune, but her defects in singing—inequality of tone, and inability as regards vocalization—have been more painfully apparent every time we have heard her, and this of course more particularly in the concert-room, where, though she is abundantly animated, she cannot enter unreservedly into the action of the stage.

Mdlle. Piccolomini is easily "reckoned up." We have just given our opinion of her cantatory qualifications, and, with regard to her stage talent, we can speak of her Violetta as a most touching specimen of the domestic dramatic; her Norina, as a piece of the prettiest coquettishness and fascination (though perhaps a little too girlish for the sly widow,) and her Maria (in La Figlia del Reggimento) as perfect in its way. Her performance in Luisa Miller was the most artistic of all, but the opera is such a miserable perpetration on the part of Signor Verdi, that we can scarcely bear to revert to it. Her personification of the Zingara, in the Italian version of Balfe's Bohemian Girl, was commendable, but the part does not afford much scope for histrionism; it is a pretty, quiet, girlish part, that could be played by any young lady in a case of amateur theatricals,—or, rather operatics—in a drawing-room. Lucia was a dangerous opera for her to appear in. Jenny Lind palpably failed in it, with the advantages of a marvellous voice, and a most wondrous facility in making use thereof, and it is not a little remarkable that no Lucia comes forward now-a-days. The careful avoidance of the part by the generality of prime donne—for the opera is far too good to be shelved,—is a little significant.

Mdlle. Piccolomini's "farewell to England" has been the musical event of the week. Let us return to it, and state of what materials the programme was composed. The young lady's songs were "Ah fors'è lui," "Vedrai carino," and "Convien partir." Mozart's aria was encored—or rather Mdlle. Piccolomini was encored, since she gave in response to the redemand, Balfe's "I dreamt that I dwelt," in English. Signor Ginghini, the only other vocalist, obtained a vociferous encore for Balfe's "Tu m'ami" ("When other lips"): taking the compliment to himself; he replied with "La donna è mobile." We are exceedingly curious to know how it was that the Crystal Palace band was provided with the orchestral parts of "La donna" and "I dreamt." Surely the vocalists were not conceited enough to take it for granted that they should be encored in even one piece!

"Convien partir," the song in which Maria (La Figlia) takes a heartbroken leave of her military companions, would have answered very well as a Chanson d'adieu on the present occasion, sung as it was with great feeling and real significance by the young prima donna, but it was followed by the jocund "Libiamo" from La Traviata (the chorus by Signori Aldighieri, Castelli, and Rossi) which sounded very much like "au revoir." We have no faith in "farewells" on the part of artists. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to take leave of the public, whether the singing be done for the love of money, or from enthusiasm for the art, and we have had such profuse proof of this difficulty on the part of some whose fame justified their announcing a "farewell" as an attractive piece of business, that we look with eyes of the utmost doubt and disbelief on all such advertisements. Mdlle. Piccolomini sailed on Thursday for the United States, so there can be no question as to the fact of her having left us, but, though she has a wide field in America, and might occupy her time and employ her talents to the best advantage for years to come, we cannot believe that she has bid farewell to England, as stated in the advertisements of the Crystal Palace Company, which ought not to tell stories, though we are convinced they have fibbed in this instance. We have heard it said that the young lady returns in some six months; if this be true, the demonstration of Tuesday last must be looked upon as an absurdity. The cheering and kerchief-waving at the conclusion of the concert, and on the departure of Mdlle. Piccolomini through the building, though real and hearty, must have caused her to laugh in her sleeve, when she knew that in so short a time she would again be amongst her English admirers, and ready to accept an engagement from any one who shall be rash enough to take Her Majesty's Theatre. Let us not be too hard upon the authoress of this excitement. It may have been a bond fide leave-taking, but we would rather believe it to have been a sham, for Mdlle. Piccolomini can ill be spared. Few artists have acquired public esteem so rapidly, and few have become, after any period of probation, so thoroughly popular. Her position is owing to her peculiar earnestness of manner, her complete entrance into every part which she undertakes (whether she is successful in every part is a different matter), and her sympathetic quality of voice. The fact of her being an indifferent vocalist, only renders her good qualities the more conspicuous and remarkable; and, though she is neither a Grisi nor a Bosio, we cannot afford to lose her at present.

Although this was what might have been termed an "opera concert," the Crystal Palace band was employed, conducted by Signor Arditi. Mr. Manns directed Balfe's Siege of Rochelle overture, which was the only instrumental piece introduced.

(From the Courier and Enquirer, Oct. 14.)

It is safe to say that the Academy of Music never witnessed a scene of such intense excitement as passed within its crowded and overcrowded walls last evening. One can scarcely imagine a more exciting spectacle than the first appearance of a great artist whose fame has been heralded, and who is known to have powers of fascination, the precise character of which remains yet to be experienced. The very indefiniteness of the coming sensation gives it a zest which cannot, in the very nature of things, attach to subsequent familiarity. With Signora PICCOLOMINI this is peculiarly the case. Her name of itself sets the imagination to play. A scion of one of the oldest Italian families, which has counted amongst its members Pope PIUS II., of high repute, and OTTINI PICCOLOMINI, the hero of one of SCHILLER'S greatest tragedies, the niece of a living Cardinal, figuring as a prima donna in Italian opera before American Republicans is in itself a novelty that could not fail of exciting the liveliest curiosity; but when to this was joined distinction for beauty and for genius, of course we could expect nothing but just such a perfect furor of excitement as found expression at the Academy last evening. Greater artists in particular excellencies, doubtless have been amongst us. Of course it will not do to attribute to Signora PICCOLOMINI the peerless brilliancy of JENNY LIND, or the dramatic intensity of GRISI, or the mellow richness of ALBONI, or the exquisite grace of SONTAG, yet it ought not to be forgotten that she is as yet but in the beginning of her career. And even young as she is, she exhibits a remarkable union of high qualities as an artist, and in some respects her very youth is in her favor. At the very opening of the opera, as will be remembered, the curtain rises upon the character she assumed—Violetta; and it required but a glance at her, as seated on her couch, to see in her bright and expressive features and slight and graceful form at least one good title to take her audience captive; and as the play opens and the banquet begins, there was no disputing her right to say, Saro l'Ebe che versa, "I will be his Hebe." She looked a Hebe indeed. Nor in regard to the qualities of her voice was her audience left long uncertain. Her sparkling carol at the end of the drinking song, and her aria, Ah, fors'è lui che, full of tender passion and beautifully executed, revealed at once no common vocal powers. Her voice may be called a Soprano sfogato—and admirably combines sweetness, clearness, and flexibility. She sings with little effort, and every tone responds freely and charmingly to every changing impulse of feeling. The part of Violetta nowhere imposes a very severe test of vocal capabilities, but the ease and success with which she executed that exuberant aria last mentioned, both in the pathos of the andante and the vivacity of the quick movement, which ranges up to D in alt, give rich promise of what we are to hear in more difficult music. This first act completely established PICCOLOMINI in the enthusiastic regards of the audience. At its close she was called before the curtain no less than three times, and was not let off until she again gave the last gushing lines of the aria. The house rung with acclamations, and the bouquets fell in a shower. But the peculiar calls made upon the heroine in La Traviata are histrionic in character—for, despite the popularity of the opera, there is no gainsay that its musical merits entitle it to only a second or third rank among Verdi's productions. It was in the second act that Signora PICCOLOMINI began to display her powers as an actress. Here the distracting relinquishment of her love before the demands and entreaties of Alfred's father takes place, and her parting from Alfred; and she rendered these scenes with remarkable effect. It would be hard to imagine any more thrilling expression of feeling than the utter anguish of the line with which the parting closes, Amarrie, Alfredo quant io t' amo—Addio. The scene, towards the close of the act, when Violetta is insulted and held up to shame by the misled Alfred, in the presence of the gay company, will not be forgotten by any who beheld it. It was not what she sang, for the expressionless music is not worth heeding, but what she acted—the overpowering sense of insults, the crushing weight of despair, the convulsive clutching of hands, the trembling and relaxing of the whole frame—all was in the very highest style of dramatic art, worthy, we might almost say, of a RISTORI or a RACHEL. And the triumph she thus earned in the second act, she sustained through all the lingering agony of the third. The reading of the letter—the tottering across the room and contemplation of her changed countenance in the mirror—her sinking exhausted into the chair—her breathing out the sad aria in A minor, Addio! del passato bei sogni ridenti—her listening to the distant Bachanian chorus, as the dying Desdemona in Otello listens to the chant of the gondoliers—her jubilant revulsions of feeling on the return of Alfred—her shriek to her attendant to make haste for the physician that she may again live—her quick giving way to utter helplessness and hopelessness as she bewails in the duet with Alfred the disease and death that cannot be escaped—the bestowing of the last gift, and the finally exultant yielding up of the last breath were all portrayed with a dramatic fidelity our pen cannot describe. Her immense audience was completely rapt with interest; and at the close, gave vent to their feelings in the stormiest demonstration. The whole evening's performance was a complete triumph to her; and we do not believe there was a person in the house whose anticipations, high as they may have been, were not more than realized. PICCOLOMINI's conception of the heroine is somewhat peculiar; she not only divests what is really a painful character of all its repulsive features, but makes it positively captivating. This of course exalts the artistic effect, but whether it is not done at the expense of the moral influence, may be questioned. Signor STEFFANI sustained the part of Alfred with great credit. He delivered the concluding stanza of the drinking song in broad and vigorous style, and the solo Oh mio remorso in the second act he executed admirably, and well earned the encore he received. The baritone Signor FLORENZA represented Germont with dignity and sensibility. He did fine justice to the lines Dunque in vano trovato at the interview with his son, and was encored.

The Orchestra under the direction of Signor Muzro did well, and also the numerous chorus. Senorita SOTO and the corps de ballet added much to the brilliancy of the spectacle. The mise en scene was excellent; costumes were new and splendid, and scenery and every accessory were irreproachable. The entire representation, in all of its features, went off with the utmost eclat, and Mr. ULMANN has reason to congratulate himself that he has inaugurated his new campaign with a triumph so absolutely complete and unequivocal.

From the Tribune.

We did not hear Mlle. Piccolomini in the first act, and judge of her from her rendering of the second, third and fourth acts. In person she is rather under the middle height. In carriage she is graceful and high bred. Her face boasts a pair of dark eyes of exceeding vitality and expression, well-turned features, and remarkable powers of mobility. Her nature evidently is quick, ardent and enthusiastic. Her voice is warmly toned and in the lachrymose portions of the opera, which abound, is full of the loveliness of tragic sorrow. In quality it is not of the highest rank, but the electricity of the artist lends it at the climax of intensity an expression which is apart and truly admirable. In the three acts which we heard there is no florid music, so we cannot judge of her ability to execute it. In declamatory and sustained singing passages she is excellent. Her phrasing leaves nothing to be desired. Her enunciation is perfect. With a true air of high Italian nature, she is prodigal of facial expression, answering to the sentiment of the moment. As an actress, she is charming. Her play of the arms is particularly good. The last scene of the broken-hearted, dying consumptive was best at the close. The tremulous agony of joy at meeting her lover was exquisitely faithful to nature. The impression left on us was not that of a grand, but a beautiful artist—finished and fascinating. The applause of the audience was heartiest at the end, when Mlle. Piccolomini received the honor of a triple call before the curtain. Her dressing, we may add, was excellent—in the best French taste.

The tenor, Signor Steffani, except a tendency to a certain robustness, which is out of place, contributed much to the success of the evening.

The new baritone, Signor Florenza, is a remarkable acquisition. Except a disposition to overweep his music, he afforded no point for diluted praise. His method and style are beautiful. He phrases well to a charm. Every word is as distinct as if spoken. His voice is really a low tenor, of exceeding purity, flexibility and sentimental quality. His solo called forth a thundering encore, and from that moment his success was assured.

From the Times.

Without positive owliness it is impossible to be blind to the fact that Mlle. Piccolomini's influence over the audience is the result more of manner than method. She is not an astonishing vocalist, nor is she gifted with a voice of extraordinary power. If we try to analyze what it is that gives her preeminence, we must, at the outset, discard these ordinary considerations. Much as her vocal powers have been underrated, they are still in no proportion to her immense histrionic capacity, which embraces so wide a range of emotion that it overshadows everything else. Her voice is a very charming soprano, soft yet full, and of fair compass, though evidently not yet fully developed. It is as fresh as voice can be, and as supple as youth, without much experience, can make it. Under the impulse of emotion it vibrates with feeling, and by indescribable inflection illuminates with electrical quickness, a train of deep sentiment, even as the lightning illuminates the vale. It is this rare gift which distinguishes the true from conventional art, and we have seldom seen it manifested more wonderfully than in the case of Mlle. Piccolomini. Her entire performance is, in fact, a protest against conventionality, and to this circumstance we attribute her great success in England, where things in art as in everything else, move in the most steady and antiquated grooves. To say that this independence of model is mere talent, would be absurd. It is genius of the best kind, because creative, and absolutely free from the taint of imitation. Blended as it was with all the gracious snavity of youth, and the bearing of good society, it is not remarkable that Mlle. Piccolomini astonishes as much as she captivates her audiences.

From the Courier des Etats Unis.

In fact, Mlle. Piccolomini, on this first evening, was far from producing one of those unanimous, decisive impressions from which a sort of judgment may be formed without appeal. She was applauded, called out and stormed with bouquets. But this flattery could not close the critic's eyes and ears. An agreeable voice, but deficient in body and firmness, and acting that had at times too much mannerism, these were the weaknesses observed in the two first acts.

In the last, the artist recovered herself, both as to the singing and as to the scenic sentiment. But she could not entirely efface the first impressions, and in fine, the public dispersed with some hesitation as to the exact rank to assign the new prima donna.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, SEPT. 17. — Three weeks to-day in Berlin again! Three busy weeks, happily too, just at the season when one hears no music, that is to say, at this season of most delicious weather, clear, not too warm, when fruit of all kinds is ripe, when it is the height of enjoyment to be away from the large cities among the hills and mountains of the Hartz country, Silesia, Saxony, Bohemia, Thuringia, the Rhine region, and so on. At this season everybody is away and the musicians have their vacation. Hence we have had opera only about three times a week in the Royal house;—"Robert the Devil," "Huguenots," "Don Juan," "Jessonda," "Lac des Fées," "Wasserträger," and works by Donizetti, and other Italians,—and once or twice a week the splendid ballets for which Berlin is famous. Out at Kroll's the light French operas,—"Le Domino Noir" for instance—are running some three times a week; at the better class of gardens, we find in all, but about three good symphony concerts weekly, which is a great falling off. Stern's Singing Society meets every Monday evening from 5 to 7, but "everybody" being away, he has but about 100 voices present. It was rather good though, last Monday, to hear part of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," Mozart's "Ave Verum Corpus," and other short pieces sung by these hundred voices!

So you see we are cut off from music, because the season has not yet begun. We can hear the Dom Chor, however, Sunday mornings, but that seems to me to have fallen off within three years past,—perhaps, however, as winter comes on and the rehearsals for the concerts begin, it will come up again. "John," however, thinks, as it is, that that choir sings, and that on the whole there is some music to be heard here. Your regular Berlin correspondent "J" complains sadly of the constant repetitions of old works, and the few opportunities one has to hear that which is new in the opera house. I can easily conceive that to a musician, an old resident of the city, this fact is a just cause of complaint; but there are two classes of persons who have exceeding good cause to be pleased with the arrangement—the one, all those who are benefitted by having full houses; the other, all persons who, never before having had opportunity to hear the great master works of the opera, would, if they could have the selection, demand just such a succession of them as they here, especially at this season, find.

As at all events at this time of year the boxes of the fashionable world would be rather empty, I consider it as wise on the part of the directors as it is pleasant for us strangers, that works are given which crowd the other parts of the house. Having neglected to get a ticket for "Don Juan" the other morning, I found such a crush there in the evening that I turned away as did a great many others. You should have heard "John" talk about it next day!

But, enough of this!

Certain readers of the Journal—perhaps more correctly, divers persons, who promised to be subscribers and readers—have my promise in return, to devote some space in one of my first communications to questions in relation to the study of music here,—its expense, the advantages offered, and the like.

If a person has nothing but money-making in view, and merely wishes on his return to say: "When I was studying in the Conservatory at Paris or Leipzig," or, "when I was pupil of this, that, or the other famous man," I am, unfortunately, not able to give him any advice—or if able, not disposed. There have already been too many humbugs of that sort here, and that not alone in music.

The comparative advantages and disadvantages of different cities here as places for musical study, depend, of course, to a certain extent, upon the real object which the student has in view. For general musical culture, it is as important for the student to be where he can hear the most music of all schools and of all kinds, as it is for the student of literature to be where he has the best libraries at command and the most frequent opportunities of meeting with literary men, of hearing them speak in public oftenest, and so on. If a young man wishes merely to study Latin and Greek, he may, perhaps, find as good a teacher in some small "one-horse" college out West as anywhere; but if his ambition is to become a scholar, in any high sense of the term, how much better it will be for him to go at once to Harvard or Yale, admits of no argument. Take a case or two. Here is a young man or woman whose object is to become a good and thorough teacher of the pianoforte, and possibly of singing. General musical culture is important to all, but in this case the question of economy may be paramount. I should advise such an one, if not very much advanced in the art, to enter one of the music schools of Germany. Which one, so far as I can see, is of little importance. That at Leipzig, that at Cologne, or either of the three here in Berlin would answer the purpose. But when one comes three thousand miles to study music, one would naturally wish to be where much good music is to be heard—a certain sum of money for concerts and opera is reckoned among the necessary expenses of the visit to Europe. In this regard Berlin offers double the advantages that any other city in Europe can. But then they must be paid for. One cannot live in Boston or New York and enjoy the privileges of city life so cheaply as he can live out in some country town. That is true, all the world over. Berlin is a great capital of 450,000 inhabitants, and it costs more to live here than in a small town. But here comes in another question; is it not better to employ a certain amount of money in obtaining two years of study and cultivation here, than to spend the same for three years in some small place, with half or a quarter of the opportunities for improvement? If a musical student's object is to become a pianoforte virtuoso, and he has already reached a certain degree of skill, it is clearly his best course to bury himself in the little city of Weimar and study with Liszt,—if Liszt will take him. But for nine out of ten who come to Europe to study pianoforte it would be throwing away time and money to go to Weimar, just as it would be for a young man, whose object is to become a mere civil engineer, and who has not gone beyond arithmetic, a little geometry, and algebra, to go to Cambridge, Mass., and undertake to study privately with Pierce in the highest region of mathematics, or to Paris to study with Le Verrier.

To go back to our young teacher. He has a certain amount of money, and the point is to use it to the greatest advantage in Europe, in fitting himself to be a teacher.

No one will deny that the number of music teachers with us, who have really pursued any system in their studies, or have made any great progress in what may be called "the general knowledge" of their profession, is small,—though happily, I grant, increasing. Few of these teachers, in case they came to Europe, would be foolish enough to think of becoming "great pianists," or virtuosos in any department, and of throwing away their funds in paying one to two dollars a lesson to some great finger gymnast. A very few weeks spent among the musical people of Leipzig or Berlin would show most of them that, for the attainment of any really eminent skill, they have yet the foundation to lay—the A B C to learn. What it seems to me they need is just that sort of instruction which they would get in some one of the music schools. Especially if a young man or woman, who has had only the ordinary advantages of our smaller cities or towns, has the object in view of becoming fitted to superintend the entire musical department in a school, I consider the only wise and economical course to be to enter a Conservatorium. The advantage of this course, to put it in the most general form, is precisely the same as that of going to an academy and college, instead of depending upon private teachers for a knowledge of science or letters.

Of the teachers, whom I know, a great majority need at least two years of this kind of instruction, however great their diligence.

What particular school to select is, I take it, a matter of not very great importance. For an American, I should say, considering all the circumstances of the case, those at Leipzig and in this city are preferable. But whether to select the Leipzig Conservatorium or either of the schools here, of which Stern and Kullak are respectively at the head, would depend not so much upon any great difference of advantages offered in the character of the instructors, as upon matters outside the school. The course of instruction is about the same in all. In all, the pupil has his regular lessons in instrumental performance, in counterpoint and composition, in singing and music generally.

Happening to have a circular of Stern's school only before me, I will give an abstract of it, with the remark that it will answer pretty well for the others. The instructions naturally divide themselves into two classes,—theoretical and practical.

The former class includes, as I see on this circular, elementary instruction, harmony, melody, composition, (in its several departments of vocal, figural, fugal, pianoforte and orchestral), History of Music, method of instruction, playing from scores, conducting, declamation (musical), and the Italian language.

The second class, 1. Vocal music; elementary for the voice and articulation; cultivation of the ear; singing in chorus and ensemble; solo singing, both in concert and church music; and dramatic vocalization.

2. Pianoforte playing, from the elements up to virtuosoism; playing with orchestra, or concerted pieces with fewer instruments.

3. Study and practise of orchestral instruments, both for solo, concerted, and full orchestra music.

It is considered of high importance for every pupil—though it is not demanded—to study singing and some orchestral instrument, even though the principal objects he has in view be merely the study of the pianoforte and the theory of music and composition. By doing this, he has variety in his studies, and is enlarging the sphere of his knowledge without sacrificing at all his specialties.

I give the names of the principal teachers:

Music Director Weitzmann:—Elements, Theory, Harmony, History of Music.

Lührs, (a rising composer):—Counterpoint, Fugue, Composition.

Music Director Stern:—Accompaniment, Thorough-bass, Score Playing, and Directing.

Hans von Bülow, Herr Golde, Herr Schwanzer, and Herr Wolff:—Pianoforte.

Stern and Bülow:—Playing with 4 and 8 hands, with Other Instruments and from Score.

Dr. Luigi Bossi:—Italian Language.

Wagner, (of the Royal Opera):—Declamation and Dramatic Performance.

Oertling, and others of the many excellent musicians, of whom Berlin possesses such a multitude:—the various Orchestral Instruments.

Schwanzer, one of our best Organists, teaches that instrument.

There is a good deal of practice in chorus singing with orchestra, under Stern, one of the very best conductors I ever saw, and who has made himself famous for the style in which he has brought out recently, in his singing society, Beethoven's "9th Symphony" and great "Mass in D," and Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

Though Bülow is among the very first of the younger class of pianists—some say he is the first in Berlin—my impression is that in Kullak's school the piano is on the whole more successfully taught—certainly Kullak's organ instructor, Haupt, is the greatest player in Germany, now that Johann Schneider's day is over—and probably—nay, doubtless, in the world.

On the other hand, I am led to think that in the vocal department, Stern's school stands best.

Of course I cannot go into all the particulars. I have said so much merely to give some idea of these schools, and to justify what is said above,—that it makes but little difference in what particular school an industrious, observing person becomes a pupil.

As to Leipzig and Berlin, the difference between the two cities is, that one is a great capital and centre of Art, the other a provincial town. In Berlin there is always music to be heard; one learns music, as he does the language, by continually hearing it "spoken." But, on the other hand, I suppose it costs more to live there. I find a very marked change since I left for home in April, 1856. Rooms that then were rented for five or six thalers a month, cost now from seven to ten.

"But, Sir, why not give us the figures in full?"

I'll try.

Passage from New York to Bremerhaven, see the newspapers for steamships; but if you will do as I have done twice, take passage in a first class Bremen sailing ship, you will pay fifty dollars. At the end of the passage you will give as "drink money" to the steward a dollar or two. Reckon your passage up to Bremen on the steamboat as another dollar; half a dollar will get you and all your baggage to the hotel, and a couple more dollars will pay your hotel bill for a day and get you to the station, or ought to do so. Ten dollars is amply sufficient to carry you from Bremen to Berlin, where, for the two or three days which must elapse before you find rooms, you will be at an expense of $1.50 to $2 per day.

If you can so arrange your plans and come by sailing vessel to Bremen or Hamburg, then sail about the end of May or the beginning of June, for it is very important that you should be here learning the language, so that when you begin your music lessons you will be able to understand your instructors. Hence you ought to be here in July. Until the middle or the end of September you will employ yourself in studying German (to which end take with you from home a Grammar, Adler's Lexicon, and a reading book) and in hearing the opera and the garden symphony concerts.

This is a digression.

Once in Berlin, you begin to run about seeking rest and finding none—for "rest" read "rooms." Then you meet some American, perhaps, at the Café Baviere or the Belvidere, where you get your dinners, and tell him your trouble. You have been in this street and in that, hither and yon, and the only decent rooms you can find they charge four or five dollars a week for. He smiles, and asks if you can speak German. No, say you. "Well," he says, "for a room that they ask you 12 thalers a month for, they would ask a German student 8—and this for two reasons; the people think that whoever speaks English is a goose to be plucked, and, as a general rule, English and American students, when they first come to Germany, until they have learned and to some extent adopted German habits, make a great deal more trouble and expense for their landladies. I will give you an hour or two after dinner and we will see what we can find."

N. B. that all this is some two months before the beginning of the term, October 1; so that it is not particularly necessary for you to be near the music school into which you design to enter.

Do not be in a hurry about getting your pianoforte. Take things easy. Go every day to hear an opera, or to some symphony concert. Hear all the music you possibly can, so as to "get the sharp edge worn off," for when you are fairly at work in your school you will not have time to follow up concerts so closely—but during these two months make your daily task at least six hours hard study in the language. Get a musical work or two and study it as a German reading book—not as a musical text book—because your first object must be to learn the German musical terms and expressions. If you should work in this way three months it would be no loss of time. Just as soon as you can make yourself understood, and can understand others, go and see Stern, Kullak, and Haupt,—better to get some American, who “knows the ropes,” to go with you,—and have a talk with them. Get permission to visit a few classes, if you can, and see how you like.

But I am away off again from the topic of expenses! Well then, by the first of October or of April, when the terms begin—six terms or three years is the regular course for beginners—you are settled in your room at from $5 to $10 a month, as you think fit. You have a Grand Pianoforte, for which you pay from $2 to $4 per month, according to its value. For the study of the organ you have a set of pedals adapted to the piano, costing perhaps as much more.

Your “portion” of coffee and bread and butter, &c., need not cost over a thaler or a dollar a week. You dine at an eating house, as do probably 25,000 other persons daily, at an expense of 15 to 20 cents of our money. Your tea or regular supper may cost you from 10 to 30 cents, as you will. Washing is about 50 to 75 cents per dozen, according as you have many small pieces or not. You must buy your own lamp and pay your landlady for the oil you burn. Your room has a great tile stove, which is heated with wood twice or three times a day, according to circumstances, costing 10 to 15 cents a day.

The regular fees at the Music Schools amount to about $8 per month of our money. Private instruction is to be had for all prices, from 25 cents to $1.50 per lesson. The regular first-class concerts, if subscribed for, cost 20 silver-groschen (50 cents) each. Liebig's ordinary series, if you buy several tickets at once, cost 7½ cents each; his higher class concerts in the Sing Akademie, 25 cents. The opera costs 75, 56, 42, 25 cents, according to place. Do not bring many clothes, many books, nor much music; the transportation costs money, and all you want can be got much cheaper here.

I think of nothing farther to say to that particular class of students for whom I am now writing, except to ask, whether two or three years here, with all these advantages, cannot be enjoyed at a less cost than attends the spending of five or six months a year, for two or three years, in Boston or New York?

If any Subscriber to the Journal of Music has any questions to ask through its columns, I will do my best to answer them. A. W. T.

NEW YORK, OCT. 26.—THE great musical sensation—the debut of PICCOLOMINI—has transpired, and the excitement is already subsiding.

Of course there was a crowded house at the Academy of Music, and the auditorium, with its additional lights and its bewildering array of female beauty, presented a really imposing appearance. The audience was well disposed to be pleased, and there were a number of excellent people who were present purposely to applaud—at least so I judged from the startling exuberance of their enthusiasm, which was constantly bursting out in wrong places and did not know when to stop.

They had a very pretty bit of new scenery for the opening scene; the stage was brilliantly illuminated with chandeliers, and the choruses were numerous and gorgeously dressed. It was quite exciting to look at them; the men were very gallant to the ladies, and the singer with the long legs, I noticed, was very attentive to the lady with the corkscrew curls, and, during the banquet, helped her several times to empty plates, and gave her two or three pasteboard gilt goblets to drink out of; she seemed to be gratified with these attentions.

After a while Piccolomini sailed in, looking quite enchanting in yellow silk with blue trimmings. She was received with great applause, and acknowledged it very gracefully; the chorus then gabbled a little, and there was heard the popping of corks from champagne bottles, (the chorus had nothing to do with these—only the principal performers who sat round the little table in the centre,) and pretty soon the tune for the drinking song came along. Piccolomini sang the Brindisi very sweetly and archly, but without the abandon that Gazzaniga throws into it. The following duet, with the tenor, called for no special comment, and then the little prima donna was left alone on the stage to sing the most brilliant cavatina in the opera—the finale of the first act.

To be sure, she did it very sweetly and gracefully, with ever so many bewitching gestures and shakes of the head—and then she avoided the runs and difficult passages so nicely that the alterations after all made little difference. She was called before the curtain three times, and repeated the cavatina. Everybody said afterwards, that she was a charming creature, excepting the critical owls who said she couldn't sing the music.

In the next act she was better, because there was more dramatic action, and less florid music; the duet with her lover's father was a very touching performance. In the last act she both acted and sang well, but did nothing really startling—nothing to call for special comment.

Piccolomini is by no means a great singer—Her voice, though somewhat sympathetic, is not powerful, and can scarcely be heard in the concerted pieces. Her execution is smooth, though not facile; and a difficult chromatic passage she will turn off into something else that is easier. Everybody knows that her forte lies in her acting, and for this she is certainly deserving of praise. It is not in startling bursts of passion that she is great—the very delicacy of her physique would incapacitate her for excelling in the Miss Heron or Gazzaniga line—but it is in her really exquisite by-play that she is almost unrivalled. Every phrase of the libretto, she utters, is accompanied by some singularly appropriate gesture or motion, that seems so perfectly natural, you at once wonder no other representative of the part has ever made use of it. Piccolomini would make an excellent mimic artist, and in the part of Fenella, in Masaniello, would be irresistible, for her features are mobile, expressive as well as beautiful.

Of course she takes, and the house is thronged every night. The critics are very just and unanimous in their estimate of her abilities. While awarding to the young prima donna much praise for her finished and touching style of acting, and for her sympathetic singing, they all acknowledge that she is not a first-class opera singer—that is, as musically considered. Our audiences have heard so many that are really superior, that they cannot easily rush into ecstasies over a pretty enthusiastic little girl. Mademoiselle Piccolomini is certainly delightful to see and hear, but she will not be as permanently popular as a finished artiste like La Grange. And yet after all, even though the new comer is not a “finished artiste,” there is something indescribably delightful in listening to the voice of a beautiful child of genius, like Piccolomini—in seeing her passionate, yet polished action—and wondering how it is that a girl of twenty-two, without much voice or remarkable vocal cultivation, can for hours enchain the attention, and enlist the heartfelt sympathies of thousands of hearers.

TROVATON.

HARTFORD, CONN., OCT. 26.—I wish I could give you a glowing account of some fine concert which has come off in this city, but I cannot. We have been free from all such innovations in any shape or color, excepting two instances, i. e. “Campbell's Minstrels” and one other; of which latter I will write briefly.

The Concerts given a year ago or more by Thalberg and his troupe, and the one still later by Formes, Cooper and others, may be recollected as delightful oases in the vast desert of poor entertainments, in the way of music, which have been offered us from time to time, for two or three years past, from the fact that they were free from all taint of “trickery”—solid and satisfactory,—everything performed being legitimate and well done—carrying out to the letter “all that was on the bills.” Ullman is a great talker, but he generally does as he says he will; but some how or other, when Strakosch is named as being connected with any concert enterprise, there is an involuntary feeling that you are going to be “taken in” in other ways than at the door. Two weeks ago our city was thrown into a musical excitement by the announcement in two or three of our “dailies” of an “Opera in Hartford!” which then went on to tell of the novelty of such a thing, and how the entire force of STRAKOSCH's company were coming, &c., &c. Only little Springfield just above us had a real, live opera given by the Cooper-Milner troupe; why shouldn't we have one by the great STRAKOSCH, COLSON & Co's! Where was it to be given? We have no hall large enough for such a purpose. What was the opera? The new one called “Trovario,” perhaps. How magnificent! “Opera in Hartford!” What an event! And so we waited for the red bill posters to give us information upon all these points. The Morning Courant, however, relieved us; it contained a manifesto which amounted to this: That I, Maurice Strakosch, Prince of Humbug, and pianist to the Princes Oldgal, of the Court of Saltpetersburg, will give a grand operatic concert, (a thing never before heard of in this out-of-the-way place,) for the express purpose of affording an opportunity for Madlle. THERESA PARODI to take a last farewell of the citizens of Hartford “prior to her departure for Europe.” “Ye that have tears, &c.” Madlle. Parodi will be kindly assisted by my wife, she that was “Little Patti” years and years ago, but now called Madame Strakosch for short, and other artists too numerous to mention. This operatic concert will be given in the “Unitarian Church!” “Opera in Hartford!” As the Courant actually had it, the programme will be made up of selections from “J. Paratoni” and other operas. The bubble was pricked, and the great “opera in Hartford” suddenly collapsed!

The concert was good enough in its way, but those who went to hear “Maurice” play “Yankee Doodle with variations” went away disappointed, for the “Prince” was in New York with Colson, Brignoli, Junca, &c., arranging for an opera there, and had left the “small fry” to sing the “Star Spangled Banner,” and “Jerusalem thou that killest!” in Hartford. Now isn't that a perfect specimen of Strakosch humbuggery? This letter is already too long, I will tell you more next time. H.

BOSTON, OCT. 30, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of “Miriam's Song of Triumph,” a Cantata for Soprano solo and chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Concert of Miss Adelaide Phillips.

Our young townsman, — who has been winning golden opinions in the Opera performances in New York, and who would have been upon her way to Havana, but for the sudden stop put to Maretzek's enterprise by the explosion there, — surprised us at very short notice with a concert at the Music Hall, last Saturday evening. The hall was perhaps half filled with listeners, when in justice both to so fine a native artist and to our own love of good music, it ought to have been overflowing. But the truth is, the public excitability in these matters has become so debauched by the showy humbug advertising arts of musical managers and agents, that nothing which is quietly and modestly announced, standing purely on its own intrinsic merits, can possibly create enough impression beforehand to ensure an audience. The immense expense of the new system of getting up and trumpeting a concert—which includes not only what is proper to the concert itself, but also a very great outlay for the “preparing of the public”—makes it too formidable a venture for any artist or small group of artists to attempt to give a quiet, genuine concert in the old way, trusting simply to the love of music to induce an audience. They cannot afford these costly arts of humbugging and whipping in. Accordingly it is no wonder that ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, with other excellent artists, having the charm of novelty withal, had only half a house-full at her concert. The real wonder was to see so many people.

Her welcome was a warm one. And the past impression of the rare nobleness and richness of her voice, and her artistic use of it, found itself more than confirmed upon the present hearing. We have long regarded Adelaide Phillipps as, all things considered, and in spite of the generally acknowledged higher charm of a soprano voice, that can soar and revel lark-like in the clearer heaven and sunshine of song, the most satisfactory and valuable in an artistic sense of all our American aspirants to the name and fame of vocal artists. We only wish that such a singer could find worthier employment for such powers in music of a more sterling, elevated order than the rôles of Azucena, Favorita and the like afford; or at least, that she might not be quite so exclusively absorbed in music of that kind, when she has the voice and feeling and intelligence to do such justice to the noblest music.

The programme of this evening was made up mostly of well-worn selections. Miss Phillipps sang some of her old pieces to a charm; namely, Dio clemente, from Marino Faliero; Ah! non credea, and Ah! non giunge, from the Sonnambula; O! mio Fernando (one of her oldest), from La Favorita; and the little ballad of her own: “Tears of Love,” which is a natural and pretty melody, and which she sings, accompanying herself at the piano, with true simplicity and pathos. Indeed her ballad-singing is of the very best now heard in concerts. Her marked improvement as a singer was evident to all. The rich contralto voice seemed even to have gained in mellowness and fullness, as well as in clear and equal development throughout its compass. She has, in a great measure, overcome, what seemed an organic difficulty, a certain thickness in her sounds. There is more of artistic finish; more of sustained purity of tone and finished phrasing; more of flexibility—indeed, quite enough for any but a high soprano voice—while good taste and genuine sentiment restrain her from false ornament, from overstrained effect, and keep her within the bounds of chaste, pure style. It is a great pleasure to us to listen to the singing of Miss Phillipps.

The vocal interest of the concert was largely shared by two new singers. Mr. HENRY SQUIRES, who is an American, and of whose studies in Italy, and praised appearances in opera in Italy and in England, we have heretofore kept our readers informed, has a light, sympathetic tenor of remarkable sweetness, best suited to a sentimental ballad in a room of moderate size, but with little of the robust, or of the penetrating quality which conquer in the opera. He looks singularly Italian. His style is finished, perhaps to almost an excess of tenderness and fineness; but he has it in him to be a very pleasing singer, particularly of the serenading Trovatore order. Of Balfe's sweetish melody (superfluous sweets,) to Tennyson's “Come into the garden, Maud,” he made, we should think, as much as could be made, and won an encore. Verdi's Ramanzza: Quando le sere, introduced him favorably and showed his true vein. But in the “Don Pasquale” duet: Tornami a dir, his voice found the best use; the melody is pleasing, and his rendering of it was refined; only his small sweet voice was unequally matched with the large tones of Miss Phillipps.

Sig. GARIBALDI showed himself a most spirited, thoroughly alive, dramatic singer. He paced the stage, looking stern and gestulating with a sort of uncontrollable, but not ungraceful energy, and delivered his music, (an andante aria from Verdi's Attila, and the slow air: Infelice, followed by the spirited cavatina, in Ernani) with good round, solid, ringing tones (baritone, with some satisfactory deep bass tones,) and a fine declamatory style, that were quite refreshing. He really made a “hit” with his new audience.

A very well selected little orchestra, led, violin in hand, by Mr. Suck played a concert overture by Kalliwoda and Reissiger's “Yelva” overture—both of the most pleasing and ingenious of the lighter overtures—and a festive sounding reminiscence from Wagner's Tannhäuser, arranged by Hamm—all very nicely played. It was refreshing to hear even so much of orchestral music, after such long and entire privation.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The subscription list for ZERRAHN'S Orchestral Concerts grows apace; but there are many music-lovers yet delinquent; let them lose no time, but do what in them lies to make the thing secure. . . The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are practising “Israel in Egypt;” they could not be about better work. . . We have several times of late had occasion to remark the rare excellence for a theatre orchestra of that at the Boston theatre, under the direction of Messrs. COMER and Suck. It is large, for a theatre, select, exceedingly well drilled, and has a repertoire of overtures and other pieces, many of which are of a really classical character, in addition to the usual waltzes, pot-pourris, &c., of which too it is a pleasure to hear a moderate allowance, when they are so nicely played. When one can have such fine acting as that of BURTON in farce, and young EDWIN BOOTH in tragedy, the finest Shakspearian actor we have had, by all odds, since his father, with the intervals of the acts filled up by such nice orchestral renderings of Mozart's and Rossini's overtures, fragments of Haydn's Symphonies, vivid reminiscences of such rich operas as “Tell” and “Semiramide,” what better can he desire for an evening's entertainment?

How is PICCOLOMINI pronounced? Which syllable is accented? It should be spoken without any accent; that is the Italian way; to dwell with a sort of musical fondness equally upon each syllable of the long word. Pic-co-lo-mé-ne would be awkward. Pic-co-lom'-i-ni sounds too quick and business-like; but with luxurious Italian euphony let the long word spread itself along, leisurely and equally, like oil upon a marble table, slighting no syllable and accenting none.

Mr. J. P. GROVES, the young Boston violinist, who won the first prize at the Conservatory in Brussels last year, gave a concert in that city some months since, in connection with LITTOLF, the famous pianist, of Brunswick, who, on this occasion, brought out a number of his own compositions, among others a Concert called “Eroica,” for violin and orchestra. Of the manner in which our young townsman played the violin part, we translate what a German critic says: “Mr. Groves, an American by birth, overcame the great difficulties presented by this composition with peculiar skill, and promises, after so fair an achievement, a still fairer future. A firm, sure conduct of the bow, a full tone, pure intonation, and a certain noble repose, not passionless, but removed from all charlatanism, are excellencies which certainly warrant the finest hopes after this first success. . . . ELISE HENSLEER has been singing in Trieste, and the journals compliment her in glowing Italian fashion. One of them, speaking of her farewell performance, says: “Flowers, garlands, sonnets, verses, plaudits, clapping of hands, and cries of brava! brava! without end: such is an epitome of the benefit taken by the sympathetic Hensler, by whom we again heard the Sonnambula always gracefully interpreted, while it was relished by the public with delight. The gentle actress regaled us, moreover, with the cavatina from “Rigoletto”: Caro nome che il mio cor, sung with that fine and loveable quality of voice, whose notes still trill and gurgle in our ears after the lips which modulated them are mute. The Signora Hensler has every attraction on her side: voice, song, grace, figure, comeliness and youth. Who must not prize such gifts united in a single individual!”

MARIA PICCOLOMINI, born at Sienna in 1835, is now only twenty-three years old, and has been fully six years before the public, having first appeared at Florence, in 1852, in Donizetti's opera of Lucrezia Borgia.

Her family rank among the most ancient in Tuscany. Two of them have occupied the Papal Chair, (Pius II and Pius III.) and her uncle, a venerable gentleman well known in Rome, for his appreciation of the fine arts, and his enthusiasm for music, is the well-known Cardinal Piccolomini. On the Italian principle of children and grandchildren participating in the family honors, Maria Piccolomini may claim the honorary title of princess. As a professional singer, she is content with the humbler and more appropriate rank of Signora, as a private gentle-woman.

Music Abroad.

STRASBURG.—The London Musical World translates the following from the Courrier des Bas-Rhin:—

One of those pieces of good fortune which seem denied to the provinces fell to the lot of the persons who assembled the day before yesterday in the saloons of M. Georges Kastner. Our learned fellow-citizen had been kind enough to invite them to hear M. Berlioz—who is stopping with him a few days—read the book of an opera in five acts, composed for the Académie Impériale de Musique, and of which he has written both the words and the music. It may easily be conceived what an interest was felt to hear a work not yet produced read by the author himself, a musician and a poet at the same time, especially when that author is already so celebrated.

The subject of M. Berlioz's opera is taken from classic antiquity, but treated in the modern fashion, not without being adapted, as far as the scenic development is concerned, to that exceptional style to which the composer of Romeo et Juliette has devoted himself. This is tantamount to saying that, under the circumstances, M. Berlioz could not have found a better librettist than himself, and that everything will gain from the fact that the words and the music of the work, executed in a form and on a plan scarcely ever selected up to the present day, have proceeded from the same brain.

The book contains a great number of dramatic situations, many of which must produce a striking effect, to judge by that produced at the reading. As to the musical situations and the melodic motives, the poet has prepared them for the composer with quite a paternal weakness, which we fondly hope the audience of the Opéra will sanction. They result moreover from the very nature of the subject, taken, as we have said, from pagan antiquity, by which lyrical art was so highly honoured.

M. Berlioz has given his opera proportions which are strangely grandiose, and has taken care to surround it with all the accessories indispensable at the present day for the success of a dramatic work. Thus the book suggests a brilliant mise-en-scène, which will call up our Homeric and Virgilian reminiscences; change of scene, mythological scenes, and a graceful and picturesque ballet, or, in other words, so many elements which will soften down the tragic nature of the action, and heighten the splendour of the spectacle. We must add that the symphonic proportions of the score, to judge by the outline of the scenarium, gave promise of being gigantic.

The rehearsals of the—I was about to betray the title!—will commence, it is said, under the especial patronage of His Majesty the Emperor, and Paris will soon appreciate the opera of M. Berlioz, which is destined, on so many accounts, to produce a deep sensation, and of which, thanks to the courtesy of M. Kastner, we have had a literary foretaste at Strasbourg.

DRESDEN.—Richard Wagner's Rienzi, one of his earlier operas, was recently revived. A German critic says:—

The opera of Rienzi differs very much from Wagner's later efforts, to which, indeed, it forms a strong contrast. In Rienzi he entered on the path of grand French opera, and, with bold youthful fire, freed himself in it, to a certain extent, from the purely material elements then predominant in his nature. Empty phrases, full of tune, bombastic pathos, and coarse masslike effects, without delicacy of coloring, are there in full force. Deep heartfelt expression, true character, real feeling, and that poetically conceiving, highly coloured style, which produces so great an effect in his later operas, rarely occur. It is true that the composer of 'the later operas' is sufficiently evident in many peculiarities and affected mannerisms, a special notice of which would here lead us too far, in many detached motives, in speculative technicality, and in the attachment to the rhetorically-musical element; but the forms are not yet free from the ordinary type, the style is altogether a mixed one, swaying from pathos to triviality, and Meyerbeer's influence is frequently visible, while in Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, Weber is the composer's romantic model. The sensual tone-painting, which, in Tannhäuser, works upon the imagination with poetic colouring, degenerates, in Rienzi, into coarse noise. But, however far the composer still was, in Rienzi, from his deeper intellectual development and enlightened conception, his great talent for dramatically-musical description and stage-effect, and his bold and daring mastery of technical difficulties, are indisputably manifest. The masses move with rhythmical certainty, while the recitative and ariosos, in a constant struggle with all the wind instruments, possess vigour and dramatic consistence. In the midst of the coarse tumult, which causes us to fear we shall soon have to stumble over vandal-like ruins in art, a freshly daring and fiery power are pleasingly perceptible, and every act contains certain pieces, not merely short fragments, but long, independent pieces, comprising sufficient of what is valuable, uncommon, and inspiring, to cause us to say—were only this first opera of Wagner lying before us—The composer would be successful at some future period, if he really dedicated his talent to art.—Rienzi has been produced at our theatre with great splendor, and with new and admirable scenery, the view of the Forum Romanum being particularly effective. After four hours' enjoyment of this real musical infliction, the inevitable result is a feeling of astonishment at the powers of endurance possessed by the singers and orchestra—especially by the wind-instrumentalists. The opera had been rehearsed with the greatest care under the direction of the Capellmeister, Herr Krebs, and the entire representation was a successful one; every person engaged exerted himself to the utmost. The performance of Herr Tichatschek, as Rienzi, was admirable for its dash, grand heroic style of expression, and the unimpaired freshness, powers of endurance, and still unbroken smoothness of the singer's voice. The highly fatiguing and dramatically important part of Adriano was sung by Madame Krebs-Michalesi, with excellent effect. Next to these two artists come Herren Mitterwurzer and Conradi, as the chiefs of the Orsini and Colonnas. The applause from an overflowing house was very great; Madame Krebs-Michalesi was called on several times, and Herr Tichatschek after each act.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The last musical event of any note in Goethe's birth-place, as well as in some other German cities, appears to have been the performance of an ambitious composition by an Englishman, Mr. Pierson, whom the Athenæum and other oracles at home scout as one crazy with the "Music of the Future." Here is the impression made upon a writer in the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung of Cologne.

There was an overflowing house on Goethe's birthday, to witness the second part of Faust, with music by Hugo Pierson. The version chosen was the excellent one adapted for the stage by Wollheim. The performance was highly successful, for the representatives of the principal characters, and the chief stage-manager, Herr Vollmer, were tumultuously called on several times.

No theatrical work has been regarded with so much suspicion as the second part of Faust. Even after the great success it had in Hamburg, people in other places still continued to think it was unintelligible. Here and there, too, those who wield the pen would not confess it had been successful, because they were not the persons who had been fortunate enough to produce a good stage version. With regard to the music, also, it is true, that both critics and public in Hamburg pronounced it original, beautiful, and worthy of the poem; but then Pierson is a man who belongs neither to the party of the Musicians of the Future, nor to any other. For years past, ever since he resigned his office as Professor of Music at the University of Edinburgh, he has kept aloof from taking part publicly in musical matters, and busied himself only with composition, to which fact his grand oratorio, Jerusalem, his songs and other small pieces, as well as the opera he has just completed, bear honorable testimony.

But, however this may be, the second part of Faust, according to Wollheim's stage version, and with Pierson's music, has triumphed, here in Frankfort, over prejudice and envy. This is a fact which can no longer be disputed.

The music was very well performed, under the direction of the excellent Capellmeister, Herr George Goltermann. The audience welcomed each member with the greatest interest, evinced either by devotional silence, as, for instance, in the case of the magnificent introductions to the fourth and fifth acts, or by loud applause, in which they indulged after the chorus: "Heilige Poesie," the concluding chorus, the "Te Deum," etc.

That portion of the music which is omitted, because it is impossible to extend the time of representation, which is already very long, in the case of this drama, is to be found in the piano-forte edition published by Schott's sons in Mayence. Herr Goltermann has, however, publicly stated that he will shortly give the whole of the music at a concert. This will be a great boon to the numerous admirers of Pierson's compositions.

Woman's Resolution: or, The sober second thought. Comic Song. L. Heath. 25

Most of the so called Comic Songs of the day have a touch of the offensive, which, however slight it may be, still makes their admission into refined society an impossibility. This song is an exception. It is truly and emphatically comic, and fit and proper in the parlor and at the fireside.

Must I bid thee farewell, dear mother.

Dr. O. C. Alexander. 25

A plaintive, easy ballad.

Lottie Lane. Song & Cho. J. H. McNaughton. 25

This is a song of that class, which has been introduced in and forms such an attractive feature in Ethiopian entertainments. Many as there are of these songs, created, as it were by the dozen every day, there are but few which attain a permanent distinction, by virtue of some indescribable charm, to which the ear of the many is sensible. This song is of the latter class, destined to become widely known, and not unlikely to take the lead in the race.

"Mine eyes are dim with weeping." Written and composed by H. Millard.

This is a reprint of a very elegant English song, published in the Bridal Album, by Cramer, Beale & Co., London. The Album was made up of 10 or 13 Songs by the leading English composers, viz., Balfe, Hatton, Wallace, Glover, Linley, Mori, &c., each contributing one song. We feel well pleased to find that the name of our townsman has thus been placed upon the list of English song writers, and trust we shall have an opportunity of hearing this ballad sung during the winter by its originator.

Le Carnival de Venise. Polka. Joseph Ascher. 30

At last this melody of everlasting popularity has given rise to a pretty French Operette, by the talented Ambroise Thomas. The indefatigable Ascher has not been slow to work a charming little polka out of the novelty, which all piano players, fond of Ascher's light and graceful style, will certainly not be slow to buy.

Never mind Polka. F. L. Becker. 25

One glance Waltz. " 25
Easy and agreeable.

Souvenir d'une Excursion des Artistes. Grand Valse brillante. B. Courlaender. 50

The pen of this excellent player and writer has long been suffered to rest. It will be much gratification for his friends and admirers to see that his vein of invention and melody is as fresh as ever. In fact, this is a very brilliant and pleasing set of waltzes for players of medium ability.

Waltz, in D flat, and Ecossaise. (Posthumous Works.) Chopin. 25

Both in the inimitable style of this great master of Chromatics. The waltz is a tone-poem, which does not bear all its beauty upon the bright surface, as its companion, the sparkling Ecossaise does; there is a melancholy tale of sadness, with but little joy intervening, told in the duet, which the fingers of the right hand are bidden to interpret.

The Character and Genius of Handel.

Musical genius is certainly much more fertile than literary genius. The very least composers have produced a great deal, and all the great ones have been exceedingly fruitful. Handel was prodigiously so. His works number altogether one hundred and twenty-two, the greater part of them being of large proportion; and even when we know that he never rested for an hour, and that he devoted himself exclusively to his art, we ask how it was that a single man could supply the material labor which they required. His thirty-nine operas are in three acts; his twenty-one oratorios are not more astonishing for their extent than for their excellence. One feels amazed at that mountain of noble things piled up by a single hand, and especially when we remember that he was not, like Bach (his worthy emulator), a sort of Benedictine monk, working in the peaceful seclusion of a cell, without any difficulties to contend against. On the contrary, circumstances, his activity of mind, and his impetuous character drove him into the current of the world and its affairs.

What this man was able to do astounds the imagination. Take, for example, what he accomplished during the year 1734, when he was director of the Italian Opera: On the 26th of January, Ariadne, an opera in three acts; on the 13th of March, Parnasso in Festa, taken from Athalia, but containing fifteen original pieces; on the 18th of May, a revival of Pastor Fido, entirely recast, Terpsichore, a ballet intermixed with songs; the formation of a new company of singers, and the organization of a new theatre; the composition of Ariadante, an opera in three acts, finished on the 25th of October; the opening of a new theatre on the 18th of December; the performance of Orestes, a pasticcio; finally, in the midst of all this, the publication of the six famous concertos for thirteen instruments, called the Hautbois Concertos.

In 1736 his labors were still more extraordinary. Alexander's Feast, commenced on the 1st of January and finished on the 17th; Grand Concertante for nine instruments, on the 25th of January; Atalanta, an opera in three acts, commenced on the 3d of April and finished on the 22d; Wedding Anthem, with choruses and full orchestra, performed on the 27th of April; Justin, an opera in three acts, commenced on the 14th of August, and finished on the 7th September; Armenius, an opera in three acts, commenced on the 15th of September, and finished on the 3d of October; "Cecilia volgi," a grand cantata, with three recitatives, three airs, and a duet, on the 22d of November; "Sei del cielo," a small cantata, on the 22d of November; and, finally, Berenice, an opera in three acts, commenced on the 18th of December, and finished on the 18th of the following January.

Another astonishing proof of this abundant vigor was that which he gave toward the end of 1737, on his return from the waters of Aix-la-Chapelle, while still convalescent from a paralytic attack: Commencement of Faramondo on the 15th of November; end of the first act on the 28th of ditto; end of the second act on the 4th of December; commencement of Funeral Anthem on the 7th of December; end of the same on the 12th of ditto; rehearsal and performance of the same on the 17th of ditto; end of the third act of Faramondo on the 24th of ditto; commencement of Xerxes on the 26th of ditto. The accuracy of these facts is based upon incontrovertible proofs.

During ten years, from 1741 to 1751, and when he was from fifty-six to sixty-six years of age, and in the midst of the troubles attendant upon two failures, Handel wrote thirteen oratorios, besides Semele, Choice of Hercules, Dettingen Te Deum, Dettingen Anthem, several chamber duets, and a great deal of instrumental music; without mentioning his journey to Ireland, which occupied nine months, or the time consumed in mounting and producing each work, every performance of which he conducted in person. When we remember what an oratorio is, that Epic of Music, can we fail to be astonished at the spectacle of an old man who sometimes wrote one, and sometimes two such works in each year? It was Apollo in the body of Hercules. He composed one after another, almost without breaking the chain of continuity; The Messiah in twenty-three days, and Samson in thirty or thirty-five. The history of the productions of the human mind does not contain a similar example. No one ever composed difficult things with such facility.

It is another extraordinary circumstance that The Messiah was completed on the 12th of September, and Samson taken in hand on the 21st. The end of Faramondo is dated on the 24th of December, and the first line of Xerxes was written on the 26th. Saul was finished on the 27th of September, and Israel commenced on the 1st of October. The correspondence between the author of the words for Belshazzar and Handel proves that he did not always know the whole of a poem when he began to set it to music. He was gifted with such astonishing powers of conception, that he had no need to collect his ideas beforehand, or to form a plan. He had the faculty of penetrating himself instantaneously with the most opposite passions and sentiments. He did not so much compose as improvise his works. And, nevertheless, they are complete, as strong as oaks, and as solid as rocks; they have no signs of haste; they are massive gold.

Genius acts in many ways. Gluck, who, if he had written instrumental music, would have been something of Handel's stature, found it necessary to collect his ideas before production. His score was finished before he had put the first line upon paper. With the one, thought annihilated space like a race-horse; with the other, it was distilled slowly, like an essence in an alembic. The one produced without difficulty; music welled forth from his brain like water from an abundant spring; the other brought forth as our mothers do, in grief and pain. "Gluck has often told me," relates Mr. Corenses, "that he began by going mentally over each of his acts; afterward he went over the entire piece; that he always composed imagining himself in the centre of the pit; and that his piece thus combined and his air characterized, he regarded the work as finished, although he had written nothing; but that this preparation usually cost him an entire year, and most frequently a grave illness. 'This,' said he, 'is what a great number of persons call making canzonets.'"

Handel was a worker not less indefatigable than his genius was inexhaustible. He never abused his supernatural faculties. His MSS., which were so impetuously written, bear the marks of incessant revision. As an example of this constant perfecting process, may be cited the air, "How beautiful," in The Messiah, which was rewritten four times. In many of the scores, and especially in Radamisto, corrections made on little pieces of paper may be found pasted over the passages which had been effaced. In Esther there is a recitative, four lines long, which is corrected in this manner; and then, the corrected version not having satisfied the composer, he has made a third. The last version is now attached to the original MSS.; the first is in the Fitzwilliam Museum. So much patience in such an impatient man, so much trouble taken with four lines of recitative by the man who produced Israel in Egypt in twenty-four days, speak volumes for the laborious industry with which he toiled. When he died, scarcely any of his works were as he had written them; all have sustained some change, some transformation. He returned to them constantly with the activity of an inexhaustible fecundity. And yet no man was ever less uncertain than he as to the road which he intended to follow; no one had a more decided will or definite end; no one knew more precisely whither he was going, what he wished to do, and what he did. But in addition to his great love for improvement, having been his own manager for half a century, and being consequently obliged to accommodate himself to one circumstance or another, one new singer or another, conducting the score every evening, struggling every day against powerful enemies, and against the musical ignorance of his age, he was compelled to multiply himself, to employ all sorts of means to attract attention, and satisfy that blind and insatiable passion for novelty which was then even more morbid than it is at the present day.

In spite of his ardent disposition, he never worked capriciously. His was a well-directed fire. His compositions followed each other with monastic regularity. With the exception of Hymen, which was written between the first and second acts of Saul, I do not recollect that he wrote more than one at a time.

A Glance at the Present State of Music.

By Dr. A. B. MARX.

THE first glance we take at the present state of musical art, reveals to us a picture of musical activity so great and universal as may scarcely have existed at any previous period; excepting, perhaps, during those lovely days once shining upon Italy and Spain. Then, indeed, the stream of holy song gushed from the open doors of every church, flowed down from every pilgrim-crested eminence; from every balcony the clang of festive trumpets enlivened the banquets of nobles and princes, and, in the stillness of the balmy night, the trembling chords of mandolines and citherns mingled with the voices of tender singers. So our own country also resounded, in the days of Luther, with his songs of holy warfare. Powerfully exciting, inspiring, and confirming, they swelled from the church choir, and through the open doors spread over the crowded marketplace; they filled the busy streets with shouts of religious enthusiasm, and penetrated to the private family circle, the lonely chamber of the pious Christian.

That which, in those countries and those days, arose spontaneously as the inborn medium of expression of a people more easily excited, and inhabiting a country rich in nature's sweetest charms, or the natural voice of holy zeal, has come down to us; not, it is true, as something foreign to our nature—for it had been lying dormant in the deeply poetic mind of our German nation long before it was awakened—but still as something acquired, in the form of a gift presented to us for our enjoyment, and as an ornament of our existence.

Thus are our public gardens, our social circles, and our festivals, everywhere filled with streams of harmony; bands of music, consisting of numerous instruments, the number of which is ever increasing, parade before our military hosts, or make the ball-room tremble with the "phrensy of delight." Where is the town, however small, which does not attempt to get up, at least, a series of winter concerts? How many virtuosi, how many quartet-societies, how many concerts of every kind and description, divert the music-loving multitudes of our larger cities! At what time were there seen almost everywhere so many opera performances almost the whole year round? What time or country can show anything equal to our musical festivals and musical societies? Or, lastly, in what age, before the present, has music been so universally recognized as an indispensable branch of education, both in word and in deed, and with such sacrifices of time and money?

For this diffusion of music, the lively interest universally taken in its cultivation, in every sphere of life accords proportionate means. However great the cost of instruction, instruments, printed music, &c. every family in the middle as well as the higher ranks of society endeavors to obtain them. There is no where a lack of teachers; singing is practised in every school; seminaries, universities, and special music schools, continue the instruction and lead it to a higher point; everywhere academies of singing, instrumental and general musical societies, established for the purpose of collective practice or performance, are found increasing. Municipal authorities and governments bestow attention upon, and provide means for, the performance of works of art in chapels and in choirs, or for the musical instruction of the people; our publishers and music-sellers diffuse the works of all nations and all times to an extent and in a form unprecedentedly cheap and convenient; even the acquisition of good instruments has been considerably facilitated by the progress of the mechanical arts.

Wonderful power of the art of sound! To open all hearts! engaging the interest and drawing contributions even from those who for want of instruction, or from a naturally defective organization, are denied a participation in its pleasures; who willingly make sacrifices for those belonging to them, and then step aside, content with the feeling of having afforded to others a pleasure which they themselves cannot enjoy!

Whence has music this power? and how does it reward our love and sacrifices?

It has this power, and is all-powerful over mankind, because it seizes upon every fibre, sensually, and spiritually, upon the whole body and soul, sensations and ideas. The rudest nature thrills under the effect of its powerful strains, and is soothed by its sweetness. Its sensual effect is in itself irresistibly enchanting; for the merely sensual hearer feels that this trembling of the nerves penetrates to the inmost depth of the soul, that this corporeal delight is purified and sanctified by its hidden connexion with the origin of our existence. But he who has experienced in his own person how music calls forth, and leads to pleasure, the most tender, powerful, and secret feelings of the soul, imparting brightness to its mysterious twilight, awakening it to a dreamy consciousness; he to whom the deepest perceptions and ideas present themselves as spirits diverting him from, and raising him above, the fluctuating play of feelings and emotions; who is in short, aware that our existence would be imperfect, did not the world of sound supply the deficiency: such a one knows that the most intellectual pleasure of the senses derived from hearing music is merely an attraction to its spiritual fountain, from which are drawn purity of feeling, elevation of mind, the contemplation of a new and boundless world of ideas, and a new sphere of existence.

The one is the all-penetrating, universally prevailing power of sounds; and the other, the promise of this art—a more elevated and blissful existence, which we, knowing or anticipating, confide in, and to which so many of us and ours are devoted.

But its nature, like man's own, is twofold; partaking both of the sensual (material;) and the mental (spiritual.) It has power to raise us from a rude and barren state of being, to a higher, more susceptible, and spiritual existence; to soften and refine our feelings, to awaken in us ideas of pure and perfect humanity; to exalt us above the human sphere to the confines of the Divine, and in this mental elevation, fill our hearts with love and holy zeal for everything that is good and noble. But this self-same power of melody and harmony may also bury the yet unrevealed indwelling spirit in the alluring waves of excited sensuality, obliterating from the soul every noble feeling, and every virtuous power, and gradually leading it to that thoughtlessness, that want of principle and desire for sensual pleasure which dissolves or stifles every noble disposition, and in whose train are found those strange twins, satiety and insatiability, and that terrible condition of the mind, utter indifference.

How then does this dangerous but dear art reward our love and our sacrifices?

In art itself all is pure, noble, and good. It is the fault of our weakness, if to us its gifts become poison; if we linger inactively upon the threshold of its sanctuary, or allow its call to die away unheeded, and, instead of joining the company of the initiated in its sacred halls, lose ourselves in the courts destined for the offal of the sacrifices.

Many things have conspired to embitter the pure enjoyment and interrupt the pure and honest cultivation of the art of music in the present times. The waves of mighty events are penetrating into, and acting upon, every form of social and spiritual life, while the nations are still without a unifying and guiding principle of mental elevation. Stupendous events and recollections have called forth, on the one hand, vehement desires, and a prevalence of violent and suddenly changing impressions; on the other hand, its opposites—inanition, and a deep longing for peace and quietness. In both directions, the material, a means of violent excitement, or of soothing the mind into a pleasurable repose, has acquired undue preponderance over the spiritual element of art, and we see repeated a spectacle often witnessed before: that, in such moments when the tension of the German mind and character, in the masses of the people and those who speak to their hearts, suffers relaxation, foreign influences, especially the frivolity and ready loquacity of the French, and the enervated sensuality of the Italians, wrest the sceptre from native talent. In respect to music, it is in the opera especially that foreign mediocrity at such times gains its easiest victories, and carries every thing before it in its rapid march. For, how many different means are not resorted to, in these productions, to take the hearer by surprise and confound his judgment, so that their worthlessness remains concealed beneath the novelty of their effects! And how can the evil influence thus brought to bear upon the highest and most commanding point, fail to affect in a similar manner, every other sphere and branch of art?

Are we compelled, on the one hand, to censure the mind-debasing materialism of the foreign opera, whose tendency in our days is the more irresistible, because we are still accustomed, indeed forced, on account of the more highly developed political and public life of our western neighbours, to look to their country as to the balance-wheel of the great European clock; so, on the other hand, we acknowledge that which is positively good in those operas, and which has been too much neglected by our writers and composers for the theatres; viz. dramatic, or at least scenic, animation, and the progression from mere individual conditions to public and more universally intelligible and interesting relations of life. Only when this positive element shall have been more generally perceived and appreciated by our poets and musicians, amongst all the poverty, lowness, and errors of the foreign opera—then, and not till then, will German art, in all other respects so much more pure and true, be able to triumph over its rivals in the theatre, as certainly and signally as it has done everywhere else.

Till then the foreigner will reign, will be a favorite, attract the multitude, and in his way satisfy it. A flattering tickling, a strained excitement of the senses, external splendor, coupled with internal poverty, superficial desire to please, instead of character and depth, a general inclination for that which is low, the degradation of the most significant conditions and forms to mere means of effect—these are the inseparable consequences of this dominion. Music, having become a mere pastime, is dragged about everywhere; it pursues us into our gardens and dining rooms, prevents all spiritual interchange, and conscious of being only intended to fill up the emptiness of a listless society, blunts at the same time the ears of the audience and its own powers. This want of character and meaning may be observed in every branch of art, and the general indifference is increasing. In proportion as our modern composers stray from the true nature and genius of art in general, and the different artistic forms in particular, treating the means as the chief object, without regard to design, so does that perversion, which is the death of art, become more palpable. In proof of this, we find that those seductive foreign operas, even though the authority of their origin may dazzle and mislead us Germans, only gain their success through the aid of celebrated singers who are specially gifted for their coquetish or forced efforts, and by the employment of every possible adjective resource of attraction. The opposite fault of negligence in the adaptation of the means to the end, has often, and not without reason, been urged as a reproach against us: perhaps our bitter experience is intended to teach us better.

Proceeding from this point, another not very animating aspect of the present condition of music opens to our view.

We have such music, but very little real enjoyment of it. We make it a means of diversion and entertainment, when it might serve to collect our ideas and elevate our minds. Thus our fashionable operas for a moment render their admirers giddy with delight, but to dismiss them unsatisfied, and to be shortly forgotten by them; so in our concerts, whose highest pinnacle of success is that most barren of all emotions, astonishment at the skill of a virtuoso; so in our public performances and musical festivals, which merely serve to furnish another not very pleasing accompaniment to the conversation of the audience; so in our social circles, where unmeaning exercises, or badly executed novelties of the day, form the staple articles of musical entertainment, and which, instead of real pleasure, produce more mental distress, envy, and ennui, than people are inclined to confess even to themselves.

With pleasurable feelings do we quickly withdraw the eye from this cheerless side of the picture; the more so, as it is not our object to form a conclusive judgment, but only to arouse the earnest attention of those who take a lively interest in the cause of the musical art and the education of the people. It would also evince great ignorance of the spirit of our times, did we not, by the side of degeneration and weakness, also perceive and honor the most cheering and promising efforts in the right direction; the faithful adherence shown to the works of the older masters, from Beethoven, back even to Gluck and Sebastian Bach; the rare, though perhaps temporary, increase of technical industry of executants, the assiduous efforts of so many students to acquire scientific proficiency and general information, both of which are indispensable to the artist, and were certainly by no means so earnestly aimed at in times past as they are at present. The only drawback to this cheering aspect is the fact, that many, whose zealous efforts must be acknowledged with praise, still appear to be unconscious of the real nature and purpose of all artistic activity; this unconsciousness must be awakened into a clear perception before those labors can bear the right fruit. As it is, we have the strange anomaly of great depth of thought associated with shallowness; of false and real art held in equal estimation, the good and the bad accepted without distinction under the flattering name of versatility, and discrimination denounced as formality.

Thus, in the traces and germs of the good, as well as the bad, great and wide-spread activity is everywhere displayed; an activity promising much, if directed to the right end, but which still remains unaided by that concentrating and guiding consciousness, that quickening spirit which imparts to art the highest of its powers.

Thus many noble-minded and deeply thinking men have prefigured to themselves, in this whirlpool of confused efforts and conflicting powers, the destruction of an art which in their opinion, has already reached the culminating point of its glory in Bach, or Gluck, or Mozart, or Beethoven. We, on the contrary, adhere firmly to the conviction that art is a necessity of human nature, and therefore, like it, imperishable; and that, for the same reason also, in a single nation, music can only perish together with that nation itself; though it may, in common with it, experience repeated moments of dejection or retrogression. The history of music, attentively examined, gives ample proof of this; and a worthy conception of what our nation ought to be, and what may be expected, and will be gained for musical art by its re-elevation, is calculated, even in times of undeniable retrogradation, to inspire with hope every heart beating for something higher than that which is perishable.

College Music.

[NEW HAVEN, Conn., Sept. 29, 1858.]

DEAR SIR:

If you could find it in your power to give me any information on the state of music in Yale while you were at college, I should be very glad to obtain it.

If you would be so kind also to state to me any particulars you know about the introduction to Yale of "Gaudeamus igitur," you would much oblige me.

Yours, in 322,

EUGENE SCHUTLER.

Editor of the Musical World.]

The above letter has induced quite a train of recollection as to the pleasant days and pleasant fellows of college years. We well remember the first visit we received after the Freshman examination, from the august President of the Beethoven Club. In our Freshman verdancy we had taken a room in one of the public buildings of the city, (the Exchange) from which we were speedily routed by the college authorities, no student being allowed to have a room in any public building or hotel. But it was during the short time we were quartered there that the Beethoven official came to examine into our musical qualifications to join the college choir. Of course we were given the usual psalmody to sing—upon which we passed a much more satisfactory examination, we dare say, than certain other metrical text-books in languages less familiar—concerning which we had subsequently to undergo rigorous investigation.

So kindly were we received by the Beethovenites that at the end of the Freshman year they inducted us into the office of President—a post we continued to fill during the three remaining years of the course.

During that time how many excellent fellows passed in musical review!—both of classes preceding and following. We had, in all, a force of about thirty men. Of these, twenty, perhaps, were singers, and the rest composed a "grand orchestra"—as the concert programmes have it. Max Maretzek would probably have turned several summersaults, had he heard our orchestra but once vigorously tune up. Not so much on account of the melodious results, albeit—for the fellows did not make bad music—but rather the extraordinary novelty of the acoustical effects; for we had every unique instrument from the piccolo fife to the big drum. Of course our music in its grand ensemble of voices and instruments was often what might be termed rousing;—and whenever we put forth our musical energies we kept the attention of our auditors from the beginning to the end—you may be sure. And, indeed, the attention thus bestowed was often well repaid. Among our singers we had several capital voices, tenors particularly, and the voices of each and all had that freshness and warmth, which no training and no art can supply and which go more directly to the popular heart than all the graces and embellishments of more artificial song. To be sure, we had far fewer tenors than basses—this being—in common with more professional impresarios—the particular woe of our career as Kapellmeister; but then the tenors had to sing all the louder, and we scorned being sung down by any number of ruder Basses—having a certain acoustical advantage, also, in the more penetrating and pervading tones of a higher scale.

In matters of psalmody, we sang the music just as it is usually written for mixed voices; that is, for male and female. But the late auspicious era, in which the question is so gallantly agitated of admitting young ladies to colleges, not having as yet dawned upon us, our music was essentially male. Of course, the conditions of the music we sang, as to progression of parts, etc., were radically changed:

and some fellows insisted on singing tenor, and this part generally running higher than the melody itself, we had such inversion of parts, and such consecutive octaves, fifths, and forbidden horrors of every kind, that some of our modern Philadelphia Doctors of Music might have been driven into a lunatic asylum. Yet these dissonances were something like certain coarser stops in an organ; which, though diabolical in themselves, when drowned in an overtopping harmoniousness, help jill up.

The instrument greatly predominating in our orchestra was the flute. The inevitable flute had, indeed, ever to be repressed and discouraged. Every second fellow who wanted to join the choir played a flute. We grew indeed to be relentless on the flute question. Having secured several of the most accomplished upon that pastoral instrument, (like Field and Larned) we turned our backs resolutely on all other piping shepherds.

Strange to say, however, the instrument best played of all was the violin. We actually had violin-playing, rather than that fiddling naturally (of students) to be expected. There was Washington and Trotter, particularly of the "Southern members", and Whitney of the Northern, who drew, really, a capital bow. We were also supplied with a viola, 'cello and double-bass, so that the quartet of the "strings" was complete. Of the "brasses" we had but a single representative,—a big ophicleide. This piece of ordnance, when projected out of the chapel window, called explosively the choir together every Saturday noon to rehearsal, filling the breasts of the "milky mothers of the herd", nibbling the grass in College street, with alarm. It was our pièce de résistance—our great gun, that ophicleide. We based a good deal of our musical reputation upon the fundamental notes of that deep-mouthed orator. The double-bass was solemnly grand, but the ophicleide was fundamentally grander. The big drum, too, though somewhat martial and operatic, when touched by the professor thereof lightly, rumbled deep down into the region of the pedal-pipe tone in an organ, and served very much the same purpose in the general effect.

Of the lighter instrumental cohort—the fancy pieces—we had an ornamental supply. Our views were liberal as to what was proper in an orchestra. We had now and then a guitar, a triangle (which, of course, was not very unorchestral,) a piccolo flute, etc. Such instruments as were not heard, by reason of the general din—like the tinkling guitar—were supposed to be heard. They looked pretty when the fellows played them—and a great many serenaded misses in town, could testify that, (when heard at all,) they also sounded pretty.

Our best music was at prayers on Sunday evenings. During the day the choir was very much dispersed. Some of the members had charge of town choirs; others attended churches of a different denomination than that worshipping at the chapel. But at prayers there was a general gathering. We usually practised, too, on Saturday, an anthem for Sunday evening. The Christmas Nativity anthem was, of all our musical attempts, the most successful and popular: partly from its traditional associations, and partly from the enthusiasm natural to the occasion of its performance—Christmas Eve.

The choir and orchestra, during the period of our administration, did themselves most justice, perhaps, the year we were graduated—'41. Hitherto, each graduating class had gone to the no inconsiderable expense of hiring a New York orchestra to play at Centre Church during the commencement exercises. (We believe this is still done.) But the choir had so augmented in numbers, that their music was really so much more popular with the students, (and with the outside Philistines as well,) than even Max Maretzek's far more scientific instrumental corps, that we determined to save the college all expense of commencement music, and do the melodious thing ourselves. Not this alone. We resolved to attempt the as yet unheard of enterprise, and give a concert on the evening preceding Commencement. All this, to be sure, involved not only daily, but nightly exertions on the part of the zealous President of the club: who not only had to arrange—yea, verily, to compose—overtures, intermezzos and musical fantasias of various kinds for the extraordinary variety of instruments on that occasion to be brought forward (for an orchestra constituted as was ours being entirely unknown to the classic masters and ancients, no music for our purpose was found to be extant) but we had to accomplish the still more difficult task of getting the fellows together to rehearse. Herein lies the true test, of course, of an Impresario's genius—the power of getting musicians to preliminary rehearsals. Students, particularly, are in any case frisky enough—but Sophomore examinations and Senior preparations, and Freshman and Junior impediments of every kind added materially to this friskiness whenever we talked to them about the necessity of rehearsal, and the awful musical responsibility we had assumed. We added the attraction of watermelons and all the fruits of the season as seductive means to secure their attendance at rehearsals—indeed, but for the watermelons we are afraid our concert and commencement music would have fallen through.

Our rehearsals—for the greater privacy—were held in the Rhetorical chamber instead of the chapel: and this was the scene of our own private labors upon that remarkable instrumental score, which we were compelled to prepare for our nondescript orchestra. There was a long table in the middle of the room, and a pianoforte at the head of it. Upon this table, during the intervals of rehearsal, were generally left the instruments, to do justice to which we were ransacking our brains of music. When we sat solitarily at one end and thrummed out upon the piano a Skull-and-Bone March, or a Freshman Fandango, or some such mad-cap invention, the big double-bass, lying prone on its stomach before us, and the bigger drum looming ponderously in the distance, and the little fiddles, and the guitars, and everything that could vibrate, seemed to respond to the strains and to suggest their own music. So that there was not so much real difficulty in composing the tunes—but the thing was to get the fellows to play them.

However, after many tribulations and sleepless nights and anxieties, and a fabulous consumption of watermelons, all was in readiness. The concert was given in a church on Church street, the pulpit being removed for the occasion and a staging constructed. The number of tickets issued was unlimited and—unfortunately for the accommodations of the church—the sale was unlimited: so that when the evening of performance arrived, one-third of the audience had to listen from the street—we putting up the windows, and the auditors complacently submitting to such unprecedented concert-arrangements. Between the parts of the programme an address on music was delivered by the President—he feeling safe from any expressions of disapproval on the part of the audience, from the fact that precautions had wisely been taken, early in the evening, to request the audience to refrain from any tokens of satisfaction or dissatisfaction—if for no other reason, out of regard to the character of the place.

The Beethovenites, we believe, still flourish, eminently at Yale College—we should be sorry at all events to hear that the music of our old Alma Mater had in any degree died out.—We trust that the same spirit of emulation, the same musical zeal, the same jolly good fellowship prevail now as in previous collegiate years. We understand an organ has latterly taken the place of the heterogeneous orchestra once assembled:—and yet we can hardly think that either on festive college occasions, or in the more solemn services of churchly worship, more youthful ardor can be exhibited on the one hand, or a profounder and sincerer feeling on the other, than that which characterized the music under the older arrangement.

In reply to the interrogatory of our correspondent, we would say that Gaudeamus igitur was introduced into college some eight or ten years since. We brought it with us, in a book of German student-songs, on our return from Europe. In the same book was that glorious Integer Vir—Horace's ode, set to music by Flemming—which was sung at the same time, and we hope is still sung, in the halls of Old Yale.

The Theatre in Sans-Souci.

(From the Berlin Echo.)

Such is the title of a highly interesting paper by Herr L. Schneider, in No. 2 of the Neues Deutsches Theater-Archiv, from which we select the two following very remarkable cabinet orders of Frederick the Great. For the reception of the Russian Grand Prince, afterward the Czar Paul, at the Prussian Court, in July, 1776, all kinds of festivities were projected, and the king busied himself with the most trifling details connected with them. All sorts of interesting documents relating to the dramatic performances to be given are still preserved, in the Royal Secret Archives. As early as the 20th of June, Herr Reichardt, the capellmeister, had to go to Sans-Souci, and compose an allegorical prologue to the opera of Angelica e Medora, for Porporino and Tosoni, as well as an aria for Mad. Mara. The latter's husband, a personal enemy of Reichardt, succeeded in prevailing on her to write and tell the king, "She could not sing such music." The result was an order to the Baron von Arnim, which affords us a glance at the manner in which the great king ruled the little kingdom of his theatre at Sans-Souci:

"Vous pourrez dire à la chanteuse Mara en réponse à la lettre, qu'elle vient de m'adresser que je la payois pour chanter et non pour écrire, que les airs étaient très-bien, tes qu'ils étaient et qu'elle devoit s'en accommoder, sans tant de verbiage et difficulté. Sur ce etc., etc."

"à Potsdam le 30 de Juin 1776. FREDERIC."

("You may tell the singer Mara, in answer to the letter she has just sent me, that I paid her to sing and not to write; that the airs were very well, as they were, and that she ought to be contented with them without so much idle talk and fuss. In consequence, etc., etc."

"Potsdam, the 30th June, 1776.) FREDERICK."

Underneath there was a note in the king's own handwriting:

"Elle est payée pour chanter et non pour écrire."

("She is paid to sing and not to write.")

At the same time, the above-mentioned individual, Mara, who was one of the royal private band, was sent to Spandau. This reduced the Baron von Arnim, who dreaded some hitch in the operatic representations to a state of despair. His remonstrance on the subject to the king was followed by the remarkable order, written in German—an exception in theatrical matters—of which there are several copies still extant, instead of running thus: "The Mara shall sing," are as follows: "The — shall sing."

"My best, and very dear faithful Arnim! I perceive from your observations of the 4th inst., that you are very tender-hearted, and a very great friend of the Mara and her husband, because you espouse their cause so warmly, and speak up for them. I must, however, tell you that your tender-heartedness is very badly applied in the present instance, and that you would act much more sensibly, if you did what I order you, and did not accustom yourself to argue the matter; for I will by no means suffer this, and you must not let such things enter your head. The Mara shall sing the air, as I require her to do, and not be obstinate, unless she wants to be served just like her husband, and he shall stop in prison till further orders; to that he may make up his mind. For your part, you must not fancy you are my privy counsellor. I did not take you into my service for that, so you had better busy yourself with rendering parition to my orders, if you wish me to continue your gracious king."

"Potsdam, the 5th July, 1776. FREDERICK."

Mozart in Vienna.

(From Frazer's Magazine.)

Years roll on, and Mozart finds himself settled in Vienna, in great reputation, and surrounded by the closest ties of kindred—wife and children. At once the composer and the performing artist, now immersed "over head and ears," as he expressed it, in composition, and now the centre of all eyes at the theatre, the world has never seen in any musician such an instance of various power or of equal promptitude in thought and action. His society was mixed. From the boudoir of the empress herself, from the sympathetic and elegant intercourse of Haydn, Metastasio, Gluck, to the revelry of the green-room, and its orgies crowned with flowers, every one could extract something to please out of our Mozart. Here his mercurial temperament, however, wronged him, and between too much work and too much pleasure, he consumed himself. When illness had restored predominance to his reasoning and reflecting powers, his regrets at being so early obliged to leave his art were poignant, for he saw into the extent of his own mind, and had begun to view his music as a precious casket, deposited with him by Providence, not merely for his own advantage, but that of mankind at large. For a while, however, the flowers of Mozart's composition never grew in greater profusion, rich and rare, than at Vienna. The excitement of an imperial court, its variety of musical men and musical tastes, employed his mind incessantly on new models in music; and when shortly after his death a void began to be felt, his chief friends, Prince Liechowsky, Baron van Swieten, &c., received Beethoven with open arms; and the same hospitality and distinction which Mozart had enjoyed, passed to his successor by right of inheritance. At the same tables, in the same carriages, at the same pianofortes, among the old companions of Mozart, Beethoven may be seen; and hopes revive in the promising genius of the new comer, that the regeneration of music will not be left incomplete. But we may here retrace some of those influences which set Mozart's invention in peculiar activity at Vienna.

Van Swieten, the eccentric physician of Maria Theresa, lived here in greater credit on the strength of the excellent constitution of that princess than perhaps his pills and draughts merited. He was very fond of music, understood it scientifically, had an orchestra frequently in his house, and a better listener to fugues never sat in self-concentration and delight by the side of a player. Fugues of Bach and Handel formed after mass a regular part of the Sunday morning service at the Baron's; Mozart was the performer, and he took so much interest in this musician's music, that when he played for his own diversion at home, he scarcely ever touched anything else. Still his reverence for the past did not lead him to pedantry, or to lose sight of the advance of his own day in elegant melodious taste.

We are in the physician's music-room.

"This sonata in the style of Handel, with its introduction and fugue," observes Van Swieten to his friend, "seems to me a very complete example of the individuality of your workmanship. You show Handel and yourself too. I have set others the same task, who have either produced what was not at all like their original, or else a servile copy."

"The composer who attempts to borrow the pen of any great master," returned Mozart, "must first possess a well-pronounced, distinct style of his own. An artistic imitation only pleases by such a resemblance to the composer imitated as satisfies the imagination that he might himself have written it at an advanced stage of existence. Merely to copy a composer's modulations and peculiarities, is to produce such a dull imitation as is allied rather to the unpleasant likeness of a wax model, than to the spirited representation of a fine portrait."

"And yet the allegande and courante in this sonata," said Van Swieten, "are such exquisite gems, that I can scarcely imagine Handel sufficiently refined in instrumental music to produce them. The fusion of the old and new is admirably accomplished, and makes perfect music. I wish, my dear Mozart, that you may get our German composers out of the horse-in-the-mill track which they pursue, not only in their music, but in the series of their movements, where the same allegro, the same slow movements, &c., follow in eternal procession. Now this is a formality which should be broken through. I perceive that your pianoforte tastes of opera music, church and organ music, the symphony, the quartet. This mode is extremely suggestive, and will in time render the pianoforte a perfect microcosm of the great world of harmony."

"It is, as I take it," said the composer, "just the business which the present age of music demands. The pianoforte must hereafter fill the concert-room, the theatre, the church, with accomplished hearers; it must exhibit music in all styles, and in a perpetual variety of forms. It will thus make the fortune of composers when kings have no longer places or pensions to give them. But there is much to do. People are now only beginning to see into the significance of notes apart from words or a scene on the stage; yet in instrumental music a few bars more or less make a serious difference to a composition."

Ferdinand Ries has informed us in his notices on Beethoven, as a curious example of the deep speculations of that master on symmetry and effect in instrumental music, that he one day received in a letter from Vienna a couple of dotted crotchets, which Beethoven instructed him to insert in a sonata long before published, as a new and improved commencement of the same. He was quite surprised at the effect of these two notes. Beethoven certainly worked out many of the theories of Mozart with a strong fellow feeling in beauty, yet with a manner entirely his own.

We now follow Van Swieten into a room in the palace where Joseph II. sometime recreated himself with musical talk and criticism. The emperor turns over the pages of a four-handed fugue on the desk of the pianoforte, with the words, "See, something struck out afresh from the mint of Mozart. He wrote this to please the countess Thun and Metastasio's niece; the four hands allow the parts to go smoothly, and the bass to come in like the pedals of the great organ at St. Stephen's, when Albrechtsberger performs a voluntary. The ladies played it last evening; and Clementi, who listened, said that it was an admirable composition, but that it wanted an introduction."

"Mozart thought otherwise," said the physician, and would probably reply, "Why should we always make the same beginnings?" A company who will not cease talking through crashing chords, will sometimes have their attention piqued by a quiet début; even a succession of single notes. Your Majesty may recollect Mozart's agreeable innovation, in commencing the overture to Figaro allegro and piano: how hushed and full of suspense and interest it rendered the house."

"The musical ideas of Clementi," returned the emperor, "are, in your opinion, too subservient to the formal and conventional. His admirable playing is much cried up by the Italians here, but even I can find that he has not Mozart's melody."

"Clementi," replied the physician, "has many original qualifications of the musician, but his science is not wholly free from dryness and pedantry. In every kind of serious music, melody, design, and modulation, must concur to produce pleasure; and certainly it is the praise of Germany, in the instrumental art, to have united science with the graces. I see in this volume of pianoforte duets, three complete specimens of fine music under various designs. The first in F."

"Haydn, I remember, called it a symphony in disguise," said the emperor.

"It is indeed such fine music, that when it is well played, you forget the players. This other in C, beginning in unison and fortissimo, is intended expressly to show two performers of equal talent in alternate solos; the one in F minor is a mixture of the orchestral and inspired organ style. It differs from everything else by its author, and is one of the noblest monuments of his ambition and powers."

"That piece originated," said the emperor, "in the large mechanical organ which Count F— erected in the hall of his country-house, near Prague. The times of playing were regulated by clockwork. The count was a humorist, and said to the man of Silbermann's, who built the organ: 'We shan't want for clever machinery or good pipes, but where shall we get the music, that we may listen to twice a day for a month without being tired?'"

The physician smiled, and continued, "I think the organ-builder found out the right shop. He had but to explain what was wanted, and to say that his clarinet, his flute, his bassoon stops, would be of exquisite quality, to inspire the imagination of Mozart. So to make his work the more durable, the musician selected as his models the two greatest masters of the organ, Handel and J. S. Bach. But he has reserved a place for himself; the prelude and the postlude, in which he has enveloped Handel, are his own, and so is the adagio in that second piece, which breaks the figure in two, and prepares so agreeably to introduce it a second time with new treatment."

We now enter Mozart's home. He is writing in haste, and throwing the sheets of his music on the floor to dry. His wife and sister return from abroad, and tell him with much pleasure that they have been at the Jesuit's church hearing the beautiful symphonies of Haydn, called the "Seven last words"—that they have seen Haydn, who conducted the performance himself; that he is coming to visit them in the evening. Mozart expressed his delight. "I know his famous new work, and I will please him." At night Haydn is seated near his friend, who is at the pianoforte. "Now, Haydn, you shall hear one of my 'last words';" and he extemporizes an admirable adagio in B minor.

Haydn acknowledges his successful and complimentary imitation. "If you can make such music on a single 'word,' one may well wish that instead of 'seven last words,' there had been seventy. But for ladies this music may be too solemn and severe. There is Mademoiselle Sophie, who will be glad to hear something tender and sentimental." Play the clarinet movement you wrote for Stadler," said the composer's wife. Haydn wishes to possess this beautiful piece. "I think I must write it out for the pianoforte, and call it 'Miscellaneous Romance.'" "I am afraid that your husband," continued the musician, addressing his wife, "will be thought a great scapmonger."

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of "Miriam's Song of Triumph," a Cantata for Soprano solo and chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

The Diarist Abroad. No. 5.

BERLIN, SEPT. 20. — Here beginneth a discourse, the text of which is: "Are you going to write the result of your researches in German or in English?"

When this question is asked me I smile — smile to think anybody can suppose me capable of the folly of thinking four or five years in Germany sufficient to enable me to write a book in the language of the country. Think of this matter a moment.

How many of the first hundred students in any literary institution in America that you may meet, do you suppose will ever attain eminence as writers of their mother tongue? Leaving for the moment entirely out of view the question whether they are men of original thoughts and ideas, how many of them will attain such a mastery of the language as to express their ideas with precision and elegance. Listen to the first fifty sermons, speeches or legal arguments that come within your reach, with a view simply to the style of their authors, and how many of the fifty could you find it in your conscience to praise? Why, a high degree of precision and elegance in the choice and collocation of words, in the form and succession of sentences and paragraphs, so as clearly and distinctly to convey the picture or idea in the mind of the writer or speaker to that of the reader or auditor, is so rarely found, that he who has attained it, even if his thoughts be not very new or striking, is at once a marked man and is in constant demand from the publishers of periodicals and lyceum committees. And yet your hundred students have, from the first opening of the infant's ear to sounds, been constantly hearing the English language spoken, in the social circle, from the pulpit, at the bar, in the public assembly; since they learned their letters have read it in books and newspapers; have, through their whole life, breathed in it as in the atmosphere.

Nay, more; while still but children, a text-book of English Grammar was put in their hands to study, and periodical compositions were required of them in which the rules of grammar were to be reduced to practice. At a later period they studied the philosophy of language, directly or indirectly, in the lessons of their Latin and Greek grammars and reading books; and to crown the whole, as the final foundation for their future success in making their own tongue an instrument of power, in their sophomore year (at least in Harvard College) they begin a course of study, which, starting from the point of the simplest grammatical rules, carries them onward with constant practice in writing, through the canons of rhetoric and logic, and is spread over a period of two or three years.

And yet, I ask again, how many of these hundred students, will, in after years, prove that they have really acquired a mastery over their mother tongue?

"But," you will say, "we have great writers, who have never made all these studies," and you can name Franklin, and Marshall, Buckingham, Greeley, and others. True enough, but think of the constant practice they had in writing for years and years, and recollect that such men are men of a taste, which leads them to the closest study of the master writers of their language.

Now permit me to address my discourse to some single individual, leaving the rest to make the application to themselves, as far as it does apply.

You, Thompson, live in a country town of four or five thousand inhabitants. Some bookseller is about to publish a Gazetteer of your state, and a letter is sent to one of your citizens, requesting a topographical and historical notice of the place. How many persons of the thousands within its limits do you suppose able to write a satisfactory article in reply, viewing it only as a specimen of English composition? A dozen names occur to you at once; perhaps a score; or even a hundred. How is it with the other thousands? Would you undertake it yourself?

I?—replies Thompson, no indeed! I make no pretensions to be able to write.

And yet you have been breathing the language all your life. But, Thompson, you are musical—I address you personally for this reason—you play the organ on Sundays, give lessons on the pianoforte, are the music-teacher in the academy and high school for girls, have half-a-dozen tunes in the "Holy Banjo"—Prof. Pipes' last new book—have published the "Catnip Waltz" (with only one measure too much in the first movement, so that it cannot be danced), and are editor of the "Juvenile Whistle", a musical text-book for schools and academies. But you are not satisfied with yourself. You feel that there is something in music higher and nobler than all this. The months you have occasionally spent in Boston in the concert season have made you feel that something is yet to be learned before you can wield the orchestra and great vocal forces as a means of expressing musical ideas.

Let me tell you a story—no story, only an incident with a moral.

A gentleman of a good deal of musical taste, and one who has had much to do in the way of music in schools, asked me why I did not write some tunes.

"I cannot write tunes," said I, with some degree of surprise at the question.

"Why not? When you read a fine piece of lyric poetry does it not awaken some corresponding musical idea in your mind?"

"Very often; and here is just the difficulty—to grasp that musical idea, hold it fast, and write it down." Well, in the course of the conversation it appeared that his conception of writing music and mine were so different that it required mutual explanation before each understood the other.

He reads the lyric stanza, a scrap of melody comes into his mind, and this he, by degrees, draws out into the due length and proportions of the stanza. Then with the assistance of Prof. This or Prof. That's work on "Harmony and Thoroughbass"—a book to carry in the pocket—he draws out some notes which the bass can sing, some more for the tenor and the alto. The tune is finished. That is, having got a melody, the other parts are made according to the "recipe"—as the apothecaries say.

My conception of the matter was this: I read a stanza of poetry which touches my feelings; with my mind's ear I hear a flow of corresponding melody and harmony, all as one thing—an integral whole. Confining ourselves, for the present, to the simple psalm tune, I feel how the four voices of the choir start from some given harmonic point, swell and die away, the parts now approaching, now diverging from each other, here a voice dwelling upon some long note, while others throw in some delicate figure of ornament or expression, here some powerful discord, answering to the text, followed by harmony doubly delicious, from the previous crash of voices. I hear some musical phrase as it is handed from one part to another—perhaps now a solo, now a duet—in short, the piece of music, as a whole, is in my mind. But I have never studied composition, so as to be able to grasp this succession and combination of tones, and hence it is impossible for me to analyze it into its constituent elements, and write out their signs or notes.

This idea was new to him, and I have found since, by careful observation, that it is equally new to many others; and yet every musician will think it absurd for me to devote so much space to so self-evident a thought, as it is to him.

How is it with you, Thompson?

But, as said before, you wish to become a composer in a higher sense of the term than being a mere maker of tunes; you wish to handle the grand chorus and orchestra. My idea of writing for the orchestra, I will illustrate thus: you know the noble old melody by Swan, to the words:

"Why do we mourn departing friends," &c.

Whenever I think of this melody, and it is very often in my mind, I hear in the second part (in my mind's ear), a full orchestra accompanying it. I hear the wind instruments giving it with colossally triumphant power, while the stringed band is filling up the grand and massive outline with figures, which combine to form in the general effect the very intoxication of joy. So strong is my admiration for this theme, so invigorating, grand, and beautiful the music of which, in my fancy, it forms the basis, that, were I a young man with time and means to study, I would almost devote myself to the theory and practise of composition, just to be able sometime to write it out, and place it in musical notes upon paper.

Think, Thompson, what the power to do this presupposes.

1. That the ordinary rules of counterpoint are as familiar to me as those of grammar, so that I write my music with as little thought of consecutive fifths, as I have at this moment of nouns and verbs.

2. That I have all the different characters and expressions of the various orchestral instruments, with their powers, as distinctly before my mind, as I have the various cries of the different domestic animals in a farm yard.

3. That I have so studied the mechanism and modes of handling all these instruments, as to be able to write for each in such a manner that the performer can understand and reproduce just the musical thought, which I intend to allot to his instrument.

4. That I have made myself so familiar with the almost infinite variety of effects which may be produced by the different combination of these instruments, as to be able when I have once grasped my musical thought, to hold it fast and coolly think out, on the twenty or more staves of my score, just what notes, given to the horns, trumpets, flutes, clarinets, trombones, bassoons, oboes, violins, violas and the rest, will result in that tide of melody and harmony, which I am feeling. And

5. The most important of all, that I have so studied orchestral writing, that I can grasp and hold fast my idea.

Are you equal to this, Thompson?

I trow not.

As I do not believe it possible to get such a command of any foreign tongue, as one has of his own, by the study of books, and as in most cases it requires long and severe study to be a master of his own, so I do not believe it possible to acquire that command of the orchestra, supposed above, from books alone, or, except in some cases of great genius where one has created orchestral music from infancy, without long continued and laborious study, — and even this will not give it, where the genius fails.

I was reading an evening or two since of Baron van Swieten, the patron of Mozart and Beethoven. He was a man of acknowledged high literary taste, and learning, and as such was at the head of the Imperial Library at Vienna. As a critic of fine and unerring taste his reputation was enviable. From infancy he had lived and breathed in music. He wrote the text to Haydn's Seasons, drawing it from Thompson's poem. That text, without grammatical fault, was absurdly bad. He wrote eight symphonies, as faultless as his poetry — but they were, said Haydn, as stiff as himself.

If it be almost impossible for an adult to so learn the German language, that an attempt to write a book in it would not draw a smile from every scholar, if to master your own language requires such study, how much more difficult must it be for you, Thompson, who have come to manhood without hearing an orchestra, except occasionally, when in New York or Boston, to become a master of its language?

Was it not Correggio, who, sunk in ecstatic thought before a painting, suddenly exclaimed, "I too am a painter!" and in his adult years became one?

There may also be Correggio's in music — but not many.

Mozart was a virtuoso on the violin as well as the pianoforte at seven years. Handel, Bach, Haydn and Beethoven grew up from early childhood in the midst of music; all four were for long periods members of orchestras. Music they learned as they learned their mother tongue, and its rules they studied as they studied their German and Latin grammars. I know not where the Correggio of music can be found in history. Now, Thompson, let us pass to the practical application. You have made up your mind to come to Europe to study music in its higher forms, and wish me to give you some hints. I can only speak from observation and hearsay — I can give no experience of my own, but can give a plenty of experience from men here, whose opinions are authority on the subject. All agree that in such cases as yours — I have the authority of Liszt for one — the student must select a city where, through the multitude of concerts, he can be constantly hearing orchestral music, oratorios and operas. Berlin is of all cities the one. Secondly, the student must work upon strict — the strictest — counterpoint, until its rules are habits, just like grammatical rules in his mother tongue. Thirdly, he must study pianoforte or organ — not to be a virtuoso — but so as to feel the full effect of all sorts of contrapuntal relations. Fourthly, he must study the violin or cello, until he can play in an orchestra, and there make up by hard labor and constant observation for the want of opportunities in early life to gain that knowledge of effects, which can only be drawn from long familiarity with them. There is no more a royal road to musical than to mathematical learning. You can with comparative ease learn to write music by rule — to make music per recipe; but such music will strike every musician as being stiff as yourself. To gain your object will be expensive. You must have private instruction from men of great learning and large experience, and each man must be paid. For your contrapuntal studies and for the organ or pianoforte, Haupt is your man. For the violin there are a hundred good teachers, but it will be well for you to study that instrument with a teacher in one of the music schools, in order to play afterward in the private orchestra of the school. But there is this for your comfort; such a teacher as would charge you three to five dollars per lesson in Boston or New York, will cost you from one to two here.

Take a hint or two. Do not think of astonishing anybody here by any of the productions, which your neighbors at home all compliment as being "first-rate music." True, the musicians here may be astonished at them, but whether that emotion will be exactly complimentary, may be a question. Do not bring any very large amount of conceit and self-esteem with you, because that is a kind of starch that loses its consistency in this damp climate. Do not tell Haupt what great things you can do, — for wonderful as it may seem, he will soon find out without telling. Do not go away from him disgusted and dissatisfied, if after he has examined your grand Te Deum, (which made such a sensation when sung in your singing society, and for which your neighbors talk of erecting an image to your honor) he should say, "very good indeed", and then give you a lesson in two-part counterpoint. Depend upon it Haupt knows better than you do — if not, why study with him?

My dear Thompson, can I do anything for you?

Musical Chit-Chat.

We yield about all our editorial space to-day to our Correspondence, which is unusually rich, and to our 'Diarist's' excellent advice to young would-be great composers. As it is, much of our correspondence must lie over. . . . The lovers of classical chamber music will rejoice to learn that the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will commence their concert on the 18th of this month. . . . There is no better practice, for the more advanced student of the piano-forte, than that of the sonatas, &c. of Mozart, Beethoven and others, composed for piano and violin. Not a few lady amateurs in our city, have been in the habit of taking 'accompaniment lessons' in this way of some of our best musicians, who, while accompanying with the violin, initiate the pupil into the beauties and the right way of rendering those admirable compositions. We would commend Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, whose card will be found in our advertising columns, as a most competent and gentlemanly person for this service. . . . Mr. ZERDAHELYI, we are happy to learn, has found inducements to remain in Boston as a teacher of the piano. . . . Mr. KIELBLOCK's return to his pupils is delayed, we presume only for a few days. He was to have sailed from Bremen by the steamer 'New York' on the 9th ult., and we do not yet hear of her arrival.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB gave their first parlor concert in Cambridge, on Wednesday evening, under their new leader, Mr. SCHULTZE, who, while lacking in the fire and energy that characterized Mr. Fries, has excellencies of his own, smoothness of tone and brilliant execution, that please some hearers more. There is no more delightful mode of passing an occasional evening, for a circle of music-loving friends and neighbors, than is afforded by these soirées of this club, and we allude to this one, not for the purpose of criticism, but to direct the attention of lovers of chamber music in the city and its vicinity, at the very beginning of the musical season, to this club. It is not a difficult matter to get a subscription for a sufficient number of tickets to fill comfortably an ordinary parlor, for a few evenings, and thus enjoy so great a treat in such a pleasant way. We give the programme of the concert alluded to above.

1. Quartet in D, No. 63, Haydn.—2. Adagio from the Second Symphony in D, Beethoven.—3. Song from the Album. (For the Piano.) Arranged by T. Ryan. Schumann.—4. Adagio from the Posthumous Quartet in D minor, Schubert.—5. Aria from the Second Act of Idomeneo, Arranged for Quintet. Mozart.—6. Quartet in B flat. (No. 9, Op. 18.) Beethoven.—7. Adagio Nocturno. From Midsummer Night's Dream. Mendelssohn.—8. Aria (Non mi dir). From Don Giovanni. Arranged by T. Ryan. Mozart.

We hear of an amusing incident which recently happened to the well-known vocalist, W. R. DEMPSTER. It appears that Mr. D. arrived at a town in Western New York for the purpose of giving a concert. The landlord of the hotel at which he located himself became at once cognizant of a genuine practical joke in embryo; for another person was his guest, who gave the same name, claimed the same profession, and visited the town for the same object. There was the name on the register, three days back, of Wm. R. Dempster, Vocalist, and at this moment the genuine W. R. D. entered his name. The landlord handed the latter a programme, setting out in glowing colors, interspersed with any amount of fine points, comprising all the exclamatory interrogations and quotations usually found in a job printing office, a "Grand Concert!" This was quite unexpected by Mr. D, of course, and various questionings, surmises, and conjecturings arose as to the why, what, when and wherefore. Had his shadow travelled on in advance and made all these preparations for his own coming? What an accommodating shadow! And had this same obliging shadow written his name on the hotel record, gone out that very moment to open the hall, try the piano, and — perhaps — take the receipts and journey on to some other place? If so, he must be after that shadow. Remarking to the landlord that when the apparent owner of the hand that wrote "Dempster" first in the book, made his appearance, he would like to see him, our friend D. directed his attention to the discussion of a work on tables, illustrated with many plates.

The bogus got ear of the new arrival, and came at once to the conclusion that, however easy and agreeable it might be for him, as W. R. Dempster, to give a concert "alone and unattended" it was quite a different and more difficult task to do so with another man of the same name and profession, and, in fact, claiming to be the same individual, in town. This conclusion acted as a motor power to his personal corporation, and dashing down to a stable, he hired a horse and took a ride for his health, whistling, we presume, as well as he could for the jolting of the beast, the favorite air of "The Rogue's March," leaving the outraged keeper of the hall to turn off the gas, close the doors, and pocket the loss.

The people, at first somewhat excited by the deception that had been practiced upon them, were soon pacified on learning that the real Dempster was in town, and that the failure of the counterfeit would be immediately followed by the success of the genuine.

Mr. Dempster should have introduced into his programme that night Schubert's "Doppelgänger," a song based on the superstition of a man's seeing his own "double."

The friends of Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, late of the "Musical Exchange," will be glad to learn by the following, from the Transcript, that he is enjoying renewed health, and is still active in the cause of musical instruction:

New Method for the Piano.—Mr. Nathan Richardson, the celebrated author of the "Modern School for the Piano," still remains in Warren, Mass., a quiet little village in the western part of the State, where he is availing himself of the best means for re-establishing his health, which is now much improved. He is devoting his leisure hours in finishing and perfecting a new work upon a system which has occupied several years of reflection. We understand it will eclipse all his previous efforts, as it is upon an entirely new and original plan, which will also embrace all the essential points in other Instruction Books. The title reads thus: "Richardson's New Method for the Pianoforte," being an improvement upon his celebrated "Modern School" in adaptation, progression and facility of comprehension, comprising a thorough course of instruction upon a new and practical plan recently discovered from critical observations, extended experience and long meditation.

Mr. Richardson has written one method for the Pianoforte, which has been acknowledged by the most eminent musical judges (as Thalberg, and others) to be superior to all previous instruction books. It has reached many editions of thousands of copies, and is now in use in most of the best institutions in the country. Since the publication of that work, he has been studying for an improvement, and has enjoyed the advantage of many different opinions on the progression, classification, &c., of different parts of the work, until at last he has discovered the great desideratum, and he now feels confident that the present method cannot be excelled. We shall expect something from Mr. Richardson's pen very soon which will stand the severest musical criticism. This work, we understand, will be ready for the press in a few weeks. The publisher is not yet decided upon.

The Publisher, we understand, is found. Messrs. O. Ditson & Co. have taken the work in hand.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Nov. 2.—For once we have an Opera enterprise, that is a genuine paying success. Mr. Ullman's campaign at the Academy of Music has so far resulted in a complete triumph, for the enterprising little manager. The building has been crowded night after night, and $3,000 houses are nothing strange.

Il Trovatore has been revived with quite a new cast, embracing PICCOLOMINI, ANGRI, STEFANI and FLORENZA. The little Sienese prima donna sang the role of Leonora better than was expected, making some fine points, especially at the end of the second act; yet as a general thing her rendition of the role is not up to the mark. Angri was received with enthusiasm and sang nobly. Florenza, the new baritone, is a real gem. To a high baritone voice, reaching into the tenor, he joins an excellent method, and exhibits cultivation and taste. He does not shout, and in this respect forms a pleasing contrast to Stefani. This latter artist greatly marred the success of the opera, by his wretched singing; he was too hoarse to sing decently up to G, and the audience did not hesitate to express their disapprobation in a very decided manner. Yet in the final air of the 3d act, he temporarily overcame his hoarseness, and sang with such force and vigor as to receive a double call before the curtain. In the last act the frog in his throat again overcame him, and the fickle audience greeted his forlorn efforts with laughter and sibilation.

Friday night GAZZANIGA sings in Lucresia, and the management have in preparation Don Giovanni, with Gazzaniga, Piccolomini, Mdle. Ghioni (a new arrival), Formes, and Stefani in the principal parts.

The Fulton arrived this morning from Havre with a large batch of musical importations. Among them is Mme. LAURDE, who was very sick during the whole of the voyage, and could not contribute her talents, as did the other musicians on board, to enliven the tedium of the trip by impromptu concerts. The Fulton, by the way, is one of the most favored steamships in a musical way, seldom making a voyage without some eminent musicians among her passengers.

Piccolomini, who is a devout catholic, has taken a pew in St. Stephen's Church, in 28th Street; between this church and that of St. Francis Xavier in 16th street, there exists a kind of musical rivalry. The pastor of the former, Rev. Mr. Cumming, is a man of excellent musical education, and during a recent visit to Europe he obtained a quantity of rare music for the use of his choir. COLETTI, the basso, formerly of various operatic companies, sings here, and Miss SCONCIA, daughter of a well known music teacher of our city, is (or was till recently) the first soprano, while the other singers all possess great merit. The music sung by this choir is of a varied character. Donizetti's operas (especially his Favorita) are often dissected and pressed into service, and the rendition of the various morceaux would do justice to any operatic troupe extant.

The Church of St. Francis Xavier (familiarily known as the Jesuits' Church) does not possess such a fine ensemble of singers, but there is one lady—Miss HADLEY, I believe is her name—who has one of the most angelic voices it is possible to hear. There is a rich sympathetic pathos in it that I have never heard surpassed either on or off the stage, and many attend the church solely to listen to its exquisite melody. Then they have Mr. BERGE as organist at the Jesuits' Church, and such an organist! You would think, to hear him, that he was two or three organists rolled into one, for it seems scarcely possible that a single individual could produce such brilliant orchestral effects even out of that prince of instruments, the organ. Mr. Berge is, without doubt, the most effective organ player of the florid style, that we have in the city. He is also a prolific composer, writing almost all the music sung by his choir. His compositions are of the Italian School, and would soon give him an eminent reputation as a composer, did he not retain them for the exclusive use of his own church and choir. As a whole, it is difficult to decide as to whether St. Stephen's or the Jesuits Church is entitled to the palm for superiority in music. They are each crowded every Sunday by strangers,—Protestants as well as Catholics,—and the music is superior (of its style) to that to be heard in almost every church either here or abroad,—for few churches of Italy possess such efficient choirs or splendid organs as are in these two New York Churches.

TROVATOR.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. OCT. 26.—The first concert of our "Philharmonic Society" comes off next Saturday evening, and as I shall be absent at that time, I must content myself with giving you the best report I can in advance.

The Orchestral pieces which are under rehearsal, I have already given you in a former letter. The soloists are to consist of Madame GAZZANIGA, Herr SCHREINER, cornet, and KEIFER, clarinet.

As the programme is not entirely made up at this writing, I cannot give you it in full, but what the concert is to be, in point of character and real excellence, is very clearly indicated by this most excellent array of talent, and certainly speaks well for the good sense and musical taste of the gentlemen who manage these matters.

The fears I expressed in my last in relation to Mr. EISEL, have only, I am happy to say, proved in part well founded. From letters received here by his friends we learn that Mr. E. has received no other injury than a slight attack of the same disease which obliged him to give up, altogether, labor of every kind some two years ago, and seek relief in a voyage to Europe. I believe the pneumonia or something of that nature was the particular disease with which he was afflicted; and the three hours exposure in the water after he jumped from the burning "Austria" till he was picked up by the boat from the "Maurice," together with the quantity of salt water swallowed, brought on again such alarming symptoms of the old trouble, that on his arrival at Fayal, Mr. Eisfeld deemed it best to follow the advice of his physician and remain at Fayal until next Spring.

Mr. NOLL will conduct the concert on Saturday; but for the remainder of the concerts, the society intend to engage Mr. BERGMANN, who has also been engaged for the concerts of the "New York Philharmonic."

A public meeting has been held in relation to the new Music Hall of which I spoke in my last, and a committee of twenty of our most wealthy and enterprising citizens appointed to solicit subscriptions. I hope and fully expect soon to be able to say that the amount necessary ($125,000) has been raised, and the work of building begun.

BELLINI.

CINCINNATI, OCT.—Our musical season commenced this month, with three concerts, under the auspices of Herr FORMES. The music performed on these occasions was above the average of those overdone operatic selections, perseveringly forced upon us by the "stars" of the musical hemisphere—Madame So-and-so singing Casta Diva (for example), because Signora Such-an-one sang it; and Mdle. Such-another repeating the dose, because it had been administered by her predecessors; while all our visitors, from soprano-sfogato down to basso-profondo, are evidently impressed with the conviction that it is a matter of necessity to sing as much as they possibly can of the contents of those inevitable "concert-books," whose appearance is simultaneous with that of each new "troupe"; every edition bearing a family resemblance, so strong as to be absolutely identical with every other.

Formes was warmly and sympathetically received; the German element in our population displaying itself largely among his audiences. We scarcely think that his bold phrasing and mellow equality of tone were fully understood here; but the slight disappointment experienced by some of Herr Formes' hearers may be traceable to the fact, that he displayed a tendency, not unfrequent, and painfully perceptible, to flatten the tone. The orchestra, under the direction of ANSCHUTZ, was a most welcome element in these concerts. PERRING sang acceptably, as usual. Of the fairer portion of the party we cannot say much.

Of home performances, which are, beyond a doubt, of far greater importance as regards the genuine cultivation and appreciation of music, than any passing displays of artistic excellence, we have had but one, as yet; the opening concert of the "Cecilia Society." It was highly satisfactory to all participators, active and passive; evidencing a decided improvement on last season, particularly in the orchestra, which gave convincing proof of the indefatigable perseverance that guides its efforts. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

1. Overture "Cosi fan tutte," Mozart. 2. Chorus of the Fairies, from Oberon; Weber. 3. Aria: "On song's bright pinions;" Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. 4. 1st Concerto for the Violin; De Beriot. 5. Chorus, "Oh thou that tellest good tidings," from Messiah; Handel. 6. Solo for the Piano; Liszt.

PART II.

7. Overture No. 3; Kalliwoda. 8. Chorus: "Kyrie eleison," from the Mass in C; Beethoven. 9. Aria from Don Giovanni; Mozart. 10. Chorus: "O Isis and Osiris," from the Magic Flute; Mozart. 11. Caprice in E, for the Piano; Mendelssohn Bartholdy. 12. Chorus: "Hallelujah," from Messiah; Handel.

The Kalliwoda overture, No. 3, was rendered with verve and animation. In accompaniment, this orchestra has made a considerable advance; following the singers, and not, as is too often the case, struggling for pre-eminence with a determination worthy of a better cause. Of the choruses, the most effective were: "O, Isis and Osiris," from the "Magic Flute"; well sung, with ensemble and solidity; Beethoven's Kyrie, from the Mass in C, and Handel's "Hallelujah"—that master-piece of religious jubilation, clear, strong, and sublime as one of the Elgin marbles, or a stanza of Dante. Had the singers been more unanimous in rendering the degrees of piano and forte, the impression made by these choruses would have been more favorable. We could have wished that the violin solo had been something newer than the so often heard first Concerto of De Beriot; why cannot our violinists present us with less hacknied solos, or with some of Beethoven's sonatas, which receive less attention than they deserve? Mendelssohn's Lied, "On wings of Song," was gracefully and smoothly sung; Liszt's pianoforte Cantique d'Amour, from the "Harmónies poétiques et religieuses," was executed with a warmth and finish rare among amateurs. The aria from "Don Juan" was finely conceived and sung; but we regretted that the hall of the Society was not large enough for the full development of so powerful a voice. Mendelssohn's Capriccio in E received an interpretation worthy of its classic elegance—and this is high praise.

These concerts cannot be too highly estimated as regards the influence they exert upon the musical taste of our city; they present an excellence and variety in their programmes that has never been equaled by any local society; and good music, rendered even with occasional imperfections, does more to further the real interests of Art than all the virtuosity of performers without conscience, who, displaying their own mechanical dexterity in compositions that degrade themselves and the art they profess to honor, corrupt public taste, in place of elevating it towards a purer and nobler level.

BERLIN, SEPT. 26.—It is not easy to describe how great a loss to me the death of Prof. DEHN proves. In everything relating to musical bibliography, whether historic, theoretic or aesthetic, I had had to refer to him with the certainty that the information which he gave me was trustworthy. Through him, during my former residence here, my attention was called to a multitude of works of whose value, in many cases, existence even, I was not aware. Happily I was wise enough to profit by my intercourse with him, and the more from a fear, which I then expressed to some of our common friends, that his too constant and never tiring application to mental labor, might soon be followed by serious consequences.

From my window I looked down into his study. When I arose in the cool winter mornings he would be at his table with his lamps burning; when I blew out my light at night his still burned. My fears have proved prophetic. From the position which Dehn has occupied as a teacher and general musical scholar he is worthy of being made more fully known to our musical public than he is now. To this end, I beg leave to make up a letter from the notices which have appeared here of his life and labors, with certain additions from other sources.

In the latter part of the last century there lived in Altona (near Hamburg) a merchant of Jewish descent, named Israel, who, notwithstanding a great many changes of fortune, succeeded at length in establishing his business upon as firm a basis as his own well-deserved reputation for honor and honesty, and in gaining an honorable position among the richest and wisest merchants of the city. His oldest daughter was betrothed to a Hamburg merchant; on the evening before the wedding a young Polish Jew, a far-off connection of the Israel family, Solomon Dehn by name, appeared with letters from his parents beseeching their distant cousin to give the young man employment and aid him to make his way in the world. As a connection of the family it was proper that he should be present at the wedding ceremony—but his dress? In this extremity, a sister of the bride equipped him with ruffles in his bosom and upon his wrists, and thus he figured as one of the relatives on the occasion. His education had been sadly neglected. To make up for lost time he devoted all the means which he could command and all his spare time, from the employment which Israel gave him, to the purchase of books and to study. In the modern languages and in arithmetic he made remarkable progress, and no less in business acquirements. Israel treated him as a son, when of age set him up in business as a money broker, soon afterward gave him the daughter (of the ruffles) to wife, and not long afterward took him into partnership. A younger brother of Solomon in the mean time had come from Poland, had been kindly received by Israel, had been educated for a mercantile life and was now also taken into the company, which bore the name of "Israel, Dehn & Company."

The position to which Dehn attained as a man and merchant may be understood by giving the names of a few of the men, who, at a later period became his intimate friends and frequent guests at his table. Among them were Bernadotte, (when he was governor of Hamburg), Bourrienne, Prince Wittenstein afterward Police Minister in Berlin, and the Duke of Mecklenburg, who, during the time that the French had possession of his duchy, was long in Altona, and used to send up his name when he breakfasted with Dehn, as "John the Landless."

As Dehn grew wealthy, he gave free course to his taste in literature and art, collected a very fine library and completely covered the walls of a large room with paintings and engravings of high value. In another room, especially arranged for music, was a splendid Broadwood piano-forte, a violin, viola, and violoncello, and a fine collection of music. In another room for ordinary use, and for the practice of the children, was a square piano-forte. Dehn's house, very modest in appearance outwardly, was a house of literature and art within.

The children were three in number, two sons and a daughter, of whom the latter was the youngest, and Siegfried Wilhelm (whose death calls out this letter,) the second. He was born upon the 25th of February, 1800. Another date is given (Jan. 25th 1799) by a writer in the Spenersche Zeitung, who professes to have had his materials for his article from Dehn himself; but the former, I have been assured by the widow and sister-in-law of the professor, is correct.

Solomon Dehn, having known by experience the evils of a youth passed in poverty and ignorance, spared no pains or expense in the education of his children; and in this, their moral, intellectual and artistic culture were alike regarded. In his later years the professor was perhaps almost as remarkable for his knowledge of engravings of all schools and eras, as in the department more particularly his own. For instance, an engraving, which I have often examined with ever increasing admiration at his house, one of the finest specimens of Rembrandt's skill, came into his possession in this manner:—"I was once travelling," said he to me, "by treckschuit on a canal in Holland, and stepped into a small grocery to get some lump sugar. A woman produced a piece wrapped up in an old engraving. I wished but for a small piece, but seeing at a glance the marks of Rembrandt's hand, upon her asking me how much I would have, 'Well' said I, 'what is the entire piece worth?' She told me. 'I'll take the whole of it, just as it is!' What became of the sugar, I do not know; and the picture I sent to Paris, had it carefully cleaned and mounted, and now I have refused four hundred thalers for it!"

The musical teacher engaged by Solomon Dehn for his children, was Paul Winneberger, first violoncellist of the orchestra of the French theatre in Hamburg—the same man whose symphony, when he was in the service of the Prince of Wallenstein, was to his surprise performed at sight, by the Orchestra of the Elector of Cologne, as related by Junker in his account of his visit to Mergentheim. Winneberger's object in his instructions was not to make virtuosos of the children, but to implant and nurture a true musical taste to lay a solid foundation for real musical attainments. Before the future professor was thirteen years old, the three children played trios, the elder brother taking the violin, Wilhelm the violoncello, and the sister the piano-forte.

Meantime the father's business was continually expanding and his name was becoming a powerful one upon the Exchange. An anecdote told by Herterich, a distinguished painter and intimate friend of Solomon Dehn, illustrates both the position to which the poor Polish Jew boy had attained, and his business character.

Russia wished to negotiate a loan at Amsterdam, Dehn was made the agent. He made the journey in a coach and invited Herterich to accompany him. From Altona to the boundary of Holland, Dehn was full of talk and apparently without thought of business; but instantly upon passing the line he threw himself into the corner of the carriage and hardly spoke. Soon after reaching Amsterdam he sat at his table four hours, all his faculties absorbed by his writing. Suddenly springing up he exclaimed to his friend, "Now I have finished, we can chat again." He had finished the report to the Russian government, and written it in the French language. Herterich, who read it, described it as a masterpiece, and affirmed that it was sent off next morning without the alteration of a word.

The rest next week.

* I do not feel absolutely certain that Dehn said he had refused 400 thalers for this picture, but very nearly so—at all events the Museum since his death has offered that sum and been refused. The subject of the engraving is "Christ healing the sick"—The picture is about 16 inches by 12.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Mother dear, good bye. J. R. Thomas. 25

This is a new ballad of this excellent and deservedly popular song-writer, which will exercise a strong claim upon the favor of the lovers of simple, touching family ballads.

Adeste Fideles. (Portuguese Evening Hymn). Solo and Chorus. 25

A new and greatly improved edition of this good old tune, which has heretofore only belonged to Collections, and could not be obtained separately, except in an abbreviated form.

Nearer to thee, my God. S. & Quar. T. Wood. 25

One of the finest sacred songs that ever were adapted to music.

Lizzie just over the way. Ballad. H. Millard. 25

A simple, but very graceful song, which has something of that charming quaintness about it, which is so much admired in Glover's song of "Kitty Tyrrell."

Morning wakens on Nevada. Moorish Ballad in the opera of "Leonora." W. H. Fry. 30

This is the first of the author's own edition of songs &c. in his Opera, with English and Italian words. This "Moorish Ballad" is one of its strongest numbers; a fine Romanza for a soprano voice.

Vocal Beauties of Verdi's "Aroldo." No. 1. And must I then before. (Ed io pure in fucina.) Duet. Soprano and Baritone. 50

The first of a number of gems from the last, really original Opera of the great Maestro, a duet, in the vein of the grand duet in "Traviata," 2nd act, between Violetta and the Germán, highly dramatic and full of fine points, especially for the baritone part, which is, as usual with Verdi, written so high, that it might be properly undertaken by a tenor voice.

Instrumental Music.

Tremolo Waltz. Albert W. Berg. 30

A charming composition, in that style for which the instructive works of this author are so highly estimated among young players. The leading idea has been borrowed from Rosellen's famous Tremolo-Reverie.

Sparkling Hock Galop. H. Sauer. 25

A brilliant, dashing galop, storming on with that reckless impetuosity, for which the Storm Galop has become the dancer's favorite galop. Requires a pretty smart player.

Como Quadrille. (Young Pupil's Pieces. No. 1.) Rimbault. 15

Sultan's Polka. " " " " 2, 15

Little pieces for the very first beginners, such as may be given to young pupils, whose ambition prompts them to ask the teacher for a "piece" which is not in their Instruction Book.

Books.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' GLEE BOOK. Consisting of nearly one hundred copyright Songs and Duets never before harmonized; and the choicest gems from the German and Italian. The whole arranged in a familiar style for the use of Singing Classes, Glee Clubs and the Social Circle. By Chs. Jarvis. 1.00

Special attention is solicited to the general features of this work, as possessing universal attractions. The copyright Songs, Duets, &c., comprise the best pieces of the leading publishers, inserted here by permission and contained in no other book. Of the gems of German and Italian Song, nothing need be said, as their beauties are universally known and admired; and their arrangement and collection in this form can not fail to be duly appreciated by every lover of a highly refined and classic style of music. Attention has been directed to the choice of words, and they will, in each case, be found elevated in sentiment and adapted to the great mass of the people. In a word, the "Young Folks' Glee Book" is intended to be of a superior class in every particular. A glance at the table of contents will convince any one that what it was intended to make it, it really is.

I have no long disquisition to write upon the music of the "Magic Flute." It is enough to say that I consider it as possessing more truly beautiful and popular music, both melodic and harmonic, than any other opera ever written. Don Juan is greater, because there are greater passions in it to portray; but nothing can be more beautiful than the constant succession, the heaping up, of the loveliest melodies, together with accompaniments and harmonic combinations, which are as extraordinary and marvellous to the contrapuntist now, as in 1791. Sometimes when I have not read "As you like it," or the "Tempest," or the "Winter's Tale," for several months, I re-peruse them with the feeling that I never felt their beauty adequately before. So last evening, solos, duets, quintets, choruses, overture, accompaniment and all, familiar as all are, — constantly to be met with as most of them are in our song-books, glee-books, psalm-books in all sorts of shapes and with all kinds of texts — seemed almost for the first time to open to me their delicious perfection.

Near the close of the opera, as I listened with "John" — whose emotions were written in his face — it was the first hearing — both of us in that rather rare state, one of perfect satisfaction with the music — I was startled by something peculiarly familiar. Ah, Mozart, I should not have thought this of you! I hope I shall find myself mistaken, when I hear it again or get the music to examine; and I shall be so, if it does not prove that you, in the ritornello, in this air of Monastatos, and in a part of the vocal motives, have stolen the idea bodily from the Largo al factotum, in Rossini's "Barber."

Is that so, reader? Well, then, Mozart is free from the imputation of plagiarism in this case. But what right had he to compose such prophetic music? He was always doing it. If at the opera you are struck with a concerted piece for any number of voices up to the sextet, which naturally springs out of the dramatic situation, in which, at the same moment, as many different passions are depicted in music upon the stage, as there are parts, you will be sure to find something almost perfect of the same kind, as a model, in one or more of his operas; if you are struck with the effect of a concealed chorus, singing solemn music, as in so many modern operas, this had Mozart did the same thing again and again, and save by Gluck, with almost unparalleled effect; in this very "Magic Flute," you have two men come upon the stage and sing an old Lutheran choral, while the orchestra works up a fugued subject about it. Now, what right had this man to forestall Meyerbeer's greatest effects in the "Huguenots" and "The Prophet"? If the man had lived twenty years longer, I don't see that he would have left a single new musical idea for his successors to have wrought out — his European successors; of course, for when our "free, independent, and enlightened citizens" take to operatic writing, we shall beat the world, as we do now in architecture, sculpture, painting, landscape gardening, railroad building, steamboat exploding, and I know not what all. John Smith assures me, that we do lead all Europe in these things, and this being so, we shall soon also lead the way in opera. Then where will Mozart be with his "Don Juan" and "Magic Flute"? This brings me back again, from my ride on the American Eagle!

A vast amount of matter has been printed upon the history of the "Magic Flute," but much of it is scattered, and has escaped both Holmes and Oulibicheff. Without waiting for the fourth volume of Jahn, which, judging from the first three, will give us the story in full, here are two or three matters, which I think will be new to the reader.

The authorship of the text is almost universally attributed to Schickaneder, as it is by the programme given above, by Nissen, and after him by Holmes and Oulibicheff. Yet, many years ago, I think in an early volume of the London Musical World, some twenty-five years since, there is a notice of the death of a German teacher in Dublin, Ireland, who claimed it. So far as my reading goes, no notice of this has ever been taken — not even so much as to question the man's veracity. And yet a text is a matter of some importance at least — many a one has carried good music with it to the shades, and some have saved music in itself hardly good enough to be worthy of contempt — and its author is worth finding out.

I translate a short article on this point from the Neue Berliner Zeitung, of June 13, 1849.

"The real author of the text to the Magic Flute was not Schickaneder, but his chorus singer Giesecke, who drew up the plan of the action, made the division of scenes, and manufactured the familiar naïve rhymes. This Giesecke — as J. Cornet relates in his interesting book, "Die Oper in Deutschland" — a student born in Brunswick, and expelled from the University at Halle — was author of several magic operas, also of the "Magic Flute" (after Wieland's *Lulu), Schickaneder having no other share in it, than to alter, cut out, add, and — claim the whole. The poor devil of a Giesecke contrived to keep soul and body together by singing small parts, and in the chorus on Schickaneder's stage in the "Freihaus auf der Wieden" — the Theater an der Wien not yet being built.

At length he disappeared nobody knew whither. (During Napoleon's continental embargo Giesecke was in Poland indulging his taste for natural history and collecting mineralogical specimens.)

"In the summer of 1818," says Cornet, "at Vienna, a nice looking old gentleman, in a blue, swallow-tailed coat, white neckcloth, wearing the ribbon of an order, seated himself one day at the table in an inn, where Ignaz von Seyfried, Korntheuer, Jul. Laroche, Küstner, Gned and I met daily to dine. The venerable snow-white head, his carefully chosen words and phrases, his demeanor in general made a very pleasant impression upon us all. It proved to be Giesecke, once chorus singer, but now professor in the University at Dublin, who had now come directly from Iceland and Lapland to Vienna with a collection of specimens of natural history from the animal, mineral, and vegetable kingdoms for the Imperial Cabinet. Seyfried was the only one among us who knew him. The delight of the old man in Vienna and at his reception from the Emperor Francis — who had presented to him a really splendid gold box, sparkling with jewels and filled with the newest Kremnitz gold pieces — was a sufficient reward for the labors and necessities of many years. Here we had opportunity to learn many things in the past; among them,

* Wieland's Lulu? I know of no play or tale of this title in Wieland's Works. The poem, "Schack Lolo," has nothing in common with the text of the Magic Flute. Who can tell us?

that in him we saw the real author of the text to the Magic Flute, (he was a member at that time of the persecuted order of the Freemasons)—a fact which Seyfried indeed in some sort suspected. I relate this from his own assertions, which we had no reason whatever to doubt. He made the statement to us in connection with my singing of the cavatina from the "Mirror of Arcadia,"† which was introduced into Mozart's work. Many have supposed that Helmböck, the prompter, was Schikaneder's assistant in the work. Giesecke corrected us in this, and moreover stated that, nothing but the parts of Papageno and his wife belonged to Schikaneder."

The character of Shikaneder, as shown in his treatment of Mozart, is not such as to lead any unprejudiced person to doubt his readiness to claim anything in his power, which could be for the benefit of his establishment, or of his own reputation.

Some additional light as well as doubt is thrown upon the matter by Treitschke, the poet who, in 1814, revised the text of Beethoven's "Fidelio." He states that just as Shikaneder was engaged upon the text of the first finale in 1791, the Leopoldstädten Theatre announced "The Magic Cither, or Casper the Fagottist," prepared by Isacium Perinet (for 30 years poet of that theatre,) from the same Märchen of Wieland, and in the main closely following the original story. Just this lamentable occurrence (for Schikaneder) proved the salvation of the Magic Flute, for he was compelled to change the entire character of the opera. For instance, Sarastro, who was to have appeared as a monster, took the new character of a Priest of Wisdom. Treitschke does not state it, but from other testimony in connection with his, I infer that it was now that Papageno and Papagena were introduced into the play.

The splendid success of the "Zauberflöte" induced the manager to prepare a second part under the title of "The Labyrinth, or the Strife of the Elements," and Winter was employed to compose the music. It was a failure.

Oulibicheff can hardly find words to express his disgust and contempt for the text of the Magic Flute. It has found but two or three defenders during the sixty-nine years of its existence—but one of these was Goethe! Perhaps defender is too strong a term to use—but here is his expression—"Es gehört mehr Bildung dazu, den Werth zu erkennen, als ihn abzuleugnen"—a higher intellectual culture is necessary to appreciate its value, than to deny it.

This letter from Goethe to Paul Wranitzky, Schikaneder's Kapellmeister, dated Jan. 26, 1796, I think will be new to most, if not all the readers of the Journal:

"The immense success of the Magic Flute, and the difficulty of writing a piece to rival it, has awakened the thought of taking it as the fundamental idea of a new piece, both in order to meet the public in the line of its taste and to lighten the task, both for managers and actors, of producing a new and complicated piece. I have to reach my object most directly, by writing a Second Part to the Magic Flute; the characters are all well known, the actors practised in them, and the author, having the first part before him, is enabled to paint the situations and relations of the characters in stronger colors without overdoing them, and thus give such a work much life and interest. In how far I have reached my aim, the effect must show.

"That the piece may at once make its way throughout Germany, I have so arranged it, that the dresses and scenery of the first Magic Flute, will nearly suffice for the production of the second; still if a manager should see fit to add expensive decorations, the effect would be greater? but, at the same time, it is my desire, that even in these, the first "Magic Flute" be constantly kept in mind. J. W. V. GOETHE.

No one at a performance of the "Magic Flute" can help feeling the utter insipidity of the verses, the weakness of the plot—hardly worthy the name—and the looseness, almost at times incongruity of the succession of scenes. But great things could not be expected from a chorus singer in a minor theatre, even though an expelled student of Halle, where the grand aim was to produce another "taking" Magic Spectacle for the delectation of by no means the higher classes of society. It is clear, however, that the writer had a leading practical idea in his mind, however incapable he was of adequately reproducing that idea either in plot or poetry; and this is, the triumph of light over darkness—the certainty that the earnest, persevering effort of a courageous, steadfast, unfaltering soul in the pursuit of wisdom, shall not fail of attaining its aim and receiving its reward. Mozart perceived the idea, felt it, and to the priests' music gave a nobleness and grandeur which places it among even his grandest conceptions.

But what is the "Zauberflöte," the Magic Flute or "La Flute Enchantée" all about? asks the reader: just as I asked in vain from my childhood on, until I saw and heard it here in Berlin—and that too more than once. I have never found in any book or periodical any such account of this opera as a drama, as enabled me to form any satisfactory conception of its plot, or to follow its story. Although it forms one of the grand stages in the historic progress of the operatic drama, all who have written upon it, so far as their writings have come under my notice, have either taken it for granted, that the story was already known to their readers—or they did not have any clear conception of it themselves. The various editions of the opera, which have come under my notice, are all printed without the spoken dialogue, and without stage directions; this is also true of the text books; it is then no easy matter to follow this opera as a drama. My late friend, "Brown," seems to have felt this difficulty, and to have considered both the Magic Flute and Don Juan as epoch-making works, worthy of a careful study not only as musical but as dramatic works; for among his papers both are found written out as tales. A pretty poor tale the former proves to be, but the poorer it be the brighter shines the genius which could compose such music to it! I send it to you for the Journal, if you think proper to use it. A. W. T.

[Mr. Brown's story shall have place next week. Ed.]

The Character and Genius of Handel.

(From the Life, by Schöelcher.)

Grandeur is the distinctive characteristic which dominates over all the compositions of Handel. Even in the exquisite gracefulness of Acis and Galatea there is a latent vigor, a certain solemnity of style, which elevates while it chains the mind. Every one is struck with this. So true is it, that critics, biographers, friends, and enemies all concur in speaking of him as a "colossus," a "giant," a "man mountain." His atmosphere is the immensity resplendent with the sun. Like Corneille, he lived in the sublime. Thus, of all musicians, no one has better realized the dreams of those heavenly songs which glorify the majesty of Jehovah. No one before him, and no one after him, has ever composed choruses comparable to his, or has known how to employ and combine with an equal power the different forms of the human voice. When you have heard an oratorio ten or twelve times, when the first transports of admiration have passed away, when you can more calmly appreciate your emotions, and taste them all the better for being in full possession of yourself, these choruses develop themselves before you like a drama filled with interest; you see each group of the different registers advancing successively, as bravely as a battalion marching to the assault, halt, unfold their strength, and at length display their united power in a majestic and wonderful finale. The transitions are so ably managed, and the effects are of such incredible perfection, that you seem to hear ten thousand voices, whose harmonious clamor is loud enough to reach the skies. In this sense, the "Hallelujah" of The Messiah is an explosion of incommensurable beauty.

Where have the Pindaric Odes expressed the idea of triumph more brilliantly and more enthusiastically than the chorus in Judas Maccabæus, "See the conquering hero comes?" The battle-cry in the same oratorio, "Sound an alarm," is just such another spark of musical electricity as our Marseillaise, which has made myriads brave, and is alone sufficient to immortalize the name of Rouget de l'Isle. And Israel in Egypt! Is there an epic poem to surpass that? With what breathless anxiety, with what fervor is the introductory chorus of the Hebrews filled, in which they describe the sufferings of their hard servitude, and implore the succor of the Lord! With what truthfulness are the convulsions of nature painted in the storm of hailstones! With what terrific reality is the thick darkness spread over the earth! What heart-rending lamentations when the first-born of the Egyptians are slain by the hand of God! What a contrast between the silent march of the enfranchised Israelites at the bottom of the miraculous way, and the crowding of the waters together to let them pass! Words cannot depict these superhuman effects of musical art. When you enjoy these, you wish to have around you those whom you love, in order that they may partake of your delight.

The works of humanity proceed from each other. Strictly speaking, no man is a creator. But among men of intellect there are certainly some who are more inventive, or rather, who discover more than others. Handel is one of these. Whatever the kind of composition, he makes it his own, and his only. He changes or increases it so as to make it quite a new thing. This is what is called creating. His oratorios are cast in a deeper mould than any one else has ever imagined. They resemble nothing else that has ever been heard before. As a composer of Italian operas, he had opened for himself a new way even in Italy. As a writer of sacred music, likewise, he listened to nothing but his own genius, and disdained to follow the traces of Gombert, of Palestrina, and of Allegri; nor yet of the English composers who had preceded him, Byrde, Gibbons, and Purcell. His Anthems preserve a very high religious sentiment, but they have an ardor and a lyrical beauty previously unknown in that species of composition. His predecessors give us the idea of monks, filled with a grave faith and animated by an ethereal fervor, adoring God in the depths of their cloisters with a touching unction; but he sets before us active and energetic men, singing enthusiastically under the canopy of heaven the glories of the Omnipotent.

The author of The Messiah is an epic poet above all; but he exhibits no less superiority in treating subjects with which the fire, the nobility, and the majesty of that style would not so well accord. He has even succeeded in matters for which one would suppose him to be the least fitted. His overtures all uniformly terminate with a coda in minuet, according to the custom of his time. Many of these minuets are delicious, especially in Tamerlane. That in Ariadne was so much in request, that every fiddler in town and country scraped it about; it was set to words, which were sung in the streets as well as in the drawing-room, and nothing but it was heard for six months. The gavot in the overture of Otho must have been not less popular, for it was played from one end to the other of the three kingdoms, upon every kind of instrument; as Burney says, "from the organ to the salt-box."

But we are indebted to this multifarious genius for something more than minuets to be sung in the streets. His operas (judging by what I have heard of them upon the piano) prove that, if he had not written oratorios which have absorbed universal admiration, his renown as a composer of theatrical music would have been as great as that of the celebrated Italian masters. They have composed nothing more dramatically fine than "Tutta raccolta," in Scipio, and "Trà sospetti," in Rodelinda. The duet in Rinaldo, "Al trionfo del nostro furor," will bear a comparison with "Esprit de haine et de rage," in Gluck's Armide; and it could not sustain a more formidable one. He also produced delicious melodies, elegant as those of Cimarosa; lively and spirited as those of Gretry; gentle and holy as those of Pergolese. "Lascia ch'io pianga," in Rinaldo; "Verdi prati," in Alcina; "Ombra cara," in Radamisto; and "Piangerò," in Giulio Cesare, are morceaux of infinite simplicity of expression, and of a tenderness which draws tears from your eyes; they equal the perfection of design, the purity of form, and the delicacy of the cantabiles of Stradella and Palestrina: they are consonant with all that is chaste, good, and affectionate in the human soul. At the same time, he has known how to be as graceful as Haydn (that is to say, to be the perfection of grace) when he wrote the songs for the nymphs in Acis and Galatea. The pictures of Watteau are not more lovely than that pastoral, which is a gem of freshness and prettiness.

And this brings me to another of Handel's qualities, that of being a great painter of words. He reflected always as he composed; instead of giving himself up passively to the demon of inspiration, he subjugated and governed it. His notes seem to be the echo of the words. What an immense and mournful grief is there in "He was despised" in The Messiah! What heart-rending desolation! No one can listen to it without sympathy. All who have suffered themselves will admit that it is impossible to descend deeper into the depths of sorrow. Thus Handel's music reveals to us, as far as can be, the very significance of that which it interprets. One may say that it articulates, so exactly is it fitted to the poem, as a well-made coat to the body of its wearer. It portrays the thought. The oratorio of Samson, above all, is in this respect almost as remarkable as Don Giovanni, the masterpiece of the lyric stage. Each personage in it has its peculiar character so distinctly designed as to be intelligible even without the words. There has appeared in Germany a school which pretends to emancipate music, and to reform the art of Bach, of Handel, of Mozart, of Beethoven, of Cimarosa, of Weber, and of Rossini, and to put in its place I know not what. Even this school admires in Handel the perfect appropriation of his note. One of the reformers passes for the author of an article on L'Allegro ed il Penseroso, in which it is said: "If music is to be restored to that state of purity and depth, when the standard of its worth is sought for in the physical truth of its expression; when the words and their significations are the touchstone of the composition; when the melody of speech shall be the stipulated foundation of the melody sung, there will not be for us northmen, for us Germans, in the entire collection of musical treasures, any works that should be so highly valued and exclusively brought forward, as classical specimens of the study of art, inspired with fresh youth in the spirit just mentioned, as the works of Handel." I will quote also the judgment of a French amateur upon the subject:—"With the greater number of composers one does meet with features intended to adorn the song, and which may be suppressed at need; but with Handel the distinctive feature is inherent to the song, and is almost always the most conspicuous and energetic part of it. It is there that the composer gives the finishing touch of his pencil, and completes the picture, which words alone could never have painted. I shall quote, as an example, the two airs of Satan, in the Resurrection. Could audacity, rage, and rebellion be better expressed? Sometimes the character of the personages is revealed by the accompaniment, as in Giulio Cesare. Achilla, a kind of military executioner, who is a favorite of Ptolemy, and who has brought the head of Pompey to his master, makes a declaration of love to Cornelia. His song is gross, doubtless, but it only expresses that which he wishes to say. It is the accompaniment which shows what is love in a base and cruel soul. One trembles every moment, lest a word or a gesture of Cornelia should cost her life.

The works of Handel are in fact full of truth and of local color. To the people of the Lord in their prayers, to pagans in their orgies, to shepherds, to pontiffs, to warriors, to the afflicted and to the happy, to mortals and to supernatural beings, he knows how to render their own peculiar language. He has invented voices for the angels as Weber did for demons; he has discovered the true accents of a monster like Polyphemus, as Mozart did for a statue. Gifted with such qualities, he necessarily excels in recitatives; not less than Gluck himself, he knows how to impress upon them at the same time a singular strength and justness of expression—a penetrating and magisterial tone, which satisfies the mind as well as the ears. That in Giulio Cesare, "Alma del gran Pompeo," and the scene of Bajazet's death in Tamerlane, may be quoted as examples of the noblest style of declamation. Porpora, who was indebted to his recitatives for a part of his reputation, could not help praising those of Handel even in the midst of the outcry against him in 1734. Shield reports that once having congratulated Haydn on the beauty of the recitatives in his oratorio, Il ritorno di Tobia, the latter replied immediately: "Ah! 'Deeper and deeper,' in Jephtha, is far beyond that." Shield subsequently adds: "While I was examining this wonderful production for extracts, an impressive singer had the goodness to rehearse it, during which my mind became so agitated by a succession of various emotions, that I determined to lay the whole of this climax and anti-climax of musical expression before the eye of the reader, to prove that the highest praise of it will never amount to an hyperbole." I quite agree with Shield in this.

Max Maretzek.

The Havana difficulty was not so very alarming after all. Mr. Maretzek arranged it in three hours by "Shrewsbury clock." He said to the Captain General: "Accede to these terms or there shall be no opera this season." The Captain General, cowed by the stern bearing of the impresario and trembling for the fate of his beloved opera, acceded. There was no red-tape used in the negotiation, and the Circumlocution Office of the Island of Cuba derived no emoluments therefrom. Mr. Maretzek accomplished everything in three hours, and returned to the city with a contract in his pocket for the other house, (the Tacon still being under the weather,) and a privilege to raise the prices to double what he intended to charge if he had not been overtaken by this sad calamity. It is thought, by persons whose profession it is to interpret the sentiments of others, that Mr. Maretzek would not object to have a magazine explode every year. The company is to sail from New York on the 12th of the present month. Thanks to the energy of the manager, the actual retention has scarcely exceeded a fortnight.

We have already referred to the members of Mr. Maretzek's company. It is a very fine one, and will undoubtedly achieve a brilliant success. We hear it rumored that the entente cordiale between re-established between Messrs. Maretzek and Ullman, it is probable that an exchange of artists will be made as the season advances. Formes, it is hinted, will essay his fortunes with the Havanese. Signorina Alaimo, a renowned lyric tragedienne, has arrived, and will, we presume, take her departure under the Maretzek banner on the 12th. Mrs. James, an American lady, recently returned from Italy, is another addition to the company. Mrs. James is the seconda donna, but will, we fancy, speedily achieve a higher position. She has a remarkably fine, high soprano voice, a good dramatic style, and a method that needs nothing but practice to make perfect. We are glad that Mrs. James has fallen into Mr. Maretzek's hands. He is one of the few men who do not hesitate to assist real merit.—New York Musical World.

A Letter from Theodore Eisfeld.

The following says the New York Musical World, has been received by a lady of this city, who has kindly permitted us to transfer it to our columns:

ISLE FAYAL, AZORES, Oct. 4, 1858.

I give you some news of my exile. Since my arrival here I have been very ill. The terrible shock I have received, morally and physically, has reduced me to such a state of feebleness, that I hope you will excuse my laconicism and incongruity. Hoping also that I may dispense with a recital of the disaster—of those scenes of despair between husbands and wives, between mothers and children, between brothers and sisters, which I witnessed. Oh it is dreadful, and to think that out of more than five hundred persons on board, only seventy-eight are saved!

From the moment that the fire was known beyond doubt, we saw upon the promenade deck neither captain nor officers, nor even sailors, but only the passengers, and they in the most complete disorder. The officers were all very young, even the first engineer, and could not have had much experience, nor a knowledge of their great responsibility. The captain, a man about forty years of age, was the first to lose his senses and throw himself overboard. That was a good example! The Francis metallic life-boats were burnt, except two, which were overcrowded and filled with water immediately.

The cannon were in the lower part of the ship, so there was not a possibility of discharging one as a sign of distress to draw the attention of the vessels we could see at a great distance. There were no life-preservers, and not even chairs or stools with compressed air, which would have served to sustain us while on the water, nor pumps to put out the fire. I stayed on board till the flames reached me, and then threw myself into the sea, where I swam for two hours and a half with my clothes on, without any support. By this time I had lost my strength, and after offering a prayer and thinking of my friends, I went down. It is supposed that a counter current threw me many times to the surface, when at last I was picked up by the small-boat insensible and carried on board the French bark Maurice, Captain Ernest Renaud, one of the bravest and most noble men it is possible to imagine. He had me placed in his own bed, and after trying a thousand experiments, they brought me back to life. During four days I was in a quiet state of delirium, after which I was perfectly prostrated. The 19th of September I was landed at Fayal, where I have been very sick, my chest and lungs being very much influenced by the quantity of salt water I swallowed and the exposure. I shall probably be forced to pass the winter here, and do not think it likely I shall be able to return to New York before April.

I have received much attention from different families. The military Governor, American consul, and the consul from Hamburg, have visited me. One German gentleman who lives here, Mr. A. D'Orey, has treated me so affectionately, that he calls three or four times a day to see that I want for nothing.

Please ask the gentlemen of the Press to publish this letter, that my pupils may know where I am.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, SEPT. 26. — In 1811, Madame Dehn died, and in the train of this first misfortune came, as is so often the case, a series of others. The fatal years 1812-13 followed, and the widely extended and diversified business relations of Dehn rendered him a victim to the dreadful pressure of the times, and he was forced to withdraw from that mercantile stage upon which he had played so important a part.

An acquaintance, who happened to call upon the ruined merchant at his house, and who knew nothing of what had just happened, relates the following:

As he entered the saloon he found several of the principal merchants of Hamburg, Seiler, Hülsenbeck and others, there. Upon asking for Dehn, Hülsenbeck said "he is above, but not to be spoken with just now. You come at a very unlucky moment—however, take a seat."

The merchants continued their deliberations and the result was that if Dehn could make up his mind to declare himself insolvent, matters might easily be so arranged as to leave him in the end a handsome fortune. Seiler went up stairs with this proposition to his friend, but immediately returned and reported; "Herr Dehn declares that he will sell his last coat before he will take that step."

In Hamburg the stopping of this great house created a remarkable sensation. Bourrienne advanced at once a loan of 40,000 marks; Senator Sornstog and others came forward and secured all his paper. But debts were to be paid and the merchant was determined to owe no man anything. The friend above mentioned, upon making him another call, found him in the kitchen making notes of the necessary expenses of the family, and was greeted with the words; "Yes, my good friend, I must now even look after the parsley!" The old cook, one servant, one saddle-horse and a groom for him, only had he retained. All the long army of domestics was already dismissed; horses, coaches, all that belonged to his fine equipage were already sold; his beautiful library, all his works of art, save a few exquisite pictures by Tischbein, which his son's widow still has in Berlin, house lots, and houses, lands, everything in short that he could sell, went to the hammer to discharge his obligations.

But what a change for the children! The eldest son was put to the study of scientific agriculture, to which he devoted his life. Sieffeld Wilhelm was taken from his school and his music and placed under the care of Forest-master von Schenek, somewhere in Holstein, to study the science of the Forester—a science unknown in America. The boy had a hard life of it; but it developed him physically, and in spite of the tastes which he had cultivated in his father's house, and which here could not be gratified, he learned to love the profession.

A shot received in his foot, upon a grand hunt, through the carelessness of a certain Count Pless, however, rendered him incapable of ranging the forests, and sent him to books and literature.

Meantime Bernadotte, now king of Sweden, remembered his friend Solomon Dehn, appointed him Swedish consul in Berlin, and thus secured him not only from want, but placed him in an honorable position. Wilhelm went to Eutin, entered the Gymnasium, by untiring industry made up for lost time in his studies, and in 1819 was matriculated in the University of Leipzig, to study jurisprudence, in accordance with the wish of his father, who hoped to find in his son a successor in the diplomatic position to which he had himself now attained. He studied also at Jena and Heidelberg, and, returning to Berlin in 1824, was appointed to an office in the Swedish Embassy, giving to his father also much assistance in his consulate. During all these years he had never neglected music; had made himself a very fine violoncellist, and had played often in public concerts. In fact, though but an amateur, he had attained an excellence to be envied by many an artist by profession. In Leipzig he had for a time studied the theory of music with the distinguished organist, Droebbs. In Berlin, his acquaintance with Bernhard Klein—a name unknown in America, but that of a man, who is in the very first rank of modern theorists—did much to develop his great genius for the depths of the science.

1829 and 1830, two more terrible years in commercial history, came on. In the former year, Consul Dehn, who had retrieved his fortunes, again lost all. Happily Bernadotte had not forgotten his old friend. He called him to Stockholm, and appointed him to the directorship of the Swedish mines, where he died Nov. 7, 1837.

In the latter (1830) the son, who had inherited sufficient from his mother to place him above want, was a victim, and lost everything but his violoncello—an Amati—and the pictures of Tischbein, above-mentioned. No longer connected with the Swedish Embassy nor with the consulate, he was reduced by a single stroke, at the age of thirty, to such poverty as actually to want candles and fuel, and sometimes for three weeks together not to be able to purchase a warm meal. To his juridical studies he could not look for aid, and music became his resource. Klein, then in the height of his popularity as a teacher, offered him a helping hand. He took Dehn as a pupil; in eighteen lessons went with him through his course; then gave him a certificate of his ability to instruct, and also several of his own pupils. Kellstab says: "Another offer (by Klein) to furnish him the means of an Art-journey into Italy, Dehn, from an equally noble feeling, declined, determining rather through his own efforts to effect it. From that time he devoted himself to the profession of teaching the Theory of Music with far-reaching success. A large number of pupils assembled about him; and, as Bernhard Klein died a few years after, Dehn became in some degree his heir and successor in that profound knowledge of musical literature and the theory of Form, which is not too often now to be met with. With a perseverance which can seldom be found, Dehn threw himself into these studies, and his fame soon became that of a recognized scientific authority in music, to whom men came as pupils, who already were well known to the public as men of reputation as leaders and masters in the practical branches of the art. Of the many examples that might be cited we select one only. Glinka, the most celebrated of Russian composers, chose Dehn as his guide in his contrapuntal studies; and so valuable were his instructions that he returned to Berlin repeatedly at long intervals to review and renew them. This was the case during the last winter, when death put an end to his zealous studies and labors here in Berlin. With a rare kindness the teacher repaid the affection of his mature pupil; he was his nurse in his sickness, the mourner at the funeral, the careful custodian of whatever he left."

Haupt, also a pupil of Klein, yet thought it worth his while to hear Dehn, at least, in so far as his method could offer him anything new. The most promising of the generation of composers now coming upon the stage have studied with him—indeed I know of no contrapuntist who can show so many such disciples as he. Hugo Ulrich, Martin Blumner, Kullak, Bernhard Scholz, are all men, whose names, if not now known, will become so yet, even in our distant land.

At home, as well as upon his journeys, such a man must soon make his way into the acquaintance and gain the respect of the most distinguished men in the profession. This was eminently the case with him. With Fétis in Brussels and Kiesewetter in Vienna he was for years in close correspondence, giving them both great assistance in their important publications. His writings soon attracted general attention, and at length, in March, 1842, by the advice of Meyerbeer, he was appointed Librarian of the musical department of the Royal Library. None but a man familiar with libraries, and who by experience has learned the value of the rare combination of profound bibliographical and scientific knowledge can properly estimate what Dehn in his new position has effected.

From another notice, I translate the following upon this point;—"A happier appointment could not easily be made, since he was one of the few to whom the ancient methods of notation presented no difficulties. Hence he was able to render available the treasures of ancient music preserved in the Library, by translating them into modern notation. He also edited many classical works, until then existing only in manuscript, thus drawing them from their previous oblivion."

In 1845, upon the resignation of Grell, he was appointed teacher of the Dom-chor, but circumstances occurred, which led him soon to resign that position. In 1842 the "Cæcilia" was revived, and he took Gottfried Weber's place as its editor until its close in 1848. He was also one of the editors of Peters' edition of Bach's instrumental works—which fact prevented him from taking part in the publications of the Bach Society.—Had he been one of the committee of that society, that edition would have fewer pages of errata to print, and would have been saved the mortification of being obliged to reprint two thirds of Bach's great Mass in B minor. By command of the king, Dehn made journeys for the purpose of collecting works for the Library. Passing over his journeys to Italy, here are a few lines relating to similar journeys nearer home, in the various provinces of the kingdom of Prussia.

"These were very fruitful," says the writer in the Spener Zeitung, "as is proved by the descriptive catalogue, which for Silesia alone comprises 400 numbers. Among them are beautifully preserved Codices of the 11th and 12th centuries; and among the printed works of the 16th century, the old Flemish songs (Souter Liedekens, in three books) published by Thielmann-Sousato, and harmonized mostly by James Clemens von Papa, which Dehn translated into modern notation. The journey into the province of East Prussia in 1854 was alike fruitful, for of the works found in Dantzie alone, he made a descriptive catalogue of 400 numbers. These fine results, joined to his thorough knowledge of all that the Library contains, enabled him to send Fétis such a mass of materials and corrections for his new Biographie des Musiciens, as will fill at least two of his volumes."

Orlando Lasso was Dehn's favorite among the old composers, and it was a labor of his life to work out a complete biography of the old Fleming. To this end he made a journey the last summer to Munich, and was intending during the present one to have gone to Belgium to make his final researches. To this end also he had already written in score nearly 700 of Lasso's works (!), and just before his death he had engaged in their final correction. In connection with those of the Provinces, he began a grand descriptive catalogue of the entire musical collection in the Royal Library. This gigantic labor is finished so far as to be ready for copying, for the entire musical literature, and for the works published in parts during the 16th century. The finishing of that catalogue by the addition of the rest of the printed and manuscript works, has been prevented by his sudden death. It would be of the highest value to the literature of music, if this catalogue could be completed and published by some competent hand.* The value of Dehn's labor to Belgian musical literature was so highly appreciated by King Leopold, that in 1853 he presented him with his own hand the order of the Belgian Lion.

On the 5th of July, 1849, Dehn was honored with the title of Professor of Music by the Government, and soon after elected member of the Berlin Academy of Art. He never appeared before the public as a composer, saying himself that he did not possess ere-ative talent, and was too proud to publish insignificant compositions; yet a Kyrie in 16 parts in canon style proves his mastery of the laws and rules of strict counterpoint.

* I have been told that the Library looks upon this work of Dehn's as its private property and refuses to allow it to be copied and printed.

Next to the old Italian Fathers of musical theory, whom he has quoted so freely as to make his work on harmony a valuable addition to musical bibliography, Dehn honored and revered the memory of Mattheson, Marpurg and Kirnberger. By constantly watching for opportunities for the space of thirty years, he had succeeded in making a complete collection of the musical works of those authors — one of the three or four only which exist.

When I had the pleasure of renewing my acquaintance with him in 1854, I was authorized by Dr. Mason to purchase books to a certain amount for his library, and Dehn offered this collection, moved principally by the thought that if thus sold it would probably be kept entire forever, while otherwise upon his death the books might be scattered in all directions, and perhaps lost. Dr. Mason purchased them. I was at the time surprised at the small amount of the bill, but never knew until within the last few weeks, that had he been willing to scatter them, he might have sold them for a far higher price in this city.

He was for many years an agent of the British Museum, and other libraries of Great Britain and other countries, public and private. There is now in the music room of the Royal Library, a collection of old printed music of the 16th and 17th centuries, occupying three or four shelves, which by long and persevering diligence he completed from all sorts of collections of odd parts and imperfect copies, and which is now awaiting the order of the British Museum. The price paid is over $2,200. Among the works which he gave to the Library here, and which he has copied out in modern notation, and which is hardly less valuable for its beauty of execution, than for its historic interest, is the oldest opera ever composed. The clue to this he obtained from some of the single parts — it did not exist in score — which had found their way to Berlin, and which led him to search old cloisters and other possible places for its preservation in Italy. In course of time the work was complete. He copied it splendidly in score, and his sister-in-law, Fraulein Wedel, a true artist, adorned his score with drawings, fac-similes of those which adorned the original parts. The work is throughout in five parts and has this title:

"L'Anti Parnasso, Comedia harmonica d'Horatio Vecchi da Modena. Novamente posto in luce: con Prio Venezia apresso Angelo Gardano MDLXXXVII. Aggiunta di alcune notizie intorno all' Antiparnasso proposte dall redattore della presente partitura."

Another of Dehn's specimens of copying, equal to the finest specimens of printing, is a copy of the mass by Ballabene in forty-eight parts. Dehn sometimes described to us the performance of that mass as he once heard it in Italy. Imagine a dozen choirs stationed at intervals in the lofty narrow gallery, which is generally found in Gothic cathedrals, just above the arches which separate the nave from the aisles, and singing down into the body of the church. Sometimes a single choir takes up the theme, and is answered from the other end of the edifice; sometimes one falls in after another until the entire space is vocal with the swelling flood of all the voices combined. The effect was almost superhuman.

On the 12th of April, 1858, Dehn felt so unwell at the Library that he returned home. He seated himself in his chair and died without a pang. On the afternoon of the 15th, he was followed to his grave in the Sophia churchyard outside the Hamburg gate of Berlin by a large concourse of friends and artists. Dr. Jonas delivered an address, and a part of the Dom-chor sang "Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath," "Jesus meine Zuversicht," and "Wie sie so sanft ruhn."

The publications of Dehn are not in number probably such as to meet the expectations of the reader. They are the following: —

1. Collection of ancient sacred and secular music of the 16th and 17th centuries. 12 parts. Berlin. 1837.
2. Biographical notices of Orlando Lasso from the French with notes. Berlin, 1837.
3. Psalmos VII. paenitentiales modis musicis adaptavit Orl. de Lassus, etc. Berlin 1838.
4. Two comic cantatas by J. S. Bach, in score now first published. Berlin. 1839.
5. The work on Harmony. Berlin 1848.
6. Gustate et Videte (Ps. 33. 9-11.) Motette, 5 voc. &c., Orl. de Lassus. Berlin. 1841.
7. Part of Peter's edition of Bach's instrumental works, among them 16 concertos.
8. 22 Etudes per violoncello d'apres les 40 Etudes p. Viol. de Rode, Krentzer, &c.
9. Writings in musical periodicals, one of which, the Cecilia, he edited.

He had prepared a new edition of his Harmony, was busily engaged upon his complete Life of Lassus, had just sent to press a new edition of Marpurg's "Abhandlung von der Fuge," and had other works in different states of forwardness, when death came and closed his labors.

(Conclusion next week.)

[The following was omitted last week accidentally, and much to our own surprise. We fear the omission has discouraged our good friend from writing us this week.—ED.]

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 2. — The debut of Mme. COLSON, in Verdi's Traviata, drew together within the walls of our magnificent Academy, a very large and elegantly attired audience. So far as the fair cantatrice was concerned, it was a most undeniable success; and but for the lamentable, out-of-sorts singing of the handsome BRIGNOLI, and the unrehearsed bleating of the chorus, would have created an intense furore. Thus the audience found itself alternately swayed from emotions of glowing enthusiasm over the Prima Donna, to the most unamiable undercurrent of feeling against the other delinquent vocalists. Brignoli must have perceived this; for, after encountering a very equivalent applause upon his rendition of De'miei bollenti spiriti, he gave evidence of more pains-taking, and finally bore his share of the Duo, Parigi, O cara, in a highly creditable manner.

The vocalism and acting of Mme. Colson has been so ably and correctly reviewed by yourself in the Journal of October 9th, that I cannot fail to commend all those who desire a perfect idea thereof, to re-peruse that critique. Verily, every cadenza, every roulade, every intonation,—her personnelle, her movements—each dramatic point, every wail of sorrow, and gushing outburst of joy, and pang of remorse, substantiated, in my mind, the singular truthfulness of every line and clause of your description. I think that mine ears have never listened to a more graceful, as it were spontaneously-flowing, free-from-strain bit of execution, than that of the roulade, which leads into the Sempre libera; it seemed to flow from the pretty lips of the charming Colson, like the gushing tones of a canary; i. e., with the same natural ease, as though it was the result of an innate predisposition to sing, rather than the achievement of a studied art. Her vocalization is singularly correct throughout, and so far as I could perceive, but one false intonation (the opening note of a recitativo, in Act I.) stands charged to her many excellencies. Correctly, indeed, did the Journal rate her "a very highly finished, charming, and expressive vocalist, though not in all points a great singer." The public viciously based its impromptu lobby criticisms, last night, upon "odious comparison;" and the names of Colson and the diva GAZZANIGA were invariably breathed together. At the "Amodio," a first class restaurant in the neighborhood of the Academy, where oyster and ale critics "most do congregate" between the acts, these contrasting analyses were heard to an amusing extent.

Said Raik to Letherhed,—"I'll bet you a bottle of champagne she's not as good as Gazzaniga. Her voice is 'nt so gentle-like, her style so forcible, or her manner so piquant. "Take your bet", responded little Letherhed, whom I overheard last night, just as he was gulping down his horrid jaws a mammoth chincoleague hivalve, "take your bet, she things more like a conthumptif perthorn, than Gathaneega; more gwaccful, too, and her voith ith more like a thilver bell." In every part of the caravanserai, knots of two or three stood, arguing the two Prima Donnas, placed in juxtaposition. Thus, too, in the lobbies and in the Foyer of the Opera House, friend button-holed friend and the "odious comparisons" went around with the speed of thought. Imagine, then, the critical position of the debutante; and rejoice that so deserving an artist stood the test of these comparisons thus triumphantly.

AMODIO sang and played with charming effect.

The orchestra acquitted itself most execrably; and the random floundering of that leviathan of the deep sea of harmony, the contra-basso, were such as to excite the liveliest apprehensions. The same remarks apply to the chorus, which, certes, must have been negligently abandoned to its fate, on the part of the management. The Coro di Zingari might be likened unto the tender bleating of a score of lost lambs, and that of the Matadores seemed even more confused. All this, nevertheless, served to bring forth into bolder relief the charming rendition of Violetta, by Mme. Colson.

MARRICO.

HARTFORD, CONN., NOV. 8.—What has become of your New York correspondent "—t—" ? Has it given up writing for the papers — has it left the country — has it "married a wife," or a husband," (provided it is not already provided) — or what's the matter? Do let us know; for we have missed that cabalistic signature of late, and have wondered more why it did not make its appearance as usual, than we did formerly to know its meaning. "Trovator" is rich and racy, and has our warmest thanks for his rich and racy correspondence every week, but little "—t—" is one of the old marines of "Dwight's", and has faithfully fought by the side of the big "T." (with an "A. W."), and the fear that perhaps it has "given up the ship", now that she is on the high tide of prosperity, has caused all this solicitation in its behalf. I trust that it will think of this, and again throw a thrilling thought or two of thorough thinkings through your thriving columns, and accept our thanks therefor.

STEPHEN C. MASSETT, ("Jeems Pipes") has given a concert here with but poor success, so far as the "house" went, although it was the best of the kind which has ever been given here, I should judge. Miss KATE DEAN, assisted by Mr. W. H. COOK, as Tenor, and Mr. Geo. T. EVANS, as pianist, all of New York, are to give a concert to-morrow evening in this city. They are all highly spoken of by the New York papers. I had an opportunity of listening to them for a few minutes the other evening at Messrs. Barker & Co's Piano-forte rooms, and was delighted with Miss Dean's singing. I trust that she will go away with a purse as full and rich as is her voice.

What a funny old fellow was BILLINGS. And still it seems to me that could he have had a thorough musical education, he must have ranked high as a composer. I have been looking over a "singing-book" which he published in 1794, under the title of of "CONTINENTAL HARMONY — containing a number of Anthems, Fugues, and Choruses, in several Parts, never before published. Composed by WILLIAM BILLINGS. Author of Various Music Books." He tells us in the forepart of the book, in a dialogue between a master and scholar, that the scale, or gamut, was "projected," or said to have been, "between 7 or 800 years ago, by Guido Aretinus, a monk, whose name deserves to be recorded in the annals of faune, in capitals of gold." He afterwards says that

"Guido by some means or other availed himself of King David's Scale, and by making some few alterations and amendments, or it may be, by climbing a few steps higher on a ladder of King David's raising, he (in spite of the royal author) has unjustly taken all the glory of the first invention to himself." Guido must have been a very mean man to have done that! See what ridiculous words there are to "An Anthem for Thanksgiving." Perhaps they may be useful to some modern composer for the approaching festival.

"Ye dragons whose contagions breath,
People the dark abodes of death,
Change your hissing into heavenly songs,
And praise your Maker with your fork-ed tongues."

"Fire, hail and snow, wind and storms, beasts and cattle, creeping insects, flying fowl, kings and princes, men and angels, Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free, earth and heaven, land and water, young men and maids, old men and babes, praise the Lord; join creation, preservation, and redemption join in one; no exemption nor dissention, one invention and intention, reigns through the whole to praise the Lord!"—with a dozen 'Hallelujahs' at the end of that. If there is not variety enough for an aspiring composer, I don't know where he will find it. But what breaths could those 'fellers and gals' take in them days! For instance, when in another anthem they come to the words —

"Strange that a harp of thousand strings Should keep in tune so long" —

the last word is most beautifully and graphically illustrated by the 'counter' singing it to seven measures, 4-4 time! I doubt whether the 'harp' would 'keep in time' a great while it obliged to perform such gyrations as are in the music, now before me, many times. But I am becoming prosy. 'In conclusion,' as the ministers say, I will give you one more and stop, — an eloquent dissertation on the Fugue, which may be somewhat entertaining to your readers, if not improving. It is decidedly rich and 'hifalutin!' Here goes: —

"It is an old maxim, and I think a very just one, viz: that variety is always pleasing, and it is well-known that there is more variety in one piece of fuguing music, than in twenty pieces of plain song; for while the tones do most sweetly coincide and agree, the words are seemingly engaged in a musical warfare; and excuse the paradox if I further add, that each part seems determined by dint of harmony and strength of accent, to drown its competitor in an ocean of harmony, and while each part is thus mutually striving for mastery, and sweetly contending for victory, the audience are most luxuriously entertained and exceedingly delighted and extremely fluctuated, sometimes declaring in favor of one part, and sometimes another. Now the solemn bass demands their attention, now the manly tenor, now the lofty counter, now the volatile treble, — now here, now there, now here again. — O enchanting! O ecstatic! Push on, push on, ye sons of harmony, and "Discharge your deep-mouthed cannon, full front with dia-

May you with Maestoso, rush on to Choro-Grando, [pasons;
And then with Vigoroso, let fly your Diapentes
About our nervous system!"

There! I have nothing more to say! H.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Lucrezia Borgia," arranged for Piano-Forte.

What is "Classical" Music?

A friend asks us to define the term "Classical" in music. The term is variously and vaguely used. Doubtless it first grew into use in music, in the same sense and in the same way that it had done in literature. The classical authors were those studied as the models of the art of writing, models in sentiment, expression, style and use of language, in the schools and colleges. Their works became the "classics," that is to say the text-books in the classes. Originally, and still par excellence, the literary classics were the Greek and Latin authors: — not all, of course, who scribbled in those tongues, but those whose works by their intrinsic worth outlived the accidents and fashions of a day, and won a permanent place among the mental treasures of the race. They are classical because they have been so long the recognized foundation of all education in language and literature. It followed naturally that the modern languages began to boast each one its "classics." Bacon, Shakspeare, Milton, Addison, &c. are our English classics; Luther, Lessing, Herder, Goethe, &c. the German; Dante, Petrarch and the rest, are the Italian classics.

Something of this sense of course is implied in the phrase "classical music." Those composers, (as Palestrina, Marcello, &c. among the Italians; Bach, Handel, Mozart, &c. among the Germans) whose works have acquired the sanction of the whole musical world, for a long time, as models in their kind; those compositions which have stood and still stand as pillars of the splendid temple of harmony that has reared itself within the two last centuries, have necessarily become the basis of sound musical education, both in the technical acquirement of the art, and in the formation of the taste, the prompting of a high and earnest aspiration, the inspiring of ideas beautiful and true and holy. The real secret of their becoming classical, models (like text-books) in the classes, lies in their intrinsic excellence, in the fact that, however little appreciable by the multitude, yet, wherever they have been appreciated, a high and glorious working of the human intellect and soul, a spark of the divine fire, cherished and tempered by true study and true art, is surely recognized in them, just as in Bacon, Shakspeare, Dante, &c. A natural consequence, too, is the attaching of a certain idea of venerableness, or respectability at least of age, to works we accounted classical.

This is but an accidental property. Age alone would not have made them classical. Time has not preserved them; time is the arch-destroyer; they have preserved themselves in spite of time, and therefore are they classical. They had the true fire in them; they had life in them; they still live and are as fresh to-day as when they first came warm from the composer's brain; and this makes them "classical."

2. There is mingled (and sometimes too much confounded) with this idea, however, the idea of certain peculiarities of Form and Structure, as essential to classical music. Art is essentially formative. To create beauty, whether for ear or eye, is to embody feelings, thoughts in beautiful artistic forms. Some forms are arbitrary, and have no essential, obligato, necessary connection with the subject matter cast in them: — these are the poorest forms, and drop away of themselves, without waiting to be cast off. Other forms grow with the growth of Art, as by an innate necessity, a natural and divine law of crystallization, or far higher organization, from within outwards. We cannot but believe that certain forms in music, such as the fugue form; the whole involved contrapuntal process of four or more individual melodic parts or voices working together as one, yet quite distinct; the Sonata or Symphony form, that consummate fair epitome of all the laws of form in instrumental music, are outgrowths from this necessity of music's inmost nature. The creations of the grand old masters naturally, necessarily, providentially, divinely, and not arbitrarily, nor capriciously, nor accidentally took these forms. Hence it is common to speak of "classical music" when we hear Sonatas, or works in the Sonata form, as violin Quartets and Quintets, Symphonies, &c., or fugued choruses, like those of Handel, Motets, &c., by Bach; — the great old Italian masters, and all the great Germans down to this day, having found no forms so noble and so native to their inspirations. It is partly habit, education, schooling; but it is more, and primarily, a thing of nature and intrinsic law.

But let us always distinguish music which is classical from music which is only cast in classical forms. The form alone does not make a work classical. A mere form, or body, cannot live without a soul. There must be inspiration, genius, life in it. There must be poetry before there should be verse. It took the poetic exaltation of the soul first to invent rhythm, or rather to accept it from the hand of the All-beautiful. And just so, the classical forms in music are so, because live musical inspirations first naturally found utterance in them. The life is still the main thing; the genius, the inspiration, the imaginative conception, the warning into utterance of original experiences and thoughts of beauty: this is what makes a composition live, whether it be a mere song or a symphony built up in the grandest mould.

We shall resume the question; for it concerns us to know, whether the most modern things, creations of to-day, in whatsoever forms, may not also merit the name "classical."

A Word from the "Professors."

[We hope our readers will be edified by the following lucid and concise epistle. It will be remembered that a few weeks since we noticed one of those mushroom products so common in the lower strata of the money-making musical activity of this great country, — an inflated announcement of a grand musical Festival, to come off somewhere in the interior of New York. We noted, not in the most respectful terms, we own, the contents of a pompous pamphlet programme, (30 pages) which we had received, with its long array of psalm-book singing-masters, comic minstrels, &c., all styled "Professors," its prizes, judges, and honorary members, whose names, from one instance whereof we knew, we reasonably concluded to have been inserted without authority from those who answer to them elsewhere. Here is a return shot from the miscellaneous camp. It speaks for itself.]

COVERT, N. Y. NOV. 4, 1858.

J. S. DWIGHT, ESQ. BOSTON.

Dear Sir. — The heralding sheets of our humbug-festival received such a courteous attention from your Journal, (Oct. 23, 1858,) that a neglect or a delay in appreciating and repaying the well-designed compliment would justly be censurable, yes unpardonable, even in a class of people, termed Barbarians.

Owing to a strong instinct we may be clever and cavalierly enough to adhere in our reply to the systematic arrangement of your eulogy; but being unfortunately possessed of a voracious appetite for information, we are in the outset most wickedly tempted to feast upon a barbarian episode, which though extremely vulgar your well known generosity will render relishable to us undoubtedly in a few days through instructing us in the art or method of counting and qualifying unhatched chickens. That strange things may occur in this year of Comets, all our back-wood philosophers unanimously concede; but nevertheless we confess that they were somewhat startled at the manœuvres and experiments of a certain Boston critic who attempted to employ his argus eye, which he industriously exercised for many years in prying into other folks' business, to penetrate an egg-shell at the present era. And why should not Barbarians, why should not all civilized nations startle at such a novel movement, for if it proves successful in the one case, why could not the same faculty be employed to penetrate the great deep, to tell the sorrowful Atlantic Telegraph Company the locality and nature of the defect in the obstinate telegraph wire. But to our great disappointment his faithful labor proves a total failure; for certainly his editorial observations in the journal of Oct. 23, do not in the least correspond with the facts as they now exist and appear before us. There he prophesied, glancing at an inoffensive embryo, the production of sundry bastards, such as short-winged clap-traps, long-billed impudences, lame humbugs, blind, bogus, featherless vulgarities and long-tailed nonsense; but to our astonishment, our barbarian scheme brought forth a goodly number of nice, sound, fat snug and jovial fellows, cheering and pleasing every body — 'tis strange how great men will err. But apologizing for our lengthy digression, we now humbly propose to return to our theme and to introduce the points in argument with candor and brevity.

In the article above referred to, you denounce a certain musical enterprise of our section as a clap-trap festival, on account of the humbug "professors," "judges" and "bogus honoraries" connected with it. We answer to this bold and frankly that your assertions and insinuations are pregnant with the basest and most contemptible falsehoods, and to vindicate our cause, we ask you to name us for instance our humbug professors; we affirm that there has not been a name inscribed in that respective list, but was fairly and honorably entitled to that appellation; they are all well known, competent and highly reputed instructors, earning their bread in the sweat of their brow, and working with diligence and self-denial for the promotion of an art and science ever dear to us; or is it then really possible, that the musical Autocrats of Boston swell into such vipers of self-conceit and absurdity, as to call every professional musician a humbug professor, who did not possess the good fortune to pass through their personal examination, or to receive an inaugural address from their pharisaic lips? Nay! we ask you once more candidly for the reasons of your terming our professional Musicians "humbug professors." In speaking of our judges, you seem to stagger over our venerable Bernard Covert (associate of Ossian Dodge?) What did you mean with that sign of interrogation? Excuse our ignorance, for we barbarians are very slow to comprehend; but we think that you hinted at a faint probability of his being with us at all. Now to this we answer firmly, that he favored and enlivened us with his presence from beginning to end. Never for once blushing to be identified with our musical movement; on the contrary, smiling upon our complete success, and ardently wishing for the speedy repetition of a similar enterprise. This is the sentiment of the composer of "Sword of Bunkerhill," but should his condescension influence you to cast also his name out as evil, and to plunge him in the abyss of barbarism, you may rest assured that he will fare then better, than among those frightful, critical ghosts, who with the murmurings of a death-march besiege the grave-yards of Boston.

In relation to the adjective, "bogus," which you attach to our honorary members, we would remark, that it applies exactly to one of them, we mean to the editor of the Boston Musical Journal; for when a writer of your rank and order totally suspends common sense and judgment and succumbs under a personal pique, occasioned by a slight, trivial and barbarian oversight in not asking your permission, hat in hand, to lend your name to a brave, pioneering, musical get-up, so as to hail upon it fire and brimstone as the awful revenge of an offended vanity, we all think, that, should in future another circular be issued on a similar occasion, it would appear much more respectable and attractive minus your name. We have since met with musical characters fully equal with you in importance, whose names we have used under similar circumstances, and strange to tell, they all have approved of it, and wished us a hearty God-speed.

Your would-be spicy comments upon our Programme, are marked with the same gross injustice and absolute want of charity, that characterized all your preceding criticism. In constructing the order of exercises for our Festival, we aimed at a well proportioned mixture of concert ingredients, keeping in view rather an agreeable variety, than an indiscreet association of homogeneous things. But your assertion that we have "Handel's Hallelujah" and "I know that my Redeemer" in immediate alternation with "American Ladies' Quickstep," "Mormon Quickstep" and "Sensitive Coon," is another bare-faced lie; * our Programme shows no such succession of pieces as you alluded to. And, finally, your attacks upon the national Drama of William Tell are in themselves too insignificant and ridiculous to be noticed even by a provincial correspondent. Now, in regard to the excommunicating Bull, which you introduced at the close of your article, we must confess, that you have made yourself obnoxious to every man of common sense, through your warfare with our honest attempt to raise the standard of music in this section of our country. Your disfiguring, misrepresenting language, used against a creditable enterprise, has met with a general indignation. Is this the reward, the encouragement, the stimulus, that self-denying musicians are to secure, when they combine and co-operate to improve the musical taste of the public, through a thorough and scientific drilling of the young, watchfully nursing their talents, and surprising their parents, patrons and friends with the first fruits of their genius in a "clap-trap" festival, as you will have it.

You denounce and ridicule us because we offer an endless variety to an appreciative audience. How many tastes have we to satisfy in an assembly of thousands? Freely we lavished upon them the vocal, instrumental, sacred and secular, serious and convivial, etc., exciting thus a general interest; being convinced at the same time that the pure and classical muse which prevailed in every concert, would prove the last and superseding impression with our audience, to engender nobler and better views of our art and science than they formerly entertained. And stand we alone in the adoption of such a method? Did not the same principle actuate the musical out-door festivals held under the auspices of Messrs. Maretzek and Anschütz in Jones's Wood, New York, and the musical jubilees celebrated in the valleys of Switzerland, in which we happened to participate.

But the strongest argument in our favor is, that our "clap-trap festival" has proved a complete success, and that everybody cries for more clap-trap. A happier, more harmonious, delightful and more musical time has never been spent with young and old, humbug professors and bogus honoraries, as at Goodwin's Ferry from Oct. 22, to Oct. 29, 1858. Long live the clap-trap festival! Now we would say, that we all have the highest esteem for your paper, and we could not do very well without it; its teachings, historical and biographical paragraphs, classical tone, exquisite reading matter, and miscellaneous musical notices, and especially its progressive spirit, render it to every musician an interesting, instructive and indispensable companion; but we hardly deem it advisable or practical in its able editor to spend a keg of powder, as long as there is no real enemy in sight; and confident that you will arrive at the same sensible conclusion at the first clearing of the fog, in expectation of an answer through your columns, we subscribe yours respectfully.

SENECA BARBARUS.

Musical Chit-Chat.

At last a beginning of good music; ear and inner sense have thirsted long. The MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB commence their tenth season of Chamber Concerts, at Chickering's rooms, next Thursday evening. They will be led by Mr. SCHULTZE, and assisted by that able young pianist, Mr. B. J. LANG, who will play (for a novelty) a Capriccio by Sterndale Bennett, with accompaniment. There will be a good old Beethoven Quartet, and a Mozart Quintet, a violin solo, and other good things. We hope now soon to hear that Mr. ZERRAHN's subscription for Orchestral Concerts is made up, and that the rehearsals of Beethoven Symphonies, &c., by the orchestra of fifty, have commenced in earnest. But it depends entirely on the promptness of the music-loving public, to give in their names in season and secure the annual Symphonic feast. . . . The ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB held one of their delightful little musical "sociables" at their club room, Wednesday evening, which we were sorry to be obliged to lose. Why will they not give some more public concerts? . . . The rehearsals of the "Israel in Egypt" choruses go on bravely in the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

Mr. TRENKLE, our excellent and much esteemed pianist has returned from Germany — earlier than he intended; for it seems he narrowly escaped the strong paternal gripe of Prussian law in Leipzig, which raised a question about his passport, and would peremptorily have made a soldier of him (such being the liability of Prussian emigrants caught back in Vaterland again under the age of thirty). But after a two-days' examination, our young friend escaped with a costs and petty fine, on the condition of quitting Germany instantly. What he loses in enjoyment of German Art and genial life, he will gain here at least in freedom. We are sorry to state that Mr. T's health is not improved; nevertheless, with care and moderate exertion in his calling as a teacher, there is good hope of his gradual recovery. Mr. T. made our mouth water with his account of the Beethoven Symphony performance that he heard in Leipzig; — orchestra on the scale of 12 first and 12 second violins, 8 double basses, &c., all of them artists, led by David; long practice and complete, hearty love of their work; the most musical of audiences; and surrounding all, inspiring all, a real atmosphere of Art, which is the thing wanting here! . . . OTTO DRESSEL's health, we hear, is much improved. He has been most of the time in Frankfurt and in Leipzig, full of spirits, and composing constantly, which such as he do only when they have the real inspiration. He will probably return to Boston by the middle of December. . . . Mr. KIELBLOCK has returned, in health and spirits, and is ready for his pupils.

The MENDELSSOHN UNION, in New York, give their first concert of the season next week, when they will perform Mendelssohn's "St. Paul", assisted by Mr. C. R. ADAMS, tenor, of this city, and by FORMES and other artists of the operatic company.

We mentioned some time since the prizes offered by the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Florence, for the best productions, on given subjects, in Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Music, &c. We see by the Monitore Toscano of Oct. 4, that the triennial "Concorso," or competition, has taken place, and in the list of "Premiati," or prize-winners, it is gratifying to read the name of FRANCIS BOOTT of Boston, as having received the "accessit" to the first prize for musical composition (the first having been awarded to Prof. Alessandro Biagi, of Florence). The subject on which the competitors exercised their skill and invention was "The Canticle of Zaccaria: Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, for four voices, with accompaniment of full orchestra." Of course the prestige must have been against all foreigners, and that an American should have been adjudged worthy of the second place, speaks highly of his production and of the fairness of the judges.

"Trovator's" letter is too late for our press this week; but he tells us: "Mr. Ullman is making a great deal of money at the opera. He gave a matinee on Saturday, when, notwithstanding a driving rain, the house was crowded in every part, the receipts amounting to some $4,000. The entertainments consisted of La Fille du Regiment, with PICCOLOMINI and FORMES, and the last act of Favorita, with GAZZANIGA and LORINI. Wednesday night Don Giovanni was produced with unrivalled effect, PICCOLOMINI, GAZZANIGA, GHIONI, FORMES, GASIER, all appearing." "Trovator" will tell us more of this next week. The other matter of his present letter will keep.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Courier (Oct. 21), gives the following lively survey of the present state of Opera in that metropolis.

First, then, as to the Italiene. This used to be the resort of the aristocracy of every kind and sort. Under the Restoration of the Government of July, whatever had a name in French history, whether in politics, in the army, in the so-called "world," or in the world of high art, all thronged here; and if you wanted to meet any of those men or women who, for various reasons, have in every capital a world-wide celebrity, you were all but sure to meet them at the Italiene. In the latter days of Louis Philippe, the bitterest enemies met at the Salle Ventadour, and those who had abused each other like pickpockets in either Chamber in the morning, voted together in the evening in support of La Grisi or of Rubini. Before the quartette of the Puritani or the finale to the second act of Lucia, where could any opposition find place?

These times are gone—forever gone, I fear. What is termed society has deserted les Italiens, and it would be hard to say where it goes instead, unless you track it to inferior theatres, the great merit whereof it is to show up all the world to itself—grand monde, and demi-monde, and all the "worlds" smaller still, whereof those who live in or out of them seem to rejoice in observing the manners and customs. Now, if society had abandoned les Italiens because les Italiens are so decidedly inferior, I should say society was right; but in that case the mischief would soon cure itself. M. Calgado said, that if better singers brought him more subscribers, he would soon contrive to have the best singers in Europe. But not a bit. They had here one of the last really great singers of Italian music whom we shall ever hear, la Frezzolini; but they said she was "too thin," or "too old," or that her voice was no longer "fresh," or something of that sort, and they let her go, instead of religiously listening to her very last notes. And when one gets angry at their indifference, and when one says to them, "But la Frezzolini was one of the finest singers ever heard," they stare at you, listlessly, and answer, "Well, I'm no judge; I did not like her looks." Just now they have got two stalwart, dashing, slashing artists, la Penco Graziani, (the brother) a tenor, and they seem as well satisfied with them as though they were really worthy bearing, which they are not. The class of people who frequent the Italian opera here now, is a totally different one, and the few French who go there are the "nouveaux riches" to whom music seems seriously to have small charms. The rest of the audience is composed of foreigners.

Then, as to the Grand Opera; this is altogether a mere official business. The Emperor absolutely hates music, it is disagreeable to him; the Empress submits to, but does not like it; the Court thinks of it as something that may or may not be, but that furnishes a pretext for showing off fine dresses. The Opera, as it is called absolutely, is so entirely a Court and household affair that it is impossible now for any nominal director of it to make anything by his direction. He must, in all necessity, lose; for the boxes subscribed for by public functionaries (who are in favor) may or may not be regularly paid for, (often are not so) and he is never allowed to refuse the demand of any Court dandy who sends to him for a box or stall gratis. At the same time it is, from pure ostentation, enjoined upon him to secure the most celebrated singers he can find, and give them any price! What is the result? that the opera direction is perpetually having its debts paid by the State. As to the artists, the music sung at the Grand Opera, and the manner of singing it, are so prejudicial to the voice, that, spite of all advantages many singers now refuse, and Meyerbeer is delaying any new work because he says truly that no singers are forthcoming. Roger—a real talent—has been worn out in a few years. Gueymard, a splendid voice, has been destroyed; Mme. Lauters and la Cruvelli resisted, but one left the stage early, and the other is showing signs of fatigue although not yet five and twenty; as to Madame Borghi-Mamo, the "great gun" of the Opera, she is done for. She sings as out of tune as all the rest do, and her fine voice, by being forever forced out of its limits and what promised to be her fine style, by being forever perverted from its purpose, have both given way. So much for the Opera, where, if the ballet did not come to the rescue, matters would soon be in a sorry plight.

But in the two minor lyrical theatres of Paris there is talent perhaps incomparable. At the Opera Comique we have Faure, of whom it is not too much to say that at the present moment he is the most perfect singer in Europe. This young man (he is not 28) has a voice of such prodigious compass that he can sing both Gilluame Tell and Arnold in Rossini's famous opera. It is a voice of almost unequalled richness, purity, facility and truth of intonation. But added to this—and the instance is a very rare one—he has studied his art with such ardor and perseverance that his style and method are as fine as ever were Crescentini's, Nozzari's or any of those heroes of song in Italy some seventy years ago. Faure knows this well. He is a profound musician, in every sense a master, and he will not, for any inducement put his career in danger. He has refused all the offers of the Opera, and has forced the Opera Comique into giving him fabulously high terms. Here we come again to the public. Do not suppose that such full houses are drawn to the Opera Comique to hear Faure sing. No! they are attracted by the exceeding handsomeness of his looks and splendor of his costumes, or (it may be sometimes) by Mme. Cabel's ankles and piquant air when she plays men's parts, for as to her vocal attractions, they, too, are 'used up.'

The other theatre, that has every right to a brilliant reputation, is the Theatre Lyrique. This was originally established in order that young, obscure composers might find a stage on which to bring forth their creations; but the youthful obscure were soon found to exercise no influence whatever on the public, and M. Carvalho, the director, having married Mlle. Miolan, resolved to play the young composers' works on alternate nights with the works of the great defunct. Accordingly you may see names you never heard, and perhaps never will hear, by the side of those of Weber and Mozart, and at the Theatre Lyrique only have you a chance, in this town, of hearing the chefs d'œuvre of the musical art. I have advised you of Faure,—well, by his side I must place Mme. Miolan. This lady is quite without a rival in her sex. Neither Sontag, nor Persiani, nor Damoreau, nor any earthly woman ever did the impossibilities Mme. Miolan does, nor did them as she does—as though they were the enjoyment of her life. She executes what is impossible with a grace that makes it charming, and that gives it the appearance of ease. As to the truth of her intonation, it is miraculous, and you feel it to be infallible. There is a drawback to all this: Mme. Miolan's voice is originally not a pleasing one. It is thin; and, however true and pure, expressionless and devoid of natural pathos. But she makes up for this by art of so wonderful a kind, that you forget any defect and hang enraptured on her method of phrasing an andante of some classic author. If the French cared for music, pilgrimages would be made to hear this gifted creature. There is no genuine music lover who, having once heard her, would not willingly go any distance on foot to hear her again. Last month the Theatre Lyrique revived anew the Nozze di Figaro, and probably the execution was about the best heard in our days. Mme. Ugalde's Susanna was vulgar; but Caroline Duprez's Contessa was delightfully elegant and chaste, though her voice is daily diminishing; and Mme. Miolan's Cherubino was one of those gems never to be banished from memory.

PARIS.—At the Lyrique they have reproduced Weber's Preciosa; and a host of musical novelties are promised at this theatre. Madame Grisi will appear much earlier at the Italiens this season than she has of late years. She is to appear in Verdi's Mac-betto. Mr. Harris, stage director of Covent-garden Opera, is engaged by M. Calzado to superintend the bringing out of this opera.

An event which indicates the commencement of our winter season has occurred this week. The Théâtre Italien was opened to the fashionable world under very attractive arrangements. The manager has secured the services of the most famed artists of the day, and is laboring to place each opera on the stage on an improved system as regards chorus, scenery, &c., &c.

The opera selected for the opening night was La Traviata, never a favorite in Paris. There are only two events to record in connection with the reproduction of this opera, viz., the appearance of Madame Penco as the "Traviata," and Graziani, a tenor new to a Paris audience. Madame Penco became universally acknowledged as one of the first prime donne of the Italian stage when she sang at Naples in the Tro-vatore for some fifty nights in succession. We well remember the rare richness of her soprano voice. The same power, the same pleasing quality remains, but now used with an artistic knowledge which she did not possess at the beginning of her career. In Madame Penco we have an example of a singer who has not lost her vocal powers before she obtained the perfection of her art. During the whole opera she sung with a purity of tone and distinctness which displayed the large resources of her organ and complete confidence in its delivery. Her tremolo is one remarkable for a sustained evenness and clearness.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Far away where angels dwell. Jacqu. Blumenthal. 30

This is a free translation of that celebrated concert-song of Mario's: "the chemin de paradis," which has since been placed by many a distinguished tenor singer on his répertoire. It is a ballad in the French sense of the word, or, as we would have it, a versified tale, of touching import. The song stands in its original key, the key of F.

Regret. Song. Geo. Linley. 25

The open window. " 25

Farewell to home. " 25

The latest songs of these favorite composers, both equally distinguished for the grace and winning elegance of their style. They are much in vogue in England now, and will not be thought of less favorable in this country.

Our Land. Patriotic Song. T. Comer. 50

This song has all the qualities which should make it prominent among the patriotic songs, old and new. Of Comer's music it is needless to say anything in recommendation. It is, what it always has been, fresh, vigorous, and to the point. The words are very fine.

Song of the winds. J. J. Clarke. 25

Very much in the style of Neukomm's celebrated song of the "Sea"—words and music nicely wedded.

FIVE THOUSAND MUSICAL TERMS. A complete Dictionary of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, French, German, Spanish, English and such other Words, Phrases, Abbreviations and Signs, as are found in the works of Auber, Beethoven, Bertini, Bergmuller, Carulli, Cramer, Czerny, Donizetti, Haydn, Handel, Herz, Hungen, Labitsky, Listz, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Rinck, Spohr, Thalberg, Warren, Weber, and other eminent musical Composers. The whole including the celebrated dictionaries of Dr. Busby, Czerny, Grassineau and Hamilton, arranged, revised and corrected by John S. Adams. To which is added a Treatise on Organ and Pianoforte Playing by Figures, &c. 50

The above Musical Dictionary contains twice the number of words of any other, and two thousand more definitions than Hamilton's. The Musical World says: "There are many Musical Dictionaries extant, some larger, yet with less number of defined words; some smaller, and containing only what everybody knows now-a-days without a dictionary; but none that we know of, or can now recollect, so convenient in size, so concise in definition, so thorough in plan and so perfect in execution."

Once upon a time, in those days when the worship of Isis and Osiris prevailed in Egypt, and when beings of a spiritual nature were sometimes found under the power of mortal men, there dwelt in a delicious valley, among certain mountains upon the banks of the Nile, which have since disappeared from the maps, a man of grand and lofty nature, who united in himself the characters of an earthly prince and high priest of the gods. His name was Sarastro. His dwelling was a huge edifice, half palace, half temple, one of the noblest monuments of the old Egyptian sacred architecture. It contained within itself courts filled with tropical trees and flowers, adorned with fountains and statues of the gods — places for study and meditation — and around it were wide-spread gardens, extending on the one hand to the mountains, on the other to the waters of the sacred river — devoted to innocent pleasure, to mirth and joy.

Sarastro was the grand master of the Mysteries of Isis, and the great duty of his life, the grand aim of his thoughts and acts was to encourage virtue, to aid all who sought true wisdom for its own sake, to watch over and guard them during their periods of probation, and finally, to receive and consecrate them as members of the holy fraternity of which he was the head.

A band of noble and reverend men shared with him the mysteries and duties of the temple and its worship; trains of black slaves awaited his bidding and performed the menial offices of his palace; men servants and women servants, followers and dependents of all sorts added to the grandeur of his state as temporal prince.

In the same region of the world, in a castle built in the darkest and most gloomy style of Egyptian architecture, the entrance to which was through a cavern, that yawned beneath its massive walls, dwelt a mysterious being — the Queen of Night. She was of a haughty, proud, and revengeful nature, loving darkness rather than light; the opposite in character, as in sex, of Sarastro. Her dress was black as the thick darkness, but bright sparkling with stars, and, when she appeared to human eyes, vivid lightnings and rolling thunders announced her presence. Three women, also dressed and veiled in black, were her familiar spirits and executed her commands. The wedded life of the now widowed Queen had been blest by the birth of a single daughter, Pamina, a lovely and gentle being, whose spiritual tendencies were as virtuous as her person was charming. To save her from the evil influences which surrounded her, to give her virtues the opportunity of development, and to save her from temptation and sin, Sarastro had caused her to be taken from her mother and brought to his abode of wisdom and peace.

In the Queen's mind grief and revenge struggled for the mastery — but against the power of the great ruler and priest she was helpless. She sought in vain to regain her daughter, equally in vain to punish Sarastro.

It happened that while the Queen was in this state of mind, nourishing her hatred and revengeful feelings, a young prince, upon his travels, Tamino by name, came near her castle. Whether through the arts of the Queen of Night or not does not appear, though it is probable, the prince became separated from his followers and, while unarmed and defenceless, was attacked by a huge serpent. He could only fly and call for help, and at length, overcome by fatigue and terror, hard by the entrance to the Queen's castle, he swooned and fell. At this instant the three women, attendants of the queen, flew from the cave and transfixed the monster with their silver javelins. The three were equally struck by the grace and beauty of the youth, and neither one was willing to allow another to remain with him while the others reported the adventure to their mistress. But this must be done, and the dispute resulted in their going all together, and leaving Tamino still in his swoon, from which he was awakened by the entrance of a new character upon the scene. This was a jolly, rollicking, prating, cowardly knave, ready to lie even when the truth would answer his purpose better, by name Papageno, by occupation a bird-catcher, a huge eater and drinker, sadly in love with pretty damsels, and now come, with cage on back, to strike bargains with the Queen's ladies.

Placing his cage upon the ground in front of the palace, he announced his presence by repeated blasts of his Pan's pipes and a lively song suited to his character and occupation, too busy with his own affairs to notice the prince or the dead serpent.

Tamino, recalled to himself, at the close of the bird-catcher's song drew near, and asked him who he was.

"Who am I?" replied the bird-catcher. "Perhaps it would be as well for me to ask who you may be?"

"I am one, whose father rules over many lands, mountains and valleys," replied the prince.

"What? are there other lands and mountains than these?" said Papageno.

After some conversation of like import, the prince, seeing no other person, pointed to the serpent, with the inquiry whether he was indebted for his life to him, Papageno. The bird-catcher trembled in every limb at the sight, until convinced that it was dead, when he at once claimed the credit of having slain it, by the mere strength of his muscular arms. During his description of his conflict with the animal, the three women had drawn near unperceived, and overheard this falsehood, as well as others which he added to it, in reply to Tamino's inquiries in relation to them. One of them suddenly stepped up to him, applied a heavy padlock to his lips, reducing his entire vocabulary to "hm, hm, hm," and sent him about his business.

Being now free from the loquacity of the bird-catcher, they addressed themselves to the prince, told him of the Queen, their mistress, and of the loss she had sustained. Whether in consequence of the report which the three women had made of the beauty of the stranger, or of a preconceived plan, does not appear, but the Queen had determined to make Tamino the instrument by which she should regain Pamina, and at the same time be revenged upon Sarastro. In hope of awaking in him a passion for her daughter, she sent him by the women Pamina's miniature. It had the desired effect. His breast was agitated, as he looked at it, with feelings until then unknown — it kindled a passion as deep and strong as it was sudden.

The impression being made which the Queen had hoped, it suddenly became dark, thunders rolled, the women fell upon their knees and bowed their heads at the entrance of the cave, and their mistress, in her star-spangled robe, stood before them.

She addressed herself at once to Tamino, bade him fear not, and expressed her confidence that, through the aid of such an one as he, the sad heart of a mother might be comforted. She told him the story of the abduction of her daughter, gained his sympathy not only in her sorrow, but in her desire of vengeance, and promised him, should he succeed in rescuing Pamina, to give her to him in marriage. The prince gladly undertook the adventure and swore to risk all for the rescue of the maiden.

Another burst of thunder, and the Queen had vanished. Poor Papageno, who in the meantime had tried in vain to release his lips, now came back and with piteous gestures and sorrowful "hm, hm, hm," besought Tamino to remove the padlock. But this was beyond his power. The women, however, thinking him sufficiently punished for his falsehoods, relieved him, with an earnest caution to beware in future of lying.

To Tamino, now engaged in her service, they brought from their mistress an enchanted flute, cut from the heart of an oak of a thousand years by the father of Pamina, in whose tones was hidden so magical a power, as to protect its bearer in all dangers, to change the passions of men, make the sad joyous, and fill the envious and proud heart with friendship and love.

To Papageno, who would gladly have retained his humble position as a bird-catcher, but who was forced into the service of Tamino by command of the Queen, they gave a casket, containing a set of musical bells, similar in power to the Magic Flute.

Thus equipped for the adventure, it only remained to learn the way to the castle-temple of Sarastro. To the inquiries of the prince the three women informed him that three spirits, in the likeness of boys, would hover around him to guard and guide, whose advice and directions alone he must follow. "So fare you well! We must away. Farewell, to meet some other day."

Pamina, meantime, might have been happy in the peaceful halls of the priest of Isis, but for the feelings natural to a daughter, and for the audacious passion of an ugly negro, Monostatos, the head of Sarastro's troop of black slaves, who took advantage of his position, to treat her as a prisoner, and to force his disgusting attentions upon her. In the afternoon of that day upon which the Queen of Night had gained an ally in Prince Tamino, the negro succeeded in forcing Pamina into a lonely apartment in the castle, and threatened her with death, unless she would consent to become his bride. But death to her, save for her mother's sake, would be happiness, as a deliverance from his persecutions. He called his slaves to fetter her with chains; but seeing her faint and fall upon the divan, he sent them away, and knelt beside her to gaze undisturbed upon her charms, and cover her white hand with kisses. At this moment, Papageno, who had been sent before as a messenger by his new master to seek Pamina, and who through the carelessness of Monostatos had gained an entrance into the castle, came stealthily into the apartment. The figure and face of the beautiful Pamina instantly caught his eye and filled him with admiration, to which his tongue, as usual, gave utterance. The negro started up affrighted. Papageno was no less frightened by the black face of Monostatos. Each took the other for the devil, and, after some moments doubt and hesitation, fled in different directions. Papageno, however, soon conquered his fear, reasoning that as there were black birds, there might well be black men, and returned to Pamina. Satisfying himself, from a careful comparison of her features with those depicted in the miniature, which Tamino had entrusted to his care, that the lady was none other than the daughter of the Queen of Night, and the beloved of his master, he related to her all that had passed, and besought her to trust herself to him and escape. Pamina hesitated from fear that he was not what he pretended, but at length was convinced, and they left the castle together.

Tamino, guided by the three boys, advanced directly towards the great gates of Sarastro's castle. Having reached the open space before them, they pointed thither and said: "Yonder is the way to your object; but only by manly courage can you conquer. Hear, then, our final instructions; be steadfast, patient, and silent."

"But tell me," said the Prince, "whether I shall rescue Pamina?"

"This is not for us to make known. Be steadfast, patient, and silent. Be a man! and then, though but a youth, like a man shalt thou conquer!" Thus saying they vanished.

"Be steadfast, patient, and silent," said the Prince to himself; "so may I attain unto wisdom—let this admonition be forever engraven upon my heart."

And now, as he looked around and measured with his eyes the vastness and grandeur of the palace-temple before whose gates he stood, he was filled with astonishment and wonder. It seemed to him a seat worthy of the gods themselves. Everything proved to him that here were united persevering industry, high art and the wisest adaptation of means to ends; but the Queen had impressed him so strongly against Saraastro, that instead of seeing in the glory and magnificence of all before him proofs of his wisdom, goodness and power, he drew the conclusion that he, the monster tyrant, must be hated by so enlightened a people, who could need but an energetic prince for a leader to rise against him and destroy him. Encouraged by these reflections, and by the thought that none could have nobler and purer motives for action than he, he advanced to one of the grand portals; but even before he had knocked for admittance, a chorus of unseen voices, in awful tones, stayed his farther progress by the single word "Retire!" The same warning met him at a second door. Undismayed he drew near to a third. Without awaiting his knock, it opened, and a venerable priest, clad in the pure robes of his office, as one sees to this day depicted upon the monuments and in the catcombs of Egypt, came forth and addressed him thus:

"Whither wilt thou, rash stranger? What seekest thou in this holy place?"

"That which virtue and love claim for their own."

"Truly words of lofty sense! But how wilt thou find them? Love and virtue are not thy guides, but thoughts of death and vengeance."

"But vengeance only upon a monster."

"Such an one," said the priest, "thou wilt hardly find among us."

"But Sarastro rules in these valleys!" said Tamino.

"Yes, here rules Sarastro."

"But not in the temple of Wisdom," exclaimed the Prince, astonished.

"Yes, also in the Temple," replied the priest.

"Then it is all pretense and hypocrisy," said Tamino, and turned away.

"Wilt thou then so soon depart?"

"Yes, I will go, and enjoy my freedom and happiness, nor even enter your temple."

"Explain thyself further, thou art the victim of some deception."

"Sarastro dwells here, that is sufficient." (Going.)

"Lovest thou thy life, remain and answer me. Thou hatest Sarastro?"

"With an eternal hate!"

"Give me thy reasons."

"He is a monster and a tyrant."

"Hast thou proof of this?"

"An unhappy mother, bowed with sorrow and anguish, has proved it to me."

"A woman, then, has turned thy head? Ah, women are weak in action but great in talk! And thou hast trusted one? Ah, would Sarastro but explain to thee the object he has in view!"

"His object is but too clear. Did not the robber pitilessly tear Pamina from her mother's arms?"

"Yes, what thou sayest is true."

"Where is she, then? perhaps already offered as a victim!"

"It is neither the time, nor is it for me, my son, to answer this. My oath and duty bind my tongue."

"When will the veil be removed?"

"At the moment when the hand of friendship shall lead thee into the holy place to join the immortal brotherhood."

Thus saying, the priest turned away, the portals opened, and he passed from the sight of Tamino.

The prince's bosom was torn with conflicting emotions. The demeanor of the priest, the respect, veneration, and love for Sarastro, which every word indicated, failed not in their effect upon the youth; he could but contrast all that he saw and heard with the darkness and gloom which surrounded the Queen of Night, and with the wild strong passions which she had exhibited. The desire for true wisdom, pity for the Queen, love for the original of the miniature, all agitated him, and above all, the desire to know the real character of Sarastro. In his spirit all was darkness and gloom, and an indescribable longing for something, he knew not what, had seized him.

"When wilt thou pass, oh, everlasting night,
And these too weary eyes behold celestial light?"

To this cry of the Prince, a choir of invisible voices replied in mysterious tones: "Ere long, or nevermore!"

Surprised, but rejoiced that his words, involuntarily spoken, had been heard and answered, he ventured to ask if Pamina still lived, and the same chorus replied, "Pamina liveth still!"

The current of his feelings changed, joy for Pamina, gratitude to the unseen beings, dawning hope—all sought expression, and this could only be in music; and now for the first time he applied the flute to his lips and saw proof of its magical powers. At its first sweet tones, wild beasts,—apes, bears, and the like—came flocking from the neighboring forests, tamed and gentle, ready to lie down with the lamb, moving their uncouth limbs in harmonious action to the sounds of the music. If the flute has this power over the beasts of the forest, what if it should farther prove a means of communication with Pamina? thought he, "Oh! Pamina, hear me, hear!" A few moments more, and his tones were answered by the Pan's pipe of Papageno in the distance. Tamino instantly knew the sound, and hurried away to find his servant, hoping that he had, at least, seen Pamina. Deceived by the echoes he took the wrong direction, and was hardly out of sight when Papageno and Pamina, who had succeeded in eluding their pursuers, and in finding their way through the labyrinths of the temple and gardens, appeared in front of the castle. Now could they but find Tamino! for there was danger every moment that Monostatos and his slaves would be upon them. They had heard his flute and knew that he could not be far away; and Pamina in her anxiety and terror thoughtlessly called aloud for him. Papageno hushed her at once, and applied himself to his Pan's pipe as a better means of announcing their presence to Tamino, and one not likely to be suspected by Monostatos. The flute at once answered the tone, and in the next moment they would all have been together and might easily have escaped, but for the unfortunate call of Pamina to her lover, which had betrayed them and brought at this instant the negro and his whole train of slaves upon them. Pamina at once lost all hope, and so for the moment did her companion; but he, arrant coward as he was, had sometimes sense enough to have his thoughts about him, and, at this crisis it suddenly occurred to him that the three women had given him the casket of bells as a protection. How it could be so, what magic power it could have, what were to be the effects produced by his playing upon it, of all this he

In him we find all the marks whereby to recognize the culminating powers of his art; he has been universal. Certain composers excel in the theatre, others in the church; this one in the fugue or the quatuor, that one in the chamber duet or the cantata; but Handel has treated all styles, and has excelled in all, whether the subject be gay or serious, light or solemn, profane or sacred. He would be the Shakespeare of music if he were not the Michael Angelo. Like Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, he composed instrumental music, which is as powerful as his vocal music. The Suites de Pièces pour le Clavecin and the Organ Concertos would be alone sufficient to place his name in the first rank. To appreciate the value of the Suites de Pièces, it is only necessary to quote the few words by M. Fétis: "These compositions are of the most beautiful style, and can be compared only with pieces of the same sort composed by Bach." This comparison with Bach is, in the mouth of Fétis, an enormous compliment. Hawkins had already said: "Without the hazard of contradiction or the necessity of an exception, it may be asserted of these comsitions that they are the most masterly productions of the kind that we know in the world." Burney, speaking of the Organ Concertos, says: "Public players on keyed instruments, as well as private, totally subsisted on these concertos for nearly thirty years."

The overtures of Handel are extremely short, as was then the custom; they have none of those symphonic dimensions which are now given to that style of composition. "The most elaborate of them never cost him," as Hawkins affirms, "more than a morning's labor." Nevertheless, some of them include marvellous fugues. The celebrated critic, Marpurg, in his Lettres sur la Musique, declares that he could never listen without emotion to that one in the second overture to Admetus. The celebrity which the Hauboy Concertos enjoyed during the last century makes one regret that Handel lived in a time when concerted music had not taken its full development.

Men who have been thus admirable in all the branches of art are rare. It is to be remarked that men like Gluck, Cimarosa, Mehln, and Rossini have not dared to write for instruments; they lack this gem in their glorious diadems. There, in fact, is the rock upon which all those geniuses, upon whom Nature has not lavished all her gifts, make shipwreck. Judges say that Leo, Porpora, Hasse, and Piccini are quite beneath themselves in their instrumental music. They inhabit Olympus, but they are only demi-gods.

In that musical Olympus the most divine masters have given to Handel the place of Jupiter Tonans. "He is the father of us all," exclaimed the patriarchal Haydn. "Handel," said the dramatic Mozart, "knows better than any one of us all what is capable of producing a great effect; when he chooses he can strike like a thunderbolt." The lyrical Beethoven called him "the monarch of the musical kingdom. He was the greatest composer that ever lived," said he to Mr. Moscheles. "I would uncover my head, and kneel before his tomb." Beethoven was on the point of death, when one of his friends sent him, as a present, forty volumes by Handel. He ordered that they should be brought into his chamber, gazed upon them with a reanimated eye, and then pointing to them with his finger, he pronounced these words, "There is the truth."

What a magnificent subject for a picture! David did not select a more inspiring one in the "Death of Socrates," to which he has given a second immortality. Is it not grand to see these noble geniuses standing before each other on the threshold of eternity? Is it not beautiful to see the author of the English oratorios arising, as it were, from the tomb, to present his works to the author of the symphony in D, who greeted him with a sublime death?

Handel was not the less excellent as a performer than as a composer. He played to perfection on the harpsichord, and above all upon the organ, his favorite instrument. As an improviser, there was only Sebastian Bach who could be compared with him. Hawkins, who heard him, says: "Who shall describe its effects on his enraptured auditory? Silence, the truest applause, succeeded the instant that he addressed himself to the instrument, and that so profound that it checked respiration, and seemed to control the functions of nature; while the magic of his touch kept the attention of his hearers awake only to those enchanting sounds to which it gave utterance."

Handel exercised the same power over his hearers from his infancy. At eleven years of age he threw all Berlin into an ecstasy; at twenty, Hamburg declared his voluntaries of fugues and counterpoint to be superior to those of Kuhnau of Leipzig, who had been regarded as a prodigy. Festing and Dr. Arne, who were present in 1733 at the ceremony of the Oxford Public Act, when he played a voluntary upon the organ, told Burney that "neither themselves, nor any one else of their acquaintance, had ever before heard such extempore or such premeditated playing on that or any other instrument." His execution seized every body with amazement from the very first moment. Busby relates the following fact: "One Sunday, having attended divine worship in a country church, Handel asked the organist to permit him to play the people out, to which he readily consented. Handel accordingly sat down to the organ, and began to play in such a masterly manner as instantly to attract the attention of the whole congregation, who, instead of vacating their seats as usual, remained for a considerable time fixed in silent admiration. The organist began to be impatient (perhaps his wife was waiting dinner), and at length addressed the great performer, telling him he was convinced that he could not play the people out, and advised him to relinquish the attempt, for while he played they would never quit the church."

In like manner, when he was at Venice, he enjoyed a curious triumph. Arriving in the middle of the carnival, he was conducted that very evening to a masked fête, at which he played upon the harpsichord, with his mask upon his face; on hearing which, Domenico Scarlatti, who happened to be present, cried out, "'Tis the devil, or the Saxon of whom every one is talking." Scarlatti was the first player upon the harpsichord in Italy. What took place at Rome between Handel and Corelli still more forcibly proves that our composer was stronger upon the violin than the greatest virtuoso of his time. Mainwaring relates that Arcangelo Corelli had great difficulty in playing certain very bold passages in Handel's overtures, and that the latter, who was unfortunately very violent, once snatched the violin out of his hand and played it himself as it ought to be.

Every musical faculty was carried in him to the highest point. He had an inexhaustible memory. Burney heard him, while giving lessons to Mrs. Cibber, play a jig from the overture of Siroe, which he had composed twenty years before. It has been seen that the blindness with which he was attacked in 1753 did not prevent him from playing an organ concerto at every performance up to the termination of his career, and he did not always improvise. He sang also marvellously well. "At a concert, at the house of Lady Rich, he was once prevailed with to sing a slow song, which he did in such a manner, that Farinelli, who was present, could not be persuaded to sing after him."

But let me remind the young, that however prodigious may be the gifts accorded by nature to her elect, they can only be developed and brought to their extreme perfection by labor and study. Michael Angelo was sometimes a week without taking off his clothes. Like him, and like all the other kings of art, Handel was very industrious. He worked immensely and constantly. Hawkins says that "he had a favorite Rucker harpsichord, every key of which, by incessant practice, was hollowed like the bowl of a spoon." He was not only one of the most gifted of musicians, but also one of the most learned. All competent critics admit that his fugues prove that his knowledge was consummate.

It is a singular circumstance in his life that his genius gave him an indirect part in almost all the events of his century. His music was required to celebrate successively the birth-day of Queen Anne, the marriage of the Prince of Wales (George the Third's father), that of the Princess Royal to the Prince of Orange, the coronation of George the Second, the burial of Queen Caroline (all great events in those days), the Peace of Utrecht and that of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the victories of Culloden and Dettingen. To this day there is no great public funeral at which the Dead March in Saul is not used for impressing the mind with the solemnity of the occasion.

One may be disposed to say that Handel himself was a great conqueror. Thanks to his indefatigable perseverance, to his moral courage, to his indomitable will, and to his masterpieces, he succeeded, before he died, in dissipating the cabals which had been formed against him, in crushing folly, and in conquering universal admiration. The public was enlightened by the torch which he held constantly in his hand; the impression which he left behind is profound and living. It is ineffaceable. There is no other similar example in the history of art, of the influence which one man can exercise over an entire people. All the music of this country is Handelian, and if the English love, seek after, and cultivate, more than any other nation, Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, they are indebted to the author of The Messiah for it. No man in any country has dominated more generally over men's minds in his sphere of action, no composer ever enjoyed in his native land a more unlimited popularity.

Musical Correspondence.

SKETCH OF PROF. DEHN.—(Concluded.)

BERLIN, SEPT. 26.—The limited number of Dehn's works may easily be accounted for. Men who have so marvellous a talent for accumulating knowledge, find, above all others, as they advance, "hills o'er hills and Alps o'er Alps" rising ever before them. Unless it be in their power to devote themselves to a work or series of works for a long time uninterruptedly, they never feel that they have fully mastered their subjects. The time to begin working up their accumulated materials never comes.

Dehn too was a librarian, a man who, of a small collection, was determined to make one, which should be certainly in some parts unrivalled. His attention was thus drawn from his own studies and writings to a very great extent.

Again, for this daily four hours' attendance at the Library, for all the valuable knowledge, all the zeal and all the extra labor, which he brought and freely gave to the great end of making the Royal Musical Collection complete—for all this he was generously rewarded with the title of Professor and—500 thalers—$375 per annum!—a sum not quite sufficient to pay his rent and keep his dwelling warm. Hence out of the Library there was little time for the work to which he would have gladly given all his days and nights. He sometimes said to us at the Library; when he saw that we hesitated to trouble him with questions and yet needed assistance, "Come to me, you will find me a living lexicon, you have only to open such or such a page and find what you want". This was indeed so; but he never said it boastingly; nor when any were present save those who he knew would understand it jocosely, as he meant it.

I often heard him urged by musical men to waste no time ere committing to writing his great stores of curious knowledge. One work was particularly mentioned—a treatise upon ancient modes of notation. Dehn would gladly do this, but—but—there was his family to be supported, his catalogues of Bach and other divisions of the Library to finish, his new edition of his Harmony and his Lassus to be prepared, and the like—so soon as he could find any spare time—then, &c.

Ledebur, writer of one of the notices of Dehn lying before me, says on this point: "It is a great loss to the musical world that Dehn never placed before the public a work containing his method of reading ancient notation. I urged him several times to do this, but he always answered that he had so many other works in progress as for the present not to be able to think of this."

When I first wrought in the Library, eight years ago, his abrupt and sometimes impatient "Well, what will you have?" as I labored in my imperfect German to state my wants and wishes in relation to books, sometimes confused and annoyed me. I soon learned that it was but his manner arising from the pressing nature of his occupation. He thought with the rapidity of lightning. Our acquaintance ran through some years, and during them all, his kindness and willingness to aid me were undeviating. The quartet and trio parties, with but some half dozen auditors—at which he played violoncello, his sister-in-law, Miss Wedel, a splendid artist and a pupil of his, the pianoforte, and other artists, as it happened, the other instruments, which were sometimes at his own house and sometimes at that of the mother-in-law, are among my pleasantest recollections of Berlin.

Here I saw Dehn free from all care and labor, kind, good humored, full of anecdote and wit, the life and soul of the company. How I was touched the other day to learn, that when ill and worn out I left Berlin in April, 1856, he said in a tone indicating real sympathy, "I shall never see T. again!"—His words soon proved true—but not as he feared.

Presumptuous ignorance was that which of all things he could least endure in any person. His sarcasms, which he could not avoid, when a man came to him and talked learnedly about that upon which he knew nothing, made him many enemies; but whoever, he saw, was working steadily with no object other than the truth—to this man he gave all aid and assistance in his power.

"Now Dehn is gone," said a gentleman to me the other day, "these fellows will have it all their own way. So long as he lived there was one whom they feared. They felt that he knew."—No names were called, nor did I ask whom he meant by "these fellows."

He seldom made many words, when he felt called upon to come forward and correct an error.

In one of Marz's book's a figure in the "Beethoven Studien" is adduced to show that very deep knowledge of the science of counterpoint is not absolutely necessary to enable a composer to ascend to the highest place in his art, the fugue in question being pretty severely criticized. Dehn in the "Cæcilia," simply remarked, that this fugue was copied from Fux's Gradus ad Parnassum, where it has stood for a century and a quarter as a famous example of the use of a certain chord, to introduce which it was written.

The collection of books left by the professor is by no means so extensive as one might suppose. After his appointment to the Library he ceased to collect for himself to any great extent, having everything there at his command. There are, however, several very valuable works in it, and as a whole it would be a great and valuable addition to any collection upon our side of the Atlantic. Kiesewetter's works are, I believe, complete with one exception. There is a fine copy of Gerbert's "Scriptores Ecclesiastici de Musica:" a copy of Fétis, one or two volumes enriched with Dehn's notes and corrections; a number of rare old works; three old Italian works, beautifully copied by Dehn at a time when he was too poor to procure them in any other manner.

Among the small collection of objects of interest left by Prof. Dehn, two are worthy of particular notice—a viola and a manuscript. No visitor at the professor's can fail to notice conspicuously hung upon the wall of the best room, in a case with a glass door, the viola, as remarkable for its size, as for the position it occupies among the pictures and other ornaments of the apartment. The following notice of it has been given me from one of his letters:—"During my travels in Silesia, where I spent November and December of the year 1845, and examined everything, I was so fortunate as to find and purchase a Viola, which surpasses everything in the form of good instruments, which I have thus far met with. This viola is one of the eight large instruments, which the celebrated Stainer (or Steiner) manufactured for the several Electors. These instruments have in part been lost, and only a very few, which are still well preserved, can be found. This one which I possess is wonderful in tone."

Gen. Lwoff, now Imperial Kapellmeister at St. Petersburg, a particular friend of Dehn, was delighted with it and advised him by all means not to part with it for less than £100. Probably even that sum could not have bought it, for its owner used to express his affection for it by jocosely calling it his bride. The instrument, as said above, is much larger than other violas, the head is ornamented with fine carving, and it is in all respects in fine condition.

The manuscript was a present to Prof. Dehn from Gen. Lwoff, accompanying his photograph, and moti-ly beautifully copied by the general's own hand. The title is simply:

and is by HANDEL. Three copies only exist; the original in possession of Lwoff, a copy given by him to a society in Dresden, and the one in question, which was made in 1857. Since Dehn's death Lwoff has written urging Mrs. D. to offer it for sale in England or America, assuring her that it is well worth £50.

To me certainly it is a very interesting circumstance to have a new work by Handel thus come to light, just at a time when attention is again so loudly called to him and his works.

For the student of Musical History the loss of Professor Dehn is irreparable. He has left us a good example—inde fatigable in his labors, but, and that is better—what he did, he did well. A. W. T.

NEW YORK, NOV. 15.—At the opera, Don Giovanni had a successful run of over a week—something unusual for our fickle audiences. The work was splendidly produced, and PICCOLOMINI, as Zerlina, has won great and deserved applause; it is by far the best role she has performed in here. The other singers, GAZZANIGA, LORINI, FORMES, and GASSIER, did very well indeed, and especial praise is due to Signora GHIONI, a new arrival. She took the part of Elvira, and raised it at once to prominence, introducing the difficult air which is usually omitted. Signora Ghioni is the best seconda donna we have had.

LABORDE appeared as Norma at the matinée on Saturday, and though very successful, it is not probable that she will create any furor. We have had in Sontag and Lagrange, such superlatively fine bravura singers, that it will take a most astonishingly brilliant executant to surprise us.

Mr. Ullman has certainly the most remarkable talent for keeping up an excitement, and though he has exhibited great liberality this season in producing novelties, yet much of his success is owing to the excellent tact he evinces in his managerial system. It is not humbug—that is too broad a word, nor does tact rightly express it; so let me call it managerial genius. In the first place there are his advertisements! They are certainly the most attractive and readable that could possibly be made. They are not merely bold announcements of operatic facts, but they are delicate missives, that appear to be concocted solely for the private use of each individual reader. The manager therein appeals to your pride, to your liberality, almost to your conscience. He argues and reasons with respectful pathos, to prove why you should pay double the usual price. He hints at future novelties; he talks mysteriously of forthcoming wonders. Gazzaniga will appear to-night—Piccolomini the next, and then, oh! unexampled condescension, the two will appear together. Then Mme. Laborde will appear, and Mlle. Poinot will appear, and so, between debuts and revivals and novelties, the poor opera-goer is kept in a constant whirl of excitement. Then when the house is crowded at double prices, what does the incomprehensible Ullman do, but reduce the rates of admission to the old standard—and this too, when there was no apparent necessity for so doing.

On the whole, this speaks well for Mr. Ullman's liberality, and the little man fully deserves his title of the Napoleon of managers.

We are over-run with prime donne. In the city are Gazzaniga, Piccolomini, Laborde, and Poinot, Ghioni, and Carlioli. At Philadelphia they have Parodi, Colson and de Wilhorst, while Gassier has but just left us. Mme. d'Angri sailed Saturday for Europe, and Miss Phillips has gone to Havana, so there is no really good contralto in this city. There is also a deficiency in tenor. Steffani has left to join Maretzek. Brignoli is jealously guarded by Strakosch, and Tammaro and Lorinni—both second-rate—are all that are left to us.

Mr. Ullman's triumphal season—the most money-making ever known in this city—closes soon, but not before the production of both Robert le Diable, and Les Huguenots, in the latter of which, POINOT will appear. The company then go to Boston.

Concerts are beginning to flourish. Mr. WILLIAM SAAR, a young pianist of this city, who has recently been studying in Europe, has returned, and given a concert with success. He performed selections from Bach, Chopin, and Liszt. The Philharmonic Society commences its season next Saturday. The Mendelssohn Union gives Mendelssohn's St. Paul, Thursday evening, and the same night, a new prima donna, by the name of LANDI, gives a concert. The unfortunate absence of Mr. EISEFELD will oblige us to lose his delightful classical soirées, this season, but this deficiency will be partially atoned for, by MASON and THOMAS' matinees.

I wish the "Shakespeare Sisterhood," the new work by Mrs. T. W. PALMER, were a musical book, that I might be allowed the privilege of speaking of it at length in your columns. It will consist of a series of sketches of Shakespeare's female characters, with such reflections as woman, taking a purely womanly view of the matter, would be apt to make. Nothing pedantic, obtrusive or dry—simply what a living woman of intelligence and refinement, thinks of the women of Shakespeare. And who can be better qualified to judge of women than a woman?

A troubadour is always a wandering, restless creature, and I am not exempt from the erratic failing of the race. Consequently, I am forever visiting new places and making important discoveries. I have, however, several haunts that I hover about periodically, and after prowling therein for a season wander away, seeking what I may devour elsewhere.

Among these places, I know none more snug and attractive than the cosy little office of Mr. Norton, the well-known agent for libraries, whose name will at once be recognized by all interested in books. It is in quite a classic region, directly over Appleton's mammoth bookstore, and in a building that is perfectly overrun with publishing offices of every kind, and is, probably, the most literary in the city. Mr. Norton has a vast number of queer old books—rare antique volumes, that will quite drive a bibliomaniac wild with delight. I have spent many a pleasant moment in looking over these quaint old works, but few have I examined with greater interest than an illuminated missal of the 14th century, that now lies before me.

It is a remarkable old work, with a title page of big sprawling letters, around which is a neatly ornamented border, all done (as is the entire work) with a pen. The second page is still more striking, the letters being in red, and curiously ornamented with flowers of divers kinds, all traced out with laborious care and patient skill. After a number of pages of Latin prayers, I find the music—a style of music that could not be very intelligible to modern musicians. There are but four lines to the staff—there are no bars—the notes are all of the same length and character, being the now obsolete breve, and the general appearance of a page of this music suggests the idea of a large number of small black cockroaches, walking on the tight rope, or (to the use the happy comparison of a country editor), a parcel of tadpoles trying to climb a four-barred fence.

In these rushing times, it is almost painful to reflect on the long, long days, that some mediæval monk has spent in the preparation of this missal. To be sure, the holy old fogies had little else to do, and that is perhaps the reason they did these things so well. The letters are all printed with pen and ink in the Latin character, about the size of two-line pica type, and the mistakes or corrections are exceedingly rare. In the capital letters, the monkish amanuensis expands into an artist, becomes decoratively imaginative and indulges in floral productions of the most remarkable styles, occasionally varying these refreshing objects with etchings of fat abbots or demure monks. This one book has probably occupied the spare time of the worthy scribe for 10 or 15 months.

You see such books, to this day, in use in the Italian churches, though they do not always possess the venerable age of this specimen. Each of the officiating priests has one, while in the centre of the chancel upon a desk that revolves upon a pivot, is placed a gigantic monster of the species, beside which the most ponderous ledger of the heaviest merchant in Boston will shrink to quite a little pocket edition. The letters in this huge book are suggestive of mercantile signs, while the notes are of a size that is appalling—the cockroaches have been expanded into dancing bears, the tadpoles are metamorphosed into alligators.

What has become of “—t—”, Let “—t—” be exhumed! The welfare of society demands the resurrection of “—t—”! Your interesting correspondent “H” has but anticipated myself, and asked the same question that, I have no doubt hundreds of your readers wish to have answered, when he desired to know the whereabouts of our mysterious “—t—”. It is to be hoped that a communication from his, or her pen, will shortly illuminate the pages of Dwight's Journal, and our eyes be once more gladdened with that mystical combination of quotation marks, dashes and letter, that typifies the great unknown, the immortal “—t—”.

TROVATORE.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 11.—The opera is now fairly under way, but is not characterized by the success to which so long an interregnum entitles it. On Monday night of last week, Mme. COLSON opened the ball in Traviata; she is a sweet looking person, with cunning ways and a most lovely voice; she sang the brindisi with perfect ease and rendered the rapid movements, which immediately follow, exquisitely. In the second act she exhibited great pathos, singing clearly and with fine execution. In the last act her representation of phthisis was painfully accurate. She was loudly called for at the fall of the curtain, and may be said to have had a very successful debut. BRIGNOLI, whose warm reception must have gratified him, sang splendidly. It seems hypercriticism to allude to his acting—our fashionables go to the opera more to watch the actions of the singers and to examine each other's wearing apparel, than from any real love of music; if half the money spent upon dress were devoted to Art, we should have fine music and the best of performers constantly with us; AMODIO sang as well as he knew how; his voice is a most unmanageable one, he roars away drowning soprano and tenor, beating his breast and shaking his fists at the audience, as if there were necessity for such violent demonstrations; he should be more gentle, and his voice would have a better chance. The chorus sang badly and the orchestra played indifferently—the brass band, usually on the stage, was non est, and the noise was wonderful; the scenery was extremely fine; the house was not nearly full.

On Wednesday night we had Lucia, with Mme. de WILHORST, Brignoli, and Amodio. The soprano is perhaps the best American artist we have had at the Academy, but she certainly is not equal to the role of Lucia; she is extremely petite, and would look pretty had she not loaded herself with clothing. Her voice is thin but strong, and in some parts, the crazy song, for instance, did very well. Brignoli was ill at ease, but sang finely, particularly the much abused death song; Amodio sang in his usual boisterous manner; the chorus did better, but the orchestra, though better tempered, coöperated badly; there was a very poor audience owing to the weather. On Monday evening, La Figlia del Reggimento, with Mme. COLSON, LABOCETTA, and BARILI. This is the style of music to which Mme. Colson seems adapted, and very well she did her part. It was necessary that she should, for without her energy and fine singing, the whole would have been a failure; never was woman more poorly supported. Labocetta cannot sing, and when he attempts it, stretches out his neck and gasps at the throat as if he were choking, he is good in concerted pieces, but should never weary an audience by his incapacity in every other respect. Barili had but a poor chance; he seems to have a good voice, and with a chorus properly trained, would do well enough; the music was too rapid for him. The orchestra played miserably. Every kind of liberty was taken with the score; in fact, with the exception of Mme. Colson, the less said about the performance the better.

On Wednesday night, Trovatore, by Parodi, Strakosch, Brignoli, Amodio, and Barili. PARODI sang very well, but with the greatest indifference of manner. STRAKOSCH sang nicely and acted well, yet seemed out of place. She has not nearly so good a voice as Miss Philipps, who is a great favorite here. Brignoli sang admirably and Amodio too noisily and very much out of tune. The orchestra did better but the chorus was unendurable. The Misere was well done, receiving an encore. Strakosch and Brignoli sang most satisfactorily in the last act.

A brother of the Mr. THORNECKE, who was lost on the “Austria,” is now established here, and bids fair to do well. The pupils of the late Mr. Thorbecke speak of this gentleman in the highest terms, they say he has great general culture and a touch that would please the refined ear of Mr. Dwight. The pupils of Mr. HERMAN THORBECKE felt for him the greatest admiration, not only on account of his excellence as an artist and teacher, but for his kindly nature and gentlemanly deportment.

The Germania rehearsals, with SENTZ as leader, begin next Saturday; the Musical Fund Hall will be well filled with young misses, who can hear much better, and allow others the same privilege, if they will talk less during the performances.

ACCIDENTAL.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 16, 1858.—Since the debut of Mme. COLSON in Traviata, we have heard this highly accomplished artist in La Fille du Regiment, and in Flotow's Martha, sung for the first time in Italian, in this country, last night. Her Marie in La Fille du Regiment, was an unequal performance, displaying at one moment sprightliness and vivacity coupled with exquisite vocalism, and at another instant betokening the crushed spirits of a lyric actress, who finds her coadjutors upon the boards inefficient, unrehearsed, nay positively incapable. At times she would rise to greatness, and display those brilliant points in her lyric education, which have constituted her the special pet of the New Orleans connoisseurs; she would flash out momentarily, as though she deemed it best to essay with her own exertions to retrieve the opera from the impending fiasco; but the shocking intonation, hollow voice, and stiff perambulations across the stage of the sergeant (Sig. BARILI),—and the sick-canary style of Tonio's (LABOCETTA's) spasmodic attempt at singing, proved too much for the charming Colson. The Opera proved a melancholy fiasco; and the 3 or 4000 habitués repaired homeward, with feelings of heartfelt commiseration for the immolation of the Prima Donna.

The Italian version of Flotow's admirable “Martha,” last night, evoked a magnificent audience, and proved highly successful. Here is the cast; Martha, (Colson); Nancy, (Mme. Strakosch); Lionel, (Brignoli); Plunkett, (Ettore Barili); was to have been Juncu; Tristram, (F. Barili.) They acquitted themselves as follows:—

Mme. COLSON. Charming; vocalizing the music with singular gaiety, abandon, and with the most affecting tenderness and expression, when incident and style of composition demanded. Her “Last Rose of Summer,” was given with a pathos, rarely equalled by any cantatrice we have heard; and affected not a few persons to tears, as did her Con-vien partir in La Fille du Regiment. Mme. STRAKOSCH played with but slight effect, and from some cause or other, sung falsely in many instances, a defect which proved the more lamentable because of her uniformly correct intonation in other operas. Her shake is very smooth and even.

BRIGNOLI. The handsome tenor vocalized the score of Lionel unequally, now holding the audience spell-bound with the tenderness and inexpressible pathos of his “How so fair” romanza, then worrying the nerves of the same persons with his straining attempts to sing clearly and in tune certain notes of an altitude, such as he had never encountered in Verdi, and such as would not readily admit of transposition. Ah! Flotow, how rigidly you kept our hero of the Trovatore “to the scratch,” whenever time was called, in spite of the frightful strain upon his voice!—On the whole, however, Brignoli sang deliciously, and even took some degree of interest in the acting of his role.

BARILI, No 1: This gentleman's Plunkett, however not entirely satisfactory, was so much superior to some of his former achievements, as to ensure him considerable applause. His voice is long-drawn; his notes waver like a tremulant organ-stop.

BARILI, No. 2. Emptiness personified.

Mr. Strakosch, last night, very wisely wrested from the inefficient grasp of Sig. Nicolai, the conductor's baton, and swayed it with his own kid gloves. Well timed, indeed!—for, under the Nicolai regime, last week, every individual member of the orchestra seemed, as in a scrub race, to be striving for a certain goal, by a special and private method of his own. Strakosch, however, mended matters, with all the presto! change-like savoir faire of a magician.

Mad. de WILHORST has appeared in two operas,—Lucia and Somnambula; and has caused the critics to marvel at her manifest improvement, since her first appearance here, at the Thalberg Concerts. PARODI, for her part, has made her entrée upon the lyric boards, in the character of Leonora, in Trovatore, and of Norma, in the opera of that name. She still stands forth as a great tragic actress, but her voice has lost so much of its pristine power and freshness, as to cause her to use it in the most guarded manner. She was greeted with the most enthusiastic rounds of applause, on the part of a public, which has idolized her in the concert room for years. In the fourth act of the Trovatore, her exhaustion and failing of voice were painfully apparent. Parodi is no longer young. Mme. Strakosch's Azucena in the Trovatore was a splendidly natural picture, and also proved an ample evidence of the correctness of her school of vocalization. She sang the music with fine dramatic effect, and faultless intonation,—and indeed her entire rendition of the gipsy role places her, deservedly, along side of D'Angri, Miss Phillips, and others of note.

Next Wednesday night, we are to have a repetition of Martha. On Monday night, Gazzaniga in Fiorita. What glorious news for the innumerable adorers of the diva G!

MANRICO.

BANGOR, ME. OCT. 30.—THE Maine State, and the Penobscot Co. Musical Associations jointly held a four day's session here last week, assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG, and Messrs. B. F. BAKER and S. B. BALL of Boston. The united efforts of these well organized associations called together a larger and a more efficient body of singers than ever before assembled in the State on a similar occasion.

The choir, comprising some five hundred voices, gave two concerts—on Thursday and Friday evenings—consisting of selections from the Oratorio of the "Creation," "Baker's Church Music," and the "Opera Chorus Book," to full houses, and the last was literally crowded.

The choral performances, as a whole, were quite satisfactory, exhibiting many effects which could only result from hard and careful drilling. The songs, "He was despised," from the "Messiah," "With verdure clad," from the "Creation," and "Consider the lilies," were well sung by members of the association. Mrs. Long sang with her usual effect, and so did Mr. Ball. Messrs. Rice of Bath, and Merrill and Wilder of Bangor gave interest to the concerts in their several solos. The exercises on this occasion were conducted with characteristic propriety, and harmony prevailed among the members.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Lucresia Borgia," arranged for Piano-Forte.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We suspend for a week the discussion of that vague term "Classical Music," to make room for the fresher matters of our Correspondence. In the utter silence of all music here in Boston, we can read with interest of what is doing elsewhere. . . . On Thursday evening, though, the "classical" vibrations of that dear Chickering saloon (not yet abandoned to the Philistines for a Court-house,) were once more awakened; the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB opened their tenth season—just too late, however, for our press this week; but we shall not let so good a theme escape us. . . . It seems to be the general understanding that the Opera is coming soon—perhaps before the month is out. What a Thanksgiving this will be to many! Ullman's opera, with PICCOLOMINI! Of course we are to see and hear the fascinating little Countess in her special role of Traviata; expectation is on tip-toe till our own senses realize what we have heard described with such enthusiasm, however poor and trivial a thing we may regard the music of that Opera. And we shall have La Figlia, and the other well-worn things which they have had in New York. But let us hope that we shall also hear some of the best things, some of the new things. Shall we not have Don Giovanni, in the grand style of which the New York papers tell us, with Piccolomini for the Zerlina, and FOMMES, Leporello; no matter about the chorus of two hundred voices—we can spare that in an opera which has no choruses except those few bars: Viva la Liberta! And shall we not have

Il Barbiere, the immortal, ever sparkling? Then is there not Robert le Diable, which this company possesses, and which was never given here complete? Likewise the Huquenots. And can we not well spare one of the hacknied Verdi things to gratify our curiosity about that pleasant little comedy of an old Italian master, La Serva Padrona, by Paisiello? With such materials as Ullman has at his command, such an army of superior singers, and so many operas ready learned, which have not yet grown hacknied here, it certainly is possible to have an interesting season for at least a few weeks. We trust the opera will stay just long enough and not any longer; for since the opera, with us, is always a spasmodic, all-engrossing fever while it lasts, and utterly excludes all chance of any other music for the time, we must either pray that its heyday may be short, or else be content to take Italian Opera in lieu of every other musical enjoyment, which we are not and cannot be at all. . . . And this reminds us of our excellent ZERRAÏN, upon whom we rely for all our prospect of orchestral music for this winter. We are happy to state that the subscription warrants him in going on. It is decided that the four concerts will take place, and subscribers are now notified that they may find their tickets at the music stores. The rehearsals of the orchestra of fifty will commence forthwith, and the first concert will be given just as soon as the Italian Opera excitement shall subside, and leave a quiet field for Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, and Mozart. The Symphony for the first evening will probably be the Pastorale of Beethoven, which we have not heard for two years. There will certainly be a good audience, respectable in numbers, and of the most appreciative and earnest; but there ought to be one large enough to fill the Music Hall, and show that that Beethoven statue stands for something truly felt in this community. The subscription lists are still open; let the enterprising conductor, who takes all the risk and pains for our enjoyment and improvement, have plentiful and prompt encouragement!

The friends and pupils of OTTO DRESEL will be glad to know that he is much improved in health and anxious to return here to his work, which surely is an important one and anxiously awaits him. He will sail for Boston in the "Persia" on the 27th inst., and hopes to be ready to meet his pupils by the middle of December. Mr. Dresel played recently, in Halle, at a concert for his friend ROBERT FRANZ, the unrivalled song composer, who is kapellmeister there in Handel's birth-place.

JULLIEN, the great, announces in London his twentieth and last annual series of concerts—"Concerts d'Adieu," previous to his departure on his "Universal Musical Tour", which is to include not only Europe, America, Australia and the colonies, but also the civilized towns of Asia and Africa! In short he has on foot a mighty plan to harmonize the World! He will set out (these are his words) "accompanied by the élite of his orchestra and other artists, savants and hommes de lettres (!), forming the nucleus of a society already constituted under the title of "Société de l'Harmonie Universelle," with the object not only of diffusing the divine and civilizing art of music, but of promoting, through harmony's powerful eloquence, a noble and philanthropic cause." Jullien turned world-reformer! Meanwhile he gives the Londoners a higher class of concerts than he ever did before. He has reduced his orchestra to sixty, making a virtue of the necessity of taking a smaller theatre, because Beethoven considered sixty the right number for his symphonies! The first parts of the concerts are to be purely classical and grand, including the "Choral Symphony", the Lobegesang, "Gregory the First's Canto Fermo and Fuga Fugatum", and what not else with a big name. The bagatelles, galops, &c., are thrown into the second part; but one of the bagatelles contains a bag-full of treason; it is "La Grande Marche des Nations, et Progrès des Civilisations, composed on the authentic National Hymns of every country and descriptive of the convocation and assembly of the Universal Congress, elected by every reigning monarch, every established Government, and every nation of the world, united in one peaceful confederation by the powers of harmony." By the powers of harmony, and of mud too, Jullien is great!

FINE ARTS.—Truly a wonderful painting, the finest of the kind that we have seen, is WINTERHALTER's "Florinde," now on separate exhibition for a few days, at the always attractive store of Williams & Everett, 234 Washington St., where you will see so many other beautiful things en passant—among others, Rowse's perfect crayon portrait of EMERSON, pictures by Babcock, &c. "Florinde" stands there, the loveliest of a lovely group of maidens, Spanish beauties, near a dozen, round a fountain, all so beautiful that you are held in equilibrium between their rival charms. The grouping, drapery, scenery, all are exquisite.

Musical Review.

Among the publications of the last few weeks we find the following:

(By Oliver Ditson & Co.)

Posthumous Works of CHOPIN: Valse in D flat, (Op. 70, No. 5), and Eccossaise, (Op. 72).

The Waltz, a little one of only two pages, is graceful, delicate, sweet, a little pensive, and will repay study, though not one of Chopin's most striking productions—not nearly as much so as the number before published of this little series, the "Last Mazurka." The Eccossaise, a sparkling dance, a deux pas, is simple enough as well as pretty in design, but demands well-trained hand and fingers.

Piano-Forte Album: No. 24. Le Cascade, by E. PAUER. No. 25. Song without Words, by A. JAEHL.

The "Cascade" is a pretty difficult piece, one of those highly elaborated conceits of the modern romantic piano-forte music. A pensive theme in G flat, allegretto moderato, first sings itself to a full and limpid accompaniment, as if it were one musing by a brook-side; this occupies four pages; and then the theme dissolves into a spray of demi-semiquavers, through which the melody again is presently distinctly heard, and clothed with changes of the continually reiterated spray figure for a dozen pages. Gracefully executed, it must be a pleasing piece.

Jaehl's "Song without Words" is the charming little piece which he contributed to the pages of this Journal some weeks since, and will serve for a very pleasant reminder of the genial and brilliant young pianist with his many friends here.

Favorite Songs, Duets and Trios of MOZART. S. S. Wesley's arrangement. No. 7. Porgi Amor, from Le Nozze di Figaro.

This sweet and tender melody, so truly Mozartean, has been republished often, as it deserves to be; but it will be pleasant to have it, so well arranged (from Mozart's score), and so beautifully engraved, as one of this choice series of the vocal gems of Mozart. To those who possess a voice and any real gift of song, we cannot too earnestly commend the study of every number of this admirable collection. It will be drinking from the purest fountains.

Germany: new Vocal Gems from eminent German composers.

Five more numbers. One is called "The Three Students," by SPEIER. The German title is Die drei Liebkens. An effective sentimental ballad about three youths, sitting by "the noble Rhine" and drinking to the lady-love of each in turn. There is an alternation of three kinds of movement: an Allegretto, 2-4, a Waltz, and an Andante, 4-4, in each stanza. The last ends tragically; as their glasses touch the third time, Heinrich's bursts in twain, and a "piercing shriek," duly announced, of course, by a diminished seventh, accepts this omen of his true love's death. Quite a pathetic, German romantic sort of song for a baritone voice. Judged by high standards it is but an ordinary song; it has musically no originality; but it owes a certain power to the fascination of its subject and its strange alternation of the convivial, the tender, and the tragic.

"The Maid of Judah," by KUECKEN, is already somewhat well known as an effective and dramatic minor song,—the Jewish maiden's lament at the thought of her country. "Thou lovely angel mine" (Du lieber Engel du!) by FISCHER; "How can I leave thee?" (Ach, wie ist's möglich!), by CRAMER; and "The Youth by the Brook" (Schiller's Jüngling am Bache), by PROCH are each good specimens of the more popular sort of song-writing of the minor tone-poets of Germany.

Music Abroad.

LONDON.—The various metropolitan choral societies are issuing notices of their resumption of "business," calling in choristers that have erst migrated seawards, and inviting vocal aspirants to join their harmonious (or otherwise, as the case may be) ranks.

Firstly, at Exeter Hall the Sacred Harmonic Society is extending its powerful arms to embrace all the efficient assistance which may be offered, and for which it may find room. Mr. Hullah is advertising his classes for singing at St. Martin's Hall for all the singing classes. Mr. Leslie is re-marshalling his forces. The London Polyhymnical Choir is issuing notes of preparation. The Bach Society is making a move. The members of the Vocal Association give weekly evidence in our own columns of an interest in the society's progress. The Surrey Gardens Choral Society is proving itself undismayed by the reverses associated with its name. A host of smaller fry, of various kinds and grades of pretension, are on the alert; and last, and far from least, the ponderous machinery of the Great Handel Commemoration Festival, though its grand feat is yet "dim in the distance," is yielding to the influence of so general a movement, and, though comparatively dormant, it is occasionally set in action to show that it is kept bright and in good order.—Mus. Gazette.

LIVERPOOL.—The conversazione on Tuesday evening, in St. George's Hall, was a brilliant and highly satisfactory affair. Shortly after eight there were about 1,000 persons present, including the élite of the town and neighborhood. The performances on the grand organ afforded much interest and pleasure. During the evening, Mr. W. T. Best played the following compositions:—"The Wedding March," by Mendelssohn. Air, with variations, W. T. Best. Fugue, J. S. Bach. Fantasia, from the opera of Les Huguenots, Meyerbeer. Chorus, "The heavens are telling," Haydn.

MILAN.—Mercadante's opera Pelagio has been produced here, but without much success. In this work, which is but little known, many beauties are to be found; but on the whole the music appeared labored, and the general effect is not satisfactory. The principal artists were Mlle. Lafont, an excellent prima donna newly imported from France; Signor Sarli, tenor; and Signor Orlandi, baritone. The opera was well performed.

NAPLES.—Mr. Chorley writes to the Athenæum (Oct. 23):

Music, however, must be given up in Italy,—perhaps for many a generation to come. Fancy five days in Naples, and literally not a sound to be heard! nothing in the theatres; nothing among the fishermen at Sta. Lucia,—not a single Tarantella tune twanged out of a guitar by humpbacked man, or blind woman, or brown, dark-eyed child before the hotels!—nothing save a rather sweet choir-organ, which accompanied the plain-song in the Duomo. There was an opera given on the sixth night at the Teatro Nuovo, 'Maria di Rohan,' by a third-rate troop.—Matter fresher in interest to a Londoner tempted me elsewhere.

ITALY.—A gleaner or two—very famine-bitten, it may be feared, are the ears of corn!—may be given from the Italian musical journals, in addition to what correspondents send. From these we learn that Signor Peri is to write a Carnival opera for La Scala, Milan,—that the veteran, Signor Pacini, has just been producing an oratorio, 'Il Trionfo della Religione,' at Lucca; and is about yet another opera, to be called 'Lidia di Bruxelles,'—lastly, that an opera, 'Il Matrimonio per Concorso' (which, if a title tells anything, should be a comic opera), by Signor de Ferrari, has had an immense success at Genoa; the composer having been called for twenty times!—Athenæum.

VIENNA.—On the 7th of this month the uncovering of a slab, in memory of Franz Schubert, the musical composer, took place at the "Himmelpfortgrund," one of the suburbs of Vienna. The slab is fixed in the house in which Schubert first saw the light, and has no other inscription but "Franz Schubert's Geburtshaus." On the right of these words a lyre, and on the left a laurel wreath, with the date of Schubert's birth, "31st of January, 1797," are to be seen. The whole has been planned and executed by the Vienna Männergesangsverein.

PARIS.—At the Théâtre-Lyrique, while Le Nozze di Figaro produces the most splendid receipts, the off-nights always command good houses with Preciosa, the Médécine, and Broscocanno. The management is carefully preparing Mozart's Don Juan; Les Chevrans de Jeanne, the virgin score of M. Bellini, the nephew of the composer of Norma; La Fée Carabosse, by M. Massé, and Faust, by M. Gounod. It has also revived Oberon and Der Freischütz, and there is some talk of submitting Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream to the judgment of the Parisian dilletanti. Mozart's Don Juan promises to prove very attractive, as there is a report that M. Carvalho has determined on playing the part of Leporello. After all, this gentleman has, for some time past, enjoyed such success as manager, that he may well rely on his lucky star, and succeed even in a part where he will have to contend against the remembrance of the illustrious Lablache. The revival of Oberon was received with unanimous applause. Many pieces were encored; among them were the overture and couplets—"Tra, la, la," so deliciously sung by Mlle. Girard. A new tenor, of the name of Guard, is to make his début in M. Gounod's Faust. M. Carvalho is taking the greatest care of this gentleman. If it were possible, he would shut him up in a case till the day of his first performance.

HAMBURG.—At the commencement of last June, a number of musicians and amateurs assembled, at the invitation of Herr Ave-Lallement and Herr Graedener, to make arrangements for producing, during the sitting of Convocation in September, Johann Sebastian Bach's grand Passion, according to St. Matthew, to a Hamburg audience for the first time. Only persons acquainted with Hamburg can conceive how difficult a task it was to give a performance of Bach's great creation, especially at the period just named, on account of the number of families in the country, of the horse-races, boating clubs, the absence of the vocal associations, etc. Such were the usual obstacles in such a case. In that of Hamburg more especially, we have to take into account the small acquaintance of the inhabitants with Bach's works, and, consequently, the small amount of reverence entertained by them for his name; the dislike felt by many persons for the Convocation; the departure of the troops, taking with them some excellent instrumentalists to the camp at Nordstemmen; and, lastly, business, always business, the Exchange, always the exchange! But still there was a starting-point for the undertaking; the Bach-Verein, founded, in 1856, by Herr von Roda. Incredible, but true! This very association, which had set itself the task of rendering the public acquainted with Bach's music—this very association held aloof, from the outset, and refused to take any part in the proceedings! It based its refusal on reasons which it summed up, in an official notice issued by its own committee, in the two following sentences: "1. The work is too 'great'—according to the experience we have gained—to be studied and 'worthily' performed in the short space of three months; and, 2. The Hamburg Bach Society cannot, as a corporation, co-ordinate with any other association, in a performance of any of Bach's music." But all this, and a great deal more, did not deter him who had undertaken the trouble of getting up and directing the work. With every rehearsal there was an increase in the number, and (for how could it be otherwise?) in the enthusiasm of those who collected to execute the grand production. Madlle. Jenny Meyer, Herr Sabbath, of Berlin, and Herr Schneider, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, most readily promised their co-operation as solo singers, and when, on the 10th of September, the first of the four rehearsals with full band took place, lo and behold! the staging erected in the Catherine-Kirche for more than 200 vocalists, and about 70 instrumentalists, was scarcely capable of accommodating those present. We may be allowed to add, in a few words: In the whole double chorus of singers and instrumentalists, there was not a single person who was not thoroughly penetrated with the lofty seriousness, and the elevated dignity of the four choruses, with the religious inspiration of the chorales, and with the fanatical fury of the Jewish choruses, and who did not strive, heart and soul, to reproduce the impression made on himself. In all the audience, which filled every nook and corner of the imposing church, there was not a single individual who did not listen with eager attention, for three full hours, to the tender or mighty strains; and who did not leave the church completely satisfied, and with the consciousness that something "great" had passed before his soul. What shall we say about solo singers? All three (who are so well-known that they do not require any lengthened eulogium) performed their difficult task with dignity, piety and inspiration, but we may boldly add that, without such an Evangelist as Herr Carl Schneider (formerly of Leipzig, but now engaged at Berlin), or at any rate, without any one approaching him in recitation, understanding, and feeling, the execution of the work is almost an impossibility. The festival was consecrated musically by the presence of the artist who had undertaken the incalculably difficult task of reducing the score, by unwearied collating, to the form in which it is at present published by the German Bach-Verein—we mean Herr Rietz of Leipzig, to whose complaisance and readiness to give advice, moreover, the directors and committee have owed themselves deeply indebted.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Round the corner waiting. Song. Randegger. 25

A playful little poem, to which the melody fits charmingly.

Cavatina from "Corrado d'Altamura." Ricci. 30

This is the last brilliant movement of a Scena and Aria for mezzo-soprano voice, which is well known to those conversant with the beauties of the older Italian writers by the first words: "O cara tu sei Vangelo." An English translation has been added. This piece forms a very agreeable and profitable lesson for somewhat advanced pupils, more with regard to delivery and phrasing, than florid execution.

The Frost upon the pane. F. Wallerstein. 25

This pleasing Song with its wintry subject is quite appropriate at the present moment. It is a nice little impromptu on one of the most harmless features of the stern destroyer, Winter.

Dreams of my childhood. S. & Ch. Brockway. 25

A pretty piece, effectively rendered at the entertainments of Morris' minstrels.

The first time we met. S. Glover. 25

My heart is sad for thee. " 25

Both will be a welcome gift to the many friends of this composer.

Lillian Lee. Song and Ch. J. H. McNaughton. 25

Written in the popular style of "Dearest spot on earth," "Jeannette and Jeannot," "Minnie Clyde," &c.

Instrumental Music.

Prison Duet (Si la stanchezza) in "Trovatore," arranged by Adolph Baumbach. 25

An arrangement of medium difficulty, as the talented author knows so well how to make. The arrangement strictly follows the original score of Verdi. Those who have visited the Boston Theatre during the past two weeks, have had the very same thing served up to them, excellently scored for Orchestra, by Comer's troupe of artists, always amid much applause.

Ormsby Schottisch. Carl Trautmann. 25

A well written, pleasing piece of dance-music.

Caïssa (chess) Fantasia. W. O. Fiske. 25

A melodious impromptu, with a leading thematic phrase, reminding one somewhat of the crooked ways of the "Jacks" on the chess board. The piece is well written and calculated to interest as well as please.

Motif de Bellini, varied for 4 hands. F. Beyer. 30

This is the last and closing number of a series of six four-hand pieces, entitled: "Les deux élèves," (The two pupils). Knowing how often teachers are in want of easy duets, wherein the second player finds, like the first, a melodious, independent part to perform, and not merely a dry accompaniment to a melody, played in octaves in the treble, these duets are recommended as answering just this description.

The Magic Flute.

(Concluded.)

Papageno shook with fear, nor was he encouraged by the words of Pamina, who exclaimed that there was now no hope, for this announced the approach of the chief. The clown's first thought was to wish himself a mouse or a snail to escape observation; his second, what story they could devise to avoid Sarastro's wrath. "Nothing but the truth," said Pamina, be the result as it might.

From the opposite sides of the open space where they were, now drew near the joyful crowd of Sarastro's followers, men and women, old and young, grave priests and young of both sexes, singing the praises of their noble master. Between the long lines in which they arranged themselves came the Priest-Prince, drawn in a chariot, from which he soon descended — a tall, dignified man of majestic presence, on whose brow wisdom and goodness sat enthroned. He drew near the trembling couple. Pamina threw herself at his feet, acknowledged that she had endeavored to escape from his power, but urged as her justification the persecutions to which she had been subjected by the negro, Monostatos.

"Arise, my daughter," said Sarastro mildly, "I know thy heart, and that thou lovest. I desire not to force thy inclinations, and yet I cannot give thee freedom."

"But," said Pamina, "the duty I owe my mother calls me, for my mother —"

"She is in my power," said Sarastro, "and, should I grant your return to her, thy happiness were gone forever."

"But the name of mother sounds sweetly to my ear," pursued Pamina, "and she is mine."

"But, alas! a haughty, arrogant woman!" returned he, "For thee another heart is in store, and thy path of duty and happiness lies in another direction."

At this moment they were interrupted by the entrance of Monostatos and his slaves, bringing Tamino as a captive.

The prince was known to Pamina through the descriptions of Papageno alone, but she knew him as one who was risking everything, even to life itself, for her and her mother; her heart had been touched by his character — now he stood before her in all his youthful beauty, a captive — perhaps destined to death for her sake, and her whole soul yearned toward him in all the strength and fire of oriental passion.

Tamino had known her but through the portrait, yet this had led him to risk all; but now, in the face of death, so far as he yet could know — for how could Sarastro forgive one whose purpose in approaching his castle was to gratify the hate of the Queen of Night in his death, and to tear from him her who perhaps had been elected to share with him his temporal greatness and his spiritual power? — now, she stood before him, among the long train of followers of the great Priest and Ruler, resplendent above all in beauty — beauty enhanced in his eyes by the danger in which she stood there, like himself a captive.

It was one of those moments, when a sudden feeling overpowers all considerations of time and place. Each lived but for the other — and in the very presence of Sarastro — within reach of his hand, they rushed into each other's arms — their first, perhaps their final embrace. A profound feeling of astonishment at such a liberty pervaded all except the calm and noble chief. Monostatos, doubly enraged with Pamina, rushed up, parted them, and falling upon his knees before his master, besought judgment upon the prince and his servant, and a due reward for his own watchfulness and care.

Sarastro turned to his servants; "He has deserved a reward," said he, "give him —"

"Thy kindness alone makes me rich," broke in the negro.

"Only — seventy-seven blows of the bastinado!" added Sarastro. Then, when the negro had been torn away from the princess, whom he had so outraged with his absurd passion, he turned to two of the chief priests, and commanded them to conduct Tamino and Papageno to the temple of probation and purification. The priests, throwing thick veils over the heads of the neophytes, led them off, while Sarastro, giving his hand to Pamina, led her, through the grand portal, once more into the palace.

The history is silent as to most of the proofs to which the character of Tamino and his servant were put during their period of probation; the Mysteries of Isis are still mysteries.

There was a secret inner court to the temple in which, upon great occasions, the priests assembled, forming two long lines upon the sides of a triangle, Sarastro's place being upon an elevated dais at the point of junction. The history now takes us into this court. The priests have marched in, from either side, to the sound of solemn music, have exchanged silent greetings, and stand each in his place, with a long brazen trumpet before him. Sarastro has followed them, and has also taken his place upon the dais, the two chief priests on either side of him, a little lower.

The business of the convocation was opened by a speech from the chief, in which he explained the motives which had induced him to deprive the Queen of Night of her daughter, and his intention to bestow her upon the new candidate for admission into their holy order, Tamino, in case he proved worthy.

It was the custom in these solemn meetings, in the discussion of important questions, for the priests to make known their concurrence with the views of their chief by joining with him in a long blast upon the trumpet — which, when heard resounding through the halls and courts of palace and temple, announced that some weighty affair had been decided. So now to the question whether they were ready so far to favor Tamino, a king's son — in the conviction that he had, by his demeanor, thus far, since he had been under probation, proved himself worthy — as to admit him now to the final trials of his courage, steadfastness, self-control, truth, and faith, all raised the trumpets to their lips, and gave their assent in loud and joyful tones. Sarastro then addressed himself particularly to the two high priests, confiding the new pair to their charge and giving them instructions for their guidance in preparing them for their future consecration.

Then, descending from the dais, he raised his hands to the gods, while the choir of priests bowed reverently, occasionally joining in the invocation, and solemnly prayed to Isis and Osiris to grant the spirit of virtue and wisdom to the candidates, to endue them with patience in calamity, steadfastness and courage in danger, and if death in their early years should be the will of the gods, that their virtue might be rewarded in a higher sphere.

From this calm and solemn scene our history takes us to a vast and gloomy apartment of the temple, where the prince and his servant have been confined. The high priests, obeying the orders of their master, came immediately to release the prisoners from their confinement and give them again to the warm air and bright sunshine. As the prince had borne his confinement with courage and patience, he was now to be subjected to a new trial of his faith in Sarastro's wisdom and good will. The priests warned him and his servant to beware of the arts of women, and let what would happen, to answer them not; and with these warnings led them away to one of the beautiful gardens, where they left them. They were not long alone, for suddenly Tamino, looking up from the bank upon which he had thrown himself, saw the three women of the Queen of Night before him. They besought him to fly at once if he held his life dear; assured him that his death was already determined upon; reminded him of his promises to their mistress, who, they informed him, had made her way into the castle in search of Pamina. Tamino heard them in silence; though all his power as master was not sufficient to restrain the tongue of Papageno. All the arts of the women were unavailing to move the prince. He answered them not, trusted them not. At length the approach of the priests put them to flight.

Meantime, in another garden, which extended down to the bank of the river, Pamina, weary and exhausted, had thrown herself upon a seat and fallen asleep. Monostatos, with all evil passions raging in his bosom, entered, determined to steal a kiss from the sleeping girl. His design was frustrated by a peal of thunder — the Queen of Night was there. Here was the time of trial for Pamina. Her mother, unable to take her away from Sarastro, now only desired revenge upon him. Glowing with hatred and rage, she would make Pamina her instrument. She gave her a dagger, and in an awful oath, swore by the gods, that unless Pamina plunged it into the heart of Sarastro, she should forever be cast out of the mother's heart. With this threat she vanished. Monostatos, returning, seized the dagger, and gaining no consent to his wishes, at length raised it to strike Pamina, unconscious, in the violence of his passions, that Sarastro had drawn near and stood almost at his elbow. As he drew back his hand to strike, it fell into that of his master. "My lord, I am innocent!" he exclaimed, as he sunk to his master's feet. Sarastro, despising his weakness and his falsehood alike, simply waved him off, with a look that told him he was forever banished from his presence; and taking Pamina again gently by the hand, comforted her with the assurance that the probation was over, and that the next day, did Tamino conquer, she should be made happy with him. He sought not for revenge upon the Queen of Night, would not even punish farther his slave, for, said he;

"Here, in these sacred halls, revengeful thoughts are vain,
When one from duty falls, Love leads him back again."

But Tamino's strength was to be put to a still harder test. The temptation to break his vow not to hold intercourse with a woman was to be presented in its strongest form. He had stood firm against all the influence of evil passions as presented by the Queen's women, but now love was to tempt him. The scene changes to the garden in which we left him with Papageno. No stronger test of the patience and long-suffering of the prince could be found, than in compelling him to bear with the continual prating of his servant, and his absurd conduct. Patience under great calamities is oftentimes easier than under the constant annoyance of an absurd and ridiculous companion.

The history here kindly turns aside from the prince and gives us divers adventures of Papageno, particularly one in which he, having made himself merry with a hideous old woman, who hobbled in on crutches and gave him a goblet of water, stands at length aghast at being told by her that she is the veritable Papagena, whom the gods and Sarastro have destined for him at the conclusion of his probation. But we have not time and space to follow the servant instead of the master, who bears and forbears with exemplary patience; for at this point the three spirits in the shape of boys, again appeared, bidding Tamino welcome into the dominions of Sarastro, restoring the flute and casket of bells, renewing the injunction of silence, and closing by calling up from the earth a table spread with delicacies, to partake of which, in preparation for the final trials, they gave full permission. Tamino's mind and heart were too busy to allow him to feel physical wants — not so with Papageno, who, in vain inviting his master to partake, took his place, and feasted to his heart's content. The great test, mentioned before, of Tamino's steadfastness and faith now came. Pamina appeared, seeking her lover. Obedient to his vow he turned from her, and to all her expressions of love, to all her appeals made no reply, though he waved her off with feelings of agony no less heart-breaking than her own. Still he preserved his faith in Sarastro, and broke not his vow. As Pamina retired, the two high priests returned to lead the prince and his servant away. Tamino obeyed at once, but Papageno refused to leave his feast until a noise beside him made him turn, and two huge lions stood beside him.

The priests with Sarastro again assembled in the dark temple, and their solemn chorus of thanksgiving to Isis and Osiris, for the faith and steadfastness of Tamino, was heard rising and falling in manly tones. The chief ordered the prince and princess to be brought in. She had lost her faith in Sarastro's promise, that when the new day came, she should be united to her beloved, and now this want of trust in him was its own punishment. Sarastro bade the lovers take leave of each other, for the result of the first trial was known only to the gods. He comforted them with the assurance that Tamino could not but endure to the end, and that they would soon meet in joy. The cause of Tamino's apparent coldness at the interview in the garden was explained to Pamina; but her faith was shaken, and when her lover was again led from the assembly, her reason gave way.

The history here again turns to the adventures of that unlucky varlet, Papageno, and relates how he was again attacked by the old woman, and partly by threats, partly through the workings of conscience, was at last brought to such a depth of humiliation, as, with at least a partial resignation to his fate, to give her his hand and receive her for his god-promised Papagena; and, moreover, that when he had done this work meet for repentance, the object of his not very warm affection, as may justly be supposed, threw off her age with her dark garments, and appeared before him, just the neatest, trimmest, jolliest, prettiest, cunningest little maiden, that ever blest the heart of solitary servant. But, alas for Papageno! hardly had he feasted his eyes upon her beauty, and drunk in one full draught of bliss, — when — presto! — she is away, and he sinks into the earth!

Poor Pamina found in her want of faith its own punishment. She wandered in the gardens and groves, seeking her lost lover, and her disordered mind, forgetful of the last interview with him in presence of Sarastro, and of the assurance from the priest that they should meet again, dwelt upon that previous meeting when she in vain had sought tokens of recognition and love from him. The three boys — the genii — hovered about her to guard and protect. In this state she remembered the gift of her mother, and the thought of ending her sorrows and her life together with the dagger arose. The thought took complete possession of her, and she raised the weapon for the fatal blow. Of course the genii prevented her design. But the crisis had passed. The sound of the flute in the distance and the assurance of her protectors that, for reasons they were not yet allowed to explain, the coldness of Tamino was not real, that her love was returned in fullest measure, restored her to herself, and she besought to be brought at once to him to share his fate, whatever it might be. This was granted.

Meantime, two men, in black armor, had taken charge of Tamino to bring him to the last test, that of purification by the elements. A lake of water and flame spread itself before the portals of the mysterious holy of holies of the temple. To its banks Tamino was led. In a solemn choral song, strange and mystical in melody as in harmony, they sung — in much better music than verse,
"He, who the dangers of this awful way shall dare,
Is purified by fire and water, earth and air,
Who finds in Virtue's strength from fears of death release,
Rises from earth and time to realms of heavenly peace.
Enlightened he will be, who conquers in this crisis,
And worthy, then, to share the Mysteries of Isis."

Tamino might still have turned back, but his faith was too strong, his courage too serene; others had crossed the lake, was he less virtuous, less steadfast than they? His determination wavered not for an instant; he gave the command: "Open the terrible portals!" At this moment, guided by the Genii came Pamina. She saw the adventure her beloved was to undertake. She hesitated not, but firm in love and trust besought permission to join him. It was granted. So, leaning upon his arm, they passed through the gates, and the clear and tranquilly joyous notes of the magic flute were heard piercing through the raging and dashing of flame and blood, speaking the unflinching courage of him who bore it, and stilling for the moment as they passed the billows of water and fire. And so they were seen to reach the broad stairs which led up into the Temple, to ascend them slowly, to enter the portals, which flew open to receive them, and to kneel before the altar and Sarastro; and a chorus of triumph and welcome was heard from multitudinous voices, as the portals again closed upon all profane eyes.

The utter inability of Papageno to attain the least command over his tongue and himself, and his positive refusal to be initiated into the mysteries, seem, according to the history, to have given matter for a sort of wise and very sober mirth to the dignitaries of the temple. When he recovered from the terror arising from his sudden translation, he found himself near the entrance of one of the internal courts of the palace. He entered, but its gloom and darkness, for it was night, terrified him, and he sought to retrace his steps. But thunder and fire cut off his retreat; he rushed to the opposite entrance, with no better success. Mortal terror and the loss of his Papagena were too much for him to bear, and after long communing with himself and bewailing his unhappy fate, rather than die there with cold and hunger, he determined upon the last resort of despair. He fixed a cord to a tree, with the intent, if no hope came before he had counted one, two, three, to put an end at once to his life and his sorrows. He called upon Papagena in vain. He slowly counted the fatal three, and there was no one to help him. The three genii, who had watched his proceedings, now became visible, and reminded him of his magic bells! These brought the beloved one. His trials were over, and the history leaves the new pair as happy as the day is long.

The eventful night was now nearly over, and soon the morning would come. But still there was time for a deed of darkness. Through the dark passages of the temple Monostatos and the three women of the Queen of Night steadily made their way towards the grand hall. Amid thunders again the Queen appeared. It was her last desperate effort, and to inflame the negro and secure his aid, she promised him Pamian, should they be successful in destroying Sarastro. A deep and bodeful sound filled them with terror, but their hearts knew no relenting. Hatred and revenge were too powerful. Monostatos, who knew the customs of the place, at length announced that Sarastro and his followers had taken their places in the hall. This was the moment to fall upon the chieftain with fire and sword. He was defenceless save in his wisdom and goodness. The hour of sweet revenge for the Queen of Night had at length come. Thus far had Sarastro given her free scope, that his own power and mercy might be more fully revealed. But at this moment, at a sign from him, the wall, which alone divided him from his enemies disappeared, and the bright rays of the glorious morning sun dart full upon them. Like obscene birds of night, they fled its rays forever, while Tamino and Pamina joined hands, and received the blessing of the Priest-Ruler, amid the joyous and triumphant chorus of Priests and the grand assembly, hailing the new pair with blessings and uttering praise and thanks to Isis and Osiris, through whom they had gained the victory.

Richard Wagner's Lohengrin.

1. RICHARD WAGNER endeavors to characterize the heroes and more prominent situations of his operatic dramas by fixed and constantly recurring motives. This endeavor was previously to be found in the operas of C. M. von Weber, especially in his Euryanthe. The system is much more consistently and comprehensively carried out in Lohengrin than in Tannhäuser. There is no objection to the principle, but, in this instance, likewise, everything depends on the way in which it is executed. If the latter is delicate, intellectual and skilful, if the motives are perceptible, merely as bright flashes in the background, an indisputable advantage is gained for the opera, and the musical unity of this complicated Art-form; nay, we should not hesitate long in declaring such a plan to be the sole correct and sufficient one. We must be allowed to remark, however, that the manner in which the principle is employed in Lohengrin is an exceedingly clumsy, and, so to speak, sententious one, inasmuch as, to each figure and situation, a placard is, as it were, stuck, which announces, loud and clear, "Now I am coming, and here I am." Should anyone, however, think that the motives which characterize, or, rather, typify Lohengrin, Elsa, Friedrich von Telramund, Ortrud, the King, and the holy Grail, are important of themselves, this is a mere matter of taste. We do not consider them so. They are certainly characteristic, but in the ordinary sense; that is to say, their character is such as abstract understanding in combination with a slight degree of education can always produce with little trouble. Their principal importance, too, does not consist in the invention, which, as we have already said, is not particularly great, but in the orchestral coloring. It is not the phrases with which Friedrich von Telramund, the King, and the Holy Grail, announce themselves, which play the principal part, but the double-basses, the trumpets, and the flutes. Is there any such very great art in this, or have we not rather an instance of the means by which a mind possessing but little fancy tries to effect its purpose? The manner in which Wagner employs the principle, leads to insupportable monotony and wearisomeness, nay, as far as the trumpets are concerned, to torturing discomfort. By the adoption of such a form, however, the demands made by an opera upon the composer as a musically creative being, are certainly very much modified. Instead of being always new, and displaying his mastery over the fundamental tone and similarity of character, the composer simply repeats what has gone before, with slight variations, and a completely material and increased gradation, etc.

2. Richard Wagner despises Melody and does not care much about her. The feeling appears reciprocal, and it is, perhaps, out of mere spite, that R. Wagner speaks so rudely of the gentle virgin in his books. Melody or no melody is a subject about which we will not quarrel; but what we require from every work of Art, connected with stringed or wind instruments, is well-defined, palpable, nay, we would almost say, plastically perceptible forms, and thoughts which flash before us as if they proceeded from a distant star! We are sorry to say that scarcely the slightest trace of such forms and thoughts was visible to our weak mind, during the four hours Lohengrin took in representation. In fact, we will speak our opinion honestly and boldly: this psalmatically-quoted, musically-unmusical declamation wearied us indescribably, and yet shall we not be allowed to confess it? Such a protracted application of this principle was, certainly, never practised by any composer since Lully (and most undoubtedly not in any way by Gluck) before Wagner, and the mere putting such music to paper would have produced a very narcotic effect on Mozart for instance. Whenever R. Wagner steps out of the phrases which are at everyone's command, and only employed by him with more prudence than by many others, and endeavors, in some degree, to present us with more definite forms, we are immediately reminded of C. M. von Weber, nay, of Mendelssohn and Spohr. In this particular, Tannhäuser is more original and less poor than Lohengrin. The scene of Venus's grotto in the former opera is the only composition at all comprehensive, as well as decidedly hold and successfully carried out, which Wagner has yet been able to produce.

3. Music is an art free as the birds of the air. It possesses no laws, not even of acoustics, which the artist has to respect. This principle is announced "loud and clear," in Wagner's scores, and his disciples follow him in this particular with wonderful sagacity. There are two laws of organic musical construction which have not the slightest existence for R. Wagner: the laws of the various keys, and of harmonic combinations. With regard to the first, somebody once observed to us, rather wittily and appropriately, in reference to Tannhäuser: "The four-and-twenty keys do not afford a good basis for the ear." Now, let any one, bearing this in mind, go through Lohengrin or Tannhäuser, and he will find it a rare exception when R. Wagner remains for eight, nay, only four bars, in the same key. Thus, for instance, the herald gurgles out his short recitative before the sacred court is held, in six or seven keys, and on account of the unnatural springs taken by the harmony this single piece might in future be given to every singer for the purpose of testing his powers; whoever could get through it would be available at all times, and for all the scores of the Music of the Future for which we may yet hope. The notions, however, which Wagner appears to possess of harmony and the succession of chords, etc., must, to judge by the results, be actually barbarous; at any rate, all our own auricular nerves revolt at them. If the reader will only turn to page 20 of the pianoforte edition, line 3, and realize, "loud and clear," the return from F to A major, or, at page 47, in the first four bars before the fight, the harmonical succession: G, B flat and A major, then G, E, and D major, and, at page 63, the last few bars—especially the fifth, and, lastly, if he will only reflect on the horrible transition from A to B flat major at page 62, he will, perhaps, pardon us, if despite the celebrated name with which our investigations are connected, we exclaim: "This is mere bungling, nay, it is filth, the most despicable violation of the rules of Art!" and if any one should cry out and tell us that we are stupid, because this music does not please us, we appeal to a far more certain organ than the brain, and reply: "You cannot possess ears, if you are fond of revelling in such discord."

4. "When ideas fail, a word is introduced at the right time." Wagner employs everlastingly the same means. If there were no chromatics, no tremolo of the violins, and no trumpets and trombones, Wagner would be obliged to lay down his commander's staff, for we have named the principal forces with which he fights his battles. C major, C sharp major, D major, E flat major, E major, serve to portray passion, affright and excitement, and the reader will be able to open but few pages of the score without finding a climax of this description. In order to express a mysterious feeling on the one hand, and, on the other, a horrible, demoniacal feeling, was not Apollo gracious enough to allow us to discover the tremolo of the violins and basses? What more do we want, since we possess this? The trumpets and trombones, however, are Wagner's pets, and whenever, by way of exception, he soars into the realms of melody, he is fondest of employing the above instruments, especially the latter, to support him. O, it is something magnificent to have a song of joy (that shall, for instance, celebrate a marriage feast) brayed forth by a collection of trumpets and trombones. Who would deny the result? Wagner understands effect, we mean clumsy, material, coarse effect, as well as any one of his predecessors. He frequently approaches closely to Verdi, and is indebted for his best things to Meyerbeer and Berlioz, from whom he takes his treatment of the orchestra, although in some particulars he goes beyond them. Exactly like Meyerbeer, Wagner is fond of letting the gentlest sounds, the "sweet" toying of the violins, and the lisping of the flutes and oboes, sweep over the stage after the most overwhelming outbursts of braying noise. We first have unmeaning tumult, striving to appear like strength, then unmeaning cooling, striving to represent the tenderest sensations; in one place, untruthfulness and unnaturalness, and, in another, the gradations Wagner employs "to carry away" the spectator with him, heaping up, in order to depict a forcible situation, the tone-masses, from imperceptible beginnings, as it were, to colossal proportions; all this is imitated pretty nearly, from the well-known chorus of the conspirators in Meyerbeer's Huguenots. Wagner surpasses in all material details his model Meyerbeer, the connection with whom he thought he could not repudiate more effectually than by abusing him to his utmost; but Meyerbeer is far superior to him in intensity of specifically musical capability; compared to Wagner, he is an absolute Cæsar. It was lately remarked with great justice, that Wagner reverses the natural mode of constituting an orchestra. The wind instruments, especially the brass ones, occupy nearly always the first places, while the violins are generally employed in the highest passages. If people choose to call this kind of music new, the reputation of a great musical discoverer would belong to Richard Wagner, as far as he was really the first to discover all these things; but he found them, one and all, ready to his hand, and merely pushed them to the most extreme, most unlovely and most unharmonious lengths.

But enough of this. We hope we have satisfactorily explained the reason why we cannot enlist ourselves among the admirers of Wagner's muse. But, some one may probably object, if such is the state of the case, to what is the success attributable? Let the reader turn over the history of the immediate as well as of the more remote Past and call to mind what triumphs, by no means transient, it chronicles. Success certainly amounts to proof, which exceeds the authority of any mere individual, however highly placed; but then it is only that success which can look back hundreds, nay, thousands of years, and not the success of ten, or twenty, which is as readily granted to the most preposterous as to the most worthy things. Besides, may not a great portion of the present success be really set down to the unusual nature of Wagner's operatic subjects, to the enormous scenic splendor they require, the colossal masses they set in motion, to the varied interest connected with Wagner personally, as poet, composer, author, agitator, and reformer, and to the excessively active exertions of a party, very devoted to him, and who, by incessant announcements, keep the world in excitement and suspense?—all things which lie far beyond the actual artistic productions. His success, like his works themselves, certainly does prove something for Wagner; it proves that we have to do with no insignificant person, but with one distinguished by varied intelligence, and endowed with energetic mental powers for without these; such success and such works would be impossible. But a man may be still richer in gifts of this description and yet knock in vain for admission at the gates within which eternal Art resides.

While endeavoring to describe R. Wagner's muse generally, we have endeavored to characterize the music of Lohengrin, and shall add only a few more observations. In a musical point of view, the third act is the most successful piece of composition. The scene between Lohengrin and Elsa, in the bridal chamber, contains much that is beautiful, and, now and then, is marked by agreeable touches of warm feeling. Wagner sometimes manages the choruses—and large masses generally—in a very skilful manner, and frequently imparts to them, even musically, a certain antique stamp. The first chorus, for instance, in the first act, at Lohengrin's arrival, is admirably carried out, and surprisingly effective, while the effect of the concluding chorus depends on the ordinary common operatic means, and that of the nobles preceding the bridal procession, endeavors to produce an impression, by a coarse imitation of nature, and excels by a constrained and unnatural treatment of the voices. But Wagner uses us worst in the second act. We hope we shall never hear such a braying of trumpets and trombones again till the Day of Judgment, and we confess that, as often as the horrible trumpeters, who always announce the approach of the king, appeared on the stage, we began to tremble in all our limbs, like children, when they know there is to be a volley of musketry, or a discharge of artillery.

The opera was received, on the whole, favorably. The audience welcomed the first and third acts with tolerable warmth, but were somewhat more indifferent about the second. A portion of the success may be fairly attributed to the perfectly exquisite manner in which the opera was produced. The first place belongs to Herr Ander and Madlle. Meyer, who sang and played the parts of Lohengrin and Elsa with nearly ideal perfection. Had we not already long valued Herr Ander as a thinking artist, we should be obliged to do so now, after this admirable performance. Throughout the opera he recollected the part he had to represent, and never assumed a tone or indulged in a look or gesture, which did not befit the "holy knight." Madlle. Meyer has evidently thrown her whole soul into the part of Elsa, and we blame her the less as all the advantage falls to our share. She was rich in the most beautiful and most touching points. Herr Beck (Friedrich von Telramund) possesses in his wonderful voice such a natural gift, that he requires to exert himself but little to captivate us. Mad. Hermann (Ortrud) and Herr Schmid (King Heinrich), were, on the whole, deserving of praise, although we should not say the latter could be entranced by the ascetic demeanor his part imposes on him. Nor must we forget Herr Hrabanek, who acquitted himself with certainty of the exceedingly difficult part of the herald. Both the chorus and orchestra were admirable, and the wonderful precision which distinguished the opera as a whole reflects the greatest credit on Herr Esser, who, as Capellmeister, directed the performance, and Herr Eckert. Lastly, scene-painters, costumiers, stage-managers, etc., honestly contributed their share towards the success, and we think that the management need not fear producing Tannhäuser next year, for R. Wagner should be heard. To this he has a right. C. D.

A Piccolomini Matinee.

A correspondent of the Providence Journal writes thus from New York:

The success of the Piccolomini matinée was a surprise even to Metropolitan opera goers. The darkest, murkiest, most suicidal of November days, the chilliest of November rains, could not damp the musical ardor of the public. An hour before the doors were opened, Irving Place was blocked up with carriages, and the steps of the Academy were swept by dreary, dripping velvets and ermines, brocades, poplins, and "antiques," among which "skeletons" surreptitiously peeped forth, and Bloomers and Balmorals audaciously intruded themselves. When the outer doors were opened, the crush was fearful. Ladies fainted, and frightened children were lifted over the heads of the crowd into the lobbies and corridors. I was fortunate enough to be directly in the wake of Mrs. Potiphar, whose ample ermines furnished a safe and convenient point d'appui through the most perilous crisis of the pressure. During the performance of Norma, in which Mde. Laborde made her debut, I had almost forgotten the Piccolomini. She was to appear in the character of "the Domineering Housemaid" in Paesiello's comic operetta, "La Serva Padrona," played for the first time in America. A descendant of the chivalrous house of Piccolomini, niece to a Cardinal of the Church of Rome, appearing before a New York audience in the part of a saucy soubrette! Truly, the world turns round very fast in our day.

At length the grand opera of Norma was ended, and before we had time to recover from our druidical dreams, the little princess tripped upon the stage, looking like a child of fourteen years, in a short petticoat looped up with cherry-colored ribbons, which showed to great advantage her pretty child-like feet and ankles. In five minutes the eyes and hearts of "four thousand spectators" were irrevocably captivated. "Did she pelt them with her kisses, as she did the poet of Idlewild?" Not oppressively. "Was she beautiful?" No. "Was she a great artist?" I cannot tell. She was charming in a way so exclusively her own that it would be quite unavailing to talk about it. She was so young, so innocent, so blooming, so confidently frank and coquettish and piquant, so winning, so arch, so graceful, that her presence was like a beam of morning light or a breath of morning air. My memory of her, should I see her a thousand times, will be always "A Matinée."

Marietta Gazzaniga.

MADAME GAZZANIGA MALASPINA, the subject of our sketch, was born at Voghera, a small town in the neighborhood of Pavia, in Lombardy, on the 8th of June, 1826. Her father was a lawyer, in easy circumstances, and it was comparatively long before her inborn love of music was developed into a passion for the stage. At the early age of six, however, Marietta was distinguished by her voice, and in her sixteenth year her talents attracted the attention of Signor Amadeo Cetto, a dilettante of Voghera, who counselled her parents to add the advantage of competent instruction to her natural genius. She was accordingly placed with Alberto Mazzucato, one of the first Italian maestri, and after one year's instruction only, her début took place at La Scala, in Milan. The part was Sappho, and Marietta's success unequivocal. After several representations of Sappho, each of which added to the admiration excited by her first performance, she performed in two operas by Mazzucato—the "Due Sargenti" and "Luigi V.," the latter having been composed expressly for her.

After a triumphant season at Milan, Marietta Gazzaniga played triumphant engagements at Turin, Como, and elsewhere, in the "Capuletti," "Templari," "Nabucco," "Lucrezia," and other operas, appearing also in the part of Lucrezia at Varese, in Lombardy. At this place her extraordinary genius excited to such a degree the admiration of a wealthy nobleman, that he ordered the company of military which he maintained at his own expense, to escort and serenade the prima donna after her performance.

During the Carnival of 1844, Marietta Gazzaniga performed at Lucca, principally in the operas of "Linda di Chamounix" and "Don Pasquale," and afterwards appeared at Florence, where, after being engaged in the performance of the unsuccessful opera entitled "Saul," by its composer, Speranza, she played in the "Elisire" and in "Il Bravo," in the last of which she appeared together with Erminia Frezzolini, Poggi, Castellane and Debassini. Frezzolini was at that period in the height of her fame and popularity, and to venture upon the stage simultaneously with one who stood confessedly at the summit of her art, was a bold undertaking for a youthful prima donna; but she triumphed over the difficulties of the situation, and her fame extended with each performance. After a brief interval, she appeared again at Florence, where she sang in "Giovanna d'Arco," and in "Buondelmonte," which was composed expressly for her by Pacini. In 1844 she sang at Leghorn, and was so successful during her engagement, that it was renewed by the management, nor was it until 1845 that she left Tuscany for Venice. During the years 1845 and 1846 she sang successively in every one of the principal Italian cities. Her repertoire included the large number of forty-two operas. Her remarkable career exhibited no single fiasco. Wherever she appeared she became at once the favorite of the press and the idol of the public. The fame of the rising artiste soon extended beyond the Italian peninsula, and she was called to Madrid, where she became a favorite at once. She sang during several years at the Spanish capital, and in 1855 made a tour of the provinces. In 1855 she returned to Italy, where she gave thirty-eight performances, of which twenty-six were Verdi's "Traviata."

In February, 1857, Madame Gazzaniga made her first appearance before an American audience at Philadelphia. Her success there was deservedly great, and she passed from thence to Boston and New York, and after a few additional performances at Philadelphia, she sailed for Havana, where she performed during the last winter. The Cubans exceeded even their brethren of Madrid in the enthusiasm which they manifested at her performances. They recognized in her impulsive and earnest manner that genius which gives lifelike reality to a simulated character, and marks the great from the mediocre artist. They appreciated her for what she did, and forgot the minor blemishes in the resplendent glory of her grand inspirations. They judged her rightly, and the tokens of their enthusiasm were solidly gratifying, and proved the sincerity of their appreciation.

Madame Gazzaniga, who will be one of the bright particular stars of Max Maretzek's season in Havana, is now finishing an honorable and successful engagement at the Academy of Music. Notwithstanding the extraordinary popularity, the almost idolatrous admiration of Piccolomini, Gazzaniga has made her genius acknowledged, and has received a brilliant ovation in the shape of one of the most crowded and fashionable audiences of the season, on the occasion of her performance of Leonora in "La Favorita." She was greeted with extraordinary enthusiasm from the moment of her appearance to the close of the opera. Her acting in the last act could hardly be surpassed, and the public and the press acknowledged her glorious talents. Gazzaniga is still young, and has before her a brilliant career. She has the good wishes of all for her prosperity.

On leaving New York, to the regret of thousands of her admirers, Madame Gazzaniga proceeds to Charleston, and will sail thence for Havana on the first of December, in the steamship Isabel. The operative performances to take place during the coming winter in the capital of Cuba promise to excel in brilliancy even those which have been presented during the last five years. The contretemps which has delayed Maretzek's arrival in the Queen of the Antilles has added an eagerness, unusual even among the music-loving Habaneros, to witness his coming; and the theatre which he has at length succeeded in securing will undoubtedly be found scarcely of sufficient size to accommodate his audiences. Opera, in fact, is nothing less than a passion during the Havana winter, and the presence of Madame Gazzaniga, who is idolatrously worshipped there, will contribute not a little towards fanning the already ardent flame. —Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

It is well known that innumerable stories are afloat concerning the origin of the "Magic Flute," and the relation of its composer, Mozart, to Schikaneder, the theatre-manager and text-writer. These stories are both true and false, and the latter can hardly any longer be distinguished from the former. Now the Vienna "Monatschrift für Theater und Musik" gives an account of the origin of this opera, which was written by a contemporary of Mozart and Schikaneder, and may therefore be regarded as authentic. We will make some extracts from it. Early on the morning of the 7th of March, 1791, Schikaneder came to Mozart, who was still in bed, and entreated him to assist the tottering Art-temple "an der Wieden" and its debt-laden manager by a new opera; he would prove himself not ungrateful. He had written the text to a magic opera, from Wieland's Lulu in Tschimistan, and it was nearly finished. Mozart consented conditionally, and Schikaneder left him. On the stairs a spark suddenly crossed his brain, and, almost breathless, and as quick as his corpulence admitted, he flew from the "Raubeinstein gasse" to the Wieden suburb, and into the Kapanner gasse, where stood the so-called "Kopäundl" (little capon, probably an inn.) Here lived Madame Gerl, who, together with her husband, the Basso Gerl, was in the employ of Schikaneder, and was said to exert great influence over Mozart. The shrewd Schikaneder gained her over to his interest, and already the next evening Mozart came to him on the stage, and said: "Well now, look you that I soon get the book, and I will write the opera. If we have a malheur I can't help it, for I have never yet composed a magic opera." In about a week Mozart had the text, which he rather liked, as it really contains some poetical or rather romantic ideas, which, though Schikaneder's total want of intellectual culture prevented them from being adequately worked up, were still obvious. Mozart quickly began his work, which was, however, interrupted before the end of the month, as the States summoned him to Prague, to write the "Clemenza di Tito" for the coronation festivities. In a few weeks the latter was finished, and Mozart returned to Vienna, to continue the "Magic Flute." This great work he created partly at his residence in the "Raubeinsteingasse," partly on a little garden bired of Schikaneder, in the large middle court of the "Freibans," and adjoining the theatre. The little half-raised pavilion, with chair and table, where Mozart composed, can still be seen there to this day. During the noonday meal, (it was midsummer) which Mozart mostly shared there with Schikaneder, they diligently worked, laughed, and drank Champagne.

Under these circumstances the Zauberflöte saw the light. Mozart had hardly written the first few numbers, when Joseph Schnitzer, who was one of Schikaneder's actors, came to the latter with an unpleasant piece of news. He had accidentally been present at the rehearsal of the new magic opera in the Leopoldstadt, "Casper, the Fagottist, or the Magic Cither," by Perinet, with music by Wenzel Müller, and had acquired the sad certainty that Perinet, like Schikaneder, had taken his subject from Wieland's Lulu, and that the characters as well as the progress of the intrigue, closely resembled those of the "Magic Flute." Nothing remained, therefore, but to destroy what was already accomplished, and give an entirely new tone to the opera. Sarastro, who was originally a tyrant, a villain, was transformed into a wise, noble priest and friend to humanity; the Queen of Night, who was before a Princess of Love, a tender mother, became a monster, an intrigue-monger, an unnatural woman. The three ladies, the companions of the Queen of Night, the moor, as an allegory of the dark workings of villainy, were assigned to her as tools, and in this wise something entirely new had been created, of which the author himself had before no idea. Hence it happened that, on the first appearance of the ladies where they are, the deliverers of Tamino, they direct him to the three young boys, who are to be his guides, and are consequently in the service of the Queen, while, as the opera progresses, they become followers of Sarastro, and the protectors of Tamino and Pamina against the dark plans of the Queen of Night. Schikaneder probably was not sufficiently aware of these inconsistencies, and the great Mozart, in the consciousness of his musical power, did not trouble himself much about them. Many of the numbers Mozart was obliged to alter on Schickaneder's demand. The part of Papageno the latter had reserved for himself, and as he was unable from his small compass, or rather total want of voice, to sing the Papageno song, as it was first written, it had to be made perfectly simple, and is yet so melodious, so charming! The duet: "With men, who love's sweet pain are feeling," Mozart altered three times; Schickaneder always said: "Brother, it is very fine, but too learned for me." At last, with his hoarse voice, he hummed something to him, and the good Mozart said, quite patiently: "Well, thou shalt have it." It is only to be regretted that Mozart destroyed the first two sketches of the duet. Now the greater part of the opera was finished. Mozart worked untiringly. Süßmayer, Mozart's pupil, helped him to instrument it; he was closely familiar with his master's wishes, and some of the accessories of course, after explicit directions from Mozart, are said to be entirely by him. The Priests' chorus: "O Isis and Osiris," the Papageno songs, and the second Finale were written on the 12th of September, the Priests' March and the Overture only on the 28th, and so late, that the latter was still quite wet when distributed among the orchestra at the rehearsal. At last, on the 30th of September, 1791, after many rehearsals, the first representation took place. It was singular that on this occasion the public, probably by the many great beauties of the music, and the rare wealth of the motives, was so astonished, so taken aback, that the applause could bear no comparison with the subsequent unexampled success of the work. At each repetition the enthusiasm increased, and this master piece of Tone-Art was soon completely understood and entirely appreciated, so that it was given on sixteen successive evenings. The first three times Mozart conducted in person; Süßmayer sat next to him, and turned the leaves; Henneberg, director of the orchestra at the Wieden Freihaus Theatre, played the bells. As a proof of the modesty of Mozart, we may mention the fact that, when, at the close of the first representation, the Composer was vehemently and continuously called out, he hid himself in various places, in order not to appear, until Süßmayer and Schickaneder at last found him, and dragged him upon the stage by main force. During the month of October, 1791, the opera was given 24 times, and brought, in spite of the limited accommodations for an audience, and the low prices of admission common at that time, the sum of $8,443 florins up to Nov. 1st, which seemed almost fabulous. It continued to be given very frequently, but the master, who, since his journey to Prague, had been often ailing, and whom unceasing mental exertion (he wrote La Clemenza di Tito, the "Magic Flute," and his Requiem almost simultaneously,) was rapidly wearing out, enjoyed his triumph only from hearsay. He already left his bed but rarely, but never his room. Mozart himself gained but little by the "Magic Flute," as Schickaneder paid him badly, and, besides, sold the score to many theatres without allowing its great creator the smallest share of the profits. If any one spoke to Mozart of this wrong, which was all the greater, as he had saved Schickaneder from ruin, the good, noble man would only say: "What shall I do with him, he is a shabby fellow"; and that would end the matter. The day before his death he said to his wife, afterwards Frau von Nissen (from whose lips the writer of this has himself heard it: "I should like to hear my Magic Flute once more," and hummed with hardly audible voice: "The merry bird catcher I. The late chapelmaster Rosen, who sat by his bedside, arose, went to the piano and sang the song, which seemed to cheer Mozart greatly. The next morning he died; it was on the 5th of December, 1791. The funeral took place on the 7th of December, in a terrible snowstorm. The only followers of his remains were chapelmaster Rosen, the violoncellist Orsles, of the Royal Orchestra, and Süßmayer. His wife was seriously ill; Schickaneder was not present.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, OCT.—In the beginning of the past three months, while it was vacation at the opera-house, the interest of that portion of our Art-loving public, who were confined to the drought and almost intolerably bad air of Berlin, turned to the "Bouffes Parisiens" at Kroll's little theatre. The sphere in which this quaint and interesting troupe of artists are especially at home is that of one-act musical farces, which are made up, after the manner of vanderilles, of droll songs, complets & ensemble pieces; noteworthy among which is the thoroughly melodious and flowing operetta by Offenbach, Le Mariage aux lanternes, which contains a fund of natural merriment and humor. Unluckily the troupe aspired above this level in two works demanding higher dramatic power and higher musical culture, namely, Rossini's Bruschino and Mozart's Impresario. The former piece proved far beyond the powers of this troupe; and yet on the other hand so nonsensical, that it could hardly be expected to succeed even upon a larger stage. To the little ariettas and ensemble-pieces of the Impresario of Mozart, a text has been put by Batty and Halevy, which is in open discord with the character of the music. Mozart's music is graceful, arch and playful, altogether finely formed and of a noble style; the text, on the contrary, contains motives and presuppositions which degrade the piece to silliness. As to the performance, Mozart requires, even in the smallest aria, above all, fresh voices and fine musical culture; just these two things were lacking in these French buffo singers. Mlle. CHABERT was not equal to the charm and graceful neatness of the Mozart melodies, and fell into important variations and impure interpolations. On the contrary in La Charmeuse, the players felt themselves at home in their own element, and Mlle. GÉOFFROY, as Nette, both by her personal attractiveness, and by her arch, coquettish play, made it easy to believe that all the young men of the village could regard her as a charmer.

In the one-act operetta, "Le 66," Offenbach has sought to smuggle a specific German element into the French opera; but the attempt has failed. German strains are heard frequently enough in the piece, but they are so opposed to the character of the French music, that the composer was obliged to Frenchify them thoroughly. Before his Parisian audience this may be all very well; but to us Germans, this disagreement in the character of the music is repugnant. A second difficulty was, that this German element was entirely foreign to the singers, especially in the acting and conception of their roles. They gave you Frenchmen, but no Tyrolese; their comedy was at times striking and enlivening, but it was comedy of the Parisian precinct. The second novelty, Le Financier et le Surtout, was the most nonsensical thing given by this company. The plot of the opera moves in a sphere, where one no longer has to ask if what is given can be reconciled with sound humor understandingly or not. Yet, with all its bêtises, poor jokes and adventurous situations, it preserves a certain elegance; it is often trivial, but it understands how to be graceful even in triviality. Offenbach's music, with all its carelessness, is melodious and ornate.

The Royal Opera began, after the summer intermission, with the "Barber," "Prophet," "Robert" and "Tannhäuser," the principal parts in each being taken by "stars" (Gästen). If Frailein GUENTHER, who was called here to a second round, fell short of the mark as Rosina in the "Barber," she was all the more decidedly successful as Fides in the "Prophet," and we are persuaded that her talent, in this kind of field—say as Leonora in La Favorita, Azucena in Il Trovatore, &c.,—will yield abundant fruit. Especially refreshing was the intelligence with which she gave the mother of the prophet, and her expression of the tenderest stirrings of maternal love, which gave a peculiar charm to the Arioso of the 2nd, and the duets of the 4th and 5th acts, while the voice was not sufficient for the bursts of passion. Yet the curse and the fiery Aria in A flat major in the last act, which she rendered after the best models, received much applause. The intelligence which we have praised so decidedly in the delivery of Frä. Guenther, was very moderately manifested in the Bertha of Frä. BUERY. So far as her worn voice permitted, she sung her part with technical facility, and here and there in passages in the highest register produced a sotto voce of unexpected smoothness. Frä. WIPPERN sung the Alice in Robert le Diable with a most youthful freshness and a lovely charm that will not be forgotten. Robert was represented by Herr GRILL, of Munich, a heroic tenor, to whom, take him as he now is, without gentler polish, we cannot accord any unqualified approbation. He might have profited in this also by the example of Roger, which in many respects he happily followed. In action, to be sure, he showed a certain freedom and certainty, and even nobleness, without going much beyond the limits of the traditional gestures and movements. One Herr HUMESER, who appeared on the following evening as Tannhäuser, was not allowed to appear again; by his bad singing he compromised essentially the warm reception of the excellent Elizabeth of Frä. Günther.

Von Flotow's opera "Stradella" acquired unusual interest through the farewell of Herr Grill in the title-rôle, and the re-appearance of our esteemed Frau HERRENBURG. Two, and only two, of all the operas of Flotow have acquired a certain capacity of living. He had the good fortune to have to exercise his routine upon two pretty, piquant texts; he brought to the task a pleasing talent, considerable taste in the arranging of comical and lively situations, as well as a sense for the piquanteries of a comic humor which, if not always fine, is not offensively broad. Flotow had a happy faculty for working up foreign, especially French popular melodies; and so this work, made up of French polka and quadrille motives, sentimental phrases and rocket-like cadenzas, is actually pervaded by a certain originality, especially for those who let themselves be dazzled by the surprising rhythms, upon the garnishing of which all his ingenuity is expended. The general public and the great majority of the press were full of the praises of Herr Grill, and we too should have joined in it, if had not been on the Royal stage. This same public, this same press, once fought zealously for R. Hoffmann, now departed, but only—to let him drop. Herr Grill's tenor is not great in compass, and has no body in the lower notes. The tone is seldom quite pure, being almost always accompanied by a fatty timbre; his notes are not attacked with certainty, they form themselves in a crescendo fashion; his intonation often wavers. His delivery is on the whole expressive, but frequently accompanied by too declamatory a manner, which is much opposed to the dramatic, and is characteristic of second-rate singers.

Frau KOESTER appeared for the first time again in the "Huguenots," in her splendid part of Valentine. She was received with unmixed delight, and showed anew how valuable she is in the present ebb of tolerable singers on our stage; although her voice sounded somewhat worn and even excited serious apprehensions in the second act, yet she succeeded in the duet of the third act, and still more in that of the fourth act, in coming near the height of her earlier achievements. Herr FORMES in the third act was betrayed into a too great forcing of his voice, followed by a pardonable exhaustion in the last act.

Fraulein BAUR for the first time played the queen, a part which the composer has equipped with all the charms of fresh, sensuous galantry and French vivacity, for which reason it runs out almost exclusively into the boldest and most coquettish floriture. It was rather the aim of the composer here to excite in the hearer light, agreeable and fresh sensations, by way of contrast with the part of Valentine; and for this end he requires a singer quite at home in all the finesses and nuances of a facile, ornamental vocalization. Such a singer Fräulein Baur is not; the restraint with which she first came on, made her intonation very uncertain, and she was sadly at odds with the orchestra, who must use more discretion. The choruses in the third act did not take hold with sufficient energy and freshness. But the soldier's chorus, the mocking and the conspiracy chorus were very successful.

The "Bouffes Parisiens", after several unsuccessful efforts, partly owing to their selection of the coarsest pieces, were succeeded at Kroll's theatre by the Königsherg Opera Company of Director Woltersdorf, who gained more and more upon the sympathy of our public. Their repertoire consists of musical melodramas and farces, and they had the merit of seeking out and producing good old pieces, those especially by Schenk, Dittersdorf, Boieldieu, Fioravanti and Paer. Particularly worthy of mention is Dittersdorf's Doctor und Apotheker, a comic opera, occupying about the same place in German opera that Rossini's "Barber" does in the Italian. In spite of their superficiality both breathe a genuine nationality, which keeps them still alive. The comic characters, the doctor and the apothecary, those town-life copies of a Capulet and a Montague, — the house-plague of the former, Claudia, — the barber, who knows how to advise in all cases, and pull the strings of intrigue, and whom Figaro would not be ashamed to have for a colleague — these all belong to those German types which thrive so luxuriantly on German soil, and whose counterparts we meet upon the streets and market-places of our little German towns. While Rossini's work is a creation of unbridled carnival fun, filled from beginning to end with uproarious mirth and overflowing humor, in the music of Dittersdorf, with all its roguery, an intellectual element predominates. This runs as a groundstone through the whole opera and rings out clearly and intelligibly in the first number; it is a masterpiece of genre painting, of an idyllic character, full of the most genial festive evening mood. The Doctor und Apotheker also resembles the "Barber of Seville" in the fact that it surpasses all the later works of its composer in freshness and wealth of invention. The execution showed that the performers did not feel quite sure in their parts. The whole enterprise is as yet too young, and in the rapid change of repertoire may justly claim indulgence. One obstacle was found in the acoustic qualities of the otherwise unsurpassed royal hall, which is particularly unfavorable for dialogue.

As for the other musical enjoyments of a Berlin summer, in which, strange to say, it has already begun to rain twelve Sundays in succession, they have been almost altogether programmes à la Musard, and have offered an abundance of quadrilles, polkas, and especially pot-pourris, battle music with fireworks and salvos of cannons, &c., better suited to the Zaun-güste (population outside of the gates), than to the cultivated concert public. JF.

NEW YORK, NOV. 23. — We have been enjoying a very piquant newspaper war between Mr. Ullman and the editors of the French paper, the Courier des Etats Unis, in which the other city journals have taken a part — like the boys who stand around a couple of juvenile combatants and cheer them with shouts and bravos, and mysterious phrases of dread import, as who should say, "Go in, lemons!"

It seems that Mr. Masseras, one of the French editors, was on a visit lately to Philadelphia, and met some gossiping old friend, who told him that PICCOLOMINI had no right to that name, and was of the family of Clementini. Mr. Masseras publishes this startling information in his paper; whereupon Mr. Ullman publishes an amusing manifesto, wherein he takes occasion to stigmatize the editors of the Courrier as being "Three hungry Frenchmen" — to accuse them of ungovernable appetite for free tickets — and to state the amount of salary paid to their musical critic, and charge the said critic with giving sugar and water soirées!

To this the Frenchmen respond. They say they never demand free tickets — they disclaim the heinous charge of being peculiarly hungry, and they republish certain articles, which, according to Mr. Ullman, had been written merely to insult Piccolomini.

Ullman again to the rescue. He reiterates his charges and is so delighted with the happy phrase, "Three hungry Frenchmen," that he repeats it again and again, with infinite gusto. It takes. The newspapers quote it, and already an up-town stereoscopic company have got up a picture, representing three foreign-looking men, in an opera-box, with their mouths wide open, like so many ravenous little robins in a nest, and their hands at work clapping à la claque; and under the picture is the inscription:

YE THREE HUNGRY FRENCHMEN.

The French editors then become quite grand and dignified, and give the lie direct to Ullman. "Some way or other public opinion begins to side with them, and Mr. Ullman to-day publishes a grand farewell card, which amounts to nothing. So the affair ends in smoke, and the result is that Piccolomini turns out to be really a Piccolomini, and will, on the death of a relative, be also a Clementini — her father being heir to the estates and title of an individual of the latter name.

In the meantime, the opera has been progressing, and a successful pasticcio performance has taken place in Brooklyn, it being Mr. Ullman's intention to give a weakly performance there during his next season. To-morrow night he produces Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with Piccolomini as Susanna. Then she is to appear in Lucresia, and the season will close with the Huguenots, in which Poinson will make her debut.

Mr. Ullman's company is very unequal. With a splendid list of prime donne, he is actually without a presentable tenor, and has no contralto at all. His repertoire is consequently limited, and for the past few weeks he has had to depend upon some of the artists of Marcetzk's troupe — STEFFANI, GASSIER, and GAZZANIGA having been called in to his aid. He goes to Boston next week, and if Piccolomini should first appear there in Don Giovanni, your fidgitty, capitious musical writers will be charmed at once, and the Cerberus of criticism placated — nay, fascinated — by the voice of the siren. (I was going to say "lulled to sleep" — that would have sounded prettier, but if any one could go to sleep while Piccolomini is singing Zerlina, he is fit only to be a Turk and take opium, and I verily believe that even Mr. Piekwick's Fat Boy himself would gloriously triumph over his somniferous propensities, could he but be present to hear the Batti, batti.)

I found it, however, hard work to triumph over my somniferous propensities at the Philharmonic Concert Saturday evening. The programme, vastly inferior to those usually offered, was as follows:

PART. I.

Symphony, No. 5. in D minor, Op. 25, (first time), 1. Allegro con Fuoco; 2. Andante Sostenuto; 3. Scherzo — Allegro Molto Vivace; 4. Finale — Andante con Moto and Allegro Vivace: Niels W. Gade. Piano Obligato, Mr. Henry C. Timm. Aria, from the opera "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart; "Parto parto, ma tu ben mio," Miss Hattie Andem. Recitative and Aria, from the opera "Guttenberg," Fuchs; Mr. Philip Mayer.

PART II.

Quartet-Concerto, Op. 131, (first time); Louis Spohr: Quarter-Obligato — Messrs. E. Mollenhauer, J. Noll, G. Matzka, and F. Bergner. Lied, "Überall du," ("Thou everywhere.") J. Lachner; Mr. Philip Mayer: Corno-Obligato — Mr. C. Brannes. Fantasiestück, for Cornet & piston, (first movement), L. Schreiber: Herr Louis Schreiber. Aria from "Maritana," "The Harp in the Air," W. V. Wallace: Miss Hattie Andem. Overture, L'Assedio di Corinto (Siege of Corinth), first time; G. Rossini.

Gade's symphony contains a delicious movement — the scherzo — in which the piano part is brilliantly prominent. Spohr's fine Quartet seems out of place in a large building like Niblo's. Nobody appreciated it, few listened, and the majority chattered. The vocalists of the evening were inferior, though Mr. MAYER sang a German Lied exquisitely, and was encored. Rossini's overture seemed to wake up the sleepers, and quiet the chatters, and it was generally conceded the concert was below the mark.

Item. It has struck me, by the way, whether half the adverse criticisms ever written do not come from sleepy heads? How can a being enjoy a symphony, when his head is bobbing like a Chinese mandarin in a tea shop?

The "Mendelssohn Union" gave a fine performance the other night, of "St. Paul." Mr. ADAMS (from Boston) was the tenor, and sang with taste and expression. The wife of CARL ANSCHUTZ, whose name was given on the bills as Madame ZIMMERMANN, sang most of the soprano solos well, and Miss HAWLEY did the one piece allotted to her, excellently. Mr. GUILMETTE interpreted the bass solos. This Society will next produce Rossini's "Moses in Egypt." TROVATOR.

BOSTON, NOV. 23. — Mr. Editor: Overwhelmed with confusion though I am by the loud and clamorous calls for my "littleness" which have graced your last two numbers, I yet feel it incumbent upon me to reply to the kind inquiries of my worthy colleagues. After stating that my long silence has been caused entirely by lack of material during several months of "rusticating," I must say that, during a temporary visit to your city, I am enjoying musical advantages sufficient to compensate amply both for the summer's dearth, and for what I lose in New York. At the house of an amateur friend, music is the order of the day, and several times a week, the snite of lofty, spacious, well-lighted rooms, set apart for the purpose, resounds with the best of compositions, ably executed by both dilettanti and professional artists. Then we are frequent visitors of the weekly meetings of the Amateur Orchestra, and though the performances are not always what might be wished for in point of execution, they give us an opportunity of hearing many new works. Besides all this, private concerts at other houses, and those of the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, serve to make me acquainted with much of your musical talent, and afford me occasions of listening to music, and just the music that I love, to my heart's content. I will not, of course, enter into details, of which you can treat so much better than myself, but I must say that I was exceedingly gratified with the performance of the Mendelssohn Club, and that I never heard Beethoven's B flat Trio more beautifully played than, at a private concert, by Messrs. TRENKLE, SCHULTZE and FRIES. I had for the first time the pleasure of hearing the first named gentleman, of whom I have read much in your journal, and my expectations were more than fulfilled. There is a depth and earnestness, a power and dignity in his playing, which I have seldom heard equalled. I hope I shall hear him again, and often.

Having now accounted for myself, and, I hope, satisfactorily so, I must tell you how much I was interested in A. W. T's account of the history of the "Magic Flute." Particularly so, as I had for some time had in my possession an article on the same subject, cut from a German paper a few months ago, which gives another side of the story. I have been waiting for an opportunity to send it to you, and do so now, certain that it will interest some of your readers. You may not be aware that Mozart's little Operetta of "the Schauspiel-director" is founded on the same subject. I had the good fortune to hear it in Berlin some years ago, admirably given, with a singer named Hasse, I believe, from Vienna, in the character of Schickaneder. He was said to bear a strong resemblance to the old "Schauspiel director", and, having known him personally, to imitate to perfection all his oddities. The very scenes which are described in the article I send you, were enacted in the operetta—for instance, that relating to the duet—besides many other similar ones, which made a tout-ensemble of the most charming, humorous character.

One thing more; before I affix the unlucky signature which has so provoked the sarcasm of friend Guage of words. In the string Quartets, Quintets, "Trovator," and the curiosity of all my friends, I will give them and myself the satisfaction of explaining that this same signature: "—t—", represents my whole name, minus eighteen letters, and this declaration will in future, I hope, spare me the indignity of being called "little" —t—.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

With eager appetite, after six or seven months' privation of what may be called the quintessence of musical enjoyment—that of listening in a small room, quietly, with a select company of sincere lovers, to the violin quartets and quintets of Mozart, Beethoven, and the like—did we, with hardly a couple of hundreds of others, wend our way, on Thursday evening, last week, to the beautiful saloon of the Messrs. Chickering, long hallowed by such influences, but, soon alas! to be abandoned to more vulgar uses. It was a goodly company; yet we missed quite a number of the most familiar faces, that had become inseparably identified in past years with the concerts of the Club; their absence,—doubtless accidental and only for an evening,—seemed to chill the atmosphere of the room to a degree hardly counteracted by the welcome accession of many new and earnest listeners. But soon the music made all warm and genial and bright again; a few magic strains of Beethoven and all "the winter of our discontent" was summer!

Music in Boston owes a great debt to the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, if only for the one rare merit—singularly rare in these degenerate times and hereabouts—of having persevered through nine continuous winters in giving us the true thing, music that is music, intrinsically beautiful and noble, the finest inspirations of the great tone-poets, who are such consummate masters of their language—a language far more delicate and perfect, more of the soul and universal, and yet far more difficult, complex and quick to elude the grasp of any but true genius, than any language of words. In the string Quartets, Quintets, Trios, Sonatas, &c.,—what we call the "chamber music"—of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, and other kindred spirits, is sealed up much of the finest wine of pure poetic inspiration—the happiest and heavenliest thoughts with which mortal brain was ever blessed, and lifted to a kindred sense of the divine. Sealed up, we say, because it takes skilful artists, of fine culture, to set free these delicate spirits locked up and preserved in written characters, so that they may become real and alive to us; and because at best they must be sealed to all except the few, the hundreds, perhaps only tens, of those who have an earnest, cultivated love of music. It is not that to which the thousands rush, that necessarily exerts the deepest influence upon the mind and taste of a community. Quality in the long run goes as far as quantity. A string quartet speaks to a hundred or two hearers only; but that hundred is composed of those who lead in musical culture, who exert an influence in society around them, who necessarily are referred to in their own circles more or less as standards of true taste, and who set the tone according as they take it. Moreover the example is copied; the wholesome infection spreads; chamber concerts spring up at various points about the neighborhood, kindling the true fire in many circles; the charm works, too, in private life, not the less really and beneficially, because noiseless and unseen; quartet parties have become a somewhat common thing in private houses. A real, refined love of music, naturally, just in proportion as it is that, seeks the shade and the protection of the congenial social sphere for its enjoyment. We complain of the falling off of large and showy public concerts here in Boston, which was wont to boast so many; but silently and slowly music, in its purest forms, has crept into our private life during these past years, and so domesticated itself as to have to become quite an essential element in the internal culture of not a few homes, and thus prove that in the best sense we are really making progress. Is it going too far to suggest that to the persistent influence of the Quintet Club, not forgetting others, belongs a very large share of our thanks for this result.

Of the original members who composed the Club nine years ago, two only, Messrs. RYAN, and WULF FRIES remain; yet its identity seems well preserved, and never was the Club, upon the whole, in so good a condition to present a quintet or a quartet as at present. It now consists of Messrs. WILLIAM SCHULTZE (successor to AUGUST FRIES), first violin; CARL MEISEL, second violin; GUSTAV KREBS, tenor, and occasionally flute; THOMAS RYAN, tenor, and occasionally clarinet; and WULF FRIES, violoncello. The first taste of their quality, on Thursday night, was highly encouraging. The opening piece was Beethoven's second Quartet, the No. 2 (in G) of the six composing Op. 18, and we do not know that we have before heard so fine a blending of the strings, so pure and musical an ensemble of tone, together with such clear individuality of parts, especially the middle parts, which were often the weak point of the quartet. The new leader played with admirable purity, delicacy, finish, and expression, very rarely swerving in the least from perfect intonation even in the acutest sounds. There was more warmth and spirit in his playing than we have credited him with before.

The "Sylvester Song," arranged from Schumann's "Album" by Mr. Ryan, made a sweet little piece, and was nicely played; only the clarinet melody, against the quartet accompaniment, stood in too bold relief. We would rather hear such things well played on the piano-forte, for which they were intended. Mr. B. J. LANG, who assists the Club this season, is one of the most promising of our young pianists, already at home in a pretty large repertoire of difficult classical and modern music, and evincing a facility of technical acquisition in which perhaps there lies some danger. His selection was unfortunate.

This "Benediction de Dieu Dans la Solitude," from the "Harmonies Poétiques" of Liszt, proved but a repetition of all our experience with these high sounding titles of Liszt, who doubtless has executive, but not creative genius. It was a wearisomely elaborate concatenation of difficulties, wandering on without aim, like an uninspired improvisation, spell-bound to keep on and come to nothing. We wonder how a man like Liszt could have the patience to write down such things. That it labored somewhat in the rendering, in spite of Mr. Lang's evident command of execution, was only to be expected; if there is any charm in such things, it must lie in Liszt's own playing of them.

Part II, consisted of an Andante and Scherzo from the Posthumous Quartet in E, op. 81, by Mendelssohn,—a good illustration of his serious and his fairy vein; Rode's ninth Violin Concerto, a clear, elegant and spirited composition, capably played by Mr. Schultze; and for a delicious conclusion, Mozart's Quintet No. 5, in E flat, full of all Mozartean qualities, and finely played.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We go to press a day earlier than usual this week, that the printers may enjoy Thanksgiving:—too early therefore for certain correspondence, announcements, &c. . . . Next in order, in the musical doings of our own city, comes the annual run of Operatic fever, during which, whether it last two weeks or two months, there will be small chance for Symphony, Quartet, Oratorio, or any of the more quiet forms of musical enjoyment. Our Societies must stand all in abeyance, even before they have got well started for the season, which makes the interruption especially ill-timed. Our musicians, even the members of the Quintette Club, will very likely be absorbed into the Operatic orchestra. We are sorry for the loss upon the one hand, but hope, since the Italian Opera is coming, that its short reign will be as brilliant as possible, and such as shall be worthy the allegiance for the time being of true music-lovers as well as of the fashionable and fickle crowd. We trust that Mr. Uman will not give us Verdi and Donizetti altogether; that we shall also have Don Juan with the best cast that his grand troupe will afford; that we shall have Robert and the Huguenots, at least once or twice each; that the immortal "Barber" will not fail us, nor be put off into a Saturday afternoon; also the Servant of Two Masters, for a curiosity for once; and above all, since the famous Nozze di Figaro of Mozart has come at last so near to us as New York, let him not tantalize us with the mere rumor of that long delayed gratification; it were a cruel insult to Boston to come here and not give us Mozart's Figaro! Let us have him right along side of Rossini's Barber, that we may mark the features that betray relationship. By last reports, the Opera will close in New York on Monday, and open at the Boston Theatre either on the 1st or 6th of December.

We had great pleasure in listening a few days since to a very superior Organ built by Messrs. E. and G. G. Hook for the Unitarian Church at Portsmouth, N. H. In a very chastely modelled case of black walnut, the gilt pipes seeming almost the only and the most appropriate ornament, are embraced a great organ of 10 stops, each extending through the whole compass; a swell of 10 stops, through the whole compass; and a pedal of over two octaves, with 3 stops;—in all, 1233 pipes. The wind arrangements and all the mechanism seem to work to a charm. The sound of the full organ, in fugues, choruses of Handel, &c. is remarkably rich and nobly bleeded. The diapasons, particularly, struck us by their freshness and lustiness of tone, as well as roundness and sweetness,—an effect due in a great measure, we doubt not, to the fact that the pipe metal (for almost the first time in this country) is composed of a sufficiently large proportion of pure tin, after the German method. The donor of this organ sets a good example, too long needed, in thus expending freely upon solid, honest excellences, rather than upon mere show, fancy-stops, &c., in an organ. The solo stops are voiced with all the taste and skill for which these builders are so justly celebrated.

The French Opera in New Orleans was to open on the 16th, at the Theatre d'Orleans, with La Favorita. M. Boudinque's company is thus composed: Tenors—Messrs. Lomault and Lagrave, prime; and Beutgeois, Debrinay and Metzler, sec-onde.

Baritone—Beauce.
Bass—Taste, Vila and Jolly
Prime Donne—M^{lle} Dordier, (first chanteuse legere.) Lafranche, (soprano); Bourgeois, contralto; Paola, (soprano,) and Uadi (dugazon.)

Besides twelve female and the same number of male choristers.

The Mozart Society, in Worcester Mass, numbering 140 voices, performed Mozart's 12th Mass last week, under the direction of EDWARD HAMILTON, Esq.

Ruskin On Education In Art.

A paper read before the Educational Department of the British Association for the promotion of Social Science.

I will not attempt in this paper, to enter into any general consideration of the possible influence of Art on the masses of the people. The inquiry is one of great complexity, involved with that into the uses and dangers of luxury; nor have we as yet data enough to justify us in conjecturing how far the practice of Art may be compatible with rude or mechanical employments. But the question, however difficult, lies in the same light, as that of the uses of reading or writing; for drawing, so far as it is possible to the multitude, is mainly to be considered as a means of obtaining and communicating knowledge. He, who can accurately represent the form of an object, and match its color, has unquestionably a power of notation and description greater, in most instances, than that of words; and this science of notation ought to be simply regarded as that which is concerned with the record of form, just as arithmetic is concerned with the record of number. Of course, abuses and dangers attend the acquirement of every power. We have all of us probably known persons, who, without being able to read or write, discharged the important duties of life, wisely and faithfully; as we have also, without doubt, known others able to read and write, whose reading did little good to themselves, and whose writing little to any one else. But we do not, therefore, doubt the expediency of acquiring those arts, neither ought we to doubt the expediency of acquiring the art of drawing, if we admit that it may indeed become practically useful. Nor should we long hesitate in admitting this, if we were not in the habit of considering instructions in the arts chiefly as a means of promoting what we call "taste," a dilettantism, and other habits of mind, which, in their more modern developments in Europe, have certainly not been advantageous to nations, nor indicative of worthiness in them. Nevertheless, true taste, or the instantaneous preference of the noble thing to the ignoble, is a necessary accompaniment of high worthiness in nations or men; only it is not to be acquired by seeking it as our chief object, since the first question, alike for man, and for multitude, is not at all what they are to like, but what they are to do; and fortunately so, since true taste, so far as it depends on original instinct, is not equally communicable to all men; and so far as it depends on extended comparison, is unattainable by men employed in narrow fields of life.

We shall not succeed in making a peasant's opinion good evidence on the merits of Elgin and Lycian marbles; nor is it necessary to dictate to him in his garden the preference of gillyflower or of rose; yet I believe we may make Art a means of giving him helpful and healthful pleasure, and of gaining for him serviceable knowledge. Thus, in our simplest codes of school instruction, I hope some day to see local natural history assume a principal place, so that our peasant children may be taught the nature and uses of the herbs that grow in their meadows, and may take interest in observing and cherishing, rather than in hunting or killing, the harmless animals of their country. Supposing it determined that this local natural history should be taught, drawing ought to be used to fix the attention, and test, while it aided the memory. "Draw such and such a flower in outline, with its bell toward you. Draw its side toward you. Paint the spots upon it. Draw a duck's head—her foot. Now a robin's—a thrush's—now the spots upon the thrush's breast." These are the kinds of tasks which it seems to me should be set to the young peasant student. Surely the occupation would no more be thought contemptible which was thus subservient to knowledge and to compassion; and perhaps we should find in process of time, that the Italian connection of Art with diletto, or delight, was both consistent with, and even mainly consequent upon, a pure Greek connection of Art with arete or virtue.

It may perhaps be thought that the power of representing in any sufficient manner natural objects, such as those above instanced, would be of too difficult acquirement to be aimed at in elementary instruction. But I have had practical proof that it is not so. From workmen who had little time to spare, and that only after they were jaded by the day's labor, I have obtained, in the course of three or four months from their first taking a pencil in hand, perfectly useful, and in many respects, admirable drawings of natural objects. It is, however, necessary, in order to secure this result, that the student's aim should be absolutely restricted to the representation of visible fact. All more varied or elevated practice must be deferred until the powers of true sight and just representation, are acquired in simplicity; nor, in the case of children belonging to the lower classes, does it seem to me often advisable to aim at anything more. At all events, their drawing lesson should be made as recreative as possible. Undergoing due discipline of hard labor in other directions, such children should be painlessly initiated into employments calculated for the relief of toil. It is of little consequence that they should know the principles of Art, but of much that their attention should be pleasurably excited. In our higher public schools, on the contrary, drawing should be taught rightly; that is to say, with due succession and security of preliminary steps, it being here of little consequence whether the student attains great or little skill, but of much that he should perceive distinctly what degrees of skill he has attained, reverence that which surpasses it, and know the principles of right in what he has been able to accomplish.

It is impossible to make every boy an artist or a connoisseur, but quite possible to make him understand the meaning of Art in its rudiments, and to make him modest enough to forbear expressing, in after life, judgments which he has not knowledge enough to render just. There is however, at present, this great difficulty in the way of such systematic teaching—that the public do not believe the principles of Art are determinable, and in no wise matters of opinion. They do not believe that good drawing is good, and bad drawing bad, whatever any number of persons may think or declare to the contrary—that there is a right or best way of laying colors to produce a given effect, just as there is a right or a best way of dyeing cloth of a given color, and that Titian and Veronese are not merely accidentally admirable, but eternally right. The public, of course, cannot be convinced of this unity and stability of principle until clear assertion of it is made to them by painters whom they respect, and the printers whom they respect, are generally too modest, and sometimes too proud, to make it. I believe the chief reason for their not having yet declared at least the fundamental laws of labor, as connected with Art study, is a kind of feeling on their part, that "cela va sans dire." Every great painter knows so well the necessity of hard and systematized work, in order to attain the lower degrees of skill, that he naturally supposes if people use no diligence in drawing they do not care to acquire the power of it, and that the toil involved in wholesome study being greater than they would ever be willing to give. Feeling, also, as every real painter feels, that his own excellence is a gift no less than the reward of toil, perhaps slightly disliking to confess the labor it has cost him to perfect it, and wholly despairing of doing any good by the confession, he contemptuously leaves the drawing-master to do the best he can in twelve lessons, and with courteous unkindness permits the young women of England to remain under the impression that they can learn to draw with less pains than they can learn to dance. I have had practical experience enough, however, to convince me that this treatment of the amateur student is unjust. Young girls will work with steadiest perseverance, when once they understand the need of labor, and are convinced that drawing is a kind of language which may, for ordinary purposes, be learned as easily as French or German, but not more easily, nor on any other terms; this language, also, having its grammar and its pronunciation, to be conquered or acquired only by persistence in irksome exercise—an error in a form being as entirely and simply an error as a mistake in a tense, and an ill drawn line as reprehensible as a vulgar accent. And I attach great importance to the sound education of our younger females in Art, thinking that in England the nursery and the drawing-room are perhaps the most influential of academies.

We address ourselves in vain to the education of the artist while the demand for his work is uncertain and unintelligent; nor can Art be considered as having any serious influence on a nation while gilded papers form the principal splendor of the reception-room, and ill-wrought, though costly, trinkets the principal entertainment of the boudoir. It is surely, therefore, to be regretted that the Art-education of our Government schools is addressed so definitely to the guidance of the artisan, and is therefore so little acknowledged hitherto by the general public, especially by its upper classes. I have not acquaintance enough with the practical working of that system to venture any expression of opinion respecting its general expediency; but it is my conviction that, so far as references are involved in it to the designing of patterns capable of being produced by machinery, such references must materially diminish its utility considered as a general system of instruction. We are still, therefore, driven to the same point—the need of an authoritative recommendation of some method of study to the public; a method determined upon by the concurrence of some of our best painters, and avowedly sanctioned by them, so as to leave no room for hesitation in its acceptance. Nor need it be thought that, because the ultimate methods of work employed by painters vary according to the particular effects proposed by each, there would be any difficulty in obtaining their collective assent to a system of elementary precepts.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment. Catawba Wine. Poetry by Longfellow. Music by W. R. Dempster. 50

Longfellow has given us the sparkling, genial poem, and Dempster has wedded to it a melody as beautifully musical as the most imaginative fancy can conceive of. Not even a "Brindisi" from Verdi's pen, imbued with all the dazzling brilliancy of this master's genius, can vie with the irresistible strain of this "Catawba-Wine Song." We do not know but this is the first poetical and musical tribute of America to the ancient deity of the Grapes. Never, however, has the praise of Bacchus been better sung.

Castles in the air. Scotch Song. 25

One of the quaintest and prettiest little poems written in the Scotch dialect. The air is not less pleasing. There is a genuineness and heartiness in the inspirations of the Scotch muse, which will always attract all truly musical minds, the learned as well as the unlearned.

Hope, (L'Esperance,) with flute obligato. Halévy, 25

This is the well known Romanza from "L'Éclair." Bright Star of Hope, made familiar by the Germanians, in a new form, viz: with an ad libitum accompaniment for the Flute. This additional Flute part increases the charm of the whole materially. It is easy of performance.

Instrumental Music.

MASTERWORKS FOR THE VIOLIN, with Piano-accompaniment.

Rode's celebrated Air with Variations. 30
Seventh Air varié. C. de Bériot. 75
Le Carnaval de Venise, varié. N. Paganini. 75

All of these pieces are well known to Violin players as standard pieces of the concert-room, each one representing the highest perfection of a particular style of composition. "Rode's air" is the easiest of the three pieces. It has all the winning smoothness, the tender, soft melodies of Haydn's period. Moderate skill combined with a little musical tact, suffice to render it well. Bériot's Air, though in form hardly different from the one by Rode, and distinguished likewise for its elegant and highly refined appearance, demands a good deal more of the player. It is not exactly difficult, technically speaking, but demands a well-defined style for its satisfactory delivery. Among the twelve airs which Bériot has written, this one is the favorite with players and the public. Paganini's Carnival, which is the original Carnival, from which those hundreds of imitations are derived, which have for years been the delight of great and small players, is sufficiently known as an unapproachable creation of genius. This first American edition of the above works has been prepared with great care, and will compare favorably with the foreign editions. Especial care has been taken to insure correctness.

Books.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST.—A collection of Opening and Closing Voluntaries, selected and arranged from the works of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Rink, Pleyel, Mendelssohn, Von Weber, Andre, Schmidt, Hesse, &c., together with original compositions by the editor. The whole prepared with especial reference to the wants of beginners, and forming an excellent course of study for the Organ or Melodeon. By John Zundel. 1.50

This work is eminently a book for beginners. It is by the author of "Two Hundred and Fifty Voluntaries," and was produced in answer to numerous requests to furnish more and still easier pieces of that class. As its title imports it has been the aim of the author to present easy and pleasing compositions of a desirable length, and suitable for organs of the smallest, as well as the largest class, and even for melodeons. One or two more pieces of a scientific character have, however, been inserted; and even a fugue will be found from Handel, though a very easy one. The few voluntaries by Rink here first appear in print in this country.

NOTES AND A QUERY.

I. In relation to HANDEL.

Every person, who cares enough about music to have paid some attention to its history, knows the difficulty of following Haudel's course of study and musical experience, so as to form a clear conception of the manner in which the young Saxon organ and fugue student became the giant of his age in Dramatic Music. This difficulty is not more owing to our want of biographical material than to the confusion into which the chronology of his early years has fallen. In Dwight's Journal of Music, of Nov. 14, 1857, there is an article upon a passage in Hawkins' History, in which it is suggested, and, as I still think, rendered very probable, that the young composer was in Hanover and made the acquaintance of Steffani, the Kapellmeister there, before the great Italian journey of 1707—10, and not first upon his return from Italy, as is generally accepted. I hoped that on this point we should have light when Chrysander's book should appear. But the first volume of his Biography is out, and he adopts the usual date—making Handel's first visit to Hanover in 1710. My present notes are not to Chrysander's book, but to the article in Dwight's Journal, and are corrections drawn from Chrysander and from other new sources of information.

"Of these six years," (1697—1703) says the writer in Dwight's Journal, "we know absolutely nothing beyond his having studied with Zachau, and given lessons, except what Telemann has recorded." In addition to this, Chrysander has discovered "that Handel followed his father's wishes for five years after the old doctor's death, and entered the new University at Halle in 1702, as student of law; and 2d, that the "Studiosus Georg Friedrich Hendel," who had often filled the place of a drunken fellow, Leporin, as organist in the Schloss and Dom Church at Halle, was appointed to his place for a year upon trial, March 13th, 1702. I cannot find that Chrysander shows Handel to have served after his year was out, although he shows that Handel's successor, Kohlhardt, was appointed Sept. 12th. We know that Handel did not fill the place up to that date, for on the 9th of June, or July, he met Mattheson at the Organ in Hamburg. There is nothing in Chrysander's book, so far as I have seen, that disproves the suggestion that he spent a month or two in Hanover in the Spring of 1703, where Hawkins alone sends him at that date.

Again, "Mainwaring originates the story of Handel's having made the acquaintance of Steffani in Venice." (Dwight's Journal.)

Chrysander seems to take every opportunity of expressing his contempt of Hawkins, but gives a great deal of weight to Mainwaring, and in this matter follows the latter. I do not find, however, that he has added any circumstance to strengthen the statement which he adopts. As between Hawkins and Mainwaring in this matter I prefer the former.

Once more. As to the opera, "Agrippina," at Venice, Mattheson and Marpurge date it, Carnival 1710; Burney and Arnold, 1709; Schoecheher, 1707; Chrysander, 1708. The writer in Dwight's Journal followed an Italian work and made it with Mattheson, 1710. Chrysander proves to his own satisfaction, from internal evidence, and by comparing the opera with the oratorio, "Resurrezione," that the Italian authority is wrong. The oratorio was written in 1708 at Rome; in the oratorio is much taken from the opera: Ergo, the opera was composed first. q. e. d.

Why not reason that passages in "Agrippina" are from the "Resurrezione"? Chrysander argues the matter, but his examples are not convincing to me. I however give up the date 1710, and admit the error in the "Le Glorie della Poesia e della Musica," but happily am able to bring forward a new witness, who confirms Burney in his date of 1709. In 1666, Lione Alocci published at Rome a catalogue of printed dramatic works in the Italian language, with the title "Drammaturgia." In 1755 this, revised, corrected and continued, was again printed in quarto in Venice. It is a strictly bibliographical work, in some cases giving the various editions of a work to a wide extent. For instance, Guarini's "Il Pastor Fido," occupies over a page, containing even a London edition of 1714. Query—an error for 1712? for in that year it was produced in London with Handel's music.

Here follow the two notices—the first from "Le Glorie, &c.," Venice 1730, the other from the "Drammaturgia."

1. Anno 1710. D' Inverno. Agrippina 441. Teatro S. Gio. Grisostomo, 56. Poesia d' Incerto. Musica di Giorgio, Fed. Hendel. Questo Drama, come pure l'Elmiro Re di Corinto, e l'Orazio rappresentati piu di venti anni sono, su l'istesso Teatro, vantano commune l'origine da una Fonte sublime."

2. "Agrippina. Damma recitato l'anno, 1709 in Venezia, nel Teatro di S. Gio. Grisostomo,—in Venezia, appresso Marino Rosetti, 1709, in 12—Poesia di Vincenzo Grimani, Patrizid Veneto, poi Cardinale di Santa Chiesa e Viceré di Napoli,—Musica di Georgio Federigo Hendel, Tedesco."

The "Drammaturgia" is better informed than "Le Glorie," for it states that the "Elmiro" was performed in 1686, at Venice, written by the same Grimani, and printed the same year, "benche non porti il suo nome"—(but does not bear his name). Music by Carlo Pallavicino. The "Orazio" it states also as performed and printed in 1688. "Poesia" by Grimani, "Musica" by Giuseppe Felice Tosi. The entire work is so distinguished by accuracy, so far as I can judge by comparing its statements with such as I find in other sources, that a mistake in a London edition—if indeed there be one, which is doubtful—of "Il Re Pastore" is of little importance. Although that part of the argument in the article upon Handel's visit to Hanover, founded upon "Le Glorie," falls, it certainly seems to confirm fully Burney's date of the "Agrippina."

Be this as it may, Chrysander has not, to my mind, shown any reason to doubt that the great composer visited the court of George I in Hanover, as a young virtuoso, in 1703, on his way to Hamburg.

II. THE PIANOFORTE.

Dwight's Journal of Oct. 16, brings me a thoroughly Frenchy piece of history upon the first Pianoforte! One dislikes to speak soberly upon a point so ridiculous—but as the story is just of the kind to run through five hundred country and literary (!) papers, it needs a note or two.

Erard was born at Strasburg April 5, 1752—one century to a day before the date of the first number of Dwight's Journal of Music—and about 1768, says Fétis, came to Paris. Now let us translate from Fétis, and see how his history compares with that in question.

"Sebastian Erard was not yet 25 years of age, and yet his reputation was already so well established that whoever wished to have any remarkable piece of mechanism executed, applied to him. He was esteemed by men of the highest rank. One of them introduced him to the Duchess of Villeroy, who loved art, protected artists, and who above all, had a passionate taste for music. She requested Erard to reside with her, and offered him an advantageous engagement. But he had already conceived the idea of a journey to England, and burned with the desire of executing it. He therefore only consented to remain so long with the Duchess as would be necessary to execute some projects of that lady, and an apartment was granted to him in the Hotel de Villeroy, suitable for his work, and where he enjoyed the most perfect freedom. In his old age Erard found pleasure in paying due honor to the bounty of Mad. Villeroy, and in speaking of the gratitude with which she inspired him.

"It was in the hotel de Villeroy that he constructed his first Piano. This instrument, which had been known already in Germany and England for many years, was but little used in France, and the small number of Pianos in Paris had been imported from Ratisbon, Augsburg or London. It was the fashion in the great houses to have one of these imported instruments. Mad. de Villeroy one day asked Erard if he could construct a piano? His reply was in the affirmative, and quick as thought. The piano was already in his head. Like all his works, his first piano proved him a man of invention and taste. It was heard in the Saloon of Mad. de Villeroy by all that Paris at that time possessed of amateurs and distinguished artists, and produced a lively impression. Many of the great lords urgently demanded instruments of the same kind of him; they were not however so prompt in paying for them; most of them never paid."

Fétis goes on to tell us how Sebastian's brother came also to Paris, and how they moved off to the Rue de Bourbon and established a great manufactory, &c. Years afterward Sebastian invented an Organ-Piano, with two key-boards, and this so delighted Queen Marie Antoinette, that she ordered one. "The voice of the Queen," continues Fétis, "was of small compass, and all her music, as she thought, was written too high. Erard conceived of the plan of making the key-board movable by means of a pedal, which would carry the key down a half tone, a tone, or a tone and a half at will, and without trouble on the part of the person playing the accompaniment."

It is clear, that the wiseacre, who wrote the story of "The First Pianoforte," supposed that this name was derived from the movable key-board, which is found in many European grand pianofortes, and by means of which a touch of the pedal causes the hammer to strike but one of the double or triple strings to each note. An arrangement which probably by far the greater number of readers of Dwight's Journal never heard of before, although they think they have seen pianofortes! The name Pianoforte was given in 1725-7, to the first instrument in which the tones, instead of being caused by a point of a quill, leather, or some other substance, snapping the string, were produced by being struck by a hammer, as in all our modern instruments. With the hammer the string may be struck hardly or softly, and the tone will correspond; but the string, as it slips off a point, will always vibrate with nearly the same intensity, and the player can hardly make any difference of forte or piano.

The invention of the hammer was nearly simultaneous in Germany, France and Italy. Fétis says that Marins, a harpsichord maker, made three models of instruments, and presented them to the Academy of Science as early as 1716. No doubt, but they never came to anything.

In 1720, Bartolo Cristofolo at Florence conceived the idea of using hammers, and I suppose worked it out.

But the man who really carried out the invention into practice, was Christoph Gottlieb Schröter. He was born at Hohenstein—I suppose the village in the so-called Saxon Switzerland, which many of my readers have visited,—they will remember the huge precipices, the deep lovely valley, and the old castle on the opposite side.—Aug. 10, 1699. In his seventh year he became a singing boy in a Dresden choir, and finally member of a principal school there. His parents intended him for the Church, and in 1717 he entered the University at Leipzig. During this year both parents died, and he at once exchanged Theology for music. While in the school, he had prepared models of the pianoforte—i. e. had invented the hammer, and in 1717 presented them to the Dresden Court. He was too poor to have an instrument manufactured; but Silbermann, harpsichord maker at Freiberg in Saxony, took up the matter, and about 1726 made the first pianoforte.

So much for the Frenchman's fantasy piece. What is the old saying about drawing upon your fancy for facts, and your imagination for arguments? I do not remember it exactly.

III. A Correction.

In a semi-weekly Tribune which came last week, I find extracts from Longfellow's new Poem. By the way, I could wish that paper had more such book notices and less of long serial novels; it is a little hard to pay 14 to 18 cents postage upon each number, and so often find one to two pages filled with Thackeray and Bulwer, which I can buy much cheaper in Tauchnitz's editions. I fear Prof. L. has not read Dwight's Journal carefully enough; or he would have seen full proof that Luther knew nothing of the Old Hundredth psalm tune, which was first adapted to Beza's translation some seven years after Luther's death. The name Beza in the line would be equally rhythmical, though perhaps with more of truth than poetry.

Query. Alden leaves Plymouth on Standish's errand, and his way leads through the forest, "where robins and bluebirds are building towns in the trees." Do robins and bluebirds build in the forest? I cannot affirm that they do not—but according to my observation, never.

What says T. H. thereto? What Audubon?

A Permanent Diapason.

The following letter from the Paris Correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, throws more light than we have yet had upon the attempt of the French Government to establish a uniform standard of musical pitch.

PARIS, Oct. 18, 1858.

You know the French Government is engaged in an attempt to fix in a permanent manner, by some standard, the musical diapason. I confess I did not exactly know the evil sought to be cured, nor the mode likely to be proposed. I have sought some information on the subject, and as I dare say it is not impossible some of your readers may be nearly as ignorant as I was. I condense, in as few lines as possible, all I have gathered relating to the diapason.

It seems to be proved that the rise of the diapason, or musical pitch, is to be imputed solely to the manufacturers of musical instruments. They, to give more éclat to the flutes, hautbois and clarinets, they manufactured, have clandestinely raised the tone. Now, when these instruments were introduced into concertos with other instruments, their masters were obliged to draw the "slip" or "slide" a little, to put them in accord with the other instruments. But as this lengthening of the tube (especially in flutes) disordered the proportions and consequently the precision of the instruments, the masters, by degrees, ceased to meddle with the slip; so the stringed instruments tightened their strings a little more than was usual, and attained a higher pitch. Then the brass (the bassoon, the second hautbois, &c.) instrument performers, finding themselves unable to rise to the dominant note, carried their instruments to the makers and had them "cut," that is, shortened until they gave the new pitch. In this way the diapason was raised in orchestras, and it soon affected pianos, which are always tuned by steel musical forks, whose prongs were filed down until they gave the new pitch.

There is no question that the pitch has risen within the last hundred years, and has risen almost equally every where, as the musical festivals of England and Germany prove. How could the orchestras of so many different places as are collected on these occasions be tuned together, were there a great dissimilarity between the pitch of Birmingham and London, or Liverpool and Durham? The differences of pitch between different cities and countries is scarcely sensible, and the largest orchestras may be "put in tune" if the "slip" of the wind instruments, whose pitch proves too high, be drawn. The musical or tuning forks, made in 1799 and 1806, &c., and the old organs of some churches show that the pitch has risen, for they are all a full tone lower than the pitch of the present day. Hence these organs are commonly called "si flat organs," because their ut, being a tone lower than the present ut is in unison with the present si flat. These organs are less than a hundred years old. As the pitch has risen a tone in a hundred years, if it continues to rise as it has done it will rise through the twelve demi-tones of the gamut in six hundred years, and be a whole octave higher in 2458.

The ruin of the finest voices and the brief career of singers are not the only pernicious effects produced by the rise of the pitch. In the days of Lulli, that is, at the period of time when composers began to write dramatic music and operas in France, no singer found it difficult to sing the parts written in the limits then adopted for the voice. And, although subsequent composers failed to note the rise of the diapason and to write a little lower (as they should have done,) the parts written by Rameau, Monsigny, Gretry, Gluck, Piccini and Sacchini, when the pitch was nearly a tone lower than it is now, long remained easy to singers, and most of them are so still, except some passages in Monsigny's scores which were a little high for that day, and are a great deal too high for ours. Spontini, in "La Vestale," "Cortes," and in "Olympia," wrote tenor's parts which singers now-a-days find too low for them to sing. Twenty-five years afterwards, during which the pitch had risen rapidly, composers increased the upper notes for soprani and tenors. Then shrill, natural uts, as head and breast voice, and shrill uts sharp (it is true, as a head voice, but old composers never used them,) began to appear. Tenors were more and more frequently required to give the shrill, natural si, with great force as a breast voice, which would have been for the old pitch an ut sharp, of which no trace can be found in scores of the last century. The soprani were forced to give and sustain shrill uts, and the bass's part was loaded with high, natural mi-s. This last note, although too often used by the old composers as fa sharp, at the period when the low diapason was in use, was nevertheless much less used than it is now as mi natural. Achille, in Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," (one of the highest tenor's parts in all Gluck's scores,) did not go up above si natural, which si was then the note our la is, and was consequently a whole tone lower than our si. He placed one single shrill ré in his "Orphée," but this note which was the same sound as the ut used three times in "Guillaume Tell," appears in a slow vocalisé in a head voice, so as to be rather hinted than hallooed, and offers neither danger nor fatigue to the singer. One of Gluck's great feminine parts contains the si flat given shrilly and sustained with force, (Alceste), which si flat is equivalent to our la flat. No composer at present thinks of hesitating to write in the prima donna's score the la flat and the la natural and the si flat, nay, even the si natural and even the ut. The highest pitched feminine part composed by Gluck is Daphné in "Cythère Assiégée." An air of Daphné, "Ah! quel bonheur d'aimer!" rises rapidly as high as ut, [our si flat] and the whole part bears evident marks of having been written for one of those extraordinary songstresses, found at every epoch and called "light singers," women whose voices possess an extraordinary compass in high notes. M^{mes}. Lagrange, Marie Cabel, Miolan-Carvalho, Zerr and some others, are contemporary artists of this class. Now this shrill ut found in Daphné's part is equivalent to our si flat found every where at present. M^{me}. Cabel and M^{lle}. Zerr give the shrill counter fa; M^{me}. Miolan-Carvalho gives the counter mi, and M^{me}. Lagrange gives the flute's counter sol. How brief is the period of time during which voices which attain these notes, last! How many voices break in attempting to imitate these songstresses! How many tenors have destroyed their voice by breast uts and natural sis! And this rise of the pitch prevents performers on the horn, and the trumpet, and the cornet, from executing notes which formerly were executed by every horn player and trumpeter; as, for instance, the shrill sol of the Re trumpet, and the mi of the Fa trumpet (these notes together produce la to the ear); the shrill sol and the shrill ut of the sol horn (the latter note was used by Handel and by Gluck; it is considered now as absolutely impracticable); and the high ut of the La cornet. Hence it has been said: "Now-a-days trumpeters and cornists have no mouth," for at every performance miscarried, broken sounds frequently annoy the ear. The fault is not with the men, but lies on the change of diapason.

It is probable the Government will not attempt to lower the present pitch, (although such a measure would unquestionably prove a substantial benefit to the whole musical world), since to effect such a revolution it would be necessary to buy new wind instruments for all of the theatres and for all the bands of the army, to say nothing of organs for the churches. All the Government deems feasible is to ascertain the present pitch and to secure it in a permanent manner. The means of doing this are simple enough. The instrument of acoustics, found in every laboratory, called "siren," enables us to count with mathematical precision the number of vibrations a sonorous body executes per second. If the la of the French Grand Opera be selected for the standard, (a la of 898 vibrations per second,) nothing would remain to be done but to place the pipe of an organ giving precisely a la of 898 vibrations per second in the greenroom of the orchestra of all the theatres and concert rooms. And hereafter the orchestra will no longer be tuned by the hautbois or flute, as is now the rule, but by the la organ pipe, and no musician will be allowed to carry his instrument away from the theatre; and any piano, wind instrument or organ offered for sale, which may be tuned above the official tone will be liable to fine; and, lastly, the Government will forbid all composers writing for the Grand, Opera, Opera Comique, Theatre Lyrique and Italian Opera, from using the notes which have destroyed so many fine voices. You see, nothing less than a musical revolution is about to be attempted, if not effected in France.

GAMMA.

A NEW ORLEANS PRIMA DONNA.—We are informed by letter from New York, that Miss Emma Oakley Wilkinson, a native of our city, and daughter of one of our late and prominent merchants, is to make her debut, during the coming year, in New York, in Italian opera. She is at present a pupil of Signorina Spinola, prima donna of the Jullien and Ole Bull opera troupes.

Miss Wilkinson was educated here at M^{me}. Desrayaux' well known academy on Burgundy street, where she was a favorite pupil of that very capable and experienced music master, Mr. Engèle Prévost, leader of the orchestra at the Orleans theatre. We have often heard her sing at the frequent musical examinations given at M^{me}. Desrayaux', and her sweet and powerful mezzo-soprano voice, and cultivated style of singing, even then attracted much attention.

We learn that this young lady intends visiting our city professionally ere going to Europe, where she intends studying in the best schools of art.—N. O. Picayune.

Another Opinion on "Lohengrin" in Vienna.

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)

In the case of new works, which, in accordance with the intention of this author, are meant to effect a reformation, and embody a complete system, to effect which a constant agitation is kept up by an active party, as speedy a production of them as possible, as, indeed, of every other Art-production of any value, is not only an act of justice, since an honourable judgment is due to every honourable aspiration, but it is, at the same time, an act of wisdom, because, through the ready production of a work of this description, the deceptive nimbus, which surrounds everything system actually kept from us, disappears of its own accord. In the domain of Art, just as in that of religion or politics, persecution assists pretended as well as real error, while the freedom of regular propagation and undisturbed investigation causes everything to appear in its true light.

Following out this principle, we have advocated, when addressing all our musical institutions, the production of new works generally, even when we did not agree with the artistic tendencies of their composers. The principal consideration will always be to act justly towards every vital effort, without making any exception on account of the special form under which that effort may be exhibited. But if this first duty is fulfilled towards the composers of the present day, we must be allowed the greatest freedom in judging their efforts, and we must sternly defend those healthy principles, on which every work of Art, if it deserves the name, must be unconditionally based.

Regarded in this light, the production of Wagner's Lohengrin, at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, strikes us as a very significant and satisfactory event, not as being a victory achieved by the so-called "Music of the Future," but as a first guarantee of, at least, a partial change in the system pursued at our Imperial Operahouse, where, it would seem, the repugnance hitherto evinced for everything new and unusual has, at last, given way to a reasonable mode of looking at matters of Art.

The divided and partially brilliant success of the first representation of Lohengrin, on the 19th August, has been unanimously acknowledged by all the Viennese critics, competent and not competent.

What a welcome opportunity for the organs of the Weimar-Leipzig party to indulge in a "Te Deum landamus!" Vienna, which has hitherto been branded as heretical, will now probably rise in value, that is to say, in the estimation of the above party, and, by the applause it has bestowed on Wagner, have earned the recognition of its right to possess a "Future!" All assertions to the contrary, adverse criticisms, and objections will wisely be passed over in silence by the organs of Wagner's party; the applause bestowed on certain passages will be claimed for the whole work, and the success of the whole work will be claimed for the "Opera of the Future."

But we, who, perhaps, look at the matter with somewhat harmless partiality, and, at all events, are better acquainted with things here than our colleagues in Leipzig and Weimar, can only perceive, if not an intentional deception of the public, at least only a gross piece of self-deception. That Lohengrin was produced is a proof of the artistic feeling of the new management, a feeling which, we trust, will be extended not to the "Music of the Future" alone, but to every effort of real talent of the Present. In the fact of the public having readily come forward to welcome this praiseworthy step, we see a new proof of the susceptibility of the Viennese, and their yearning for fresh and better things. With regard, lastly, to the success of Lohengrin, we consider it as the merited recognition of Wagner's talent; recognition which he has achieved not through his system, but in spite of it, recognition, therefore, which is in no wise to be attributed to the new operatic system, or to the so-called party of the "Future." We will at once clearly explain ourselves on this point.

Madame Bosio in Russia.

(From the Gazette Russe de l'Académie St. Petersburg, Oct. 5, 1858.)

It is truly delightful to hear Madame Bosio sing. Our incomparable prima donna appeared last week, for the first time this season, in Verdi's opera of Rigoletto. The part of Gilda was performed by her with that artistic perfection, both vocal and dramatic, so highly appreciated by the exceedingly exacting public of St. Petersburg. We will not speak of the manner in which she was received. The enthusiastic shouts of applause of the audience lasted a quarter of an hour. It was a perfect ovation. She sang as only Madame Bosio and the nightingale can sing.

The public seemed inclined to make her repeat every piece, but was contented with encores the quartet of the last act, where the poor girl's bitter tears and her outraged father's despair are accompanied by the strident laugh of the courtesan, and the joyous song of the seducer.

Madame Bosio made her second appearance in La Traviata, one of the favorite operas of the St. Petersburg public. The large theatre was filled to the roof, and there was not the smallest place left unoccupied. The performance resembled a perfect artistic festival, at which all the lovers and amateurs of music, in fact, the cream of the public, had agreed to meet.

Madame Bosio appeared, and the shouts and applause, after lasting twenty minutes, were succeeded by a religious silence. The fair singer appeared as if she wished to surpass herself. Her silvery voice resounded through the house with indescribable sweetness. Her admirable notes entered the soul and seized hold of the heart. First we had the gay creature, sventata, spoilt and mocking, who says, laughingly: "La vita è nel tripudio." Then, when a new sentiment has stolen into her heart, she becomes pensive. "Estraro in cor scolpito loquer accenti; saria per mia sventura un sero amore?" Yes! it is that true and pure love which ennobles and elevates every woman. In vain does she endeavor to subdue this "delirio vano." Her efforts are useless; in vain does she try, in the admirable cabaletta, "Sempre libera deggio io," to recover her self-possession. She must accomplish her destiny; she sacrifices everything to her lover, and expires in his arms, exclaiming: "Ah! io ritor-no a vivere!"

Madame Bosio's acting and singing are beyond praise. She has now no rival in all Europe; this is a fact of which we had no opportunity of convincing ourselves last year, when we visited the principal theatres on both sides of the Appenines. In Italy, there was nothing but mediocrity; one lady is past her prime, and the other puffs away like an old clarinet. Miolan-Carvalho, Nautier-Didié, and even Piccolomini, who is so celebrated, are but poor singers compared with Madame Bosio, who is the queen of contemporary cantatrices.

Calzolari is quite worthy of singing with her. The performance was a complete success, and every person present left the theatre with that sort of sweet impression which men remember for a long period, especially if fate compels them to quit the capital and banishes them to the extremity of some distant province.

A NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.—Some time ago the director of the Conservatoire appointed a commission to examine into the merits of a new instrument, called the Baryton. The members of the commission, M^{ms}. Auber, Halévy, Panzeron, and Meifred, expressed high satisfaction with the invention, which was by M. Lacomme du Harve. The Baryton is an instrument of the violin tribe, midway in size and compass between the viola and the violoncello. Its four strings are tuned octaves to the corresponding strings of the violin; and its compass is thus lower by a fourth than the viola, higher by a fifth than the violoncello. It is held and played like the latter instrument, so that the violoncello performers can easily play upon it. Its tone has a special timbre, which strikes the ear, and is perfectly distinct from that of the viola or the violoncello; and thus (said the reporters) instrumental music has acquired a new organ, which, in the quintet and the quartet, will vary the effects and add a new speaker to the dialogue of instruments. It is evident, too, from what was said, that to the violoncellist it will be an addition to his own instrument; for, from its being struck exactly an octave below the violin, it will throw open to the player all the beautiful music, written for the piano-forte and violin, by Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and other great masters.

A Paris correspondent of the Transcript relates the following anecdote of M^{me}. CABEL, of the Opera Comique. It occurred at the little town of Le Mans, where she had gone to sing at a charity concert. There is no mistake, it seems, about that Cabel:

Shortly after she had alighted at the hotel, she saw an elderly gentleman carried into a room adjoining that which she occupied, and who had just been seized with a violent nervous attack. After she had recovered from the emotion caused by the sight, M^{me}. Cabel turned her thoughts to the object of her visit to Le Mans, and began practising the pieces which she was to sing the next morning at a public concert. When she had gone over them once or twice, some one knocked at her door. It was the chambermaid of the hotel, who came to say that her singing had produced the most singular effect on the sick person, and that the medical man began to hope that music would produce a cure. M^{me}. Cabel, on hearing this, did not hesitate a moment, and, notwithstanding the fatigue of her journey, continued singing for a part of the night to alleviate the sufferings of the temporary neighbor. Not content with this, on her day after, having sung at the concert, she returned and sang for the sick man five or six times as much as she had done before the public.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, NOV. 29.—The opera season is approaching its termination. The production of Mozart's Nozze di Figaro was moderately successful, but the work has created no sensation. How anybody can place it by the side of Don Giovanni is perfectly incredible. It is, however, replete with beautiful, flowing melodies, and is pleasing and interesting, if only from its quaintness, and its illustrious composer. FORMES has a capital part as Figaro, and PICCOLOMINI and GIUONI sing a sweet duet that is nightly encored—or was for the two nights the opera was given. Robert le Diable has also been given twice, GAZZANIGA being really sublime in the last act. Piccolomini will go to Philadelphia this week to sing with Strakosch's troupe, and she will return to New York in time for her benefit, which takes place Monday next. Mlle. POINSOT appears this week in the Huguenots.

MESSRS MASON and THOMAS commenced last Tuesday a series of classical matinées, the chief feature of which was Mr. Thomas's fine performance of a Chaconne, by Bach—a very difficult piece, and the performance reflected great credit upon this studious and careful young violinist. Mr. Thomas is now considered one of the very best violin players in the city, and deserves his reputation.

The Mendelssohn Union repeat this week their performance of "St. Paul." The Harmonic Society will give us the "Messiah" on Christmas night.

ARTHUR NAPOLEON, a boy of fifteen, is the greatest, the most astonishing pianist we have in New York. He has already given one concert, and will give others. His style is more like Gottschalk's than that of any other pianist that has been here, and he plays with true feeling as well as surpassing execution. We are over-run with pianists—MASON, NAPOLEON, GOLDBECK, and Mesdames GRAEVER—JOHNSON and ABEL, (a new arrival) all threaten us with piano-forte recitals.

Taking up a newspaper a short time since, I read an item headed "Tragic occurrence in Milan," and as it relates to musical people whose talents have afforded me great enjoyment, I make note of it here.

For the last year or so, the sisters FERNI, two young girls, each an accomplished violinist, have been travelling around the cities of Italy, giving concerts, which were always successful. I had the pleasure of hearing them at La Pergola, Florence, where they performed some of their duets, between the acts of the opera, and the enthusiasm they created quite eclipsed that aroused by the prima donna of the evening. The girls are modest and intellectual in appearance—they are blondes, and though attractive possess none of that traditional beauty of Italian women; they look rather like a couple of English young ladies. The speciality of their performance is their duet-playing, which I have never heard surpassed, though they also appear as soloists, and their popularity is very great all over Italy. It now appears that some two years ago "a young and rich Sicilian fell in love with one of these sisters, and one day asked their father whether he would give his daughter to a young man possessing an income of 20,000 fr. a year. Ferni replied that he would do so with pleasure, provided the suitor obtained her consent. The young man went away without saying anything further, but a short time ago Ferni received a letter from him, asking him whether he was still of the same mind. This letter remained unanswered; Ferni repaired to Milan with his two daughters to give concerts at La Scala; but they had not been long there when the Sicilian called upon them at the Hotel della Bella Venesia, and repeated his suit.

"Mlle. VIRGINIA, who was the object of his passion, told him frankly that she was resolved not to marry. "Is that your fixed resolution?" asked the Sicilian. "It is," replied the young lady; on which the Sicilian rose, cast three letters into Virginia's lap and then stabbed himself with a poignard. The consternation of the Ferni family may be imagined; surgical aid was instantly procured, but there are no hopes of saving the young man's life. One of the letters, above-mentioned, was addressed to the police of Milan, informing it of his intention to commit suicide, in order to prevent any suspicion of murder; the second contained his will, leaving half his fortune to Virginia, and the other half to one of the public institutions of Naples; the third letter was addressed to his mother, announcing that he could no longer live without her he loved." Should the frantic lover survive, it is probable he will after all obtain the lady's hand, for few ladies could withstand such a proof of disinterested, though rather silly, devotedness.

TROVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 23. — After three successful representations of Martha, and a grand miscellaneous concert for the sanctimoniously straight-laced, at the Musical Fund Hall, last week, the town has gone Gazzaniga-mad. The ovation which greeted Napoleon Bonaparte at the Tuilleries, upon his return from Elba, could scarcely have been more enthusiastic than the reception extended, last night, to GAZZANIGA, when she made her first obeisance before her legion of adorers, since her voluntary exile to the small island of Manhattan. The American success of this intensely dramatic vocalist has been of Philadelphia creation. Unheralded, unpuffed, and unknown, dropped she in upon us two years ago, at the completion of our noble Academy; and when her name appeared amid the list of daily arrivals at the Girard House,—Mad. Gazzaniga de Malespina—the city was by no means convulsed to its centre. Then, when she had thoroughly recruited from the fatigues of a protracted voyage, the first rehearsal took place, in the presence of a chosen circle of critics, and on the following day the accredited reviewers of the daily papers laid before the half-million population their first impressions of the new cantatrice. The majority of these Doctors spoke guardedly, and disagreed to a remarkable extent. Conscious of their inability to criticize a new candidate by the just criterions of Art, they hesitated and faltered, for fear of compromising themselves eventually. Only two of the journals wrote unhesitatingly, and claimed for her in advance the position as a dramatic singer which she now holds; I allude to the Evening Bulletin, and if I err not, the Pennsylvanian, which at that time comprised in its editorial corps a highly accomplished musician, Mr. Albert G. Emerick. Soon thereafter followed the grand opening night,—the inauguration of the Academy for operatic purposes.

Circumstances, it cannot be denied, of the most propitious nature surrounded the debut of Gazzaniga in this country. Like Spurgeon, the famous divine, whose talents were first placed strikingly before the English public by dint of his privilege to preach at the newly built and just opened Exeter Hall, in advance of all other public speakers, so Gazzaniga at the Philadelphia Academy. But for the eclat attending the completion of this magnificent temple, and the pride which, on its account, swelled the bosom of every Philadelphian from that blasé individual, the oldest inhabitant, downward, the peerless G. might never have howed before even a corporal's guard. As it was, however, five thousand elegantly attired persons waited breathlessly for the rising of the curtain on that night. The Opera was Verdi's Trovatore, and in it the subject under present notice "came, saw, and conquered." She swept the stage with all the intensely dramatic energy of a Rachel, and sang,—well, she sang just sufficiently well to manoeuvre her sympathetic voice to the enhancing of her splendid histrionic abilities. From that time onward, Gazzaniga made a footstool of the Philadelphia public. Thousands hung breathlessly upon her slightest movements, during the entire brilliant season which followed. What though she took the most unwarrantable liberties with the time, metamorphosing positive allegro movements into languishing ad libitum passages; what though she transports soaring cavatinas into a lower-world contralto compass;—the many headed public for the most part sat in blissful ignorance thereof, and those few who did know it, cared not a tinker's excretion about it, so long as they wept with her in Traviata, or thrilled with horror at the flashing of her eyes in Lucrezia.

In view of all these things, little wonder then that, despite the merciless storm of last night, Gazzaniga should have excited a tumultuous furore. When, after the introductory chorus, and the solo of Orsini, the gondola, freighted with the hateful Borgia, slowly glided into view, the assembled thousands greeted their adored Prima Donna with a prolonged round of applause, which I have rarely heard equalled, and which so thrilled the recipient with affecting emotions, as to suffuse her eyes with tears. Then at the end of the first act, when BRIGNOLI led her before the curtain, the waves of popular enthusiasm surged higher than ever, and hundreds arose from their seats to pay homage to her, standing. Bouquets of the most expensive texture, (and bona fide, this time) fell in showers upon the stage; sufficient to have filled a donkey-cart, and plenty to spare for chorus, orchestra, &c. Old men stood up on tottering knees, and stamped their canes, until their silvery hairs vibrated again: and their wives and daughters stood by them, glowing with admiration. Lobby dandies clapped, until their kids ripped into dangerous rents, and the corns on their feet grew red-hot from stamping in pinching patent-leathers. Little Letherhead, whom I introduced to you in a former letter, and who picks his teeth between the acts, standing in the parquette, exclaimed near me: "Hey! Hey! Gathaneegath's the gal for us!"

Let me remark in conclusion, that the Opera passed off tolerably well. Gazzaniga acted the part of Lucrezia splendidly, but her voice seemed slightly hoarse. Brignoli sang well; Amodio, tolerably; chorus and orchestra, as usual, badly. MANRICO.

HARTFORD, CONN. NOV. 27.—I have no concert to write about this time, excepting the one of the KATE DEAN troupe, which was about to be given when I last wrote, and which turned out to be a fine success. I do not know when I have been so much pleased with a company of concert-givers as I was with them—not only in their performances, but in their whole deportment. They had a most enthusiastic reception here, and gained a heap of friends. I trust that should they ever visit Boston, for the purpose of giving a concert, they may be greeted with a large audience. Somebody told me yesterday that Mrs. E(A)STCOTT and SQUIRES were to give a concert this week. I hope it is so. They were fine singers before they went to Italy—they should be far better now that they have returned. I am sure they will draw a good house if they do come. Thus we hail everything in the musical horizon with delight, from this isolated spot,—waiting patiently to be transported.

Oh ye that live in the great pent-up cities of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, that breathe the whole winter long the delicious atmosphere of fine and classical music,—that swallow during the season a heap of splendid Beethoven Symphonies, stacks of magnificent operas—spiced with Piccolominis, Gazzanigas, &c., &c., what think ye of us poor dogs, who are content to partake of the musical crumbs which fall from your tables,—hearing now and then a great performer of note(s)—hardly daring to criticize on our "own hook," but thinking just what the "New York papers" say must be true,—although some one having the audacity, may put out his head and publicly state, that "the singer has a fine voice, but it needs cultivation!" (How harrowing to an artist's feelings.) I say; what do you think of us—of our few opportunities of listening to good music? Sans oratorios, sans operas, sans symphonies, sans string-quintets or quartets, sans anything,—a wonder that we have even a slight taste for the refined and beautiful in music.

Music, music everywhere,
And not a note to hear.

And there you sit, Mr. Editor, and tell us country readers, with the most vexing complacency, in your "chit-chat," how you are on tip-toe at PICCOLINI's advent in Boston; of the splendid operas which are to be given, &c., &c.! and how Carl Zerrahn has completed his orchestral arrangement for his series of Symphony Concerts; and then nearly drive us mad by coolly informing us that the "PASTORAL SYMPHONY" would be brought out at the first concert! Oh the delightful sensation of being in the country!—"Erwachen heiterer Empfindungen bei der Ankunft auf dem Lande." Vide the 1st movement:

All. ma non troppo.

Since writing the foregoing, "something has turned up," and I hasten to give you the important information that Hartford has been blessed with an opera,—not a full-fledged Academy-of-Music one, but a twenty-by-nine opera (somewhere near the dimension of the stage at Tourro Hall,) given by the LUCY EASTCOTT troupe. To be sure, the "orchestra" was only in keeping with the stage, for it consisted of Mr. JAMES G. MAEDER, who acted as conductor and orchestra combined—playing the accompaniments on a fine-toned "Hallett and Davis Grand." Still the performance was evidently quite pleasing. All ideas of a curtain were dropped; and scene-shifters, prompters, call-boys, choruses and chorus masters, &c., were entirely done away with, as being totally unnecessary in the existing exigencies of the representation. The whole thing, excepting the admission, was "free, open and above ground." The opera, the first evening, was Wallace's "Maritana," produced in full costume by Mrs. Estcott, Miss Heywood, Messrs. Squires, Durand and Bowler. Of course it was not fully brought out, and might be more appropriately called, on the occasion, a "drawing-room opera;" but it gave a few of our citizens an idea of what an "opera" is, and therefore, did all that it was intended to do.

I was a good deal disappointed in Mrs. ESTCOTT's voice,—(why doesn't she spell her name as she used to with an "a" in the first syllable?)—most of her tones, in the middle register, being quite husky and unpleasant. Her execution, however, was brilliant and florid. Miss HEYWOOD has a very rich contralto voice, but is an inferior actress. Mr. HENRY SQUIRES must have had a most shocking bad cold, or he has lost the fine organ he possessed before he went to Italy. His performances were unsatisfactory. Of Mr. BOWLER I have nothing to say as regards his singing; he acted creditably. Mr. DURAND has a rich barytone of great power. He sang magnificently. "Sonnambula" was given the second evening, and an act or two of "Lucrezia Borgia" the third. Poor Mr. Maeder put the heroine, Lucrezia into an extremely sorrowful plight just after her "dear son" had expired from the effects of the "pizen," by losing his place and presence of mind just at that critical period, and not being able to recover either of them; and there she stood, with her face deep buried in sorrow and her hands, waiting for the "orchestra" to strike up, that she might sing of her affliction. But the "orchestra" could not find the proper key for her to give vent to her "pheelinks," not even after the "prompter" had sung out from behind the—platform: "E flat minor!" Meantime, all that was mortal of her son "Elvino" had quietly "departed and went;" and peeping out from her hands, and seeing no chance for "E flat minor" to come to her assistance, Lucrezia precipitately rushed from the stage, quickly followed by the disconcerted "orchestra!" You may well imagine the effect upon the audience of such a denouement.

Upon the whole, we have to thank Mrs. Estcott for giving us so good a taste of opera in Hartford, but if she visits us again, we would much rather hear her in a straight out-and-out concert.

A new music association, called the "BEETHOVEN SOCIETY" has lately been organized here, with Prof. E. G. DAVES, of Trinity College, as President; Mr. JAMES G. BARNETT, as conductor; Mr. GEORGE WHITING, organist; Mr. F. C. STERNBERG, pianist; and W. H. D. CALLENDER, Esq., Treasurer. I trust it will be a permanent thing. We have musical talent enough, if that's all, to ensure its success.

BERLIN, Nov. 8. — Dear Dwight, — Among the constant attendants at all the best concerts here is a gentleman from Baltimore, who, for the second time (the third?) has come over just to spend the winter in this city and hear the music. When spring comes and the season is over, he steps aboard a steamship and returns home.

Another is an old friend of yours — who, by the way, complains of your long silence — a pioneer in the good cause of chamber music and the Music Hall in Boston, who is also here, with his family, for the music. He tells me that he can live cheaper in the very excellent hotel, where he is, than in his own house in Boston. Now why should there not be fifty just such cases from the musical circles of our cities? People come over in crowds every year to Paris, Florence, and Rome, to spend the winter in the indulgence of their peculiar tastes, at a far greater expense, if I am correctly informed, than it would be for the lover of music to come here and gratify his. You see I go upon the assumption that Berlin is for music what Paris is for fashion, and Florence and Rome are for painting and sculpture. I will show you that it is so. During the last three weeks — in which I have been prevented from writing to you by the Boston Library business — the musical season has fairly opened, and that, too, most richly. Let me take things somewhat in order.

Opera. — Your regular Berlin correspondent has at times complained of want of enterprise on the part of the directors, for continually reproducing so many of the old operas. This is very natural for a man whose home is here, and to whom such works have been familiar from childhood. But for us, who have never seen any opera adequately put upon the stage, even the most flimsy work of the weakest school, and whose whole experience is confined to a range of some dozen or fourteen, the fact that the Berlin Opera gives us standard works of all schools, all produced with equal care, even to the smallest details, is just that which renders it for an American the most interesting and valuable operatic institution in the world. The directors, it seems to me, are wise in this, as the crowd of strangers, which one always sees at the performance of a standard work, shows. To show how catholic the direction is in this regard, and what an opportunity it gives us to compare schools and styles, see this list of performances during the last few weeks.

Oct. 5. Sophie Catherina; Flotow.

" 7. Zauberflöte; Mozart.

" 8. Lucrezia Borgia; Donizetti.

" 10. Macbeth, by Taubert; which, I am told, contains much really fine music, and is a success, for which I am heartily glad, tho Kapellmeister's efforts hitherto not having been successful with the public. I have not heard it.

" 12. Martha; Flotow.

" 15. Vestal; Spontini. (Magnificent!)

" 19. Figaro's Marriage; Mozart.

" 21. Robert the Devil; Meyerbeer.

" 24. Don Juan; Mozart.

" 26. Merry Wives of Windsor; Otto Nicolai.

" 28. Tell; Rossini.

" 29. Belmont and Constanza; Mozart.

" 31. Merry Wives of Windsor.

Nov. 2. Troubadour; Verdi.

" 4. Barber of Seville; Rossini.

" 5. Tannhäuser; Wagner.

" 7. Masaniello; Auber.

How does it strike you? The trouble is that it is a superfluity of richness; one is so often in doubt whether to go to opera or a concert. Three or four times a week, on off nights, a new ballet, "Flick and Flock's Adventures," which is having an immense success, has been given all this time and seems likely to last the winter.

Out at Kroll's a company from Königsberg, which has a delightful soprano, has for many weeks been giving a series of light operas, many of them being translations of the favorite works of Auber, Mehul, and others of the French school, to full houses.

Oratorio. — The usual series of three concerts by the Singakademie offers Handel's "Joshua," Bach's great Mass in B minor, and Haydn's "Seasons." The first of these has been given, and caused me great delight, both by the excellent chorus singing and by the opportunity afforded of enlarging my acquaintance with Handel, of whom the work, though not a "Samson," or a "Messiah," is worthy. The Society has no organ, and as additional parts were not added for the orchestra (Liebig's), at times the accompaniments were thin. Handel always made up for the small extent of the orchestra of his time by playing the organ — and where this instrument is not at hand there is a necessity of adding modern wind instruments, or we do not get his full idea.

Besides the regular series, the Akademie announce an extra concert, at which Bach's "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit," and Cherubini's Requiem will be sung.

The Schneider Singing Society has given Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in the Garrison church, and now advertises "The Resurrection of Lazarus," as I am told; the advertisement has not yet appeared in my paper.

I am sorry to see that Stern advertises as yet no oratorios by his singing society, for from no other source have we any hope of hearing Beethoven's great Mass in D, and Ninth Symphony entire. The Society gave on Saturday evening a private concert in honor of Mendelssohn, singing the Lobgesang, but no ticket was sent me, and none were for sale; of course I did not hear it.

The Dom-chor, that extraordinary choir of men and boys, announce their series of three concerts, at which one has opportunity of hearing the works of the older Italian masters, Palestrina, Lotti, Allegri and the like, — works of which you will soon have correct copies in the Public Library — thanks to the wisdom of the directors.

Three or four years since I wrote you much and very eulogistically of the fine mixed concerts, arranged and conducted by that enterprising man, STERN, in which orchestral, vocal, and virtuoso music were so admirably mingled. These we shall miss this winter, but as a substitute to some degree, a series of three, of which two have already been given, has been brought to performance by ROBERT RADECKE. The first of these had the following excellent programme;

Overture to Meeresstille, by Mendelssohn.

Concerto for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello with orchestra, Op. 56, by Beethoven.

LAUB played the violin, GRÜTZMACHER, of Leipzig, the 'cello, RADECKE the pianoforte, and LIENIO's orchestra the accompaniment. Of the work it is sufficient to say it was by Beethoven. The solo playing was of the very first order. I hope hereafter to make you better acquainted with Laub and Grützacher; of Radecke I will say now that he is a young man, I should judge not yet thirty; a Silesian by birth; received his musical education at Leipzig, passing his examination in 1850, and being in 1852-3, for one year, at the head of the music of the Leipzig theatre, after which he came and settled here. When I was here three winters since, he gave with Grunwald, a young violinist, a series of concerts of chamber music which I did not hear.

What he is as a musician, the following extraordinary fact will give an idea. At the Prüfung of the Conservatorium of Leipzig, in October, 1850, Radecke, in one evening, played the solo parts in Schumann's pianoforte, and Mendelssohn's violin concertos, and then directed the performance of a symphony of his own! Since his residence in Berlin, Kapellmeister has produced another by him at the great Sinfonie Soirées. There is a probability that you will yet know the name of Robert Radecke better. But I am far away from my concert!

The third number on the programme was an air by Bach, sung by Herr SANNATH, a noble bass of the Dom-chor, with obligato violin, played admirably by Laub—who is indeed one of the great violinists. After this followed a virtuoso performance on the violoncello with orchestra by Grützmacher. I think him the finest 'cellist I ever heard.

The second part of the concert was occupied by a cantata—"dramatic poem"—after Ossian, for solo, chorus and orchestra, composed by—as a matter of course almost—by Gade. The argument, as printed in the text book, is as follows: Comala, the daughter of Sarno, king of Innistore, so goes the legend, had conceived a consuming passion for Fingal, king of Morven. Fingal returned her love, and Comala, disguised as a warrior, followed him in an expedition against Caracul, king of Lochlin. On the day of the battle, Fingal parted from Comala, left her upon the mountain behind, whence she could behold the battle, and promised in the evening, after the victory, to return to her. Comala waited with gloomy foreboding the return of Fingal; the storm arose and swept around the mountain, and upon it rode the ghosts of former generations, on their way to the battle-field to lead the souls of the slain to their new abode; she mistakes the purport of their appearance, and supposes the battle lost and Fingal slain. The shock is too great and she dies. But Fingal had conquered, and when evening came, returned amid songs of triumph from his warriors; but the victors were met by the damsels of Comala singing lamentations over the death of the beloved one. In sadness and sorrow the king called upon the bards to praise her in their songs, and the choruses of the virgins and bards went with the soul of the deceased to the home of her fathers.

I liked it very much, and should the project ever be fulfilled of giving a series of united orchestral and vocal concerts in Boston, I should expect to hear this. There is great opportunity for orchestral painting, which Gade has well taken advantage of. The effect of the whole is somewhat sad, but one hears it and feels the charm of the old Ossian passion, which at some period of our literary lives we have almost all passed through.

Radecke's second concert was given last Friday evening, and was one of very high interest. Three numbers were new on the programme to nearly the entire audience, and the other as good as new. The three were, 1st. The Serenade composed in 1780, for 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bass horns, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, violoncello and contrabass—a delicious work and finely played by members of Liebig's band. 2d. "An die ferne Geliebte," a set of six songs which belong together, and are expressive of varied emotion—a work full of feeling, and very well sung by Herr SCHNEIDER, who has lately played in several performances of the opera-house. CLARA SCHUMANN played the accompaniment. 3d. Symphony No. 2, in C, by Schumann—on the whole, the most interesting symphony I have heard from him—and one which many who hear it, call one of the very richest works since Beethoven. The other—good as new—was Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, for piano forte and orchestra, the solo played by Clara Schumann. Quite a delegation of Americans was present and all agreed as to the perfection of the performance. For my part, her playing on the whole gives me more real musical enjoyment than that of any other pianist I have heard. Our friend A, referred to above, thinks the same, and he, you know, is a better judge than I. The enthusiasm with which I wrote of her three years ago in your paper, was not misplaced. Could you but make it pay her to visit Boston!

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

What is "Classical" Music?

II.

We endeavored a few weeks since (see Journal of Nov. 13) to break ground a little towards furnishing an answer to this question. We own to having made but little progress. The further one proceeds, the clearer it becomes that such a question defies definite solution; that there is an essential vagueness in the phrase "Classical Music," by which even the most intelligent use of it is not entirely unencumbered. Be it understood, however, that our task is not to show what music should and what should not be accounted classical; nor what ought to be meant by "Classical Music"; but simply to define, if possible, what is meant; to note the various uses of the term in common parlance, and try to drag to light the notions and distinctions more or less implied or latent in the various applications of the word.

Again, we hear classical opposed to popular music, as if it were something not meant for the many, but for the few—for cultivated tastes—for "the appreciative"—for those in whose life-plan music holds so serious a place that they have deemed it worth their while to learn to love what there is best in it, and not remain content with what is easiest, or what it is the fashion of the day to like and be amused with. For the most part it is so. And yet much of the most learned, complex and artistic music;—much that does not cease to be a study with the earnest music-lover and musician while he lives, is also popular, inspiring and delightful to the masses, when given a fair hearing. What shall we say of Handel's "Messiah," of the 12th Mass of Mozart, of the "Creation" by Haydn, of the opera "Don Juan," where it has once got tolerably well known, and does not suffer in the representation? Nay, even the C minor Symphony, played by a noble orchestra, has held the largest audience breathless with delight, exalted above common life, above themselves, as certainly as standing face to face with the great mountains or Niagara. Many a time it needs no learning to appreciate the beautiful and grand results of learning. What the scholar alone can write, if it be true, if there be life in it, we all of us can feel. And so of much of this fine music, which we hear coupled with the bugbear epithet of "classical"; give it a fair chance, offer a fair exposure to its sunshine, and all of us, who have a sense and soul for music, whether we understand it learnedly or not, are pretty sure to feel its warmth, and find it "meets our case" by rendering back to us a portion of our best life, that daily ebbs away amid the sands and shoals of miserable routine.

"Classical" music in the sense of learned, elaborately complex, highly artificial, as opposed to simple; of pedantic, as opposed to natural, spontaneous, captivating; of music in certain forms, cast in certain moulds, or woven into certain textures, as the contrapuntal and fugue structure in choral or concerted pieces, organ music, &c., and the Sonata or Symphony form in instrumental composition, as opposed to the free fantasia style, so common in these days of virtuoso exhibition, scarcely recognizing any principle of form; and finally in the sense of old, time-sanctioned, as opposed to modern, has already been considered. Perhaps if we consider what has made the music that is old "still live," what has made the fugues and the Sonatas that are so learned and so difficult, and so beyond the comprehension of the many, still the more valued the more truly musical one's taste becomes, we shall get at the essential meaning and intention of the term "classical," as used in all of the above senses. Meanwhile, before summing up, we venture to recall some hints upon this topic written by us a long time ago.

In Music the "classics," the cherished models and text-books of the classes, are of comparatively modern date. Yet music, like literature, has its classics, its established models of form and method in the art of composition. It finds them in those brave, inspired old geniuses, in whose hands the rude music of nature gradually grew into the wonderful forms of the music of Art: the men, whose musical creations were a practical unfolding of the germs of music, according to their innate divine laws of proportion, combination, harmony, into full and perfect forms of Art. In them natural music became scientific, learned; that is, in their works we find the principles, the eternal laws of music best illustrated. It is no longer a vague, wild, æolian harp-like phenomenon, floating about the world in mysterious snatches of melody; but its principle of order has been found and logically developed; and now a piece of music is a connected discourse, in which a melodic theme is unfolded, treated, brought into relation with kindred themes, and woven as a motive or primitive fibre into a complex organic texture. Those who first did this (working of course in an ascending series of greater and greater successes, from Orlando Lasso, through Palestrina, through Bach and Handel, up to Mozart and Beethoven) of course wrought earnestly. They had got hold of the genuine thing.

Mere fashions, weak aspirations after novelties and specious effects, had no part, or at least a very small part in their labors. Hence they could always be appealed to as genuine: Das ist das wahre! (that is the true thing!) said Beethoven of Handel. And all the more modern music, however various in form and spirit, however antic and fantastic in its attempts at novelty, even to the Paganinis and De Meyers, rests on this classic ground-work of culture. To make musicians, the works of the great contrapuntists must be studied. Counterpoint—Punctum contra punctum, point against point,—is the derivation of the word. It describes a composition in several parts or voices, note answering to note, each part having its distinct individual movement, yet all together intertwined into a beautiful, complex, harmonious whole. Canon and Fugue followed by the logical necessity of things; for this very logic of nature is itself a fugue; and the fugue principle, variously modified and more or less distinct, runs through all nature and all Art. Fugue is the form of free, harmonious motion, type of the infinite everywhere in the finite; set water in motion and you have wave chasing wave, which is a fugue. These old masters got hold of this principle of nature and wrought it out gloriously into their works, their fugues and choruses, their masses and oratorios, their sonatas and symphonies.

Those of them who adhered most strictly to the principle, and were least drawn off by tempting fashions and popularities of the day, naturally became the classic models for musical students—Palestrina, Bach and Handel especially so.

Now some are narrow and pedantic enough to limit the term classical to these, and to think nothing sound which wanders far from them. They forget that genuine Art must have two attributes; one is learning, but the other is inspiration, genius; one may be acquired, the other cannot. Bach, and Handel, and the later names whom we call classical, were all men of genius; if they have all met in certain common principles of Art, because all so profoundly true to nature, which is one in all its infinite variety, still they have each wrought from a decided individuality of genius. Mere imitation of their form and manner cannot make one classical; for what makes the models themselves classical, is that they imitated no one, but sought the real laws of Art, whether in the labors of their predecessors and masters, or in new experiments of their own. They made nature, Art, the soul, God, their master.

This element of genius admitted, together with the perpetual change of circumstances, local and historical, and we see that the term "classical," to preserve any good and worthy meaning, must constantly extend its arms and take in wider and wider varieties. It is absurd to limit it to a certain number of old masters, and to later copyists of them. Thus we approximate by a negative process to a clear and sensible use of the term.

Musical Libraries.

Dear Dwight.—The experience which I had as a sort of under-librarian, with the late Dr. Harris, at Cambridge, together with the observations I have made in, and what I have learned from various sources of the great libraries of Europe—all this has impressed me with the conviction that the two greatest objects of a public library are: the collection of books which are too costly for private persons to own, and the preservation of such as are not worth owning by a private person. There are so many, many books, which once in half a century for some one person have an immense value, and through him for the public, but which are not otherwise worth the room they would occupy on the shelf, that I consider among the best institutions of Utopia—when that land shall at last be discovered, that which has for its object the preservation of worthless books. Hence I wish devoutly to see somewhere preserved (in our own line) a complete collection of all the collections of psalmody, which, like leaves of autumn, are continually falling.

But more important for us is it, that some public library should have a collection of the old classics upon the theory, history, and practice of music. No private person with us can well afford to own them, nor are there many who would find much inducement to use them—but here and there one will appear whose tastes and studies will lead him to make such a use of them as shall make them of public advantage.

As a matter of personal profit all that tends to awaken and increase the public interest in music is of advantage to the practical musician. The writer upon music creates a demand for the composer and performer; the latter opens a way for the writer—all are equally interested in having a good musical library in the city.

The conductors of the Public Library in Boston have made quite a handsome appropriation for the basis of a musical collection, but in the multitude of branches of learning, literature, and art, which they must see to it are represented in this collection, the means fail for an extensive expenditure at once. A comparatively small sum annually will add the more modern music and musical books to those they already have. But unless the rare opportunities can be embraced, when old collections happen to come up, no money or pains will enable us to acquire the ancient classics. Such I call the Italian and German writers—nay, the English also—of the period from 1475 to 1725. Since 1845 I have examined London Antiquarian catalogues for certain works on music in vain.

Just now there is a collection for sale in this city, of which, I am sorry to say, the possessor knows the value, and his prices will be for many of the numbers high. But the great libraries of London, Edinburgh, Paris, and several of the German princes want many of the books, and will pay immense prices for single ones. The opportunity of purchasing many of them—old Italian, Latin, and German works, such as occasionally are of the highest value to the student, but not directly of use to the public—is the first I have known since I began to interest myself in this matter. Now is there any way in which the musicians of Boston can be brought to see that it is for their interest in the long run to have such a basis for a musical library? If so, why can they not arrange a concert to raise funds for its purchase, and establish an annual concert for the increase of the collection? In Europe government collects pictures, statuary, books, everything that the people can ask as a means of studying science, history and Art. In our country almost all must be done by the voluntary act of the people. Can the musical people be depended upon to do anything for their Art? I have good reason to think that a handsome offer for the whole would not be refused. One library only needs the whole.

Musical Chit-Chat.

A tribute to the memory of the late JOHN LANGE, one of our best musicians, and very highly esteemed as a teacher and as a man, who died Nov. 8, in this city, shall appear in our next.

OPERA! The Opera is coming. The great ULLMAN TROUPE, with PICCOLOMINI, and LABORDE and POINSET and GIUONI,—with FORMES, BRIGNOLI, FLORENZA, and other tenors, baritones and basses,—with an orchestra of from forty to fifty instruments, according to the requirements of the piece,—with the same large and well-trained chorus as in New York,—with a repertoire including all the famous operas there given,—and with most piquant fashionable prices, which we suppose everybody will be fashionable enough to pay, by way of "treating resolution" after valiantly confessing poverty and not subscribing to cheap orchestral and other concerts;—for all this the manager pledges himself in his grand manifesto in our advertising columns, omitting however, some of its gems of eloquence which will be found in the daily newspapers. Next Wednesday is the opening night, the first of the "Piccolomini nights," when the fascinating little Countess will appear in La Traviata. On Friday we plunge into the thick of the business with the grand opera, the "Huguenots," for the first time in Boston, when the three other prime donne will appear, with FORMES in his great part of Marcel. Of course we shall have the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," and "Robert le Diable," and more famous things as long as purses shall hold out. We believe there never has been in this country such an operatic success as that of this same company this past month in New York. . . . CARL ZERRAHN commences his rehearsals this week, and we suppose the evening of the first Orchestral Concert will soon be announced. . . . Dropping in at the Museum the other evening to see a portion of the new and brilliant spectacle of "Sinbad the Sailor," we were struck by the originality and beauty of much of the music, composed for it by Mr. EICHENBERG, the conductor, who gives some exquisite violin solo passages in the course of a moving panorama.

CARL MOZART, the second and only surviving son of the great Mozart, died at Milan, on the 30th of October, in his 80th year. He left the bulk of his property to a religious society, after distributing valuable mementoes among his friends, and providing almost munificently for the future comfort of a faithful servant. For the last forty representations of "The Marriage of Figaro" in Paris, he had received the sum of 8,000 francs. . . . VERDI is at Naples, directing in person the rehearsals of his opera, Simon Boccanegra. . . . The foreign papers are not yet weary of reporting or of manufacturing ROSSINI anecdotes and bonmots; among the latest this is good enough, whether it be true or not. The composer, being asked by a friend why he never went to any lyrical theatre, gave, amongst other reasons, the following: "I am embarrassed," said he, "at listening to music with Frenchmen; in Italy or Germany I am sitting in the pit, and on either side of me is a man shabbily dressed, but who feels the music as I do; in Paris I have on each side of me a fine gentleman in straw-colored gloves, who explains to me all I feel, but who feels nothing! All he says is very clever indeed, and it is often very true, but it takes the gloss off my own impression—if I happen to have any."

A German paper (the Regensburger Zeitung,) speaks in glowing terms of a new musical work by a valued contributor to our Journal, Dr. ZOPFF, of Berlin. We translate a few sentences: "No recent event in the world of Art here has excited such an interest among cultivated people, as the performance of the final scene of Märcker's Alexandrea, set to music by Dr. Zopff. Our large and beautiful Arnim's Hall was filled with a rare audience, composed of honored statesmen, artists, and men of science, such as no work has brought together since the days of Mendelssohn. There was our venerable Nestor, Humboldt, with other learned men, attracted by the antique theme and execution of the work; there, two, were Meyerbeer, Grell, Schneider, and other musical celebrities; the leading members of the stage, the diplomatic corps, &c., who also listened nearly three hours with singular attention to the work as performed by our best court opera singers and players. Great as was the impression produced by this work in the concert-room, where it was given as a 'Requiem on the death of a hero,' with the title, 'Funeral solemnities of Alexander the Great,' especially by its large polyphonic features, it is still better suited for scenic representation on the stage; its grand military processions, its dramatic fire, its extremely animated recitative, and dreamy southern melodies make Dr. Zopff's work a highly effective stage piece."

Ave Maria, composed by A. BENDELARI, pp. 5.

The common Latin words of the Catholic prayer to the Virgin, with English version, are here set to music of a chaste, religious character. There is much power and beauty in the melody, with due abstinence from those cheap common-places of Italian opera which singers so delight in. After a few solemn church chords, the words Ave Maria are twice intoned slowly in the plain old canto fermo style; and then the melody flows forth naturally upon a well-contrived accompaniment. We leave it to the singers to compare it with the Ave Maria by Cherubini and by Robert Franz.

The Echo: Waltz for Soprano Voice. A. BENDELARI. pp. 9.

This is the brilliant piece of concert vocalization composed by Sig. Bendelari for the remarkably flexible and bird-like voice of his pupil, Miss ABBY FAX, a very good likeness of whom adorns the title-page. Yet while the aim is vocalization the piece being full of echoes, trills, runs, arpeggios, &c, there is a little poetic song-thought running through it,—a pretty melodic subject, taking the form of a waltz, with suggestions of mountain air and distances in the accompaniment. It will be good exercise for bird-like sopranos.

Ruskin On Education In Art.

The facts of which it is necessary that the student should be assured in his early efforts are so simple, so few, and so well known to able draughtsmen, that, as I have just said, it would be rather doubt of the need of stating what seemed to them self-evident, than reluctance to speak authoritatively on points capable of dispute, that would stand in their way of giving form to a code of general instruction. To take merely two instances: It will perhaps appear hardly credible that among amateur students, however far advanced in more showy accomplishments, there will not be found one in a hundred who can make an accurate drawing to scale. It is much if they can copy anything with approximate fidelity of its real size. Now, the inaccuracy of eye which prevents a student from drawing to scale is, in fact, nothing else than an entire want of appreciation of proportion, and therefore of composition. He who alters the relations of dimensions to each other in his copy, shows that he does not enjoy those relations in the original; that is to say, that all appreciation of noble design (which is based on the most exquisite relations of magnitude) is impossible to him. To give him habits of mathematical accuracy in transference of the outline of complex form is, therefore, among the first, and even among the most important means of educating his taste. A student who can fix with precision the cardinal points of a bird's wing extended in any fixed position, and can then draw the curves of its individual plumes, without measurable error, has advanced further towards a power of understanding the design of the great masters than he could by reading many volumes of criticisms, or passing many months in undisciplined examination of works of art.

Again, it will be found that among amateur students there is almost universal deficiency in the power of expressing the roundness of a surface. They frequently draw with considerable dexterity and vigor, but never attain the slightest sense of those modulations in form which can only be expressed by gradations in shade. They leave sharp edges to their blots of color, sharp angles in their contours of line, and conceal from themselves their incapacity of completion by redundancy of subject. The assurance to such persons that no object could be rightly seen or drawn until the draughtsman had acquired the power of modulating surface by gradations wrought with some pointed instrument (whether pen, pencil, or chalk) would at once prevent much vain labor, and put an end to many errors of that worst kind which not only retard the student, but blind him; which prevent him from either attaining excellence himself or understanding it in others.

It would be easy, did time permit it, to give instances of other principles which it is equally essential that the student should know, and certain that all painters of eminence would sanction; while even those respecting which some doubt may exist in their application to consummate practice are yet perfectly determinable, so far as they are needed to guide a beginner. It may, for instance, be a question how far local color should be treated as an element of chiaroscuro in a master's drawing of the human form. But there can be no question that it must be so treated in a boy's study of a tulip or a trout. A still more important point would be gained if authoritative testimony of the same kind could be given to the merit and exclusive sufficiency of any series of examples of works of art, such as could at once be put within the reach of masters and schools. For the modern student labors under heavy disadvantages in what at first sight might appear an assistance to him, namely, the number of examples of many different styles which surround him in galleries or museums. His mind is disturbed by the inconsistencies of various excellence and by his own predilections for false beauties in second or third-rate works. He is thus prevented from observing any one example long enough to understand its merit, or following any one method long enough to obtain facility in its practice.

It seems, therefore, very desirable that some standard of Art should be fixed for all our schools; a standard which it must be remembered, need not necessarily be the highest possible, provided only it is the rightest possible. It is not to be hoped that the student should imitate works of the most exalted merit; but much to be desired that he should be guided by those which have the fewest faults. Perhaps, therefore, the most serviceable example which could be set before youth might be found in the studies or drawings rather than in the pictures of first-rate masters; and the art of photography enables us to put renderings of such studies, which for most practical purposes are as good as the originals, on the walls of every school in the kingdom. Supposing (I merely name these examples of what I mean) the standard of manner in light-and-shade drawing fixed by Leonardo's study, No. 19 in the collection of photographs lately published from drawings in the Florence gallery; the standard of pen drawing with a wash, fixed by Titian's sketch, No. 30 in the same collection; that of etching, fixed by Rembrandt's spotted shell; and that of point work, with the pure line, by Durer's crest with the cock; every effort of the pupil, whatever the instrument in his hand, would infallibly tend in a right direction, and the perception of the merits of those four works, or of any others like them, once attained thoroughly by efforts, however distant or despairing, to copy portions of them, would lead securely, in due time, to the appreciation of other modes of excellence. I cannot, of course, within the limits of this paper, proceed to any statement of the present requirements of the English operative as regards Art-education. But I do not regret this, for it seems to me very desirable that our attention should for the present be concentrated on the more immediate object of general instruction. Whatever the public demand, the artist will soon produce, and the best education which the operative can receive is the refusal of bad work and acknowledgement of good. There is no want of genius among us; still less of industry. The least that we do is laborious, and the worst is wonderful. But there is a want among us, deep and wide, of discretion in directing toil, and of delight in being led by imagination. In past time, though the masses of the nation were less informed than they are now, they were for that very reason simpler judges and happier gazers; it must be ours to substitute the gracious sympathy of the understanding for the bright gratitude of innocence. An artist can always paint well for those who are lightly pleased or wisely displeased but he cannot paint for those who are dull in applause and false in condemnation.

Guardian Angels. Song. Clare W. Beames. 25

A simple, but well finished song, which will gain much upon nearer acquaintance.

Trip lightly. Song. Albert W. Berg. 25

An easy, off-hand composition, fresh and pleasing.

Under the Linden. Song. Geo. Linley. 25

The latest of the favorite pieces of this popular author.

My guardian angel. Song. Geo. Felix Benkert. 25

The first work of this promising young composer after returning from his studies in Germany. Easy and pleasing.

Threads of Gold. Song. M. W. Balse. 25

This little song betrays more care on the part of its author than he has been wont to bestow upon his numerous late productions. It is a very happy effusion, both with regard to poetry and music.

Steadily on we go. J. P. Knight. 25

Another of Knight's bright, cheering songs: a rushing, impetuous mariners' lay, with wave-like, six-eighth rhythm.

Les deux amis. Nocturne. " 30

Reverie sur l'océan. " 30

Schottisch de Salon. " 30

Popolska Mazurka. " 30

This series of original compositions by the well known, talented author well deserves the attention of all piano players of taste and skill. The first piece is a pompous march of great brilliancy, demands a clever player, but is sure of a fine effect when played well. The Nocturne is a neat, amiable little tale, with the melody principally moving in the middle part. "Reverie sur l'océan" is the name very appropriately given to a really charming, dreamy tone-poem, with a melody moving along fairy-like upon lightly heaving billows, which rapid arpeggios in the left hand cleverly imitate. The two last named pieces are comparatively easy, and of a lighter cast than the rest.

The Legend of the Rose Tree of Santa Maria degli Angeli.

By TROVATOR.

The famous church of Santa Maria degli Angeli, one of the most magnificent in Italy, is situated near the Convent of St. Francis at Assisi, and covers the spot formerly occupied by the little hut of the holy saint — the rude walls of the hut yet remaining under the dome of the church. St. Francis occupied this little hovel at the period of the legend, related in the following ballad —

St Francis was kneeling before the cross
In lonely and silent prayer,
When he heard the sound of a heavenly voice
Ring sweetly through the air.

St Francis looked up, and a holy light
Dazzled his saintly eye,
And he felt that it was our blessed Lord,
Who had died on Calvary.

And he heard a voice that thrilled his soul,
The voice of that blessed Lord;
The voice of Him whom the hosts of Heaven
For ages have all adored.

It was not the voice of an angry Judge,
But the voice of a Saviour dear,
And its tones of mercy, its tones of love,
Banished his rising fear.

It told him his pious prayers had been heard,
And, like Solomon of old,
To him would be granted whatever he asked,
Were it wisdom or earthly gold.

St Francis prayed that each pilgrim, who
From afar this place should win,
Might by that toilsome pilgrimage
Be pardoned from every sin.

His prayer was granted; the holy saint
Then turned from his humble home,
And joyfully travelled alone and afoot
On the road that leads to Rome.

The Pope was before the High Altar,
And the holy mass he read;
And St Francis, after the vesper hour,
Told him what Christ had said.

"Away! away!" said the faithless Pope,
"I cannot believe this tale."
St Francis wearily turned from Rome,
And he travelled o'er hill and dale,

Till he came again to his humble cell;
Then mournfully he sighed
And, lifting up his voice to heaven,
To Our Lady dear he cried.

Then again he kneeled before the cross
In lonely and silent prayer,
And again he heard that heavenly voice
Ring sweetly through the air.

And he looked, and again a holy light
Dazzled his saintly eye,
And again he was near our blessed Lord,
Who had died on Calvary.

And again that dear voice spoke, and said
That a miracle would prove,
To the world abroad and the Pope at Rome,
The strength of a Saviour's love.

It said to him that the rose-tree fair,
That grew by his cottage door,
Should suddenly bloom at the touch of his hand,
Though the summer time was o'er.

And then the voice to sweet music changed
And slowly it floated away;
And the holy light, that had filled the room,
Withdrew its celestial ray;

But it seemed to have left a halo bright
Round the head of the holy saint;
When alone in his cell it was brilliant and clear,
When away from the cross it was faint.

Yet many a time when the mass he read, ---
When he preached the holy word,
That light was seen, and the people said:
'Twas the shadow of Our Lord.

St Francis stood up from before the Cross,
And he went to the rose-tree fair —
It was only the first month of the year,
And bitter and cold was the air.

And the frost lay glistening bright on the ground,
And the mountains with snow were white;
The rose-tree had lost all its flowers and leaves —
It was but a piteous sight.

Then the people gathered around to ask
What the holy man wanted there.
He gave them his blessing — he looked towards Heaven,
Then he touched the rose-tree fair.

I would that we all had been there to see
The miracle wrought in their sight,
For quickly there bloomed on the withered tree
Roses, both red and white.

The roses so red, St Francis said,
Were tinged with the blood of His dying love;
The roses so white were the garments bright
That we all shall wear in His kingdom above.

The news soon spread o'er the Christian world,
To the Pope on his papal chair;
And the miracle that St. Francis wrought
Was quickly known everywhere.

And pilgrims flocked to St. Francis' shrine,
As had been ordained by Heaven,
And as many as made this pilgrimage,
Were of all their sins forgiven.

Long ages have past, and the holy saint
Has gone: — and now joyfully
He sits at the feet of Our Blessed Lord,
Who had died on Calvary.

But the rose-tree lives to this very day,
And even now, it is said,
That every year, on this same rose-tree,
Bloom roses, both white and red.

And a stately church with its frescoed dome,
Covers St Francis' shrine,
And the Pope, in his papal chair at Rome,
Still honors the saint as divine.

Thus when we, like St Francis, from earth are called,
Like him may we upward fly,
And meet at the feet of that blessed Lord,
Who has died on Calvary.

The Third "Mittelrheinisches" Musical Festival.

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)

The concert on the second day (the 27th September), took place at two o'clock P.M., under the direction of Herr Hagen, Capellmeister of the Ducal theatre at Wiesbaden. It opened with a very fine performance of Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis. We cannot, however, approve of the choice of the conclusion which R. Wagner has appended to it, instead of that by Mozart, which is far better adapted for a concert. The orchestra, however, proved what it could do with a correct tempo.

The choruses a capella, the choral by Johann Eccard: "Es ist das Heil uns'kommen her," with alterations in the text, and Johann Christoph Bach's motet: "Ich lasse dich nicht," were given, it is true, with precision, and without sinking, but the execution was far beneath what we are entitled to expect in such choruses without accompaniments. The notes were intoned rather than sung. Due significance was not given to them, so that it was seldom we heard the tone properly, or swell and die away as it should have done. We confess that proper expression of this description, and, especially, perfect equality of the same in all the voices, is difficult to achieve with only one general repetition of a number of different associations, and, for this reason, we consider that choruses a capella are not at all suited for musical festivals. They can only be sung after a course of persevering study by particular associations, which have dedicated themselves exclusively to this description of music; and even then such an effect as that produced by the Berlin Dom-Chor will be difficult of attainment.

Herr Dionys Pruckner, of Munich, played Beethoven's pianoforte concerto, in E flat major, like an accomplished artist. It was greatly to be regretted that the excellently toned grand piano he used was not tuned to the pitch of the orchestra. This circumstance naturally weakened very much the effect of his playing. The orchestra, also, took matters too easily, and was not always exact. The kettle-drums completely marred the conclusion of the last movement, and the impression it produced could not be effaced by the brilliant manner in which the solo performer gave the final cadence. Altogether, Herr Pruckner succeeded best in the last movement; his execution of the adagio left the audience rather cold, while, despite all the purity and certainty of his performance, he did not always impart the requisite breadth and dignity to the magnificent first allegro. Concerning the proper mode of executing this concerto we entertain ideas completely different to those held by most pianoforte virtuosi of modern times, with the exception of Franz Liszt, who plays it with a classic repose, which in no way excludes heroic expression, but, on the contrary, heightens it. At the very introduction of the first movement we nearly always meet with an instance of false conception; the passages in it are not cadences in the ordinary sense of the word; they are integral component parts of the whole movement, as is sufficiently proved by their recurrence in the tempo of the second part. It is true that the execution of them is left by the composer to the performer, but only in so far as the latter conceives and renders them in conformity with the character and spirit of the whole movement, and not as the mere means of displaying technical skill.

Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm brought the first part of the concert to a close. It was better executed than any other piece in the whole programme. The chorus and orchestra worked well together; the tempo was always correct and appropriate, and the effect produced by several detached passages—such for instance, as, "Was war dir, o Meer;" "Vor dem Herrn bebte die Erde;" and the repetition of the first theme, "Da Israel aus Aegypten zog"—was grand and magnificent. The "Hallelujah" at the conclusion would, perhaps, have been improved by a little more fire and dash in the expression, though not in the tempo.

The second part commenced with Franz Schubert's grand symphony in C major. We cannot abstain from saying that the performance was an utter failure from beginning to end. We never met with such exaggeration of all the tempi. The grounds on which this fact was justified by a zealous friend of, and coöperator in, the festivals, who resides in the neighborhood, are too curious to be withheld from our readers. "There is no art required," he said, "to find fault with the false tempi; in the present instance, the conductors were perfectly right; the proper tempo should be observed with artists and amateurs; but, if we would introduce Art among the people, everything must be taken more quickly." Who can successfully resist arguments of this kind?

It is impossible to say to what music will be reduced, if such a scampering through the notes is received as an artistic execution? The piano-forte virtuosi of the last ten years have got to answer for a great deal. They were the first to take the tempi too quickly, for the purpose of displaying their digital skill, and I recollect perfectly well that one of the favorite phrases of admiration was, "And what a mad tempo!" Ay, mad, indeed, in the true sense of the word, even as regards that contagious principle inherent in every kind of folly. French criticism invented for it a word, "enlever," and was delighted if the pianist (another Parisian invention) rattled a piece off the keys in such a manner that nothing of it was left either in the ear or the heart. The mania gradually seized orchestral conductors, and when, in addition to this, literary men and democrats began, without possessing musical knowledge, to take the lead in music, we heard such observations as: "Our age is the age of rapid progress—the rate at which our blood rolls is quicker than its sluggish pace in the veins of our predecessors—we live more quickly!" As a natural result we were told that we must completely change walking (andante) into running; gaiety (allegro) into unbridled noise; and quickness (presto) into racing. To this we must add contempt for all that was old and had been handed down to us, ridicule of all traditions, and, therefore, of musical tradition; and, lastly, theory advocating the right of the subjective conception of a classical work by the player or conductor.

In this manner we have gradually arrived at such monstrosities, as the manner in which Schubert's symphony was executed by Herr Hagen in Wiesbaden. We can only repeat what we have already said about it. In the very first allegro, the warning inscription "ma non troppo" was written in vain on the finger-post pointing to the correct time; the pert strength of the dotted crotchet, and, with it, the entire character of the movement was lost, since the grace quaver could never come out with sufficient force. The rapidity, moreover, which transformed the wonderful andante con moto into a regular jig, was really revolting to every one who treasured in his heart the heavenly melodies of this piece. Similarly, the allegro vivace of the scherzo became a presto, rendering a staccato of the quaver figures almost impossible. The worst treated, however, was the trio, in which, moreover, very little attention was paid to the expression, the piano being usually almost entirely ignored in the forte piano, which is here so frequently marked. But the ne plus ultra of insipid conception was furnished by the finale, allegro vivace, that is to say, according to the theory invariably followed by the conductor of the symphony, "as quickly as possible." It seems as if Herr Hagen wished to prove that rapidity is, after all, witchcraft. In our opinion, music ceases when such mad speed begins.

After the symphony, the chorus of priests from Die Zauberflöte fortunately restored our musical equanimity, while Handel's grand "Hallelujah," from the Messiah, concluded, in an imposing manner, and, strange to say, in correct tempo, the second festival-concert.

Concerning the proceedings of the third day, we append the account furnished by our esteemed Wiesbaden correspondent.

The festival on the Neroberg, one of the most charming spots in the lovely country round Wiesbaden, was something never witnessed here before. From two o'clock in the afternoon, the crowd flocked towards the hill. Numbers of carriages conveyed the fashionable world thither, while the other part of the community moved forward in various manners, on foot, on horseback, or mounted on donkeys. An inscription on a kind of triumphal arch, bade the singers "Welcome under roof." It was a people's festival, and, consequently, a popular tone predominated. All ranks were represented. Even the old master Spohr came. Wherever he set his foot, he was greeted by triple huzzas. On this occasion he became a "man of the people." About seven o'clock, the procession of the visitors, with music at their head, again reached the town, which was up and stirring.

At seven o'clock, the performance of Spontini's Festeln commenced in the theatre. Herr Tichatschek (Licinius) was the only artist who rendered the performance a "festival" one. His voice is still fresh, strong, and equal; his style as bold and sure as ever; while his dramatic fire is still the same that for years has charmed the public. We are all acquainted with his peculiar declamation, which we overlook in favour of the genial singer. He has gone too far in this, ever to divest himself of his custom of dividing syllables, shortening notes instead, as Bader, Mantius, as well as Schneider, who was once here, and all great tenors have done, of connecting them a little more. He pulls and pushes them, and is not fond of submitting to the composer. (Subjective conception.)

In spite of this artist's fiery performance, the public was not particularly enthusiastic. Whether this fact was to be attributed to the increased prices of admission, the house decorated in a festive manner in honor of the third Middle-Rhenish Festival (as the bills announced), or the performance of the other articles, Heaven alone knows.

Mdlle. Lehmann, who played and sang Julia, Mdlle. Schönnchen (First Priestess of Vesta), and Herr Simon, evidently took pains to prove themselves "talented;" but the audience bestowed some faint applause only on a few of Julia's sighs.

Herr Lipp (Pontifex Maximus) did full justice to his part, both as regarded the music and the declamation. The constant tremolo, the chuckling shakes, and the disagreeable notes in the upper register of Mdlle. Lehmann's voice, her unpleasant screaming, her marble-like face, which is always the same, and her running backwards and forwards, without any object, on the stage, are truths which we will defend against this young lady, and of which we are obliged to remind her. That, as a native of Denmark, she does not speak better German, could not be urged as a reproach against her, were she singing in Rendsburg, Flensburg, or Kiel; but it is not every one here who knows she is a foreigner, and, therefore, this defect produces a disagreeable impression. Mdlle. Schönnchen does not always sing in tune. She is too uncertain, and speaks rather with her hands and eyes than sings. To master such a part as that confided to her, she is deficient in power. Her voice may be well enough for unpretending songs, but not for dramatic singing. Herr Simon competes with Mdlle. Lehmann in the tremolo. He possesses good vocal powers, but he should learn to employ them in a more worthy manner. This would be attended by profit and honor both to art and himself. The dances, introduced by Mdlle. and Herr Opfermann, were, as usual, applauded.

NEW YORK, DEC. 7.

Mr. Editor,—I concluded my last letter by proposing to examine a few facts in connection with the production of greater or less velocity of vibration, for the purpose of drawing such inferences as the facts may warrant. I will now briefly do so.

If we take several strings of equal length, but of various thickness, and place an equal strain upon them, we find that, when set in motion, the velocity of the vibration of the thinner strings is greater than that of the thicker.

Again, if we take several strings of equal thickness, but of unequal length, and place an equal strain upon them, we find the velocity of vibration of the shorter greater than that of the longer.

The same inference results from both facts, viz: that, all things else being equal, in proportion as the quantity of matter brought into vibratory motion is greater the velocity will be less; and, vice versa, as the amount of matter is less the velocity is greater.

The velocity of the vibration, then, is nothing more than the effect, perceived by the ear, of a certain amount of matter set in vibratory motion; and its action upon the ear is like the action of size upon the eye or the pressure of weight upon the hand or any other part of the body.

Now, as an increase of matter gives an increase of weight and size, if the proposition that the proportions (or interval ratios) of one scale should be the same as in another, be admitted, which would give a like form or figure, we might, perhaps not inappropriately, liken the twelve keys in use to twelve metal balls, and represent

C sharp " " " " 11½ "

D natural " " " " 11 "

D sharp " " " " 10½ "

E natural " " " " 10 "

F natural " " " " 9½ "

F sharp " " " " 9 "

G natural " " " " 8½ "

G sharp " " " " 8 "

A natural " " " " 7½ "

A sharp " " " " 7 "

B natural " " " " 6½ "

Now let these balls be rolled across a floor above our heads, and let the impetus given be such that their relative velocity shall be as their relative weight, and they will exhibit just that proportionate difference which, to my mind, exists in the keys in music.

If an experiment of this kind were made, although the only means of perception were by the organ of the ear, yet we should, by associate knowledge, be able to state the positive form, relative size, weight and velocity; and, possibly, that the balls were of metal!

In relation to musical sound, the Musical Scale is the form, and the Pitch is the size, weight and velocity; and that which it is produced from, the material. Will any one pretend to say that the ball of 8 pounds, when rolled as before specified, will convey to the ear the impression of greater size and weight and less velocity, than the ball of twelve pounds?

Now, as associate knowledge enabled us to determine several points beside the one actually communicated to the ear, so in musical sound, the same idea of weight, &c., is associated; and as the difference between one range of tones and another is the result of an actual difference of quantity of matter brought into operation, so the difference of weight, &c. will be in proportion to such difference of quantity, all things else being equal.

As the amount of matter brought into play, with its size, weight, &c., would, separately considered, exhibit no sentimental quality, it only remains to examine the associate impressions that these properties make, and whether the impressions and properties are in proportion the one to the other. If, then, a musical sound of 200 vibrations to a second of time be a consequent of double the amount of the same material brought into action for a sound of 400 vibrations, will not whatever associate impression results from the ratio 2:4, be likewise exhibited in the ratio 3:4, if we use such an amount of matter as shall produce a sound of 300 vibrations? If the difference between one sound and another be the result of a difference in the quantity of material used, then the effect of such difference must be in proportion to such difference.

That which is true of a single sound, is also true of a musical scale; a single sound has associated with it a certain amount of weight, size, form, material, and velocity of motion; and, when compared with another sound, possesses these qualities in a greater or lesser degree, according to the sound with which it is compared. A musical scale is a certain proportioned series of sounds, commencing on some given sound, and carries with it, in all its members, greater or less weight, &c. than some other scale, according as the fundamental sound of that other scale is produced from more or less material.

One very important association, then, of a scale formed upon a sound whose velocity is less than in some other scale, is, that more weight, size, &c. is represented; hence the idea of grandeur, vastness, &c. presents itself to the mind.

There is, however, another very important association connected with velocity of vibration. When motion is very rapid, we consider there is much motion, when it is slow, we consider there is but little. The evidence of life is motion, and we judge of the liveliness of a person by the rapidity of his motions. Every person ordinarily exhibits a certain amount of motion, according to temperament, constitution, &c., and whenever more than this average amount is exhibited, the individual is laboring under some more than ordinary exciting cause; when less than average is exhibited, ordinary causes fail to produce their usual effect, and a tendency to cessation of motion, or death, is exhibited; or the usual velocity of motion is lessened by the weight of some mental or physical impediment. Less motion, then, in an individual, indicates a pressure upon the mind of great importance, and associates the idea of large size, weight, &c., or it shows a failing of power, and points to cessation, either partial or entire! Greater motion indicates lightness, buoyancy, &c., and points to an increase of life, power, and its enjoyments!

Another Opinion on "Lohengrin" in Vienna.

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)

(Concluded from last week.)

Musical Vienna has troubled itself but very little with the factions existing in musical matters, for a considerable period, in the North of Germany. The Viennese public are not conversant with the subjects of dispute, and the warfare carried on in consequence by the various musical papers, and, above all, does not think of them, when streaming into the theatre to hear a new opera. A Viennese is, on the one hand, too uneducated, in many particulars, and, on the other, too reasonable, and possessed of too sound a judgment in musical matters, to look for anything else at the theatre but the unbiassed, undisturbed enjoyment of the work of art he goes to see, and of its representation. The reader perceives, we by no means wish to depreciate the success of Lohengrin, which strikes us as all the more satisfactory and natural, for the very reason that Wagner has to share it only with the artists who represented, and the gentleman who directed his work, while we must decidedly refuse to acknowledge, and, in doing so, we think we truly render the opinion of the Viennese public—that the so-called "Music of the Future"; the ideas which Wagner enunciates with such passionate pathos in his writings; the tendency which Herr Brendel advocates so cleverly in his paper, have achieved, with Lohengrin, that triumph, about which the members of Wagner's party are so enthusiastic. In reply to this, we shall be told: "The public was not, perhaps, quite conscious of what it felt; but the applause bestowed on Lohengrin involved the recognition of those principles which Wagner wishes to introduce into opera." To our mind, however, the direct contrary is the case. Whatever produces a satisfactory and elevating impression in Wagner's opera is precisely that which is not the practical realization of his theories of reform, or that on which he and his adherents lay the greatest stress in their arguments—but that which, in every opera of the Past or Present, would be considered good and appropriate, dramatically true, and musically beautiful.

Wagner's talent strikes us as indisputable, but his system as by no means so. We invariably perceive the greatest development of his talent in the very instances where he is unfaithful to his own system.

Wagner's polemical and reformatory writings are distinguished for their clever and soaring, although frequently superabundant and verbose, exposition of the defects and excrecences clinging to modern operas. But, from the very outset, Wagner confounds the abuse with the right employment of allowable means, and erroneously portrays every abuse as an incurable and fundamental evil, and all that the greatest masters have produced in the shape of operas as a failure. This is a crying act of injustice, which is an evident contradiction to the well-known respect entertained by Wagner, as a musician, for these self-same masters. But his rhetorical mode of exposition always becomes darker, more unintelligible, and more superabundant, whenever he has to set up a picture of the future to guide us, instead of the past, which, according to him is languishing in its last death-struggle. His ideal of the true, and only possible opera, is, as far as we can comprehend what he means, either a highly impracticable step backwards, to times long since past, or an intended completion and perfecting of that which has been done, in the same style, by the masters of the Past and of the Present—of that which, therefore, in both cases, according to his principle, has already existed, without the slightest intention of really re-modelling it. If opera is indeed to be only a succession of recitatives, without a resting point—a mere musical inoning of the dramatic dialogue, without any specific musical aim and substance—such unhappy eagerness to exaggerate Gluck's strict theory, and to return to the infancy of opera, can only end in a very deplorable result. If this is the case, Wagner is no reformer, but the most violent reactionary in the domains of Art, who despises the progress made since Rameau and Lully, and, most impracticably, would, instead of developed dramatic music, such as we have possessed for eighty years, restore the recitative, which, if solely and wholly supreme, would constitute the essence of monotony. Directly the dramatic action and dialogue are regarded as the principal things, as the "aim," and the music as the "means" only, the latter runs a risk of being justly discarded as completely useless, nay, as an impracticable adjunct, even interrupting the dialogue, and impeding the action. Music is effective and agreeable only when it appropriates the meaning of the words, and imparts to them a heightened effect, possessing, at the same time, dramatic truth and musical substance. If this, however, is Wagner's purpose, if his only intention was to restore to opera dramatic truth, in which, from various errors, it is occasionally deficient, then he ought to have said so; then, instead of stepping forward as a reformer, he ought, as a true disciple of honored and great men, to acknowledge that he, in his way, wished to effect nothing but what Gluck and Mozart, Cimarosa and Paisiello, Méhul and Boieldieu, Cherubini and Spontini, Beethoven and Weber, Spohr and Weigl, Meyerbeer and Lortzing, also tried to effect, and which they succeeded more or less in doing. The above masters have, each in his own way and in proportion to his powers, produced effects that are extraordinarily beautiful and great, precisely in musically-dramatic characterization, and not, in order to be characteristically true, by descending to absolute recitative, and banishing the cantilena; no, they enjoyed the privilege of uniting beauty and variety with truth, of blending melody and dramatic expression, of retaining the form of the aria, the duet, etc., and, at the same time, of being so true, that Wagner cannot be more so, although he sacrifices everything, even beauty, to truth. What becomes, then, under these circumstances, and the crushing weight of these facts and examples, of Wagner's system of the "Opera of the Future"?

For these reasons nothing has yet been gained for the system itself by this success of Lohengrin, at least not with us in Vienna, where, from the force of habit, we are, in musical matters, usually accustomed to call things by their right names. We do not exactly know how the new philologists on the banks of the Plesse may choose to express themselves, but, among us, a melody is still always a melody, and an opera an opera, while simple, impressive vocal music which penetrates to the heart, is still always considered as the greatest triumph a heaven-inspired composer can achieve, so old fashioned are our views. Little is to be effected by us with phrases concerning the difference between the "tone-melody," and the "word-melody," of the "harmonically-poetical complex," of the "architectonic treatment of the subject," of the "union of all the arts in one whole work of Art," &c. If Wagner succeeds in Vienna, it will be in spite of what he has written about himself and what others have written about him. He will owe his success solely to his unusual natural talent, which, although not free from error, is powerful enough to captivate the mind of an impartial auditor, to elevate his heart, to fix his attention, and, in many instances, to satisfy his musical taste. But we must receive the composer with unbiassed opinions, and the less the public listens to the effusions of party papers, and the less the educated amateur troubles himself about them, the easier will it be for both to pronounce a just decision.

In the choice of his dramatic subjects, Wagner manifests an especial partiality for those of the middle ages, the period of myths and legends. In this again he is a warm friend of the dusky Past; his dramas are not rooted in the struggles and efforts of the Present, or in the yearning for a better Future, unless, under their obscure, mysterious surface, we are presented with allegories, or unless the "light temple, more precious than anght known on earth, and in it a vessel of wondrous and blessed power," has a deep concealed meaning, which we must not dare to particularize more nearly, since "of so sacred a nature is the blessing of the Grail, that, concealed, it must escape a layman's eye." But however this may be, Wagner's operatic librettos are universally and justly praised for richness of matter and dramatic effect. A strain of true poetry pervades even Lohengrin. It is Every-anthe, with greater inspiration, with purer and more vigorous expression, but, otherwise, in a tolerably similar shape. The cursory and almost incomplete manner in which certain points are architected—in the repeated endeavors of Telramund and Ortrud to separate the lovers, and especially in the bewitching of Gottfried, &c.—does not materially injure the attractive and moving effect of the whole. Those persons, indeed, who apply to the libretto of an opera the standard which belongs to the drama alone, can hardly be satisfied with the mere outlines of character they will find in the work. But we who stand upon the so-called "surmounted point," must be content with the operatic libretto, considered as such, because, from a composition of this description we expect only outlines, intended not to receive real life until united with music.

This real life is in Lohengrin something very pithy, and inwardly rich, although not outwardly varied enough. No one will call Wagner's music trivial. It is pervaded by snatches of truth, grandeur, and real genuine depth of feeling, which, unfortunately, being disfigured by a great many peculiarities and weaknesses, do not always produce the same powerful effect. Wagner's scoring is distinguished for originality, the dazzling charm of unexpected combinations, and many detached genial touches; but, on the other hand, it is deficient, at times, in simplicity, nature, and correct measure. The introduction, before the curtain is raised for the first time, is very original, but much too long, and is rendered repulsive to many persons by the long continued high fingering of the violins. Many, too, of the orchestral introductory and after pieces, are spun out a great deal too much, and the tremolo on the violins is too frequently employed, while the wind instruments are playing the melody. Lastly, the finale of the first act, as well as that of the second, is, in certain passages, too noisy, and strikes us, here and there, as an effective but coarse exaggeration of the means at the composer's command, in Verdi's style. Very nearly the same qualities may be proved to exist in the vocal music of Lohengrin. Of course we are still speaking of the "opera" of Lo hengenrin, as an opera, that is to say, we are judging it by the old standard, according to which we look upon vocal music, musically beautiful, and at the same time dramatically effective, as the greatest triumph of Art. Musical inventive power is, therefore, for the operatic composer, the first and most indispensable quality, as it is for the writer of the smallest song and of the greatest instrumental work. To investigate how far Wagner is, in this respect, inferior to the old masters, would be here a superfluous task. Whether he sometimes avoids melody on purpose, or does so only when his imaginative power comes to a standstill, is difficult to determine. The musical auditor will always be loth to believe in such an intentional renunciation of this most lofty and heavenly gift, and, whenever he hears no melody, his first and last idea will be: "The composer could not think of anything here." These remarks apply partly to Ortrud and Telramund, both of whom are, musically speaking, neglected. Weber's principal fault in Euryanthe, namely, the disagreeable expression, which deprives his Lysiart and his Eglantine of all musical effect, is here, if not surpassed, at least repeated in Wagner's peculiar manner. We do not require that the "out-and-out villain" * should always indulge in the most dulcet of strains, but we still do not perceive why villainy should be marked by the composer's condemning the criminal to set at naught the rules of rhythm and good music. Can the feelings which quiver through Ortrud and Telramund in the beginning of the second act be portrayed only by dissonances which reduce the singer to despair and offend the ear of the public? Are not melodies of a gloomy character more appropriate for rendering such situations, than a gloomy absence of all melody whatever? The concluding unisonal passages of this scene are a sufficient proof of the correctness of our views, since these few bars, from the fact of their forming a definite melody, produce a far more powerful effect upon the minds of the audience than all the preceding detached recitative passages. It is for this reason that the character of Elsa stands out so brilliantly from the rest. We there find the greatest number of complete melodious passages, while spread over the part is that enthusiastically quick and poetically refulgent expression, which Wagner succeeded in imparting to his Elizabeth, although in a different degree, corresponding to the nature of the latter work, an expression which, being, both in a musical as well as a dramatic point of view, as beautiful as it is true, fills the soul of the hearer with profound delight, and of itself is a testimony of Wagner's great ability. Lohengrin himself excites in certain passages a similar sentiment of satisfaction, but suffers, like almost all the personages in the opera—not even excepting Elsa—from the systematic employment of the recitative form, on which Wagner's system, if we understand it correctly, is founded. It strikes us, however, that only a tolerable dose of sound judgment is requisite to perceive that when recitative is adopted, partly in its most simple, and partly in an obligato form, as a permanent standard, and only extended, now and then, into ariosos, but never into a regular air, duet, etc., the impression produced must be pre-eminently wearisome. In the drama when sung as well as in the drama when spoken, one of the most powerful means of heightening the effect is to give a scene an unexpected turn by the arrival of a fresh personage, or the addition of new motives. If, however, this expedient is employed two, three, and four times in succession, so that, in the course of the act the situation is not definitely brought to a close after any one scene, and no interval of natural repose supervenes, the expedient then becomes a fault, because the performers are no longer able to express without exaggeration the increased effect, because they are disappointed in the just claims they have to the applause of the public, applause which is procured for them by the definite conclusion of a situation; because such a conclusion of the separate portions of a work is one of the first rules of composition in art; because the repetition of this dramatic lever, however effective it may be, betrays a partiality for exaggeration and an ignorance of the stage; and because, lastly, the spectator and auditor require occasional periods of repose, and can only experience the consciousness of such a period by the formal rounding-off of a situation naturally complete in itself. This requirement which is, at least, quite as necessary for a musical as for a spoken drama, is mostly unfulfilled in Lohengrin, and hence arises the more or less wearisome impression produced by the work even on those who feel that, while their attention is captivated by the composition as a whole, their mind is delighted by detached beauties.

These beauties, however, consist precisely in those (melodic) portions which Wagner's system possesses in common with the opera of the Past, and the interest felt is paid to the poetical whole, the work of individual talent, while all which, in this "Opera of the Past," belongs to the "System of the Future," is to be reckoned among the defects and weak points of both the opera and the system.

That which turns the scale in matters of Art is true, fresh, and original talent, and not the dry, hollow theories of arrogant system hunters. What the latter spoil, the former make good again, and the sooner talent of this kind frees itself from systematic errors and a useless hankering after novelty, and returns to truly liberal, that is to say, sound and reasonable views, the sooner will it clear for itself a sure and honorable path through the Present to the Future; a Future of merited recognition and undying fame.

The Poetry of the Puritans.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.*

Was there no poetry in the Puritans, because they wrote no poetry? We do not mean now the unwritten tragedy of the battle-psalm and the charge; but simple Idyllic poetry and quiet home dreams, love-poetry of the heart and hearth, and the beauties of everyday human life. Take the most common-place of them. Was Zeal-for-Truth Thoresby, of Thoresby's Rise in Deepening Fen, because his father had thought fit to give him an ugly and silly name, the less of a noble lad? Did his name prevent him being six feet high? Were his shoulders the less broad for it? his cheek the less ruddy for it? He wore his flaxen hair the same length that every one now wears theirs, instead of letting it hang half way to his waist in essence and curls; but was he the less a true Viking's son, bold-hearted as his sea-roving ancestors, who won the Danelagh by Canute's side, and settled there on Thoresby Rise to grow wheat and breed horses, generation succeeding generation, in the old moated grange? He carried a Bible in his jack-boots; but did that prevent him, as Oliver rode past him with an approving smile on Naseby field, thinking himself a very handsome fellow, with his moustache and imperial, and bright red coat, cuirass well polished, in spite of many a dint, as he sat his father's great black horse as gracefully and firmly as any long-locked and essenced cavalier in front of him? Or did it prevent him thinking too, for a moment, with a throb of the heart, that sweet cousin Patience, far, far away at home, could she but see him, might have the same opinion of him as he had of himself? Was he the worse for the thought? He was certainly not the worse for checking it the next instant, with manly shame for letting such "carnal vanities" rise in his heart while he was "doing the Lord's work," in the teeth of death and hell; but was there no poetry in him five minutes after, as the long rapier swung round his head, redder and redder at every sweep? We are befuddled by names. Call him Crusader instead of Roundhead, and he seems at once—granting him only sincerity, which he had, and that of a right awful kind—as complete a knight errant as ever watched and prayed ere putting on his spurs, in fantastic Gothic chapel, beneath "storied windows richly dight." Was there no poetry in him, either, half an hour afterwards, as he lay bleeding across the corpse of his gallant horse, waiting for his turn with the surgeon, and fumbled for his Bible in his boot, and he tried to tune a psalm, and thought of Cousin Patience and his father and his mother? and they would hear at least that he had played the man in Israel that day, and resisted unto blood, striving against sin and the man of sin?

And was there no poetry in him, too, as he came wearied along Thoresbydyke, in the quiet autumn eve, home to the house of his forefathers, and saw afar off the knot of tall poplars rising off the broad misty flat, and the great eagle tossing its sheets of silver in the dying gusts, and knew that they stood before his father's door? Who can tell all the pretty child memories which flitted across his brain at that sight, and made him forget that he was a wounded cripple?

Fair Patience, too, though she was a Puritan, yet did not her cheeks flush, her eye grow dim, like any other girl's, as she saw afar the red coat, like a sliding spark of fire, coming slowly along the straight fen bank, and fled up stairs into her chamber to pray, half that it might not be he? Was there no happy storm of human tears and human laughter when he entered the court-yard gate? Did not the old dog lick his Puritan hand as lovingly as if it had been a Cavalier's? Did not lads and lasses run out shouting? Did not the old yeoman father hug him, weep over him at arm's length, and hug him again, as heartily as any other John Bull, even though the next moment he called all to kneel down and thank Him who had sent his boy home again, after bestowing on him the grace to bind kings in chains and nobles with links of iron, and contend to death for the faith delivered to the saints?

And did not Zeal-for-Truth look about as wistfully for Patience as any other man would have done, longing to see her, yet not daring to ask for her? And when she came down at last, was she less lovely in his eyes because she came, not flaunting with bare bosom, in tawdry finery and paint, but shrouded close in coil and pinner, hiding from all the world beauty which was there still, but was meant for one alone, and that only if God willed, in God's good time? And was there no faltering of their voices, no light in their eyes, no trembling pressure of their hands, which said more, and was more, ay, and more beautiful in the sight of Him who made them, than all Herck's, Waller's Sacharrissas, flames, darts, posies, love-knots, anagrams, and the rest of the insincere cant of the court? What if Zeal-for-Truth had never strung two rhymes together in his life? Did not his heart go for inspiration to a loftier Helicon, when it whispered to itself, "My love, my dove, my undefiled is but one," than if he had filled pages with sonnets about Venneses and Cupids, love-sick shepherds and aerial nymphs?

FORMES ON LEPORELLO.—Some of the New Yorkers do not like Karl Formes's performance of Leporello in Don Giovanni, which was regarded in Philadelphia as one of his best parts. Formes undertakes to teach them what the character is, by publishing a letter, from which the following is an extract:

"For ten years I have been playing the part of Leporello, and everywhere with unequivocal success. I saw it played by the greatest European artists, such as Lablache and others. I have been studying as a conscientious artist this part, and in conformity with the idea of the great composer and to the best conceived characteristic features of Leporello—immensely different from those ideas which a superficial critic is too apt to adopt. Leporello is not the sneaking, crafty servant which critics would like to have him represented; he is neither a Tartuffe nor a Mephistopheles—he is, above all, the Spanish servant of his master. Had the reporter of the Staats Zeitung, like Lablache and myself, travelled in Spain and Seville, or Vittoria, and procured for himself a true specimen of a Spanish servidor, he would have the opportunity of being enabled to judge a Leporello as he is—a Leporello immensely different from the German valet de chambre of a German count or petty prince.

"Leporello is the servant of a Spanish grandee, treated by him less as a servant, than as his confidant. He is overflowing with insolence and wantonness—ever fickle; when in good luck, bold and reckless; when in danger, craven and trembling; in his conversation, coarse; in his movements, partly rude, partly polished. Add to this his southern vivacity, which, in a German valet de chambre, into whom the critic of the Staats Zeitung would like to see him transformed, would no doubt appear unnatural and exaggerated. Lastly, Leporello, who certainly is superior to his master, is so cunning as to still exaggerate these natural qualities in order to deceive his own master with regard to his own shrewdness and craftiness. The great opera public in Paris, London, and also New York, well know how to appreciate this conception of character, such as Lablache and myself regard as the right one, and in spite of increased prices of admission, rewarded us with a numerous attendance and much applause.

PATRIOTIC TUNES IN SCHOOLS.—A letter-writer from Boston, in the New York Courier and Enquirer, who has been listening to the songs of Young America, reports the following.

Musie in the public schools may be an improvement, though it would be a pity to allow a child that had an ear and voice to spoil both at an age when they ought to be cultivated with great care. The mention of music reminds me of an incident which I happened to witness this summer. Where I was visiting, there was, near by, a large primary school, in which the children, every Wednesday afternoon, spent an hour or two in singing, chiefly patriotic tunes, accompanied by spitting hands and stamping. The windows being open, we heard "Hail Columbia" regularly about four o'clock. One day as I was passing, some twenty of the boys were out and at play on the meeting-house steps near the school house. They were shouting, singing, riding on the balusters, etc. One little fellow, of about eight or nine, was astride one of the rails, drumming and singing with all his might, "Firm, united let us be, rallying round our liberty tree!" etc. In the middle of his song, a smaller boy who was below him, trying to clamber up, fell off; whereupon the singer interrupted his song with a parenthesis, but only for an exclamation, thus: "Firm, united let us be, rally—(G—d—you, don't you know no better than that!)"—rallying round our liberties," etc., the parenthesis being thrown in boldly, in a good mouth-filling style, as if it were almost a part of the tune.

I could not but moralize on the spectacle, and say to myself, "Have I not beheld a too common specimen of YOUNG AMERICA?"

In Memoriam.

Died in this city, Nov. 8th. JOHN LANGE.

Talents and virtues like those Mr. Lange possessed should not pass away from among us without some tribute of grateful recollection. We are sure there are many of his pupils who now feel that they owe to their faithful master a purity and refinement of musical taste, and a love of what is best in Art, which were among his own marked characteristics.

And however their ripened judgment may differ from his, they will never forget the impression produced by his character. In that most arduous and trying occupation of teaching music, his unexampled and unfailing patience, his gentle method of correction, his rare yet satisfying praise, and the enthusiasm which was not concealed by a quiet manner, all combined to stimulate to industry and to inspire respect and attachment. He had, to a remarkable degree, two qualities which young people are quick to recognize and admire—modesty and simplicity. His scholars knew that he was never thinking of himself. Though he was not much disposed to talk to them even about musical matters, the few sentences he did utter, gave insight into a most delicate and appreciative mind. Holding decided opinions, he was yet cautious not to censure, or allow his scholars to condemn hastily even those works which he could not admire. He would sometimes patiently point out the merits of a composition of the "new school," with which it was impossible for him to sympathize. But the greatest pleasure came when a pupil was sufficiently advanced to study Beethoven's works with Mr. Lange; to that great Master he gave the most respectful admiration and the most entire sympathy—he called attention to the less prominent beauties, and taught one to appreciate his music both with the intellect and the heart.

Though we have had among us more distinguished and brilliant pianists since Mr. Lange first came to Boston, there must be some persons who still remember with pleasure the strength and delicacy of his touch (which had a clearness, a ring quite peculiar) and the expression of his playing. He was very unwilling to appear at concerts, partly from shyness, and partly from the labor of preparation which he deemed necessary, but his brother artists received from him in more private ways the aid which he refused on public occasions.

It is pleasant to recollect that he came back to Boston last year because he had more friends here than anywhere else. He spent his time rather in composition than in teaching, and it is to be wished that his publishers would now let us know what he has written.

His solitary life on earth is ended, and as we add his name to the lengthening list of those whom we shall see here no more, there rises before us the vision of truth, uprightness, purity, kindness, and above all, Fidelity.

"How can we wonder when we see him go To join the Dead found faithful to the end?"

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, NOV. 10. — In his third concert Radecke has some idea of producing Mendelssohn's "Lorely" music.

For Symphony music the opportunities this winter are no fewer than usual. The Royal Orchestra have begun their usual series of six, in a hall in the opera house, hardly large enough, by my estimate, to hold 800 auditors. Practically the Germans know nothing of ventilation—how much this has to do with the enormous number of deaths by apoplexy, I do not know, but think it must be one cause of them. Neither the opera-house, theatre, nor any one of the concert halls of the city, would be endured in Boston, without some further provision for the renewing of the air of the room. The seats on the main floor of the small hall of the opera house having been all taken, nearly all of us Americans were forced into a narrow gallery, which is nearly up to the ceiling, where the heat and foul air were almost insupportable. The Germans, however, seemed to take it as a matter of course, and when I found my way at last into a deep hole of a recess, where there was a window, and opened it a few inches for a breath, they soon called upon me to close it again. One of the papers suggests that these concerts be given in the opera-house itself. Ah, if they would but do it! They would get many a thaler from the Americans here for their widows' and orphans' fund. The principal pieces were a queer old symphony by Haydn, and Beethoven's first. Tanbert led, and how wonderfully he makes them play. Liebig, too, with enlarged orchestra, has begun his extra series of symphony soirées, now given in the Singakademie. House full, performance very fine. His, like those of the Royal Orchestra, will consist of a series of six and another of three.

His ordinary concerts are not, as formerly, all given out at Hennig's Garden. He plays there Sunday afternoon, from 4 to 7, Tuesday and Friday afternoons at 112 Friedrich St., and Wednesday evenings at Sommers' saloon, outside the Potsdam Gate. He has increased his orchestra to 40 members, and naturally has raised his prices—formerly we got six tickets, and now only five, for 371-2 cents of our money. That his orchestra is by no means a contemptible one you may judge from the fact that it is employed now by all the oratorio societies, where formerly the royal orchestra played.

For chamber music, we have first, the old established Zimmermann Quartet; secondly, a new one consisting of Laub, Radecke, Wuerst and Bruns; thirdly, the cheaper one, of which Oertling is at the head; fourthly; the Trio, Hans von Bülow, Laub and Wohlers; and fifthly, the soirées of chamber music of the brothers Ganz.

I have not heard the Zimmermann Quartet since 1856—then I was struck by the perfect union of their playing. I am told that in this respect it surpasses the other, which has not had so much practice, but that Laub surpasses Zimmermann as a first violin.

Laub has made great progress since I first wrote about him three or four years since; as I never heard Joachim in a quartet, I can say with many others, who have heard much more chamber music than I, that L. stands ahead of all players in that department of music, which we have heard. It is truly exquisite.

Their series is to consist of four concerts; at each three quartets; of the twelve, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Cherubini, Schubert, Veit, furnish one each, Beethoven the rest. 1st evening, his Opus 130; 2d, Opus 95; 3d, Opus 132; and on the fourth, op. 131, 18 and 59. There are some quartet concerts for you worth having. They are given in a nice little hall in the hotel known as the English house, and are attended by some 150 to 200 persons,—among them enough from our side of the water to prove that we possess some feeling for the best music.

At the von Bülow Trio, we have old and new; Bach and Beethoven, Liszt and his school. Bülow is held here to be Liszt's best pupil—as he is his son-in-law. He does play wonderfully—only a little too apt to cover the bowed instruments with the tones of his grand pianoforte. Of him, and Laub, and others of the rising artists here I hope to write more at length hereafter.

The Gauz concerts are of a different order; more of the ordinary salon music is given, and the room at the English house is crowded in consequence—as is the hall in the hotel de Russie on von Bülow's evenings. These are the regular concerts of the season as now announced. Those for chamber music will probably be doubled in number before the winter is over, as the series consist of only three or four performances each. Besides them others of all sorts take place, as among us, so that not an evening passes in which the music-lover may not somewhere indulge his appetite.

The regular prices at such performances here are—in our money—half a dollar to subscribers, 75 cents for a single ticket.

There are hopes that before the winter is past, we shall hear Joachim and Clara Schumann together again, but nothing decisive is yet known. Speaking of Joachim—have I mentioned that the ridiculous story of his marriage to Giesele von Arnim, which passed into circulation in the spring of 1856, has no foundation whatever? Poor Bettina, since the renewed attack of apoplexy, is lying very low, and must soon pass away. What she wrote in her letters to Goethe on music should keep her memory alive with all lovers of the art. A. W. T.

BERLIN, NOV. 15. — I cannot remember what I have written about the LAUB-RADECKE Quartet here. I hope I have been sufficiently enthusiastic, for really their third concert, last week, gave as great delight as any one I ever attended in my life. The three quartets played were, Schubert, Op. 41, A minor—exquisite beyond description, and, by me, heard for the first time; Veit, Op. 15, G minor, also an exceedingly interesting and pleasing work, one you must have at the Quintette Club; Beethoven, Op. 132, A minor—that wonderful work containing the Hymn of Thanksgiving of a Convalescent, "in modo Lidico"—one of those Galitzin works, which occupied him so much during his last three years. The effect of this quartet, heard for the first time and probably not half understood, upon me was indescribable, and shall pass without any attempt at description.

LAUB has so pleased me by his great execution and evident feeling and enjoyment of all this great music in which he takes the most prominent part, that I have taken pains to procure some particulars of his life—and a mere accident has thrown into my hands a Prague newspaper, which contains just the outline that I need and which I can easily fill up from other sources.

If you will turn to the Leipziger Mus. Zeitung, vol. 47, p. 362, you will find a notice of the Prague Conservatorium concerts for the winter '44-'5, towards the close of which is this passage:

"The most extraordinary talent, however, which these concerts have brought to our notice, we save for the close of our article;—namely, the little violinist, Ferdinand Laub, who played the Polonaise by Ernst. This boy, now about twelve years of age, is the son of a poor musician, from whom he received just the absolutely necessary elements of instruction, and by whom he was then carried from hotel to hotel as an infant prodigy. Some three years since, he gave a concert, but hardly anybody took notice of it; happily Prof. Mildner was struck by his talent and he was received into the Conservatorium. Now his talents developed astonishingly. No one, who hears him now, and sees with what unfailing certainty, ease and elegance he overcomes the greatest difficulties, with what grandeur of tone and depth of expression he produces cantabile passages, can help asking what remains for the adult, when the boy is capable of so much? A brilliant future certainly awaits this boy."

There is a saying, which I have often found in musical works, attributed to Mozart or Beethoven, that

"the Bohemian is a born musician" — certainly that country has produced an immense number of the best musicians during the last two centuries. Laub is one of them.

"Ferdinand Laub," says the Prague newspaper, "was born on the 19th of January, 1832, in Prague, and when but six years of age, played in private concerts. When Ole Bull gave his concerts in Prague, in 1841, Laub played variations by Mayseder to him, and the Norwegian virtuoso was delighted with his playing. In 1843 the boy entered the higher course in the Conservatorium and received a stipend of 80 florins, [some $40]. When Hector Berlioz was in Prague [1846?] the boy played a violin piece by Ernst with such expression that the Frenchman threw his arms around him and invited him to Paris. Archduke Stephen made him a present of a real Amati violin; after which the boy, now fourteen years of age, went upon a concert tour, playing in Vienna, Salzburg, Augsburg, Munich, Stuttgart. He then returned to Vienna, where he remained until 1850. The next year he gave concerts with great applause in London. In the same year Prince Fürstenberg made him a present of a violin worth 1500 florins [over $700]. In 1853 he came to Weimar to Liszt, and was appointed chamber virtuoso to the court, which position he retained two years, and then made another concert tour to Cologne, Aix la Chapelle, Frankfurt, Heidelberg, Leipzig."

In the winter 1855-6, he came to Berlin. I remember well the impression he made. In spite of the overwhelming greatness of Joachim's playing, who in largeness and grandeur of style stands above all others, Laub's extraordinary abilities were at once acknowledged, and after playing before the king he was appointed chamber virtuoso here, as he had been previously at Weimar. Last winter he went to Copenhagen, gave there seventeen concerts, and among the marks of attention received there, none is more highly valued by him than a presentation copy of one of his last books and his portrait, both with autographs, from Hans Christian Andersen. Returning from Denmark he went to Vienna, where Ole Bull arranged a banquet in honor of him.

This winter I have only heard him in quartets; but judging from them, I have no doubt that the general remark here is true that, since 1856, he has made "giant progress." He goes soon with Wehle to Russia, to spend six or eight months. Not having heard Joachim in quartet, I can say, conscientiously, that Laub surpasses any one I ever heard in that department of his art. If it were only possible for him to visit Boston!

He is a small man and no one could judge from his appearance that he is so great an artist. His eyes are very full and prominent — he is near-sighted; his forehead not very high nor wide, but very full.

In 1850 he spent some time in an old castle in Bohemia — Schloss Nischburg — and one Sunday was invited to play a solo at high mass in the village church. He told me the story the other day after dinner, and I see no impropriety in repeating it. It was upon some occasion when the musical talent of the place was combined for the production of the service with great village splendor. Laub was told that a very pretty girl was to sing the solos. He went to the church, played his solo to general satisfaction, heard a delicious voice singing hers, but could get no sight of the singer, to his great disappointment, as the tones of the voice had made sad work in the feelings of the boy of eighteen as he then was.

However, after all was over, a rosy-cheeked, dark-eyed beauty of sixteen approached him, all blushing and beautiful, and placed a wreath of oak leaves and wild flowers upon his head! She was the vocal soloist doing homage to the instrumental.

"Yes," said Frau Laub, with a smile, "Madame So and So" — I forget the name — "told me I must do this, and so I went out and collected the leaves and wild flowers, and made the wreath all with my own hands. I did not think when I crowned him I should ever be his wife!"

NEW YORK, DEC. 6.—Before the receipt of this, you will have PICCOLOMINI in your city, and the Hartford folks, headed by your correspondent "H." will be howling with rage and envy at your good luck — for in spite of disparaging critics, Piccolomini is a treasure.

I have a theory that the opera is not a purely musical entertainment — that besides hearing the singing and orchestration, we go there to see a pretty prima donna, and to look at the dresses of the ladies in the audience, and to make witheringly satirical remarks upon the foppishness of the young men who dress a little nicer than we can afford to do, and to admire the effects of the scenery, and to laugh at the awkwardness of the chorus singers — and to get a little posted up in operative affairs, so as to be able to talk — and to do ever so many things that are but remotely connected with the music that is the ostensible attraction. And viewing it in this light, I think that when a bewitchingly beautiful little creature like Piccolomini, comes and delights us with her actions and her touching singing, and her grace and her thousand and one prettinesses — why I think that we can very well spare the execution of a Laborde or the intensity of a Gazzaniga. To be sure we might get tired of Piccolomini after a while — but then for a few weeks at a time she is perfectly enjoyable.

She sings better than the critics are willing to allow. To be sure, for a difficult chromatic passage or a high note she will substitute a pretty toss of her head, but yet she is not so wholly destitute of vocal execution as some people say. The first act of Lucrezia Borgia she sings well. But unluckily the poor little thing has a thin little voice, and all the genius in the world cannot change it. If she were only a little larger and stronger in her physical frame, and if she had a powerful voice, she would become to posterity a great traditional name, like Pasta and Malibran to us.

Gossips say she has a cherished superstition on the shoe topic. When she first appeared on the stage she wore a certain pair of slippers; and she preserved them, using them the first night of her appearance in any new place, and then placing them away until she again met a new audience. Is not that a pretty, girlish, silly superstition?

She is so good, they say, to her family, and they are all so fond of her, as they ought to be. Indeed I have noted down in my Owl-Book, (a valuable collection of axioms deduced from the result of my patriarchal experience) the following sage remark: "The mutual regard of kinsfolk, though primarily dependent upon the natural ties of consanguinity, is incredibly enhanced by the pecuniary opulence of the object of such regard, inasmuch that they who were in vulgar parlance snubbed, while in a state of pecuniary depletion, are not unfrequently the recipients of lavish affection, when the cornucopia of fortune may have been emptied into their hitherto vacant coffers." So I don't wonder that the Piccolomini tribe are devoted to Maria Pic. Why, I recall at this moment, another striking proof of the truth of my Owl Book extract. Steffanuci — of course you remember Steffanoni, — went upon the stage in direct contrariety to the wishes of her family. Her inclination for lyric triumphs was too great to be resisted and her severely proper relatives disinherited her, and said they never wanted to see her again, and did the usual heavy father business of melo-dramas. Balbina Steffanoni, they said, was no more a relative of theirs. Balbina, however, was not appalled at this domestic excommunication, but commenced her operative career, and gained fame, and what is a good deal better, money. After an extended tour in North and South America, she returned to Europe with a fortune. And lo! her family magnanimously resolved to bury the past, and to receive dear Balbina with open arms, and they did so, and their love for their only lost Balbina was like that of Jonathan for David. Does not this support the theory propounded in my Owl Book?

Mr. Piccolomini, and the Dowager Piccolomini, and Master Piccolomini, (who will one day be Clementini) and Miss Piccolomini, Junior, are visible every night at our Academy. They occupy a private proscenium box. Miss Pic. Junior is a very elegant and beautiful girl, and like her sister possesses musical talent. On the nights when Maria Piccolomini herself is not on the stage, she is in the box with her parents, and seems to take as hearty an interest in the performance as any of the audience, liberally applauding the cavatinas of Gazzaniga and Laborde. She is a charming actress, a lovely woman, and a good domestic little soul, the best of daughters and sisters — so everybody tells me that enjoys the acquaintance of herself and family.

ARTHUR NAPOLEON continues to give weekly concerts here. He is more than a prodigy. It is wonderful to hear this delicate boy playing the most difficult fantasias of Thalberg, with almost as much effect as the composer himself. How he has found time in his short life to gain such command over the instrument it is difficult to tell. His brains have not all run to his fingers either, for he is a good linguist and better informed on general topics than most boys of his age.

MR. ROBERT GOLDBECK gave a concert here a few nights ago. He is a delicate, finished player, though not as astonishing an executant as several we have had here of late. Mr. Goldbeck produced a trio of his own composition, of more than average merit. But I trust that the re-discovered "—t—" will leave the provinces and return to New York, and assist my feeble pen in reporting the classical department of music for your Journal. Mr. Goldbeck's concert was one that "—t—" would be more competent than myself, to do justice to.

The Mendelssohn Union gave a second performance of St. Paul Thursday evening. Mlle POINSSOR made her debut Saturday night in the Huguenots with great success. She is as fine an artist as Ullman has in his company.

BOSTON, DEC. 11, 1858.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Lucrezia Borgia," arranged for the piano-forte.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The second Chamber Concert fell upon not the luckiest of nights. The weather was in no sense inspiring; what with mizzling and freezing, the sidewalks were as glass, and with not a few the musical appetite was hardly up to venturing upon the glissando movement, by which, with many a fiasco, a brave minority of us reached the hall — the, soon to be no longer musical, Masonic Temple. Yet not a bad audience for such a night, and here is what they had for their reward:

PART I.—1. Quartet No. 4, in E flat. Allegro—Andante con moto—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro vivace: Mozart. 2. Air from the Lauda Sion, "Caro Cibus," Mrs. E. A. Wentworth: Mendelssohn. 3. Larghetto and Finale from the Quintet in G, op. 171, (first time): F. Ries.

PART II.—4. Adagio for Violoncello; Wulf Fries: Kummer. 5. English Song, "The green trees whispered," Poetry by Longfellow: Mrs. E. A. Wentworth. 6. Quintet, No. 2, in B flat, op. 87. (Posthumous work.) Allegro vivace—Allegretto Scherzando—Adagio—Finale, Allegro: Mendelssohn.

A programme without Beethoven! The more the pity, seeing that his chamber compositions, as well as his Symphonies, are the most interesting and inspiring of all instrumental music, and that our opportunities at the best are not over-frequent for widening and deepening our acquaintance with them. Yet, on the other hand, a programme nobly true to the name borne upon the banner of the Club, since it contains that noble Quintet one of the three or four greatest instrumental works of Mendelssohn. And what a luxury it is, always, to hear Mozart, and just that one especially among his Quartets, that perfect one in E flat, fourth of the set which he inscribed to Haydn (composed in 1784). Do you remember what his Russian commentator says about it? No? Then turn back to volume VI, page 130, of this Journal, and read it. Certainly in the Allegro and other quick movements, it is grace and spontaneity itself; consummate art, and yet the most delicious, genial, natural expression of pure music; the language of a life freely, blissfully permeating an atmosphere of music, which is world enough in itself, and needs not to be translated into, nor even to borrow a subject from this world of colder thought and speech. And of the divine reverie of the Andante con moto, Onlibieff has certainly not said too much. We love the naïve and childlike ecstacy and beauty of Mozart; but all the more after it should we have liked the depth and earnestness of Beethoven. The quartet was smoothly and beautifully played, but the Andante would have borne a little more intensity of feeling on the part of the leading violin, which left nothing else to be desired.

The movements from Ferdinand Ries, Beethoven's pupil, were, to say the least, interesting; very dramatic in their structure, with recitative and sudden turns and contrasts, and richly colored; but we should prefer to hear the entire Quintet before saying more. That grand old B flat Quintet of Mendelssohn—we say old, because it has ever been a prime favorite in the repertoire of the Quintette Club, and indeed, if we mistake not, it furnished years ago the corner stone to the foundation of the Club, and suggested its name—was most admirably played, and lacked neither fire nor fineness. How bold and animating the theme with which the Allegro opens! and with what breadth and grandeur of effect, what never disappointing growth and climax, sweeping a world of incidental beauties along with its rushing, swelling flood, it is wrought up! What a quaint air of old times, as if it were some ancient ballad, in the second movement! And the Adagio, profoundly tender and at the same time wildly imaginative,—is it not part and parcel of the same inspiration, equally rich, with the Adagio of the "Scotch" Symphony?

Mrs. WENTWORTH met warm welcome. By her tour in Europe, the past summer, she has (to say the least) lost nothing either of that silvery purity of voice, or of that purity of style, which made her admired. On the contrary, she has gained something in ease and finish. And the air from Lauda Sion was one finely suited for the exhibition of these qualities; a strain of chaste, ethereal melody. The anonymous setting of Longfellow's verses did not particularly impress us; it sounded like scores of songs which English composers are so fond of setting to Tennyson's and Longfellow's poems. Mr. FRIES displayed a rare mastery in his violoncello solo; and a still finer power in those exquisite obligato passages his instrument has in the Quintet by Mendelssohn.

"The Household Book of Poetry."

We hardly know a book—at all events no new book—which has better claims to enter every home where poetry is cherished and our English tongue is spoken, than this "Household Book," collected and edited by CHARLES A. DANA, and published by Appleton & Co., New York. It will make the most beautiful, significant and sterling of all the new Christmas and New Year's presents. Truly a splendid volume, whether we regard the outer casket, (an elegant large octavo of near 800 pages), or the imperishable jewels, happiest products of the mine of thought and feeling and imagination, it contains. The name is singularly appropriate. What is home without poetry? What house is furnished and complete, which has not all those poems, which make themselves known almost by heart, by the truth and tenderness with which they sing of all the best experiences of life, as readily at hand as any of the luxuries and comforts of the outward man? We think this is just the book that we all wanted. It is incomparably the best of all the specimen collections, or selections of English poetry yet published. It is better in its plan. It does not offer specimens, either of famous poems, or of noted poets. Literary history was not the purpose of the editor; he has not aimed to show how every poet writes, thereby including with what is good, a vast deal that is dull, that exists only in libraries, that does not live in the heart and life of to-day, and that is only interesting to those possessed of literary curiosity, or engaged in the study and appreciation of an author. He has made a live book, by collecting in one volume "whatever is truly beautiful and admirable among the minor poems of the English language." This claim, made in his preface, is perhaps over-confident. It were hardly possible that any one collection, made by whomsoever, should contain all the short poems one would like to keep near by him. But one who carefully explores these 800 pages will be astonished and charmed to find how very few of the poems which he loves are wanting, and how invariably excellent are all of the selections in their way.

The "Household Book," presents a line of poetry from Chaucer to our living English and American bards. It embraces all those cherished pieces of such length as Milton's "Comus," Chaucer's "Flower and the Leaf," Burns's "Cotter's Saturday night," Shakespeare's Sonnets (a liberal selection), Pope's "Rape of the Lock," Wordsworth's "Ode to Immortality," Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind," &c., &c., together with nearly all of those genuine little lyrics of well-known bards which humanity has taken to its heart, and a large number of those waifs of song of unknown parentage. Of course hosts of injured bards, and friends of bards, will complain that they, or their favorites, are left out. This was inevitable to the plan of such a book, which was not to do justice to the poets, but to English poetry,—and to that chiefly as it is received and as it lives in human hearts, really mingling with our vital culture.

The arrangement of the poems, too, is excellent as novel. Instead of a dry historical or personal order, they are classed under several rubrics of sentiment or sphere of life to which they belong and out of whose inspiration they have sprung. Thus we have poems of Nature, poems of Childhood, of Friendship, of Love, of Ambition, of Comedy, of Tragedy and Sorrow, of the Imagination, of Sentiment and Reflection, and of Religion: some authors of course appearing in several or all of these and some in only one. An index of authors, with date and place of birth, &c., adds to the convenience and completeness of the book.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The musical season here in Boston being suspended for a while in favor of the "tulip" exhibition at the Boston Theatre, (see manager Ullman's Tuesday's manifesto in the daily papers), we gather our material this week chiefly from abroad. The intelligent music-lover will not be deterred from reading the account of the Middle-Rhine Festival, and the criticism from Vienna upon Richard Wagner's opera, by their length or the remoteness of the subjects. Both contain musical criticism of value. The remarks in the former about the modern trick of playing everything too fast, are truly to the point, while our readers will be interested if not altogether pleased with its reference to one of our whilome vocal favorites, CAROLINE LEHMANN. The criticism upon WAGNER strikes us as eminently fair and just, recognizing the real talent of the musician, but pointing out the fallacy of his system. At all events, its reasonings are worth considering by those who are impatient for a revolution in the forms of music. . . . Mr. J. J. CLARKE continues his discussion of the alleged characteristic expression of the Keys in music; it strikes us that he has got hold of something worth considering, although he is not altogether clear and fortunate in the expression of it; our only criticism would be, that he tries the case entirely in the literal court of mathematics, when perhaps it does not altogether belong there. . . . Herr FORMES writes well about Leporello. . . . The tribute, by a lady and a pupil, to the late JOHN LANGE, is appreciative and discriminating; Mr. Lange, it will be remembered, played the piano part, and like an artist too, in the first classical Chamber Concerts ever instituted in this city (under the direction of the Harvard Musical Association). . . . Read our "A. W. T.'s three or four last letters from Berlin, if you would know what can be called "a musical city." There opera goes on in several places every night, yet interferes not in the least with Symphonies, Quartets, Oratorios, and regular concerts by all sorts of societies. You can have your choice any night between several Symphonies, several Chamber Concerts, or several Operas, as you can in New York or Boston between several theatres or minor shows. When will that good time come for any of our cities? When shall we have Opera as a regular, wholesome institution, instead of the consuming fever of a few weeks that it now is, fatal to all other music, such as one may enjoy quietly?

The opera-opening at the Boston Theatre was changed to Thursday night; we go to press by that time, and cannot therefore say how we like the PICCOLOMINI. This afternoon she sings in La Fille de Regiment, and Mme. LABORDE, one of the most finished of florid vocalists, will follow in the first act of Norma. . . . If there are no concerts, there is plenty of good music to be bought in a more permanent form, destined to give the sweetest kind of musical enjoyment in many a home circle. And in this gift-giving season what can be a more appropriate memento to a musical friend, than a beautiful edition of some noble oratorio or opera; or a complete set of the Sonatas of some master, like Beethoven or Mozart, or the "Songs without Words" of Mendelssohn; or Thalberg's "Art du chant;" or for the earnest student, who would go to the bottom of what is most artistic in the divine art, the "Well-tempered Clavichord" (48 Preludes and Fugues) of old Sebastian Bach, all of which good things, with many others, Messrs. DITSON & Co. have published in the finest style, and will be happy to furnish at most reasonable prices. See their advertisement of Christmas presents.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP has arrived in London and announces a grand concert in Exeter Hall for the 13th of next month. It will be her first appearance for a number of years before an English public, and it is said that she is in full possession of her powers. . . . The STRAKOSCH company performed Don Giovanni at the Philadelphia Academy last Monday week, with GAZZANIGA as Donna Anna, COLSON as Zerlina, PATTI-STRAKOSCH as Elvira, AMODIO the big in the small part of Masetto, and the two BARILIS to give a faint impression of the Don and Leporello. The season closed on Tuesday night with the "gem acts" of Favorita, Puritani, Martha, and Il Trovatore: the four prime donne, Mmes. Colson, de Wilhorst, Strakosch, and Gazzaniga, with the rest of the singers, making their adieux. BRIGNOLI is announced to sing with Ullman's troupe in Boston. . . . Several new books of the fine pianoforte Studies of STEPHEN HELLER have lately been published in London, under the absurd publishers' title of "Ecole essentielle des Pianistes—études progressives, pour servir d'introduction aux ouvrages des grands maîtres." Books 12, 13, 14, and 15, op. 90." To which title—not to the of course interesting compositions—a critic raises two good objections; to wit; "The Studies of M. Stephen Heller, agreeable as they are to practice, by no means form an essential school, for pianists; nor do they contain everything that, properly speaking, can serve as 'introduction to the works of the great masters.' It is quite enough to insist that they are in themselves charming, that they rank among the most original contributions to the pianoforte which the present not very prolific age can boast, &c."

PICCOLOMINI. Now that the machinery of clat has been exhausted—writes a New York correspondent, in regard to this fascinating little cantatrice—you may wish to know to what conclusion the judicious have settled down. It is briefly this,—that Pic. is a capital rustic coquette and does the sancy, the wheeling and the hoydenish most cleverly; that she pouts and uses her arms with effect,—but that her rôle is very limited, that her voice lacks power, and that she is very like a canary-bird in action, trill, pettishness and prettiness—a sweet, taking, shrewd, capricious, graceful little woman, but no prima donna assoluta.

Music Abroad.

PARIS. At the Grand Opera it is proposed to revive one of the operas of Gluck — either Iphigenia in Tauris, or Alceste, or Armida. A new opera by Felicien David, "The Last Day of Herclaneum," is in rehearsal; it contains a "Hymn to Venus" which is said to be very beautiful.

At the Théâtre Lyrique a two-act comic opera, Broskavano, by Louis Deffès, has been produced for the first time, and with great success. The music is said to be "full of grace and freshness, abounding in charming melodies, while the instrumentation shows the hand of a master."

All the important singing societies in France are to combine in a great festival to be held in Paris, next March, 3500 singers have already signified their intention to take part in it. Prizes are to be distributed.

The rehearsals of Meyerbeer's new opera in three acts have already commenced at the Opera Comique. The principal characters are entrusted to Mme Cabel, M. Faure, and M. St. Foix. — A grand opera by M. Lebean, the author of Esmeralda, will be produced in January at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. It is entitled Le Sanglier des Ardennes; the libretto, taken from Sir Walter Scott, is by the brother of the composer.

The Emperor has resolved to build a new opera house. A year ago, when the pretty Hotel d' Osmond, opposite the Rue de la Paix, was pulled down, a report that the new opera house was to be built on the site was indignantly denied by authority. Nevertheless, there was much foundation for the report, and the scheme for establishing the new opera there is even yet on the tapis. A rival project is, however, under consideration for building an opera house on the south side of the Place de la Concorde, which would harmonize in point of architecture with the Ministry of Marine on the opposite side. Such a building would spoil the fine view of the river and the quays from the place de la Concorde and the Champs Elysées, and would be otherwise an eye-sore, beside being an encroachment on a principal public promenade. Wherever the house may ultimately be, it will, I believe, be made to hold a much larger audience than the present one. The house in the Rue Lepelletier will scarcely hold more than 7,000f., and it is proposed, with a slight rise in prices, to bring the nightly receipts up to 15,000f. The architect has an ingenious plan for warming the lobbies, so as to prevent ladies from taking cold whilst waiting for their carriages; and it is intended to insist upon evening dress for gentlemen, as is done, or at least supposed to be done, in London.

The event of last week at the Italian Opera was the reproduction of Il Barbiere, with Mario and Alboni, Corsi, Zucchini, and Angelini. Mario is congratulated on the admirable condition of his voice. "Repulse at his villa near Florence has done wonders," says a letter from Paris, "if we may judge from his admirable singing the other night. All the rare and charming qualities of his voice were displayed with that natural perception of how to use it, which belongs, one often thinks, to the inspiration of the moment rather than premeditated study."

BRUNSWICK. The Maenner-Gesang-Verein, under the direction of Herr Abt, and aided by the principal singers of the court theatre, gave lately a vocal concert, the proceeds of which are to form a fund for compensating the composers, whose songs are admitted into their repertoire.

RIO JANEIRO. All the organs of the Brazilian capital speak of the great success of Mme. de La-grange. She first excited great enthusiasm by a concert; which reached the highest pitch when she sang Norma and Rosina in the theatre. Prices rose to more than double the usual rates.

TRIESTE.—Mr. Lumley's popular tenor, Giuglini, has been creating a furor. Previous to his arrival the opera had been twice reduced to the brink of ruin. Signor Giuglini brought back its prestige in one night, and gave the direction a new vitality. The public have been in raptures with the great tenor's Edgardo in Lucia, Fernando in La Favorita, Manrico in Il Trovatore and Arturo in I Puritani. Some of the local journals state that the terms he received are altogether unprecedented.

MUNICH.—King Maximilian of Bavaria intends to erect a monument to Wolfram von Eschenbach, the Minnesänger, and author of the epic poem of Parzival. The sculptor, Herr C. Knoll, has been intrusted with the modelling of the life-size statue; and we hear that he has nearly finished his task. Leaning with the left hand on his sword, the harp in his right, and the helmet surrounded by a laurel-wreath, the poet steps forth, as it were, to meet us. In his noble face, gentleness and dignity, it is said, are happily combined. The statue is to form the central ornament of a fountain at the birth-place of the poet, the little town of Eschenbach, in Franconia.

LUGANO.—The correspondent of the Cosmorama Pittorico writes in enthusiastic terms of a new tenor who appeared a short time since at the Lugano theatre in a petite opera, entitled Il Pipolet, the music by the maestro De Ferrari. After speaking of the prima donna, Signora Benvenuti, and the buffo, Signor Carlo Rocca, in terms by no means eulogistic, the writer continues: "But that which above all produced the greatest impression and created the greatest astonishment was the young tenor, Signor Giovanni Romano, pupil of Signor Prati. Handsome in person and gifted with a powerful and extensive voice, he sings with intense feeling and animation, and absolutely rose superior to the scene. He sang the aria in the prison with so much suavity in the adagio and so much energy in the cabaletta, as to create a real furor." The writer goes on to state, that Signor Romano achieved a triumphant success at the fall of the curtain; that Roberto Devereux is to be produced for him; and that the public await with curiosity and great interest the first night of the performance.—Query? is not Signor Giovanni Romano identical with Mr. Cavallani, a promising tenor, some time since pupil of the Royal Academy of Music?—London Musical World.

LONDON. English Opera, by the PYNE and HARRISON troupe, who sing "Maritana," "Rose of Castille," "Crown Diamonds," &c., is all the music we see noticed, except JULIEN's grand farewell concerts on the eve of his starting off upon his universal tour to convert the world. His old friend Mr. Punch seems to feel badly at parting with the Mons., and thus gives utterance to his "pheelinx:"

ODE TO M. JULIEN.

And must you leave us, Julien? Must we wander,
Through life's hard pathway tuneless and alone
Whilst you are gone your magic notes to squander Midst savages in regions little known?

What shall we have to cheer us when November,
Oppresses us with fogs and spleen and gloom,
Whilst you are playing tunes we well remember
On Timbuctoo's inhospitable shore?

Sure we shall cut most melancholy figures
When in your concert-room in far Penang,
Fair Jetty Treffz is singing to the niggers
The songs that once in Drury lane she sang.

And will you go as far as Madagascar,
And take the Trovatore even there;
And will each pigtailed Chinaman and Lascar,
Think you, for Verdi's Miserere care?

And do you think the notes of great Beethoven
Will feast the soul of greasy Quashyboo?
Take care he doesn't pop you in an oven,
And make another kind of feast of you.

Why have you taken up these strange vagaries
Of wandering off to foreign parts abroad;
Of visiting Azores and Canaries,
And leaving us by whom you are adored?

If, as we hope, your scheme is only puffing,
Be warned, dear Mons. your Punch sincerely begs,
By him who over-greedy for the stuffing,
Destroyed the goose that laid the golden eggs.

As a specimen of the Julien concerts we give one report from the Musical Gazette (Nov. 13.):

We were almost afraid the Trovatore selection was to last forever; the performances, however, at the Lyceum have been agreeably varied during the past week by a selection from the opera of Der Freischütz, which was produced on Monday evening last, and was highly successful. It is, in truth, very effective, and displays considerable judgement in the arrangement of the various solos; and the introduction of the "Huntsman's Chorus," capitolly sung by Mr. Land's choir, makes an excellent finale to it. The selection commences with the entire overture, and includes Rodolph's song "Thro' the forest," "Softly sighs," Caspar's Drinking Song, the Waltz, and Hunting Chorus. The solos are finely played by Messrs. Praten (flute), Duham (cornet), and Hughes (ophicleide). The houses have been well attended throughout the week.

For Monday, Nov. 15, M. Julien has announced a "Mendelssohn night," with Miss Arabella Goddard as solo pianist.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Instrumental Music.

Skating Polka.

50

A spirited piece of dance-music, easy of performance. The title-page has a vignette, executed in colors, representing a group of skaters in full enjoyment of this delightful winter-sport.

Papageno Polka.

Ludwig Stasny. 25

Most of the visitors of the afternoon concerts last summer, and many of the last season's guests at Newport will recollect this charming Polka on airs in the "Magic Flute," introducing especially those performed by Papageno on Bells and Fifes. It will become a great favorite with piano players.

Muscantine Light Guards Grand March. Atkins. 50

A pleasing march, with a military frontispiece, drawn true to life, and printed in colors.

Wanderer, by Schubert. Transc. by Franz Liszt. 35

This is a celebrated arrangement of Schubert's favorite song. It is superior to every other arrangement, but, like most of Liszt's pieces, it demands a smart player.

Souvenir de l'Amérique. Mazurka. Schulhoff. 30

A very pretty, coquettish Mazurka of medium difficulty in the key of D, Schulhoff's 18th work, which has hitherto been comparatively unknown in this country.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

SONGS AND BALLADS. W. R. Dempster.

Dempster holds a distinguished position among the song-composers of America. His claims for the first place are eminently paramount to those of all other parties. In looking over his numerous works one cannot fail to notice the delicate taste and refined mind which display themselves in the selection of the text, which is invariably made from among the choicest poems of modern authors. A composer who is inspired by that which is truly beautiful in poetry deserves our considerations, even if his labors should but furnish a dress of inferior value to the refined gold of the original. But Dempster has done much more. It is well known that it was Dempster's genius which has contributed largely to the popularity of Tennyson's beautiful ballad of the "May Queen"; and likewise portrayed in tones of striking fidelity the pater and clatter of the rain, so ably pictured in Longfellow's characteristic stanzas on the "Rainy Day," thus carrying out the intentions of the poet. None who have listened to the song of "The Blind Boy" will ever forget its touching simplicity and beauty, and many a one will recall both melody and sentiment of "I'm alone" and numerous other of Dempster's songs and ballads. Dempster's compositions are popular, but in no degree partake of that odious popularity which is fostered into quick bloom by the exertions of wandering minstrels, and brought to an early end by the doleful screechings of street organs. They are addressed to minds of a well cultivated musical taste, and deserve unlimited recommendation as the most pure and refined fruits of American musical literature.

A List of Dempster's Songs will be found elsewhere in the present number.

LANLACHE'S COMPLETE METHOD OF SINGING.

With examples for illustration and progressive vocalizing exercises. By Louis Lablache. Translated from the French, and improved from all former issues, by the addition of new Exercises for Sustaining the Voice and an engraving representing all the parts of the month and throat brought into action in the cultivation and development of the human voice. Complete, $2.50. Abridged, $1.50. For Bass voice, 3.00

This is a very clear, philosophical and comprehensive analysis of the true method of developing and forming the voice, and rendering it flexible. It begins at the beginning, describing the organs of voice, giving explicit directions how to produce and vary the vocal sounds, and how to cultivate the powers till the matchless instrument has attained its full excellence.

The Story of Don Juan.

(From the Brown Papers.)

A great many years ago, in those days when nobles were looked upon by the common people as almost of a higher order of beings, and the nobles looked down upon the common people as born to do them service, and created but for their amusement and pleasure; when the power of Spain was felt all over Europe, and the Spanish nobleman was as much at home on the banks of the Danube or the Rhine as upon the Tagus or Guadalquivir; when simple cavaliers were as wealthy as princes now, and it was a point of honor to cultivate themselves mentally in all the learning of the time, and physically in all the exercises of chivalry and knighthood; when, however, the deepest darkness and bigotry ruled in the religious world, and people believed in the actual appearance of devils and spirits of hell to carry off to their doom extraordinary sinners—in those days lived a Spanish nobleman called Don Juan. He was distinguished not more for his wealth, and intellectual and physical culture, than for his personal beauty, fascination of manners, nobleness of mien, and for an undaunted courage, which never quailed, let what would oppose him in the prosecution of his designs. Morally this splendid hero was a monster, the whole aim and object of whose existence was to employ all the means of fascination with which he was so lavishly endowed, in the destruction of female innocence, and in the satisfaction of his depraved and lascivious appetites. He had travelled in Italy, France, and Germany, as well as throughout his native Spain, and wherever he had been he had left victims to weep over their folly in trusting his smooth words and confiding in his honor.

In all his travels and intrigues, Don Juan had one confidant and inseparable companion, his servant, Leporello—a cowardly, cunning, humorous, droll knave, who seems to have been born but to serve his master, and who, faithless and a rascal to all the world beside, followed the Don like a faithful hound, ever ready to do his bidding, and executing his commands, when too much courage was not involved, with an alacrity that showed how congenial such a service was to his depraved nature. He was in fact so proud of his master's success in destroying female innocence, as to have kept a regular register of all whom he had ruined—a sort of album in which, as he himself said, were to be found

High-born dame and chambermaid,

High and low, and all degrees,
Country girls and duchesses,
Countesses and marchionesses,
City madams and princesses,
Every size and every shape, etc.

With the previous history of Don Juan we have nothing to do farther than was necessary to give an idea of his character, and prepare us for the close of his dissolute career. It is the circumstances attending this which form the subject of our tale, or rather opera.

In the same city where Don Juan dwelt, lived a noble lady of severe and dignified beauty, whose lofty mind had been cultivated with the utmost care, and whose accomplishment in all that was womanly rendered her peerless among women as was Don Juan among men. Morally she was, however, the highest possible contrast to him—as reserved and severe in virtue as he was abandoned. Her father was commander or general of an order of knighthood, and a man venerable for his years and virtues. She had been wooed and won by Don Ottavio, a rich and noble knight, and Donna Anna was now looking forward impatiently to the day of her marriage, when Don Juan in an evil hour cast his lascivious eye upon her. The attempt to undermine her virtue was one which he instinctively felt would be fruitless, and he determined to try some other means. Late one evening, taking Leporello with him, he made his way secretly into the garden of the palace, where, leaving him to watch, he entered the dwelling of Donna Anna, which was distinct from the official palace, in which at the time her father was engaged. He found the Donna alone, sitting in the darkness, and thinking of her lover. Partially concealing his face in his cloak, he drew near her; she, never dreaming that a stranger could find entrance into the garden, supposed him to be Ottavio. In a few moments she was undeceived, and, shocked and outraged by the insult, she seized and held him with almost superhuman strength, at the same time crying for help. The Don, startled by such an unexpected resistance, struggled to free himself from her, and make his escape without being recognized. Though he by his superior strength made his way again into the garden, the necessity of keeping his face concealed—a face so well known in the city that even he dared not brave the consequences, should this insult to Donna Anna, her lover, and her family become known—prevented him escaping from her grasp. All the woman was aroused, and the strength of a man imbued her muscles. Her cries in the garden were heard in the palace, and her aged father, drawing his sword, rushed to her aid. Loosing her hold, Donna Anna ran to the room of her lover to hasten him to the spot, and take vengeance upon the outrager of their mutual honor.

This was the moment for Don Juan to escape, but for the wrath of the venerable commander. He saw in an instant the danger of his situation. If he dropped his cloak to defend himself, he would be recognized; if he tried to escape, still retaining his disguise, the old man's sword was drawn to prevent him; in open conflict the old man would be but a child in his hands; he could with the utmost ease defend himself and escape without injuring him; but this involved making himself known. He threatened in vain. The Commander, jealous of his honor, attacked him, and Don Juan was at last compelled to drop his cloak and draw in defence. Having shown his face, the preservation of his secret involved the necessity of murder, and his sword in an instant pierced the old man's heart. He fell. His assassin waited a moment to be sure that life was extinct, placed his hand upon the faintly-beating pulse and heart, and finding that he could never be betrayed by that poor old father, made his escape from the garden just before Donna Anna and Don Ottavio rushed in from the door of the palace—she to find her father dead, he to see his beloved and betrothed thus suddenly and cruelly overwhelmed with sorrow. For a time her grief was inconsiderable, and the tenderest expressions of love seeking to comfort her seemed but cold and cruel. He besought her to hear him, her affianced, and promised to be father, husband, and all to her. After the first emotions had subsided, Donna Anna arose from the body upon which she had thrown herself, and turning to her lover, made him swear never to rest until he had sought out the murderer and avenged his victim. There was as yet no suspicion that he who had so tragically interrupted their happiness, and the polished, courtly, noble Don Juan were one and the same person.

Time passed away. The commander was entombed, and a noble equestrian statue in marble was erected to his memory. The efforts of Don Ottavio had been unavailing to discover the murderer, and a settled sorrow filled the bosom of Donna Anna. In the mean time Don Juan and his servant had pursued their old way of life, but the murder of Don Pedro seems to have rendered them both at times a little uneasy; for upon a certain occasion, some months after that adventure, the Don, seeing an expression of uneasiness upon the face of Leporello, inquired what it was that troubled him? The knave, after much hesitation, and after extorting a promise from his master not to fly into a passion—in case Don Pedro was not mentioned—finally confessed that even he was becoming shocked at the life they led, and began to lecture the Don upon his dissolute conduct. A significant touch of the sword, however, soon put an end to the sermon of Leporello, and the sincerity of these, his better feelings, was immediately shown. The conversation took place in a by-street, and the master followed up his threat by informing the servant that he had another love adventure in view there. This changed the whole current of Leporello's feelings, and he forgot his lecture in his desire to get the lady's name to add to his list.

But the end of Don Juan's career is approaching. Henceforth his designs upon the innocent are baffled. Each new attempt but adds to the number of such as seek vengeance upon him. But though the number of his enemies increases, his shrewdness and daring courage are sufficient to render their efforts fruitless. One old Spanish history of the Don represents him as having made a compact with the evil one, by which he was made safe from all human enemies. But this idea is hardly necessary in the progress of the story and its final catastrophe. The idea, which both Da Ponte and Mozart seem to have had, is that of wickedness triumphant over all human power, but doomed the moment the crime of blood was added to that of ruined innocence. This doom, in spite of all the jesting and comicality which follow—in spite of the boundless animal spirits and good humor of the Don, we feel impends from the moment the commander falls; though why we feel this I know not, unless it be intimated to us in the wonderful strains of Mozart.

We left the Don and his servant in a by-street, whither he had come bent upon adding a new victim to Leporello's list. Their conversation was interrupted by the approach of a woman, whom the Don pronounced at once young and handsome, and stepping aside they overheard her in soliloquy mourning the loss of honor and the baseness of her deceiver. Don Juan, struck with her appearance, suddenly approached her with pretended offers of friendship, when she, turning to him, removed her veil, striking him dumb as he saw the face of Donna Elvira, a lady whom in a distant city he had ruined; but who, taking a servant-girl alone with her, had followed him hither in the hope of recovering the love which she foolishly believed he had once really felt for her.

To her upbraidings Juan replied in the kindest tones, and offered to explain satisfactorily his desertion, or if she doubted his word he referred her to Leporello, whom she might certainly trust. She had hardly turned to the servant, when the Don, taking advantage of the darkness, hastened away. The only explanation Leporello could give her was that his master was an abandoned roué, and that as he had served her, so had he served the vast number of women of all grades and classes, whose names and miniatures he had in the book which he produced and showed to her. This insult stung poor Elvira to madness—her love was turned to hate, and she vowed revenge.

Don Juan, upon leaving her, went out of the city to his palace, on his way thither being joined again by Leporello. As they approached, they found the villagers assembled, making merry and dancing before the village inn, which lay not far from the gates of the palace, and upon inquiry learned that the festival was in honor of the pretty village maiden, Zerlina, who was to be married to a peasant named Masetto. The Don was at once struck by the beauty and artless simplicity of Zerlina, and determined to make her his victim. He at once approached her, asked her name, the name of her bridegroom, and offered her, as lord of the manor, his protection. To clear the way for the success of his scheme, he invited all to enter his palace and gardens, and ordered Leporello to show them all hospitality, with a hint to him not to lose sight for a moment of Masetto. With some difficulty the bridegroom was forced away from Zerlina, and into the palace, leaving the simple girl alone with her destroyer. Don Juan began with flattering speeches, assuring her that Masetto was no suitable husband for one like her, and succeeded at length, by offers of his own hand, and promises to make her mistress of his chateau, to get her in an evil moment to consent to desert her lover, and unite her fate to his.

His triumph, however, was but short. Leporello had hardly left Elvira, after his edifying discourse to her upon his master's character, when she suddenly, moved either by a return of tender feeling or by rage, determined also to go out to Don Juan's country residence, and fortunately for poor Zerlina, she arrived before the little inn just at the moment when the simple girl, overcome by the fascinations of the cavalier, and the prospect of exchanging a cottage for a palace, gave her consent to follow her betrayer. Elvira hastened at once to rescue her. She declared the true character of the Don, who in reply could only assure Zerlina that she, Elvira, was an insane girl in love with him. Elvira, however, prevailed, and Zerlina hastened to join Masetto, Elvira following her to relate what had happened.

Don Juan had hardly time to recover himself before a new interruption to his schemes, and not a very pleasant one, occurred.

The ill-success which had attended the efforts of Don Ottavio to discover the murderer of Don Pedro, had led him and Donna Anna to seek assistance, and to whom should they apply, if not to the noble and brilliant cavalier, Don Juan? With this object in view, they went out of the city to his palace, and had already reached the village-green, when in the midst of his efforts to cheer his companion, he suddenly beheld the very person they sought. Donna Anna instantly appealed to him as a knight for his assistance in her distress. He perceived that she had no suspicion of him as the guilty one, and replied by profuse offers of service, and went on to ask her the cause of her grief and distress. He might perhaps have succeeded in his hypocrisy, had not his ill-fortune—which, as he complained, made every thing that day go wrong—brought a fourth person into the interview. This was Donna Elvira, who, as Leporello afterward related, came in with Zerlina in the midst of the festivity, when some were half-intoxicated, and all given up to the influence of the hour, and related all that had passed, and excited the peasants to vengeance. Leporello had waited until she had nearly exhausted herself in her denunciations, and then artfully contrived to lead her out of the garden-gate, where he shut the door and locked it upon her. At this moment she came upon the Don in conversation with his visitors, and instantly informed them as to his true character. Donna Anna was greatly struck with the appearance of the stranger, and could hardly believe Don Juan's protestations, that she was disordered in her mind. Each word spoken by them only bewildered her the more; but when the Don became angry, and forced Elvira away, something appeared in his words, the tones of his voice, and his manner, which shed a horrible light into her mind, and showed her in the person of the polished cavalier, him who had attempted her own honor, and followed up the insult by the murder of her father. As soon as the Don left them, her horror and detestation of the monster found words, and now for the first time she made known to her lover his entry into her apartments, the attempt upon her which led to the murder. Some proof beyond the mere conviction of Donna Anna, however, was necessary before Don Ottavio could charge the rich and high-born Don Juan with crimes so despicable as well as revolting—crimes which touched his honor as a Spanish noble so nearly. The truth of Donna Elvira's words seemed now made manifest, and they determined to seek her out, and devise some plan of unmasking the Don, and bringing him to punishment.

Day was already waning when Leporello came out to seek his master. Things had not gone to suit him in the chateau, and the old idea of leaving his service had come up again. He found his master in high spirits at his supposed success in preventing Elvira from working his ruin, and in this frame of mind Leporello's lugubrious account of his treatment of the peasant, especially of Masetto, and of the appearance of Elvira with Zerlina, was but a subject of laughter for him. The thought of so many pretty village maidens in his palace at that moment somewhat consoled him for the disappointments he had met with during this unlucky day, and he determined upon the impulse of the moment to detain the company until night, and put all thoughts of leaving him out of Leporello's head, by sending him to prepare for a grand supper and ball.

Savage with jealousy and anger, Masetto had left the company and gone out into the garden. Here poor little Zerlina, now thoroughly repentant of her momentary folly, sought him out, and endeavored to win from him a smile of reconciliation. At first the young husband would hear no excuse, and upbraided her with leaving him, a man of such consequence, allured by the arts of a villain. She begged forgiveness, assured him that the Don had not touched her with the tip of his finger, and finally entreated him to punish her in any manner he pleased—beat her, kill her, only forgive. Such tender entreaty was too much for him, and peace was made. At this moment the voice of the Don was heard in the garden giving orders to the servants. Zerlina, overcome with fear, entreated Masetto to fly with her, but he misinterpreting her agitation, ordered her to remain and meet the Don, while he secreted himself in an arbor. Don Juan, delighted at finding Zerlina again, and alone, upon his entrance with a band of peasants, who passed into the banquet, called her from a hiding-place which she had vainly sought among the trees, and seizing her by the hand, drew her towards the arbor. Though baffled by meeting there Masetto, the last person he expected to see, he concealed his disappointment, and shielded Zerlina by placing her hand in that of her lover, and inviting him in to dance with the rest. Masetto was easily persuaded. Perhaps he hoped that he and his friends might be able to punish the Don for the insult he had suffered at his hands; if so, he was mistaken, for Don Juan had assembled several persons of rank, and the peasantry found themselves powerless to carry out any such project, if indeed they had formed it.

In the mean time, Don Ottavio, Donna Anna, and Elvira had determined to be present at the banquet, which they could easily do without being known, by joining the masks. As they approached the chateau, the Don saw them from the window, and ordered Leporello to invite them in, little dreaming who were concealed behind the dominoes—an invitation of course willingly accepted, notwithstanding the anxiety and forebodings of Donna Anna.

The grand saloon presented a splendid spectacle. Three bands of musicians were stationed in the three several divisions of the saloon, each playing music appropriate to the movements of the different ranks of the guests. In the front apartment the nobility and friends of the Don, engaged in the stately minuet, in those days the mode among the high-born. In the next the guests of the rank of citizens moved more lively in the mazes of the contra-dance; while, still beyond, the peasants whirled, intoxicated with the fire of the giddy waltz. Coffee, chocolate, and sherbet were handed about to the guests of distinction, while more fiery liquids were distributed among the peasants and the village maidens.

Don Ottavio and his companions did not join the dance; but sitting apart, they followed with jealous eyes every movement of the Don. They saw his renewed attentions to Zerlina. They noted the efforts of Leporello to draw Masetto away from her. Don Juan at length claimed her hand in a dance—a request which she could not refuse. There was a small apartment opening out from the saloon, towards the door of which the Don gradually brought his partner in the progress of the dance; and at a moment when Masetto had been carried away to a distance by Leporello, and when he thought no one was observing, by a sudden movement he forced her in, Leporello rushing thither to stand by his master. But Zerlina was no longer a willing victim. Her scream rang through the saloon high above the sounds of music and the shuffling of feet. All was confusion. The guests in the front saloon, save Don Ottavio and his companions, knew not what to think. Not so Masetto and the peasants. They had been forbidden by Elvira, and were prepared with sticks and clubs. To seize these and burst open the door was the work of a moment. Zerlina was rescued, and Don Juan was forced to confront his enraged guests. For a moment, he endeavored to turn their suspicions upon Leporello, and drew his sword, as if to punish him for his audacity; but Don Ottavio, to whom now the guilt of Juan was clear, assured him that this was too shallow a device. Unmasking themselves, Don Juan saw before him those very persons whom of all men he had most reason to fear. The guests of his own rank who were present, with the instinct of caste, drew their swords and protected him from the assaults of the peasants, while Don Ottavio made known his crimes and infamy. For a moment, his bold spirit quailed; but recovering himself, he gave Leporello a secret charge. Keeping his assailants at bay, and braving the scorn and indignation which were heaped upon him from all sides, he stood his ground until his servant returned and secretly conveyed a pair of loaded pistols into his master's hand. Whether Don Ottavio, with the aid of the cavaliers then present would have inflicted deserved punishment on the spot, is not clear. If this was the intention, it was defeated by Don Juan, who suddenly dropped his sword, and forgetting all the dictates of chivalry, fired his pistols among his guests, and in the consequent confusion rushed through the crowd and escaped.

[Conclusion next week.]

Conference on Singing in Schools.

(From the London Musical Gazette, Oct. 30.)

The conference, called together by the Tonic Sol-fa Association, was very well attended, the lecture theatre of the Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate street, being crowded. Not less than six hundred persons could have been present, comprising the teachers of many of the training colleges and schools of London and its vicinity.

Mr. Curwen, the president of the association, explained the object of the conference to be the promotion and diffusion of singing in schools. He believed that, however various the methods employed, there would be no difference of opinion as to the importance of the end in view. In order to promote free discussion, teachers generally had been invited, regardless of denominational distinction. He ended by proposing Mr. Hickson, whom he called the "Father of School-music in England," as chairman. The motion having been seconded, and carried by acclamation, Mr. W. E. Hickson, of Fairseat, Kent, took the chair.

To facilitate the business of the meeting a series of four resolutions had been previously prepared, and were now submitted to the meeting. The first of these, referring to the fitness of vocal music to promote the healthy development of the organs of voice, and to supply a brief recreation in the course of school studies, was moved by Mr. White, of Spitalfields, who observed that he had during the last twenty years tried four or five systems, and now, in the Tonic Sol-fa, was glad to say he had got hold of one which answered his purpose.

Mr. Crampton, in a very sensible speech, moved the second resolution, affirming that an important advantage to be derived from singing in schools was the fixing just sentiments on the memory, by the combination of good poetry with good music. He observed that he was glad the notion was losing ground that children should sing nothing but hymns. He thought there was little danger that in avoiding the Scylla of excessive religious singing they would fall into the Charybdis of excessive secular singing. He wished to see a good ballad literature for boys. They could not always be singing moral essays, or such words as "Deeper, deeper, let us delve," the delving being carried on in the mines of knowledge. (Laughter.) Songs for boys, similar to nursery rhymes for infants, were at present a great desideratum.

In order to show his idea of a combination of good poetry with good music, Mr. Crampton exhibited a small volume of school songs which he had published. He was not alone, however, in taking advantage of this cheap method of advertising.

The third resolution was moved by Mr. Langton, of the Model Schools, Borough-road. It referred merely to the attainments that (irrespective of any particular system) should be required from all students leaving training colleges.

These three resolutions having been respectively seconded by Messrs. Curwen, Daintree (of Highbury College), and Murby (of the Normal College, Borough-road), were put to the meeting and unanimously carried. Our readers will perceive from the nature of these resolutions that little opportunity was given to would-be disputants, though ample latitude for speech-makers. Thus it was fully half-past nine before Mr. Tilleard (of the Council-office) proposed the fourth resolution, which was the real question of the evening, being upon the method best calculated to produce the desired end. He observed, that in every method that was scientifically truthful there must be a recognition of the fundamental truth, that all major scales are formed upon the same type. Any system which took scale after scale and repeated the same course of training on each was erroneous, and entirely opposed to the Pestalozzian principle, that every successive step should be in reality a generalization. Mr. Tilleard was proceeding still further when Mr. Curwen proposed the adjournment of the meeting till that day fortnight. The motion, being put, was carried by a considerable majority, and the meeting was about to separate, when Mr. G. W. Martin (conductor of the National School Choral Festival) rose and said he could not let that meeting carry away with them the idea that he had been tacitly consenting to what had been said in favor of the Tonic Sol-fa system. As he could not possibly attend the adjourned meeting, he wished to say a few words then. He disapproved of the Tonic Sol-fa notation. They must in time come to the old notation. (Cries of "No, no!") In fact, he understood Mr. Curwen to say that he regarded the new notation as an introduction to the old. (Hear, hear!" from Mr. Curwen.) He (Mr. Martin) maintained that the former was not so easy as the latter. Syllables were not intended originally as methods of distinguishing sounds, and the adoption of them for that purpose only created confusion. Sounds were represented simply by lines and spaces, not by notes. He then gave a practical illustration of this, by getting the audience to sing an octave, which he pointed out, using one of his hands as a staff. He concluded by strongly recommending the old notation.

After thanks had been voted to the chairman, the conference adjourned.

We had forgotten to state that between the second and third resolutions a dozen boys and girls (instructed on the Tonic Sol-fa system), assisted by two or three gentlemen, sang one or two pieces for the amusement of the audience.

The performance, however, was far from being good. The Mountain Boys' Song, of which they only sang one verse, commenced on F and ended on E flat. We are glad to see that in some of their later publications the Tonic Sol-fa Association are rendering tardy justice to Miss Glover, of whose system theirs is but a modification.

This conference reassembled on Wednesday evening, Nov. 3d, at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, 165 Aldersgate street. The attendance was very similar to that on the previous occasion. Mr. Hickson again took the chair. Before the discussion was resumed, a class, consisting of about thirty boys and girls, was subjected to tests of sight-singing from the tonic sol-fa modulator, in addition to which Mr. J. T. Tilleard wrote, on a blackboard, an easy tune in B natural, modulating into F sharp, which they sang very satisfactorily. The chairman then opened the business of the evening by reminding the conference that the adjournment had taken place upon the discussion of the fourth resolution, viz.:

"That, in the opinion of this conference, all methods which aim at usefulness in schools should possess the following qualifications:

"They should be scientifically truthful. They should be progressive: always proceeding from the less to the more difficult,—introducing new topics in such a manner as to sustain a freshness of interest,— and enabling the teacher to take one truth at a time, and to assist his pupils in discovering it. The lessons and exercises should be in themselves attractive; such as will, for their own sake, be loved and remembered by a child. Such methods should also be easy to teach,—making small demands upon either the physical powers of the teacher or the invaluable time of the schools."

Mr. Tilleard then renewed the debate by restating upon what principles, in his opinion, the teaching of music should be conducted. There should be a well-known and recognized terminology, and one universal musical language or notation; so that musical persons of the most opposite systems might thoroughly understand each other on musical subjects. The resolution, having been seconded by Mr. Myers, was put to the meeting and carried unanimously. Mr. Curwen then (having previously stated his intention) moved the following series of resolutions:

"1. That, in accordance with the opinions just approved by the conference, no system of teaching to sing can be a good one which does not accustom its pupils to measure intervals from the tonic or key-note. Hence the failure of Mr. Hullah's method.

"2. That the chief difficulty of carrying out this tonic principle arises from the frequency of modulation, or change of key, in the higher styles of music; that this difficulty appears almost insuperable when the pupil of such methods as Mr. Hatley's of Edinburgh, Mr. Jackson's of Bradford, or Mr. Turner's of London (which are all confined to the established notation) wishes to sing classic music at first sight—such a pupil being obliged, then, to leave tonic sol-fa and have recourse to what may be called chromatic sol-fa. That the tonic sol-fa system of interpreting the keys (in this kind of music), and expressing them in a new notation, is to be regarded, at present, only as an experiment; but that this difficulty of the tonic method is confined to the higher style of music, and need not give any anxiety to the school teacher.

"3. That, as in all good teaching the sign should be regarded as entirely subordinate to that which it signifies (the object of the instructor being to teach the thing itself, and only subordinately the marks or names by which it is known), it is not 'teacher-like' to object to the methods of Nægeli, Natorp, Waldmann, Müller, Schade, Anberlin, Gall, Byrce, Jcu de Berneval, Chévé, or Miss Glover, that they have employed some new notation (of figures, symbols, or letters) in order to attract the exclusive attention of their pupils to the great principle of key relationship in their early lessons on intervals; if it can be shown that the pupils do learn the thing music more truthfully or more quickly, or obtain music at a very much cheaper rate, and therefore more abundantly, by the help of these new notations than without them. This conference, however, recommends that those school teachers who adopt new notations for this purpose should not neglect to introduce the pupils of their higher classes to that notation of music which is now established in general use throughout the world."

After expressing an opinion, founded on his own personal observation, that the advocates of the old principle of sol-fa were becoming less numerous every day, Mr. Curwen observed that Mr. Hullah's system did not flourish in schools. There, generally, it assumed the shape of certain unused sheets, in certain dusty cupboards. In his (Mr. Curwen's) resolutions, reference was made to the methods of Mr. Turner, Mr. Hatley, and Mr. Jackson. These gentlemen, though they sol-fa'd from the key-note, seemed afraid to leave the old notation, and consequently, in classical music, became involved in great difficulties. To give an idea of these, he would state that in Israel in Egypt, which contained 1,752 bars of music, there were about 230 changes of key, or, on an average, one change to $7\frac{1}{2}$ bars. The average in Bach's Motet, No. 5, was one change to every 7 bars. Was there any musician in the world who could read off such modulations at first sight? (Cries of "Yes.") Well, suppose there were a hundred, that would not answer his purpose—he must have thousands upon thousands—he wanted the people to sing. He regretted that Mr. Martin, at their former meeting, spoke of the tonic sol-fa as his (Mr. Curwen's) invention. It was entirely due to the genius and energy of Miss Glover. (Cheers.) Mr. Martin had stated that they taught by ear alone. He (Mr.

Curwen) contended that no man could be taught to sing in the first instance except through his ears; after which, signs of some kind would be indispensable. He allowed, with Mr. Martin, that syllables would not teach differences of sound, but when the pupil became acquainted with these differences, syllables were of use in naming them. He had tried many plans before he adopted the present one. It was the only one that answered. It was like loosing the tongue of a dumb man. In speaking of the old notation he stated that it could be acquired in a day by any one acquainted with the tonic sol-fa system. In addition to these advantages, cheapness should not be forgotten. The nineteen numbers of Mr. Martin's "Two-a-Penny Part-songs" cost 1s. 7d., but in the tonic sol-fa notation, 4½d. would cover the expense, and "Eight-a-Penny Part-songs" would become the title. The publisher would enjoy the same profit, and the purchasers four times as much music.

Mr. Goodchild having seconded the resolutions, Mr. G. W. Martin rose to reply to Mr. Curwen. He stated that the advocates of the tonic sol-fa system seemed to take great credit for the teaching of key-relationship, as though it were peculiar to their system, whereas it was generally allowed to be the foundation of all good teaching. He agreed with Mr. Curwen that this relationship should be cultivated, and also that the first note of the scale was the principal one; but he would maintain that the new systems of notation introduced into this and other countries had decidedly a dangerous tendency. They were calculated to destroy that universality of musical language, which was so desirable. The difference in the cost of music became insignificant when placed side by side with community of language. Mr. Martin concluded by comparing most elaborately and scientifically the merits of the old and new notations, showing the former to be greatly superior when properly taught. In doing this he made considerable use of a blackboard and the voices of his audience.

Mr. Crampton considered that the key was not established by note but by the accompanying harmony of that note. He thought the tonic sol-fa system was a good introduction to harmony, but when harmony came in, that system could not be too quickly abandoned.

Mr. Roberts thought the tonic sol-fa notation had not been treated fairly. They should look at the results. After three lessons a boy with an ordinary ear could make out a simple tune by himself.

Paisiello and His Works.

GIOVANNI PAISELLO, son of François and of Grazzio Foggiale, was born at Tarento in the year 1741. His father was a veterinary surgeon, particularly distinguished in his art; and the reputation he had acquired, not only in the province of Lucca, but in the whole kingdom, procured him the honor of being employed by the King of Naples, Charles III., during the war of Velletri. His father determined, as soon as his son had attained his fifth year, that he should study till he was thirteen, with the Jesuits, who had a college at Tarento; and as it was the custom of these fathers to have the service to the virgin sung in all their festivals, they remarked, when their young pupil sang the hours of matins, that he had a fine contralto voice and an excellent ear. Upon this observation, the Chevalier D. Girolamo Carducci, of the same city, and who superintended the music for the holy week in the church of the Capuchins, endeavored to make young Paisiello sing some pieces from memory. The boy, who was then under thirteen years of age, acquitted himself in such a manner, that it might have been imagined he had studied music for a length of time. This was in March, 1754. The Chevalier Carducci, perceiving the promising genius of Paisiello, advised his father to send him to Naples, in order that he might study music, and for this purpose, instantly to place him with some good chapel-master; but his parents would not consent to this, for, being their only son, they could not resolve to part with him. The reiterated entreaties of the chevalier began at last to prevail, and they promised to give an answer, after having reflected more maturely. In short, after some time had elapsed, they determined on sending him to Naples; his departure was fixed for the month of May following, and in the meantime he employed all his time in learning the first elements of music, under an ecclesiastic, a secular priest, named Carlo Resta, of Tarento, an excellent tenor, who played very well on the arch-lute, an instrument which Paisiello made use of during the two or three months allotted to him for acquiring the first instructions. He afterwards set out for Naples with his father, and in June, 1754, was received into the conservatorio of St. Onofrio, where he had the happiness of finding, as a master, the celebrated Durante. It was under him that he studied, and at the end of five years became first master among the pupils of the conservatorio. During the next four years he composed there some masses, psalms, motets, oratorios, and a comic interlude, which was performed in the same institution. This interlude procured him the advantage of being employed to compose, in 1763, an opera for the theatre at Bologna.

Here begins the first epoch of his works. At the theatre of the Marsigli, at Bologna, appeared "La Pupilla," "I Francesi brillanti," "Il Mondo a Rovescio," at Modena, "La Madama Unorista," at Parma, "Le Virtuose Ridicole," "Il Sogno d'Abano," at Venice, "Il Ciarlone," "Le Pescatrice," at Rome, "Il Marchese Tulipano," &c., &c.

On the 28th of July, 1766, Paisiello departed for Russia, and entered the service of Catharine II., with an appointment of four thousand rubles. As music master to the grand duchess, he had the further sum of nine hundred rubles; and his country house, which was allowed him during five or six months in the year, procured him two thousand rubles. With these and some other advantages, he had an annual income of nine thousand rubles.

Second Epoch.—Paisiello remained in Russia nine years, during which time he composed "La Serva Padrona," "Il Matrimonio Inaspettato," "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," "I Filosofi Imaginari," "La Finta Amante," &c., &c.

Third Epoch.—At Vienna he wrote for the Emperor Joseph II. the opera of "Il Re Teodoro," and twelve concerted symphonies. From thence he returned to Naples. On his arrival in this city, Ferdinand IV. took him into his service, in quality of master of the chapel, with a salary of twelve hundred ducats. He then directly composed his opera "Antigono," at Rome, "L'Amore Ingegnoso," "La Molinara," at Naples, "La Grotta di Trofonio," "Le Gare Generose," "L'Olympiade," "Il Pirro." This work was the first, of the serious kind, in which introductions and finales were employed. It also contains a scene where the principal person, executing a monologue, is surprised by soldiers, who arrive at the sound of a military march, and which agrees with the song of the actor; a scene which has served as a model to many composers.

The French revolution having extended to Naples in 1789, the government assumed the republican form. The court abandoning Naples and returning into Sicily, the rulers of the state named Paisiello composer to the nation. But the Bourbon family, being re-established, made it a crime in him to have accepted this employment, and for some time his appointments were suspended. At last, after two years had elapsed, he was restored to his situation. He was afterwards demanded at Paris by the First Consul of France, Napoleon Bonaparte; when Ferdinand, King of Naples, gave him a despatch, with an order to go to Paris, and place himself at the disposal of the first consul. Alquier, the minister of France, resident at Naples, pressed him on the occasion to declare his intentions respecting the fees and the treatment he desired. Paisiello replied, that the honor of serving the first consul he considered as a sufficient recompense. On arriving at Paris, he was provided with a furnished apartment, and one of the court carriages; he was assigned a salary of twelve thousand francs, and a present of eighteen thousand francs for the expenses of his stay, besides those of his journey. He was offered at Paris several employments; such as those of director of the Imperial Academy and of the Conservatorio; he refused them all, and contented himself with that of director of the chapel, which he filled with excellent artists. He composed for this chapel sixteen sacred services, consisting of masses, motets, prayers, &c., and besides these he set the opera of "Proserpine," for the Academy of Music, and a "Grand Mass" for two choirs, a "Te Deum," and prayers for the coronation of the emperor. Finding that the climate of Paris did not agree with his wife, he quitted the city, after residing in it two years and a half, and returned to Italy; he still, however, continued to send every year to Napoleon a sacred composition for the anniversary of his birth, the 15th of August. A year after his departure, the emperor proposed to him to return to Paris, but the bad state of his health prevented him from accepting the invitation. The Bourbon family being obliged to quit Naples, King Joseph Napoleon confirmed to him the place of master of the chapel, of composer and director of the music of his chamber and of his chapel, with an appointment of one thousand eight hundred ducats. He wrote for this chapel twenty-four services, consisting of masses, motets, and prayers. At the same time, Napoleon sent him the cross of the legion of honor, which Joseph himself presented to him, with an additional pension of one thousand francs.

Besides the offices already spoken of, Paisiello was chapel-master of the cathedral of Naples, for which he composed several services alla Palestrina; he was also chapel-master to the municipality. He likewise composed for different religious houses, now destroyed, a great number of offices; such as three masses for two choirs, two masses for five voices, alla Palestrina, with an accompaniment for the violoncello and tenor, and a Christus; and besides these, three cantatas for a single voice, for amateurs; four nocturnes for two voices; six concertos for the pianoforte written expressly for the infantia, Princess of Parma, afterwards Queen of Spain, wife of Charles IV.

Paisiello died at Naples, in the year 1816, aged seventy-six. That city rendered him funeral honors, in causing to be executed a mass for the dead, found among his papers. The same evening his "Nina" was performed at the opera, when the King of Naples and the whole court attended.

Among the numerous works of which we have given the list, there are many which have had general success, and which have been often performed in the principal theatres of Europe. The following are among the most favorite of his comic operas: "La Fiescantana," "Le Due Contesse," "Il Re Teodoro," "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," "Il Furbo mal accorto," "D'Anchise Compagnone," "Le Medeste raggiratrice," "I Zingari in Fiera," "Dal Finto il Vero," "L'Inganno Felice," "L'Arabo Cortese," "L'Amor contrastato," "Il Tamburro Notturmo," "La Pazzo per Amore," "L'Innocente Fortunata," "Il Matrimonio Inaspettato," "La Serva Padrona," "I Filosofi Imaginari," "Le Gare Generose," and "La Grotta di Trofonio." Among the serious operas: "La Disfatta di Dario," "L'Elfrida," "Il Pirro," "La Nitteti," "L'Antigono," "Lucinda ed Armadoro," "L'Olympiade," "Il Demetrio," "L'Andromaca," "La Fedra," "Catone in Utica," and "I Giuochi d'Agrigento." Among the works for the church: "La Passione," the mass for two choirs, the "Te Deum," the motets and funeral symphonies.

Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro."

From Holmes's Life of Mozart.

The all-engrossing subject of Mozart's thoughts during the spring of the year (1786) was "Le Nozze di Figaro," an opera likewise undertaken at the suggestion of the Emperor Joseph. This work, which has maintained its place on the stage and in the drawing-room for nearly sixty years in continuation, is justly considered, for its extraordinary wealth of melody, the variety of its style, and the perfection of its concerted music, as one of the most wonderful trophies of human skill.

The libretto, adapted by Da Ponte from the well-known comedy of Beaumarchais, seems to have satisfied Mozart, and the subject to have possessed unusual charms for him, if we may judge by the rate at which he worked. The whole opera was written in the course of April. The marvelous finale of the second act, consisting of six grand pieces, occupied him for two nights and a day, during which he wrote without intermission. In the course of the second night he was seized with an illness which compelled him to stop; but there remained a few pages only of the last piece to instrument.

Salieri and Righini being at this time ready with operas, were both competitors with Mozart for preference; and the contest between the composers was so warm that the emperor was obliged to interpose and he decided for "Figaro." Some eagerness of rivalry seems to have been pardonable on an occasion which is rendered memorable by the unequalled talent of the singers, and the extraordinary congress of composers assembled at Vienna. Rarely, if ever, has it happened to a musician to submit his composition to such an ordeal as Mozart did "Figaro," and few have been the instances in dramatic annals in which men of such renown as Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Paisiello, Storace, Salieri, Righini, Anfossi, &c., have been collected under one roof to witness the first performance of an opera, as it is no improbable surmise that they were on this occasion.

What the lyric drama gained by this opera in elegance of melody, in models of love songs in rich concerted music, and varied finales, is the question at present, and that we are well able to determine. While all the popular melodies of the comic operas coeval with "Figaro" (tunes which were regularly transferred from the theatre to the street musicians) are lost, not a note of that composition has faded; and when reproduced, it still finds as many enthusiastic admirers as a comedy of Shakespeare. The combination of playfulness and grace which predominates in it imparts to "Figaro," according to some critics, a more decided Mozartean character than any other of his works. Every one may certainly find in it something to please. The musician, for instance, listens with delight to the bass of the first duet, or to the admirable instrumentation of the song in which the page is trying on the cap. What wealth of beauty in places comparatively unnoticed! Those who like to combine delightful music with a laugh may find both in the duet in which Susanna describes the behavior of the count when her bridegroom is gone on his travels. The deprecatory interjections of poor Figaro, "Susanna pian, pian!" call up the most pleasant recollections. It were endless to pursue this opera through all its materials for pleasure.

The favorite piece of the composer was the sestetto: Riconosci in questo amplesso.

Kelly, who claims to have sung "Crudel perchè" with the composer, just as it had fallen fresh from the pen, gives a lively account of the first rehearsal. Alluding to this occasion, he observes: "I remember Mozart was on the stage with his crimson pelisse and gold-laced cocked hat, giving the time of the music to the orchestra. Figaro's song: 'Non più andrai, farfallone amoroso.' Benucci gave with the greatest animation and power of voice. I was standing close to Mozart, who, sotto voce, was repeating 'Bravo! bravo! Benucci;' and when Benucci came to the fine passage: 'Cherubino, alla vittoria, alla gloria militar,' which he gave out with stentorian lungs, the effect was electricity itself, for the whole of the performers on the stage, and those in the orchestra, as if actuated by one feeling of delight, vociferated, 'Bravo! bravo! maestro; viva! grande Mozart!' Those in the orchestra I thought, would never have ceased applauding, by beating the bows of the violins against the music desks. The little man acknowledged, by repeated obeisances, his thanks for the distinguished mark of enthusiastic applause bestowed upon him." What a transition this, from the midnight solitudes in which, animated by a great idea, he could not rest till he had delivered himself of it! Had it been the acclamation of a crowded house at a performance, instead of a spirited scene at a rehearsal, it might have been better; still, it was the voice of truth, which he seldom heard save in his own music.

"The Huguenots" in New Orleans.

One of the best operatic critics of New York, where they think they know "what's what" in these matters, says that "no sagacious opera manager in America will often attempt to place Meyerbeer on the stage. His operas are written for rare voices, and without such they are miserable failures. Bassos profundissimos, like Formes, can alone sing Marcel in 'Les Huguenots,' and Bertram in 'Robert le Diable.' Besides, it costs (and impresarios well know what we mean by this word) a plum to mount properly one of his operas. The orchestra and chorus must be doubled. Scene painters, scene shifters, and supernumeraries innumerable must be called into requisition."

This is true enough of opera management in those cities where the opera is only an occasional affair, and not, as it is with us, in New Orleans, a fixed institution. Here, all the requisites described by the critic we quote are to be found, every season. We have the "hasso profundissimos," to sing the *Marcel*s and the *Bertram*s, tenori robnstissimi to sing the Roberts and the Raouls, soprani altissimi to sing the Marquerites, the Valentines and the Isabelles, and all the rest. As to the question of "cost" in the getting up, it is not a troublesome one at the Orleans, for these operas have been handsomely "mounted" on our stage for many years, being regular stock pieces of the theatre. We have no need to "double" the orchestra, for it is always sufficiently large, numerous and capable. And so is the chorus. To enjoy Meyerbeer, he should be seen and heard as he is presented at our French theatre, under French management, by French artists, and in the French language. Picayune, Nov. 30.

ORLEANS THEATRE.—A full house—including but few ladies, however—greeted the first performance, last evening, at the above theatre, of Meyerbeer's chef d'oeuvre, "The Huguenots." It is a test-piece at all times for tenor, prima donna and basso, and the severity of the trial was the greatest, as it included also the first appearance of a new prima donna, M^{lle} Lafranche, and the real debut of the new basso, Mr. Taste. With some slight hitches here and there in the piece—to be expected in a first performance, under the circumstances—the opera was excellently given. The choruses and grand concerted pieces, in particular, evinced manifest improvement—the "Rataplan" and "Ponard Benediction" being particularly well done.

M^{lle} Cordier's Marquerite was a delightful personation, in looks, graceful acting and brilliant vocalization. Her appearance at the opening of the second act was the very picture of youth and gaiety, and one might well imagine the fascinating effect on the young Huguenot noble, Raoul, of so charming an apparition of coquettish beauty, in all the splendor of royal costume. The "Ah! si j'étais coquette!" was given with bird-like lightness and a gushing richness of pearly notes that fairly enraptured the audience.

M^{me}. Vadé's Page was a pleasing and successful personation.

Delagrave, early in the evening, showed evident signs of hoarseness and weakness, but in the impassioned fourth act he rose to all his former strength, and sang with a mingled power and sympathetic expression that surprised the audience.

It is unfair to judge a performer on his first appearance, where it is evident he labors under the paralyzing influences usually attendant on such an appearance. We will merely say that Mr. Taste has a full, clear, flexible basso voice, well cultivated, whose volume could not be judged of—although now and then the singer gave proof of sufficient capability of expression and dramatic power. He will undoubtedly improve on a better acquaintance.

The prominent feature of the evening was the complete and unexpected success of M^{lle}. Lafranche. As she quietly came down the stage, in the second act, she was received with chilling coldness. Her personal appearance is somewhat against her; she is thin, and has a pale, sickly look, and her dress at first was disadvantageous. Her unceremonious reception was soon changed into astonished admiration, when her clear, full, powerful voice was heard, and in the grand scenes between her and Marcel and Raoul, in the third and fourth acts, the frail form and pallid countenance of the performer showed themselves imbued with that glow and energy which seize upon the listener and bind him fast to every note and look and gesture of the singer. M^{lle}. Lafranche forgets the audience, and gives herself up to the spirit of her part, exaggerating nothing, however, and casting over her presentation, in its most passionate moments, the charms of feminine grace and delicacy. Picayune, Dec. 2.

Letter about Robert Franz.

A correspondent of the New York Musical World, fresh home from Germany, writes:

AS ROBERT FRANZ'S name as a composer ranges now among the highest in Germany, and his compositions having received already in Boston a hearty welcome, your readers will receive, perhaps with interest, a few extracts from my journal in relation to that excellent man.

Robert Franz is the son of a "Halore," a tribe of Wendish origin, who, centuries ago, owned the Salt Springs at Halle, and work them to this day. Peculiar dress, customs, and certain privileges distinguish them from the German race. He must be about 40 years old, but loves the society of young men of talent and spirit, and although odd to the last degree in mien and manner, he is highly esteemed and warmly loved by the refined and intelligent portions of Halle. His tall, loose limbs find it difficult to follow his head, which is always in advance of the perpendicular line, and which bears, to counterbalance this abnormal position, a high stove-pipe hat of unbrushed texture, far back on the neck. He lisps most unmusically, sings with contorted features and a strange Shanghai-voice, and is equally famous in discussing the merits of a musical performance and a glass of genuine Bavarian beer of the "Aulmbach" denomination; and yet, within the rough shell reigns a soul of poetry and a highly cultured mind. As director of the "Sing Academic," he is noted for his good-natured roughness; when ladies complain of it he tells them in a cool manner: "Ladieth, I thscold your voiceth, not you."

After the appearance of opus 8, he sat at the piano, JULIUS SCHAFFER, now Music Director at Schwerin, my brother Theodore, and several other friends around him, singing to them with that remarkable voice, his glorious song, "Die Gewitternacht," which combines the raging of the storm with the wild passion of an unhappy love, dissolving the one into a gentle rain, the other in tranquilizing tears. When he came to this point he turned around and exclaimed in an undertone, unconscious of the ludicrous prosaic effect: "Hear je! how it dripsst!"

In conclusion of this already too-long letter, a few words in regard to the above mentioned Julius Schaffer. It was my good fortune to be invited to a private musical matinée at Halle, where he played, among other pices, some numbers from his opus 1, Fantasie Stucke, which I would heartily recommend, together with opus 3 and 4, to all pianists who have heart, ears, eyes and hands for the "music of the future."

BOSTON, DEC. 18, 1858.

Italian Opera.

We have had a week of it, and on the whole a rich one. From Thursday evening of last week, there have been six performances in seven days, in the course of which the most sceptical person must have been satisfied of the rare resources of Mr. ULLMAN'S large and splendid company. In amount, variety and average excellence of personal talent; in wealth of accessories, in completeness of orchestra and chorus, and in the variety and interest of its repertoire, it certainly surpasses any troupe that we have had before.

The opening night was, of course, M^{lle}. PICCOLLOMINI'S, — that bewitching natural little charmer having been all along put forward, in the plan of the campaign, as the manager's best card, the one sure to win. She has been most extravagantly praised, no doubt, in advertisements and libretto prefaces; grouped with the great stars, as Grisi, Sontag, Bosio, and even Malibran and Jenny Lind! pronounced not only a charming little singer and actress, but the lyric genius of the age, — simply because the general public is always ready enough to mistake a pleasing talent for genius; and by all the arts of reclame has she been magnified in a way that would be quite fatal to her successful debut in any intelligent community, were it not that she decidedly has certain charms of her own, not necessarily of the highest kind, in rare perfection. Take her for just what she is, she is a remarkably fine specimen of that. It is simply absurd to name her with the great prima donnas — at least now; but she may be, she is, for all that, a charming singer and a delightful actress in her way. This every one acknowledged at her debut in La Traviata. Criticism was disarmed. Criticism could but smile at the idea of having anything to do there; to pull out its nice scales, with a grave face, were a joke. For anything so simply childlike, so naive, fresh, spontaneous, so pretty and fascinating in its way; anything done with such entire unreserve and passionate love of the occupation, one sees very seldom in these days of ours. It is perhaps rash to gauge the depth of nature of an artist and predict all her possibilities, from one performance or one season of performances; but we cannot help suspecting that, were the nature greater, were the talent of a deeper, rarer kind, something more akin to genius and imagination, there would perhaps be less completeness of expression, less of the charm of unreserve, and far less of that "infinite assurance"—charming as it was, and never overstepping bounds of modesty and grace, we cheerfully admit—by which this piccolo of a prima donna, setting her own standard, in spite of all our memories and results of critical reflection, renewed with us the triumph she has enjoyed everywhere.

We cannot enter the lists with the glib writers who have turned over the whole vocabulary of delicate phrases and fancies to describe Piccolomini; we should surely be beaten if we attempted it. Her description has been for a month in all the newspapers, and we need not to alter or to add to it. The charm is in the first place that of youth—an incalculable advantage, adding many ciphers to the right side of any unit of positive talent. Then that sunshiny vivacity and good nature, animating the petite prettiness and plumpitude of person, so delighted to act itself out, so fond of the full sunshine of applauding publics, rushing to the foot-lights by a childlike attraction, singing and gesticulating right into you, acting personally to every one of her audience—all genuine as possible so far as it goes. Then a delightful voice, remarkably sweet and musical, clear and pure and liquid, highly sympathetic, lending itself to each emotion that she would portray, so truly that she even cries in music; but withal a small, fine voice, limited in compass, limited in power, which obviously precludes anything like lyrical grandeur; and yet one wonders that the little voice makes itself heard and felt so palpably, even more than he does at its sweetness and its flexibility. Then she is a good singer; she has the art of using her voice in a much higher degree than critics told us. She sings always true, with grace of style and just expression; with plenty of execution for all the best purposes, although wisely avoiding difficult bravura passages, as in this very Traviata, which we confess we do not consider any loss, so long as what she does give is consistent, graceful and complete. Were it an air of Mozart, we should be sticklers for a literal fidelity to text.

Then she is a born actress—at least within a certain native range of character; and if she has not genius, she has talent, a plentiful deal of what is called smartness; a good head; quickness of perception, at least of the external kind, ready power of imitation, extending (as we shall see) even to a clever rendering of intense and somewhat complex tragic parts—added to all which a very resolute little will of her own, an unfailing zest in all that interests and actuates her, and an intensity in such passion as she knows,—an intensity at any rate in her prime key-note passion, that for representing passions—so that her faculties are ever strung for action, and it is no wonder that she captivates an audience. But she is an artist; there is a rare harmony of song and action in her, as in Mme. Colson, though her conceptions are by no means of so high and so refined a stamp.

Of her impersonation of Violetta, the Traviata, we must say that it showed amazing cleverness, although by no means the best that we have seen and heard. In the first scene she takes the character into her own element; she makes it playful, arch, coquettish; plays at love, in an extremely pretty, sprightly, but yet rather common-place way; pert, and smart, and much at home in certain pretty tricks, the common-places of a coquette,—tossing the little head, flirting the little handkerchief, and all the little et ceteras that common audiences delight in,—singing it, too, most charmingly;—but evidencing no depth, no such intrinsic superiority of nature to the false sphere in which she moves, as to at all justify the subsequent development of real love and the high moral interest of the last scenes. Yet we could only wonder at her cleverness, her really expressive singing and action throughout all that serious sequel.

Our old friend BRIGNOLI, with his delicious tenor, sang the lover's music touchingly, with more of earnestness than usual. The part of Ger-mont Père was sustained by Sig. FLORENZA (his first appearance here) who has a rich and powerful baritone, and sings like a superior artist; but his gesticulation and his make-up were grotesque. Among the secondary characters were Herr MUELLER (as Physician), Herr QUINT (or Sig. QUINTO), and various other Germans as well as Italians, who, with the remarkably fine chorus (more numerous, enphionous and well-trained than we have ever had before) made up a capital vocal ensemble. The orchestra was by far the best we ever had in opera; numbering about fifty instruments, and comprising our best local talent with additions from New York. There was a noble body of strings; the reed instruments blended with uncommon beauty, and the brass (a generous allowance) was well subdued. Sig. MUZZO, the conductor, showed a quiet, sure, intelligent mastery of the whole combination. With such an orchestra we had hoped to discover more of musical idea and substance in the Traviata, than we had done before. But the music still seemed empty, scarcely justifying such an orchestra.

On Friday evening another large and brilliant audience were assembled eager for "the Huguenots." But Mlle. PONSSET was ill, and at the eleventh hour the play was changed to Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento, with more of the piccolo to console our disappointed hopes of the colossal. The announcement was taken in good part, when it was found that Mlle. PICCOLOMINI, with characteristic kindness had come to the rescue of the manager in this dilemma, and, better still, that the great basso of the world, CARL FORMES, had consented to appear for once in so subordinate a rôle as that of the old sergeant. The first sight of Formes, with a few ringing notes of his voice, and his brisk military salute, electrified the house. It was clear in an instant that the man was thoroughly alive, that Formes was in the most complete sense there. He acted the old soldier to the life, and put life and spirits into all about him. The music of the part is not much, but he gave that little admirably, and was perfect in all the recitative and musical declamation, and in such concerted pieces as that rapid trio in the last scene, which is a very palpable and clever imitation of Rossini's Zitti, zitti, piano. It was incomparably the best Sulpizio we ever had upon our stage. And then the Figlia herself, pert, playful, smart, vivacious, joyous little PICCOLOMINI, now all alive before you in her own proper character. What a witch of a child she seemed! so full of dashing confidence and talent. How running over with sunshiny good nature and frankness! How she glories in the regiment, in the general sympathy, and above all in that of the audience, rushing to the foot-lights with a child's delight, innocently charmed with the sense of her own power in occupying general attention! The gay and brilliant melodies were nicely sung, and altogether it was a unique and charming piece of musical comedy, dashed with some true touches of sentiment. The spoiled child's roguery with the old pedant aunt in the music lesson was the cleverest and truest part of it.

For Tonio we had a new tenor, Sig. TAMARO, physically of the same type with Labocetta, but young, with a much fresher voice, sweet and telling, and fair execution. The part suited him well. The chorus of soldiers was capital. Altogether, it was the best performance we have yet had of this sparkling opera.

On Saturday afternoon La Figlia was repeated, followed by the first act of Norma, in which Mme. LABORDE astonished everybody by the marvelous perfection of her rendering of Casta diva.

Monday evening. Another disappointment. For Piccolomini in Lucia, and in the little comic opera, La Serva Padrona, by Paisiello, was substituted Lucrezia Borgia—probably for reasons beyond the manager's control. There were marked signs of discontent, which soon yielded before the rich music of that favorite opera, illustrated by such an orchestra and chorus; with the curiosity to witness how her little ladyship would make out, leaving her native element of the coquettish soubrette, to assume the tragic, proud airs of the Borgia, and with the certainty of something splendid and commanding in the duke Alfonso of Herr FORMES. The Lucrezia of PICCOLOMINI was certainly, in its way, an astonishing triumph.

You could not forget the child all the while, but you wondered to see how admirably the child caught and reflected in that limpid mirror of her imitative nature, in miniature, most of the traditional points and features of that part as portrayed by the great prima donnas. Some points, too, were original and striking—arts of effect, cleverly conceived and executed, but not to be accounted flashes of imaginative treatment. Such was the wicked glow of triumph on her face with which she met the Duke, as she covered the escape of her son. But there was an intensity and a variety of passionate expression in her whole impersonation, voice finely corresponding, especially in the great Trio scene, by which she grew immensely in the faith of her audience in her lyric possibilities. Formes was majestic, grandly declamatory, but perhaps hardly enough polished in his impersonation of the Duke. Both were superbly dressed. BRIGNOLI sang well as GENARO. Mme. GHIONI made but a tame, phlegmatic Orsini, with a mezzo soprano voice, which she used indifferently well.

On Tuesday evening the Boston Theatre was crowded with a brilliant and cultivated audience. Meyerbeer's colossal opera, "The Huguenots," came this time without fail, and more than answered every expectation. For though it was the first hearing of the "Huguenots" in Boston, few were unfamiliar with the Meyerbeerian characteristics, and we had heard Meyerbeer discussed and his position among great composers long since settled, as being that of a musician of most energetic talent, a wonderful master of effects and mighty combinations, one who crowds more thought and study, more audacious novelty into a work, than would suffice for twenty of the current Italian operas; but yet not gifted with spontaneous inspiration, not in the high imaginative sense a great creative genius; as opposite as possible in that respect to Mozart, Weber or Rossini; astonishing, but not in the long run edifying like the Beethovens, the Shakspeares of the art; the dazzling and overruling master of the moment, but not a living influence in the soul forever. Such is the conclusion which the world has reached regarding Meyerbeer, and it would be absurd now so apply critical tests to such a masterpiece of its kind as "The Huguenots," as if it were an Art phenomenon just newly risen on the world. It was an immense thing to construct; it is an immense task to perform it, and it is no small task to hear it through, albeit with unqualified delight. Abridged as it was that evening, it occupied four hours,—four hours fraught with the most dazzling and bewildering combinations of every thing to tax ear and eye and apprehension and anticipation to the utmost. The success was complete. Musically and dramatically, we think most persons found more to interest them in "The Huguenots" than they had dared to hope. It was a splendid subject for a lyric drama, and Meyerbeer in his peculiar way had made the most of it.

Nothing here was ever put upon the stage with so much splendor. It was all on a magnificent scale, for any theatre this side of Paris. The principal rôles were mostly in good hands, forming a great concentration of variety of talent. The orchestra was very large, and under the control of Herr Conductor ANSCHUTZ, brought out the rich and gorgeous instrumentation with fine effect. Only the harp was wanting. The choruses, both male and female, Catholic and Protestant, noble and gipsy, religious and bacchanalian and warlike, came out in fresh clear colors. The ballet of bathing dampsels, with but a dainty bit of Soto's grace, was unexceptionable; and the military band upon the stage made spirit-stirring music. But where to begin, and when to leave off! It were folly to attempt here to go deeply into so vast a subject. Suffice it to recall mere hints.

The first act gave us the banquet in the castle of Count de Nevers (COLETTI,) with the smart and tingling "orgy" chorus; the tenor romance in which the Protestant hero of the piece, Raoul (TAMARO,) relates his love adventure; the grand old Lutheran choral, as rolled forth in the stentorian tones of Marcell, the old Huguenot soldier, who is something like a positive creation in the way of character, and lifted up to satisfying grandeur the masterly impersonation of FORMES; the Huguenot battle song, Piff-Paff, sung by the same, as no other man probably can sing it; and the salutatory flourish of the page, Urbain, in which part, M^{me}. GIRONI appeared to better advantage than in Lucresia. The dresses of this feasting conclave of French nobles were superb, and so was the scene.

Act second introduced to us M^{me}. LABORDE, in the character of the Queen, Margaret of Valois, surrounded by her ladies, in the gardens of Turaine. Her music, a series of rhapsodical bird-flights of song—not melodies, for the most part, but exquisitely florid passages—tells of the joy of living, the sweet sense of life, in such peaceful scenes, and deprecates the religious rancor of the times. Never, with the exception of Jenny Lind, and perhaps some of the best moments of Lagrange, have we listened to such perfect singing of high florid music. M^{me}. Laborde's voice was sweet and fresh and liquid, compared with our recollections of her visit here some years ago, and her execution is the finished perfection of all ease and grace; in sustained crescendo tones, the voice would seem to grow as if renewed and fed from hidden fountains. Her look and manner, too, were charming, and entirely suited to the part. These bird warblings were beautifully relieved by snatches of female chorus. Then came the duets with Raoul, and her exquisitely tripping staccato in the lines commencing Ah! si j'étais coquette. Coquette she is not at all, kind noble soul; not, however, for the want of plenty of vivacity.

Act Third is a marvellous combination of contrasts. Quaint, grotesque, suggestive of the middle-ages—Victor Hugo-like is all this music. The scene is an out-door festival in the Prés aux clercs. Choruses of catholic students; choruses of women; the loud ringing Rataplan of the Huguenot soldiers; then a solemn catholic marriage procession, women chanting in thirds, a wild antique, primitive religious strain in no settled key, fluctuating between major and minor like a strain heard in the fitful pauses of the wind; then with this the loud Rataplan again; then gipsy songs; then the curfew bells and watchman's call, and all sounds die out to a murmur in the orchestra as night broods over the deserted streets. Then comes the anxious scene between Marcell and Valentine (M^{lle}. POINSET), and the duel, and general quarrel, and the sudden entrance by torchlight of the Queen and cortège on horseback, with an illuminated barge, bearing a band of music in the background, &c., &c. All is now ominous of the coming danger.

Act Fourth. The catholic leaders lay out the dark plan of the night's work (the massacre of St. Bartholomew's night). Valentine and Raoul, who have overheard it, have a duet scene, intensely exciting of course, in which the clear, powerful and eminently dramatic quality of M^{lle}. POINSET's soprano made itself felt beyond a question. She made a fine impression by her powers as a tragic singer, which grew upon the audience through this and the last act.

Sig. TAMARO sang with earnestness, and as much power as his light style of tenor would permit. The part requires a great tenor. But we are forgetting the great feature of this fourth act,—the one musical effect in the whole opera which rises to something like the sublime, and that is where the priests enter to take the oath of the conspirators and bless the poniards. This is appallingly wild and grand. Parts of the music hereabouts, especially where St. Bris (FLORENZA) leads off with so much fire, are essentially in the same spirit with many of Verdi's characteristic finales; one could not but suspect that the Italian found much of his inspiration in this German. (Charge us, then, no longer with disliking Verdi on the ground of his music being Italian!)

The fifth and last act is the massacre, of which we have no room to speak. On Monday we shall have the "Huguenots" again, after which it will be more reasonable to judge of it. After a first hearing one can only wonder, and begin but slowly to collect his thoughts.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, taking advantage of the presence of the Italian Opera, will give a concert in the Music Hall to-morrow (Sunday) evening, assisted by the principal artists of Mr. Ullman's troupe. The Society will sing some fine choruses from "Israel in Egypt," "Solomon," the "Creation," and "Elijah"; and famous oratorio solos will be sung in English by LABORDE, POINSET, PICCOLOMINI, FORMES and the rest. On the following Sunday, the same artists will aid the Society in their annual Christmas performance of the "Messiah."

The Opera Company gave on Wednesday evening a concert in the theatre; last night (for the first time in Boston) Mozart's Nozze di Figaro! This afternoon PICCOLOMINI will sing in Lucia and in La Serva Padrona or the Servant Mistress. Monday night, a repetition of the Huguenots. And in immediate prospect beyond rise up Robert le Diable, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, and Don Giovanni on a grand scale. Certainly with all his queer ways, musical Boston is largely indebted just now to Mr. Ullman. Who else has had the courage or the managerial genius to give us these grand operas, thus realizing to us hopes that have been long deferred. The addition to our repertoire in half a month of Robert, the Huguenots, "Figaro's Marriage," and Servant Padrona, and with such artists, such an orchestra and all, is a rare windfall in these dry places.

THE SALARIES OF MUSICAL ARTISTS.—The French papers give some curious statistics in regard to the salaries paid to great musical artists. We learn that Milbrlan received in London, for every performance at Drury Lane, $750. Lablache, for singing twice, $750, and for a single lesson to Queen Victoria, $200. At a soirée in London, Grisi received $1,200. Paganini charged $400 a lesson. Hummel left a fortune of $75,000, and twenty six diamond rings, thirty-four snuff boxes and one hundred and fourteen watches, which had been presented to him at various times.

In modern days musicians are quite as extravagant as ever: paid: Alboni and Mario get $400 every night they sing; Tamberlik every time he sings a certain high note demands $500. Madame Gazzaniga was paid $500 a night recently in Philadelphia. Herz and Thalberg each made about 60,000 in this country. Lagrange, at Rio Janeiro, is now receiving a princely salary; and Piccolomini costs her manager over $5,000 a month.

At the Italian Opera in Paris, for the present season, M. Calzando, the manager, pays as follows: To Tamberlik, for seventeen representations, $8,000; Alboni, $2,200 for seven representations; Mario, 15,000 for a season of five months; Grisi, $5,000 for two months; Madame Penco, $14,000 for the season; the Graziani Brothers, $15,400; Corsi, a baritone, $4,000; Galvani, $3,600; Nantier Didiée, $4,000; Zecchini, $3,500; M^{lle}. de Ruda, $3,400. The chorus and orchestra cost for the season $17,600.

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, CONN., DEC. 13.—Mrs. ESTCOTT, assisted by Messrs. DURAND and ESTCOTT, and MAX MAYO, of this city, gave a concert here, last Tuesday evening, which was quite fully attended, considering the unpleasant state of the weather. Everything went off finely.—Mrs. Estcott singing with her usual spirit—and executing some most difficult passages with brilliancy and ease. Mr. Durand sang in the same magnificent manner which I spoke of in my last. Max Mayo played Thalberg's difficult fantasia on the "Huguenots" with splendid effect; and made his audience feel proud that they possessed such a performer. The "Estcott Troupe" were induced to come to this country in a most unfortunate time—just when Piccolomini was captivating the New Yorkers;—what company in the world, I should like to know, could compete with the fascinating little witch? Mr. Burton brought them over here, and when he found, after a few performances in New York, that he would make a "losing thing" of it, closed up his theatre and threw up his engagement, leaving them sans amis in the opera-going world. Mr. Burton may have greater reasons, and be justified in doing as he did, but it seems a little too bad that the misfortune should come upon Mrs. ESTCOTT and her troupe, because a manager unwittingly makes a faux pas. I understand that she has sued Mr. Burton for breach of contract, and will undoubtedly receive full justice from the hands of the court.

The "Beethoven Society" is in full blast, and hard at work on Dr. Löwe's (pronounced Leroy, I suppose) oratorio of the "Seven Sleepers." Stepping into Messrs. Barker & Co.'s music rooms the other evening, I found two gentlemen performing Schubert's delightful symphony in C., for four hands. Didn't it bring up delicious associations of the old "Gewandhaus Concerts" in Leipzig,—when KELLY and PRATT (peace to his ashes) and CLAPP and one or two others of us used to sit together facing that long row of Deutsche Damen, and see JULIUS RIETZ conduct that superb body of musicians through the different movements of the above-mentioned symphony, as well as those never-to-be-forgotten tone-poems and pictures of Beethoven and of Mendelssohn? There was wont to sit white-haired MOSCHLES, with his down-dropped and protruding under lip, and who knew Beethoven personally,—couldn't we watch the expression of his face and learn to know where all the great points lay in those immortal works? And there, too, sat dear old HAUPTMANN, with his quiet manner and good, pleasant countenance,—didn't we feel that he knew by heart all the intricacies of counterpoint which were being thrown before us, by his wonderful knowledge of harmony?

And then, sometimes, there would be FERDINAND HILLER, and RUBENSTEIN, and DREYSCHOCK, and CLARA SCHUMANN, and JOACHIM, and ARABELLA GODDARD, appearing as soloists! What a glorious atmosphere was that to be in! And where RIETZ stood, with DAVID immediately before him leading the violins, once moved the beloved form of MENDELSSOHN! Happy reminiscences are all these; but I must leave them for the present, and write you more anon.

II.

BERLIN, NOV. 22. — Part of the music of the last eight days I have heard. Four symphony concerts I have missed! What should we say to this at home? The grand one by the Royal Orchestra was of the number, and I remained at home because I did not dare risk the intolerable heat and want of ventilation in the gallery of the opera-house concert room; Liebig's extra concert in the Sing-Akademie was another, because on that evening the Laub-Radecke Quartet called several of us in that direction. Two of Liebig's usual concerts, because of the smoking on Friday and of the crowd on Wednesday evening.

What I have attended during this time were:

1. Opera. Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice." I have nothing new to add to my account of it three years since. I was just as much struck now as then with the wonderful beauty of the opening chorus, where the Greek men and women surrounding the tomb of Eurydice lament the loss of the beautiful one and call upon her shade to hear them if it be in her power, with the voice of Orpheus occasionally heard through the current of tones, calling in the saddest accents simply her name. Indeed through the whole I was as much struck as before with the wonderful adaptation of the music to the dramatic situation and to the gradual changes of feeling from sorrow to despair, from hope to the fullness of bliss when the lost one is finally restored. Now, as then, my appreciation of Gluck's art rises to astonishment at the manner in which he has made the pleading tones of Orpheus, when he descends into Tartarus, gradually overcome the opposition of the subterranean powers, and by the force of his singing open a way through that dark region to the Elysium beyond. The myth is, that by the force of music he conquered. The task of Gluck was to write such music that we can feel the result a probable one — and this the composer has done! And magnificent Johanna Wagner! As I listened the question came up, why not bring this out in Boston as it was first brought out here, in oratorio style? How divinely would Adelaide Philipps sing the Orpheus! How deliciously Mrs. Long or Mrs. Harwood the Eurydice! The part of Amor is unimportant comparatively. And if the Handel and Haydn Society would give one or two Saturday evenings to it, what a body of voices for the few but noble choruses! Let it be translated into English, and let the programmes give hints of the action. The Sing-Akademie produced it in this way here first and that led to its revival, nay, to its permanent place, upon the stage of the grand opera. Excepting from an air or two our Boston musical public knows nothing of Gluck. Could not an audience of two thousand be found who would gladly hear it twice or three times each year? I cannot but think, if Adelaide Philipps could have such an opportunity, that she at last would be duly appreciated. She would have no opportunity here for mere vocal gymnastics, unless she abused the music, but would have, what is better, one to show the very depths of tenderness and the higher passions. The way she sung last year in the "Messiah" proves to me that she could feel and then sing Gluck.

2. The LAUB-RADECKE Quartet — the last of the four, of which, as I wrote before, three of Beethoven's works constituted the programme. To us Americans the execution was wonderful, and I find the impression was general that this quartet is superior to the other great one. Of Laub and Radecke I have written you. The viola is played by Richard WUERST, of whom I only know that he is a music-teacher and composer here — and of so much talent that I once heard a symphony — Frühling's (Spring) symphony? — of his played at a Royal Orchestra soirée. He has hardly yet reached middle life.

The violoncellist is Dr. BRUNS, an amateur, one of the officers in the Royal Library, to whom I was indebted three years since for much politeness when studying the history of our Calvinistic psalmody.

I mentioned WENLE in my last. As his pianoforte compositions are becoming so well known in America, it may interest many readers of the Journal if I translate the notice of him, which is also in the Prague paper — in an article upon the fiftieth anniversary of the Conservatorium.

Karl Wenle was born March 17, 1825, studied music with J. Prosch, but afterwards entered upon a mercantile life. In 1848, being in London, he became acquainted with Thalberg, by whose advice he came back to Germany and entered upon a regular course of musical study at Leipzig. He studied composition with Richter, pianoforte with Moscheles until 1850, when he went to Berlin to perfect himself as a pianist under Kullak. Since then he has travelled, giving concerts, in France, Spain, England and North Germany. His pianoforte compositions have already reached Op. 46, and are very popular. His "Marche Cossaque" is known everywhere. He makes Paris his home, and is now, as I said above, on the point of going with Laub to Russia. I have not heard him play.

3. Tuesday afternoon Liebig's concert, at which an Overture, by C. C. CONVERSE (a young American) was played. It is in fact a "pupil" work and no criterion to judge of his powers in this department of music. It was well received and repeated upon Friday — when I could not hear it as it was a "smoking" day — one of those days when the smoke is carried out in carts after the concerts — I suppose — for else I cannot conceive how the building is cleared.

As to the overture, I prefer to give the opinion of one of the first musicians in the city to my own — with which, however, I agree fully. It exhibits musical talent, especially a natural turn for melody, but a want of command of orchestration, and a lack of fundamental contrapuntal study, both of which branches of the art he is now pursuing under Haupt.

The young German composers can often, with a tithe of the melodic power here shown, produce a more effective orchestral work, simply from the fact that they have been hearing this kind of music all their lives and have learned to use the orchestra as they have learned their mother tongue. Still, under all disadvantages, we were not ashamed of this American work.

Latterly, at most of Liebig's concerts, some one new piece has been played, and in nearly all, if not in every case, has been received with mingled applause and hisses. In this case, from my point of observation, the applause was predominant. No audience, of which the majority has been educated by years of acquaintance with the great masters of orchestral writing, will be satisfied with a succession of tone pictures any more than a really literary audience will applaud a speaker who can merely string together eloquent passages. In both cases there would be a subject — a theme — and this must be wrought out with logical sequence. In music this can only be attained by conquering the groundwork of harmony — canon and fugue. Moreover, this implies something more than the ability to make canons and fugues merely by rule — the spirit of the Sonata form must be thus made our own. It is the spirit of logic — not alone syllogistic rules — which the profound reasoner must acquire. I see nothing to prevent Mr. C., under such a man as Haupt, from making this spirit his own.

MUSIC BY MAIL. — Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Eveleen Lamore. Words by Mrs. Hall. Music by W. R. Dempster. 50

A new song of this favorite composer, which partakes in no small degree of all the excellencies which were enumerated in the last number as belonging to Mr. Dempster's productions.

O ask not my heart if I love thee. L. H. Parish. 25
A light, pleasing "hagatelle."

Maggie of Nantucket. J. B. Packard. 25

No, I cannot forget thee. J. R. Phelps. 25
Two parlor-ballads for young singers.

True love never dies. E. H. Hime. 25
A ballad in that style which is generally termed "taking" — a graceful and sometimes pathetic melody to touching words.

Bonnie Bessie Lee. Scotch Song. J. T. Craven. 25

A pretty little ballad with those cunning peculiarities in melody and rhythm which constitute one of the greatest musical charms of Scotch songs.

The green trees whispered low and mild. Poetry by Longfellow. Music by J. Blockley. 30

The subdued, hushed tone of the poem has been expressed remarkably well in the music. There are few among Longfellow's poems so eminently fit for musical treatment. Blockley has made the most of it and his version cannot but give the greatest satisfaction.

Jenny Bell. Song and Chorus. T. H. Howe. 25

Sally come up, or The Niggers' holiday. Blackney. 25

Echoes from the recesses of Ethiopian minstrelsy; the first sentimental, the second comic; both clever productions in their line.

Ever of thee. Arr. with Guitar accomp. Bishop. 25

Will be very welcome to amateur guitar players, and an easy arrangement of this charming song, which is fast getting popular.

Instrumental Music.

The Erlking, So. by Schubert, ar. by Franz Liszt. 35

Schubert's most celebrated ballad, in a superior pianoforte arrangement, which, notwithstanding its difficulty, will be eagerly bought and practised by every player of some ability, as it depicts the thrilling passages of the song with intense dramatic effect.

Dearest Spot. Quickstep. W. C. Glynn. 25

A lively quickstep, introducing the melody of the favorite song: "The dearest spot on earth to me is home, sweet home."

Books.

BERTINI'S SELF-TEACHING CATECHISM of Music, for the Pianoforte, together with Ample Explanations of the Science as applicable to every Musical Instrument. 25

This is a new and popular hand-book by the author of the celebrated Method of Piano Instruction. It is comprehensive in its style, attractive, and adapted to the capacity of the great mass of learners. An examination of its pages will convince any one of its remarkable excellence, and its use will soon prove it to be an indispensable both to teachers and scholars.

The Story of Don Juan.

(From the Brown Papers.)

(Concluded from last week.)

The scene has again changed to the city. Some time has elapsed, and the Don is again pursuing his love-adventures. Whatever impression the scenes at his chateau had made upon him, it had now worn off. Impunity had made him still more reckless and daring. Scoffing at the warnings which Don Ottavio had given him of impending ruin, he had come into the city now to push an intrigue with the very girl whom Elvira had brought with her as an attendant. It is the last night of his career, but, as if in defiance of fate and of all warnings of danger, it is a night in which the character of the Don exhibits itself as never before. As he and Leporello approached the house in which Elvira had taken up her abode, she was sitting at the window chiding her too fond heart for its pleadings in favor of him who had inflicted the greatest of all injuries upon her, and followed up his cruel desertion by insults no less biting. So far from being repelled from his design by finding the mistress where he sought the maid, Juan, ever fertile in expedients, saw at once a means of turning her presence to his advantage. He took Leporello aside, and exchanged hat and cloak with him—a disguise sufficient in the darkness for his purpose. Approaching the window with his servant, in a voice of deepest sorrow and repentance he confessed his evil treatment of her, and besought her pardon. She, still brooding over her desire for revenge, hesitated long; but the fond memories he recalled, the deep sorrow each tone of his voice breathed, at length overcame her: she yielded to his entreaty to come down and meet him again as her lover, her husband. In the tumult of her emotions, it was easy in the darkness for Leporello to play his master's part undiscovered. All her fond and foolish love returned. All that she could ask, her feigned lover promised. But the Don grew impatient. Suddenly rushing upon them with his drawn sword, she fled, taking Leporello with her to the inner court of the house. The coast being clear, the Don, after a hearty laugh at the success of his scheme, took his guitar, and sang a serenade to Elvira's fair companion; but though he heard some one at the window, his ill-fortune again defeated his wishes.

But we must turn to Masetto.

After the grand attempt upon Zerlina at the banquet, a settled determination to be revenged seized him. He found no difficulty in arming a band of his fellow-villagers, and had followed the Don upon that evening into the city to carry out his determination. They passed through the silent streets one after another in vain, until the patience of his friends began to wane. They had not the same spur to urge them on. Masetto, armed with a musket and a pair of pistols, was full of confidence, and urged his friends to persevere a little longer; they would soon find him. It was their approach in the next street which had driven the Don from Elvira's window. Masetto heard his foot-fall. "Who goes there?" No answer. "Speak, or we fire!"

Again a dilemma for Don Juan. As usual, his presence of mind did not forsake him. He recognized the voice of Masetto, and saved himself in the darkness by feigning to be he whose clothes he wore. He sympathized in all that Masetto could say against the Don; he had become weary of the service of that bold, bad man, and nothing could give him a more sincere pleasure than to assist in bringing him to punishment. The Don was at that moment in company with a young lady, and they might easily surprise him by dividing into two bands, one passing down the street on either hand. He and Masetto would wait there. The advice seemed good, and the two were soon left alone.

"But you would not kill the Don, Masetto? Would it not be enough to break his bones or wound him severely?"

"No, no; I will kill him. I will hew him into a thousand pieces."

"But are you well armed?"

"Yes; here is my musket, and here a pair of pistols."

Under pretense of wishing to examine the arms, the Don got possession of them, and, the street being clear, beat the poor fool until he left him half senseless upon the ground, and escaped. Zerlina had followed her betrothed to the city, and, hearing him crying for help, came to his assistance. She had warned him not to "try conclusions" with the Don, and her anxious, loving little heart had foretold her that nothing but ill-luck could follow his mad attempt upon a cavalier. As this history is represented upon the stage, the scene in which Zerlina comforts her unlucky Masetto is one of the most delicate episodes that can be imagined.

In the mean time, Leporello, by saying little himself and listening much to Elvira, had succeeded in keeping up his assumed character so as to excite no suspicion on her part. But as the hours passed away, he became anxious to depart. The difficulty in the darkness was to find the door, with its thick hanging curtains, by which he had entered. But what added to his fear of detection and to his anxiety was the gleam of torches apparently approaching the house. Elvira's entreaties to him not to leave her were now of no avail. He rushed from door to door, and at length came to that which led to the street. A moment too late; for the curtains divided, and by the light of torches borne by their attendants, lo! Don Ottavio and Donna Anna appeared, while Leporello, baffled in his attempt to escape, rushed for refuge through the nearest door, followed by Elvira.

Don Ottavio and his betrothed had come to consult with Elvira upon their great and common object, the punishment of Don Juan. All goes well; and before seeking out the apartments of Elvira, he stops to console and encourage his companion by this assurance, and to persuade her to look hopefully into the future, to believe that her father's spirit would grieve to hear her longer sigh.

The moment seemed favorable to both Leporello and Elvira to escape into the street—he, to avoid detection and find his master: she, because her feelings had undergone such a change that she wished to avoid Ottavio and Anna, and follow the fortunes of her restored Juan. But a new impediment! Hardly has Leporello once more reached the curtains, when they are again thrown open, and Masetto and Zerlina come in, eager to join in whatever plan may be devised to secure the grand object. The utter astonishment of all present as the glare of the torches shows them the well-known dress of their enemy, is not to be described. Nor was their astonishment lessened to see the Don muffle his face in his cloak, and at their threats of vengeance fall upon his knees, while Elvira, the outraged, the deserted, the insulted, threw herself upon him to shield him from their swords, and besought mercy for her husband!

"Is it Donna Elvira that asks this? No, no; the murderer must die!"

Trembling like an aspen leaf, pale with fear, Leporello threw off his master's bat and cloak, and showed them his cowardly, roguish face, and besought their compassion. Outraged and insulted anew, so rudely awakened from her new dream of love and happiness, poor Elvira stood for a moment confounded, and then a cry for vengeance burst from her breaking heart. A cowardly knave like Leporello was beneath the dignity of Don Ottavio's sword, and he found no great difficulty in eluding the feeble arm of Masetto and making his escape. When the others had somewhat recovered from their astonishment at this new proof of the audacity of Don Juan and his servant, Don Ottavio turned to Elvira, assured her of his conviction that he had discovered the murderer of Don Pedro, adding that if she would still remain in the house for a short time, he would have recourse to the officers of justice, and she should see her betrayer punished. Before leaving on this mission, after the rest had retired within the house, he burst into an apostrophe to his absent mistress, (the well-known Il mio tesoro,) which for true and perfect expression of the most heart-felt affection and love was probably never equalled.

Meantime, Don Juan and Leporello have met once more. At no great distance from the scenes of these last adventures, probably just outside the city-gate, as is usual in Europe, and on the way to Don Juan's country chateau, lay the churchyard in which Donna Anna had had the monument and statue raised to her father's memory.

The Don, after his rencontre with Masetto, had spent some time, if his own word is to be trusted, in adventures more successful than that with Elvira's maid. He met one young girl, he said, who mistook him for Leporello at first, but soon recognizing him, began screaming for help, which forced him to hurry away, and clamber over the church-yard walls for refuge, as Leporello himself had done. All this, and more to the same purpose, the Don related in great glee while assuming his own cloak again. His adventure with the lady-love of Leporello was not so much to the taste of that highly respectable personage.

"And you tell me this so coolly?" said he.

"Why not?"

"Suppose she had been my wife?"

"All the better," said the Don, laughing violently.

His laugh was interrupted by a solemn voice chanting in measured tones, while a burst of awful music came resounding from the tombs:

"This mirth will end before the morning dawns!"

The Don, not awed in the least by what he heard, and supposing that some one was attempting to play with his fears, demanded: "Who goes there?"

Again that awful voice from the statue:

"Blasphemer bold! let the dead in peace repose?"

Don Juan, true to his character as one who feared neither man nor God, looked up with perfect indifference, and, seeing whose statue it was, ordered Leporello to read the inscription. The servant, though half-dead with fright, still feared his master more, and, approaching, read:

"For him, whose impious hand cut short my life, Vengeance surely waits."

The Don heard this with the coolest contempt, and, as if to testify this in the most ridiculous manner possible, ordered Leporello to approach the monument and invite the statue to supper. The fear the poor slave exhibited was but fun for his master, who amused himself for a time in attempting to force him to deliver the invitation. Leporello finally ventured to approach; but seeing the statue nod his head, he retreated to his master in a very paroxysm of fear. The Don, becoming interested in the matter, and wishing to know if in fact there was any foundation for Leporello's assertions, approached himself, and addressed him thus:

"Speak, if you can speak; will you join me at supper?" To which the marble head distinctly replied: "Yes!"

For an instant, he himself seemed somewhat staggered; but his usual hardihood was not lightly to be disturbed, and, after a moment's musing, he exclaimed to his servant, as he left the place: "An odd adventure this, the old man coming to supper! Well, let us go and make ready to receive him." The next moment all was forgotten.

Don Ottavio, having returned from his mission, assured Donna Anna of the certainty of Don Juan's punishment, though he little knew that that punishment was to be inflicted by no mortal hand. But a strange feeling, a sort of presentiment of some unheard-of event, seemed to have taken possession of Donna Anna. She confessed her deep and abiding love for him, but still was unable, as yet, to forget her father and seek happiness and consolation in the arms of a husband; and though he pressed her to reward his long service and constancy of affection on the morrow, when, at the farthest, the murder of her father would be avenged, she still persisted in deferring their marriage to some future time.

Don Juan, in the highest spirits, having entirely forgotten the adventure in the church-yard and the guest he had bidden to supper, reached his chateau with Leporello without farther adventure. The table was spread, his band of musicians were in their places, and to the sound of music he turned, with an appetite whetted by long fasting, to the well-spread board. Wine flowed and champagne sparkled. "As I spend my money freely," said he, "I am determined to enjoy myself." Amusing himself with the music and the drolleries of Leporello, praising his cook and his wines, and doing them full justice, the Don sat at his own board, the very picture of careless epicurianism, if not of innocent happiness, when a woman, without a note of warning, threw herself at his feet. It was Elvira. As the night passed away, and the day approached in which, as she knew from Don Ottavio, the career of her once so beloved Juan would be rudely cut short by the officers of justice, something of her old love returned, and, forgetting all her recent desire of revenge, she had at length given way to the tumult of her feelings, and rushed out, through the night and darkness, to urge upon him repentance. She no longer asked aught of him for herself; she thought not of herself, but oh! she begged of him to repent. The Don, true to himself, made of all this but a new subject for mirth. He invited her to sup with him, told her that, if she persisted in kneeling, he would have to fall upon his knees too; and when she finally, again stung by his treatment, closed her remonstrances by a denunciation, he raised another glass, filled to the brim, and quaffed it as a toast to woman. He had hardly drained his glass, when a shriek from Elvira, who had reached the door on her way out, rang through the saloon, and she was seen flying in terror across the hall to another door, which led from the house. Don Juan, surprised by her shriek of horror, sent his servant to the door. Leporello returned immediately, pale and trembling, scarcely able to inform his master that his marble guest was there, and knocking for admittance. Juan, unable to believe him, and equally unable to force Leporello again to the door, seized the light, and, unmoved as ever, went thither himself. The marble Don Pedro was there. As he looked upon the white, stony face of him whom he had murdered, and heard his footsteps echoing through the hall, he was for a few minutes unmanned. He dropped his light, and staggered, like a drunken man, back into the saloon, the marble guest following with his heavy tread. Don Juan's confusion, however, lasted but a moment; he recovered himself, and when the statue alluded to the invitation he had received, he replied in his usual daring tones that, though he had not supposed he should in fact have such a guest, he would do the best to entertain him, and turning to Leporello, who had in his fear crawled beneath the table, ordered him to set the table anew. The statue replied that mortal food was not for such as he, that he had accepted the invitation, not to eat, but to warn him that his hour was come, and to entreat him to repentance, and, as he had accepted Don Juan's invitation, to ask if he, in return, had courage to accept one from him. Don Juan returned that he had courage for any thing, and would accept. The statue extended his hand, and demanded the hand of the Don as a pledge. Recklessly the hand was clasped. An icy chill ran through the body of Don Juan, freezing the very blood in his veins; he writhed in his agony, but that icy hand still held him fast. Alone in his mortal horror—for all his musicians and attendants had fled—and unable to withdraw his hand from the deadly grasp of the marble guest, still the impious audacity of the Don was unconquered. The awful voice of the statue urged him to repentance in vain. The statue repeated his exhortation: "Repent, perfidious!"

"Dotard, never!"

"'Tis past! thy hope has passed for ever!"

And with these words he loosed his grasp from the hand of the Don, and disappeared. Don Juan, in the darkness and gloom, felt that indeed his hour had come. A mortal terror seized him, and a trembling "which caused all his bones to shake." It seemed to him that his very brain was on fire. He cowered as in mortal agony, and covered his eyes with his hands. As he raised his head again, he saw gathering about him, and illuming the night with hideous glare of unearthly torches, troops of demons and spirits of the abyss. They surrounded him, seizing him with their burning talons, and, as the earth opened beneath his feet, drew him down, his agonizing cry hardly piercing the fearful chorus in which they threatened him with tortures and sufferings below, far, far beyond even those of that fearful hour.

It was hardly yet day when the various parties, so justly incensed against Don Juan, again entered his chateau—Don Ottavio and Donna Anna, Donna Elvira, and Masetto, with his Zerlina. We must imagine the officers spoken of by Ottavio remaining without, while they enter to meet and upbraid the master of the house. They sought him in vain. From Leporello, who still trembled at the awful scene of his master's fate, they learned what had taken place, and saw that the Don had found his punishment at the hand of him he had murdered, and whose shadowy form they had seen flitting by them in the gray twilight of dawn. The great work was accomplished, though by no human hands. Don Ottavio now spoke with confidence of his long and faithful affection, and again besought the long-wished reward. The lofty Anna, feeling that now the manes of her father were appeased, and that she could again enjoy the bliss of loving, gave him her word at the end of the year of mourning to bestow upon him her hand.

Elvira, without hope on earth, declared her intention of taking the veil, while Zerlina and Masetto, happy that no longer any cause of jealousy remained, and that their persecutor was suffering a just recompense at last, left the company of the high-born cavalier and lady for a quiet little meal together. What became of Leporello does not appear, though in his last words he expresses his solemn determination to be a pattern of godliness.

NOTE.—The story of Don Juan as I have given it will, perhaps, by a few readers, be found not exactly to conform to the librettos of the opera as they may have seen it given. Indeed, on one or two points, it differs from the plot as discussed by Oulibichef. My authority has been a text which the Russian writer never saw, a text which Da Ponte, the original author of Mozart's libretto, himself prepared. This text alone, of all the various copies of the opera, and the different text-books which I have seen, has made the progress of the plot and the connection of the various scenes clear. As all is now clear to myself, I hope to have made it so also to the reader.

Mozart's "Figaro"—The Impression it made here.

(From the Atlas and Bee, Dec. 18.)

"Le Nozze di Figaro" was performed for the first time in this city in Italian last evening. The house was completely filled, and the audience was decidedly the most fashionable we have seen thus far. No stronger contrast could well be imagined than that between "The Huguenots" and this delightful opera. In the one you admire the skill in construction; in the other you admire the work without thought of analysis. Meyerbeer pumps laboriously for his melodies; in Mozart's music they gush forth as from living springs. Meyerbeer shows you a mosaic of exquisite pattern, and you wonder at the art displayed in its form and color. Mozart presents you with a living flower, dewy and fragrant, and you do not think of it except as a creation beyond the reach of art.

Equally striking is the contrast between this dear old fashioned music of Mozart and the nerve-shaking, fiercely beautiful strains of more modern times. In Verdi's music, for instance, you seem to come into contact with people whose susceptibilities are intense, who take exaggerated views of life, and who totally lack the sense and the idea of repose. They love and they hate with a superhuman ferocity; they are jealous, and they take vengeance like fiends. A crimson coloring, as of an aurora borealis upon snow, hovers over every scene. The orchestra sympathizes in this excited mood; the violins wail, the trombones roar, the drums beat sullenly, until the hearer comes into such relations with this fascinating but unnatural mood that he accepts the conditions as actual and proper, and is borne on as upon a torrent to the end.

Mozart, on the other hand, with all his divine genius, is the most healthy of composers. Though he aspires to the clouds, he has always a firm foothold upon the earth. In listening to an opera like "Le Nozze di Figaro," (throwing aside all attempts to follow its intricate and dissolute plot,) one could fancy himself in the country on some morning in June, when "every clod feels a stir of might" and "climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;"—when brooks leap down the hill-sides, and birds fill the air with melody,—when the soul finds itself face to face with nature and, filled with an inward sense of the Divine, acknowledges the perfect beauty which the Maker of all pronounced "good."

We shall attempt in vain to convey our impression of this music to those who have not felt it. Every movement is brim-full of melody; still one feels that it cost Mozart nothing to create these airs; they sang themselves in his brain. And on the stage everything sings; the prime donne have nothing but delicious strains to rehearse; and as they sing, flutes and hautboys warble back to them; ponderous bass voices move in graceful measures, while the instruments crown them with delicate festoons of flowers; choruses sing, and every heart answers as though called to dance by pastoral pipes at a rural festival.

(From the Transcript.)

From Meyerbeer to Mozart—"Les Huguenots" to "Le Nozze di Figaro"—was a long reach. From massiveness, grandeur and pageantry to gay romance and quiet domesticity—from ambitious intellectuality of music to the warm outgush of an inspired muse—and from fitful, gusty and sullen complications of harmony into the happy and picturesque sunlight of melody.

The audience, the largest of the season—a genuine compliment to true genius—revelled in the change, and bestowed their appreciation and commendation in all sorts of demonstrative forms. The opera is humorous not so much in its situations as in the investment of character, and in its lack of incident requires performers thoroughly charged with the spirit of comedy to animate it with what is modernly known as stage vitality. The music is of the most felicitous kind, bright, buoyant and graceful,—full of exquisite conceits, imaginative and fanciful.

The instrumentation is Mozartean to a fault, and has that winning tenderness, that kaleidoscopic variety of hue that make his musical pictures so unclinging and unwearisome to the ear. The unity of song and story, the comedy that overflows in air and melody, and the subtle coloring of intrigue and passion that charge its musical dialogue, are master strokes of a man of genius, infusing his happiest mood into a work.

The opera received the closest attention, and was followed throughout with hearty and mirthful appreciation.

(From the Courier.)

Mr. Ullman showers his riches in embarrassing profusion. Close upon Meyerbeer's "Huguenots"—a splendid novelty—comes Mozart's "Figaro's Marriage," as a calm succeeds a storm. Both operas are among the greatest of their kind, but Meyerbeer's ponderous masses of sound and intricate harmonies are in such direct contrast with the silvery melodies and flowing grace of Mozart's muse, that comparisons can hardly be instituted. Vigorous dramatic effect, now so popular, is wanting in "Figaro's Marriage," while the more modern work is wholly destitute of such enchanting strains as are continually springing up in the former. Mozart's opera touches the heart; Meyerbeer's excites and dazzles the imagination.

The performance last night was not good enough. The music is not essentially comic, and the acting should for this reason be especially animated, to supply the deficiency. The story is as gay as a carnival; the performance, some parts of it at least, was as solemn as if proceedings were to terminate in a funeral instead of a marriage. Mr. Formes was the particular star of the evening, but we have seen him do better on many occasions. We cannot admire Piccolomini's acting, as Susanna; her singing was much the best she has offered. Ghioni was passionless and proper. Florenza much the same. Madame Berkel was prettier than any picture, and sung the best she could. The other characters may be dismissed without particular mention.

The audience was magnificent in numbers and appearance. The enthusiasm was not overwhelming, and most of the applause was bestowed in recognition of the exceeding beauty of the music, rather than in compliment to the performers. Mr. Formes received and deserved the greater share of the applause. His "Non più andrai" was encoored, and he repeated it with German words, a game not worth the candle.

"Figaro's Marriage" is not entirely unfamiliar to the public of Boston. An English version, introducing much of the music, was often played at the Tremont Theatre, and it was in the character of the Countess Almaviva, we believe, that Miss Charlotte Cushman made her first appearance upon the stage. We hope to hear it often. It is a work that will not die. Seventy years have passed since its composition, leaving its beauties untouched by time, blooming as ever.

(From the Saturday Evening Express.)

"Le Nozze di Figaro" was the feast for Friday evening, and a feast it was. The gems of the Opera are well known to every one who can boast of even a moderate acquaintance with, and love of the sterling classic music of the past, and when they were, as on last night, set in the composer's own setting—for the cast was admirably adapted to give a correct interpretation of the real meaning of the score—backed up by an orchestral accompaniment, which instead of concealing them, only added to their brilliancy, it is difficult to see the point of the New York Albion's criticism that "all the slow movements are enjoyable, and scarcely show age. But the ripe ones are unmistakably antiquated; anything quicker than an andante is dull. We say this with a full recollection of the concerted pieces, which abound in the opera, and which, in their day, were considered the perfection of rapid brilliancy. Anything duller than these pieces we do not now desire to hear." It was curious to note the difference of effect between this and the Huguenots' in exhausting the strength and attention in following the plot and listening to the music. It was but little shorter than the latter in point of time occupied in its performance, but while on Tuesday evening the feeling when the curtain finally fell, was one of excessive fatigue of body, brain and eye, last night none of these was observed and one could easily realize what is reported of its performance at Prague on its first being there brought out, that the excitement and emotion of the band in accompanying this work was such, that there was not a man among them who would not have cheerfully recommenced and played the whole through again. There was a deeply satisfied feeling evident in the audience, both as to the music and the performance, and in many instances this broke out into hearty and persistent calls for repetition which were often acceded to, but at other times respectfully but firmly declined. Could this opera be performed here frequently enough to make it entirely familiar we think it would rank second to no other as a favorite. But from the great number and peculiar character of the principal parts, we can only hope to enjoy its delicious harmonies under the management of such bold and experienced impresarios as Mr. Ullman. Had he given us no other novelty than this, we should have been deeply in his debt.

Statues and Piano-fortes.

A Philadelphian, describing his visit to Boston, in the Evening Bulletin, of Dec. 16, pays the following tribute to institutions whereof we are proud:

Apologues of statues, as the subject is agitating of a statue of Washington, to be placed in Independence Square, in your city, I would suggest to, and advise, any Committee who may eventually be delegated to procure such a statue, to see a model of an Equestrian Statue by THOS. BALL, Esq., of Boston. For boldness and originality of conception, and detail of exquisite finish, he is justly ranked among the first living sculptors. A gem of his art is a bust of the late Mr. JONAS CHICKERING, a beautiful work, and said to be a most perfect likeness. This reminds me of another prominent building—the Piano-Forte Manufactory of Chickering & Sons—the successors of him I have just mentioned—located on Tremont street. It is, undoubtedly, the largest building in the United States, excepting the National Capitol and Patent Office, at Washington, and, without question, the largest, by more than one half, and the most perfect and complete establishment, devoted exclusively to the manufacture of pianos, in the world. I had the pleasure of being introduced to Mr. T. E. Chickering, the senior member of the firm, who most kindly furnished me every facility for inspecting every part of this vast concern, and the gratification which I experienced from the visit must be my apology for inflicting on you a short detail. The premises comprise an entire square of 206,000 feet, or five acres. The plan of the building forms a hollow-square. The principal front is on Tremont street, 245 feet by 52 deep, besides a projection in the centre for the base of an octagonal tower, 21 feet in diameter, reaching an altitude of 110 feet. The north front, on Northampton street, 262 feet by 50 feet, and the south front, on Camden street, 250 feet by 50 feet, all five stories high on the fronts, and six from the hollow-square. The west side of the square is formed by an engine and boiler house, and wings two stories high. All the stories are 11 feet in the clear. So much for the building. To attempt to describe the whole routine of manufacture would take too much time and too much of your paper, but more perfect arrangements and conveniences for making Piano Fortes cannot be imagined. It is no wonder that they are said to make the most perfect work—the wonder would be for them to make a poor instrument, with their immense facilities.

The gentlemen who accompanied me through the works, informed me that everything pertaining to a piano is made under this one roof, excepting the strings, which are made expressly for them. That their pianos are so uniformly good, is accounted for (in respect to their not being affected by any climate) by the fact that Messrs. C. & Sons take great pains to use none but the best and most thoroughly seasoned lumber, a stock of which is kept on hand, never falling below $15,000 in value, and is seasoned by being "stuck" up one year in the open air, one year under cover, and six months in a drying-room, with a temperature of 95° Fahr., before it is used. I had always heard that the "Chickering" Piano was the best, and now that I had an opportunity of judging to some extent of the foundation for such common reports, and at the same time afford myself much gratification in sight-seeing, I took particular pains to see every part of the manufacture; and it must be seen to be appreciated. I can only compare it to a huge machine, perfect and systematic, and necessarily producing perfect work.

A great secret of their success is, I am credibly informed, that the Chickeringers are practical mechanics; each one to-day, being a first class workman, capable of constructing a piano from first to last. Having this actual, practical knowledge and skill, and untiring energy, it is clear to understand how they maintain so high a reputation, and why their instruments have so wide a popularity. The character and extent of their works can be pretty accurately judged, when I inform you that they are finishing fifty Pianos weekly, employing over four hundred first class workmen, and orders pouring in from their agents in all parts of North and South America. They have already made about 21,000. Truly, they have a name,—one in which the whole country ought to, as the Bostonians do, feel a just pride.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 13.—On my return to New York, I find that I have missed much that was worth hearing. Among other things, the "St. Paul" was given twice by the Mendelssohn Union. If I am not mistaken, this great work has never been brought out here before, and its first performance attracted so crowded an audience, that a repetition was deemed necessary. Never having heard it entire, I cannot judge of its merits in comparison to "Elijah." Of pianists "there is no end" this season. GOLDNECK, the diligent and energetic, is upon the taps again, with new compositions, the fruit of the past summer, which manifest a steady improvement. At a concert given last Thursday, he brought out a second Trio, and several smaller compositions. But as he never, like many other artists, confines himself to his own works, he also gave us a sonata of Beethoven and some Nocturnes and the Bergeuse of Chopin, which he rendered with his usual excellence. Madame GRAEVER-JOHNSON, too, appeared before the public on Friday. She is decidedly one of the finest female pianists (if not the finest) that we have ever had here, and every one must be glad that the concert last week was only the first of a series. She was assisted by Miss ANNIE KEMP, whose contralto, of very unusual timbre, we heard last winter several times, and a Mr. HUDSON, of whom the Evening Post says (and I can imagine no better criticism), that he had "a still, small voice." A Madame ABEL made her début during my absence, who is very highly spoken of, and of whom I hope to give you a favorable account soon. Another débutant has been Master ARTHUR NAPOLEON, a small lad not yet in his teens, whose performance is said to be quite wonderful.

We have much good music in prospect. The next Philharmonic, with the Seventh Symphony and overtures by Schubert and Weber, promises very fair. EISEL'S Soirées we shall sorely miss, nor can anything take their place, but MASON & BERGMANN'S Quartet concerts will be all the more welcome from being the only ones of the kind. Mr. Bergmann has commenced a series of Sunday evening concerts; the Harmonic Society sing the "Messiah" on Christmas as usual; and for the 28th we are promised the "Creation," by the Liederkrantz. This glorious work is so rarely given here, that it ought to attract a large audience, particularly as it is given for a benevolent object, i. e., the German Ladies' Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans. The Mt. Vernon Association end this week and begin the next with a grand "three days' festival," a combination of dramatic, musical, plastic, and terpsichorean performances, at the Academy of Music. The first night is devoted to drama, opera, and tableau, the second to a "bal pare," and the third to a classical concert. The two first will probably be very exclusive and fashionable, the prices of admission being very high, to the last the tickets will be but 25 cents, and if any body has a desire to be crushed, I advise them to go there.

The Journal of last week has just come to hand, and I am delighted to find "Trovator" so appreciative of my merits. Seriously, his remarks upon me hitherto have been rather flippant, to say the least, and I am glad to recognize a more kindly spirit in these last ones. I hope we shall "assist" each other admirably for a long time to come. —t—

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 13. — Prior to the departure of the Italian Opera Troupe from our Academy, it was deemed expedient by the manager to appease the clamorous outcries of the public for novelty, by a production of Don Giovanni. I do not design, at this late day, to recount to you its reception by the masses assembled. The fact is, I desire to be philanthropic and charitable; nor would I harrow the feelings of a connoisseur like yourself, or of your hosts of intelligent readers, by the painful spectacle of a chef d'œuvre entrusted to, for the most part, third-rate artists. I might however mention en passant, that the Zerlina of Mme. COLSON illumined, with one solitary ray of brilliancy, the gloomy fiasco; and drew off the mind with a sense of refreshing relief, from the insipidity, and awkwardness of the Don, and the melancholy vacuity of the Leporello. Let it pass, unnoticed and forgotten, — this wretched rendition of the world-renowned Giovanni.

The Rev. T. STARR KING, of your city, delivered some evenings since, the initiatory lecture of a course, which has been arranged by the Harmonia Sacred Music Society. Circumstances precluded the possibility of my attendance, but a feeling of deep regret seemed to pervade those who were present, that the lecturer's reputation, his subject ("Music") and the additional attraction of well-rendered choruses, should have failed to draw a remunerative audience. It can solely be accounted for by the fact that the intellectual circles of our city have been flooded with lectures, thus far, this winter, nor is the end of them yet, for the columns of the daily papers teem constantly with "special notices" of this sort of entertainment, by all the lecturers of the land, — from Henry Ward Beecher down to "Geo Munday," an eccentric Philadelphia notability, who labors gratuitously for the mental culture of the rising generation here, with the nearest fire-plug to serve as a rostrum. Seriously, — the efforts of the Harmonia to present to the community a series of edifying and interesting entertainments, deserve more consideration at the hands of the public, than has thus far been accorded to them.

The Handel and Haydn Society is engaged upon the rehearsals necessary to a production of the "Messiah," during the coming Christmas holidays. It is designed to offer this celebrated work with a chorus of unusual numerical strength, and with the efficient services of the Germania Orchestra besides. The managers have, furthermore, determined to transfer their scene of operations from the Handel and Haydn Hall, (a location somewhere in the region of the North pole) to the more central Musical Fund Hall; a politic move, which will materially serve to accommodate the majority of our connoisseurs, and to ensure to the Society, besides, the space to seat, comfortably, a larger crowd of persons. Miss HENRIETTA SHAW, and Mrs REED are to sustain the solos. Both of these ladies have won for themselves a proud reputation with the subscribers of this popular Society, and are even now assiduously and ambitiously rehearsing their respective parts. Miss Shaw's voice presents many of the properties which characterized the organ of that sweet songstress of Albion, Louisa Pyne. It is unusually clear, sympathetic and flexible. —

"When is PICCOLOMINI coming to Philadelphia?" — seems an oft repeated query in this latitude. Quien sabe? Some weeks ago, the polite circles of this city were temporarily agitated by a newspaper item seemingly emanating from the "little Napoleon himself, and which, after soundly scoring the Directors of our Academy for attempting to impose upon the poor Director of the Piccolomini troupe intolerable rents per week, closed somewhat after the following formula: —

"Nevertheless Mlle. P. finds it impossible to forego the pleasure of singing before a Philadelphia public. Therefore the Director has pleasure to announce, that he has secured the Musical Fund Hall for two nights, and that he purposes to erect therein a temporary stage and scenery for operatic purposes; in order to evince his great desire to afford the music-loving people of this city an opportunity of hearing this celebrated vocalist, in spite of the annoyances to which he has been subjected." The flutter of derision which ensued upon the publication of this morcean, subsided a few days thereafter, when the paragraph was withdrawn from the paper in which it had appeared. Opera at the Musical Fund Hall! Capital joke that! The temporary stage would scarcely have been sufficiently wide to have admitted a puppet exhibition of the "Devil and Dr. Faustus," or the "Children in the wood" over whom a bevy of philanthropic robins strewed the leaves of the forest. Nevertheless, 'twas a clever dodge, — this Musical Fund Hall operatic campaign in prospectu. It set folks to talking, — to speculating, — to wondering, — in truth it has added its quota in advance, to the success, which will scarcely fail to attend "la petite Comtesse," when eventually she shall gracefully sweep the ample stage of our noble Opera House.

MANRICO.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., DEC. 14. — The second concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society came off last Saturday night. The audience was both large and select, and all seemed to relish the entertainment very much. The programme was as follows:

PART I. — Symphony, "Pastorale": Beethoven. Aria, "Softly sighs the voice of Evening," Lucy Escott: Weber. Grand Concerto, Pianoforte, F minor, Larghetto, Allegro Agitato, Mr. Wm. Mason: A. Henselt. Il mio Valsler, Lucy Escott: Venezano.

PART II. — Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream": Mendelssohn. Grand Galop Fantastique, Pianoforte: composed and performed by Mr. Wm. Mason. "Ah! Forse è lui," Lucy Escott: Verdi. Overture, "Euryanthe": Weber.

The Symphony was executed admirably, and if we except a little unsteadiness and wavering in the Andante movement, there was nothing more to be desired.

Mrs. ESCOTT is not up to the present standard as a first class vocalist, by any means. The aria "Softly sighs the voice of evening" does not give a correct idea of what she really did sing. It was nothing as unpretending as this simple title would seem to indicate, for it was nothing less than a whole scena — the one so often sung from Der Freyschutz, including the recitative and two airs. But Mrs. Escott did not appear to advantage, for she attempted more than she is capable of doing. Something more within her capacity would have left a better impression on the audience.

Mr. MASON played, as he always does, to the satisfaction of everybody. His second piece was honored with an encore, when he gave us his "Silver Springs" which appeared to me more worthy of a place in the programme than the "Grand Galop Fantastique," which seemed to contain more difficulties than beauties. But the audience seemed to relish it very much.

Mr. BERGMANN fills Mr. Eisfeld's place most acceptably, which is saying quite enough for any one.

BELLINI.

HARTFORD, CONN. DEC. 20. — The Germans of this city have given a Concert, for the benefit of the German-English Schools, at Touro Hall, which was well filled, from the aim as well as the attraction of the music. The chorus was made up of sixty men's voices, grand piano-forte accompaniment, and MAX MAYO as Conductor, — giving us a good specimen of a large German "Männer-Chor." The "Chorus of Freedom" and the "Pilgrims' Chorus," from Tannhäuser, were very effective, — as well as the well-sung Sextet from the "Huguenots." Mr. ZWEIGGART performed a quaint little Solo on the "Zither," a Bohemian instrument, which, with Piano accompaniment, was quite pleasing. Max Mayo delighted the audience with a brilliant series of variations by Henri Herz, and was encored, — so was nearly every thing on the programme — a selfish and avaricious custom that is becoming more and more noticeable in our concerts, and which is truly an outrage upon the good-will of the performers. Compliments and appreciative demonstrations are well enough, and as they should be; but this everlasting clapping, stamping, bravo-ing and brava-ing, in order to get all you can out of an artist, or artists, so that you may be sure of obtaining your "money's worth," is an approximation to a nuisance; and I trust that some independent troupe will have courage enough to adopt it as a rule, not to repeat any portion of their programme, and thereby take one step towards abolishing this foolish and detestable practice. This making a puppet of every performer, and obliging them to trot out and repeat any and everything on a programme at the caprice and beck of a promiscuous audience, is a down-right imposition; however much the singer or player may feel flattered by any such long-continued applause. Almost all of our concerts are spoiled in this manner — our ears becoming surfeited long before the close, and the best selections, which are generally reserved for the end, are well-nigh lost upon the minds of the hearers. So much for so much. Of the other features of the concert I cannot write, as I was obliged to leave before it was ended.

Miss KATE DEAN and GEO. COOKE, are expected here next week, and we are anticipating a fine treat.

Something which you quoted about the lisping of ROBERT FRANZ, reminds me of the fact, which may be unknown to you, that MENDELSSOHN also lisped. WENSEL, a teacher in the Conservatory at Leipsic, used to imitate him in his manner and speech, as when he came into the room at the "Unterhaltung," which was highly interesting. PLAIDY told us once how Mendelssohn, at a rehearsal for a Gewandhaus concert, was unable to play, through nervousness, a certain difficult passage on the piano-forte, in a Concerto, with Orchestral accompaniment, and how, after several attempts, he relinquished it, and went home and practised only the scales during the afternoon,—without once looking at the unlucky measure,—and at the performance in the evening, played it through with perfect ease. I was so fortunate as to receive from PLAIDY a portion of the original manuscript of one of the "Songs without Words,"—Book Third—No. 4,—and it is a great source of pleasure to compare it with that published,—so delicately jotted down,—just as it came from the composer's brain,—now a half note carelessly erased, and four eighth notes substituted in its place,—now a dotted quarter and an eighth marked out, and equalled by a half note—the sostenuto characters—the peculiar shaped clefs—the three hastily written sharps,—how interesting are all these,—for there has rested Mendelssohn's own hand, and thereupon his eyes have gazed,—why should n't the little scrap be considered valuable and deeply interesting? It certainly is to me—nearly priceless!

In Springfield they are to have the "Messiah" brought out on Wednesday evening of this week. E. J. FITZHUGH is the conductor. The bass solos are to be sung by Mr. WHITNEY, of Boston. In Northampton, I understand, they are soon to have the opera of Trovatore produced by native artists. The whole of the music has been arranged by a highly talented musical amateur of that place, and it will undoubtedly be a success. GEORGE KINGSLEY, the organist and composer, is now a resident of Northampton. You will thus see that the inland towns are not all asleep in the cause of musical advancement, although they may labor under poor advantages.

BERLIN, NOV. 22.—Last evening the Singakademie repeated the performance which I recorded in November 1855:—"Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit," a funeral cantata by Bach, and Cherubini's Requiem. Two of the choruses in the former were magnificent—indeed I am beginning to work my way into Bach's style in the rest of the work, and a feeling of that man's greatness is rising within me. Still, in spite of the influences in favor of Bach here, which operate upon us all, I can not yet—and doubt if ever—forswear my allegiance to the majesty of Handel.

The Requiem of Cherubini is certainly a most magnificent masterpiece. When a great work by one of the great composers is for the first time presented to any musical community, it is an epoch in the artistic history of that public—as in the case of the "Messiah," the "Creation," "Elijah," the fifth Symphony of Beethoven, Rossini's "Moses," and the like, in Boston. I assure you, the first performance of this Requiem would be such an epoch. The work is entirely choral; and such wonderful choruses! I wrote you before that Mozart's Requiem makes one cry; Cherubini's makes you tremble. In London, Mozart's,—here, last night, Cherubini's, had upon me their old effect.

Your readers may like to know something about the author of the articles in your Journal upon Mendelssohn and Weber, which called out the ire of the London Musical World.

HERMANN ZOPFF is still a comparatively young man, having been born in 1826 at Grossglogau, in Silesia; studied at the Gymnasia of Glogau and Breslau and at the Universities of Breslau and Berlin, devoting himself upon coming of age to the science of agriculture, and finally becoming steward of a landed property in the Silesian mountains. While there he formed such an orchestra as he could out of village musicians and school teachers, and without knowing anything of the science of music, used to compose for it. In his 24th year he produced some of those compositions in Glogau, and the result was such that he was advised to really study music in earnest. For this purpose he came to Berlin in 1849 and became a pupil of Marx, who after a few years study, made him his assistant in teaching the theory of music. After having established two or three small choral meetings in successive years, the idea occurred to him of establishing a school for the study of operatic music, and his present Opern-Akademie was the result; being founded Nov. 13, 1854. It appears to be quite a flourishing school now, employing some half a dozen teachers, and having its headquarters in a fine, spacious house, quite centrally situated.

He has composed a good deal,—I have heard nothing from his works and can therefore give no opinion upon them. His chief works are:

"Astrea" a poem for declamation in 60 Sonnets, with "liturgic" music, choruses and melodrama by Zopff, performed in Berlin and Stettin, with piano-forte, in Königsburg and Hamburg with orchestra.

"Mohammed," opera. Some numbers sung in Berlin in concerts, the whole given under Liszt in Weimar, as Concert Music to a part of the "Alexandria" of Dr. Märcker—the closing scenes under the title of "Funeral Solemnities of Alexander the Great." This was performed a few months since at a concert in Arnim's Saloon, to which Humboldt, Meyerbeer, and many other literary, civil and musical dignitaries accepted invitations. As I said, I have heard none of Zopff's music—which by the way is not confined at all to these more ambitious attempts—and you know I am not given to reporting hearsay.—

A sad piece of news comes to me from London—Mrs. KINKEL is dead! She with whom I had so pleasant an interview a few months since. From a letter in the National Zeitung of this city I draw the following particulars for you, in case you have not noticed the event.

Mrs. Kinkel had suffered for some time from bronchitis, catarrh, &c. and on Monday, the 15th, called a physician, who visited her in her chamber in the third story, considered her illness as of small importance, advised her to keep her bed for the day and take some mild prescription. Immediately after the doctor, came Prof. K. to rejoice her with some good news in relation to his business prospects. The servant girl, too, came in with a cup of chocolate. All agree that she was in the very best spirits. The Doctor left, the professor went to his engagements, the servant girl went down stairs.

Ten minutes afterwards the girl came into the room again—Mrs. K. was not to be seen—the window was open—the girl looked down into the area, her mistress lay upon its pavement! As they raised her she was breathing her last.

An explanation of this is easy. Two years ago on this very day she was, in company, attacked by cramps in the region of the heart, her life being then saved no doubt by the accidental presence of a physician, as one of the guests.

Now, as the post-mortem examination showed a very great enlargement of the right ventricle of the heart, it is clear that a sudden attack drove her to the window, which she threw up, for air, and as it was but about two feet from the floor, as she swooned, she lost her balance, and fell out. The coroner's jury of course rendered a verdict of accidental death.

Few women have passed through more sorrow and anxiety than she. Thank God that the last few years in London have been happy ones!

The news comes from Vienna to day that CARL HOLZ, a member of the Schuppanzigh Quartet during Beethoven's last three years, and one of his intimate companions for about two years of that time—often employed by the great composer in his money transactions, died on the 9th inst., aged 60 years. So they go one after another—the men whom of all men I wish to know. Alois Fuchs, the great collector of portraits and autographs of musicians, told me in 1851, that if I would only stay in Vienna he would do all that was in his power to aid me in my work, but I had no Mæcenas, and must back to America. He is dead. He offered to make me known to Holz. Now Holz is also gone. Who will be left in the Spring when I get there! Holz it seems has left a note-book full of important musical records, but they have, it is feared, too much of a short hand character to be decipherable.

Gräfe is the great oculist of Europe. I heard in the house of one of the oldest and most famous of the professors of the Berlin University, the other day, a musical anecdote of him. A lady told it there, who had gone with another, to be with her during a terrible operation, no less than the taking out of an eye, and the removal of a hard substance, which had fixed itself behind the eye. Chloroform was administered, and Gräfe proceeded with perfect coolness and unruffled calmness to his operation, which proved worse and far more dangerous than was apprehended—the object being to save the sight of the other organ. At length it was over, and the bandage applied. The oculist excused himself and left the room, immediately after which the lady, who told the incident, heard the tones of a magnificent pianoforte nobly played. This lasted a few minutes and the Doctor returned. He apologized; he had performed one of the most difficult and fearful tasks that belong to his profession, and it had become absolutely necessary to calm his nerves by music! A. W. T.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for Soprano Solo and Chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Italian Opera.

We have another rich week to record. The first performance of the "Huguenots" was wisely followed by a rest of two nights. One of them, however, (Wednesday of last week) was occupied by a miscellaneous Concert in the Theatre, in which the principal artists of the troupe exhibited their powers to the immense delight of the audience in various popular show pieces; but of which two features chiefly claim a passing mention here. First, the production, and in fine style, of an unfamiliar overture of Beethoven, to 'King Stephen', by the orchestra placed on the stage,—a work with the true fire in it, but little heeded save by the few. Second, the inordinate indulgence of the audience in the "encore swindle," almost every vocal piece having been redemanded.—On Friday evening, Mr. ULLMAN gratified a hope long, long deferred, in suffering a Boston audience to witness Mozart's comic opera:

LE NOZZE DI FIGARO.

Our "Athens" could scarcely pass muster as a musical city so long as it remained a stranger to this world-famous opera. It was almost like living in ignorance of one of the best plays of Shakspeare:—an ignorance, in this case, converted into bliss for some two thousand people—the largest and most cultivated audience of the season—on Friday evening. It was perhaps well that we were forced to wait until this master-work of genius could be put before us with such completeness and fidelity. Its floating fragments of immortal melody, which have mingled themselves in all our lives more or less from childhood, could now be brought together in their original connection, in a live and perfect whole, that would not disappoint.

For our public it was one of the best of lessons to have two such works as the Huguenots and the Nozze di Figaro make their impressions on us in immediate succession. No two works could be in greater contrast: it was the most imposing type of the extreme modern tendency in music—the music of effect,—brought side by side with one of the perfect instances of the pure spontaneous process of creative genius, in an opera which for three quarters of a century has held its place as “classical” for just that reason. It was the comparison of a gorgeous, grotesque, bewildering and exciting romance of a Victor Hugo or a Eugene Sue with anything as quiet, sweet and genuine as “As you like it.” The advantages of the modern work are all external, on the outside, extrinsic, properly speaking, to pure musical inspiration; advantages of form and treatment, due to improved means and mechanism, rather than to vital quantity and quality of music; the advantage of imposing combinations, new orchestral coloring, the dramatic employment of masses on the stage, great stage effects, rare studied contrasts,—and above all, dramatic intensity of well chosen subject and ingeniously elaborated plot. Meyerbeer's vast combinations are built upon a minimum of melody. Musical thoughts, as such, do not seem to come unbidden with him. He has no unailing fount of inspiration to draw from. He is blessed with few real melodies. His poetic or dramatic theme, when he has chosen it and reflected on it and filled his mind with it, does not take possession of him in such an intrinsically musical way as to become fused in his imaginative consciousness, and so transmuted into a spontaneous perfect flow of tones. On the contrary, armed with all technical skill and knowledge in the art, with a tenacious, comprehensive brain, he studies out appropriate and striking settings of each situation and each least phrase of his text; he does this with consummate judgment, only always with prime reference to effect upon a public; determined first of all that it shall strike; for he is not that willing, consecrated votary to truth for truth's sake, that he can be content to hide a talent where only the divining rod of sympathetic understanding in a few shall own its presence. He will run no such risk. He will make less gold go farther. So he constructs us an immense romantic melodrama, in the literal sense of that word, a grand historical picture in music, splendidly illustrating all the scientific and material resources of our modern music, impressing us with a sense of power, startling us with contrasts, taxing our every faculty of attention, interesting us intensely for at least once, but wearying heart and brain, and making us feel that, after all, a violence has been done to the living peace and freshness of our souls, that we have been subjected to a rude tumultuous stimulus ab extra, but have not tasted that divine refreshment, have not breathed that life-giving atmosphere of is called repose in Art.

Now Mozart consciously attempts far less, but Mozart is unspeakably more, higher and finer than all that. For Mozart was a man of genius, one who wrought wholly by the spontaneous processes of genius. Melodies, fresh, beautiful, divine, such as are of no age, but in all ages speaking like a native language to all hearts, were his almost without the seeking,—so beautiful, that what he thought to utter in tones came back to him a hundred times more beautiful and more significant than he had meant it:—ever the true poet's experience; and such surprises to oneself, probably, are just the only real poetry, and have the only right to go forth to the world as poems. The same, in the highest sense, with music.

The “Marriage of Figaro” is quite as genuine and Mozartean, but not as great a work as Don Giovanni. It is a lighter and an earlier effort—if such a felicitous creation can be called an effort. He had a lighter, nay an altogether poorer subject to deal with; one which lacked the supernatural and the tragic element afforded by the story upon which that crowning masterpiece of his complete musicianship was founded. What a plot indeed, for a nature so sincere as Mozart! Out of Beaumarchais' sceptical and sneering comedy, then all the rage, and even acquiring a certain consequence among the political signs of the times before the French Revolution, from its smart satire on the unbelief and untruth of the whole social fabric,—a plot of miserable intrigues and tricks, in which every one of the eight or ten characters is intriguing against every other almost; a mesh of complicated love relations, in which each lover forfeits any interest you once begin to take in him, by showing himself insincere, jealous and at the same time false:—from such a picture of the prose side of life, Da Ponte made him the libretto. What was there in all this for one like Mozart? The characters, at least the principal ones, cannot interest us. They are in fact our old friends of the “Barber of Seville.” The Count is Almaviva, and the Countess is Rosina, and Figaro, now on the eve of marriage, intrigues upon his own account to baffle the designs of the false Count upon his own pretty, bright Susanna, my lady's maid and confidant. Rossini, afterwards, brought just the right genius to the treatment of the first stage of this story. His music, so sparkling and facile, full of original and never failing melody, a music almost witty, delicious to hear, but never much in earnest, genial, but external, is in the very spirit of such comedy. Moreover, the libretto of the “Barber” is broad farce, lending itself more readily to comic music; whereas “Figaro's Marriage” is genteel comedy abounding in the wit of conversation, hardly admitting of translation into anything so much sincerer and deeper as a Mozart's music must be. But therefore, and in spite of this, let us admire the genius of our dear Mozart all the more:—that he could transmute such a plot into so exquisite a musical midsummer's day.

He treats the subject in his own way, as he only could, by the necessity of his genius, which is perfect freedom. He is child enough, and has enough genial zest of humor, to make the exquisite comedy of the thing sing itself out to very ecstasy, while, at the same time, Shakspeare-like, he is continually getting very much in earnest, and idealizing these sportive amours of a day in melodies that spring from the sincerest depths and soar up to the heavenliest heights of real love. Indeed it seems as if we felt in such an opera of Mozart just the highest mission and symbolic sense of music:—the suggestion, through whatever low and common net-work of relations, of an ideal, pure, harmonic life; his music lifting every character to an unwonted sincerity; touching each emotion with a glow of holier aspiration; making these poor intrigues and alliances to typify a social whole of pure spontaneous spiritual interchange, entirely pure and free and vital,—a blessed after-world of innocence and love.

Look now at the characters and at their songs. Susanna, the fascinating, cunning, roguish, pretty lady's maid, would not, were she the liveliest of comedienues, act her part so humorously that the music would not lend a finer touch of delicacy and sparkle to it; her rapid recitatives are the ideal perfection of natural language; they are what talk might be with perfect organs in a perfect medium—“fits of easy transmission” as the electricians say. Then she is such a good sympathetic creature—so the music makes her—so kindly amused with little Cherubino's confessions. But Susanna really loves Figaro, and when on the eve of their union, after baffling the Count's designs, she sings Deh vieni, non tardar, can you conceive of any melody of love more heart-felt, pure and heavenly? Mlle. PICCOLOMINI sang this with much fervor and beauty, while in the general presentation of the part, with all its archness, she was charming—thoroughly alive in all the action, (sometimes too much so) wearing the rhythmical chains of the music with most natural ease and grace. Her recitative was particularly neat and delicate; her small voice always musical and telling.

The Countess—(how changed from our Rosina, who is just what Rossini's music makes her, sparkling and charming, but external, without passion,)—is the one serious person of the play, though not above intrigue, and hardly interesting as the play-wright makes her. But what depth of longing tenderness, of sadness chased by gleams of golden hope, those lovely airs of hers reveal: Porgi, amor, and Dove sono! Are there diviner melodies, unless you seek them also in Mozart? Mme. GHIONI appeared to better advantage in this part, although wanting in action and of marble coldness of features. She sang the music conscientiously, and with fair voice and expression, being greatly applauded in Dove sono. Her voice blended beautifully with Susanna's in the duet Sul aria, where she dictates the note,—a duet of such natural and unalloyed simplicity of melody, that the whole audience were entranced.

Let us thank Beaumarchais for giving Mozart a character so after his own heart, as the page Cherubino. What a charming part indeed! and Mme. BERKEL had just the pretty figure for it, and enacted the bewitching boy to a charm. Her voice is thin, but her artistic conceptions were all good, and she sang with unction. He is a boy of some thirteen years, in whose breast the first vague stirrings of the master passion are just beginning to be felt, filling him with delicious and alarmed surprise. He finds every beautiful woman having a mysterious attraction for him, poor rogue; and the little songs he writes and sings to Susanna and his mistress: Non so più cosa son, and Voi che sapete, are his confessions, as serious and touching as they are delightfully comical. Oulibicheff sees in Cherubino Don Giovanni in the bud. By the music of the two operas this is quite transparent. Nay, we may go further and say, Cherubino is Mozart. But this thought we have no room to develop.

Figaro, now major-domo of the Count, has in Mozart's treatment a finer and more intellectual kind of humor than Rossini's barber. Besides, he has an earnest side; he loves Susanna, and it is with an honest glow that he boasts his wits a match for those of the Count. How finely Mozart's music fits both sides of him! That dainty, cunning strain: Se vuol ballare, &c., is the melodic motif of the character. The song Non piu andrai is the prototype of Rossini's Largo al Factotum, and not reached by that. FORMES sang and acted it to perfection, as indeed he did the whole part. Figaro also has a very earnest air in the last act, where he suspects Susanna; and where there is real passion Mozart, like a bounteous creator, is no respecter of persons, but gives him his best to sing, the servant now being as much man and having as much use for music as his lord.

Count Almaviva, baritone, the central personage in all this, stands for the dissolute vices of the great, exposed and satirized. But Mozart will not let a momentary, superficial passion end with that; it goes hard with him to give up the game; he finds that he is seriously in love with Susanna; the duet: "Crudel perché" is one of the most touching and impassioned love-strains; he is better than he would be in it, for love and music are divine when they are real. And in his soliloquy before the wedding, where he vents his chagrin at being thus outwitted by Figaro, Mozart has given him a grand aria, with splendid orchestral accompaniment, altogether in his most noble and dramatic style. Sig. FLORENZA sang his music well, with a rich and manly voice; and looked the Count well, in his quiet attitudes, but in the intense parts is given to strange crouching postures and grimaces.

Of the minor characters we can only say that the small part of Don Basilio, (the only tenor in the opera, strange to say,) was well done by Mr. PERRING, so far as singing goes; and that Signora MORRA, as Marcellina, Herr MUELLER as the gardener, and Herr — as Dr. Bartolo were quite acceptable.

But the charm lay in the opera as a whole. Its concerted pieces are as fine as its songs; especially that septet finale of the second act. Mozart's finales are quiet and unpretending as compared with those of Meyerbeer or Verdi; but whereas these latter are most artificially imposing, a tenor and soprano shouting in unison, while other voices put in mere phrases of accompaniment, properly belonging to bassoon or contrabasso or what not in the orchestra, in Mozart's finales each voice sings in character, phrases which seemed as positively dictated by the personal as by the contrapuntal complication. The chorus, it is true, he uses unambitiously; it is a chorus of peasants, and they sing peasants' music, natural and simple festive strains. How quaintly beautiful that dance music! But it is all one continuous and living whole; a world of heavenly music; and it all floats charmingly upon a summer sea of instrumentation, which is so full and delicious that one is tantalized by the desire to listen to the orchestra alone. Ever at the right moment, each turn of thought, or feeling, or situation is met at once, as if by heavenly accident, by just the fittest instrumental phrase that mortal brain could possibly invent. The orchestral accompaniments afford such felicitous and sympathetic background, that it is as if the whole world took the color of our own passing thoughts and moods.

The performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" in Boston must have made its mark, and will be productive of great good. It was "experiencing" music, as some say of religion.

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.
LA SERVA PADRONA.

The Saturday afternoon performance offered these two pieces to a crowded house. Donizetti's hacknied opera was passably rendered, with PICCOLOMINI, BRIGNOLI and FLORENZA in the principal parts.

Pacsiello's little comic operetta gave the very best play to Piccolomini's especial talent. She looked more prettily, and sang and acted more bewitchingly and funnily as the servant-mistress, than in any part before. Sig. MAGGIOROTTI, a veteran, of the genuine buffo stamp, was all that was needed as the old master. The vixenish, quarrelling duet introduced from Anber's "Mason and Locksmith," given by Piccolomini and Mme. Morra, was extremely comical. The music, old and quaint, and very simple, is really genial and charming; reminding one of Mozart, so far as Mozart wrote in the fashion of his time — this was composed while Mozart was a boy — but infinitely less rich in thought or treatment.

On Monday night we had a repetition of "The Huguenots;" on Tuesday a fine performance of Rossini's "Barber," chiefly remarkable for LAMORDE's inimitable and faultless warbling, for the smooth Jesuitical perfection of FORMES's Don Basilio, and for the thoroughly expert, though of course rather passé, rendering of Figaro by the veteran MAGGIOROTTI, who has been said, with what truth we know not, to have been the original Barber; and on Wednesday, "Le Nozze" again: thus affording new chance to compare Meyerbeer and Co. with Mozart, and to make another interesting comparison of Mozart and Rossini, to which we must return hereafter, since our space is now exhausted.

The further announcements were: for Thursday, Trovatore; Friday, Robert le Diable; this afternoon and evening two cheap Christmas performances, to-wit, Traviata and Norma; and on Monday, Robert again, which opera, given as this troupe can give it, must be another new event for Boston.

Next week, being the last week of the Opera, will probably also give us Don Giovanni on a magnificent scale.

CATHEDRAL CHANTS, &c., by S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, MUS. DOC. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

Dr. Tuckerman is well known for his hearty and industrious devotion to the English Church school of music, which has led him to spend some seven years of his life in England, where he made himself perfectly at home in the music of the principal cathedrals, and returned fully master of its secret. He gives us here a collection of the most approved chants used in the Protestant Episcopal service: — a copious supply, both double and single chants, for each of the several Canticles, as well as the occasional services. He has collected them mainly from the sterling old English writers, with scrupulous fidelity to the originals; but has also enriched the collection by many of the best contributions of living English masters in this line and by a modest number of his own productions, which in severe beauty of harmony, and apt expressiveness of style for each occasion seem worthy of their place among the others. The Gregorian Tones, too, are included; but we could wish that the author in his otherwise instructive Preface, had told the uninitiated why these "Tones" appear in modern keys and harmony.

The chants are followed by the Burial and Communion Service; and by an easy Morning Service in F (Te Deum and Benedictus), by Dr. Tuckerman, which we think must take its place among the favorite pieces of this kind in choirs. The book is beautifully printed, in large, clear characters, with ample space, and all admirably arranged for use. The directions for chanting are clear and practical, and the accented syllable in the reciting portion of each chant is always plainly marked. We have seen no collection of this kind of church music so complete; none more scrupulously choice. And this we know to be the conviction of some of our best organists and professors, who are versed in this peculiar school of music, and who know the wants of the Episcopal choirs far better than ourselves. We may mention the names of the venerable Dr. Hodges, of Trinity Church, New York, and of Mr. Wilcox, organist of St. Paul's church, in this city.

Musical Chit-Chat.

This is CHRISTMAS DAY, and of course the emotions and reflections of the inspiring season seek their highest musical expression in "Handel's" sublime oratorio, "The Messiah." Of course we look to our old HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY for that; and not in vain, for, although the Boston Music Hall is strangely preoccupied for other ends than music, the Society have found the Boston Theatre open to them, and as the end sanctifies the place, they will there to-morrow (Sunday) evening perform the "Messiah," with the unexpected and most valuable assistance of our Boston prima donna, Mme. ELISA BISCACCANTI, who has been in town some weeks recruiting from the wear and tear of her triumphant career in Italy, St. Petersburg, &c. She is a great favorite here, and one of the first sopranos of the day; all will rejoice that her health is sufficiently restored to enable her to sing. The other solos will be sustained by Miss EMMA HEYWOOD, the new contralto of the Opera troupe; Mrs. HARWOOD, whose fine voice it will be pleasant to hear again; Mr. PERRING, tenor, and Dr. GUILMETTE, basso. The choruses will of course receive justice from the well-trained forces of the Society; and all, with a grand orchestra, will be under the sure, intelligent direction of CARL ZERRAHN.

OTTO DRESEL did not return, as expected, in the Persia a fortnight since; word came that the state of his health made it quite probable that he might remain in Germany all winter, much to the disappointment of his many friends and pupils and all lovers of choice music here. But there is now better news: he had concluded to sail for Boston in the steamer of the 11th inst, which is already due.

It gives us joy to announce the purchase of a very valuable collection of works on Music for our noble Boston Public Library. It consists in large part of very rare and costly works upon the theory and history of Music, of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in Italian, German, French and Latin, most of them in splendid folios and quartos, — works difficult to find in Europe, of many of which not a copy probably exists in this country. It was the private library of an Austrian officer and amateur, recently deceased, who had had for many years an intelligent passion for collecting such works. This library was offered at auction in Berlin. At the suggestion of our friend A. W. THAYER, now residing in that city, and through the liberality of JOSHUA BATES, Esq., to whose munificence our Library is already so largely indebted, and who at once saw the importance of securing such a nucleus for our musical collection as might never offer itself again, these books, some 300 in all, have been secured for Boston, at a cost of about $750.00. We have received a catalogue of the books, to which we shall refer more fully. These, added to the collection of musical literature and MS. Italian and French scores, made up for us by the late Prof. Dehn of the Berlin Royal Library, will lay a solid foundation for a complete musical library, for the first time in this country — one to which all musical students can have access.

In Worcester, Mass., the Mozart Society, conducted by EDWARD HAMILTON, gave their second concert on the 17th, performing Romberg's "Transient and Eternal," with selections from Mendelssohn, Mozart and Rossini. . . . Haydn's "Seven Words on the Cross" is to be produced in Philadelphia. . . . There is a rumor that the charming artist, Mme. COLSON, is to succeed Piccolomini in the Opera here, and sing Zerlina next week.

Music, both operatic and orchestral, seems to be flourishing in New Orleans. We have the programme of the first concert of the "Classic Music Society" (Dec. 8), comprising just five pieces, all of the true sort, to-wit: Part I. Overture to Don Giovanni; Haydn's 8th Symphony, in B minor; Weber's overture to Euryanthe. Part II. Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica; Spohr's overture to Jessonda. The leader is Mr. G. COLLIGNON. Of Opera at the Orleans Theatre, the Picayune (Dec. 12) says:

Mlle Lafranche, the new prima donna, grand opera, has sung in Meyerbeer's ever popular "Huguenots," and is pronounced by all good judges an artist of high rank. Mons. Louault grows in the estimation of the public, and Mlle Cordier is fully established in the place vacated by Colson. Her repetition of the "Dame Blanche," and her Marguerite, in the "Huguenots," gave great satisfaction to excellent and discriminating audiences. The "Ambassadrice" of Anber, and the "Juive" of Halévy, are the next revivals in contemplation, Cordier appearing in the first, and Lafranche in the last.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—Il Trovatore and Lucrezia Borgia have been performed at the Italian Opera within the last fortnight. The first, with Grisi, Alboni, Mario, and Graziani; the latter, with Grisi, Nantier-Didiée, Mario, Graziani, Corsi, and Zucchini. It is reported that Madame Penco was to have taken the rôle of Leonora in Il Trovatore, but that Grisi insisted on appearing in the part, much to the chagrin of the manager. Mario has been singing splendidly. Nantier-Didiée was very effective in Lucrezia, and altogether the opera was well rendered.

Verdi's Macbeth was to have been produced this season, but the expense was found to be too great.—Id.

The Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune relates:

The Opera Comique theatre is heels over head with "Les Chercheurs d'Or," M. Meyerbeer's new piece: manager, stars, orchestra, company, chorus, are all half crazy, for M. Meyerbeer is a very disagreeable companion during the rehearsals of any work. He does not pass by a single fault, and his "begin again" is heard so often, and his German patience is so different from French restiveness, he drives everybody about the theatre half mad before the curtain rises on the first performance. He has Faure, Sainte Foy and Mme. Marie Cabel at his rooms at 6 o'clock every morning, when they rehearse their parts, M. Meyerbeer himself being seated at the piano. M. Meyerbeer insisted, when he entered into a contract with the Opera Comique, that the rehearsal of his piece should not interfere with the rehearsal of other pieces, which "noble" request was of course granted, or rather the manager promised to grant it. But Faure has a leading part in another piece, and of course he can't rehearse twice a day and play three times a day; so the rehearsal of that opera is suspended. Sainte Foy has a part in a second piece, and he has no stronger constitution than Faure, so the second opera's rehearsals are abandoned. And who could with reason expect more from Mme. Marie Cabel than from the men, so the opera in which she is to play a part is suspended. "Mons. Meyerbeer's carriage stops the way," you see, with a vengeance, while the composer is crying as loud (but not imperatively—there is a distinction and a difference) as he can to his coachman to go on.

Little has leaked out respecting the new opera. The "book" is by MM. Michel Carré and Barbier. There are but four performers, and the piece reckoned on as likely to produce the greatest effect is a question, the parts to be borne by the actors above mentioned and a bass whom M. Meyerbeer has not yet discovered; none of the bass singers at the Opera Comique suit him. It is said to contain more music than "L'Etoile du Nord." The performance of this Cornwall or Brittany piece indefinitely postpones "Les Bleus et les Blancs," an opera by M. Limnander, the "book" by M. Scribe. The playgoers say that anybody, backed by M. Scribe, may be indefinitely postponed without fear, as he is certain of success. I think M. Scribe would not find great favor just now with a new piece, in the eyes of a portion of the public. He has been too successful with "Les Trois Mousquetaires" to be readily forgiven. M. Meyerbeer proposed to M. Limnander that he, the former, should keep his score in pocket for another year that the latter might bring his opera out, but M. Limnander replied: "I am not only a composer, but I am, and before all, an artist, and it seems to me of much more importance to art that an opera of M. Meyerbeer should be played than an opera of M. Limnander;" and so refused to allow the former to wait.

The London Athenaeum says: The amount of musical rumour in this week's Gazette Musicale is so great and so miscellaneous that we can only avail ourselves of it with slender comment, and scanty attempt at classification. First, as concerns France: Many will be sorry to be told of the death of M. Hermann-Léon, the capital dramatic baritone (and a painter, too, as well as a singer), whose performances in "Les Mousquetaires," of M. Halévy, and in M. Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile," are among the good recollections of late years belonging to the Opéra Comique.—The Sainte Cécile Mass, this year performed at the Church of Saint Eustache according to custom, on the 22nd, was no French work, but a mass by Weber—M. Remusat (the capital flute-player) is making up a French comic opera company for England, the names of the artists engaged for which may be encouraging, but are not much known, even in Paris.—Something better may be augured from the announcement of a choral festival, to be held in Paris next year, to which already seventy-five societies have "adhered," thus making up the number of performers to seven thousand, or thereabouts. Let us hope that such a mountain of voice will not content itself with mouse music to sing.—Choral life, it appears certain, is growing up everywhere in France. We now read of a society numbering one hundred and sixty singers having been formed in no larger a place than Beziers.—Italian matters in Paris become increasingly dismal or comical, as the mood of the speculator may find them. "Il Giuramento," of Signor Mercadante, has been tried this week;—a tearing drama, as regards story, none other than a travesty of M. Victor Hugo's "Angelo,"—without the aid of an artist capable of acting the least in any one of its four principal parts. The comicality is, that after all manner of talk and trial of newer tenors, M. Béart is again at the Italian Opera. Having always thought him an artist well worth watching, we are glad to see another proof that, without noise or false parade, the day of one possessing so many excellent qualities as he must return.—Quoting from another journal for the moment, in regard to Italian matters, let us advert to a hardy paragraph, somewhat hitting in the face every precise advertisement of "Her Majesty's Theatre to let," which declares that Signor —, "the known theatrical agent," is travelling in Italy to make engagements for Her Majesty's Theatre. When will Italy take any pains to inquire what and whom, and where to trust? That the entire machinery of these transactions grinds the second, third, and fourth-rate musicians, is our reason for harping on a familiar string.—Further, the Gazette Musicale tells us that M. Rübinstein has been appointed Director of Music at the Court of Russia—the "right man in his right place," we conceive,—that a new oratorio by Herr Vogt, "The Resurrection of Lazarus," has been given at a charitable concert in Berlin,—and that Herr Emil Naumann's "Judith," an opera in three acts, was produced at the theatre in Dresden on the 5th of this month—with applause.

It is with regret that we must continue the bad accounts of Herr Ernst's health, which affords little hopes of his being able to resume his career as a player, for the present at least.

BERLIN.—To-day (Sunday) is the "Todten-Fest," festival for the dead, and Cherubini's glorious Requiem in C is to be given to night in the "Akademie." I attended last evening the full rehearsal, and if I may judge from that, there will be a splendid performance of a splendid work. There has been a visible decrease in the number of concerts during the last week. Those which have been given retain that characteristic which is the boast of every true Berliner—viz., "classicality." To demonstrate this I subjoin the programmes of two concerts:—

Overture, Antigone. Arie aus der Passions-musik; S. Bach. Sinfonie (B major) Haydn. Die Dorf-musikanten ("The Village Musicians," by desire) Mozart. Overture, Anacreon; Cherubini. Sinfonie (C major) Beethoven.

Sinfonie (D major); Mozart. Overture, Faust; Spohr. Overture, Ali Baba; Cherubini. Sinfonie, (B major); Beethoven.

The following operas have been given in the past week:—Tamhäuser; Orpheus (Glück)—Wagner splendid as Orpheus; Die Nibelungen (Dorn); Wilhelm Tell.—Mus. Gazette, Nov. 27.

WEIMAR.—An opera by M. Sobolinski, a pupil of Liszt, entitled Cornelia, is about to be performed here, and is to be followed by an opera, entitled the Barber of Bagdad, by M. Cornelius, another pupil of the great pianist.—Id.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Oh, lovely Touraine (O vago snol della Turanna)
From Meyerbeer's "Huguenots." 25
'Tis love's almighty power. (A questa voce sola)
From Meyerbeer's "Huguenots." 30

These are the two pearly songs of the fair Marguerite de Valois in the second act of the "Huguenots," which the inimitable rendition of Madame Laborde has vividly impressed upon the minds of delighted hearers as being fine specimens of the graceful and florid in operatic music.

Porter Song. (Canzone del Porter.) From Flotow's "Martha." 25

The Huntress' Song, (Il tuo stral nel lancier.
From Flotow's "Martha." 25

Two old acquaintances in a new edition, with Italian words added. The first one is that famous Bass-Song in praise of England's genuine Porter-Beer, in which Formes's powerful voice will tell wondrously next week; the second is that pretty, coquettish song of Lady Harriet's merry companion, easily remembered from among the many ear-captivating strains of the Opera.

The Moorish Minstrel. Der Zigeunerknabe im Norden.) Reissigen. 25

When Aurora paints the Sea. (Morgengruss). Proch. 25

Blue Eyes. (Blau Aeuglein sind gefährlich. Gumbert. 35

Songs of popular German authors. The first one has long been a favorite song and undergone all kinds of arrangements from the Cramers, the Beyers, &c. of the day. The last two are comparatively new. Proch's "When Aurora" in the opinion of many surpasses his celebrated "Alpine horn" in charm of melody. Gumbert's song has a half comic turn. It is, like most of this author's songs, eminently pleasing. All three songs are easy and within the range of ordinary voices.

One smile from thee. M. W. Balfe. 24
The beating of my own heart. Macfarren. 30

The latest issues of these popular English song-writers: ballads for the parlor.

Our own sweet thoughts. Words by J. S. Adams. Adapted to the "Air du Simplon." 25

This beautiful air from the Swiss mountains, which has obtained wide circulation, has given rise to two stanzas, which fit it to a charm.

Jane O. Malley. So. and Cho. L. V. H. Crosby. 25
An easy and effective song, arranged from the well-known quartet of this author, "She sleeps in the valley."

CRAMER'S CELEBRATED STUDIES. With new Fingering and Explanatory Notes, by Julius Knorr. Book 1, $2. Book 2, $2. Complete, $3.50.

These studies for the piano have been more extensively used than any other collection, simply because they impart the best preparation for the works of the classical composers. A thorough acquaintance with them, therefore, becomes a matter of necessity for all who would devote themselves, especially in a practical manner, to the art of music. At the earnest solicitation of many friends, Julius Knorr has superintended this edition of Cramer's Studies. Each of the Twenty-one studies of the first book has been provided with brief remarks upon musical elocution and mechanical points. The fingering also has been revised and the musical phrasing of the single studies much more correctly indicated than it was in former editions published by Cramer himself. In these and many other points, this copy will be found superior to all others.

Musical Knick-Knacks.

By S. W.

ROBERT SCHUMANN, genial and rapid as he was in composing, and in writing about music, was, besides being very much distract and confused, as helpless in practical and ordinary things, as a new-born babe. It was a remarkable trait of his character, that he could sit for hours, with his best friends, looking at them and smiling, drinking and smoking, brooding perhaps over some new composition, but without ever uttering a word, and if questioned, would start up, as if from a waking dream, and answer in monosyllables, and then fall to thinking again, or would at once begin a fiery and enthusiastic speech and suddenly break off, as if struck dumb, relapsing into moody silence.

This was especially the case during the latter part of his life; it was quite embarrassing for strangers that were introduced to him, not acquainted with his manners, and would have been still more so, if his amiable wife had not often come to their aid.

Speaking of "the divine CLARA," as Schumann always called her when writing about her in the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," then edited and published by him and his friends (now by Dr. Franz Brendel), reminds me of the peculiar way in which he acted, when he married her, or rather, when she married him, as I am told by one of the witnesses present on the occasion.

But, before entering farther on the subject, I must beg pardon of the readers of this Journal, for my disorderly way of throwing matters about: stating only, that I do not intend to make even a sketch of his life or characteristics, (this may be read in Wasilewski's Biography of Schumann), but only to relate facts, which they may perhaps not find there or anywhere, just as they come to my memory.

Clara's father, old WIECK, was very greedy of money, and, in his later years, became an old miser, so that, when the young couple, Clara and Robert S., who were desperately in love with each other, sued for his leave to marry, he refused it, dryly stating, to the consternation of Robert, that his daughter had cost him pains enough as a father and teacher during the early part of her piano-forte studies; so that now that she was a celebrated artiste, he wished to reap the golden harvest of his and her exertions; and should he (Schumann) wish to marry Clara, it would be necessary to make him an indemnification for the losses he should sustain by his daughter's not earning any more for him. "And," he added, after S. had left, much concerned, turning to his daughter: "You belong to me, and shall not marry that composing fool, who will get crazy one of these days." From that day, he watched his daughter, as an old dragon would his heaped up treasures, so that the lovers seldom had a chance to see each other.

To help the despairing Robert, for whose health and reason his friends were apprehensive, they concluded that he must elope with her; for S., with that peculiar helplessness of his, sat silent and moody all day long, relieving himself only by quaffing immense quantities of beer, but entirely unable to act in person for his love and future happiness.

This resolution being proposed to him, Schumann answered in his slow, long-drawn way, "yes, yes! Oh Clara!—but—how shall I—Does old Wieck consent?"—"No, but you must do it without him, if you wish to possess Clara." "O, the divine Clara! I should do anything to call her my own, but there's the old miser—Ask Clara, she knows best what to do, she always knows better than I do—O my dear Clara!"

The friends saw again that they had to act for him, so they communicated their intention to Clara secretly, who was well contented to escape from the tyranny of her father and join him whom she loved. Accordingly all the preparations were made by the friends of the lovers; a dwelling was hired, and furnished by them, servants were engaged, a license was obtained, the necessary documents drawn up, and a priest notified; now only the day was waited for when old Wieck would be called out on pressing business matters, and be obliged to leave his treasure for a few hours alone. Notice would then be given by Clara instantly to Schumann's friends, and matters brought to a conclusion. At length that day arrived. All went well, in so far that old Wieck had not the least suspicion of what was contemplated, and Clara informing the friends, they in their turn again instantly informed Schumann, who trembling with excitement at the news, stood there as usual, without doing anything, when, after the necessary dressing preliminaries, he was seized by his friends and led off in secret triumph to the house of the perhaps not less excited bride. Then he indeed verified what I mentioned above of his remarkable awkwardness and taciturnity; for in the room there he stood, as if glued to the spot, facing his beloved and beautiful bride, his eyes fixed on hers, his countenance full of bliss, but motionless and silent, twisting his hat between his fingers, and coloring up to the very ends of the hair on his head, wasting the precious time by nothing, as a loving couple in an opera, who, after having concluded to escape from the old tyrant, remain standing on the stage, instead of making the best of their time by running away, and sing half a dozen duets about happiness and heavenly bliss, beginning with the sentimental Andante, then proceeding to the Allegro; and when near the end of the Presto, and about to put the ten times repeated "Let us fly" in execution, then comes the stern father, unseen, and collaring the startled bridegroom, the bride fainting (of course) says "quod non," and then—then—our thoughts go astray, and the reader finds himself in the midst of an opera scene, instead of one of real life. We left Schumann standing, and I suppose he would still stand there, if the coachman, waiting below, had not cracked his whip impatiently, and Clara, less reserved than women generally are on such occasions, and more conscious than her intended that time is sometimes worth even more than money, had not taken hold of Robert's hand, and stowing him safely in the coach and seating herself beside him, given orders to the driver; and off they went to the church, the friends following.

We now leave them united forever and safely installed in their new home, never forgetting the kind friends, who had done so much to set matters aright; only stating further, and much to the satisfaction of the readers, we believe, who always side with the lovers, that when old Wieck discovered, how the bird had flown, and how he had been deceived, he naturally flew into a passion, and afterwards brought a mean law-suit against S. for seducing his daughter to get her fortune! In this he was defeated, and had the chagrin of having to pay the costs of his law-suit instead of recovering damages. But here our narrative differs from the regular romantic; for the old man never pardoned his Clara, and even rejoiced at her later misfortunes. She, however, was fully compensated for the tenderness of a father, by the constant love of her husband and the sympathy of the public, which she still possesses in a rare degree.

More about Schumann and others in our next.

Old Pieces.—Grétry the Brother of Greuze.

(From L'Artiste de Paris.)

What life sparkles and flashes from the whole of Grétry's little composition, Les Méprises par Ressemblance! This was one of the earliest operas he wrote. He attached but little value to it. In his agreeable mémoires he mentions merely in an incidental manner this slight work, which is one of the most charming he ever composed. System has not obtained sole possession of it; the writer does not strive to impart impression to everything; as yet the philosophy, theory, and suggestions of Grimm, the speeches of Diderot, and the axioms of Mercier, have not bewilderingly penetrated the head and heart of the man who comes from Liège, and surrenders himself freely to his instinct. He does not yet arrange his inspirations, so as to frame them in system; he does not proceed with the pre-formed notions of a doctor; he advances without anxiously smoothing the folds of his robe. On all sides, the melody bursts forth, flowing on and developing itself like a living mountain spring, with a dash, copiousness and grace which enchants us. Scarcely has the first note resounded, ere passion is perceptible and forces its way through. Without any great amount of preparation, every touch is true; without scientific guidance, without mechanical skill, without laborious effort, our hero brings his work into the world; he draws rather than paints, but how lovely are his touches and how true his accent!

I was sitting at the Opéra-Comique, near one of our most genial and learned musicians, and we chatted together.

"I wish," I said to him, "all our modern composers would come here and listen to Grétry. The worthy man has none of their merit, but he possesses a gift, one solitary quality, in which nearly all of them are deficient—namely, inspiration. Clever, learned, polished, mighty in resources and fruitful in expedients, they would be perfect, if they were not deficient in this one point."

"They make up for it by their skill."

"Now-a-days, we do everything by calculation and artistic trickery. Machiavel has become our master; we are no longer simple in anything, and we darkly imprint a profound policy on all the arts. Boldness, calculation, and the genius of mastering ourselves, appear to us the end of greatness. Inspiration strikes us as childish, naïveté as folly, and feeling as madness. The exact contrary was the case with the eighteenth century, which everywhere sought out feeling, pushing it to the greatest lengths, abusing it, and straining to express it with love, and sometimes with fury and madness. Look at our admirable Grétry! How entirely he belongs to the eighteenth century! how beautiful is this simple composition, and how expressive!"

"Be it so!" replied my friend. "But how ridiculous is the libretto! You have a soldier of the Guard, giddy, virtuous, in love with every woman at the first glance, sentimental, elegiac, and a sturdy drinker. There is no more truth in this than in Watteau or even Greuze, whose rosyate flesh tints, and roguish girls belong to the same style of thinking. What composer of the present day would set such a subject to music? O, those charming country manners! and that bailiff! and that tender father! and the voice of relationship and the cry of the heart!"

"Do not speak too ill of the eighteenth century. Any one would be inclined to think that you belonged to those useless and too virtuous guardians of the harem, who speak ill of love. What saves the honor of the art of the eighteenth century is, that it is sincere in its tendencies, hopes, and dreams. It believes in shepherd-life; it adorns nature with so much lace, embroidery, shirt-frills, and fans, that the whole affair is ridiculous. But so is the human race; Gluck was true, and so was Diderot. Both of them, I confess, exaggerated nature: but their efforts were real, their tendencies, high and glowing, were sincere."

"You affirm, also, then, that the theatre is the expression of society?"

"Not at all! not for the world! The drama does not express what the society of any age or country does and carries out, but that which it dreams itself; not exactly that which it feels, but that for which it yearns; not that which it endeavors to be, but that which it would like to be. Look at the serious and elevated reason of Molière's "artists;" at the glowing devotion of Calderon's "lovers;" at Corneille's argumentative and speculating heroes. Never has humanity expressly and perfectly realized those models. But, in proportion as men's souls strove to achieve a new idea, the theatre was renewed, in order to offer them, as it were, a slight shadow, a distant picture of this same much desired ideal, to their eternal deception. Hence, that which is called local coloring is an absurdity; the drama has never any coloring but that of its own age; it does not express society, but the dream of society, and it improves nothing. On the contrary, it encourages the faults which it portrays. Let us strike out of our papers, my dear sir, such fine principles as:

"The theatre is the improver of our morals;

"The most important thing in the drama is invention;

"The drama is the expression of society, &c."

"Oh! what fables! and, as our forefathers said, what elevated trifles! Our libraries are filled with them; people speak and write in accordance with them; authors commentate on them; twenty provincial academies take them as the subjects for their prize compositions, and the competitors descant upon them. And yet there is not one of these maxims which is not a lie!"

"You speak like a book," observed the composer, interrupting me. "Yet what use is all this to me? Does it render Grétry's music less primitive and elementary? less without color, breadth, and power, and less agreeable kind of music for the winshop?"

"M. Linnander's music, I confess, contrasts especially with Grétry's. Dash and color distinguish M. Linnander; fine orchestration, intelligence, and knowledge, with less care than power. You are instantly struck with his orchestral superiority, if you compare it with the meagre instrumentation with which the melodies of the old Liège composer are furnished. How little brass in Grétry's works; scarcely more than a few flutes, with the violins and the oboes! But the essential principle of music is, most decidedly, possessed by Grétry in a greater degree than by the most brilliant and most learned of modern composers. He possesses all the feeling, accent, and passion."

"He belongs to the time of Jean-Jacques, and Greuze, from which, thank goodness, we are now very far."

"It is true that we are no longer the same. Since the epoch in question France has often changed her soul, enthusiasm, and convulsions! How many chemical experiments were tried with the French material! In how many different forms was the national paste kneaded! What a workshop is this society of ours, so often dissolved and again put together! How much the Micro-mégas at the head of these changes laugh! That which astonishes us, and causes us to laugh with pity—this virtuous giddiness, this popular sentimentality, this emphatic verbal stamp, this pastoral frivolity, and all the amorous stories of such brusque banality, rising to heroism—how it delighted, nay, entranced the youth of its time."

"You mean the blockheads."

"No; the masses; the persons easily moved; the sheep. In all times, those who rejoice in a small stock of original ideas, sink, at the commencement of youth, into the stream of the ideas then general. They suck in the color of the fashion; they allow themselves to be completely soaked in it, and adopt the idea of the day. They live on it; they remain sunk in it, and carry it to the greatest length. About thirty or forty, when a woman or a shop, the toga or an embroidered coat changes them, they suddenly become wise, wash out the lively tints, cover the brilliant vermilion or ultra-marine with sober gray, and fall back stupidly into the every-day world, into the compact crowd. PHILARETE CHARLES."

October Music in Palermo.

(From the London Athenæum.)

Knowing already that the modern Papistical abominations in Art are the most flagrant in those Roman Catholic countries which were once the most artistic, I had still something to learn in Palermo during the Sabbath High Mass in the Casa Professa. There, at the exposition of the sacrament, the player on the organ, which is a fair one, absolutely broke out into the Bolero from the "Vêpres Siciliennes," by way of symphony. The dismissal, again, might have ended some service in St. Hubert's Chapel, by appropriately "playing out" a monarch bound for the chase,—for it was an opera movement, alla caccia: with cornet flourishes, echoes, and those other devices, the freshness of which has been seemingly exhausted by Méhul, Weber, and Signor Rossini. The vocal music, modern cavatins to devout words, was sung by a low tenor voice, so tuneable and manly as to make one regret the uses to which it was put.—There was high mass, with orchestra, one day in the church of Santa Orsola, which was gaily decked out with spangled gauze draperies. I presume in her honor,—since the altar, above which hangs a dignified and spirited picture of our countrywoman's martyrdom, by Il Monrealese, wore the usual gala dress of blazing candles.—Parts of the music were not wholly bad,—in particular the "Kyrie" and a subsequent terzetto for three male voices, in the florid and flowing Italian style. Worse execution could not be conceived.

The regimental bands in Palermo are in no respect remarkable.—Certain fancies respecting the hybrid parentage of national melodies so often put forth in the Athenæum were amusingly corroborated in the only exhibition of street-music I heard during a fortnight, on the terrace above the Marina. This consisted of a guitar and violoncello played in a style of true independence, after the fashion of the talk of Flora, in "Little Dorrit,"—without stop, let, hindrance, or care whether the chords were right or wrong. The version thus produced of "Parigi, o cara," from "La Traviata," was original enough;—but who could have expected the next tune?—our shuffling, bustling, English hornpipe, "The Soldier's Joy," which has hardly been heard beyond the purlieus of Wapping or Portsmouth Point for the last forty years. Here and there some changes of the classical dance-text had crept in. What a whimsical reply to ears which had been everywhere asking for the suave old "Sicilian Mariner's Hymn!" Neither when they sit stitching waistcoats, or tying up nosebags, in the streets,—nor when they row forth to fish, or to shoot larks in the bay,—do the people of Palermo sing.—A far-off clansman to Mr. Albert Smith entertained his public of Tritons and custom-house officers every afternoon in the open air close to the Porta Felice; but he never varied his fun or instruction by "tuning up" a stave.

An amateur concert, given for charity, at which I was one evening present, in the Sala Pretoria, a grand old municipal chamber,—with tablets of inscription on the walls, a frieze which had been once painted, and a roof with decorated thick-set beams in the old Venetian taste,—was principally curious as illustrating manners: how different from the meetings which Mr. H. Leslie directs at home it would be hard to overstate!—His violins would have shrugged their shoulders,—his oboes have lifted their eyebrows, and his flutes turned up their noses,—at the band which I nevertheless conceive to have been professional,—yet more at the so-called symphony, by Signor Bertini, chosen for said band to play. But, as a set-off, there was a lively and lovely Duchessa, singing a duet by Signor Verdi, and leading a finale from "Beatrice di Tenda," with a soprano voice so intense in quality and so extensive in compass as to make one regret that its owner was not professional;—since, with training, so much voice and expression must have won their possessor crowns, sonnets, thousands, and lovers by the score. Fancy her Ladyship the—,—any English Lady of quality,—singing an opera scene, with as much evident delight as gracious courtesy, to a twenty-penny paying audience at St. Martin's Hall,—for such was the audience at the Sala Pretoria! I have heard and seen vocal performances in every respect worse excite rapturous applause at Her Majesty's Theatre, and praised by critics who profess to understand and to commiserate the destruction and downfall of music in Italy. The Huguenots.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BOSTON COURIER:

As a lover of music, I wish to say something in relation to the recent performances of the "Huguenots" at the Boston Theatre. I have intentionally waited till after the second evening, to see if my first impressions might not be modified, and as I find them only confirmed, I beg of you, who are always willing, whether in art or politics, to give the minority a chance, to allow me to have my say about an operative performance, which is, I think, strangely overrated here.

To judge from the announcements of Mr. Ullman, and from the criticisms of the press, one would imagine that we had had in Boston a first-rate representation of a first-rate work. The public mind has been kept on the qui vive by pompous proclamations of the splendor and perfection, with which this great work was to be presented to our astonished eyes and ears. Such announcements and such appeals do much to mislead the public, and to vitiate the taste of our community, as yet comparatively ignorant in matters of art. I am sure that in no other country in the world can be found anything of the kind so vulgar, so exaggerated, so deceitful as the advertised statements of Mr. Ullman in our public prints. And the worst feature of it all is, that the thing evidently pays, and that the manager finds his account in it. Our people are misled and are humbugged by these puffs, (first introduced by this same Mr. Ullman in his management for Mme. Sontag,) which would be simply ludicrous, if they were not so injurious, and so discreditable to us who tolerate them. I think the harm done to the as yet incipient taste and knowledge of our public by this Mr. Ullman is far greater than would at first sight appear; and it postpones farther and farther that day, which I trust will yet come, when we shall exercise our own judgment in matters of art, shall value things, not names, and shall no longer pin our faith on the sleeve of a charlatan opera-manager, nor swallow any dose of humbug that he may choose to cram down our throats.

The Huguenots was originally given in 1836 at the Grand Opera in Paris. It was written for a collection of singers that it would be in vain to look for at the present day. The whole orchestral and choral force of that immense establishment was constantly at work upon it under the composer's direction for many months before its production. And it is only in Paris now that the Huguenots can be really seen. The principal rôles are not filled as they have been, but the scenic effects, the traditions of the tempi, the orchestral and choral force, and all the mechanical and spectacular portions remain unchanged. Individual artists may be found elsewhere, who give greater éclat to their particular parts, but the ensemble, the whole united effect as seen in Paris is never equalled out of it, for the Grand Opera of Paris is a thing by itself.

Allowing for this, allowing for the fact that we were obliged to see a translation, and not the original piece, and that our theatre is not in itself comparable to that at Paris, we had a right to expect from the statements of Mr. Ullman that we should see this piece as well given as it is in any city in the world.

"Gli Ugonotti" is not "Les Huguenots." In translation, the dramatic fire and vivacity of the original is lost, and the music suffers by being stretched here and squeezed there to fit another set of words. But, even if this were not so, what a polyglot affair it was—a work written in French, sung in Italian by a heterogeneous mixture of Germans, French and Italians. Unity of effect is not attainable with that sort of eclecticism. Meyerbeer's operas, above those of any other composer, depend for their proper effect upon the perfection of the performance. We may hear the "Sonnambula" indifferently sung, and yet derive pleasure from the melodies alone—from the matter given, apart from the manner of giving. But in Meyerbeer's music, which is the very perfection of art and science, mere melody is of slight consequence—is but a small portion of the great whole. It is in the treatment of his themes, in the elaborate orchestration and minute working out of every part, that all his genius is exhibited. His music is pre-eminently difficult and complicated in structure, and it is perhaps against his fame that to bring out the beauties of his works so much depends on the character of their performance. Every composer, however, has his manner, and Meyerbeer, who is certainly perfect in his, never allows his works to be given in Paris, unless he is entirely satisfied with every artist concerned. The result is that there only can he be properly heard, and justly judged, although I have heard in London and Vienna very splendid performances of his opera, surpassing in the solo parts the Grand Opera, as it is just now, but always lacking that peculiar and indescribable perfection, which I have already alluded to, and which I am sure any frequenter of the French opera will recognize and admit. I can fancy that poor Meyerbeer must have shuddered at some moments on Tuesday of last week, when what was called the Huguenots was first made audible to Boston ears. Above all other composers, he is remarkable for his coloring, by which I mean his orchestral treatment of his vocal themes. No man, excepting perhaps Berlioz, (and he is an eccentric visionary) has ever so completely mastered all the resources of modern instrumentation. His scores, compared to those of Donizetti or Bellini, are like analytical mechanics to the first elements of algebra, and whereas in the Sonnambula and Lucrezia the vocal melodies are the substance of the work, in Les Huguenots or L'Etoile du Nord, the orchestration and choral writing are the principal points to be observed. The former works would be enjoyable to a piano accompaniment, for of color they have little or none—all is outline; in the latter the vocal airs alone would be comparatively uninteresting, for the coloring is here the great feature. Imagine Titian's Assumption of the Virgin without its color, and you have an idea of Les Huguenots without its orchestral score. I have been particular in this explanation of my meaning, for I have not seen here any sufficient allusion to this feature of Meyerbeer's music, and I think it is a thing which should be known and understood.

In estimating, then, the value of this representation of the Huguenots, let us first look at the orchestra. Its great fault was a lack of light and shade of sentiment. The brass blatted incessantly. The band on the stage was about half the time before or after the orchestra, and the scenic illusion was not heightened by the apparition of the black bar of the leader trying to get sight of Mr. Anschutz's baton, in the fifth act, when the band is in the wings. The finale of Act 3d lost in effect from this lack of unity. I suspect that the proper instrument to accompany the romance of Raoul in Act 1st was wanting, for the sound was more like that of a viola than a viola d'amour, the instrument indicated by the composer, and which I hope some of my readers can remember as being exquisitely played here in Jullien's orchestra, as the accompaniment to this very romance. That was an orchestra such as we are little likely to see again. The whole scene at the beginning of Act 2d, the chorus of bathers, and the Aria of the Queen, is accompanied by two harps, which give a festal character to the music, and here we were treated to Mr. Anschutz, in the shape of a substitute for our harps, who laid down his baton, and thrummed on a little piano during this scene. This was pretty bad, but it was worse still in the fifth act, at the vision of Marcel, that most magnificent burst of religious exaltation, where the loud sweepings of harps are heard as the old Huguenot gazes in ecstasy to Heaven. Here these instruments are indispensable. The composer scored the piece for them, the effect they produce on the listener heightens immensely the beauty of the music; and they contrast by their scraphic character with the harsh blatant notes of the brass instruments of the assassins. I know from frequent hearings that they never fail to send the blood to my heart, as they sweep forth the accompaniment to that glorious trio of the three Huguenot martyrs. And here again was the feeble tinkle of Mr. Anschutz's piano. It is a shame that so little respect can be shown to the intentions of a great master, that at the opera, (the last place where such liberties should be taken), they should venture on such miserable makeshifts as these. In the benediction of the daggers, the famous crescendo roll of the drums was neglected entirely. The drums, instead of commencing each passage at mezzo forte, beat fortissimo throughout, and this, with the insufficiency of voices, especially the tenors, and the undisciplined din of the brass instruments, caused this piece to fail in its effect, and to produce only the impression of a senseless noise. This scene was botched, the trumpets played false, and a composition which, when properly done, never fails to carry away any audience, fell almost dead.

Mr. Anschutz is to blame for this, and it is his duty, as conductor, to control his band more than he does. The band on the stage in act 5th played out of tune, though that may have been intentional, as tending to produce a proper degree of horror in the listener at a pack of assassins, who made such a shocking noise. The prompter was audible much too often, and I have noticed that this is a circumstance which almost never occurs in Europe, simply because the audiences there entertain an idea that singers must learn the words of their parts as well as the notes. In the duo of Valentine and Raoul the voice of the prompter was occasionally as distinctly heard as that of the tenor, an effect not down in the bills, I imagine. The male chorus was fair, weak in tenors, but singing its difficult music tolerably; the women were bad—not singing with precision, nor in tune, and frequently screaming. They were too few in number, and too loud in voice, producing the effect that three or four violins would, who should undertake by scratching with all their might to equal the sound of a large body of strings. I presume that the dresses of the women in act 3d were some that were copied from the "original drawings" Mr. Ullman tells us about. But proper dressing is what an audience very seldom sees, and therefore do not much miss.

As regards the scenic effects, I have little to say. There were quite a number of horses and some red light at the end, and the finale of Act 3d was effective, though enough of the stage was not shown. To compare for one moment the scenic illusions at the Boston Theatre with those of a first class European theatre, would be absurd, but on the whole the scenery was good enough, the only fault I find is in the parade that is made about it. Those who may have seen this opera in Paris know that there the horrible reality of the final scene, with its vast expanse of stage, dark, the stars shining, the river, the old Louvre, and the band of assassins roaming about, and crowding on the bridge, needs no such threepenny additions as a blaze of red-fire in the wings.

As regards the ballet at the Boston Theatre, the performance would gain in interest if it were omitted altogether.

Before I speak of the principal singers I wish to call attention to the finale of Act 2d, and to ask any person with ears and without prejudice, if I am not correct in saying that, beginning with the oath, it was one heap of confusion and discord—the design of the composer nowhere clearly apparent—a seeming struggle between all concerned to scream and roar à qui mieux mieux, neither together in time, nor alike in pitch.

The Huguenots contains three parts of first-rate importance—Valentine, Raoul, and Marcel; and it must not be forgotten that each of the representatives of these parts must be able to act as well as sing. It is a just boast of the French that a vocal puppet, even were he so delicious a puppet as Rubini, stands no chance on their great lyric stage. But especially in this piece much of the interest does and must centre on the acting qualities of the artists. No finer situation exists in the whole range of the lyric drama than the duo between Valentine and Raoul, at the end of act 4. On the one hand, a young and chaste woman avowing a long-hoarded but now guilty love for a man whom, by the sacrifice of her own honor, she would fain keep from a struggle which she knows must be fatal either to her father or her lover. On the other, the strife of love, raised in one moment from despair to ecstasy, with honor, duty and religion. This scene alone, so profoundly affecting, if adequately placed before us, justifies and demands the most passionate intensity in its two characters. But I need not dramatically analyze this piece. Merely as a play, it is worth bushels of the general run of opera libretti.

Mlle. Poincot, since her debut in 1851, has held and held honorably a certain position at the Grand Opera in Paris. Always a useful and pains-taking, never a great singer, she has appeared successfully in parts not exacting much power or dramatic force. As Alice in "Robert le Diable," as Agnes in "La Nonne Sanglante," I have seen her frequently with pleasure. But any habitué of the opera in Paris would laugh at the idea of her attempting Valentine. She may have played it there, but I think not; and, if she has, it was only one of the numerous makeshifts that that theatre has been obliged of late to have recourse to, in the dearth of first-class singers. Mlle. Cruvelli is the only woman of late years whom the public of Paris have been content to see in this part. Her splendid energy and genius and her fine voice made her a not unworthy representative of a rôle created by the matchless Talcon. Mme. Medori, a singer of great excellence and reputation, attempted it in Paris and played it once. I never saw a more decided expression of condemnation—a flatter failure. Her engagement was subsequently cancelled. Yet Medori was in all senses a greater singer than Poincot. Both these ladies, however, had the misfortune to create a somewhat ridiculous impression in the fourth act—Mlle. Poincot by a badly contrived and very obvious hoop, and by falling absurdly at the end of the act. Mme. Medori in the same thrilling passage displayed a most uncompromising pair of pantalettes, with two good stout ankles. This was in Paris too much for an audience already disappointed and a little savage, and a burst of derisive laughter ended Mme.'s debuts in that city. I ought to add, in justice to Mlle. Poincot, that on her second appearance she modified matters considerably. Poor Medori, if I recollect rightly, never had the chance.

Mlle. Poincot has had the advantage of being a pupil of Duprez, than whom no man more completely understood or mastered the exigencies of his art. But we have all seen, in the case of Mlle. Parodi, that the best of masters and the greatest care will not make a singer. This latter lady was the favorite pupil of Madame Pasta, who, with Ronconi (the teacher), took unwearied pains with her, but surely no more thoroughly bad or false singing has ever been heard here than that which Mlle. Parodi inflicted on us this fall. Of Mlle. Poincot it is pleasant to say that she was well dressed, acted appropriately, was always in earnest, and in fact did her best. But the part is beyond her powers. She was ill at ease in the Italian, and her voice does not possess the power and sonority necessary to rightly giving the passionate declamatory music of her rôle. She was best in the duo of Act 3d, with Marcel. This piece was the nearest to being well done of any in the opera. Formes was quite false at the beginning of it, but both the artists, on the whole, sang and acted well. The last movement made apparent Mlle. Poincot's defects, and the thinness of her voice in its upper notes; the high do, so long sustained, with the descending scale, was beyond her ability. Madame Lagrange was better here, and, vocally speaking, better throughout. Poincot has the good dramatic traditions of the French stage. Her singing is in its style characteristic of the Grand Opera. Her defects are those of nature, and, as far as she goes, she goes rightly; the only difficulty is, she cannot go far enough for the part of Valentine. If she sings Alice here, we shall see her in a part more suited to her capacities, and one in which I hope she will not be placed in a false position by having to sing and act with such a nullity as Signor Tamaro.

Herr Formes' acting is good, though sometimes exaggerated, and he is apt to forget that he is in the drama but a body-servant of a nobleman, and to make himself too prominent. I doubt, for instance, the propriety of his assisting the Queen of Navarre to mount and dismount from her horse when his master is present. This may be thought a small matter—it is so—but it is by fidelity to detail that propriety of ensemble is attained. As regards Formes' singing, his method is a bad one, and his intonation often very faulty. I need not enlarge upon the latter defect—it must be obvious to all who hear him, and I suppose that most of my readers have noticed the vicious trick of drawing his voice through intervals, especially wide ones, instead of attacking his notes with certainty and vigor. This artist is not what he was, but he never was a finished and accomplished singer. In his best days his reputation rested on his volume of voice and dramatic force—as a vocalist he cannot be mentioned in the same day with Lablache or his own countryman, Staudigl, the best Marcel that any German artist has ever given. His costume was good, and he looked the character. I cannot like or praise his singing, which I think is less artistic now than when he first came to this country. He is an artist not to be mentioned without respect, for with all his faults, he is a man of talent and eminently an effective actor.

Of Signor Tamaro, the Raoul of the evening, I hardly know what to say. That any man could voluntarily place himself in so false a position, either from excess of vanity or excess of ignorance, I find it hard to believe. I must in charity suppose that Mr. Ullman has to answer for the pitiable spectacle that Signor Tamaro made of himself in the Huguenots. Of his acting the less said the better. It was simply ridiculous. Instead of the young Huguenot nobleman, with his high, chivalrous bearing, we beheld an amiable-looking little man, who being rather short (and his lady-love very tall) made matters better by a curious trick of crouching about the stage, and by appearing in the 4th act for all the world like a demented Puss in Boots. As regards grace and propriety of action, it is perhaps an even thing between him and Signor Coletti. With respect to singing, it is hard to say whether he or Signora Ghioni was the worst. He has, however, in this opera, one advantage over the lady—that he is a tenor, though a very poor one, while she is no contralto at all. He sang his first romance too slow, and omitted the last half, with its deliciously meandering accompaniment, changing also the cadence, which is a beautiful one. The first movement of his duo with Marguerite was too slow and the rest too fast, the music, too, being altered to fit his small voice. In fact this duo was made rather a solo for soprano with tenor accompaniment. In the fifth act, in the vision of Marcel, he could not take his B flat with Poinot. The role of Raoul is miles beyond his powers, whether as actor or singer. Its finest passages were evaded or omitted altogether. The tone of his voice when beyond la flat is intolerable in forte passages, and such are of constant occurrence in this opera. At the oath in Act 2d, he did his share to spoil the piece by singing entirely out of tune. Formes was no better here. The glorious septuor of the duet, "De dritt miei," which should be dashed off with so much fire and manliness, was feebly acted, still more feebly sung. This morceau, one of the very finest in the opera, missed fire entirely, owing to the positively shameful manner in which it was sung, or rather not sung. What was done was travestied, and much was omitted, owing to the poverty of means of the executants.

Let any look at the music of this piece, and see for themselves—let them look at the phrase, "Bonne épée et bon courage" (I quote from the French partition,) and see, for with Tamaro they have not heard, what music the tenor has to sing—superb in the heroic knightly courage every note breathes forth, and then let them imagine it sung by a glorious chest tenor, such a man as Duprez was, and as Tamberlik is, and conceive of the effect it then would have. We may not expect Tamberlik, perhaps, but so utter, so irredeemable a piece of incompetency as Signor Tamaro is too much of an imposition on a public deluded by Mr. Ullman's brilliant proclamations. I might enlarge on Tamaro's appearance in the duo with Valentine, but of what use. Let any one take the piano partition, look at the music, even if they have never heard it, see to what words it is fitted, what an opportunity is given to a tenor to carry his whole audience with him, and then remember Tamaro, and I am sure they will not think anything I have said undeserved or harsh.

Of Signor Florenza (San Bris) I do not care to say much. His dressing was unexceptionable, but he wants dignity and stage presence, and his appearance and action are grotesque and exaggerated. In the fourth act his was not the fury of a Catholic nobleman of France bent upon a deed of crime to which his faith compels him, and which his religion consecrates in his eyes. He is a singer gifted with a large voice, not unpleasant in quality, but very deficient in cultivation, lacking style, method, and sentiment.

To express the latter emotion he invariably bawls, witness his singing of Di Proenza in "La Traviata"), though this may be from his having had no proper musical education, and being unable to modulate his voice. It is the vice of modern Italian singing, (by modern I mean within the last fifteen years), that any one with plenty of voice and an ear for music jumps at once upon the stage, without a tenth part of the training which was formerly deemed indispensable. That good Italian school of singing, of which Ronconi and Alboni are two such brilliant examples, is now almost obsolete. It is, perhaps, too late to mend the matter—the evil seems past cure. And, much as I like Verdi's music for its many good qualities, I could wish it all unwritten, if, in losing that, we could have again those days, when it was thought necessary to learn how to sing before appearing on the lyric stage. The present style, or no style, is ruinous to the voice, to the public taste, and fills the opera-houses with a set of wretched bawlers, who give us only the poorer Italian operas, from inability to sing the best. This article is already much longer than I intended, or I should like to endeavor to trace the connection which I think exists between Rossini's florid operas, those of his second manner, so called, and the present decadence of art in Italy. I have heard in this city a young girl hardly twenty, who, gifted originally with a fine, powerful voice, was already unable to sing in tune in mezza voce, was obliged to scream, in fact, to force her voice up to the pitch, and this from the radically false modern method in which she had been instructed. In the Italian theatres—the very buildings which have resounded with the acclamations of listeners to Pasta, Malibran, Rubini, Ivanoff, Tamburini, Lablache, and the rest of those great artists now passed away, that same Italian people go night after night, and applaud singers that would not have been tolerated thirty years ago. I except the San Carlos at Naples.

When I was in Italy that was the last stronghold of good singing. Everywhere else mediocrity or positive inferiority carried the day. To a lover of music the days of true excellence and appreciative criticism seem to have gone by in Italy, and thence, by the great influence of the Peninsula in matters of music, to be passing away in Europe generally. The French dramatic stage still remains the only stage, but the golden age of opera is passed even there. The causes of this are numerous. It would be an interesting inquiry to investigate them; but in this connection I will only say that this change is perhaps partly to be attributed to just such works as the "Huguenots," and the rest of Meyerbeer's spectacular operas. The increasing luxure of the mise en scene, and the attractions of a ballet, cause the most dreary and sterile productions to pass off after a fashion. Every year more money is expended and less good music is produced. "La Magicienne" of Halévy, composer of "La Juive," and the cleverest of the imitators of Meyerbeer, is an instance of this. Nearly 70,000 francs were expended in the getting-up, in theatrical phrase the "mounting" of this piece; but it is five acts of wearisome artificial music, ambitious in attempt, and almost entirely barren of melody. I judge of it only from a piano arrangement, and know not what effects Halévy may have produced in his hand, but there appears to be nothing new, and little that is good. When such works as "Le Comte Ory" and "Guillaume Tell" were written for that theatre, not a quarter part was expended in their production but either one of these operas is worth all that has been done in Paris during the last ten years. These five act spectacles, which Meyerbeer introduced, and which Rossini, foreseeing their mischief, from the first condemned, have injured art more than can be readily estimated. The Huguenots is a work of genius, and will live. But the followers of Meyerbeer have not his genius, and the false form once having been adopted, every year less and less good music is written, and ballets, scenery, horses, processions, machinery, and all sorts of things, except the one fundamental thing, the music, are more and more relied upon for the success of a piece. A simple, natural story, with graceful, fluent, tunable music is a by-gone affair, and to it have succeeded grand spectacles in five acts, with new and noisy instruments, superb scenic effects, ballet girls, devils, nuns, monks, saints, trap-doors, ships, and even in one case, Heaven and Hell, with their awful mysteries, the whole forming an escort, under cover of which chaotic and tuneless music gains with a blasé public a transient and spurious fame.

I have said much more than I meant to about this subject, which has little to do with the matter in hand, but the actual condition and prospects of opera are things to be considered and deplored by all who cure for music and its best interests. And let me add here that those who were fortunate enough to hear Ronconi, have heard one complete and splendid artist, a perfect singer, as well as an actor of genius, in comparison with whom Mr. Ullman's whole troupe are as pebbles to a diamond.

To return to the Huguenots. Mme. Laborde was certainly one thing which few of the rest were—correct—and this is no small praise. She is a facile, brilliant singer of fioriture, with a somewhat hard and worn voice, and one which was never sympathetic. Very few French female voices are. Her merits are rather negative than positive, but, such as they are, are not to be overlooked. She almost always sings in tune, and has a good, precise, clean and eminently French manner of singing. She was not very regal as the Queen of Valois, but the rôle is not an important one, and was certainly very well sung. Mme. Laborde is an artist who, being entirely mechanical and yet quite perfect in her way, provokes the listener, who would gladly exchange some of the clock-like accuracy of her singing for a little sentiment. She sang the music with strict accuracy, though with nothing more; but, had her companions done as much I should have had no fault to find.

Signora Ghioni, the Page, has a bad mezzo-soprano voice, and undertook with it a contralto part. Ah, Mr. Ullman, is that the way they do in the "first opera-houses in Europe." Signora Ghioni is not only no contralto, but her voice is unpleasant, she does not act at all, and I think I do not exaggerate in saying that she never sings six consecutive bars in tune. With Formes to sing false is the exception, with her the rule. She slurred the aria d'entrata of the Page, and omitted the air in the second act, written for Alboni, and which is always given in the Italian version of the Huguenots. She marred the effect of all the concerted pieces in which she appeared, and notably the finale of Act 1st, in which she has the leading phrase. The chorus, too, was not right here. In the second act she did her best to destroy the effect of the quatuor of women, between the two movements of the Queen's air; in this quatuor Laborde carried the piece through, the other three all singing execrably, while she gave the very difficult music with delightful facility.

Coletti, as Nevers, was unaccountable, at times almost absurd, and his voice was, as usual, quite beyond his control. This gentleman always tries to do well, but is so unfortunate as never to do it. He has been about it so many years now that the case may be considered hopeless. The other characters call for no special comment. The "Ronde Bohémienne" in the 3d Act, was fortunately omitted. Had it been attempted, we should not have been the gainers.

Mr. Ullman gave this opera much better in New York last spring. He vouchsafed to the metropolitans one harp. He had a better chorus, and D'Angri as the page, Lagrange as Valentine, Therini as Raoul, Gassier as St. Bris, and Taffanelli as Nevers, were all better than the representatives of these characters here.

I have intentionally avoided technicalities as far as possible in this article. Musicians know that Mr. Ullman's performance of the Huguenots is a poor one, but I have written these remarks for those who love music, but who don't know much about it, a large class, and that which pays most for the opera when it comes here. I do not wish those people to think that they have seen the Huguenots. They have not. The opera was much abridged, mutilated, and transposed, and all the strictures I have made as to the execution of what was done, I make in good faith, from personal knowledge, and with no motive, save to protest against injustice done to a great composer, and deception practised on an indulgent public. It is much easier to praise than to blame, as Messieurs les Critiques seem to have found out. I hope the public will not judge Meyerbeer by this performance of one of his works.

I am afraid, Mr. Editor, that all of this sounds very ill-natured, and more severe than anything the occasion called for. I assure you I have said nothing but what I honestly think, nothing that will be denied by any competent judge. I have been moved to write thus, not from any love of harsh criticism, even when it seems to me to be fully deserved. Performances vastly superior to this are given in Europe with merely the announcement of the name of the opera and the performers. Had Mr. Ullman contented himself with this, I should not have thought it worth while to enlarge on the deficiencies of every sort which marked the performance.

The Huguenots cannot, with our present limited means, be really given at the Boston Theatre; but those who are not lucky enough to hear it in Paris might derive at once great pleasure and a fair idea of the work from such a performance as we might have here. When Mr. Ullman pours out columns of puffs and talks of giving this opera as it is given in the first opera-houses in Europe, he knows that he is promising what he has no power to perform, and what he has no honest intention of performing; and when the newspapers echo his absurd boasts, it is a proof that their musical critics are either unfit for their duties by reason of their ignorance, or are wanting in the honesty which is the first essential of a writer for the press. An Opera Singer in a bad Scrape.

From the Cincinnati Commercial, 21st.

Notwithstanding the success, pecuniarily speaking, of the Cooper English Opera Troupe in this city, there was more than one contretemps to mar the harmony of their engagement. In particular Mr. Miranda, the tenor, appears to have been selected by fate as a butt, for fortune to kick at during his temporary sojourn in this vicinity. In the first place, during the travel from St. Louis he caught cold, and was afflicted with a hoarseness, the most serious mishap that could befall a first tenor. Then he met with so many friends that he became "overcome," and on Friday night was unable to finish the last act of the Trovatore; in fact, he died before his time. But the most direful misfortune occurred on Saturday, when having occasion to purchase something in a certain dry goods store, he tendered a twenty dollar bill in payment for the article, and was immediately pounced upon by a preying officer, who pronounced the bill a counterfeit. Who will say after this that our policemen sleep upon their posts?

It was in vain that Miranda declared he had come honestly by the note; the officer was an old bird, and swore that he wasn't to be caught by chaff, and the consequence was that the first tenor of the first English opera troupe in this country, was compelled to undergo a searching investigation, when there was discovered around his body a belt, from the recess of which were rolled forth upwards of three hundred five-dollar gold pieces. This display of wealth, so far from endorsing the respectability of the unhappy tenor, was, in the eye of the officer, "confirmation strong," and nothing would have saved him the ignominy of a sojourn in the watch house, but the guarantee of several respectable citizens with whom he had the honor of an acquaintance.

He had received the bill from the manager, between whom and himself a feud, unhappily for the harmony of the troupe, existed; and thus, swelling with indignation, he forthwith swore out a warrant, which was placed in the hand of an officer, who in the evening proceeded to the theatre to serve and capture the unconscious director, who, with bow in hand, was directing the movements of the gentlemanly musicians. It seems that the functionary to whom the warrant was entrusted, had music in his soul, and as he entered the theatre, the notes—

"Still so gently o'er me stealing—" floated so deliciously above, around, and about him, that he became unconscious of his errand, as was the somnambulist when she made her clandestine entrée into the chamber of the Count. Towards the close of the act he rallied, when again the delicious finale of "Ah, don't mingle," held him back, and before he recovered from his musical trance, Mr. Cooper had vacated the spot where throughout the evening he had wielded his enchanting bow. Happily, however, the disagreeable affair went no further; Mr. Cooper satisfactorily proved that the false note in question had been issued by him without any knowledge as to its character, as in fact every note drawn by him is of the purest quality, while those of Miranda are invariably genuine, except, as in the case of the Trovatore, he may chance to be a little "overcome."

AN OPERA COMPANY ON ITS TRAVELS.—A friend, who was a fellow traveller with Ullman's company, in the steamer Connecticut, a few nights ago, gives, in a private letter, the following amusing intelligence: "The opera company, numbering something over a hundred, kept up a prodigious jabbering on the boat—French, English, (or Inglesch, rather,) Italian, German, and what not. Formes took two of the ballet or chorus women under his special charge, and amused them and others all night with stories and imitations of cats and dogs, and a kind of trumpet solo upon his nose. Others sang—and very finely, too—in the hold, having first obtained inspiration from various bottles of wine, brandy, &c. Tamaro's state-room seemed to be the head quarters for liquor, but although many of the Italians and Germans were exhilarated, none were disorderly. The prime dame kept apart mostly, and Ghioni derived comfort from a lap-dog. On the land journey from Stonington to Boston, the chorus people took possession of the best car, and filled it with tobacco smoke. It was altogether a funny company."—N. Y. Evening Post.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for Soprano Solo and Chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Handel's "Messiah"—Christmas Performance.

Great was the crowd in the Boston Theatre, last Sunday evening, to witness the annual performance of this great oratorio by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. Great was the crowd, and great—we almost fear too great—the joy of the Society at putting money in its treasury, instead of losing some, as it has too often done by giving concerts. The motive for going to the Theatre this time, instead of giving us the Oratorio with the nobler surroundings and associations of the Music Hall, was the accommodation of the Fair held in that hall for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association. This act of accommodation was perhaps well enough for once. And we could also sympathize with the satisfaction felt by many in this removal of the ban of prejudice which shuts up theatres, as if they were unholy places, against performances of sacred music; while at the same time we would respect, and think that the Society ought to respect, the feelings of those who entertain what may appear to us a prejudice in this matter. Beyond this we can conceive of no advantages whatever to be gained by the removal of our Oratorios, or other Concerts of the higher order, from the Music Hall to the Theatre; and we earnestly hope that the mere pecuniary success of the experiment in this one instance will not tempt the Handel and Haydn Society into the "new notion" of getting already tired of their admirable Hall, and wishing to abandon it for the chance popularity of a theatre, with all the exciting, feverish, unquiet, and on the whole unmusical influences of such a place. Should they yield to this temptation, we should certainly regard the success of Sunday evening as a great misfortune.

But was it a success? Pecuniarily, granted. The patronage was great; there was "much public." But was it such a public as this noble kind of music can henceforth rely on? Many went, no doubt, who are not theatre-goers, to gratify a curiosity to see the theatre under cover of a somewhat unworldly occasion. Many more went as it were to enjoy an anti-puritanical triumph in this new recognition of a place which they think has been too long absurdly looked upon as secular and unclean. Deduct from that audience these two classes, and we doubt if we should find even the usual number left of those who go to hear the music for its own sake and be edified by it.

Then as to the effect of the music: we must freely say that we do not remember a performance of the "Messiah" for many years, which as a whole sounded so dead and dull. The grand choral masses of sound lacked vitality. The soprano, on the front of the stage, were sharply heard, but the tenors and the basses in the rear of them seemed to be smothered as if a blanket were thrown over them—their sound was swallowed up by the side spaces and the hanging drapery above. This was certainly our own experience, and that of others who sat near us, in what we should naturally suppose one of the best parts of the house. We are told by some that the weight and resonance of sound were much greater to those who had seats above; and yet as to that, impressions, we find, differed. Nor can we make an exception in favor of the effect of the solo singers. Their tones, some paper states, seemed rounder and fuller than usual, and they "seemed to be among us, with us, of us." We can only say that it was not so to our ear. We have been wont to listen to the same voices with more satisfaction ringing through what some are pleased to call the "barren spaces" of the Music Hall.

We should not have thought this matter worth so many words, had we not noticed a certain chime of jubilation over this Theatre notion in the newspapers, which seems to foreshadow, as if the writers were all privy to a purpose, the consummation which we dread as fraught with mischief and nothing but mischief to the cause of public music here in Boston. These writers tell us that a little carpentering will obviate all the disadvantages of the present theatre stage, and make it the very perfection of a resounding shell for these great harmonies to roll forth from. Observe, in nearly all of these newspaper paragraphs it is distinctly admitted that the effect of the music was bad, that the choruses seemed deadened by the side spaces, &c.; but then all this will be perfectly obviated, when the sides are walled in, "as they will be." A foregone conclusion, without the least foregoing testimony of the senses (so essential in this case), to say the least. But even if this could be done, is this sufficient reason why music should desert the Music Hall? Here is a Hall, built at a great expense, nobly planned, one of the largest and best halls for music in the world, the pride of our city, associated with all the most inspiring musical memories of these last years; a place eminently fit to be the scene and centre of our great musical enjoyments, where Symphonies and Oratorios may be listened to amid fit surroundings, in comfortable seats and good air, with architectural suggestions chaste and noble and inspiring, with the statue of the great master rising above the orchestra, and the whole soon to be completed by the addition of the largest and most perfect Organ that modern art, backed by most liberal means, can furnish:—and now that we have got it, shall it be capriciously set aside; robbed of the support of music, for which chiefly it was built; abandoned to other, mostly alien uses, while Music, which in all forms but the operative demands to be heard in a place of quiet, clean suggestions, betakes itself to the more showy, feverish, distracting element of theatrical excitements. The Theatre is good for the drama, with or without music; but for music simply, for music listened to and loved for its own sake, every true music-lover feels that we need a distinct Hall, a place of quieter and calmer influences. We trust the Society will think twice about the matter, before committing themselves to this foregone conclusion of the newspapers.

But to the performance of Sunday evening. The chorus force was large, and good justice was generally done to the grand choruses. A special merit of the performance was the restoring of the too often omitted choruses: "And with his stripes," and that series of short contrasted pieces: "For as by man come death," &c., which are among the finest in the work. Bating some blurs, and at times a little confusion in the orchestra, it was a good average performance. Mr. Zerrahn's conducting showed renewed and careful study; the tempi were more uniformly satisfactory than usual. Mr. PERRING is almost the first person for many years who has sung "Comfort ye, my people," to us simply, and without ornament. His voice was sweet and true, though not powerful, and his style chaste and expressive. We would we could say as much of the bass solos of Mr. GUILMETTE; they were marred by certain affectations, — unnecessary soundings of very low notes, feebly a la Formes. There was little to admire either in the voice, style or expression of the contralto, from the Opera troupe, Miss HEYWOOD. Mrs. HARWOOD won the heartiest responses of the evening. Her clear, liquid, penetrating soprano is always pleasant and effective, and her rendering of "There were Shepherds," and "Come unto him," was very beautiful. In "Rejoice greatly" she showed a gain in execution, but hardly yet enough for such a song. There is still a little of the rough edge to be polished off in the upper part of her voice, occasionally. Madame BISCACCANTI, the special attraction of the evening, was really too ill to sing as her kind heart prompted her, and as her highly cultivated powers would have enabled her had she been well. The risk she ran in her anxiety not to disappoint her native Boston audience, after seven years absence, deserves grateful recognition. The air "With verdure clad," which she sang between the parts of the "Messiah," was given with exceeding delicacy and finish, in a pure Italian style. "I know that my Redeemer liveth" is an air demanding such sustained inspiration, with such large voice and style, as only the very few among great singers have. Not only did it lie out of the peculiar province of this artist, but she by this time suffered from such evident physical exhaustion that sympathy forbade all criticism. Yet passages were marked by genuine fervor and much beauty. We trust she will yet give us a better opportunity of hearing her.

The Opera.

Mr. ULLMAN, with his multifarious resources, gives us so much in a brief time, so much more than any wholesome, hearty, not to say critical, appetite can digest at once, that we recall these last weeks in a perfect bewilderment of lyrical and scenical impressions. We hardly know where to begin, or on what tempting and suggestive theme or point to dare to rest, after we have begun; each when we look at it is crowded out by a hundred equal claimants for a passing notice. Leaving the second week, then, as we were obliged to leave it in our last, chronicled with a mere mention, for the present, of the operas it gave us, we will try briefly to sum up the week just past.

"THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 23. After the repetition of the "Marriage of Figaro," which drew not so large an audience as the first time, but still the most delighted audience of any evening, the opposite and most modern taste was catered for, of course not without large response, by Verdi's Travatore, with little PICCOLOMINI as Leonora. We were not present. But all agree that her fresh, childlike imitative talent, with her musical voice, and always tasteful, if not great singing, proved themselves equal to such a representation as one would not expect from such a playful Child of the Regiment little creature as she is, unless he had seen her in Lucrezia and Lucia.

FRIDAY. Robert le Diable, in Italian, for the first time with any approach to lyrical completeness here in Boston, and falling considerably short of such completeness even this time. It had only been given here, many years ago, or an apology for it, by an English troupe. There was a large and at first eager audience, who received it coldly. The beauty and wildness of the music of this earliest of Meyerbeer's Grand Opera works, its greater number of fresh and unique melodies, quaint and strange as they are, incline us to regard it as somewhat nearer to a work of genius, then his still more elaborate "Huguenots," and "Prophet"; while it is quite as essentially dramatic as either of these works, only with a less human and really interesting subject than the "Huguenots." It was perhaps unfortunate for its impression that so many of its best pieces had become hacknied under various forms, in concert singing, arrangements, &c., so that their worth was scarcely recognized. Moreover the music was exceedingly abridged, besides the omission of whole scenes essential to clear dramatic understanding. The scenic effects, with the exception of the opening scene of knights gathered for the tournament, were meagre; especially the dancing of the resurrected nuns in the old abbey, intended to fascinate Robert; even SOTO lacked the fascinating grace; the rest was wholly without charm. The part of Robert was sustained by Sig. LORINI, whose tenor voice and singing have improved since he was here. He is at least a better tenor than Tamaro, and looked the part with some degree of dignity. The great feature of the performance was the Bertram of Herr FORMES, who in his whole look and action was a fearfully real impersonation of the fiend father. Bating his well-known faults of intonation and method, he delivered his music grandly, rising to a terrible earnestness, as of a being superhuman, in the scene where he taxes Alice with having overheard his secret.

Mlle. POINSOT's truly lyrical and sympathetic voice still grows upon us. It is such a voice as we have scarcely before met in a French woman; beautiful and searching in its high tones, and startlingly dramatic in its low ones. She sings with taste and feeling, conscientiously in earnest, simple, direct, and not overdoing. The pure and touching part of Alice did not suffer in her hands. The extremely difficult unaccompanied Trio in the second act, between Alice, Robert and Bertram, was remarkably well sung, and for the most part in good tune, in spite of its strange modulations. Mme. LABORDE's part, as the Princess Isabella, was reduced to the last act. In spite of some hoarseness she sang the florid music with her usual exquisite perfection, and sang Robert, toi que j'aime most admirably, although it properly demands a larger and more sympathetic voice, like Poinsot's.

The part of the minstrel is an important tenor part, to which Herr PIKANESER was quite inadequate for want of voice. The choruses were mostly sung effectively, but the religious music from within in the last scene, was sadly out of tune. Robert was repeated on Monday evening to a much diminished house. Accepting all the other defects as necessary, we found great interest in the music by listening chiefly to the orchestra, in which the art of Meyerbeer is constantly seductive or imposing.

SATURDAY, — CHRISTMAS. An afternoon performance of Il Travatore, as before; and Norma in the evening, with Mme. LABORDE as Norma, and Mme. GHIONI as Adalgisa.

TUESDAY EVE. PICCOLOMINI exerted her most peculiar charm again in the most captivating of her parts, La Serva Padrona. LABORDE had full opportunity to revel in her sweetest birdlike mazes of melody in La Sonnambula, with BRIGNOLI singing also sweetly, and acting only when it pleased his sovereign laziness. The entertainment closed with a scene from Donizetti's I Martiri, between Piccolomini and Loriani, which we were not able to hear.

WEDNESDAY EVE. The house was crowded from parquet to amphitheatre to witness that favorite opera of operas, Mozart's Don Giovanni! It had been announced as to be given on a here unprecedented scale of splendor and completeness; and in some particulars it was; but on the whole we have, at least once or twice before, had the work performed more satisfactorily. It lay not within the powers of this company to do such justice to Don Giovanni as they did to Le Nozze di Figaro. Before now we have heard a better Don, a better Ottavio, a better Donna Anna, a better Zerlina, a better Elvira, — all the parts better in fact, with the exception of the Leporello of Herr FORMES, which was the most artistically complete and droll conception and rendering of the half insolent, half cringing, ever servicable Spanish valet, by far, that we were ever treated to. Musically, too, throughout, his was the best of all our Leporellos.

The better Zerlina we have had, was Bosio. In her impersonation the little rustic coquette showed also a refined, superior nature. Piccolomini was bewitchingly pretty and funny in her way; but it was too much fun, and her way is not the best. Taking her conception of the part, she did it to a charm, with a wonderful degree of vivacity, as full of life and spring as an Indian rubber ball, irresistibly mirth-provoking by her coquetties. But she was too much the mere rustic, merry, commonplace coquette; too consenting, with whatsoever pretty archness of apparent denial, to the Don's approaches; and as Don Juan, too, (FLORENZA) wooed her in a coarse and common style, it gave the wrong impression to the beautiful duet, La ci darem. It was well sung by both; and the little lady, child of the regiment still in a new form, continually overacting on the funny side, although most charmingly, sang Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino with an exquisite fineness. Her conception of Zerlina, however, lacked the depth and tender sincerity of nature so plainly indicated by Mozart's music.

Mlle. POINSOT has the right voice for Donna Anna and showed a feeling of the part. She was not so effective as she might have been in the wonderful recitative of the first scene, Padre mio, &c.; but she delivered the great aria: Or tu sai, in which she relates the outrage to her lover, — omitting, however, some of the fine recitative, with much intensity and fire. Of course she was not such an Anna as Lagrange, as Grisi, or even, in some respects, as Truffi, who gave us our first impressions of it on the stage.

Mme. GHIONI looked Elvira better than she does most parts, and sang much of her music forcibly and well, except when, as was sometimes painfully the case, her tone was sharp. She rendered an important service to the dramatic intelligibility of her part, as well as to the musical interest of the work, by restoring, for the first time here, the admirable air at the end of her first scene: "Mi tradi quel alma, &c., with its superb recitative — one of the finest numbers of the score.

Sig. FLORENZA, as we have hinted, fell into the common error of too coarse a conception of Don Juan. Most of his music was sung well, though it was absurd to address his guitar serenade to the audience from the foot-lights. In the last tremendous scene, where he defies the supernatural visitor, his voice rang out proudly, gloriously, and his entire acting in that scene was really fine. Herr WEINLICH, though a small man, had a telling ponderous bass voice for the statue; and these two, with FORMES, in this last scene, as in the first, where the Commendatore falls, made an uncommonly distinct, effective trio of basses. Hitherto it has been always hard to make out the figures well in this deeply shaded tone-picture. Sig. LORINI made a respectable Ottavio, and really sang Il mio steoro in a way that did him great credit.

The concerted pieces went well on the whole, especially the Quartet and that wonderful Sextet. But the Trio of maskers was much out of tune, though somewhat less so in the repetition. The orchestra of course was delicious. Extra pains had been taken to equip the ball scene as it should be, and as we never yet have had it, by introducing two additional small orchestras in galleries on each side of the stage, one to play the rustic gavotte, and the other the quick landler waltz, while the main orchestra keeps up the stately Minuet. The stage was flooded, too, with extra choristers to shout Viva la libertà! But for all that our ears could perceive, much of this was dumb show; the three dance tempi were indicated, but scarcely executed to the sense of hearing, so that the arrangement really seemed not worth the great ado made in the announcement of it in the newspapers. The scenic conclusion of the opera was simply the usual cheap and childish piece of diablerie. Certainly a less impotent conclusion might be contrived. Were the Don simply to go down with the statue, it were better.

With all the imperfections, almost inevitable to the performance of so difficult a work, and in spite of all comparisons with better artists whom we have had before in certain parts, Don Giovanni gave intense delight on Wednesday evening. There was plenty of life and interest in it. Formes was a host; and so was little Pic, too, in her own way. And the music in itself, the orchestration, was of course delicious. Every one grows to be a listener more and more to that, till he is filled with it. Our only complaint with Formes's Leporello is that he made the drollery so broad sometimes, and so provoked to laughter, that most exquisite traits of instrumentation, as in the O statua gentillissima scene, were in danger of half escaping observation.

The final announcements of the Opera season are: Friday, (last) evening Flotow's "Martha," for LABOREE's benefit; THIS AFTERNOON, Don Giovanni, again, which we hope every one will hear; Monday evening, the Italian version of the "Bohemian Girl"; and Tuesday afternoon a third performance of the "Huguenots," which will derive new interest from the discussion that has arisen out of it, and that will end the rich and most successful season.

Books for New Year.

The most splendid gift book of the season, that has fallen under our eyes, is the "Stratford Gallery, or Shakespeare's Sisterhood," a series of forty-five ideal portraits of Shakespeare's Female Characters, described by Mrs. HENRIETTA LEE PALMER, and published by Messrs. Appleton & Co., New York. Externally it is a most elegant royal octavo volume, as perfect in paper, style and binding as anything that we have seen. The engravings are finely executed from designs, (not new) by some of the best English artists. Every one of course has his own ideal of how Shakespeare's heroines ought to look, and it is hardly possible that one in twenty of these portraits should at all correspond with such ideals in the mind. Yet they all have merit, and some of them are quite felicitous. The real value of the book lies in the literary part, the thoughts which it contains. Mrs. Palmer, (who is the wife of the author of the successful comedy, "The Queen's Heart") has performed her task with a true woman's modesty, as well as tact and delicacy; and has shown fine insight and discrimination in her description of the "sisterhood." She writes with vigor, in a clear, rich style; and occasionally she has evinced a happy talent for the solution of difficulties in the Shakspearian text, as in her very ingenious and natural interpretation of that old puzzle, the phrase "runaway's eyes" in Romeo and Juliet. Altogether it is a valuable book for any lover of Shakespeare.

Ticknor & Fields send us: "The Life of Sir Phillip Sidney," anonymous, evidently by a lady; a beautiful book in every sense; inspired by a true admiration of so high and beautiful a subject; a just, instructive, glowing tribute to one of the manliest, sweetest noblest characters in history; a portrait of a true Christian gentleman, and a model and encouragement to youth's aspirations for ages yet to come. 2. "Sir Walter Raleigh and his times, with other essays," an exceedingly rich collection of KINGSLEY's miscellaneous contributions to English periodical literature. 3. A new volume of Poems, by Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE, which will be welcomed by her hosts of friends and admirers. 4. "Miles Standish," with smaller poems, by LONGFELLOW. It is never too late to say what we think of such a poem as "Miles Standish." In spite of all the critical dissections, we are bound to say we like it, and even better than "Evangeline;" we like the spirit in which it is conceived, so true to the human and poetic side of the old Puritan life, and to New England scenery and climate—when was our "East wind" ever so perfectly rendered into poetry? We like the tone of the book, so sweet and deep and genuine. We like its style and execution, the perfection of simplicity; a few words tell so much, and all that is told blends into such poetic and harmonious completeness. We like its local coloring, fragrance as of pines and "Mayflowers," and all the happy little emblematic hints and correspondences. And we like its musical Hexameter, a rhythm as of full broad ocean waves rolling with majestic quiet up the beach—the very rhythm for the subject. It is in truth a poem, and will outlast Plymouth Rock. It is easy to take out single sentences and find them simple prose. Real poetry can afford to be, loves to be, and real Art learns the last thing of all to be, plain and simple. Longfellow is not a great poet; but he is a genuine one and does a poet's service to his time; fault-finding criticism, we observe, wastes itself for the most part against just those qualities which constitute his real excellence.

Phillips, Sampson & Co. furnish sweet and wholesome nutriment to the young imaginative appetite in "Arabian Day's Entertainment," being three connected series of some fifteen stories, translated from the German, by HERBERT PELHAM CURTIS. Capital stories, charmingly told. The translation is spirited, felicitous, and judging from internal evidence, it reads as if it were faithful.

But the book, which we can most safely recommend because it needs no recommendation, is the genial "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table." Besides the cheaper edition, with Hoppie's clever illustrations, the publishers have issued one most elegant and tasteful, upon tinted paper, and without the pictures, to suit the taste of those who love the wit and wisdom of our "Autocrat" enough to prefer, as we do, to have it only with his own illustrations in his own vernacular.

Musical Chit-Chat.

In spite of its great length, we copy to-day from the Courier, a remarkably well thought and well written article, signed "Civis," on the late performance of "The Huguenots." We have no knowledge or suspicion of the authorship; but whoever "Civis" is, he writes from knowledge, with good judgment and good temper. Such criticism cannot fail to do much good among us. Truth, even the severest, ought at least sometimes to be told, and this writer tells us not a little, mingled to be sure with statements from which we might be inclined to differ, had we time. But the main point and doctrine of his article is right. He examines the performance of last week from the point of view of Meyerbeer, and of the Grand Opera of Paris, with which he is evidently well acquainted. Perhaps he does not make enough allowance in so doing for the peculiarity of our position, having to take our opera in flying visits, dependent on the unhealthy excitement of a few weeks for its only chance of any adequate support, whereas in Paris it is a strong established institution. But then we all wish to know the truth concerning Meyerbeer and his music, and it is well that some one well informed should tell us how nearly what we witness here approaches Meyerbeer's intentions. Again he does perfectly right to compare the promises and manifestos of the manager with the performance. But while we inwardly rejoice at every exposure of mere puffery and humbug, we can hardly see that it is so peculiarly the vice of Ullman as it is generally of our whole advertising system; and perhaps it is too true that he could not give us operas at all, certainly not such operas as we have been enjoying, without the aid of all these trumpets without which the worthy public seems so slow to heed or to believe in anything. Of course Mr. Ullman, in employing these means, knows he must expect to hear them questioned, and that sober, truth-loving persons must and will say what they think. In spite of the poor advertising trickery, we really are indebted to Ullman for giving us such operas as we are having, including even the "Huguenots" in such style as we heard and saw it, and for bringing to us what we must (with all respect for the contrary opinion of "Civis") regard as on the whole the strongest opera troupe we ever had. But we have not room now for several comments which we meant to make upon this in the main just and admirable article.

OTTO DRESSEL has got home, safe and much improved in health, after a rough passage in the Asia. He will be ready in a day or two to meet his pupils.

The "Chelsea Continental Musical Association" sing a selection of favorite melodies at the Tremont Temple, next Thursday evening, in aid of "The Temporary Home for Destitute Children." We know but little of their music save that it is famous; but we do know that the cause for which they sing is good, and we are told that the Continentals are ever ready at the call of charity and never sing for money.

Mr. ROBERT STÖPEL, the composer, of New York, is in town, preparing for the production of his music to Longfellow's "Hiawatha," of which mention has been already made. The critic of the Courier, who has examined the music, speaks of it in high terms, and calls it a most agreeable illustration of the poem. "Mr. Stöpel's 'Hiawatha' is a cantata, divided into fourteen parts, which are to be connected in the performance by recitations from the poem itself. They include airs for mezzo-soprano, tenor, and bass voices, choruses, and descriptive orchestral interludes. The opening piece is the song of the Great Spirit, 'O my children, my poor children,' from the first part of Hiawatha. After the connecting recitation, a chorus follows, in which the birth of Hiawatha is related. From this point, the principal events in his life are illustrated—we have the cradle song, telling of his infancy; the building of the canoe; the battles with Mudjickewis and the Pearl-Feather; the wooing; the wedding-feast; the blessing of the corn-fields; Hiawatha's lamentation; the death of Minnehaha. The final chorus describes the return of Spring, after 'the cold and cruel Winter.'

"Mr. Stöpel's work will be performed at the Music Hall as soon as the necessary preparations can be completed—probably early in January. The recitations will be given by Mrs. Stöpel (Matilda Heron); the choruses will be sung by the Handel and Haydn Society, and the solos by the best of our vocalists. All the orchestral resources of this city, and more, if necessary, will be employed."

The mania for rushing into print with efforts, large and small, at musical composition, has become so rife among us, that the extensive publishers, to whom, of course, the greatest number of them are offered, have been obliged to issue the following circular in self-defense. The information will be valuable to composers, while it is a curiosity in our musical history.

REPLY TO INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO PUBLICATION OF MUSIC.

We are in daily receipt of manuscripts which are offered for our acceptance. But so much new music is now issued, that the sale of each piece is exceedingly limited, unless it is particularly striking or original in its character. The probability, therefore, of realizing any profit from the great majority of pieces is out of the question. Not one piece in ten pays the cost of getting up; only one in fifty proves a success. Under these circumstances, authors must not consider us illiberal or unjust either in declining to publish their works or requiring them to purchase a certain number of copies, to help defray the first expense and introduce them to the public.

To those composers who have pupils, this requirement to purchase copies will not be burdensome, as they can readily dispose of them. Others who write for fame, will not object to this, because they have friends to whom their compositions will be a welcome sight.

Our charges for publishing music on private account are: $2.00 per page for engraving; $1.50 per 100 sheets for paper; and 75 cents per 100 pages for printing. If a full title is required, the expense will vary from $5.00 to $10.00, according to style and fancy. For a half-title, from $2.00 to $3.00. The expense of revising the manuscripts, when necessary, and of reading and correcting proofs, is included in these charges.

Authors are advised to retain copies, as in case of the non-acceptance of Manuscripts, we cannot insure their return—the number received and the expense of postage precluding the possibility of doing so.

OLIVER DITSON & Co.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 25.—In some of my previous letters I have casually referred to the young pianist, ARTHUR NAPOLEON. Recently I have enjoyed many opportunities of hearing him both in public and private, and have been greatly delighted with his wonderful talent. The press here have generally treated him rather coolly: though they could not deny his remarkable genius, they have not given his efforts the notice they deserve. It is rumored that there is a clique against him, and that certain newspapers, greedy for opera-tickets, are not very exuberant in their praise, their lukewarmness being more agreeable to a certain operative autocrat. For my part, I don't believe there is any truth in this rumor, for the musical critics of the respectable New York journals would not allow the professional jealousies of artists to influence their critical opinions. It has been only owing to bad weather, and other extraneous circumstances, that we do not have an Arthur Napoleon furor.

Arthur Napoleon came to this country very quietly. There was no preliminary puffing, and yet he is acknowledged by those that have heard him to be truly an Art-miracle. He is but fifteen years old, having been born in Oporto, Portugal, in March 1844. He was only four years old when his father, himself a good musician, discovering in the child a decided aptitude for musical studies, resolved to develop that aptitude to the utmost. The result exceeded his most sanguine expectations. With less trouble than is spent by most children in learning to speak, he rapidly acquired the rudiments of musical knowledge and performance; and, at six years of age, was so far advanced as to play with distinguished success before the King and Queen of Portugal, and also before a crowded assembly in the Theatre de D. Maria, one of the largest in Lisbon. In 1853 he visited Paris, where his reception was extremely brilliant. He was introduced to her Imperial Highness the Princess Mathilde, and to the Emperor. He played at the most fashionable concerts, was caressed by the most distinguished persons, and received cordial praise from the most eminent musical critics. H. Herz was so delighted with the little Napoleon's performance of the exceedingly difficult Herz bravura, that he presented him on the spot with a copy of his "Carnival de Venise," a piece which has ever since been among the most attractive in the young pianist's repertoire, and which, to the astonishment of the composer, he executed in public only seven days after it had been presented. Arthur Napoleon next came to London, where, with the bloom of his Paris triumphs fresh upon him, it might have been expected that he would at once become an object of general admiration. But the London public, so constant and faithful when once secured, is, perhaps for that very reason, singularly coy, and slow to listen to the first advances of even the most dazzling genius. Arthur, however, although still remaining comparatively unknown, had no just cause for complaint; since, in acquiring the friendship and heartfelt admiration of Mr. Ella, he laid the foundation and beheld the prophecy of a wide and ever-increasing metropolitan reputation. After playing at one of the Matinées of the Musical Union; at his own concert, which, considering all the circumstances, might be pronounced an encouraging success; and at some other concerts for which he received engagements, he proceeded to the provinces, where he may truly be said to have gathered his first British laurels. At Leeds, at Liverpool, and at Manchester, he repeatedly played to crowded and admiring audiences; and, in the latter town, gained the even greater advantage of securing the friendship and protection of the eminent pianist, Mr. Charles Hallé, of whose family, during his stay there, he came to be regarded as almost one. All this, however, was but a prelude to the enthusiasm created by his performances in Ireland. Once over the channel his progress was a continued ovation. Audiences flocked to hear him—concert-givers competed for his services—journalists, and even amateurs stepping out of their accustomed privacy, wrote columns in his praise; and, to crown all, his Dublin admirers subscribed for a piece of plate, value 100 guineas, which was presented, at a public concert, by the Lord Mayor of that city, who accompanied the tribute with a eulogistic address, as honorable to the taste of the speaker as to the genius of the young artist. Almost a necessary consequence of these triumphs was that he also received private invitations to the Castle, the Mansion-house, and the houses of the resident nobility and gentry. In 1854 Arthur returned to London, where he played with brilliant success at two Matinées of the Musical Union, and at several of the more select morning and evening concerts. In the autumn of that year he performed in Brussels, and then proceeded to Berlin, having received an engagement for thirteen performances in that city. On his journey back to England, in the early part of the next year, he also played at Hanover, Düsseldorf, and Cologne—in the latter city performing no less than thirteen times in public, although he had only contemplated staying there a single day. It was here that he received the distinguished honor of being elected honorary member of the celebrated Cologne Choral Union, and of being presented with the medal of that admirable association. After his return to London, Arthur played at Drury-lane, and on the 24th and 26th of May at the Crystal Palace, in the central transept; the success of the two latter performances being so decided, that the directors invited him to perform at the grand festival of their first horticultural fête, June 2, 1855.

After having played at the Crystal Palace before 30,000 people, the young pianist gave a concert in London, and was engaged to play at the Hereford Festival, where he met with his usual success. He now attracted the attention of Cramer and Beale, the well-known musical firm, and by them was engaged for an extended provincial tour, together with Clara Novello, Sivori, Piatti and other artists. In the two months, that these gifted musicians travelled together, they appeared at 37 towns, including the chief cities of Ireland, Scotland and England. The tour concluded in December 1855, and in January 1856, Arthur Napoleon returned to Paris, giving concerts there, thence proceeding to the provincial cities of France and to Germany. In May he was again in London; and three months after he went to Weimar. Liszt lived at Weimar, and received the young pianist most cordially, inviting him to his house, where Arthur played, before the composer, Liszt's "Galop Chromatique." The elder pianist returned the compliment by playing for Arthur his variations on the "Prophet," at the same time highly complimenting his young rival. In Baden Arthur met with Rossini, who testified his regard by writing in young Napoleon's album his name and a few staves of music. At Berlin, he was presented by Meyerbeer to the King and Queen of Prussia, and he played twice before the court. He then took an extended tour through Poland and the German principalities, meeting at Leipzig with Moscheles, at whose house he staid.

In July of 1857, Arthur and his father sailed for Brazil. Here his success was enough to turn his head. He gave his concerts every night at the opera house, to immense audiences, the orchestra escorting him home on the occasion of his benefit, while flowers were cast in the streets before him. Then he visited Pernambuco, Bahia, Buenos Ayres, and other large South American cities, and last May returned to Portugal where he met his family again after an absence of six years. In a few months he started off again, visited Lisbon, embarked for Liverpool, and after a farewell concert at St. George's Hall, embarked for America in one of the Galway line of steamers. He landed at New York, and gave his first concert a few weeks ago, at Dodworth's Hall. It was a success, artistically viewed. A few more concerts were given, but the New Year's holidays coming on, it was deemed expedient to postpone till next month his further appearance in public.

What shall I say of this boy as an artist? What would be too extravagant to prophesy in regard to his future? Here is a boy of fifteen playing the most difficult music of Thalberg, Liszt, and others with the most unflinching accuracy, the most surprising execution, and with a true appreciation of the composers. His own arrangements and compositions also betray the real musician, while the tenacity of his memory is evinced by his playing his entire repertoire without the notes. It will not be worth while to enter here into any rhapsodic disquisition upon his performance. It is simply wonderful. Of course he is not yet perfect. He lacks an individual style. He has enormous execution, and true poetic feeling, yet he is not a destructive player. His youth is undoubtedly an element of his success. The characteristic music of Gottschalk (whom he has never heard play) he does not perform well, excepting as far as execution goes, and he has sense enough to know it. Personally he is modest yet aspiring, and is fired with musical ambition. After a couple of years of concert-giving he hopes to study music scientifically and become a composer. In other accomplishments besides musical, he is not deficient; he talks several languages (English perfectly) and is well read in French and English literature—He expects to come shortly to Boston, and then you will be able to judge whether he is a real artist, or whether his youth and personal partiality have misled me in my estimate of his merits.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

LA TRAVIATA, as sung by Piccolomini, Giuglini, and all others. New, funny, and free version, by H. Walker. 60

This is a complete and well connected Potpourri from this opera, comprising all the favorite airs, to a text which is a very clever parody on the plot of the piece. As the airs in "Traviata" are familiar to almost everybody, the funny adaptations will be generally appreciated. There is the air of "Di Provenza il mar" set to these words: "But folks cannot live on love, though young couples often try; they find it's not nutritious, and must give it up or die," and others fitted just as appropriately. The Potpourri will have a wide circulation and create much merriment, where it goes.

GOD SAVE OUR PRESIDENT. National Song. Words by DeHaes Janvier; music by Benkert. 25
Well calculated to become a standard National Song.

ROMANCE FROM "ZEMIRE AND AZOR." Rose, how enchanting art thou and mild. (Rose wie bist du so reizend.) Spohr. 25

A well known song, proverbial for its sweetness, and the delight of those who revel in Spohr's chromatic style of composition. It is written for mezzo soprano voice.

SAILOR'S RETURN. (Der Schiffer fährt zu Land.) Curschmann. 25

This is one of the earlier works of this charming writer, and the first proof of his distinguished talent for vocal composition. The imitation of the monotonous peals of the distant village-bells, which is continually heard in the accompaniment, is a very happy idea, and ingeniously carried out. Poetry and music produce a thrilling effect.

JENNIE'LL BE THY BRIDE. Ballad. F. Woolcot. 25
A simple pleasing ballad, by the composer of "Bell Brandon."

THE MOON BEHIND THE HILL. Words and music by T. B. Bishop. 30

Pretty words and a taking air, which will be carried all over the country by the ballad singers and wandering troupes of minstrels.

'NEATH THE BURNING SUN OF SYRIA. (Sotto il sol di Siria. From "Aroldo," opera by Ferdi. 40
The famous tenor Air and Cabaletta in the opera.

Instrumental Music.

AIR BY WEIGL. Varied. F. Bayers. 25
Composed for the use and benefit of pupils in the second quarter of lessons.

TROIS AMUSEMENTS BRILLIANTS, from "Vespres Siciliennes. Albert W. Berg. each, 30
1. Vals d'Ilver.
2. Polka Mazurka.
3. Galop brilliant.

A series of instructive pieces, of medium difficulty, calculated to interest as well as advance the scholar, prepared with great care and painstaking by this widely and favorably known teacher of the pianoforte in New York.

RIPPLING RILL VARSOVIANA. Montgomery. 25
Pleasing and striking music to this fashionable dance.

THE PIANIST'S BEST COMPANION. (Schmidt's Five Finger Exercises.) A collection of two hundred and thirteen Five-finger Exercises for the Pianoforte, intended to impart an equal action of the Fingers on that instrument. With an introduction by J. A. Hamilton. 50

The practice of five-finger exercises, or, in other words, of passages in one fixed position of the hands, has been found so eminently useful, not only to beginners, but even to advanced pupils, as a means of forming a true and graceful position of the hands and arms, and equalizing the action of the fingers, that such exercises are now placed before pupils by all respectable masters throughout Europe.

A Song for New Year's Eve.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Stay yet, my friends, a moment stay —
Stay till the good old year,
So long companion of our way,
Shakes hands and leaves us here.
Oh stay, oh stay,
One little hour, and then away.

The year, whose hopes were high and strong,
Has now no hopes to wake;
Yet one hour more of jest and song
For his familiar sake.
Oh stay, oh stay,
One mirthful hour, and then away.

The kindly year, his liberal hands
Have lavished all his store,
And shall we turn from where he stands,
Because he gives no more?
Oh stay, oh stay,
One grateful hour, and then away.

Days brightly came and calmly went,
While yet he was our guest;
How cheerfully the week was spent!
How sweet the Seventh day's rest!
Oh stay, oh stay,
One good hour more, and then away.

Dear friends were with us — some who sleep
Beneath the coffin lid;
What pleasant memories we keep
Of all they said and did!
Oh stay, oh stay,
One tender hour, and then away.

Even while we sing he smiles his last,
And leaves our sphere behind —
The good old year is with the past:
Oh be the new as kind!
Oh stay, oh stay,
One parting strain, and then away.

The Blacksmith.

In the smithy corner, the shadows
Gloom, undefined and dun;
Through one small window shines slantwise
A yellow beam of the sun.

Broad and black, the furnace
Stands by the open door;
The glowing coals within it
Madly crackle and roar!

The smith stands by the furnace,
Shoeing a traveller's horse;
Bold are his strokes, his strong arm
Bold in its brawny force!

Bright his cheek and his glances;
White his gleaming teeth;
His brow shows brown and bronzed,
His bronze-brown hair beneath.

He hammers and sings together;
He thinks he sings not loud, —

But, round the door, the children Gather, a listening crowd.

"Trot, trot safely and swiftly,
Over highway and heath,
Up the stony mountain,
Into the valley beneath;

"Trot, trot safely and swiftly,
And bear thy rider home;
And when new shoes thou needest,
Back to my smithy come."

NOTES.

1. I see advertised in Dwight's Journal the delightful old "Portuguese Hymn" for solo and chorus. Why Portuguese Evening Hymn? Nay, why Portuguese Hymn? "Because," says the reader, "it came from Portugal." Not at all.

If there is a set of Novello's Musical Times in Boston, there will be found in one of the volumes — which, I cannot say — that the tune was composed by an Englishman, and used in the service of the chapel of the Portuguese Embassy in London. Here it was heard by Lord — somebody — who admired it and introduced it to the public. If there is a set of the Times to be found, whoever will march out the paragraph and communicate, will do a favor, &c. &c.

I contend that no country has produced more exquisite melodies than Great Britain. See how "Robin Adair," introduced by Boieldieu into "La Dame Blanche," and "The Last Rose of Summer," used by Flotow in his "Martha," have had the universal applause of Europe!

2. In the Journal for November 6, is an extract from Frazer's Magazine upon Mozart. There are in it a few of those little errors, which, once put in circulation, go on almost forever. You may kill them over and over again, and in a few weeks they are as much alive again as ever.

For instance: "Van Swieten, the eccentric physician of Maria Theresa" is spoken of as the man of that name, who was such a friend of music and musicians. Not so. The old physician died — I do not know when, I judge about a century since. The musical Van Swieten was his son. The old man's name was Gerard, — the son's Gottfried. The old man was a physician, who wrote a shelf full of medical works, which were translated into English, two or three generations ago; the young man was a privy counsellor of the Austrian Empire, President of the Imperial Library at Vienna, "Commander of the Royal Hungarian order of St. Stephens," and author of the texts to Haydn's "Creation" and "Seasons," or rather the preparer of them. He died in 1803, aged 70 years.

Again Ries informs us, &c. &c. that Beethoven wrote to him in London to "insert a couple of dotted crotchets" in a Sonata "long before published." Not at all. Turn to the "Life of Beethoven" which goes under the name of Moscheles, and you will find that Beethoven wrote to Ries communicating the metronomic tempos and this additional bar at the beginning of the Adagio for a Sonata, the plates of which were engraved, but which was not to be published until a time, afterwards to be specified, in order that the work might appear at the same time in London and Vienna.

I hope no reader will be foolish enough to suppose the conversation given in this Frazer article anything but an imaginary one.

3. Doubtless the Berlin correspondent of the Journal writes a very unreadable hand. I fully believe it — but how could his "b, y," "by" in the programme to the Magic Flute [See Journal of Music, Nov. 13] be made into a capital G — so that the reader learns this fact for the first time: "Music, G. Mozart."?

In the same article the real author of the libretto to the Magic Flute gathered his minerals in Iceland — not in Poland. Again how was it possible that in the attempt to write Joachim Perinet, he made of the first name, Isacium? What a shocking hand he must write, or what — no matter! He afterwards means to write "poetical" and it proves to be "practical." Then in the article on Dehn, "Sonntag" becomes "Sornstag" and "Siegfried" "Sieffield." What a hand it must be!

4. Nothing new under the sun! A friend has lent me a number or two of the Independent in one of which I read that Prof. Haven delivered an inaugural discourse at Chicago, subject Theology — his theme developed in answer to the following inquiries;

1. Is Theology properly a science?
2. If so, is it a progressive science?
3. What is its rank among sciences?
4. What are its practical relations and uses?

The other day I bought for a song, "Liber primus defensionum Theologiæ divi doctoris Thomæ de Aquino" &c., printed at Venice in 1483. The table of contents gives the following;

Questio I. Utrum Theologia sit scientia?

" II. Utrum habitus theologiæ sit practicus?

" III. Utrum Theologia sit una scientia?

" IV. Utrum Dens sit subjectum hujus scientiæ?

In 1258, Thomas Aquinas, the Dominican monk, was discussing in the University at Paris the question "Whether Theology is a science?" In 1858 — 600 years after — on the shores of Lake Michigan, in a continent, whose existence was undreamed of by Thomas, a professor of theology equally undreamed of by him, enters upon his duties with a discourse, the questio prima of which is word for word the same, save that it is in a language then unrecognized in the learned world! If any one will dig out this old abbreviated Latin for me I should like to know how the two arguments compare.

5. Here is the Atlantic Monthly for October and November — here away off in Germany! I should like to ask the Autocrat if he has seen or heard of the elm at South Natick? But before I can ask him, it will be the dead of winter and elms will be forgotten. No matter. To show that there were such as knew the beauty and value of a tree long ago, I make a note. When Deacon Bigelow, (father of Sawney B. of Harvard College remembrance) sold the land on the north side of the river above the mill at South Natick, he reserved a little angular good-for-nothing patch, that no harm might come to that little elm. He died about 1816 — so that now the tree must have some forty years of growth added. Seen from the bridge, on the other side of the river, it is one of the most perfect of beauties — for a tree.

1. LA CI DAREM.

Attention! here comes a brave and merry throng of people. In G major, and in six-eight time. Hurra for a country wedding! This is no eclogue nor idyll; it is Masetto accompanied by his friends, a troop of peasants, men and women, in their Sunday clothes and faces, dancing and singing; a very jovial choir, and yet a kind of joviality which you like to witness as a whole and in perspective, like the herds in a landscape. It is altogether a people's song, which sounds more pleasant in the distance, than when you are near. The little duet of the bridal couple is framed with good effect in the noisy unisono of the Tutti: Tra la la! tra la la!

But in the midst of this quite rustic choir is found a person, who will sing other tones ere long. This is the bride, Zerlina, with whom MOZART seems to have fallen as much in love, as Pygmalion with his statue. Must it not have occurred to many of my readers, to have discovered at some rural festival, amid a group of peasant girls, one form to which all the others only served as foil and setting; one of those forms not easily forgotten, when you have seen it once? Without doubt then every one has said, that here was a mistake of fortune, and that this must be a princess in disguise. Unquestionably she must have soul, mind, character and aspirations. Always to have to remain a peasant, must be terrible for her. Yet one might offer a high wager, that a closer acquaintance with this idol would have disturbed these fair presumptions; and it is just here that Zerlina distinguishes herself from the generality of peasant girls, who outwardly resemble her. Zerlina is precisely that which you would have her to be. She possesses soul, mind and much vanity. With a look Giovanni has divined all this. Shall such a beauty be suffered to become the wife of such a country lout? — How can he, the noble cavalier, permit that? Do not think long, my fair one, it is only to change your suitor. Giovanni for Masetto, the change seems worth accepting.

Still she wavers, and since the situation is ripe for music, here begins the precious duettino. Many lovers of music find the allegro of La ci darem somewhat trivial, and far from corresponding to the andante. We too are of their opinion, but before we turn the observation into a fault-finding, we will first see whether the composer had not some good ground for letting a quite ordinary melody follow a song of the first rank. Innocence in conflict with seduction, and in this growing ever weaker, is, if not precisely a very edifying, at least a very musical image. To make it true, the seduction had to be felt in the souls of the spectators as soon as it penetrated the soul of Zerlina; the moral dignity of the person survived as long as the words and music expressed resistance; but from the moment that Zerlina says andiam (let us go,) she is fallen as low as any one of the ladies in Leporello's register; and if her name does not swell the list, she may thank circumstances which are independent of herself. Andiam, andiam, mio bene, a restorare le pene d'un innocente amor. Innocent is good; the rest too is not bad. To give a seductive melody to such words, to clothe a common-place situation with flattering and pleasing features, — would not this have been as much as to make oneself an accomplice in this licentiousness of the principal person, and so to say, embellish vice? Against that MOZART wisely guarded himself. The melody of his Allegro expresses nothing but a plebeian intoxication; he shows us the head of a poor peasant girl entirely turned at the sight of a handsome cavalier, richly decorated with gold and feathers, and at the thought of fine clothes, jewels, carriages and horses. She sees herself already at the ball. Listen to the unquiet pizzicato, where the modulation inclines to the key of the Fourth and then comes back to the Tonic, like a skilful dancer, gracefully balancing before his lady. ROSSINI would not have done it better, but MOZART did not stop there. In the midst of a flowing and most natural melody, which moves upon a droning, bag-pipe sort of bass, he has insinuated a chromatic passage, the effect of which is as remarkable as the design seems deeply considered. (Seventh and eighth measures of the Allegro.) Is not this harmonious complication, lasting but a moment, a sign by which the musician meant to indicate to us all that there is dangerous and critical in this situation, leading by a flowery path directly to the precipice? The Allegro of La ci darem, then, is unquestionably the weakest piece in the opera, and a masterpiece of truth, of trivial and very suggestive music, as long as the text is only frivolous.

But the unavoidable Elvira snatches the dove from the talons of the hawk, and opens the eyes of the young peasant to the danger that threatens her.

2. BATTI, BATTI.

Now follows another aria: Batti, batti, O bel Masetto, (Beat me, beat me, dear Masetto,) which is like a concert piece for the orchestra, entirely in contrast with the preceding in its working up, and quite equal to it in truth of expression. You see and hear a woman before her judge, who, driven from her last intrenchments, her denials and her tears, seeks more to persuade than to convince, and more to seduce than to persuade. Zerlina's problem was a fine one for the musician; but has he not discharged his duty to the same too well? some rigorous critic will inquire. Why this outlay of coquetry and feminine seductiveness, merely for the sake of a Masetto, the blockhead of a husband? Venus's girdle scientifically unrolled, to muzzle the mouth of a bear! Perhaps master Wolfgang was not conscious, that there was in his aria more than it would take to turn the head of a Don Juan himself. True: but had he not also to seduce his audience? It were best not to complain too much of that.

In the first place, we have here an obligato violoncello part, which keeps on without the least interruption from the beginning to the end. You hear this insidious bass, as it twists and winds, as it hums and drones, as it extends its treacherous circle indefinitely around the poor deluded victim. Upon this seductive harmony coo the violins like turtle-dove; the flute mingles its sweetest sighs with its most amorous trills; when the voice is silent, its confederates and gossips, the instruments, speak for it. Observe, I pray you, this sequence of four measures, which in the voice part reproduces the motif of the aria, varied by sixteenths, so that it may fit the outline of the ritornel. There are five instruments: the bassoon, which goes with the violoncello in an obligato and continuous part; the flute, which imitates it, but in contrary motion; the horn, which has to hold out on the bass note: and the oboe, which descends the scale in syncopated eighths, and softens the passing dissonances, which are as quickly resolved as they are felt. Nothing can tickle the ear more exquisitely than this passage; as for the vocal melody, it expresses pure rustic naturalness and open-heartedness; it is the innocent little Zerlina, who lavishes upon her dear Masetto the tenderest caresses and in the most true-hearted tones asks, what she has done so wicked, that she must be so hardly treated. As a discreet, but very faithful representative of the stronger sex on this occasion, Masetto manifests not the least pleasure any more in striking; scarcely can he resist the wish to embrace the little rogue. Ah! who of us has not been a thousand times if once in his life masetto and masettissimo (blockhead!) The Allegro announces the great triumph of the lady. Pace, pace, O vita mia. (Peace, O peace, my life, &c.) From this moment, the art and artificiality, which have been developed in the andante, are superfluous; the violoncello gives up its snake-like movement, and hastens away in singular downward scales and unquiet arpeggios; the orchestra merely accompanies: Zerlina abandons herself to an unrestrained joy, and the aria ends with the strokes of the bass, which outlast the voice for a few measures, and murmur with a distant sneering pianissimo.

3. VEDRAI CARINO.

Vedrai carino is, like so many pieces of our opera, super-dramatic music. When we hear it, we forget the text, we forget the person. There is no longer any Zerlina or Masetto. Something infinite, absolute, and verily divine announces itself to the soul. Is it perhaps nothing but love, represented under one of the countless modifications, by which it is distinguished in each individual, according to the laws of his nature and the peculiar vicissitudes of his fortune? No; the soul feels rather a direct effluence of the principle itself, from which all youth, all love, all joy, and every vital reproduction flows. The genius of the Spring's metamorphoses, he namely, whom the old theosophists called Eros, who disembodied Chaos, who fructified germs and married hearts, this genius speaks to us in this music, as he has so often spoken in the murmurings of the brook that has escaped its icy prison, in the rustling of the young leaves, in the melodious songs of the nightingale, in the balmy odors which pervade the eloquent and inspiring stillness of a May night. Mozart had listened to and firmly held this ground-chord of this universal harmony; he arranged it for a soprano voice with orchestral accompaniment, and made of it the nuptial air of a young bride. Zerlina sings surrounded by the shadows of the marriage night, while just about to cross the threshold, at which virginity pauses, with prayer and trembling expecting the confirmation of the holy title of wife. In this place the Aria becomes a genuine Scena of Love, the source of life and of eternal rejuvenescence for all nature; — of Love, the Spring-time of souls and the most unstinted revelation of the all-goodness of the Creator. It is a marriage song for all that loves, conceived in the same spirit with the "Ode to Joy" by SCHILLER, allowing for the difference of tone and style between a Dithyrambic and an Eclogue. The theme, the image of the purest bliss, betrays none the less that inexplicable and seldom justified exaltation, which in the fairest, poetic hours of our existence leads us to that unknown good, whereof all other goods of earth are only shadows and foretastes. A rhythm without marked accent; a harmony without dissonances; a modulation, which rests in the Tonic and forgets itself, as if held fast there by some spell; a melody, which cannot separate itself from its ineffaceable motif; this tranquil rapture, this soft ecstasy, fill out the first half of the air. After the pause, hosts of nightingales begin to sing in chorus in the orchestra, while the voice with exquisite monotony murmurs: Sentilo battere, toccami qua. Then the same words are again uttered with the expression of passion; the heart of the young woman beats stronger and stronger; the sighs of the orchestra are redoubled, and the last vocal phrase, which bears the impress of chaste devotion, shows us the wife as she sinks softly upon the bosom of her husband. Mozart seems to have anticipated the desire of the ear, in that he lets the orchestra repeat the whole motif and the enchanting final phrases once again. He knew that the piece would be found too short, as it actually is the case.

Henri Wieniawski.

[From the Illustrated London News.]

The renowned violinist, Henri Wieniawski, whose wonderful powers of execution are nightly exciting enthusiastic admiration at M. Jullien's concerts, and whose portrait we publish this week, was born at Lublin, in Poland. At the age of eight, having given the most marked evidence of a musical organization, he was sent, by command and at the expense of the Emperor Nicholas, to commence a course of musical study at the Conservatoire of Paris. The violin was the instrument to which he devoted himself with all the intensity of his energetic nature, and with such astonishing eagerness did he devour and profit by the lessons of his instructor, the celebrated Massart, that at the age of eleven he was awarded the first prize of the Conservatoire—the highest distinction which, in the eyes of Europe, can be conferred on the successful musical student. This brilliant honor, however, was attended with as deep a shadow which, in the eyes of the earnest and enthusiastic little virtuoso, robbed the triumph of almost all its satisfaction. By the rules of the Conservatoire, when a pupil has attained this final token of the highest proficiency in the studies for which it affords such unrivalled opportunities, he is dismissed to employ the advantages thus gained in the struggle of life, and to commence his career with his "blushing honours thick upon him." Doubtless the regulation is framed in the spirit of the fairest justice to the existing and future pupils of the institution, and operates beneficially in the majority of cases; nor could it be expected that the authors of the law should foresee that one day the triumphant honor which they had placed at the goal of the academic curriculum would be grasped by such tender hands, and that the alma mater of European musical students would ruthlessly close her doors on almost an infant. Such was the inexorable rule, however; and Henri Wieniawski, in spite of his passionate tears and poignant regret to be so soon deprived of all the means and appliances of the study he loved so deeply, had to abide by it, and turn away from the Conservatoire. His obligations to the munificence of the Emperor of Russia rendered it incumbent that he should now wend his way northward, and present himself at the Imperial Court of St. Petersburg, and give his august protector an opportunity of judging how well bestowed had been his paternal care and solicitude on his little Polish subject.

At the age of sixteen Wieniawski visited Berlin, where he found the great violinist Viextemps reigning supreme, who, on hearing his youthful rival, pronounced the highest encomium on his marvellous mastery of all the difficulties of his instrument, and foretold that he would one day obtain the most brilliant success in the artistic world. Never was prophecy so rapidly accomplished; for ere the little "Northern Star" had left the horizon of Berlin he had during that single season given sixteen concerts, all of which were brilliantly attended; while the great Viextemps only commanded patronage for four. On the occasion of his visit to this capital he was presented by the King of Prussia with the grand medal, "Des Beaux Arts"—a distinction only accorded to the most eminent merit. During a subsequent tour through Saxony, where he continued to win the most signal proofs of admiration, he received the decoration of the Ernestine Haus Order. Pursuing his triumphant career with undiminished brilliancy through the country of the De Beriot, the Viextemps, the Sivori, he proceeded to Holland, where he gave in succession one hundred and forty concerts, and once more received from Royal hands a badge of honorable distinction in the Order of the Couronne de Chêne, shortly afterwards exchanged for the commandership of that order. Although so early the object of such enthusiastic admiration, and overwhelmed ere he had reached maturity with the most dazzling honors, Wieniawski is remarkable in private for his modest and retiring demeanour.

John Field.

(From the Echo.)

JOHN FIELD is one of those few Englishmen whose name is inscribed in ineffaceable characters in the archives of Art. He was born in 1782, in Dublin, and was a pupil of Clementi's. He soon took his place among the most distinguished pianists of his time; and, even up to the present day, has never been surpassed for touch and melodious tone. He gained his first laurels as a virtuoso in Paris and St. Petersburg. In 1822, he migrated to Moscow, where his concerts and lessons became very popular. From 1832, he travelled through England, France, and Italy. He was detained in Naples by sickness, until he returned, in 1835, with a Russian family, to Russia, and died at Moscow, in 1837. A great number of concertos and solo pieces for the pianoforte have given an imperishable importance to his name. But the compositions which have enjoyed the widest circulation, are his celebrated nocturnes, which have been frequently imitated, but never equalled for unsurpassable and simple depth of feeling. F. Liszt characterizes them as follows, in the preface to J. Schubert's admirable edition:

"Field's nocturnes are yet new by the side of much that has grown old; six-and-thirty years have elapsed since their first appearance, and a balmy freshness, a fragrant odour, is still wafted to us from them. Where else should we now find such perfect and inimitable naïveté? Since Field, no one has been able to express himself in that language of the heart, which moves us as a tender, moist glance does; which cradles to repose, like the soft, equal rocking of a boat, or the swinging of a hammock, which is so gentle and easy, that we fancy we hear around us the low murmuring of dying kisses.

"No one has ever attained these indefinite harmonies of the Æolian harp, these half sighs, floating away into air, and, gently complaining, melted in sweet pain. No one has ever attempted this, especially no one of those who heard Field himself play, or rather dream out his songs, at moments when, abandoning himself entirely to his inspiration, he departed from the first plan of the piece, as it existed in his imagination, and invented, in uninterrupted succession, fresh groups, which, like wreaths of flowers, he twined around his melodies, while he kept continually decorating the latter with this rain of nosegays, and yet so decked them out, that their languishing tremulousness and charming serpentinings were not concealed, but simply covered with a transparent veil. With what inexhaustible profusion did he vary the thought when it occurred? With what unusual felicity did he surround, without disturbing it, with a net of arabesques?"

FRIEDRICH VON FLOTOW is a nobleman, the son of a wealthy lord of the manor, in Mecklenburg, (North of Germany.) This somewhat retired part of Germany reminds one, in many of its characteristics, of the olden time; of a state of society which belongs more to the past than the present. The fertile lands are divided into large estates, and are in possession of some of the oldest families of nobles Germany possesses. The life of these proprietors is mostly agricultural, preserving, in some sort, many of the old patriarchal rights, customs and feelings. We mention this fact because of the anomaly which exists between the life and spirit of a man born and educated under such influences, and the light, brilliant French music of Martha, Inbra, etc. But it is not the first time Germans have proved they can be any thing else but German; and although in music they are least likely to forget their own nature and spirit, the history of modern opera shows in MEYENBEER and HALEVY two brilliant illustrations of the fact that we have mentioned. Flotow, however, spent only his earlier youth in the country of renowned cattle and fertile pasture-grounds. He soon came to Paris, studying music, opera, ballet, and all sorts of things, which the French metropolis can offer to an apt and diligent scholar.

The musical education of Flotow has been in some respect a very curious one. Generally a musician tries everything before he fixes himself upon any peculiar branch of his art. Not so Flotow. We do not think that he ever studied or composed any thing else but a certain class of vocal music; nay, we do not even believe that he composed much even of this before he came to Paris, with ample means to enjoy it; having a certain predilection for music, perhaps also the intention to study it, but certainly without any great preparation for the career of an opera composer.

Flotow learned first how to write little romances in the French style, then he tried larger forms, until, at last, he accomplished the short opera comique. Paris has been, in a musical sense, the cradle, nursery, and school-room of Flotow; he learned there to creep, to walk; to spell, to write, and to produce. Being always with French people, hearing nothing but the talk of a particular class of musicians; being, besides, young and unfixed in his views and principles, one can not, after all, wonder that he forgot the solid qualities of his native Mecklenburg, and reflected in his music the habits and feelings of that society in which he moved. And as this society was a good one, being formed by the circles of some first-rate houses; the young nobleman being received with all the honor due to his station; as, besides, he was very apt to perceive the finer qualities of French composition, and to adopt them, we can easily account for the elegance he displays in his better works. But Flotow learned not only this in Paris; he obtained also a knowledge of the stage, of the public, of the artists, and of men in general. Further—and this is the most essential—he obtained a perception of his own resources, and especially learned not to come too early before the public. Flotow has never been guilty of an attempt to write a so-called grand opera; he knows the scope of his talents and abilities, and therefore his whole ambition has been concentrated upon the opera comique. Having so very often seen that stuff prepared which is served day by day to the Parisian public; having assisted in all the incidents of a mise en scene; having gone as a witness through all the stages of the life of a composer for that institution, and feeling in himself musical resources enough to satisfy at least, in this respect, the wants of the public, he risked himself at last on the perilous field of an opera composer. His first trial, in association with another, was not very successful; then came a little opera in one act, which had the esteem of the critics, and the applause of the claqué, raising some hopes for a future success. Had Flotow continued to walk in the same path; to compose only for the Opera Comique in Paris, the desired full success would not have failed to appear at last; but at that time he made the acquaintance of a German author, who spent a portion of each year in Paris, to look out for pieces to translate and arrange for the German stage, and it is this acquaintance which changed the course of the composer and had the greatest influence upon his further career. The public name of that author is W. FRIEDRICH, of a wealthy merchant family in Hamburg. This man has obtained a reputation in Germany for being the best translator of French pieces, for his great knowledge of the stage, and the ability to write gentle verses, especially for opera purposes. Flotow required a libretto; Friedrich proposed one for the German stage, based upon the principles of the French Opera Comique; Flotow agreed, and both men began to work. The first sign of this new partnership was the opera Alessandro Stradella. It is almost the same plot which inspired NIEDERMEYER to make a grand opera for the French Academy of Music. If the singer and composer, ALESSANDRO STRADELLA, who lived in the last half of the seventeenth century, could have heard the music which he has to perform in either opera, but especially in that of Flotow, he would have been rather surprised. Flotow's music is very thin and somewhat obese, a sort of enlarged vaudeville with recitatives, which has had an entire success on account of the musical characteristics with which the two bandits in the piece are treated. Here the talent of the composer, the comical expression, was very happily displayed; and Flotow himself was quite right, when he said, after the first performance of this opera at Hamburg: "My bandits have saved me." The next opera was The Sailors, a more severe undertaking, and for this very reason unsuccessful. Flotow was, in consequence of this, rather dissatisfied with his partner; still he agreed for a third trial together. The result was The Forester. Again no success; decidedly Mr. Friedrich was not worth anything. Flotow resolved upon dissolution of the partnership, but first he would try once more the ability of the librettist. Martha was the result of their labors, and this time a successful one. Martha gave the composer a position and reputation in Germany, which his later operas, Indra and Rubezahl, although they were very feeble reproductions of his powers, could not shake! The music to Martha is spiritual, light, and brilliant, grateful to the ear, the singers, and also, as experience has taught us, to the composer himself. The orchestration is much better than in Stradella, and the instrumentation has some very happy and ingenious combinations. The treatment of the whole is French; but there are some pieces, as the spinner-quartet and the finale of the first act, which are as good as any thing Auber or Adam have written for the Opera Comique. The great art to finish at the right time, not to weary the public by a continuation of sentiment scenes—on the contrary to offer a continual interchange of the sentimental and the comic: these secrets of success Flotow understands very well as he proves in this opera. Then that other important point, the provision of the singers with good, grateful roles, is also not neglected in Martha. Nancy and Plunkett are very acceptable parts for male and female buffos, and Martha and Lyonel are favorite performances of all the German soubrettes and tenors. Martha and Stradella have made their way over almost all the stages of Germany, have pleased hundreds of times, and will please probably as long as society requires an opera to be served as in dramas, nothing but amusement and pleasant sensations. The opera of Martha, or rather an English version of it, was introduced to the American public by Madame BISHOP a few years since, when an astute critic of one of the daily papers gravely complimented Signor BOCHSA for the brilliant idea he had conceived, of introducing into the opera the well-known ballad, 'Tis the last rose of summer.' As most of our readers are probably well aware that whatever merit may be attached to the brilliancy of this idea is due to the German composer, we should not now refer to it were it not that the same incorrect statement has reappeared in print within a few days.

As far as we can judge from personal appearance, not having any biography at hand, Mr. Flotow is about forty years old, tall, with a dark complexion, and much smartness in his eyes. He has the appearance of a man who carefully observes, and knows how to profit by his observation. His manners are gentlemanly, amiable, and prepossessing, just as is his music. You are flattered without being aware of it. Flotow is, in our opinion, the smartest manufacturer of opera music Germany possesses at this time.

The Huguenots.

From the Courier, Jan. 4.

I beg to make a few practical suggestions with reference to the first communication of your correspondent "Civis." It was not only written in correct and fearless English, in the tone and temper of a gentleman, without technicality, and with knowledge, judgment and discretion, but it fortunately came at just the time to hit the town between wind and water and attract general attention. It was meant to inform us what "The Huguenots" is when properly represented; and to demonstrate that neither the manifestoes of Mr. Ullman, the criticism of the daily press, nor the suppositions of the majority of the audience, as to the merits of that representation, were correct. This information was needed, and it was given by one who thoroughly knew what he discussed, and who referred no more to his experience abroad than was necessary to show his means of knowledge and his fitness to institute comparisons. Besides this, his estimate of the rank of the artists of Mr. Ullman's company, and of the rank and merits of the different schools and works of operatic composition, indicated intellectual scope and comprehensiveness.

In thus expressing my honest opinion of the merits of his article, I shall run little risk of being thought captious or pugnacious if I call attention to some facts which should be taken in connection with it, when we are regarding operas as presented in Boston. We must remember, in the first place, what undeserved luck we have had for the last fifteen years in hearing operas in this city. And we are not a musical, and we are a capricious people. We are not even really fond of the drama. For nearly twenty years the only place in this city where it has had consistent and rewarding support has been the "Boston Museum." Booth, the best actor of English tragedy on the stage, played this winter to "half houses."

The "Tedesco troupe" played at a great loss at low prices in the Howard Athenæum, and nearly half the time even that little theatre was only half filled. So it was with the second Havana company, which "Civis" calls the best we ever had in Boston. What inducement did we offer that or any other such company to come here again? How many of our capricious and requiring lovers of music in Boston heard their admirable rendering of "Macbeth?"

So it has been with troupe after troupe. It would be hard to name an operatic manager in Boston or New York who has made money, except Mr. Hackett with Grisi and Mario, whose names were advertisements, and Strakosch, whose "humbug" was not so much in his advertisements and his use of an accommodating press as in making a ghastly collection of a dozen scarecrow choristers, not many more broken-winded instruments, and one or two real artists shining like diamonds set in pitch—and then, with exquisite and successful effrontery, calling it a "grand operatic troupe." If Mr. Ullman is now successful in New York and Boston, it will be not more because he has (every thing considered and with reference to our previous companies,) excellent singers and a superior orchestra, but because his advertisements of a princess, &c. &c., have had great influence, and that, too, upon many persons who would not confess it to others or to themselves.

This is all bad enough in Mr. Ullman. It reflects still more severely upon ourselves. Our Barnums and Bonners, our newspapers in their relations to publishers, our eminent men in their good-natured concession of the use of their names to books they haven't read, panaceas they haven't tried, and dinners they won't attend, as well as the whole history of opera in the United States, prescribe nothing much better to an operatic manager who takes such risks with such a public and who would succeed. It must be confessed, too, with shame, that the true lovers of music owe it very much to such tricks of management that enough un-musical people can be brought together to enable those who love operas to hear them at all.

Now, how is it abroad? "Civis" can inform you better than I can, but he certainly can name but few of the many great cities of Europe besides Paris, London, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Naples and Milan, where "The Huguenots" is as well or better rendered, on the whole, than it has been in Boston, and with these exceptions, if it be better given, it is to a musical people, giving it their consistent support for some thirty nights together, and often in addition to aid from the government, and from subscribers for the season. In Boston we grow tired of an opera on its second representation, and desert it on the third.

It is also to be remembered that in all England, London only has its opera season. What has Liverpool, with a population about as large as New York, known of opera for the last fifteen years; while a city of secondary importance, in a new country, and with an unmusical people, is blessed with a luck which makes us capricious and requiring, instead of thankful and encouraging.

I will close these hasty suggestions with the remark that I am confident that no one will be more ready to assent to them in the main than "Civis," and with the regret that a few words from him had not rendered these unnecessary. BOSTON.

"The Opera of the Future."

(From Punch.)

Meyerbeer's opera of the Africaine seems to be "The Opera of the Future," for there appears but little chance of its ever being played in our lifetime. How many years has it not been locked up in the great composer's portfolio, undergoing a species of African slavery, of which manager after manager has tried in vain to find the musical key. However, we are sorry to find Meyerbeer lending his great name to Messrs. Wagner, Liszt, and other crotchet-mongers of the Musical of the Future, in support of their inharmonious fallacies, that have lately been aired in a grand pretentious production, called Lohengrin. A "grin" seems to be the end of all their operas, though at best it is but a melancholy one, and anything but flattering to those who provoke it. The Viennese are all Lohengrinning like mad. We wish Meyerbeer would put this band of musical fanatics to shame by allowing his Africaine to become "An Opera of the Present," instead "of the Future," and so prove to these hair-brained gentlemen what good music really is. The best Musical of the Future is that which has the elements of vitality in every note of it, so that there can be no doubt about its living several scores of years after its production. The specimen that we know of this class is Don Giovanni, and our would-be Mozarts cannot do better than take it as a model.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, DEC. 13. 1858. — Since JOHANNA WAGNER returned from her short starring expedition, we have had a series of operas such as it will only "aggravate" you to read of, since on your side of the water, I fear, in our day and generation, they will never mount the stage. Not that the Wagner sings in all, but her list of parts makes quite a change in the list of operas for any given time. We have had Spontini's "Vestale," truly a most admirable work; Cherubini's ever young "Water-Carrier" (Les deux Journées): "Tannhauser;" Bellini's "Romeo and Juliet," "Magic Flute" again, "Euryanthe"; "Prophet;" "Robert the Devil;" Rossini's "Tell;" Donizetti's "Elixir;" Dorn's "Niebelungen;" Taubert's "Macbeth," and divers others; while the company at Kroll's keep up their light French and German comic pieces.

I am very desirous to hear TAUBERT's new work, but was unable on the evening of its last presentation. I hear it spoken very well of.

LAUB has left for Russia. Before leaving he gave a concert in the Singakademie. His programme was in itself a very fine one and gave him opportunity to exhibit his powers in various styles. The first number was a violin concerto by R. Wuerst—the viola of the Laub Quartet of whom I spoke in a late letter—a very pleasing work and one in which the violin and orchestra really work out the musical idea symphonically. Of course it is not a Beethoven work, but it is a fine addition to the small stock of real concertos. Beethoven's Romance in F, that exquisite thing, was exquisitely played; and this was followed by a Scherzo, by Laub himself, which, while truly musical and comical, was as great a piece of neat execution as I ever heard or saw. It was Laub's only piece of mere virtuosos work, and a great one. At the close was Beethoven's Triple Concerto, the same that was played at Radecke's concert. Dr. Bruns took the cello part this time. Can you not raise a violinist, a cellist, and a pianist in Boston, and have it at one of Zerrahn's Concerts?

A Fräulein FRIEDLANDER sang a few pieces—just as young candidates for fame sing them in Boston—very good pupil work—very indeed—full of promise.

My liking for Laub's playing, of which I have written strongly in previous letters, and my respect for him as a musician, were much increased by this evening's performances, and I hope that leaving the East he will some day be heard in the West.

The regular serial concerts have gone on, Symphony Soirées and Quartets and the like, but I have not heard them all. Last Saturday night for instance I was unable to leave the house, and the Dom Chor gave its first performance with a programme made up from Durante, Melchior Franck, Corsi, Friedemann Bach, Jomelli, Pretorius, Schütz, Thiele, Calvisius—and I must needs be sick! A good representation of America was there however. From my friends' descriptions I suppose the choir must have been full—say about 45 boys, and men in proportion.

"Well, J., how did you like it?"

"Oh, I've nothing to say—'twas too good! Never heard anything like it."

Next day. "Well, P., how did you like the Dom Chor?"

"Oh, I never heard anything like it—never heard anything which gave me any idea that there could be such music."

By and by Mr. A. comes in, who has been long in Italy, in Rome, Florence, and every where else, also in Paris, London, Dresden, wherever they are proud of their music.

"Well, Mr. A., how did you like the Dom chor?"

"I declare, I never heard anything like it!"

What? not the Pope's choir in the Sextine chapel?

"No, nothing, anywhere."

So you see, D., I begin to think that I have lost something by being shut up three or four days just now.

The private concerts have been quite numerous. I rarely go to one of them. You and every one, whose duty it is to follow up concerts, know how wearisome and tedious it becomes to go night after night, and write about them. ERK has given a couple, one by choros of men's voices, another by a mixed choir—at both of which the staple article was popular songs. At another a little cantata by Wuerst was sung—which I am told was exceedingly pretty. I have seen the pianoforte arrangement of it, and thought it so. Divers singers and pianists both male and female have added to the number. Now I am very busy night and day with literary work of all kinds. I have too about as much music as I want in Symphony, Quartet, and Oratorio concerts in addition to the opera, which you know is for us, who at home abound in concerts, but have no opera, the great thing. Taking all this into consideration, I cannot afford to give an evening, and half a forenoon, to hearing and writing about M. Schulze's or Müller's concert, and in addition miss some favorite opera and pay as much as the opera would cost. So unless the phenomenon should happen, that Mr. Schulze or Müller should hear of me and send me a ticket, he will never find when he comes hereafter to America that I have made him known through the columns of a musical paper which circulates more widely than any four in Germany put together.

RUBENSTEIN has received an appointment in St. Petersburg, with a fine salary, and HANS VON BÜLOW, the first pianist in Berlin, has been appointed chamber virtuoso to Prince Frederic William, young Vic's husband.

We have four American musical students here now. CONVERSE, studying with Haupt, counterpoint and composition. PAINE, of Portland, studying the same with organ in addition, all with Haupt—who says his pupil will make a great organist; PEASE, of Cleveland, studying in Kullak's school—working to become a pianist. I have seen him but once or twice—never meet him at the best concerts—and PATTISON, of Newark, N. J., just come—studying counterpoint with Haupt and piano with Hans Von Bülow.

To-morrow evening we are to have "Midsummer Night's Dream," with all Mendelssohn's music. I think I shall be there!

I will close this rambling letter with an extract from one which I received the other day from Paris.

"I've attended the opera considerably. If you wish to know my opinion, not worth much I admit, I can tell you I like better the German. There is nothing here that comes up to that in Berlin, that's certain. The Grand Opera Français, in the way of scenery, grandeur and display is not equalled anywhere I have been. No pains nor expense are spared in producing the most wonderful scenic or stage effect and both the music and text are inferior to Berlin. You would be astonished at the number and costliness of costumes and beauty of scenery seen there even at an ordinary performance.

"At the Italian opera of course one hears the best singers. I was charmed the other night by ALBONI and MARIO. Even there however the orchestra does not come up to the one I heard at Berlin. I must say I am more and more attached to the German opera. What say you?"

When Mr. S. was here some weeks ago and I called upon him, he was full of the performance of Don Juan, in the Berlin opera house a night or two previously. He said to me, he had heard that great opera in London, Paris, America—had never missed an opportunity in his life to hear it—had often heard it with greater Solo singers—but now for the first time it had been presented to him in such a manner, that it was all one magnificent whole, all clear from beginning to end,—that here he had forgotten that the characters were singers, he only saw them as real persons, acting out the passions and emotions of the moment and situation,—no, nothing like this had he ever seen. Now Mozart's immortal work exists from this time henceforth in his memory as one of the great triumphs of human genius—with the Iliad, the Venus de Medicis and the Madonna at Dresden.

I can give but the idea—not his words. It is not every one that can come here and view this opera in the same light. I have long since forgotten to notice when one of our singers, the worse for the wear,—for most of them no longer have young, fresh voices, sings a little out of tune, or hoarsely or not with ease. I notice it no more than I do in a lively conversation in which I am interested, occasional lapses of the tongue in pronunciation or in grammar. Your Boston and New York newspaper critics would give you a weekly letter of a page upon the faults of the prime donne and primi—what's the Italian for man?—i. e. for the first few weeks—then they would begin to visit the opera to hear—opera. They would go to concerts to hear singers. And a new light, a new delight would be theirs. This is one enjoyment here.

BERLIN, Nov. 23, 1858.—Yours is a paper of Art and Literature—I can then propose a literary query in it.

Ordering some books for the Boston Library collection the other day from a Leipzig antiquarian bookseller, I could not resist the temptation to add one for myself, which the catalogue gave as being "Seven parts" of the Latin and Spanish Bible, published by order of the Elector of Saxony, 1574. Looking into the bibliographical works at hand, I could only find that this Bible was printed in ten or twenty parts, in 1570—this edition of 1574 I do not find given at all. Still, as the price was small, and I have a fondness for such things, I ordered these seven parts.

Judge of my pleasure on receiving the seven little fat quartos, some 10 inches by 8, to find the entire Bible and Apocrypha—in short the work complete.

It is a splendid specimen of printing, the Latin and German being in parallel columns. The chapters are numbered—the paragraphs not. Pages not numbered. Published in parts; in the first volume, each of the books of the Pentateuch, having its separate title page, on the back of which is a large wood cut of the then "most serene" Elector of Saxony—so that I have five pictures of him in this volume alone. Printed at Wittenberg, by Krafft, 1574, edited by "Paulus Crellinus, Doctor of the Holy Writings." Adorned—decidedly!—with wood cuts—the Deity pulling Eve out of Adam's side—Jacob dreaming—Pharaoh ditto, &c., &c.

Bound in solid boards—wooden—3-8 of an inch thick, covered with vellum or hogskin—one cover of each volume having a full length picture of Luther impressed in gold, the other, one of Melancthon—some-what tarnished by the lapse of 234 centuries.

Query—is this a vanity?

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

GREETING FROM A WARMER CLIME.

Dear Journal.—Would you believe it possible, that having written thus far, I came to an awful pause! for it does seem very solemn-like to usher one's self into the sanctum of a worthy and learned editor! Usually my aspirations are of a very modest type, but I had a strong desire to offer a "New Year's greeting" and bid you "God-speed"—and tell you honestly how truly I have enjoyed the varied and instructive reading you have, from week to week, gathered up for those who greet your weekly visit.

And then, too, when I tell you how sweet and fresh is the morning air; how deliciously the perfume of violets and other sweet and odorous things comes stealing in at the open window by which I am writing, it surely will open your heart! Many kind and pleasant thoughts come into my soul; born of these gentle outer influences, thoughts which it will hardly do to tell you, lest you should call me prosy, good Journal,—but to some of them you are at least indebted for this "pen-and-ink sketch," dull as it is.

An early morning ramble took me through a lovely grove of oaks, whose swaying branches bore the gentle weight of the "mistletoe's" gracefully interlaced tendrils, the dew-bespangled "pearly berries" gleaming bright and beautiful in the morning sun!—a sudden turn of the path led to the corner of an elaborately laid-out flower-garden, the pride and pet of its charming owner, Miss ——. Through the slight paling came glimpses of the green leaves of crocus and jonquil, with here and there a palmetto, or ruby-budded holly, and such stores of roses, and violets, and clambering honeysuckle, mayhap you never dreamed to see, in this, the dying month of the "dear old year!"

But to my "grief," for now I have come back to my pleasant window,—breakfast is over, and "corn-dodger," and "hoc-cake" have a decided tendency to make one prosy!—

Not many weeks ago, when visiting at Fairbank, I chanced to attend a country church; and listened to a most interesting discourse by the worthy pastor, good Elder —, it was a cheerful theme, well arranged, and delivered with simplicity and earnestness,—my own feelings were in full accord with the heavenly beauty of the subject, and the spirit of the hymn given out at its close, blended sweetly, and harmoniously with the preacher's rendering of the Sacred text:—My whole soul was drawn out in sympathy, and involuntarily there sprang up in my heart, strains of a well-remembered tune learned in "days lang syne," in the dear old New England home, one always used for this hymn, and just adapted to give a spirited rendering of the sweet verses, I expected to hear. But oh the lugubrious sounds that met my ear!—Men, women, and children, all joining the mournful wail, for I can call it nothing less!—all singing the same part, or trying to,—though I think there were the "shattered remains" of at least half a dozen tunes, in as many different metres, aided and abetted, discretionary with the performer, by divers demi-semi-quavers arranged most fantastically, to suit each his own peculiar temperament.

At the sermon's close, a deep silence pervaded the assembly,—by the introduction of this strange "fantasy with variations" it was quickly dispelled, indeed some of the "lesser lords of creation" took to their heels, and seemed to think no apology necessary for this impromptu leaving before the benediction!—

I must confess I fairly shuddered!—there came a sudden revulsion of feeling, and such a keen perception of the ludicrous, that it was with difficulty I could repress a smile!

"These things ought not so to be!"—and this is not an isolated case,—in another church, not far from the Fairbank house of worship, I have in the singing of one hymn, recognized distinctly "Olmütz," "Greenville," "Old Hundred," and "Blue eyed Mary,"—and that Sabbath after Sabbath, with slight variations, and new introductions.

I have thought much, and deeply of this matter, but how can it be remedied?—In the rural districts of these distant states, we cannot avail ourselves of the musical schools, taught by Professors accomplished in their department.—

Will it not be possible to educate young men, who shall go out as itinerant teachers of vocal music? By efficient arrangements with clergymen and teachers, I have no doubt good positions could be secured, where they would be well rewarded, pecuniarily, especially if armed with credentials from the learned Profs of the art.—

I offer the suggestion in all due humility, trusting it may speedily lead to discussions and prompt action.

Farewell, dear Journal, your familiar pages come to me like the voice of a friend, I never weary of them!

A very happy New Year to you, and many of them.

"WAYSIDE."

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 4, 1859. — Allah ackbar! what a glorious revolution in the popular taste! What a cheering transition from the times when people jeered the temerity of any Society's Board of Managers, who dared the production of a classic work, unto these latter days, when thousands fill up the Musical Fund Hall, and, with countenances beaming with interest, sit eagerly expectant for the initial note of the introduction to an Oratorio like the "Messiah." People came in shad-shoals to hear the first attempt of our Handel and Haydn Society at a rendition of Handel's difficult chef d'œuvre; they wedged in between the seats, and stood upon each other's corns in the aisles; and, glory upon glory! they sat through the protracted performance with a rapt attention, and a seeming interest, which afforded ample reason for emotions of pride in the bosom of the connoisseur. On the limited stage, the chorus, numbering nearly 200 voices, and the Germania orchestra, were most judiciously disposed, with the soloists in the centre,—the tenors and sopranos to the right,—the altos and basses to the left,—and the instrumentalists, in a raised position, behind the vocal corps. PHILLIP ROHR, the general Editor of the German Musical Newspaper published in this city, and a musician of no little repute here, led the entire performance, with much ability, evidencing a marked improvement over his former efforts in that capacity, and landing his forces upon the finale chord of the Oratorio in perfect safety. The chorus consisted entirely of amateurs gathered from various avocations of life,—ladies and gentlemen, who have entered on the practical features of their association with a perseverance, enthusiasm, and Art-love, which merit the highest encomiums from all who cherish a love for the advancement of good music in our midst.

No confusion of parts marred these progressions and movements for a moment, but sopranos, altos, tenors, and basses steadily vocalized their individual parts of the score, converging, diverging, and crossing one another's paths without disturbing the laws of musical gravitation, or lapsing into confusion. The solos, too, were very acceptably given, and must have afforded gratification to all who feel a pride in our musical advancement. These efforts of our own brethren and sisters furnish us with the only reliable index to the exact status of musical culture among the American people. Not the ringing plaudits over a finished cavatina upon the Italian style, nor the crowded attendance at a Verdi Opera; these surely do not decide our progress, as a people, in the cultivation of music half so certainly as the amateur attempts of home societies and the individual members of these, in our concert saloons. Upon this occasion the soloists had their faults of omission and commission; but the self-constituted arbiters, who castigated them in the public prints, should have kindly pointed these out, and recommended the way to remedy them in the future.

Mrs. REED, the Soprano, acquitted herself with much credit throughout, evincing a fine appreciation of subject, but at intervals singing somewhat flat,—whether owing to the steaming density of the atmosphere, or an inherent defect, I am not certain. The same may apply to Miss SHAW, Mezzo Soprano, who really possesses an exceedingly serviceable and charming voice, which with its natural flexibility is susceptible of a high degree of future cultivation. Miss McCaffrey, alto, vocalized her part with fascinating simplicity and freedom from restraint. Her rendition of the aria "He was despised and rejected" was characterized with a melancholy pathos, which sensibly affected divers persons in the body of the Hall. Her intonation throughout was very correct and pure; and she has won for herself hosts of appreciative admirers.

The tenor part, entrusted to Mr. G. N. HAZELWOOD, seemed to please every one present, with the exception of the two astute critics, who had heard Sims Reeves vocalize it! Mr. Hazelwood possesses a tenor voice of singular purity and of large compass; in fact I know not an equal to it, off the stage. He has much of style and execution still to acquire; but when I reflect that this gentleman has only commenced to cultivate his noble voice judiciously within the past year or two, my respect for his first public essay with the rigidly classical music of Handel, rises to admiration; because, howbeit there were many minor points which will require time and experience to overcome, there was withal that therein which unmistakeably points to a brilliant future. Mr. AARON TAYLOR, basso, rejoices in a fine rich voice, which he has so enthusiastically dedicated to the Italian school, that the vocalization of this German score, so exactly rigid in time and rhythm, seemed to weary it perceptibly towards the close. His execution was for the most part correct; in the trumpet song he won for himself a large circle of intelligent admirers. His rendition of the bass part throughout clearly betokened that he had studied the same with much diligence and judgment. The orchestra played with varied effect, now accompanying the choruses with much vigor and exactitude, and anon marring the effect of the solos by a blast of superfluous intensity, never intended by Handel. Upon the whole, this performance of the Messiah was a most satisfactory achievement.

Turn out the false critics, who ignorantly throw cold water upon these efforts for individual and public improvement!

BOSTON, JAN. 8, 1859.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Lucrezia Borgia," arranged for the piano-forte.

Last Nights of the Opera.

On Friday evening of last week another novelty to Boston ears was offered in Von Flotow's light and pretty comic opera of "Martha." All were pleased and many were surprised by the peculiar perfection of this most readily enjoyable, although in no sense great work. We wish we could have more such. Next to the real works of genius, the imperishable ones, like Don Giovanni, Le Nozze, Il Barbiere, Tell, Fidelio, &c., we can derive most pleasure from light, genial, natural, unpretending little operas like this; in which there is a happy flow of spirits, rendered in an easy, genial flow of music, with a pleasant mingling of characters and incidents. We must confess we have been agreeably disappointed in this opera, after the impression for years past derived in concerts from the overture (popular among lovers of "light" music), with its jingling dance rhythms and its feebly sentimental horn melody. This very melody when sung in its right place, and worked up into a finale, proved at least effective.

The plot is pretty and simple, laid in England in Queen's Anne's time. The Lady Henrietta (Mme. LABORDE), sick of gay court life and persecuting lovers, especially her tedious old John Bull of a cousin, Sir Tristram (MUELLER), hears the merry chorus of servant girls who pass her window on their way to the Richmond fair to seek employment, and conceives the mad idea of donning peasants' garb, herself, her lively maid Nancy (Mme. BERKEL), and Sir Tristram, and offering themselves for service at the fair, she assuming the name of Martha. There they attract the attention of Plunkett, a hearty, bluff old farmer, (FORMES), and his friend and protégé, Lionel, (BRIGNOLI), who engage the handsome maids, they assenting at first in joke, but finding by the laws of the fair, expounded with comical gravity by the sheriff (an imitation of the never-failing notary of Italian bullo operas), that they are caught in earnest. They must go home with the two farmers; and the experiences of the first evening, prolonged to midnight, the mingling of joke and bitter strange reality, the puzzle of the farmers at their intractable servants, are the tragico-comical material of the second act. The birds escape at midnight, but a silen chain still binds them to their strange masters. Lionel of course turns out to be a nobleman, and loves and is beloved by the Lady; and little Nancy and bluff Plunkett strike up also a life bargain on their own account, and the whole ends in a brace of happy unions, after a quantum suf. of the usual crosses of true love.

Here, certainly, was nice material for the French Opera Comique kind of talent of such a musical ready-writer as Flotow, who, though German born (see sketch of him in another column,) seems by musical second nature to be three parts French to two parts Italian and one part German — the German ingredient, however, appears larger when you look particularly at the orchestral treatment. Martha passes for his best work; his later operas are pronounced insipid. Martha, to say the least, abounds in healthy music; that is, the general current of the piece is healthy, unaffected, pleasant; but it also has a large sprinkling of those little pathetic melodies, sentimental sweetmeats, which are so tempting to the general public, so fatal to the freshness of a work for any length of time with those who care for genius and real Art. For sure effect, for popular success, this author shows a fine tact in mingling these two elements. To the cultivated ear the chief charm of Martha lies in its general felicity of treatment, in its smooth, sparkling, natural flow of average melody, now individual, and now running almost unconsciously into pleasing trios and quartets, and all relieved and freshened by the prettiest orchestral figures, for which his brain seems never at a loss in the right place. (Something like this one says, too, about such works as Mozart's Figaro, but let us not for an instant confound the lesser with the greater — Jules Janin is no Shakspeare.) This quality is most observable in the first two acts; the stream gives out perceptibly in the third and fourth, and the attention is piqued, instead, by a succession of detached taking bits, palpable encore pieces, "gems" so called, such as the rollicking "Porter" or Beer song, which rings out with such unction and eclat in the rich, big voice of Formes (how hearty that hoor-ah, as he resumes the strain!); the hunting song of Miss Diana Nancy; the really very sweet and tender aria of the tenor: M'appari tutt' amor; the finale of the third act, which is chiefly a tenor solo on that sentimental horn theme in the overture, with accompaniment and responses of principals and chorus, worked up to an imposing climax for at least a fresh and general audience; and above all, the oft-returning borrowed Irish melody, "The Groves of Blarney," which Moore wedded to his "Last Rose of Summer," — a happy thought for English audiences — and which Flotow works up at last into the somewhat elaborate ensemble finale of his opera, although we, instead of that, were treated to an interpolated piece of Mme. Laborde's brilliant bravura vocalizing; — a poor fashion — false, too, since it sacrifices the opera as an artistic whole to the private display of the singer.

For these reasons, and because it was so well cast, and so admirably within the scope of Mr. Ullman's company, Martha was a complete success. It was certainly a charming entertainment; but many of course were ready to go further, and incontinently call it the best opera we have had! The quartet of principals was capital, save that the two soprani were somewhat overshadowed by the greater power of bass and tenor. Yet the clear, sweet higher tones of LABORDE told exquisitely in those nice quartets. The part of Martha is well suited to her vocally, and few other singers could go through its florid difficulties. She acted lady-like as Henrietta, prettily as Martha, but somewhat tamely. Her singing of the "Last Rose" was beautiful, of course; nor could any of her music have met with finer and more tasteful execution. Mme. BERKEL was in truth a charming little Miss Nancy; full of playful grace and naiveté, with a sure instinct as an actress, with but a thin voice and imperfect method (and the music of the part, really contralto, runs too low for her), but so right in all her artistic intentions and so abounding in little felicities that we could better spare a better singer. How prettily she sang in the opening duet, where she sets her merry wits to work to cheer her lady — a piece containing a remote suggestion, but in a very small way, of the duet of the sad and the merry maiden in the Freyschutz; and how cunningly the courting scene in the last act with Formes!

BRIGNOLI sang the music as if he loved it; never before with such good voice and will united. Nearly all his solos had to be repeated, especially the Quintet finale, which all turns on him, as much as Verdi's Carlo magno chorus on the baritone, and which there was much ado, and fine fun unexpected, to get repeated after the curtain had fallen, Mmc. Laborde beckoning earnestly to the side scenes, and Formes rushing out to drum the chorus people one by one back from their dressing rooms. Our tenor friend, too, made a poor foot at his wheel in the Spinning Quartet, while that of Formes flew, as all wheels fly before his ready "gumption;" all this enhanced the pleasant humor of the play, while too much laughter perhaps drowned one of the prettiest bits of music in it. FORMES was as individual and perfect in the hearty farmer, as in all his rôles. He was in good voice, too, and sang almost uniformly in tune. We have heard nothing richer and warmer than his higher baritone notes; his basso profundo doubtless lacks the sensuous richness of a Lablache. His Plunkett was in singing and in action, a most satisfactory artistic whole. Herr MUELLER, always acceptable, was a worthy representative of Tristram.

The ensembles all went smoothly. Choruses, male and female, orchestra, and even ballet (just competent for these country fair dances), worked well together. The finest vein of comic music in the work is perhaps the entire finale of the first act, the Richmond Fair scene, including the solemn proclamation of the sheriff; the lively answers of the servant girls, one by one, in quaint musical phrase, rising a note in pitch as each one's turn comes, reciting their domestic accomplishments; their several engagements by the farmers; the entrance of Martha and party, and the nice little quartet where they attract the attention of Lionel and Plunkett, &c., &c.,—all as fluent and sparkling as one could wish, although without many striking or original musical ideas. The quartet, Mezza notte, where the clock strikes twelve in the second act, too, is a charming piece of music.

The only regret about this very pleasant performance of Martha, was that it had not everybody there to hear it.

The Saturday afternoon performance of Don Giovanni was a great improvement on the first. We could almost say that, on the whole, that was the best performance we have had of this great work. Mme. GHIONI was this time in tune, and so made more than any of her predecessors of the part of Donna Elvira. The noble recitative and aria, Mi tradi, at the end of her first scene, was an invaluable addition; it served, too, to redeem somewhat the dignity of the character, considerably compromised by the way in which she had been lending attention to the "Catalogue song" of Leporello. It is a difficult and splendid piece, and she sang it quite effectively. Mlle. POINSON was in better voice for Donna Anna, and her dramatic, searching tones told well in the first scene. The great air: Or sai, was sung grandly; but why does she omit the recitative narration? Nor should Non mi dir have been omitted in a performance of such great promise. The Trio in masks was much better than before, yet far from perfect. Sig. LORINI does not gain upon us; he was often flat, always lifeless, as Ottavio. That Trio always needs to be encored to go well; it requires the voices to get attuned and sympathetically warmed together by one trial first.

Charming little Zerlina—PICCOLOMINI's Zerlina—the funny, all alive, coquettish little peasant, so perfect in its way, almost converted us for the time being. But no—that cannot be the true Zerlina—the Zerlina of Mozart's music—the Zerlina with a soul of sweet sincerity in her, with a spark of finer nature lodged in rustic clay! To make this clearer we have reprinted to-day from an old number a portion of Oulibicheff's remarks upon this character. Read them with the music in your mind, and judge.

Sig. FLORENZA gained upon us in his impersonation of the Don, who has been well called a being almost impossible to represent with much ideal truth upon the stage. The last scene was made very imposing by the three noble basses. The statue really sang in marble tones; and Leporello, there as everywhere throughout the piece, completely justified Herr FORMES's theory of the part. Never on the stage have we heard Formes sing so uniformly well, as on that afternoon. His opening song: Notte e giorno, and his "Catalogue Song" were given with a real unction; the tones were rich and comforting.—In the ball scene, this time, we could just catch a few thin sounds from one of the side orchestras on the stage; but as the main orchestra, trusting to them, did not attempt to convey the three dance tempi, they were virtually lost. We have rarely felt in happier sympathy with a whole audience than that afternoon.

On Monday evening, for want of due time for rehearsal of the "Bohemian Girl," or La Zingara, (no great loss), a mixed programme was substituted, consisting of the first act of Norma, with LABORDE; La Figlia del Reggimento, with PICCOLOMINI and FORMES, as before; and the last act of Sonnambula, with Laborde. It was little Pic's benefit, who went off, of course, laden with flowers, and with the cheers of an immense audience.

Tuesday evening was the farewell of Mr. Ullman's Company. In spite of the great storm, there was a large and brilliant assembly, eager to witness the repetition of Martha, and in no sense disappointed. Thus ended a successful season of twenty-one performances in hardly more than three weeks, during which were sung fourteen different operas, five of which were really new to a Boston audience. But we must take another opportunity for summing up.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Opera with its fever season having passed, the Concert business recovers its suspended animation. First in order comes a novelty, this evening, at the Boston Theatre: the first production, namely, of Mr. ROBERT STÖPEL's elaborate, and we have reason to believe highly interesting music—"Romantic Symphony" he calls it—to LONGFELLOW's "Hiawatha." From the little that we had the privilege of hearing of the orchestral rehearsal, without voices, we are prepared to expect a musical pleasure. The work includes songs and choruses, as well as descriptive orchestral interludes. The whole connected by readings from the poem by that admirable dramatic artist, Mrs. MATILDA HERON STÖPEL. Besides this there will be the attraction of Mrs. HARWOOD's soprano, Mr. MILLARD's tenor, and Mr. WETHERBEE's bass; a chorus from the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, and an Orchestra of fifty, conducted by the composer in person.

But the real musical season of Boston can hardly be said to have begun, until we have had the first classical Orchestral Concert; our readers will rejoice to see to-day that Mr. CARL ZERRAHN is at last able to make definite announcement of his first "Grand Philharmonic Concert." It will take place next Saturday evening, (Jan. 15th.) in the Boston Music Hall. His orchestra will embrace fifty good performers, and he pledges himself to give the very best that can be had, and make the concerts excel any of past years. The Symphony, for the opening, will be Beethoven's Pastorale, which we did not hear at all last winter. This to be followed by the pleasant Allegretto from the same master's No. 8; the overtures to Freyschutz, Huguenots, and Martha, and vocal contributions by the American prima donna, Miss JULIANA MAY, whose fame has reached us from all quarters, but whom we have never heard. Miss May is a native of Washington city; she pursued a severe course of study in Naples and Florence, afterwards in Paris; has had Bordogni and Romani and Duprez for her teachers (so we read,) as well as the encouraging counsels of Rossini, all of whom, as well as Meyerbeer, Balfe, and others have expressed great faith in her powers.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUN give their third Chamber Concert next Friday evening, in Mercantile Hall, entrance on Summer Street, and not as before announced, on Hawley Street. They will be assisted by a young pianist of this city, Miss FAY, (her first appearance,) who will play Beethoven's great B flat Trio, and by Mr. DRAPER, an American singer, who has acquired distinction in London. A Quintet by Gade, and a Quartet by Mendelssohn are in the programme.

The article from the Courier, signed "Boston," which we copy this week, expresses exactly what we think to be the right view of the "Civis" criticism on the late performance of the "Huguenots," and what we attempted, with less success, in crowded space, to express when we transferred it to our columns last week. The very stir that criticism makes is reason all the more for copying it; such criticism should be common.... Members of the "Harvard Musical Association" will see by a notice in our advertising columns, that for them there is "a good time coming."... Mr. ULMAN has undertaken, in connection with the present lessee, Mr. BARRY, the management of the Boston Theatre for the year commencing with next June. He will keep it open seven months in the year, under the name "Boston Academy of Music," for operas, concerts, and dramatic entertainments, and the effect will doubtless be to give us much more opera than we have had. Let him now get possession in the same way of the Philadelphia Academy, for the only solid basis for opera among us lies in the union of the three noble Theatres of the three cities.... Mr. S. Masury, the Photographer, sends us a speaking portrait of our "Diarist," Berlin correspondent, "Mr. Brown," or what not—that is to say, A. W. THAYER, photographed from the fine crayon drawing by Barry. Hosts of our readers will want to know "Brown" face to face, and Masury will be happy to supply them with a copy, at his rooms, No. 289 Washington street.... Martha stock is "up" just now. Messrs. DITSON & Co., have published most of the favorite songs, duets, quartets, &c., which they find in great demand.

The great snow storm has kept back the mails until our correspondence comes upon us all in a heap from all quarters, and too late for use in this week's paper. Two letters from New York will have place in our next.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—M. Jullien's Mendelssohn Nights and Beethoven Nights have been given as usual,—Miss Arabella Goddard has appeared at the Lyceum more than once as pianist,—and this week Madame Evelina Garcia has been heard there as the singer.

The Amateur Society began its concerts on Monday last. These, we observe, are to be fewer in number than they have been of late years, and during the earlier part of the season are to benefit by two rehearsals in place of a single one. New members, too, are to be more strictly examined before admission than was formerly the case. The above are both provisions tending to good; but with the best that can be done we do not anticipate that English instrumental amateurs will ever pass beyond a certain point, or arrive at that completeness when criticism, ceasing to be indulgent, begins to compare. The Lady known as Angelina is one of the exceptions to this rule,—a pianist who could be heard with pleasure in any concert-room. On Monday she played the steady Allergro which it has been Dr. Bennett's caprice to call "a caprice," and two Notturmi, or Lieder, of her own—the second one, "A Village Fête," particularly graceful. Miss Kemble sang for the first time this season, in some points with improvement on her last season's singing.

Of the first concert given by Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, on Thursday last, we must speak in some detail,—not, however, concerning the general execution, which was good, neither of the picturesque elegance of Mr. Macfarren's setting of "Orpheus and his lute" as a part-song (not devoid of crudity),—nor about the new manuscript duet for two pianofortes, by Mr. C. E. Stephens; having to treat matter at once more troublesome and interesting: an eight-part vocal motet, by Sebastian Bach. Every one knows how when Mozart was at Leipsic, he devoured the series of works of which this forms one, with eager delight: declaring "that from them there was something to be learned,"—a golden saying, to which every musician will subscribe. For vigor in their leading phrases (consistent with variety of ideas), for a display of constructive power never at fault, be the texture ever so intricate, be the scale ever so large, Bach's motets may be called incomparable. But one indispensable element of music is imperfectly developed in them. They have more form than feeling. To Bach every material seems to have been alike—he appears to have considered a composition to bear words, subject to the same laws as one for the keyboards of an organ. It may have happened that, because his musical activity radiated from that instrument (of all instruments the least expressive, because the least modified by the personalities of its master), his vocal music is so generally soulless. But it may be predicated that if Mozart found something to learn in these motets,—had he written aught in their form, he would have added that "something more" of vocal charm and propriety which they lack. There was no incapacity to arrive at this in Bach. The stupendous "Crucifixus" from his B minor mass, in which are the night-in-day, and the agony of Calvary,—if music ever be allowed to hear or to reflect meaning—is an example that the defect, was a habit, not a necessity—with him. The motet selected by Mr. H. Leslie, on the impracticable text, is led off by a florid passage of exultation andante con moto so cheerful, as only to be brought into any relation with the words, by a "canting" proceeding (as the heralds have it.) This we do not dream that Bach was hyper-subtle enough to contemplate: we are certain, however, that no power exists of impressing it on a chorus, so as to make the singers expressive. Call it, then, (for something like this is the conclusion inevitably arrived at) a solfeggio in eight real parts:—the motet then falls into its place among "studies" from which much may be learned. Those who are not too deeply offended with this tone of remark to pursue the subject further, are invited for themselves to consider the "Allegro non tanto," the fugue alla breve, and the Corale with its final "Hallelujah" which succeed to this movement,—with reference to the interest attaching itself to a setting of words;—and to weigh our objection that there is no tough controversial passage in the Epistles, which could not be just as wisely selected, and as pertinently treated. The "something to be learned" implies, further, "what to avoid" in another direction. There is no overlooking the existence in the vocal music of Sebastian Bach of difficulties for the voice, which are not masterly so much as unmusical. To demand every executant to do what some exceptional one may arrive at, is at once a despotism and a weakness. Every horse is not a Flying Childers. The music which distances the average physical means of its interpreters (these totally distinct from their intellectual aspiration), is music of an inferior order. The execution, unless accomplished by a party who had been hammering away at nothing smaller (or greater) for years—could not be complete; and was not on this occasion. But we understand that Mr. Leslie intends to amend it by rehearsal, and to repeat the Anthem: and all lovers of enlargement in musical appreciation, owe him thanks.

The Sacred Harmonic Society inaugurated its season, as promised, with "The Creation." In this oratorio Mr. George Perren had suddenly to take the place of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was disabled by November. A comment on the present plight of the English soprano world, lately commented on, is to be found in its provision for the Christmas performance of "The Messiah." For this the committee has engaged Mrs. Sunderland. Signor Belletti, who apparently contemplates a winter concert season in England, is the basso engaged. The choral rehearsals have begun with the choruses of Handel's "Belshazzar."

The Vocal Association is determined to be up and doing this season: and announces among other works which will be performed, an Ave Maria, for soprano solo and chorus, one of the three (?) pieces finished by Mendelssohn for "Lorely," the well-known finale being another (we believe there is, also, a March)—some new compositions by Herr Otto Goldschmidt: and Dr. Bennett's Pastoral "The May Queen,"—a work, it may be added, coming into large request.

To-day, in commemoration of Mozart's death, the concert at Sydenham is to consist of Mozart's music,—with Herr Pauer as the pianist, and Mrs. and Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Perren as the singers.

Paris.

When, a few weeks ago, in running through the list of opera promises and possibilities for the winter, we alighted at Paris—it should perhaps have been said that M. Gounod's new "Faust" is ready to appear at the Théâtre Lyrique, so soon as the attraction of Mozart's "Le Nozze" wanes out. Of this, however, there are no present signs. So far from it, the seventy-fourth representation of "Le Nozze" there was tempting enough to evoke a pleasure railway-train from Angers—a town (by express, nine hours distant from Paris), on behalf of whose occupants a large portion of the seats in the theatre were engaged. The "Society of Dramatic Authors," we see, has been discussing the justice or injustice of having paid "authors' rights" from those performances to the son of Mozart, now beyond their reach, but whose last days were brightened by the liberality of the French. He has left all his portraits, family relics, and the sum of 7,000 florins to the Mozartum at Salzburg; by which institution the "Requiem" was performed in the Cathedral there on the occasion of his death.

The dragging system of protecting a people against its own weakness bears oddly in France on dramatic representations. We observe of late more than one instance of managers, conductors and artists being called before the police tribunals, and fined for destroying the integrity of the work confided to them by omitting a portion of it. Fancy Signor Costa being called up in Bow Street for the cuts in "Gli Ugonotti"! Fancy Mr. Sims Reeves arraigned by the representatives of Handel, or Dr. Crysander, his biographer, because of his perverse determination to deny the Handelian closes their indispensable shake! But of the curious reports and rumors in the French journals there seems to be no end. This week's Gazette Musicale contains a mysterious half-promise of a concert to be given for a charitable purpose in the Palais d'Industrie; at which Madame Lind-Goldschmidt is to sing in an unpublished quartet of Weber's, together with Madame Vigier (formerly Mlle. Cruvelli), Madame Frezzolini, and Mlle. Artot.

The Italian Opera in Paris can hardly be flourishing; since as additional soprano it has been found necessary to engage Madame Frezzolini, a lady whose voice was next to extinct before she went to America. Signor Badiali, too, is engaged to sing in "Don Giovanni." Signor Verdi's "Macbeth" is given up for the present.

DEC. 11. The performances of M. Rémusat's French company are announced as about to commence, on the 29th, at the St. James's Theatre. The singers announced are, Madame Faure, Mlle. Céline Mathieu, MM. Fougère and Emon.

We repair an omission by stating that the solitary scholar, for whose education the Mendelssohn Fund collected in England was sufficient to provide, has been transferred from our Royal Academy of Music to the Conservatory at Leipsic: a wise measure, as the respective Academies stand. Some movement is now going on, with the purpose of raising a monument to the last of the German composers, in London as well as in Berlin.

Since "Belshazzar" has not been performed for many years past in London, and since on its last performance many of the great effects of the oratorio could only be guessed at,—so poor was the execution,—we avail ourselves of its having been put into choral rehearsal by the Sacred Harmonic Society, to offer a note or two on some of its choruses. These struck us doubly as coming in immediate contrast with the dry and clever science of Sebastian Bach, to which we had been listening a few hours before. Most frequenters of Ancient Concerts know the pompous-chorus, "Sing, O ye heavens; some may recollect, too, the descriptive opening, "Behold, by Persia's hero made,"—in which Handel has seized the situation, marched, like a giant, over the grotesque of the words, and contrived an introduction, grand, dramatic, yet always in clear musical form. But the more didactic chorus, "By slow degrees the wrath of God," is less known, massive, fine—and, grave though it be, never dull.—The brilliant enterprise of the opening of the chorus, "See from his post Euphrates flies," on a florid phrase of great difficulty, is noticeable; but the second movement in six parts falls off.—Even Handel's self could make nothing of such words as,—

Of things on earth, proud man must own Falsehood is found in man alone,— of closing the description of so momentous a catastrophe! The hearer must recognize the Pagan joviality of the revel chorus, "Ye tutel gods,"—in its effective use of unisons recalling "Great Dagon" in "Samson."—The scene of the "Writing on the wall" only merits attention as an exception which proves a rule. It has been justly said, that Handel was always equal to the situation: rising the highest when he had to describe such portents as the drying up of the Red Sea, or the fall of Jericho's ramparts. In this case, the terror is weak to excess; nor can the weakness be altogether imputed to the absurdity of the words, since "the Giant" himself professed to admire them mightily.—On such tone and contrast as the songs of "Belshazzar" display, we may dwell when the Oratorio is performed entire.—A rehearsal is no subject for criticism; but we may express hearty pleasure in the noble sound produced by the voices assembled—some fifteen hundred,—and the readiness with which so large a mass of singers fell into shape.—Nothing of the kind, we dare aver, is to be heard out of England at the time present.

Madame Barbot, the wife of the clever tenor singer, has adventured at the Grand Opéra in "Les Huguenots" with some success. Every lady, it may be added, apparently succeeds, but few stay there;—and those who do are of small use.

GERMANY. Among other scraps of German news we find that "La Reine Topaze" and "Fanchonnette" have been produced at Vienna,—that "Diane de Solange," the new opera by H. R. H. the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, is in rehearsal,—and that a new Mass, by that indefatigable composer Herr Ferdinand Hiller, has just been produced at Cologne.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

LIONEL, AH! UNHAPPY. (Povero Lionello, from "Martha," by Flotow. 25

This is a charming Cavatina for a baritone voice, which has only lately been added by the composer to Plunkett's otherwise meagre part. It is easy of execution, and one of the choicest hits in this remarkably melodious opera.

THE YOUNG MAY-MOON. (From Moore's Irish Melodies.) As sung by Mlle. Piccolomini. 25

Those who were so fortunate as to hear the charming little prima donna in the only concert of the Ullman Troupe during their stay in Boston, will recall with much pleasure her delicate warbling of this little, simple, yet beautiful air.

SHE WHO SLEEPS UPON MY HEART. T. H. Hinton. 25
A love-song, graceful and melodious.

THE HANDSOME LOVER. Comic Song in the drama of "Veronique." W. J. Wetmore. 25

WHIPPOORWILL. " 26
Simple songs for young singers.

DO YOU REALLY THINK HE DID? F. Woolcott. 25
In the popular author's happiest vein.

I'M A LAUGHING ZINGARELLA. (Gipsy's Song.) Abelli. 25

A spirited air in six-eighth time to a quaintly harmonized accompaniment, altogether original and pleasing.

MOSCHELES' STUDIES, for the further perfecting of advanced pianists, consisting of 24 characteristic pieces in the different major and minor keys, with fingering and explanatory remarks upon the object of each and the proper manner of performing it. Op. 70. First Book.

Ignace Moscheles. 2.50

These Studies of the celebrated teacher of the piano forte are as indispensable to the student who has mastered most of the difficulties of this instrument, as the five-finger exercises were to him at the outset. They are not so much intended for the mechanical development of the fingers or the hand, as for the advancement of a correct taste, and a proper and well marked delivery of each piece, according to its individual character. These studies of Moscheles have nothing in common with those collections of all sorts of difficulties, which modern virtuosi are in the habit of throwing off under the name of "Studies." They were the result of long years' experience, and full well justified, if not enhanced, the then already European reputation of their author. They have since been introduced into all the Conservatories of music in Germany and stand yet (unrivalled by any later attempt) at the very head of their kind.

MODEL SCHOOL FOR THE PIANOFORTE. Being an easy and progressive method of instruction, comprised in a series of about two hundred pleasing Examples and Exercises, including favorite Songs, Polkas, Waltzes, Marches, &c. 1.00

The elementary portion of this work is well designed for the great mass of learners; the Examples and Exercises are progressively arranged from the simple to the difficult, and the Songs, Waltzes, Polkas, &c., comprise the most popular pieces of the day; the music alone, would cost, in sheet form, five times the price charged for the whole volume.

Musical Criticism.—"The Huguenots."—Nationalities in Music. &c.

NEW YORK, JAN. 3, 1859.

Editor of Dwight's Journal of Music:

Sir,—It is so delightful to meet with so excellent a piece of criticism as that signed "Civis," published in last week's Journal, that I cannot refrain from indulging in the expression of the pleasure it has given sundry of your most constant readers in New York. Perhaps most persons judge of the excellence of criticism by its coincidence with their own views, and certainly the article in question most faithfully represents many of the sentiments of your present correspondent while listening to the "Huguenots," as recently given in this city. Some, perchance, might feel inclined to award a larger share of praise to Laborde, and even rather less to Poinsof and Formes. Others, too, might differ with "Civis" regarding the libretto. George Sand's observation that "she did not care to go to the theatre to see Catholics and Protestants cut each other's throats, while a Jew made the music," contains not only wit but a fine sense of the true aim of public amusements. "The Huguenots" is as much a piece of diablerie as "Robert," and really seems intended as a burlesque upon Christianity in general. As brought out in New York, instead of producing the idea of the horror of warring Christians, it merely excited the risible faculties of many among the audience. This effect may be attributed to the manner of its production, but I am inclined to think there is a radical defect, not only in the subject, but also in the dramatic treatment of it. There are those, too, and they not among least learned and competent judges, who are of opinion that Meyerbeer's musical effects are rather addressed to the senses than to the heart and mind.

The sublime and the ridiculous lie so near together that even a man of most sensitive and discriminating intellect would find difficulty in presenting such a terribly cold-blooded tragedy as the Massacre of St. Bartholomew upon the operatic stage, without showing how inadequate the scenic means are to the representation of the ideas probably intended to be suggested. One versed in the heart of woman cannot help feeling shocked at the eagerness with which the widow of the gallant, high-minded Nevers rushes into second bonds; and we are also not informed of the source whence Marcel derives his right to the performance of marriage ceremonies; as far as the story tells us, he was not even a justice of the peace.

However, I will not weary you with individual views upon a subject open to much discussion, but will gladly embrace this opportunity of congratulating you upon your success in having established a really independent and most excellent journal of Art. Nothing but entire sincerity of purpose, and true love for music, could have sustained you through the many impediments you must have encountered in the beginning; and I trust the circulation of your valuable paper is sufficiently wide to reward you for the labor you have expended upon it, as also for the wear and tear of brain and nerves that must attend the public contact of every delicately organized mind with a half-taught and unartistic world. Our people are not naturally very musical, but they have ear sufficient, and heart and mind enough to learn: the two latter qualities, however, predominating, their appreciation of what is great and good in the most ethereal of the arts must first be educated through the literature of that art; and, by its diffusion, you are nobly aiding in the good cause. Sensitiveness to lofty and hidden meanings, love of truth and hatred of humbug and affectation, are what you have ever striven to inculcate, and all true lovers of music and of our own broad land must bid you "God speed."

We, in America, with the blood of so many races coursing through our veins, stand upon high ground, whence we can impartially survey many nationalities, and select for our own edification and entertainment whatever we may judge to be intrinsically best. Nevertheless, there is danger lest fashion or exclusive cliques in our principal cities should succeed in introducing certain styles of music to the exclusion of other kinds equally good. What can be more absurd than parties for or against Italian or German music? Genius is universal, and although, of course, colored by nationality and individual character, must, when genuinely creative, appeal to civilized man in every clime. While we enjoy the delicious, long-phrased, flowing melodies of the Italian, and the more ponderous and intellectual harmonies of the German, let us not forget that there have been Italians equally intellectual and harmonic, and that, while a mere dilettante like myself would not dare to touch with praise or blame the great names of Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, the more modern Germans are too often profoundly obscure or insipidly flat. We must also remember that all music is not either German or Italian, but that there are other nationalities, whose primitive melodies, springing from the very heart of the people, are among the most beautiful ever created. Why have our pretty singing birds almost abandoned the beautiful airs of the Celtic race, the ballads of Scotland and Ireland, to devote themselves to apparently more difficult flights of song? Can it be that the love of ostentation and brilliant display, which has taken possession of our dwellings, has also invaded the still youthful realm of American Art? Or is it because it requires less real cultivation and command of the vocal organs to sing showily a few roudades, than to produce the long sustained notes, the light and shade of execution, and the clear articulation of words required by the ballad?

There is also the great Slavonic element in music, which has too long been overlooked, an element combining flowing melody with the most learned and profound harmonies, and adding thereto the simplicity, vigor, passion, and dramatic force of a race but recently aroused to a consciousness of the great part it may be called upon to play in the world's future. On the other side of the ocean, the political preponderance of the German in Slavonic countries has caused their beautiful and characteristic people's songs, as well as the great elaborated works of the race, to be ignored; but such surely need not be the case on this side the Atlantic, and it is the mission of independent journals, such as yours, to spread among the people the knowledge of all that is really good, let it come from where it may. Chopin and Tomaschek surely deserve to be as widely known, as highly esteemed, and as dearly loved as any other among the great musical names that have caught the world's ear; the first, as the "subtlest-souled psychologist," and the deepest and tenderest tone-picturer of modern days; and the last, as a giant, second only to Beethoven in all that rendered Beethoven truly great, and surpassing him in profound science, ever correct taste, and a matchless comprehension and mastery of form.*

With many apologies for this lengthy intrusion, and sincere wishes for a prosperous and happy New Year, I remain, Truly yours, L. D. P.

*This is indeed news to us! Pray, Mr. Zerrahn, Quintette Club, or somebody, give us a chance to hear a thing or two by Tomaschek. As to Chopin, of course, amen!—Ed.

John Field.

(From the Echo.)

"If we allow ourselves to be thoroughly imbued with the touching softness which is manifest in his compositions, just as it swayed his playing, we cannot avoid feeling perfectly convinced how useless it would be to attempt to copy him, or to abandon ourselves to the hope that we might successfully imitate his tender originality, which is characterized quite as much by the utmost simplicity of feeling as by the greatest diversity of form and ornament. If there is anything, the mystery of which we shall in vain strive to pierce, supposing nature has not given it as a distinguishing mark of our own disposition, it is the grace of simplicity and the charm of ingenuousness. We may possess these qualities naturally, but we can never acquire them. Field was naturally endowed with them, and, consequently, his compositions will always possess a charm, over which time has no power; his forms will never grow old, for they correspond exactly with his feelings, which do not belong to the domain of what is transient and rapidly fleeting, and which arises from the influence to which we are most immediately exposed, but to those pure emotions of the mind which possess an eternal charm for the human heart, because the latter always finds them unchanged with regard to the beauties of nature, and those tender sentiments which steal over it, in the spring of life, when the brilliant prism of the world of feeling is not yet clouded by the shadows of reflection. We must not, therefore, think of forming ourselves on so wonderful a model, for, without especial natural aptitude, we cannot achieve such effects, which can be attained only when they are not sought. It would be in vain for us to attempt subjecting the charm of their capriciousness to analysis. That capriciousness springs entirely from a mind like Field's.

"For Field the invention of what was new was a relief from what existed, and variety and diversity of form were a necessity, as is usually the case with all who are overflowing with any particular feeling. But, despite this elegance and capricious changeableness, his talent was free from all affectation; on the contrary, his fancy was distinguished for primitive simplicity, which takes a pleasure in finding an endless number of modes of representing the simple and happy harmony of a sentiment with which the heart is filled.

"What we now say, is intended to apply to the composer as well as the virtuoso. When he was writing, just as when he was playing, Field's sole aim was to obtain a clear insight into his own feelings, and it is impossible to fancy a more child-like indifference than his toward the public.

"When he went to Paris, he contented himself, in his concerts, with a table-formed instrument, the effect of which was necessarily far inferior to that which could have been produced by another more suited to the places in which attentive audiences assembled, and whom he charmed without intending or knowing it. The almost complete immovability of his hands, and his inexpressive look awoke no curiosity. His eye was not fixed on that of any one else, and his playing proceeded with clearness and fluency. His hands glided over the keys, while the notes grew up beneath them like a long track of pearly foam. It required no effort to discover that he had not so much at heart the satisfaction of any of his auditors as his own. His calmness bordered on apathy, and nothing could trouble him less than the impression he might produce on his audience. Neither in his bearing or the rhythm of his playing was there anything hard or jarring, to break the thread of his melodious dreaming, that spread around him a certain something full of precious fascination, which, by means of his melodies, and in a low voice, caressingly lisped a confession of the sweetest impressions and most charming surprises of the heart.

"Far from ever leaving him, this cool sedateness appeared, on the contrary, to obtain a greater and greater mastery over him the older he grew. Every noise, every movement became completely repulsive to him; he was fond of silence, and when he spoke he did so softly and slowly. Everything boisterous and noisy was opposed to his nature, and avoided by him. His playing, which was so tasteful and admirable, assumed the character of a morbidezza, the languor of which appeared to grow more striking every day.

"In order to avoid the least unnecessary motion, he invented for the practice, to which he daily devoted several hours to the end of his life, a plan that, unfortunately, seems to have fallen too much into oblivion at the present day. This plan consists in the player's placing a broad gold coin on the surface of the hand, and, in order to prevent it from falling, avoiding all violent movement when playing. This trait affords an excellent estimate of the calmness of his playing and his character. During the later years of his life, a feeling of complete indifference obtained possession of him, and ruled all his corporeal habits to such an extent, that even standing up or walking became a trouble to him. The light weight of a walking-stick was too much for the strength of his hand, unused to all kinds of exertion, and, if he let it fall while he was out, he remained, far want of the amount of energy necessary to pick it up himself, standing near it, and waited quietly until some one happened to pass that way and picked it up for him.

"Nearly the same was true of his reputation, about which he did not trouble himself in the least. He cared little about being known far and wide, and praised and celebrated by those who gave the tone to public opinion. For him, Art possessed no gratification save that which he found in giving himself up to it. He never troubled his head as to what place would be assigned him, what kind of name would follow him, what success his works would achieve, or how long they would last. He sang for himself; his own pleasure was the only gratification he required from his art. If he wrote anything, he did so in a kind of abstraction. Many of his works, unfortunately not very numerous, especially his Concertos, contain passages full of originality, astonishing novelty of invention, and indisputable harmonic beauty; when, however, we study them, and imbue ourselves more thoroughly with their contents, we are tempted to believe that, when writing, just as when playing, he consulted merely his own fancy, creating without effort, inventing without exertion, elaborating with ease, and publishing without any ulterior views. How is everything changed now-a-days! But it is precisely to this absence of consideration of the effect that we are indebted for the first (so perfect) attempts to free pianoforte composition from the constraint imposed on it by the normal form, over which all pieces had to be regularly and faithfully stretched, and to endow it with the expression of feeling and a world of dreamy forms. Before his time, a composition was necessarily a Sonata, a Rondo, or something of that kind. Field was the first to introduce a class of composition which took its origin from none of the existing forms, and in which feeling and song held sole sway, free from the fetters and shackles of a form forcibly imposed on it. He paved the way for all subsequent productions, which appeared under the name of "Songs without words," "Impromptus," "Ballads, &c., and we may trace back to him the origin of those pieces intended to find utterance in notes for particular emotions and intense feeling. It was he who discovered this new field of action, so favorable to the development of natural qualities, distinguished more for tenderness than for lyrical dash.

"The name 'Nocturne' is well adapted to those pieces which Field took it into his head to designate so, for it immediately carries our thoughts from the present, to those hours when the soul, having escaped all the cares of day, and sunk back in itself, soars upwards to the regions of the starry firmament, where we see it, merry and beplanned, like the Philomel of the ancients, floating about over the flowers and perfumes of nature, whose lover it is.

"The charm, which constantly attracts back again to these pure and simple effusions such persons as still retain some of their youthful impulses, is all the more irresistible now-a-days, the more we experience the necessity of recovering from the forced and far-fetched outbreaks of more violent and confused passions, peculiar to a considerable portion of the modern school. We have been fated to see, even under the name of 'Nocturne,' efforts as strange as they were astonishing offered us, instead of the modest and harmless tenderness which Field introduced in his compositions. One man of genius alone succeeded in breathing into this kind of composition the greatest flexibility and fervor of which it was capable, without losing its sweetness and the vagueness of its pretensions.

"Striking all the chords of elegiac feeling, and dyeing his dreams in the dark tints of mourning for which Young found such painfully moving expression, Chopin gave us in his 'Nocturnes' harmony which becomes the source of our most inexpressible delights, but at the same time, of our most unquiet and passionate emotions. His flight is higher, although his passions are more deeply wounded, and his sweetness possesses a penetratingly painful effect, so little can it conceal his despondency. No one will ever be able to surpass, or—what in Art is the same thing—to equal the perfection of invention and form, which distinguish all the pieces he published under the name of 'Nocturnes.'

"They are more nearly allied to pain than those of Field, and therefore more significant. Their darkly gleaming poetry overpowers us more, but calms us less, and consequently causes us to feel happy at being again able to turn to those pearl-shells, which open, far from the storms of the monster ocean, on the banks of some stream murmuring under the shade of palm-trees, in an oasis whose joys make us forget the desert by which it is surrounded.

"The charm which I always found in these pieces, distinguished by so much melody, and such delicate harmony, extends back to the years of my youth. Long before I thought I should ever meet the author of them, I cradled myself for hours in dreams full of many forms, which arose before my intoxicated soul, after I had been plunged by the music in a sweet stupor, similar to that caused by the agreeable vapor of rose tobacco, replacing, in a narghily full of jasmine perfume, the sharp and fragrant tombski; hallucinations without fever or convulsions, and rather full of impalpable pictures, gradually fading away, and the touching beauty of which changed, in a moment of ecstatic madness, emotion into passion. In these pieces are united, in the most charming manner, all the qualities which ever excited men to write or read idylls or eclogues. How often did I allow my eye and my thoughts to float over the name of that Madame Rosenkamp, to whom the longest and most beautiful (the fourth nocturne) of these pieces is dedicated; how many confused and pleasing ideas were suggested to me by this same name of Rosenkamp, which had been the motive of such a profoundly feeling, tenderly melancholy, and yet happy creation! Beauty of style is here united with grace of sentiment, and there is such softness in the ornamentation, so choice a selection in the modulations of the thought, that it appears as if nothing was noble, choice and blameless enough for the composer, when he wrote lines so pure.

"The first and fifth of these Nocturnes breathe a sentiment of beaming joy. We might almost say they are the development of happiness gained without effort, and enjoyed with raptures. In the second, the tints are darker, like that of light losing itself in a shady alley. We are tempted to assert that, in this song, there predominates the painful feeling of absence, which induced some one to say:

"Absence is a world without a sun."

"The third and sixth are treated more in a pastoral style: the mild breath of balmy breezes pervades their melodies. In them shines the reflection of those changing colors, with which the fleeting vapors of morning dye the dew, so that it is, in turn, roseate, blue, and then lilac. In the last, however, the forms are plainer and the outlines more definite; thus, we perceive, when the oppressive heat of day has dispersed the early fog, wave-shaped vapory forms which roll like a billow with a number of smaller billows, glittering like diamonds, in serpent-like folds, over a landscape beaming with light and freshness. This brilliant clearness is by no means opposed to the title of these pieces, nor was it out of mere whim that Field called one of his nocturnes, 'Midday.' Is this not the dream of a man only half awake in one of those summer nights without darkness in St. Petersburg, which he so often saw? Nights covered with a pale veil, which conceals nothing from the eye, and merely envelopes objects in a mist, not thicker than shining dun-colored silvery crape. A secret affinity dispels the difference between the night shades and the beaming clearness of day, and we no longer are astonished; for the vagueness of the picture causes us to feel that it takes the form it does only in the poet's dreamy fancy, and not in consequence of a model really existing.

"We shall not err in saying that Field's whole life, which was as free from the feverish anxiety to which the wish of seeing and being seen urges most men, as it was unscathed by the parching fire of violent passions, flowed on in a dreamy ease, lighted up, here and there, by half-tints, and an uncertain chiaro-oscuro, and passed away almost like a long Nocturne, without the stormy lightning, or the tempestuous blast disturbing the calm of his peaceable disposition.

"As Clementi's favorite pupil, he learned from that great master the secrets of the most beautiful style of playing of which that epoch could boast, and he changed it into a kind of poetry, in which he will always be an imitable model of natural grace, melancholy naïveté, and, at the same time, simplicity. He is one of those peculiar types of the past school, which are met with only in certain periods of Art, when the latter has already become acquainted with its resources, but has not exhausted them to such an extent as to be tempted to extend its dominion and develop itself more freely, in doing which it has more than once wounded its wings, while endeavoring to liberate itself from its fetters.

"FRANZ LISZT."

(From Novello's Musical Times.)

Truth about Music and Musicians.

Translated from the German by Sabilla Novello.

No. 7.—"TOO COMPLICATED."

"He who strives to give too much, generally gives too little."

After the performance of a new musical production, no sentences are more commonly heard than, "We cannot pronounce upon its merits after a single hearing."—"We must hear it several times in order to understand it."—"It is a profound work," and so forth. Read every criticism on an important work by Schumann, or others of his class, and I wager you will meet with the above or similar verdicts. Profound is a favorite word with shallow critics, for it sounds well. But should we ask them what they would signify by musical profundity, they must remain in our debt for an answer. They consider as deep all that they cannot comprehend; but the deepest waters can be clear and translucent as the shallowest rill, while every puddle is opaque, and therefore, presumptively, deep! Clearness enables us to perceive depth; but obscurity prevents us from discovering any worthy object hidden beneath its dullness. The general effect of a musical piece must be produced immediately, upon its first performance; although, of course, it is necessary to hear a work several times in order to appreciate and analyze this effect,—to enable scientific judges to recognize, clearly and distinctly, the means by which this effect has been produced, and to become intimately acquainted with finished details and elaborate passages. Even in the present day, works are produced which at once cause a sensation,—which at their first performance find favor with the public and with critics,—and which no one would think of declaring to be all shallow merely on this account. Are not such works, the impression of which is undoubtedly satisfactory after a single performance, preferable to those which we cannot judge to be worthy?—which require that we should point out the possibility that at a future period we may succeed in discovering some hidden merit? Would a composer feel content, when publishing a work, and anxious for its success, if the public instead of awarding ready welcome and enthusiastic applause to his efforts, should refer him to the prospect of a future success,—a bill at six months' notice, which might, perhaps, not even be honored? Impossible! Every artist desires immediate success; every artist hopes that his work should elicit the highest possible approbation at its first performance.

Yet, you will say, if this be the case, why are works continually written which call forth the sentences quoted at the commencement of my letter? I have already explained some of the causes, and shall mention others at a later opportunity. In this letter I shall treat of only one, the most important and most general cause, which exerts its injurious influence over even richly-gifted composers, who possess complete mastery over all the technical resources of Art. This manner of writing is too complicated; they fall into the error of exaggerated and preëminent polyphony,—of too complicated part-writing; that is, they let too many voices (or parts), which are individually equally significant, speak simultaneously. In order to realize vividly the perverseness of such a proceeding, imagine the forty men in an orchestra to be orators, not musicians; speaking, not playing,—and that each endeavored to utter an individual and different idea, or to relate an individual and different story;—and that all talked together, now loudly, now whisperingly, and now screamingly;—you would understand none of the speakers, and merely hear a confused mass of words. Do not call this exaggeration. You must yourself assuredly remember, even in the works of the best composers, certain passages throughout which the instruments of an orchestra assail the public ear and claim its attention simultaneously by closely-jostled and vociferous phrases, so that you can discern nothing but a meaningless "sound and fury, signifying nothing." But I will simplify the illustration: let only four persons address you simultaneously, each telling you something different, and then repeat to me what you have comprehended from this conversation.

I know the argument you may advance in opposition to what I have said;—I know that a good composer can, in a quartet, let four parts simultaneously flow, and give to each an important meaning, without disturbing the attention of a practised listener or good musician,—without becoming partly or entirely unintelligible. But, in this case, the different parts may utter different melodies, but they express one identical feeling; at all events, each part does not express a totally opposite feeling. Such passages do exist,—passages even of highest beauty,—in many masterpieces; but they can only be recognized by the scientific or artistic listener; to the general public they remain for ever unfathomable mysteries. But passages of this nature, even in the most masterly productions, are some of them incomprehensible, even to the profoundest musician, and are merely a Babel of music; therefore they produce no effect, or, which is worse, produce an unpleasant effect, as must be owned by every connoisseur who will honestly confess the real impression made on his soul. Even the greatest masterpieces have their defects, because their creators were but men, and not perfect beings: not the less, however, for this reason are they to be prized for their invaluable merit. Examine the scores of the best masters, from Haydn to Beethoven (excepting the last work of the latter); seek out the artificially constructed polyphone passages, and compare them with those we call homophone, in which only one part stands prominent, while the rest accompany it simply, and you will convince yourself that those polyphone passages form a very small minority, while the large majority consists of simple, and consequently, comprehensible, agreeable, expressive and melodious phrases. Pray remark this well, for herein lies the secret of those masters,—the secret which appears to be entirely lost amongst our modern composers,—the secret of affording delight. Homophone, distinct, simple passages are the light; those artificial polyphone passages are the shade. Art is simple; while artificiality is intricate, confused, and complicated. All art, however, is difficult, and artificiality is easy; in the same manner that creation is more difficult than concoction. Man can concoct much, but only Heaven, or heaven-inspired genius, can create. The invention of a beautiful melody is no trifling task,—on the contrary, it presents great difficulties; but any composer, thoroughly acquainted with the technicalities of his science, can at any time, even when not under the influence of inspiration,—even though ungifted with creative fancy, put together artificial, polyphone passages as he might work out an arithmetical enigma. But calculation is not invention, and concoction is not creation.

The want of effect, or disagreeable effect, discernible in many works of our modern composers, may be unhesitatingly pronounced to be attributable to the fact that, in their works, the relative number of polyphone (complicated) and homophone (simple, natural) passages are in exactly contrary proportion to those examples afforded by our great masterpieces; they contain very few or no simple, melodious combinations, but consist principally or entirely of passages of complicated structure, which, by the blind adorers of these present musical idols, are loudly proclaimed to be deep and admirable in their mystery. We are told that we must hear this kind of music often, in order to discover its beauty. But these idolaters betray their own perversity by some words, and unwittingly pronounce the truth. Every one seeks for melody in music; when it is not recognized upon first hearing a work, something appears to be missing, and we say, "It will be well to seek once more, and hear the piece again, as the missing article may be concealed amongst the intricacies of its structure." The above named idolaters also miss something, but they cannot tell what; yet still they strive, by their plausible phrases of "profoundity," &c., &c., to throw sand into the eyes of the public, in order that it may not discern the deficiencies of their idols.

Too complicated! this is the fault of such musical productions;—a fault engendered by feebleness or want of creative genius, and by mistaken notions of beauty; for misguided composers actually do exist, who hold that only that which is artificial and scientific can be original, genial, and true,—who look down with contempt on simple, intelligible, and graceful music,—and who are under the delusion that they can force the public to admire their compositions,—that they can induce it to believe that a big, thickly-curled and powdered wig is more beautiful than natural hair. Prizes have been offered for the best symphony that may be composed. I would rather offer prizes for the most expressive, most simple, and therefore the best melody of only sixteen bars, which may be created.

A New Valentine. Meyerbeer and Rossini.

Correspondence of the Boston Courier.

PARIS, Dec. 16, 1858.—The winter still drags on its commencement in the laziest possible way, and seems to announce itself under the most lugubrious aspect. Not a ball has yet been heard of; not a leading salon has yet been opened; half the people of any fashion are at their country houses still, and at the opera and at the "Italians" one sees strange faces around. Apropos to the former, there is just the shadow of a bit of news to give: A new prima donna has come out as Valentine in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," and is for the present worthy not only of notice, but of praise. Madame Barbot is her name, and it was an unknown one until now. She has a very fine soprano voice, she is young and handsome, and decidedly an actress. She has even a certain something that really all but approaches to what unreflecting persons term "genius;" that not one in a million ever genuinely possesses, but there is a certain spark from the great flame, a certain reflection from the real light, that whenever it shines, or burns, pleases and satisfies the beholder. Now this spark, this reflected radiance, Madame Barbot undoubtedly has. As a mere vocalist, if she were only that, she would not be sufficient; but being what she is—young, handsome, with a fine voice, and very remarkable dramatic instincts, she is altogether the best Valentine that has been seen here for the last dozen years. In the duet of the third act, with Marcel, Madame Barbot sings well, and with truth of intonation, (which is a great comfort, after the horrible flat-singing every one accuses you to at the Grand Opera); but she falls into one odious fault at the close of the beautiful phrase by which the female voice opens the andante. This phrase should be sung in time; whereas, since that day when Madame Grisi first sang the part of Valentine (taught her no doubt by some Italian professor, who arranged it à sa manière), it has become the fashion to make an indefinite rest upon the last high note, and thus absolutely distort the entire rhythmic sense of the passage.

In the fourth act, however, (and this is the important part,) I can almost unreservedly praise Madame Barbot. She was really very remarkable throughout. Her reading of that most difficult passage, "Reste! reste! je l'aime!" was, I think, the most perfect I have ever heard, being at once the most passionate and the most regretful. It was womanly in the extreme—sorrowful and desperate, tender and chaste. Too much credit cannot be given to this young singer and actress for her performance of this most trying scene.

As to swelling the chorus of those who chant Meyerbeer's eulogies for the magnificence of certain parts of the "Huguenots," I am not prepared to do it; but I cannot refrain from describing one curious little proof of the beauty of the fourth act that passed under my own eyes. The box I was in was immediately above the entrance to the pit, where stand the police agents and a gendarme. Towards the end of the duet, between Roual and Valentine, just in the most dramatic portion of it, and where really the music, when even tolerably executed only, does carry you "out of yourself," I chanced to catch a sight of the foremost Sergent de la ville. The man was literally wrapt in ecstasy! His hands were clasped, his eyes strained to devour the action before him in its every detail, and his whole expression one of an intensity of admiration, I do not remember ever to have witnessed. To touch the heart of a policeman! This is a triumph I do not presume any dramatic author, lyrical or otherwise, ever before achieved; and I would advise Meyerbeer, if he ever hears it told, to put it down as the one largest leaf of his crown of bay.

By the bye, there is, talking of great composers, a very interesting anecdote, for the truth of which I can vouch. Some months ago, Rossini received a visit from Meyerbeer, and the latter perceived in his illustrious friend's room, a portrait of Mozart. He looked at it, and then said: "It is not at all like—it is not the right one—we have one at the Mozarteums in Salzburg, that is the real one, but this is quite inferior." Rossini looked grieved, and said he really was so. "I had rejoiced in that portrait," he observed, "and used often to look for a long while at the features, and cheat myself into the notion I had seen him."

When Meyerbeer took his leave, he did so with a promise to send Rossini a copy of the picture in the Mozarteums. A few weeks ago he brought the Photograph to Paris, and sent it to his colleague in Apollo. Rossini's letter, written to Meyerbeer to thank him for the present, is a chef d'œuvre (though very short) of fine language and fine feeling; and there is something touching in this homage rendered to the glorious author of Don Juan by the authors of the Huguenots and of Guillaume Tell. When men reach the topmost heights of renown, one of the first great and young qualities that they generally lose is the capacity of admiration; they narrow down mostly into an excessive pre-occupation of what they themselves achieve, and what they do rises up and stands between them and their appreciation of the beautiful in itself. There is a passage in Cousin's volume on "Le Vrai, le Beau, et le Bien," that has always struck me as one of the truest and most elevated sentences to be found in any modern writer—it is a recommendation to admire unsparingly: "To discover and to prove that beauty fails in such or such a thing, is an ungrateful task," says the great philosopher; "to understand when beauty is anywhere present; to feel and make others feel its presence, is an exquisite enjoyment, a generous undertaking. Admiration is for him who can feel it an honor and a happiness. It is a happiness to feel the beautiful, it is an honor to reveal it to others. Admiration is the sign of a noble intellect well served by a noble heart. It is the vital principle of superior criticism, of the criticism that does good; it is as it were the god-like part of what men call taste."

I know of nothing finer in the works of any æsthetician, ancient or modern; and no better example of this instruction put in practice can be found, it appears to me, than in the anecdote I have just related. This capacity of admiration preserved at an age when the smaller instincts are usually most vivacious, and by two men who are anything save sentimental, seems to me a fact to be chronicled.

I must, however, add the following conclusion to the story: it was told as I tell it you here, by a person who had read Rossini's letter to Meyerbeer; and after those present had expressed their satisfaction at it—"Yes," remarked M.  a man famous here for his causticity, but I wish Mozart were alive—the admiration would be so much the more meritorious!" I do not and will not share the doubt here hinted at, but I have no right to withhold the story of its having been expressed, for M. ———'s mot is repeated all over Paris.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Mr. Stœpel's "Hiawatha" Music.

The Boston Theatre was not over full on Saturday evening, at the first public performance of Mr. ROBERT STØPEL's "Hiawatha." The composer calls this work a "Romantic Symphony." It is, properly speaking, a Cantata, with added recitations. The performance was too long, lasting nearly three hours, and, if the recitations of Mrs. STØPEL were omitted altogether, the work would gain in compactness and unity. The attention of the listener is distracted by the frequent jumps from speaking to singing and back again; and, though Mrs. Stœpel read her part with less of her usual peculiarities of manner, the musical portion, if given by itself, would be less tedious and more interesting.

Mr. Stœpel had the advantage of an excellent orchestra. The delicacy and good taste, with which all the instrumental portion was given, were a delightful experience to ears irritated by the noisy, coarse playing of Mr. Anschutz's band. The orchestra on Saturday was well constituted, having four contra-bassi, and a large body of strings. It is gratifying to find a band, composed entirely of Boston musicians, play with so much unity, precision, and true artistic feeling. The chorus, like all our home-made choruses, sang in that business-like, steady, respectable manner, which, though it insures correctness, is inconsistent with any enthusiasm or hearty sympathy in the singers, and thence, of necessity, in the audience. Mr.

Stœpel's choral music, being mostly mystical and fanciful in design, suffered especially from this saw mechanical style of singing.

Of the three solo singers, Mrs. HARWOOD and Mr. MILLARD both did justice to their parts. Not so Mr. WETHERBEE, for lack of voice. Mrs. Harwood sang with a good taste and refinement that she has not lately accustomed us to. She has great natural advantages of voice and person, and might be an excellent singer, if she would always do as well as on Saturday. Mr. Millard has a pleasant light tenor voice, and sings in a good Italian method. He is apt to sacrifice the words to the notes, but our mother-tongue is so desperately hard to distinctly enunciate in singing, that we cannot be very severe with him for this peculiarity. As a whole, the performance was a very fair one; and, allowing for the difficulty of rightly judging a work of any importance at one hearing, a tolerable idea could be gained on Saturday of Mr. Stœpel's claims as a composer—so far as this production is concerned.

It seems almost damning him with faint praise to say that "Hiawatha" is a composition creditable to Mr. Stœpel; and yet we cannot, in honesty, judging only from Saturday's experience, say more. There is no bad music in the piece, but neither is there much that is especially good, or indeed in any way remarkable. It is well orchestrated, the vocal parts are written with knowledge of the requirements and capacities of the voice, and the whole composition is free from crudities or any glaring faults. It is the work of a man who understands his business, and knows the use of his tools. But it seems to be rather the result of thought, time and labour, than the spontaneous creation of a mind which must make itself understood from the presence of ideas demanding utterance. Not that Mr. Stœpel's melodies are often far-fetched or artificial, but that they are commonplace, being rather correct cantabile phrases, duly accented and pointed, than vivid, salient tunes. There is a certain monotony in the whole work—the orchestra is always used properly, the parts are full, each instrument having its share, but there is never anything which seizes the attention of the hearer, which compels him to listen—no new effects of sonority—it is all quite right, and according to receipt, but it is hardly anything more. And so in the voice parts—they are unobjectionable, cleverly written, sometimes quite pretty, and that is all. The couplets, "Cradle song," very nicely done by Mrs. Harwood, are good, genuine, vocal music, such as is agreeable to both singer and listener, with a well-written, flowing accompaniment. The Barcarole of Mr. Millard we did not like as well. The rhythm is affected, and the composer seems to be striving after an effect of careless gayety, which he does not succeed in obtaining. The Trio at the end of Part 1st, (as much of it as was audible,) the bass part being for the audience a mere hypothesis, was well done, and is perhaps as good a specimen of Mr. Stœpel's manner as any number in the piece. The "Beggar Dance," for Orchestra, in Part 2d, excellently played, is a characteristic bit, and though not very new in idea, had a certain savage energy in it, resembling in its rhythm the melodies of the Arabs. Mr. Millard's couplets, "Onaway! awake, beloved," were deservedly encored. They are two stanzas of tender, graceful music, sung by Mr. M. with a pathos and expression that did him credit. In the "Chorus of Ravens," Mr. Stœpel's memory got the better of his invention—it too closely resembles the "Valse infernale" in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable. The "Harvest Chorus" commences and ends with a smooth, well balanced melody, nicely harmonized, but it is disfigured by the introduction of a trivial waltz tune, the only really incongruous thing in the whole piece. The "Chorus of Ghosts," which follows, is too much spun-out; there is in it however more colour and truth to the sentiment indicated than in any other portion of the work.

The first part of Minnehaha's death-song, put into the form of couplets (a style the composer seems to affect), is ugly, the passages being saccadé and the intervals unvocal; the ending is a very plaintive and charming piece of soprano singing. The finale is the best piece in the whole composition—the theme is luscious, ear-haunting and appropriate—well wrought out in the voices and orchestra, long-continued, yet coherent, and the conclusion is especially original and beautiful.

"Hiawatha" was at least a succès d'estime—perhaps something more—how much more time alone can show. Judged as the work of a practised and experienced composer, it merits no great eulogium; but if it be, as we believe it is, the first composition of any magnitude that Mr. Stœpel has produced, it does him great credit—more, it is true, from the absence of faults than the presence of merits; but for a young composer it is a work of promise, which we trust may be fulfilled. It lacks chiefly what in this year of grace, '59, is so hard to find—melodic invention—new musical ideas. Mr. Stœpel has shown that he knows perfectly how to write; let him now prove that he can also produce what shall be really worth writing. He has mastered the manner—let him show that he has in him the matter, without which a composer, however finished his style, is less an artist than an artisan.

C. J. T.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 31, 1858.—Mr. GOLDBECK's third concert, on Thursday of last week, was not as attractive in any respect, as his former ones. The programme was much more common-place, and the performances not so good. Mr. Goldbeck gave us chiefly his own compositions, and not the most interesting of those. A "Fantasia from Trovatore," and "Improvisations on the Marseillaise" savor rather more of humbug than is worthy of an artist like Mr. Goldbeck. Liszt's "Preludes" for two pianos, though excellently played by Messrs. GOLDBECK and MASON, was as uninteresting as are all the compositions of the great pianist. Two Etudes by Mr. Goldbeck were the most pleasing things that he gave us. Besides all this, we had a solo from ED. MOLLENHAUER, and vocal pieces by Misses ANDEM and COMSTOCK, and Dr. GUILMETTE. The second named young lady is a recent débutante; she has a fine, sympathetic voice, and pleasing, unassuming manners. I would, however, advise her to sing pieces that lie originally in the compass of her voice, and not spoil the effect of others by transposition, as she did with Beethoven's Ah perfido, which was in itself rather difficult for her.

On Christmas night, the Harmonic Society gave their annual performance of the "Messiah," with I am sorry to say, their annual faults. It is painful to be unable from year to year to discern the least improvement in the efforts of such a society. This proves but too plainly how little real Art-love has to do with these performances. I refer of course, merely to the choruses; the solo singers always give more or less satisfaction, none more so than Miss BRAINERD, with her pure, true voice, and her earnest conception of what she sings. A refreshing contrast to the Harmonic Society was presented by the "Leiderkrantz," in their production of "The Creation," on Tuesday last. I have rarely if ever heard better chorus singing in our city. The precision and spirit with which the charming music was rendered, told of earnest practice. The only fault one could find was in the first chorus, where the beginning was not sufficiently pianissimo, to give the full effect to "And there was LIGHT." Of the solos, I regret that I cannot give the same good account; Madame CAVADORI, it is true, did her part, and more than her part, admirably, inasmuch as on account of the illness of M^{me}. ZIMMER-

MANN, she represented both Gabriel and Eve. Mr. URCHS, who sang Adam, was also good, but of the other two gentlemen the least said the better, in view of their having volunteered their services for a benevolent object. The orchestra also did their part exceedingly well, and on the whole, the very numerous audience appeared very well satisfied.

The New Year was yesterday worthily ushered in by one of MASON and THOMAS's Matinées, which was a rich treat. Beethoven's quartet, Op. 17, No. 6, was exquisitely played, and was followed by solos from Wm. Mason and Theodore Thomas. Mr. Mason gave us a Ballade and Etude of his own, which seemed to me, at first hearing, to be far above common worth. Mr. Thomas played a Tarantelle of Schubert, which was extremely interesting both from its novelty and its great beauty. It opens with a slow introduction, the long-drawn, melodious tones of which were most finely rendered by the young violinist. The Tarantelle movement is very original, and full of strength and vigor, to which the player also did ample justice. The fourth and last number of the programme was another novelty, a Trio by BARGIEL.

Who is Bargiel? some may ask. He is a half-brother of CLARA SCHUMANN, and still quite a young man. The name brings to us pleasant memories of a stay in Berlin, where some dear friends took lessons of him, and told me much about him. Also of a meeting, some months later, with Bettina and her daughters at Weimar, and an afternoon spent with them there, where we were joined by Joachim, Hans v. Buelow, and Bargiel, whom the latter introduced, and in whom I was surprised to find so young and diminutive an individual. It is only since then, I think, that he has made his debut as a composer. And this is not one of the least of his class, this Trio proves. It abounds in originality, has pleasing melodies, and is very beautifully instrumented. Of course one hearing of a work of this kind cannot enable one to judge of its merit; but the impression itself was a most favorable one, particularly so as it was very finely interpreted by Messrs. Mason, Thomas and Bergmann. The concert was held in Dodworth's Hall, and I am sure many a regretful thought of poor EISFELD must have mingled with the sensations produced by the music. Many of us miss him sadly this winter, but unfortunately there are but few of those who did miss him who are willing to be friends in deed in both senses. Messrs. NOLL, BEYER, and BERGUE, Mr. Eisfeld's colleagues in the quartet, have issued a circular, proposing to continue the quartet soirées in Mr. Eisfeld's name, with the assistance of a number of pianists, and those artists who have offered their services, and to appropriate the proceeds for the benefit of Mr. Eisfeld; but, will you believe it, the requisite number of subscribers, small at best, could not be mustered! Is it not a crying shame that a man who has devoted himself to the cause of Art so disinterestedly, and for so many years, who is so well known and liked, can not find "in time of need, more appreciation and gratitude." —t—

NEW YORK, JAN. 11. — Who can complain at the present day, of not being able to hear enough good music in New York, when, in thirty-six hours (as was the case last week) he has the opportunity of listening to Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni, and a Philharmonic concert (with its morning rehearsal).

Of the operas I can tell you nothing new, after your own interesting analyses and criticisms. The representations were both very happy ones, and it was a great treat to me to hear Figaro once more for the first time since my visit to Germany. In Don Giovanni, (which was given as a matinée), PICCOLOMINI's conception of Zerlina is indeed quite a novel one, but her interpretation is so irresistibly charming and cunning, that one cannot but be attracted by the new character which she creates.

The Philharmonic concert was one of the finest, if not the finest, which has ever taken place in New York. The programme had but two faults, it was too long, (more from the length of its pieces than from their number,) and there was a little too much of Mendelssohn. The excellence, however, of what there was, would make one forget this. The Symphony was played with rare perfection, and, even new in its great beauty, was hailed with warm applause. The Overtures too, were very finely rendered. That by Schubert is very spirited, but needs a nearer acquaintance to be fully appreciated. Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits," we have heard before; and, though not as attractive as some others by the same master, it is always welcome. Madame JOHNSON-GRAEVER was warmly welcomed, having already won a high place in the regard of the musical public. The playing was what it always is, but the composition was not so effective, by any means, as other pieces of her repertoire. It was tame and heavy, and long, and struck me as hardly worthy of its author. Towards the end, too, Mme. Graever showed signs of fatigue, which made it still more uninteresting. As a composition it was, in every respect, a striking contrast to the beautiful, melodious, soulful violin concerto, the performance of which, by Mr. "BRUNO WOLLENHAUPT," was one of the novelties of the evening. This gentleman is a younger brother of the pianist, and composer of the same name, in this city. He has been a pupil of Vieuxtemps, if I am not mistaken, and has just returned from several years of study abroad. This was his first appearance here, and he has reason to be well satisfied with his reception. His bold and spirited, and yet deeply expressive playing, his clear, strong tone, and the evident enthusiasm which accompanied his performance, roused the audience to a degree seldom before equalled. He bids fair to occupy a prominent position in the musical world of our city, and all who are interested in the cause and progress of music will join me in heartily wishing him all success, and in the hope of hearing him often in public.

Another new feature in Saturday's programme was the two choruses. The first is of acknowledged beauty, but it loses much in being torn from the opera, where the situation adds so much to its impressiveness. For this reason the chorus from Rienzi, which, though far inferior in intrinsic value, was noisy, spirited, and finely harmonized and instrumented, proved far more effective, and was encored. The choral parts were very well sung, but in the solos there was much room for improvement.

Regular opera-goers are having "a good time," now. The new season commences on Thursday with Don Giovanni, substituted, (on account of Brignoli's indisposition) for La Zingara; on Friday night Figaro, for the same reason, was given instead of Martha. Saturday, as I have told you, Don Giovanni again as a matinée. N. B. Does it not strike you that POISSOT, splendidly as her voice suits the part of Donna Anna, is wanting in delicacy in the representation of that part? In the touching scene after the death of her father, for instance, not to mention other similar instances, she screamed out the music, with no regard to the situation; with the recollection of the heart-broken, touching pianissimo tones with which I have heard others breathe out their lament over the corpse, the effect of this was very unpleasant to me.

Last night La Zingara was at last produced — at least the papers do not say that it was again postponed — and to-day, for the benefit of the St. George's Society, there is to be a matinée, with Martha and La Serva Padrona, and a concert and oratorio in the evening, when, besides miscellaneous music, the finest parts of the "Creation" will be given, the choruses by the Liederkrantz, and the solos by the artists of the opera. Apropos of Martha, I am glad to find that you are converted from your dislike to it. Of its kind I have always thought it one of the prettiest of little operas, both in plot and music.

NEW YORK, JAN. 3, 1859. — I find in my Owl Book [page 894, paragraph XXIX.] the following profound axiom: "He who talks most, hawks most," which I suppose may be also applied to writing, though I have not the direct authority of the Owl Book in support of this theory. My object for quoting the above beautiful axiomatic phrase, is to confess that I may have talked or written too much. Your correspondent "—t—" appears to think that I have written flippantly in regard to the mystical signature appended to the communications of said correspondent; consequently I would wish to publicly protest against any such misconstruction of my words. "—t—" is viewed by me with too much respect to make me desire to indulge in flippancy towards the said individual.

And as I write with my cherished Owl Book by my side, my eye falls on another paragraph, and I read: "When a vacuity in extraneous objects presents itself to the astonished and wondering gaze, when the usual functions of activity in social, moral and physical matter, are divested of their identity, and lost in the vortex of void, when there in short remains but a nonentity of actions to be performed, it is expedient that those requirements be fulfilled without an intervening iota of time, forming a deteriorating chasm." This beautiful — I may say eloquent passage may be abridged, (as it will be in my juvenile edition of the Owl Book), into "When you have nothing to do, do it at once," and thus you will see it has direct reference to my musical duties during the past week. There has been nothing to do, and with that unflinching fortitude, and that prompt alacrity for which I am so eminent, I did it.

To be sure, there were some German demonstrations. Haydn's "Creation" was given in German text by a German musical society, with German soloists, for the benefit of a German charitable society, and before an exclusively German audience. Then another set of Germans hired the Academy of Music one evening, and gave a $2-a-ticket-concert for another German benevolent affair.

Then there was a little hemi-private, demi-public concert given by the Sunday School of St. George's Church, in aid of a building fund for a missionary church to be erected in some part of the city. MOLLENHAUER, the violinist, played, and Mr. GEORGE BRISTOW, the organist of the church, presided at the piano. There was some mediocre singing, the chief applause of the evening being allotted to APTOMMAS the harpist, who played a number of his most beautiful selections. He is a member of this church, and a personal friend of the pastor, Rev. Dr. Tyng. It was a very gratifying concert, and all those who took part in the musical performance, gave their services, gratuitously.

Our city churches take more interest in music than they used to, and I notice, that the plan of having children take part in the musical portion of the exercises is becoming more general. Quartet choirs are falling below par. By the way, MIRANDA, the tenor of Cooper's English Opera Troupe, has been engaged to sing at Dr. Macauley's Church in Fifth Avenue. Dr. GUILMETTE, the baritone, too sings there, and WILLIAM A. KING, formerly of Grace Church, is the organist. They have just got a new organ, built by Robjohn, of this city — who once was famous as a balloonist and dabbler in aeronautic experiments — which possesses some very peculiar features.

We have some very beautiful churches in this city, and some of them are furnished with excellent choirs. It is my intention to go prowling about them this winter, and I may thus be enabled to furnish you with some particulars in regard to the New York churches and their music. TROVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 10. — Ullman's characteristic grandiloquent manifestoes, are even now raining with floodlike vehemence upon the public of Philadelphia; and ere long will the excitements of a magnificent opera season burst over the polite circles of the city, like a mighty freshet which bears away every opposing barrier. PICCOLOMINI, FORMES, & Co. are announced for Friday night, to appear in the "Child of the Regiment;" and I propose, next week to record, in the columns of your Journal, the extent of success which they will then have achieved here. For my own part, I have heard la petite Comtesse in New York, and I promise her that position in the hearts of opera habitués here, which a pretty face, consummate savoir faire, fascinating grace, excellent identification with character, and dramatic intensity invariably acquire for the foot-light cantatrice. The Harmonia Sacred Music Society presents, in its announced concert for to-night, two features which must insure an appreciative and remunerative audience.

1. Miss HENRIETTA SIMON, a reputed pupil of the gifted La Grange, makes her debut in this city. She is represented to be a charming singer, with a singularly flexible, rich, and sympathetic voice, and a truthful method which she has assiduously cultivated for several years. Much interest seems to be evinced in this first appearance of a young lady, who has received an unqualified endorsement from so distinguished a preceptor.

2. The second prominent feature of this entertainment consists in fingers and feet mechanically, and in brains intellectually. Mr. CHARLES JEROME HOPKINS, styled "the young American organist," is this other predominant feature. We have heard him before; and it seems to me I then wrote to you, that his execution was correct and brilliant, his improvisation finished, and his knowledge of the instrument perfect, but that his impulsive temperament served to mar the fine rhythmic effect of the elegant compositions which he performed. You shall have a detailed account of all these entertainments, operatic and concert, next week.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Mr. Stœpel's Romantic Symphony "Hiawatha."

Mr. Editor:—Happening to be in Boston in time to have the pleasure of hearing the first production of this new work, I am prompted to offer you a few hasty notes of my impressions. Mr. ROBERT STœPEL is a clever musician, and the Sinfonia-Cantata "Hiawatha" is unquestionably a work of high art, challenging regard for much excellence rather in its descriptive than in an intrinsically musical aspect. Yet in detail much might be improved as regards the symmetry and euphony of the toute ensemble.

It is not for me, only after a first hearing, to dare enter minutely into an explication of my views relative to certain passages and counter-passages of this meritorious composition. Nor would it be fair to the gifted composer were I to analyze and dissect his offspring, amidst a people to whom he is a stranger, and whose musical predilections and sympathies lie not in the same channel as his; because I have yet to hear it again in order to find out many of its beauties and to apply dispassionately the touch-stone of criticism to its many parts.

But a slight examination of "Hiawatha" without entering fully into its various phases would ensure the belief that it is destined to enjoy public favor, if not as an entire work, at least partially.

The opening of the symphony is very suggestive of the reading relative to the Peace-pipe in the wilderness, and the attempt to illustrate the rising smoke, although somewhat vague and indefinite, is however characteristic. The song of the Great Spirit, which was sung rather tamely by Mr. WETHERBEE, is a sort of sostenuto movement, in which the orchestra does more than the singer, and one calculated to show off the upper notes of a Baritone, and I think that this song demanded a voice of a more vibrant quality than Mr. Wetherbee's, for he was inaudible in some parts, so great was the predominance of the brass instruments. Why is it that the modern maestri rely so much on brass for certain effects? The disciples of Meyerbeer must surely forget that the very timbre of certain brass instruments tends to destroy the ideal aspect they are intended to convey. The "Shower of Stars," musically depicted, was both suggestive and pretty, and here the more delicate instruments of the orchestra stood out in fine character. The first strictly metrical movement of the work is presented in the chorus, describing Nokomis's descent to earth, &c. In this there is a pretty motivo rendered very striking indeed by the orchestral treatment, especially the Pizzicato of the violins. The "Cradle Song," so admirably sung by Mrs. HARWOOD, is a sweet production, and the orchestral accompaniment obviously supplies the idea of a rocking movement, while the song itself recalls a lullaby. Some of the intermezzos here, as elsewhere were lost through the untimely applause. She also rendered very efficiently the "Death song of Minnehaha," which is indeed a beautiful production. The hantboy initiates the subject with a fine minor solo, after which the song begins, sustained by an effective accompaniment. The phrases are short and piquant, and in this manner, intelligibly appealing to the love of short phrases, innate in learned and unlearned, it drew forth a warm encore, which was responded to by the Soprano. The "Canoe Building Song" and "Chibiabos' Love Song," sung by Mr. MILLARD, are both gems of tenor songs. The first is original, peculiar and somewhat quaint.

The Tenor did not seem decided and confident in rendering it. It seems to me that something sostenuto in character invariably presents such voices in a more favorable aspect, than these jerking unsteady movements. In order that a Tenor should feel his position secure, that is, get accustomed to the orchestra's weight, and attune his voice properly to its temperament, there is nothing so favorable as passages which allow him to lean on his voice, or, to speak à la Duprez, "poser la voix." He sang the "Onaway! Awake beloved," with more sweetness and effect, and received an encore. Such a beautiful composition in the serenade form must please any one, and, with the exception of a slight faux pas in the orchestra, it was altogether charming. Mr. Millard's voice is sweet and round in the middle registre, but not powerful, and loses color in the upper notes. It seems better adapted for subjects bearing light accompaniments, than for those which presuppose the efforts of a tenore di forza. Thus the voice was in many places over-shaded by the fortissimo of the orchestra. His pronunciation is not very distinct, but he sings in just tune by way of compensation, and this latter "covereth a multitude of sins." This serenade bids fair to be a general favorite, because the air is strikingly beautiful, and the phrases are short and therefore easy to catch, on the same principle that short sentences are more intelligible and easier of retention than long ones.

The Trio, "Hiawatha's wooing," by Mrs. Harwood, Messrs. Millard and Wetherbee, is a solemn, and chaste moreau. It begins by the Tenor with a passage not unlike church music, and the other parts work in gradually, until all unite in concert. The accompaniments discourse a prominent melody while the voices have long, flowing sounds. As this is the only Trio in the work, I wondered at the audience not encoring it, not only for this reason, but especially because, as a concerted piece, it is really beautiful. The Baritone was hardly powerful enough for the others. Mr. Stœpel's orchestral treatment of this piece, is artistic and tasteful; and if nothing else bespeaks him a maestro, the Trio, with its admirable motives and accompaniments, eloquently proclaims it. The Orchestral description of "The fight with Mudjekewis" and "The War song," was effective as a martial piece. The drums and clashing of instruments against each other by contrary motions, although somewhat exaggerated, seemed truthful.

"The Beggar Dance," in which the Piccolo begins the motive, is not unlike a Scotch gigue in character, but not in treatment. There is an air of wildness pervading this piece, reminding one of the tambour dance of Curacao, in which the beats, so rhythmical and precise, assumes a higher tone, or rather are the chief characteristic of the whole. Like the "Dansa Habanero," the contrary motions are greater features than the air or harmony.

The "Raven's chorus," is the most original of all—bold and characteristic, especially where the violins usher in two peculiar notes, so suggestive of the Raven's cry. The Harvest Chorus is a cheerful one. The air is pretty and striking, and the second section in the minor especially sweet and novel in structure.

Perhaps the most successful illustration is that of "Winter." Mr. Stœpel here employs his bassoons and clarinets with great judgment, and the Double Basses serve, with the Kettle Drums, and with the blast of the brass instruments, to depict the dismal aspect of the "year's decay." The Orchestra was faithful in its task, and seemed, on the whole, more au fait in this than in the other illustrations.

The last piece of the Cantata is the "Chorus of Spring," which drew a warm encore. This piece was very characteristic of early spring and the song of birds, and other beauties which spring brings forth. The flute had some very sweet passages, and indeed all the instruments, together with the voices, united in presenting a very cheerful and jubilant toute ensemble. To close a work of this nature, Mr. R. could not have adopted a more effective chorus, because cheerful in the first place, and in the second place broad and grand, both as regards its nature and treatment. The only glaring defect of the evening was the mistake of the Sopranos, who ushered in their parts eight bars sooner than the time. The Reading by Miss HERON was impassioned and dramatic in many points, and on the whole seemed quite in character and not overdone. There were passages in which she was scarcely audible, but no one can manage the voice effectively in a sitting posture. Her voice is very musical, although somewhat worn. Yet the warmth and earnestness of Miss Heron's reading, and her close attention to quantities and euphony, even with a less distinct enunciation than she possesses, would be acceptable, and would entitle the reader to great consideration. To the composer and conductor, I would add the compliment that his Cantata is a work which a Berlioz, (the last authority on Orchestration) might be proud of. It is, however, a production capable of sustaining a dispassionate criticism, such as would in some few instances, not exactly suit his theory, but which perhaps might present a balance in which his merits would outweigh his few defects.

STRAY MUSICIAN IN MODERN ATHENS.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 15, 1859.

Mr. Robert Stœpel's "Hiawatha."

The first production of Mr. STœPEL's "Romantic Symphony," as he has seen fit to call his music to the salient points of Longfellow's Indian poem, did not draw to the Boston Theatre so large an audience as we had hoped to see, or as the work deserved. But the impression that it made was such as to make it imperative that it be performed again. There are, of course, different opinions of its merit, as there must be about any musical work of magnitude, when first produced before a comparatively unmusical people. To candid expressions of two such, widely differing, but honest, we have given place in another part of this paper. If the more cool and cautious judgment of "C. J. T." be supposed the right one, there is even then enough acknowledged to give "Hiawatha" a high claim to a hearing and to satisfy any musical person that he could not hear it without interest. The testimony of the great majority of those who heard the work is much more warm, in many instances amounting to enthusiasm, and in some cases to the most desperate extravagance of praise. Newspaper critics riot in superlatives, as if they had discovered a new Shakspeare. They talk of its marking "an era in our musical history"; of "his infinite resources of counterpoint and imitation" (more could not be said of Bach or Handel); of "imaginative and creative genius of the highest order" (what is there left to say of Beethoven or Mozart?); of having "found no instrumental writing finer than this of Mr. Stöpel's," and more ad nauseam. Let us, at least, avoid all such extravagance. Better for the artist that his work fail to meet due recognition all at once, or for a long time, than that it go forth coupled from the first with such pretensions. Never was any Beethoven or Mendelssohn, in countries where they do appreciate such efforts, greeted on a first production in such terms. The title to such epithets can only be established in the course of time. It is simply presumptuous because we like a thing, because it gives us pleasure or surprise, to place it all at once upon a level with the greatest that has been achieved by human genius. For ourselves, in speaking of Mr. Stöpel's music, we feel that it would be presumption either to call it great, to hail it as a work of high imaginative genius, or to deny that it has real claims upon the world's attention.

What we can sincerely say is, that we listened to the whole with great, with unexpected pleasure. Regarding the performance from no conventional or absolutely musical point of view, but simply as an entertainment sui generis, as a form of Art quite novel and peculiar, to-wit, the illustration of a poem, based on wild Indian life, by means of instruments and voices, with the aid of recitation, we found it deeply interesting to the end. There was a wild, romantic charm about it, entirely, at it seemed to us, in keeping with the poem. We enjoyed the music quite as much as we enjoy the poem. We never could admire the "Song of Hiawatha" so much as some other poems of its author. Perhaps our difficulty is with Indian subjects altogether. In spite of their picturesque life, and their romantic legends, there is a certain monotony, a certain faded, superannuated sort of feeling, that comes over us in reading of them. This savage, dying out life lacks just that germinal vitality out of which poetry, and certainly all music springs. Hence we felt with "C. J. T." that this music was somewhat monotonous, while, at the same time it seemed all the truer therein to the poem; and therefore its success or unsucess could scarcely be a full test of the musical creative powers of the composer in the truest sense.

But while it was monotonous it was also interesting, in many parts beautiful, and not without a wild, peculiar charm. Of form and treatment there was variety enough; the monotony consisted rather in the absence throughout of what we should call imaginative vitality. A man may be a fine musician, (as Mr. Stöpel plainly is), and have a fine poetic temperament, and yet lack that; it belongs to the great men; it is an attribute of that which is the rarest thing in this world, genius. The only work we know of in the same form is the "Desert" by Felicien David: and we must say that we enjoyed "Hiawatha" far more than we did that. "Hiawatha" seemed to us to have more meat in it; more musical material; more thought; more wealth of color; more variety. The instrumental portions were what pleased us most. Indeed Mr. Stöpel shows himself a master of orchestral combinations; he is at home there, to say the least.

The opening snatches of instrumental music were suggestive of the poetic images, the forest stillness, the rising smoke, &c.; and the "Song of the Great Spirit" is a grave, appropriate melody, with fit orchestral background, delivered with taste, but without telling weight of voice by Mr. WETHERDEE. The chorus No. 2, has a sweet melodious kind of motive, warmly colored by the instruments, but not particularly striking, although there are nice effects in the orchestra. The suggestion of starlight in high violin tones was delicate and pure. The "Cradle Song," a simple, tender melody, a little commonplace, was beautifully sung by Mrs. HARWOOD. The "Canoe building song," is a spirited, quaint Barcarole, not, perhaps, particularly original in its theme, but set off brightly by the orchestra. It was effectively sung by Mr. MILLARD, and we wondered that it was not encored like the other solos.

The "Fight with Mudjekeewis," was a very impressive instrumental piece, beginning with strange Indian-like balancings and approaches, as of first one party and then the other, indicated by short, rude, ponderous phrases, which are worked up with effective imitations, till the conflict becomes grand and exciting, and the piece ends with smart, crisp, fiery chords, reiterated with all the force of the instruments, in a manner that might remind one a little of one of Beethoven's fiery overtures, say Coriolanus. This seemed to us the best piece. The "Wooing" Trio, is full of ingenuity, and doubtless of beauty, which was marred in the performance.

The "Beggar Dance," in its opening "solemn measure" is thoroughly Indian, barren of course of all but rhythm, and yet worked up to be musically interesting; the jig-like movement into which it led sounded a little too familiar; the Indians must have known rum and white men before they danced to such tunes. The "Love Song" won great applause, and is really a charming serenade. There was something choice and delicate, and really poetic, as it struck us, in the music of the "Blessing of the Cornfield,"—something mystical, and yet innocent, as it should be. And after this the "Ravens" come in with their quaint, cawing, saucy phrases with most effective contrast. The chorus, though, of male voices, wanted rehearsal. This is a thing scarcely to be secured here to a degree requisite to the fair representation of a new work; and this was one of the many obstacles which Mr. S. had had to contend with. The "Harvest Chorus" is beautifully natural and simple in its motive, and not common-place. "Winter" and the "Ghosts" is the one scene where the poem rises to sublimity. We thought the orchestral picture very true, and the chorus which followed exceedingly impressive and mournful, commenced by the sopranos on a high pitch, admirably prepared by contrast in the low and sombre instrumental harmonies. The "Death Song" was touching, and the "Return of Spring" chorus, while it reminded one very strongly of the opening of Spohr's "Consecration of Tones" Symphony, by its bird-imitations, &c., by the way in which the leading melody sets out, is yet original, and broad and noble. Its fault was only too great length, too many returns of the theme.

The readings by Mrs. STÖPEL were finely conceived, and sometimes touchingly dramatic. But to our taste, plain, simple reading, without action, would be more appropriate, leaving all the coloring of the poet's idea to the music. There was something very pleasant, and which at once commanded respect, in the thoroughly sympathetic and earnest manner in which the lady entered with her whole heart into the production of her husband's work. And he, too, claimed the most respectful attention, by the modest, gentlemanly, firm and quiet air with which he presided over the performance of his own work. He showed himself an excellent conductor. So that altogether it was a unique, a refined, artistic, intellectual occasion.

These are mere hints of first impressions—cautious, as we think they should be. We purposely abstain from entering into a critical analysis of the work. Our object now is simply to show that "Hiawatha" merits to be performed again, many times, and that it fairly claims that much more general and appreciative hearing which we are sure it must have when it is repeated. We are glad to learn that it is the composers's intention to produce it here again within a few weeks.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Need we remind our readers of CARL ZERRAHN'S first Orchestral Concert at the Music Hall this evening? This is the occasion which most of all others, under our musical circumstances, deserves a full house and the most liberal patronages. The really important "events" in a community not more advanced in music than we are, are not the rarest novelties, not the productions of new works, new experiments, but whatever tends to the institution, permanently, of opportunities of hearing and knowing the acknowledged master-works of musical genius. We could better afford never to hear a new play, than we could to go on in ignorance of Shakspeare. So in music, we want to make it sure that we shall always have the chance to hear the Symphonies of BEETHOVEN, &c. Such chances must depend in future on the support we give to enterprises like Mr. Zerrahn's. Let every real music-lover go to-night. Give the thing a good start. Then we shall get more and more of the best sort of music. Read his programme in another column. The "Pastoral Symphony," the overtures, &c., are surely rich attraction. And there will be besides the opportunity of listening for the first time to an American lady who has won much fame both in this country and in Europe by her vocal powers. A special train will convey passengers out to Brookline after the concert. . . . The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB's concert last night, was too late for notice in this number. . . . The HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION hold their annual meeting at the Revere House on Monday evening. Members will please notice advertisement, which was accidentally omitted in our last.

About Old Books.

BERLIN, DEC. 3, 1858. This letter is all about old books—mostly queer old good-for-nothing things, but on the whole not unpleasant to see if you are fond of old specimens of printing.

One of the 'hobbies' of our country newspapers is an old book. Somebody happens to get sight of a Bible, or a Latin or Greek book, two centuries old, and a description of it goes into the next village newspaper, and this is copied far and wide—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Now in general these are only cases of the discovery of mares' nests, with very large eggs. Still the feeling, which lies at the bottom of these articles is one with which I heartily sympathize. I have loved an old book from childhood, and remember now how I pored over the Life of Prince Eugene of Savoy, when but seven or eight years of age—not because I care for Eugene, and Malborough, and the Emperor, and all those old fellows, so much as because the book was more than a hundred years old! The idea is among our people that books of three to four centuries of age are very rare, and the old Thomas Aquinas (about 1470) in Harvard College Library is one of the most interesting books there to visitors in general. They have an idea also that such books are very costly—far beyond the means of private individuals—schools, town libraries, and the like. For my own part I believe that every library should have one or two really old books, even though not a person who uses the collection could read them. Such things beget an interest in old literature, they bring up a hundred subjects of inquiry—and give in some sort a standard of comparison by which to judge of literary antiquity. Suppose in the library of the Normal School at Framingham, or the town library at Natick, the Aquinas just mentioned was to be seen—it would soon become a familiar example of ancient printing to many, who have never seen anything of half its age and probably never will.

Now, in regard to the expense of obtaining copies of old works. Except in a few cases, which are not likely to occur to any of us, mere antiquity does not give a book any high value; the great prices paid oftentimes for books, consisting only of some half a dozen leaves, depend upon other circumstances. Let me give some examples of books which have met my eye while examining catalogues of antiquarian booksellers for musical works. The first that I open to is a book for sale in this city. It consists of only 8 pages, small quarto, six or eight inches square perhaps. There is a copy of it in the College Library at Cambridge, and in one or two other American libraries. I think the Cambridge copy cost £20—about $100. Why should this have such a value? Because it is the letter of Columbus, "de Insulis nuper inventis," (concerning the Islands lately discovered) printed in Latin in 1493—a few months only after the discovery. The price of the copy for sale here is $75 of our money. Now another bookseller here has one of Aquinas' works, a great folio volume of a thousand pages or more—it was printed before they numbered the pages—ten years older than the Columbus book—1453—a five-dollar bill would buy it, and more too.

On another catalogue I find a Dutch book—"Beschrijvinge van Virginia, Nieuw Nederlandt, Nieuw Engelandt, &c." This has a map and pictures—printed in 1657,—and van der Douck's "Beschrijvinge van Nieuw Nederlandt" 2d edition 1656. For a perfect copy of the first, $125 have been paid, and for the second $100. These are perfect copies—what price if any is set to them I do not know. Now these books have a historical value, and are very rare—especially good handsome copies with the maps and pictures perfect.

On the other hand look at the following list:—Albertus Magnus, 'Opus de misterio missae'—a great folio, printed at Ulm 1473—within 25 years after the invention of printing—and nearly as many before the discovery of America by Columbus. Sold in England for over $21. Albertus Magnus—De landibus B. V. Mariae—printed about 1470—another copy of the same printed at Nuremberg about 1472—both great folios.

Thomas Aquinas—prima pars Secundoe—Mentz, P. Schriber—1471,—Note this! The inventors of Printing were Gutenberg, Faust and Schaeffer—and the first printing office was at Mentz—or Mayence. Here then is a book from the original printing office.

Bonaventura, Speculum B. V. Mariae, another folio, 1470. Bronnerde, Opus trivium, &c., &c., an old Latin civil law book, I guess, of nearly 600 pages, printed at Cologne before 1470. Carcano, 'Sermones,' &c., a quarto volume about as thick as the last, printed at Venice about 1472.

Cassiodorus,—'Historical tripartite ex Socrate,' &c., &c., an old Latin translation in XII books—first edition 1472.

Duns Scotus, 'Opus Anglicum,' 1474; Eusebius Pampbilus, Venice, 1473; Gallen, 1475; Gesta Romanorum, German translation, 1489; Saint Gregor, Dialogorum, 4 books, about 1472; Petrarca Fr. 'De Contemptu mundi,' about 1572, and "De remediis utriusque fortunae", same date.

I name these few books as specimens only. Not one of them is priced at more than $15 American money most at less than $5. What makes such books sell at such high prices in America is the difficulty of collecting them and getting them across the ocean on the one hand, and the ignorance of the purchaser of their real value. Some of the books in this list are five hundred miles away—probably most of them are sold by this time. If not, and I wished to get them, I must apply to some Antiquarian bookseller, who is known to those in other cities, give him the money to send, with his order, for the book. If the book is there it is forwarded—in process of time. Germans do not hurry matters. If not, in the lapse of ages my money comes back again. So here are postages and package express charges to be paid. Now it will never pay to send a single volume—a great thick folio, to America. If, however, thirty or forty such are ordered, then by sending them in one large box, the expense divided among the purchasers is not much.

When I came home in 1856, I had had a long discussion with myself whether to bring some twenty bibles of which I had a list, no one of which was under three hundred years old—some in Latin, some in German, some in both, some with pictures and some without—and which, when in Boston, would have cost me, (original prices, collecting, packing, freight, duties, &c.,) on an average about $5 each—some half that, others twice that. I presume a hundred persons said to me afterwards: "Why didn't you bring them? I would gladly give ten dollars for such a bible!"

Why I did not bring them is easily answered. To go into such a speculation requires time, capital, risk and labor, which I have not—had not then—at command.

Certain works bearing upon the history of Calvinistic psalmody have been objects of pursuit to me for five years. In searching catalogues from all parts of central Europe in the hope of at length coming upon them, (they are books which I have sought in vain for in the great libraries of Berlin, Dresden, Leipzig, Halle, Goettingen, Hanover, Wolfenbüttel!) I find continually such old works as in the list above, and know how gladly many a friend at home would give space in his library to one or two of them as curiosities. The difficulty is to get them. The trouble lies not in the original cost of the books, but the heavy tolls taken by every bookseller, carrier and agent, through whose hand they pass.

Now noted some fifty volumes—mostly huge great folios—a small wheelbarrow load each—all printed before the discovery of America by Columbus, within a half century of the invention of printing; of these, probably half are still to be obtained, at prices which would bear all the expenses of getting them to America, and then not come to more than from $5 to $10 each—perhaps less. But this could only be, in case a good box full could be sent at once.

It is curious how the Jew antiquarians of Germany feel at once the increased demand for any particular class of books. In 1851, I could buy pamphlets—the original editions of sermons and tracts by Luther, printed from 1517 to 1547, for 17 to 37 cents of our money. Some three or four Americans, seeing mine, began to buy. When four years later I wished to buy some more, the prices had more than doubled, and I thought myself fortunate the other day in getting the old German copy (1522) of Martin Luther's reply to "König Heinrichs von Engelland buch," Henry VIII's book, which gained him and Queen Victoria too, for that matter, the title of "defender of the faith,"—together with the tract, published immediately after Luther's death in 1546, containing a minute account of his last hours—fortunate, I say, in getting these two tracts for many times what they would have cost me a few years ago.

Speaking of Luther tracts—among those I brought home in 1856, was one—the only copy I ever saw, and which $10 would hardly have bought of me—printed immediately after Luther's departure from the famous Diet at Worms—containing an account of all that he did during his last forty-eight hours in Worms, and printed as an antidote to the falsehoods spread abroad by the other party. The friend who borrowed that, is requested to return it to the editor of the Journal of Music for me.

Thus far there has been no great call for books which are merely curious to us as antiquities, and it would be easy for me to fill out orders sent through Mr. Dwight to the number of at least forty or fifty volumes. I should be glad to do this. Old Bibles have become much rarer than they were four years ago, and the prices of them, especially those containing wood cuts, have risen in a pretty large ratio. In one of the catalogues, however, is a very rare Psalter, Latin and German, printed at Basle, by M. Furter, in 1503—a small quarto, with manuscript notes on the margin—for three or four dollars. Is this in the fine collection of Bibles on Dana Hill?

While looking over a catalogue yesterday which is very rich in ante-Columbus books, memory recalled the hundreds of delighted faces I have seen bending over the old Aquinas in the Cambridge library, and the tones of voice in which I have so often heard the words so slowly and wonderingly spoken—"1469! before the discovery of America by Columbus! Oh! how old!!" And it occurred to me to sit down and just talk the matter over a little with my friends—the readers of Dwight's Journal; and here, friends, you have the result.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

FROM A CHARMING, NOBLE LADY. (Nobil donna e tanto.) "Huguenots." 25

This is the famous aria d'entrata of the Page in the first act. It is one of the few pieces in this opera, which permit of a transfer from the stage. It abounds in pearly runs and sparkling cadences, which are thrown out playfully from the mere exuberance of spirits, and are eminently fitting the character of the whole.

LET ME WHISPER IN THINE EAR. M. W. Balfé. 25

THE JOY OF LOVING THEE. W. Maynard. 25
Pleasing and easy parlor songs.

THE GREEN TREES WHISPERED LOW AND MILD.
Poetry by Longfellow. M. W. Balfé. 35

This is quite a success on the part of Balfé, and may be classed with the same author's "Come into the garden, Maud," among the best modern light concert songs. Mrs. Wentworth, who sang it at the last soiree of the Quintette Club, has thus given an opportunity to a very critical audience to pass an unanimous verdict of satisfaction.

Instrumental Music.

THE NEW CALEDONIAN QUADRILLES. Arranged with the original and correct figures. J. S. Knight. 30

This is an authentic edition of this, at the present moment, fashionable set of Quadrilles. Persons desiring to procure a copy, should be careful to call for the New Caledonians, as there are several copies in circulation which have not the correct figures.

GOLDEN STREAM VARSOVIANA. Montgomery. 25
MIDNIGHT VARSOVIANA. " 25

Two more of these favorite modern parlor-dances by Montgomery, whose Varsovias are almost exclusively used in England by orchestras and at the piano.

LIBIAMO NE LIETI CALICI, from "Traviata." Arranged for four hands. R. Nordmann. 50

SEMPRE LIHERA, from "Traviata." " 50

NOI SIAMO ZINGARELLE. (Gipsy Chorus.) From "Traviata." R. Nordmann. 30

Three more of a series of excellent arrangements of the principal beauties of this opera for two performers.

LUISA MILLER. Valse de Salon. C. D'Albert. 60

A good waltz of medium difficulty, embracing all the popular airs in this opera, which, during the last London season, with Mlle. Piccolomini in the principal role has rapidly grown a favorite with the English public.

THE NEW MUSICAL ALPHABET.—Containing one hundred Exercises in one position of the hands, for juvenile pianists, and intended to precede any book of instruction. By C. Chauvieu. 25

This is intended to prepare children from the age of four years for the study of the piano, and lay a sure foundation for their correctly acquiring the mechanism of playing. Mothers, even those who know but little of music, may, with this alphabet and the musical catechism, fit their children to take lessons from a master without loss of time.

"Out in the Cold."

BY J. S. ADAMS.

With blue cold hands, and stockingless feet,
Wandered a child in the cheerless street.
Children were many, who, housed and fed,
Lovingly nestled, dreaming in bed,
Caroled their joy in a land of bliss
Without a thought or a care of this.
They were warm in Humanity's fold,
But this little child was out in the cold—
Out in the cold.

Bleak blew the wind through the cheerless street,
Dashing along the merciless sleet;
All furred and shawled, man, woman and child,
Hurried along, for the storm grew wild.
They could not bear the icicle blast
Winter so rude on their pathway east.
Alas, none pitied—no one consoled
This little wanderer out in the cold—
Out in the cold.

She had no father—she, no mother,
Sister none, and never a brother.
They had passed on to star-worlds above,
She remained here with nothing but love.
"Nothing but love"—ah, men did not know
What wealth of joy that child could bestow.
So they went by, and worshipped their gold,
Leaving the little one out in the cold—
Out in the cold.

Wandered she on till the shades of night
Veiled her shivering form from sight,
Then, with her cold hands over her breast,
She prayed to her Father in heaven for rest.
When hours had fled, 'neath the world's dark frown,
Hungered and chilled she lay herself down—
Lay down to rest while the wealthy rolled
In carriages past her out in the cold—
Out in the cold.

Out in the cold, lo, an angel form
Brought her white robes that were rich and warm.
Out in the cold, on the sleeping child,
The sainted face of a mother smiled.
A sister pressed on her brow a kiss,
Led her 'mid scenes of heavenly bliss;
And angels gathered into their fold,
That night, the little one out of the cold—
Out of the cold.

A MONUMENT TO WEBER.

Berlin, Dec. 27, 1858.

Dear Dwight:—Here is a letter from CARL MARIA VON WEBER to FREDERIC KIND, author of the text to "Der Freyschütz," the "Wild Huntsman."

Berlin, June 21, 1821.

My much loved Friend and Cofather!

We may fire a salvo for victory. The Wild Huntsman has hit the centre of the target. It is to be hoped that Friend Hellwig,* an eye-witness, has already given you a better report than I can, whose time is completely stolen from me. Besides, I shall soon be able to tell you all about it in person. The second performance last evening went off as splendidly as the first, and the enthusiasm was again equally great. For to-morrow, the third performance, already not a ticket is to be had. Nobody remembers having seen a new opera so received, and since the "Olimpia," † for which everything was done, it is really the most perfect triumph a man can experience. You have no idea how deep an interest pervades the whole, and how splendidly playable and singable all parts are. What would not I have given to have had you present! Many of the scenes were far more effective than I expected—for instance, the appearance of the bridesmaids. The overture and that popular song‡ were demanded da capo. However, I would not allow the progress of the action to be impeded. The newspapers will now, no doubt, break loose. I hope to enclose the first, of to-day, in this. The rest I can as well bring with me, as I expect to give my concert on Monday the 25th, and on the first of July to be again in Dresden. This bad weather will probably prevent you from leaving for Töplitz before that time, so that I may see you in Dresden and tell you all, for in truth such matters cannot be described. Besides I am so full, that I don't know anything to write. What thanks I owe you, my dear Kind, for this noble poem! To what a variety of expression did you give me opportunity, and with what delight could I pour out my soul upon your noble verses so full of deep feeling! I embrace you in imagination with feelings really deeply touched, and will bring you one of the beautiful wreaths which I owe to your muse and which you must hang up with those which you have previously earned in such numbers.

Gabitz, § Wolf, etc., treat me very kindly. As to Hoffmann|| I am still curious. People warn me against him; but I will believe the best as long as I can.

Now a joyful farewell for to-day. I will also write a line or two to Schmedl and Roth. Habeat Sibi. God prosper you, and still love—as he most respectfully loves you infinitely—your WEBER.

So wrote Weber in the joy of his heart, in the midst of a musical triumph such as few composers have known. Nor did he, during the few years he lived after the first performance of the Freyschütz, ever have the sorrow of hearing that it failed of fullest success upon any stage large or small where it was produced—and where was it not produced?

The boys in the streets of German, English and American cities sang and whistled its beautiful melodies. BEETHOVEN, the grandest of all then living composers, read the score with approbation.

More than thirty-seven years have passed away, and the musical public of Germany is at last earnestly bent upon erecting a monument at Dresden in honor of Weber. For this object "Der Freyschütz" was given in the opera-house in Berlin, on the evening of Dec. 22d—the house in which it was first given; moreover, the first opera given in the house, which had just been rebuilt after the fire in which the decorations of Hoffmann's Undine were destroyed.

It was the three hundred and first performance of the opera! and the occasion was made quite a musical festival. I was unluckily kept at home by a Joh's comforter—not the wife—in my ear, and must depend upon others for my account of it.

The house was crowded—it always is when this opera is given, except in the high-priced fashionable boxes!

The evening opened with Weber's "Jubilee Overture," followed by a prologue spoken by an actor, and which introduced a series of tableaux vivants. There were members of "Lützow's wild hunt"—the black Jaegers of Brunswick, which recalled the composition of Körner's "Lyre and Sword" by Weber. Then the song of "Preciosa," to a picture of gipsy life; Max and Agatha, from "Der Freyschütz"; Euryanthe and Adolar, from Euryanthe; Oberon protecting Huon and Regia, from the Oberon. These recalled to the audience the principal dramatic works of the composer and were received with hearty applause. Then the cloud, which hung down about the middle of the stage, parted, and there stood a bronze statue of WEBER, about which were grouped all the tableaux which had previously been seen. Each of them had been accompanied by soft music from horns, with all sorts of turns, modulations and melodic strains, characteristic of the master. Amid a perfect storm of applause the curtain was raised a second time upon the grand final scene.

Then came the 301st performance of "Der Freyschütz" upon the stage where it had its birth. The parts, even to the least important, were upon this occasion taken by the principal singers. Madame KOESTER was the Agathe; Mad. HERRENBURG-TUCZEK the Annchen; FORMES—brother of Carl F.—the Max; FRICKE, the Caspar; KRAUSE, SALOMON and BOST, the lesser parts. The result was, if I may believe the newspapers, magnificent—and I can readily believe it.

I have a faint, indistinct recollection of seeing in my childhood the announcements of "Der Freyschütz" in the Boston papers. At a later period I saw somewhere a large volume of play-bills from one or more of the Boston theatres, and it is my impression that one of them announced this opera as a play or melodrama for the 101st time. Moreover, I recollect distinctly being told a few years since, that an American medical student, being in 1821, or about that time, in Germany, was so taken with Weber's opera, as to purchase the score, obtain the text in full, and that from this copy the play was arranged to suit the capacity of the Boston stage at that time. That medical student is a leading physician in Boston now—or was not long since. Can he not be induced to give us an account of this matter? It is a part of Boston musical history which should not be lost.

ZELTER.

On the 14th Dec. the Sing-Akademie noticed the centennial anniversary of ZELTER's birthday. Every student of German literature knows him as the correspondent of GOETHE for many a long year. Musical people know him for his popular songs, and his four-part pieces for men's voices, as the head of the Sing-Akademie for many years, and as the music teacher of MENDELSSOHN. Many of the readers of this Journal will remember how often he writes to Goethe of the progress "Felix" is making. To the Berlin people, for half a century, down to 1832, he was known in a different sphere fully as well as in the musical world. He has monuments standing to his honor throughout the city—for he was one of the best masons and brick-layers of the capitol.

Carl Friedrich Zelter was born Dec. 11, 1758. His father was a mason and from the first determined that his son should follow him in his trade. He was wise enough to see that with the growth of the city, which the energetic measures of Frederick II.—Carlyle's hero—could not fail to result in, his son must be more than a mere bricklayer, if he would, in after life, hold an honorable place. The boy was therefore put into the Joachimthal Gymnasium, where he went through the full course. Private instructors were also provided for him in drawing, mathematics and music. Oddly enough, for the latter he had hardly any sense for aught better than a march or a dance. In his seventeenth year he was put regularly to his trade. The next year he suffered a long and severe sickness, during which so strong a sense for music awoke in him that, upon his recovery, his repugnance to his trade was only to be overcome by his father by force and by depriving him of his music.

What his father would not allow him to do openly, he did secretly. He was wise enough to see that his only hope lay in making himself independent. He therefore wrought at his trade with most persevering diligence, and once a week went out to Potsdam, some 24 English miles, to take a music lesson of Fasch, then in the service of the king. To this view of his case and this mode of gratifying his taste, however, he had not come at once. Long and severe had been the struggle with his father—a contest which at times embittered both their lives. But peace was made and, when 25 years of age, Zelter was able to enter into the guild of the masons, become a 'Master' and set up business for himself, to the great joy of his father, who spared nothing for his son's welfare. But now Zelter found himself forced to continue his business until he could depend upon his musical attainment for subsistence, and as time passed on and he became reconciled to his position, music gradually became not exactly a secondary thing, but something to share his time and thoughts, not occupy them exclusively.

Fasch at length (1783) made Berlin his home, thenceforth spending a few weeks in the year only at Potsdam, and devoting himself to severe musical study and to his pupils. Reichardt had brought from Italy a Mass in 16 parts by Benevoli, which had taken an extraordinary hold upon the fancy of Fasch, and led him to attempt a similar work and one which should be free from certain faults of that by the Italian. An attempt to produce his work at Potsdam failed, as the singers there knew nothing of chorus singing; so did another attempt in Berlin with the opera singers. He determined to try it with his pupils, though not enough in number to fill the parts in the full combined chorus.

By degrees the number of his singers increased. Among them was Zelter with his fine bass voice. In the summer of 1790, when they met in a summer-house in a garden, near the so-called "Spittelbrücke," near the centre of the city, the number was seldom more than twelve or sixteen. On the 24th of May, 1791, twenty-eight persons met at the house of Widow Voitus, No. 59 Unter-den-Linden—and this day is considered by its members as the birthday of the Berlin Sing-Akademie.

Fasch's idea of a 16 part composition was this: that it should consist of four four-part choruses, having a similar relation to each other; that, in the single chorus the four parts have. To distinguish his four choirs, he gave them a separate color, and Zelter on one occasion—Oct. 27, 1791, appeared as the only tenor in the blue, his voice having, as it appears, changed.

As Fasch's health failed, Zelter, whom he had so long known, and who was so filled with his spirit, aided him in conducting the Akademie. January 24th, 1799, the Society celebrated the birthday of Frederick II, and numbered 39 sopranos, 20 altos, 17 tenors and 18 basses. Sunday, Aug. 3, 1800, Fasch died, and from that time to his death, Zelter was director of the Sing-Akademie. I have said so much about Fasch, because, in most English and American references to Zelter, he is called the founder of this celebrated society, which, as I have shown, he by no means was.

Zelter's songs, and especially his comic songs, are considered to be among the best that Germany possesses. He founded two or three "Liedertafel" Singing Societies for men's voices, and wrote many of the best things for them to sing. His church music is altogether in Fasch's style, showing more learning than genius.

He was an intimate friend of Fichte as well as of Goethe, was elected member of the Academy of Science, and received the title of Professor from the King. He was twice married, and the father of eleven children. He was a rough old fellow, extremely witty, and given to all sorts of odd and droll remarks. I may perhaps some time collect some of the anecdotes which are still told of him. Dehn had a store of them.

The news of Goethe's death quite broke the heart of the now old man of 74. On the 15th of May, 1832, he died.

In middle life, after the death of his father, Zelter divided his time between his business and art, by devoting his mornings to study—especially of Bach and Hasse—the middle of the day to riding about the city to examine the progress his numerous laborers were making, sometimes taking hold himself—the evenings to music. His last years he gave to literature and Art alone. He wrote a good deal in musical and other periodicals, published a short biography of Fasch, an essay on Haydn's compositions, and the like.

Probably to no one person more than to Zelter is Berlin indebted for its present position as being the principal seat of music in central—perhaps in all Europe.

A. W. T.

Robert Stöpel's Hiawatha.

(From the Boston Courier, Jan. 13.)

The musical composer in America does not rest upon a bed of roses. Whatever hardships he may have to endure elsewhere, his position here is even less encouraging. In countries where musical education is known among the people, he has the satisfactory assurance, to soften the many evils he must bear, that he shall be fairly judged by his works, that he will be promptly appreciated, and that such claims to greatness as he may put forth will be recognized. How different here! Our musical taste is not equal to the formation of an opinion, nor our confidence to the expression of one. We accept with calmness the offerings of the Old World, but shrink from the responsibility of uttering a judgment for ourselves. Not only is this true with the public; it is even more true with the assumed teachers of the public. Where we should look for helps we find too often hindrances to the progress of musical feeling among us. Journalism is not beyond reproach. How wide the distance between what it does, and what it might do for Art. Of all arts, music is least unknown to us, and what is our musical criticism, with its shameful discordance of opinion, and its reckless ignorance, but a scandal and a reproach? It is not equal to the humblest of its duties, yet it boldly approaches the highest, and rudely defiles with immodest touch the finest creations of the human mind. Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

It is against this certainty of misappreciation that composers in America have found it, and will find it most difficult to struggle. The toils of years, the unrewarded labors, the slights of friends, the sneers of foes, the many disappointed yearnings, could all be compensated at the last, by one burst of sympathy from the world. Here, unfortunately, that sympathy can not be expressed. Our public fears to show a warmth that might be deemed imprudent. Our Boston, our New York and our Philadelphia must not be compromised. Who can calculate the consequences of either of those cautious cities "putting its foot in it" in a matter of taste? Of their musical valor, the better part is discretion. The composer, whatever his merit, can hope but for little at their hands, and that little will generally be vouchsafed him by the uncritical and musically unenlightened portion of the community.

We do not thus introduce the few words we have to say of Mr. Stöpel's "Hiawatha" because of any special suffering that he has been forced to endure. The truth is, that his work was received with a warmth quite unusual, and was welcomed with a newspaper approval which showed how deep a general impression it had made, and which would have been found gratifying to observe, had anything besides the baldest and flattest generalities of praise been uttered. Our object is to show the magnitude of the obstacles that stand in the way of a composer who tries to secure a proper public appreciation of his labors, and the position of Mr. Stöpel affords us as good an illustration as we could desire. Here is a young man who has passed his life from his earliest years in the most assiduous study of his art. For a long while he has held a position of prominence in France and England. His works have enjoyed the extremest popularity in those countries. Coming to America, he seizes upon a subject for musical illustration. Two years he occupies in its preparation. The mere physical labor of writing his score is a Herculean task apart from the composition itself. At length it is finished; it is sumptuously produced, with every possible advantage that energy and enterprise can secure, in a city which appears to be the fittest place for its production; and the composer is rewarded for his exertions and anxieties by a pecuniary loss exceeding one thousand dollars, and a public expression of adulation which loses its force from the fact that it is meaningless.

We do not at all know how Mr. Stöpel regards the reception of his work, but for ourselves, we are not satisfied with it. At the performance it was evident that all present were delighted; but many hesitated to express their delight at an unknown production by an unknown hand. The newspaper writers, at least, recorded the fact of a decided triumph. But after that, of what value was all their praise? What idea of the work itself was to be gathered from all that was written about it, excepting only one or two really carefully appreciative notices? Who could judge of the rank, among the world's compositions, to which this one was entitled, from the comments put into print about it? It is useless to ask. The answer must always be alike discreditable to the manufacturers of musical reviews in our city.

We would, then, undertake to give a more exact description of Mr. Stepel's composition, than it appears to have received. A work of so much importance should not be passed lightly by. That it deserves much closer and more careful critical attention than we have time or space to bestow upon it, we are firmly convinced. We shall nevertheless endeavor to explain in some measure, the intentions of the composer, and how he has succeeded in carrying them out.

First, a word of the performance. It might have been better every way. The orchestra approached the nearest to perfection, but sometimes slipped into a looseness that interfered with the effect of the work. The great success of the production, however, was due the orchestra, the members of which played with true enthusiasm, an enthusiasm that was more directly exhibited at the first rehearsal, when they rose and repeatedly cheered the composer. The vocal solos were by Mrs. Harwood, Mr. Millard and Mr. Wetherbee. The lady sang her "Cradle Song" as well as was possible, and her last tragic air with much dramatic effect. Mr. Millard, we are sure, could have done better in all that he attempted, although his singing was not without taste and spirit; he did not appear to be animated with the real sentiment of the music. Mr. Wetherbee's voice was unfavorable to the character of the music he had to sing, but his performance was expressive and dignified. The trio was altogether marred by the incorrectness with which it was sung. Of the choruses it is only possible to say that some were less badly given than others. We cannot understand the objections urged against the readings by Mrs. Stepel. The great point appears to be that she was unheard by those who sat at a distance from her. This is without doubt true, but it simply proves that her voice is not over-powerful, and has nothing to do with the readings, which were exquisite. Some of the effects she introduced were incomparably beautiful and poetic. They added much to the interest of the entertainment.

Before speaking of the music of "Hiawatha," it is proper to consider what the composer has undertaken to do. The selection of such a work as Longfellow's "Hiawatha" for illustration was a bold step. Few subjects could present greater difficulties. To apply descriptive music to the Indian legends which Mr. Longfellow has poetically idealized is a task to shrink from. The little Indian music that we know of, furnishes a very slight foundation for the composer to work upon. It is vague, rude, destitute of form or expression, and significant only of savage wildness. To preserve the spirit of these weird melodies, and at the same time to present a musical picture full of animation and vigor, Mr. Stepel did not hesitate to attempt. Even here his difficulties did not cease. In the poem, the structure of the verse is always the same; the rhythm does not change throughout. In putting music to such words, it was, of course, no easy matter to avoid repetition of the measures; but we find that the composer has succeeded in introducing an entirely different rhythmical character in each piece, while also expressing with extreme exactness the sense of the words themselves. Mr. Stepel has selected from the poem, those portions which directly relate to the career of the Indian prophet—his advent, his mission, his exploits, his departure. The work commences with the appeal of the Great Spirit, and the announcement of the coming of Hiawatha. The story of the prophet's birth is related, and the principal points of his life are depicted, to the end. The only variation from the strict unity of the work is at the close, where, after the earthly life of Hiawatha has terminated, a joyous chorus of the Return of Spring is introduced, to brighten the closing scenes.

The first number of "Hiawatha" is "The Peace-Pipe." The violins, muted, and led by the violoncellos, are heard in soft and mysterious tones, while the flutes, hautboys and clarinets break in with bits of pastoral melodies, which are more fully developed as the work progresses. As the opening bars of introduction sink into silence, the quick pizzicatos of the string instruments suggest, as it were, the puffing of the great Peace-Pipe. The rising of the smoke is indicated by the violins and subsequently by the reed instruments, rushing upwards in thirds, until, gathering strength as it ascends, it "breaks against the heaven" in a vast volume of sound, swaying and swelling, with the fullest force of the orchestra; an effect magnificently wrought. The "Song of the Great Spirit" follows,—an imposing chant, mainly accompanied by the softest possible notes of the trombones, but at each climax supported by a crash of all the instruments. Towards the close, a minute figure is interwoven with the accompaniment by the violins, and carried through with increasing effect to the end. As the voice ceases, its last tones are echoed and repeated by certain of the instruments, while the violin figure, and the two opening pastoral phrases are again taken up, and exquisitely put together, the whole closing with the softest breathings of the wood instruments, and low sustained notes of the violins.

The second number is called "The Stars." It describes, with orchestral introduction and chorus, the fall of Nokomis from the heavens, the betrayal of young Wenonah, and the birth of Hiawatha. The glittering of the stars is represented by the delicate movement of the violins, rapidly rising and falling in their highest tones. This idea is gradually extended to the entire orchestra, and finally rests with the reeds, while the violins, in swift chromatic ascents and descents, indicate the "falling of the star." Soon the flowing harmonies resolve themselves into a gentle melody, which is brought out with gradual and increasing effect, until it is taken by the chorus, who sing the words of the poem—"Downward through the evening twilight," &c. The instrumentation of this portion of the work is peculiarly significant. We have found nothing richer or more complete in its way. A fine effect is produced by the voices at the passage, "She was sporting with her women, swinging in a swing of grape-vines." While the sopranos pursue their independent melody, the tenors sing another strain, suggesting precisely the undulations of the swing. The chorus ends with the original theme, and is succeeded by an orchestral reminiscence of the starry scintillations which have preceded it. This number, notwithstanding the extreme beauty of its melodies, and the brilliancy of its instrumentation, must perhaps be considered of less musical importance than almost any in the work; because it shows less than any other the powerful originality and spirit of the composer.

The third number is "The Cradle Song." Old Nokomis rears the infant Hiawatha, and each evening sings to him a little lullaby. This is a simple and beautiful melody, for mezzo-soprano voice. The accompaniment ingeniously and unmistakably represents the rocking of a cradle, and the air itself is peculiarly gentle and soothing in character. It is twice repeated, and is succeeded by the fourth number—

"The Canoe-building Song." This is the most sparkling and dashing piece of the work. The melody is full of animation, and the instrumentation, which is everywhere of the highest order, is here superb. At every point, some little idea of the workmanship of the canoe, as described by the words, is daintily hinted. Each phrase sung by the voice is echoed with indescribable effect. The music never fails to represent the spirit of the words, whether in the gleeful confidence of Hiawatha, or the "sighs of sorrow" with which the trees answer his call. We have heard no barcarol so charming as this one.

The fifth number is "The War Song, and the Fight with Mudjekeewis." Here the descriptive Indian music is first introduced. Hiawatha, learning of his mother's wrongs, journeys to the kingdom of the West Wind to avenge them, and there encounters his father, as told in the story. The number opens with an imitation of the traditional war-song of the Indians, as it is yet heard among them. Three melodic figures are employed, one consisting merely of two notes, falling in fifths, another of three notes, embracing the minor third, and the other of five notes; with these simple materials, varied according to his purposes, the composer has wrought out a most powerful effect. The listener might fancy himself within the wild influence of a horde of untamed savages. We do not know where to look for finer contrapuntal effects, or finer orchestral writing than in this piece, which is decidedly the best of the Symphony. It is not surpassed in any of the works of the recognized masters of the art which we have had opportunity of examining. As the music progresses, the three figures are worked together with effects ever new and exciting, and at length it bursts into the representation of the Fight with Mudjekeewis, which again is a masterpiece of instrumentation. By sharp syncopations the gasps and struggles of the combatants are depicted, and above all, the war-shriek is again and again heard, as if each were spurring himself to greater efforts. The finale is equal to the best of known orchestral compositions.

The sixth number is "The Wooing." Hiawatha, returning, visits the Arrow-maker, and receives Minnehaha as his bride. Hiawatha asks for the maiden; her father, not without some words of complaint, which are cleverly treated by the composer, consents; and the lovers interchange soft words, and other delicacies of the season of youth and beauty. The trio is well put together, and is marked throughout by a peculiar melodic figure, which is effectively repeated by each voice in turn. The close is quite fairy-like.

The seventh number is "The Beggar's Dance," which, at Hiawatha's wedding, "the handsome Pau-Puk-Keewis" dances. This composition is full of drollery. It commences with "a slow and solemn measure," a quaint and abrupt melody, under which another, equally odd, is presently worked. These having been fully developed, the music changes to a swifter measure, in which the lower instruments give constantly the monotonous shuffling of rapid feet, while others chirp forth merry and quaint snatches of melody. The close is somewhat Mendelssohn-like in treatment, but still preserves a complete originality. As the time becomes still swifter, the violoncello is heard once or twice uttering a little cry of fatigue, which is, however, instantly repressed by the indomitable perseverance of the combined orchestral energies. Just at the close, a wild sweep of all the instruments in unison expresses the last frenzies of the dance, as described in the poem.

The eighth number is "The Love Song," which Chibiabos sings at the marriage feast. This is a ballad, for tenor, the melody of which is extremely beautiful, and the refrain so peculiarly touching that it lingers in the memory as the brightest charm of this work full of charms.

The ninth number is "The Blessing of the Corn Fields," the poet's description of which gains a new beauty by the musical illustrations. Minnehaha, at midnight, unclothed, draws the magic circle of her footsteps around the cornfields, to prevent them from blight. As the "War Song" is the most powerful piece of music in the composition, so this is the most serenely beautiful. It opens with a soft and sad melody, for the hautboy, which is taken up by the violoncellos, the bassoons, and subsequently other instruments. The faint tinkling of the triangle does not vulgarize, but helps the effect of this piece. Changing from the minor to the major key, the music assumes a less serious, but still preserves a thoughtful character. Again it falls into a dim mysterious mood, in a passage of delicious little contrapuntal effects, as nearly approaching a fugue as the composer has permitted himself to do, and showing how easily he might have filled his work with learned writing had he chosen, and had such been his purpose.

The tenth number is the "Ravens' Chorus." The Ravens defy the magic circle of Minnehaha, and plot to destroy the fields. In the introduction to the chorus, a quite fiercely fantastic piece, the "rush of wings and cry of voices," are aptly depicted. Here, again, the instrumentation presents many novel and striking points. The chorus, for male voices, is very characteristic. The melody, in one portion, is forcibly sung by the first basses, while the tenors and second bas-ses accompany, some with lengthened harmonies, others with short, sharp laughs. The coda is quite in the style of some operatic finales, the only instance in the whole work where anything like Italian termination can be found.

The eleventh number is "The Harvest Chorus." The first movement is a stream of purest melody; the second, a merry measure, in which the tenors have a simple theme, while the sopranos are chirping away in more fanciful strains. This chorus is one of the brightest gems of the symphony.

The twelfth number is called "The Ghosts:—Famine and Fever. The approach of Winter is first indicated in the introduction, in which all the resources of the orchestra are employed with extraordinary skill. The effect surpasses that of any similar descriptive piece we have met with. The wailing of the winds, the fierce blasts, the cries of despair, are all heard. The chorus is most artistically introduced, by a few heavy and sombre chords, contrasting powerfully with the high notes of the sopranos which are immediately after sung. The chorus itself—"We are ghosts of the departed,"—is the best that the work contains. The music adds a hundred fold to the meaning of the words. It is almost sublime.

The thirteenth number is "The Death Song," in which Minnehaha's death is told. A plaintive melody, by the most plaintive instruments, leads to the air, for mezzo-soprano voice. It is very dramatic, and finely illustrates the words selected. The climax of Minnehaha's anguish is rendered startling by an unexpected harmonic effect, and is succeeded by a soothing melody, in which the old Nokomis strives to calm the terror of the dying woman—a most happy inspiration. At the end, the elegiac tones of the hautboy are again heard, and the piece ends mournfully, upon the wild chord of the diminished seventh.

The fourteenth number is the Introduction and Chorus of "The Return of Spring." The first efforts of reviving Nature are expressed;—the twittering of the birds, the flowing of the stream, the budding of the flowers. The whole introduction is a beautiful pastoral, similar in form to that in Spohr's "Consecration of Tones," but only so in form. The character of the music is essentially different. We seem to find all the elements of returning spring struggling together, and at length breaking the icy bands which have restrained them and bursting forth in a joyful and passionate melody of thanksgiving. The chorus takes up the theme, and carries it blithely through, while the orchestra surrounds the voices with musical pictures of the "rivers rushing onward." The "flowers springing up o'er all the meadows," the "showers of rain, falling warm and welcome." This number, beaming with melody, and rich in orchestral embellishment, delightfully ends the composition.

Mr. Stæpel's "Hiawatha" merits the closest attention of amateurs. No work of such importance has ever been originally produced in this country. No finer work, of its class, has been anywhere produced at any time. It is a perfect illustration of its subject. It is easy to imagine what the composer might do with a more favorable subject. He has in this shown a wealth of melody truly surprising; a profound musical knowledge, equal to any that modern composers have displayed; and a command of instrumentation such as we have found in the writings of but few masters of the art. His pen must not lie idle. That which he has already written—he has in manuscript several operas, symphonies, overtures, &c., some of which have been produced in Europe with undoubted success, as the records show—should be heard, and he should be urged to other efforts. We sincerely trust that he may meet with such encouragement as should be offered to every man of true genius.

A Small and Amusing Flare-up in the New York Academy of Music.

Quite a comical affair, not put down in the bills, as the phrase goes, occurred at the concert given at the Academy of Music, Tuesday evening, in connection with the festival of the St. George Society. The singing of the national anthem, "God save the Queen," as every one knows, is the feature of these occasions, and great pains is always taken that it shall be rendered by the best talent. The programme promised well enough. There were the names of Piccolomini, Caradori and Formes, for solos, and the Liederkranz Society was put down for the choruses. When the time for the Anthem came, there was evidently a screw loose somewhere. The Liederkranz were in their places, waiting anxiously to begin, but the principal performers were wanting. Just as the audience were beginning to grow impatient, the good-natured visage of Formes loomed up in the distance, back of the orchestra, and the rising tumult was stilled. Caradori was with him, but to the astonishment of all Piccolomini was not visible. For a few moments they stood as if they thought "something was coming," when Formes, having handed Mme. Caradori to a seat, retreated a few steps and spoke to the conductor of the orchestra. That individual shook his head in a despairing manner. Formes and Caradori resumed their positions; the signal was given, and the anthem was proceeded with, Formes singing the second verse. But that was not the end of it, for the audience were not to be put off in that manner. Piccolomini was on the programme and Piccolomini they would have. They encored until it seemed as though the little cherubs perched around the first circle would fly from their resting places. Finally Dr. Beales, President of the St. George's Society, appeared, conducting Piccolomini. The applause grew still more deafening, and the lady advancing, stretched out her hand imploringly to the audience, and in a moment they were still. Piccolomini exclaimed: "It is not my fault, it is not my fault!" and Mr. Perring taking his seat at the piano, proceeded to play the accompaniment, Mlle. singing the second verse of the anthem.

What the difficulty was could not be conjectured, but before the programme had progressed much further the fact was pretty prominently developed that Piccolomini and Formes were hardly in the proper frame of mind to perform the parts of Adam and Eve in the oratorio of "The Creation." An air of serio-comic, which detracted considerably from the sublimity of Haydn's conceptions, became ludicrously apparent. Mlle. Piccolomini, Formes, and Perring assumed the characters of Eve, Adam and Uriel respectively, and the oratorio proceeded somewhat after the following manner.

"Uriel—In rosy mantle appears, by tines sweet awaked, the morning young and fair. From the celestial vaults, pure harmony descends on ravished earth. Behold the blissful pair, [Eve tosses her head contemptuously,] where hand and hand they go [she twitches her chair nervously;] their glowing looks express what feels the grateful heart. [Eve casts a look of ineffable disdain upon Adam.] A louder praise of God their lips shall utter soon; then let our voices join united with their song. [In the succeeding duets Adam's and Eve's voices were in better harmony than their feelings. Adam gets out of patience with the leader of the orchestra, and that functionary vents his vexation on his subordinates. The exquisite by-play accompanying the following passages may be imagined but not described.]

ADAM—Graceful consort, thee caressing,
Softly glide the golden hours,
Every moment brings new rapture,
Purest joys o'erflow the heart.

EVE—Spouse adored, with thee conversing, Sensons pass unheeded by;
In thy presence endless pleasure,
In thy love unceasing bliss.

ADAM and EVE—
But what joy to me the morning dew,
The breath of even, the savory fruit, or the fragrant bloom?
With thee is every joy enhanced, with thee delight is ever new;
Thy voice, thy look perpetual love inspires; thou art all to me.

URIEL—O happy pair, happy ever,
If still content, in humble mind, God's sacred Mandate we obey, nor more desire to know
Than he doth grant—

So much for the part of the performances of which the public were witnesses. Now for the transactions behind the scenes:—

Saturday, when the arrangements for the concert were being perfected, Piccolomini expressed a decided preference for singing the second verse of the anthem, as it was the only one she had ever performed, and the only one with which she felt at all acquainted. Formes seemed very desirous of singing the same verse, and at first refused to take any other, but finally waved his preference, as it was understood, in favor of Piccolomini. So matters stood until Tuesday evening, not a hint being thrown out of there being any possibility of a misunderstanding. What was the surprise of the managers of the festival when the anthem was sung by Caradori and Formes, the latter taking the disputed second verse. Some of them, on going behind the scenes, found

Mlle. Piccolomini in a very natural state of excitement at the slight which she felt had been put on her. She said Formes had insisted on singing the second verse, and had finally gone on the stage without having come to any understanding with her. Formes received pretty severe rebukes from all quarters, and refused to listen to the appeals which were made to him to repeat the anthem giving Piccolomini the part she desired. Finally that lady turned to Dr. Beales the President of St. George's, and said to him that if he would escort her upon the stage, she would yet perform the part assigned her. Then the difficulty was to get the orchestra together again. No leader could be found, and the different performers of course, refused to go on the stage unless under his direction. Mr. Perring was appealed to in this emergency to accompany Mlle. Piccolomini with the piano, which, of course, he cheerfully did. The rest of the transaction the public were witnesses of.—*N. Y. Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 17, 1859.—Was it my blunder, or that of your printers, which caused the omission of the programme in my notice of the Philharmonic concert? I fear I am to blame, for though I remember preparing the printed programme for insertion, I have no recollection of inclosing it in my letter, and plead guilty in that case, to great carelessness. Let me make the best amends in my power, by stating now that the Symphony was Beethoven's Seventh, that M^{me}. GRAEVER played a piano Concerto, by Mendelssohn, and Mr. WOLLENHAUPT, that for violin, by the same composer; and that the pieces sung by the two German Singing Societies were the Prisoner's Chorus from Fidelio, and one from Rienzi, by Wagner.

At the Matinée last Tuesday, Norma was substituted for Martha, owing to BRIGNOLI's illness. PICCOLOMINI, in La Serva Padrona, surpassed herself. And how charming is the music of this little operetta! The concert in the evening was, to all accounts, as successful as it was long, and was enlivened by an amusing incident. In "God save the Queen," in which Piccolomini and Formes were announced to sing the solos, M^{me}. CARADORI appeared instead of the former, which change excited vehement demonstrations of displeasure, and noisy calls for Piccolomini. That lady finally appeared, much disturbed, made a few remarks, among which the words: "it is not my fault, it is not my fault," were chiefly distinguishable, and sang a verse of the song in question, to Mr. PERRING's piano accompaniment, as the orchestra and chorus had dispersed. Various reasons are given for this state of affairs; some throw the blame on Caradori, some on Formes, and I cannot vouch for the truth of any report. With the Huguenots on Wednesday, and Traviata, for Piccolomini's benefit, on Thursday, the season closed for the present, and our choir of singing birds has flitted to other climes, to return, however, at Easter, which occurs unusually late this year.

On Saturday M^{me}. ABEL gave a matinée at the Spingler Institute. I am happy to say that the room was crowded, and that all were manifestly delighted with the entertainment. M^{me}. ABEL is indeed, a pianist such as it is rarely our good fortune to hear. She showed her powers on this occasion, in every variety of style. A Duo with Mr. MOLLENHAUER, by Herz and Lafont, a Sonata of Beethoven, part of a concerto by Chopin, and Schullhoff's Carnival de Venice were certainly as wide apart in character as possible, but they were all rendered equally well in their way. M^{me}. Abel has a peculiarly liquid touch; she shapes the notes from her fingers like strings of pearls. In point of force, she is perhaps not quite equal to M^{me}. Graever-Johnson, and in merely brilliant pieces, does not manifest a greater degree of expression than that lady but let her play Chopin or Beethoven, and her soul is roused at once, and there is a fire, an enthusiasm, and a depth of feeling in her performance, which I have seldom met with in an artist of the gentle sex. The Sonata of Beethoven, Op. 10, No. 3, in D, with its passionate restless Allegro, its deeply mournful Largo, its pretty, Haydn-like Minuetto, and sparkling Finale, showed her in her best light. It was only to be regretted that an evident nervousness caused her to hurry the first two movements a little; I have heard her play it in private with more laissez aller, and consequently, to more thorough satisfaction. The movement from Chopin's Concerto was exquisitely rendered, and made the listener long to hear her perform it with the orchestral accompaniment. It is to be hoped that she will play at one of our Philharmonic concerts. In answer to two encors, Mme. Abel played a little piece of Gottschalk, and one of Chopin's loveliest Mazourkas, the last of Op. 33, the latter exquisitely.

MR. MOLLENHAUER and PHIL. MAYER assisted the lady pianists. The latter sang a couple of German songs, in one of which, a little popular melody, "How can I leave thee," his fine voice showed to best advantage, and he was deservedly encored. —t—

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 17. — You should have witnessed the smirk of self-satisfaction which played about the diminutive features of Herr Uhlman, last Friday evening, when the rushing crowds, wedged through the elegant threshold of the Academy, afforded him the pleasurable consciousness that neither the two hundred pennies for admission, nor the veritable London fog and drizzle outside, had served to tarnish or to dampen the prospects of his petite comtesse, PICCOLOMINI. When the Marie of the evening (the opera was La Figlia del Reggimento) tripped across the boards towards the Sergeant (FORMES), her eyes fell upon a vast and costlily attired audience, which presented the appearance of an immense snow-drift, of white Opera shawls, studded with diamonds, sparkling in the rich, mellow light of the pendant bee-hive chandelier, like the crystalline ice-points upon the white winter-shroud, when the sun stands at meridian. No matter what the reputation or the antecedents of a debutante, Philadelphia audiences rarely extend an enthusiastic applause in advance; they generally welcome the claimant for public favor with a round which signifies — "Glad to welcome you here; now let us see what your attainments may be;" and then they lapse into a frigid, critical reserve, which continues to the end, unless the achievements of the artist, either vocally or histrionically, really be such as to warm them into genuine enthusiasm. Thus has it ever been from the days of Jenny Lind unto the present moment; and artists have been known to admit openly their nervous dread of a Philadelphia debut. Boston possesses this feature in common with our city, so far as my own observations have served to indicate me, — whereas in New York people cast themselves in all-surrendering homage before the singer, before that individual has sung a single note, merely upon the foreign reputation, which may have rendered the name illustrious.

Piccolomini shared the same fate here, which has astonished and even confused many of her Art-sisters before her. Gradually, however, when her matchless impersonation of Marie unfolded its fine points apace, with each recurring situation of the plot, people commenced to feel interested when they found art effectually concealed, and the pretty vivandiere the moving spirit which caused the different scenes to pass before them like a charming reality. Up to the execution of Convien partir, the crowded assemblage seemed pleased more with her piquancy, vivacity, mobility of feature and spirit, than with her vocalization of the score; but she threw so much of tender, impassioned feeling and expression into that cavatina, as to touch the heart-strings of each individual, and to elicit a tremendous outburst of enthusiasm after the final note. Connoisseurs, who measure the achievements of artists by certain established criterions of Art, certainly failed to discover that requisite amount of flexibility, compass, breadth, and that unrestrained execution which causes the roulade or the melodic strain to flow quasi-spontaneously, like the gushing notes of a feathered songster singing from an inward bent or instinct; they found not these sufficiently patent to entitle Piccolomini to a place beside divers other highly finished artists; but the natural pathos, tender emotions, and the girlish grief which characterized her adieu to the towering moustaches around her, and which seemed flooding each note of the cavatina in question, forthwith won all hearts to her. FORMES played the character of the Sergeant with his accustomed excellence, introducing some new and natural points, which admirably enhanced the delineation of the prima donna.

On Saturday evening, the "Marriage of Figaro" drew another superb house, and presented the following cast: PICCOLOMINI, GHIONI, and BERKEL; FORMES, FLORENZA, PERRING and WEINLICH. The Opera was remarkably well performed; and where the old-style music failed to interest the public, the inimitable drollery and superb voice of Formes as Figaro, the sprightly vivacity and cunning of Piccolomini, the archness of Mme. Berkel as Cherubino, the judicious acting and artistic singing of Florenza, kept the audience amused, delighted, jolly and attentive. Formes has never been heard here in better voice; his Non piu andrai elicited a tumultuous encore, and must have caused the spirit of the immortal Wolfgang Amadeus to flutter in ecstatic joy.

It would be superfluous to add more in detail concerning the artists of this fine troupe, for your masterly reviews of the recent Boston Opera season, and the early reports from New York of your able "Trovator," have afforded your readers very lucid ideas of their performances and personnel. My object has been rather to herald the reception of the troupe in our midst. That certainly has been all which the most sanguine impresario could possibly desire; crowded houses, and an increase of enthusiasm each evening, which must ere long attain to fever heat. Tonight, Mdle Piccolomini is to make her first appearance as Violetta, in Verdi's Traviata, an opera wherein her every note, position, gesture, and expression of countenance, will be measured and criticized by the GAZZANIGA standard, on the part of a public, which invariably seems disposed to judge solely by strict comparisons.

The Concert of the HARMONIA SACRED SOCIETY, last week, presented certain features which should have crowded the Concert Hall. As it was, however, the audience was not large, — a fact to be traced directly to the intense frigidity of the weather. Mlle. HENRIETTA SIMON, made a most successful debut upon this occasion. Her musical education has been thoroughly comprehensive, and she vocalizes with much power, flexibility, purity of intonation and freedom from restraint. Her voice is a soprano of adequate compass, and is characterized throughout by richness, mellowness, purity, and clearness. Mme. La Grange has been her friend and patron saint, — moulding her style decidedly after her own admired method by dint of con amore instructions and advice to her talented protegee.

MR. C. JEROME HOPKINS, the young American Organist, created a marked sensation by his splendid execution of Wagner's "Pilgrim Chorus;" but finally slightly marred the impression thus secured, by that which purported to be an "Improvisation on familiar Airs," but merely consisted in a murderous chopping of the "Last Rose of Summer," et ia genus omne, into every conceivable form and shape. Hopkins is brimful of talent, and really can improvise in the most edifying manner, as the writer of this is able to testify from actual hearing. The choruses were admirably rendered, and Mr. M. H. CROSS accompanied with his wonted skill and judgement.

MANRICO.

CERRO, (HAVANA), JAN. 1. — The second abono, or season, of MARETZKE's opera troupe, came to a successful and brilliant close on Thursday evening, Dec. 30. The opera given was Sappho, by Paccini, which had been brought out on the 28th, for the first time in Havana. It had a great success. I was present both evenings; on the first evening there was a very full house; on the second, the house was literally crammed, not a vacant seat, and gentlemen packed in behind the boxes. The parts were distributed as follows: — Sappho, Mme. GAZZANIGA; Clymene, Miss PHILLIPPS; the High Priest, GASSIER; Phaon, STEFANI. The fine baritone air, in the first Act, was very well sung by Gassier, whose voice, although fine, is, to me, very unsympathetic. The second act opens with an exquisite little chorus of women, followed by a song of Chymene's, which was finely rendered by Miss Phillipps. This is followed by a duet between Sappho and Clymene, which begins pianissimo. This duet is me, the gem of the opera; and it seemed impossible for it to be more finely sung than it was by Mme. Gazzaniga and Miss Phillipps. The romanza for tenor, in the third act, was preceded by a clarinet solo, very finely played, which was vastly applauded. The romanza itself, although well sung, was very coldly received. Stefani is no favorite here. I am told that when he first appeared before the Havana public, he had a very disagreeable habit in concerted pieces, of roaring, which roaring, as he is a very powerful, large fellow, was not the soft roaring of a "sucking dove" and rather drowned the other singers. This habit he is overcoming and is now growing into favor, although he is still very coldly received and hardly ever applauded. Sappho's death-song was accompanied by Mme. Marezke on the harp, Sappho herself keeping time on a "voiceless lyre;" on the first night, on a stage lyre, on the second on a very beautiful one, presented to her by some one among the audience. She was literally showered with bouquets and several very beautiful wreaths were presented to her; also, two white doves were thrown to her, one of which persisted in flying to and fro, from one gallery to the other, although repeatedly caught by the streamers tied to its legs, and thrown to her. The quartet following Sappho's burst of passion, at the discovery of her lover's perfidy to her and marriage to Clymene, was very finely sung, and the singers were called before the curtain three times; but on the fourth recall, Mme. Gazzaniga appeared alone, when I left the theatre until the next act, (as many others also did,) for my applause had been quite as much for Miss Phillipps as for Mme. Gazzaniga.

I quite agree with you, my dear Dwight, in your opinion expressed a month or two since, and also previously, that Miss PHILLIPPS is not appreciated in Boston. Here in Havana, she is a great favorite with the public, and as I happen to know, this same public is a very fastidious public. For instance, — a singer strikes a wrong note — immediately there is a buzz and smile all over the theatre, and if the singer persists in singing incorrectly, ladies and gentlemen commence to laugh and talk as easily and in as loud a tone as if at home. To me, it is a delight to listen to Miss Phillipps's singing; to me, her rich contralto is a gurgling river of melody, growing ever more rich and more melodious. I have met her once or twice at a friend's, and have heard her sing, and her voice is as pleasant in a small room as in a theatre, which is seldom the case with so powerful a voice. But in my admiration of Miss Phillipps, I have wandered from Sappho, which I had very nearly done with, only having intended to say, that, as too often he does, Mr. Marezke seriously marred the beauty of the opera, by the loud roaring of his drums and braying of his trumpets; in fact some parts were completely drowned by the orchestra.

Last night I drove into Havana with some friends to the Plaza de Armas, to hear the band play. The first piece performed was the chorus in the second act of Sappho, of which I wrote above. The next was a march from Ernani. On Christmas eve., kind friends of mine arranged a party to go to Midnight Mass in the church attached to the Jesuit College, where the singing is very fine. The night, when we started, about half past eleven, was most delicious. We had been fearing we should have to give up going, on account of the showers, which had been very heavy through the evening; but at eleven, the moon broke through the clouds, lighting up the wet trees and shrubbery with a flood of silver light. Immediately, you may be sure, we started, and the drive into town was one of the most delightful I have ever had; the trees were wet and glistening in the moonlight, (which moonlight, says Hurlbut in his Gan Eden, would have driven Shelley crazy) and there was a delicious perfume in the air as we drove on, such as we have in New England only a few days in May and June, when all the trees are in blossom and the leaves are just bursting out. A part of the way we drove through long double avenues of trees meeting above our heads. As we entered the walls, all the bells in the city pealed forth midnight.

We drove rapidly to the church, and Mr. —, being acquainted with the Fathers, easily procured kneeling carpets for our ladies, while we proceeded immediately to the choir. The mass performed was composed by a French Jesuit priest, named Lambillotte, who died a few years since. Much of the music is beautiful, and it was very finely performed; the orchestra was unusually large, some of the musicians belonging to the theatre. On the left of the organ stood Father Doyagüe, the celebrated Andalusian castanet player. Strange as it may seem, the effect of the castanet was very pretty indeed, and the good Father seemed to enjoy it so much, swaying himself from side to side in time to the music. The singing in this church is very beautiful. I cannot compare it with that of any of the other churches, for this is the only one I have as yet been into. The tenor on that night was marvellously sweet; Father Llué, a rector in the church, sang that part. He is renowned here in Havana for the beauty of his voice, and oftentimes of his own free will he goes into the choir and sings. Since I have heard him sing, I wonder not at all at his renown; his voice runs very high, and is "so strong and so sweet!" It reminds me somewhat of Brignoli's, but while equally sweet is much stronger and has more of the robusto in it. Almost the only blot to the beauty of the mass, was the forcing of the voice in the Gloria, by the leading soprano, a boy, whose singing with that exception was remarkably good. We stayed in the choir but a short time, as we found that we lost very much of the music up there abreast of the organ. Therefore we went down round the church, until we were behind the main altar. Now, on the right of this main altar, in the corner of the church, is a marble altar recently imported from Italy by Father Leuc? "He the sweetest of all singers, in this church of lovely singers," and presented by him to his church, and dedicated to the Heart of Mary. On the steps of this altar, thanks to my friend's influence, we obtained permission to sit; and there we did sit, facing the congregation, until Mass was finished, our heads veiled by the $2,000 worth of lace which decorated the altar. The main altar was beautifully dressed with trees and shrubs and flowers; wandering about among the trees were the wise men coming to look on the infant Christ, in his Mother's arms, both of whom were dressed in white, and had a magnificent lace veil thrown over them; also, various lady friends coming through the trees, dressed in crimson silk flounced dresses, trimmed with black velvet. The vestments of the officiating priest were very costly; they were studded with jewels and trimmed with heavy embroidery in gold thread. One emerald on the middle of his back was as large as a good sized pigeon's egg, and flashed over all the church. Immediately in front of the altar, were seated the boys at the Jesuit College; they numbered about a hundred, I believe, and were all dressed in a uniform.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for Soprano Solo and Chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Concerts of the Past Week.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The operatic Bengal lights and rockets having blazed out and become extinguished, we were at last enabled, and with joy, to hail again the quiet fixed stars in our musical heavens. Not the least welcome thereof was the familiar little Pleiades-like group, the Quintette Club, who seized the first opportunity to shine again on Friday evening, of last week. It was the third concert of their season. The old consecrated spot, the pleasant room at Chickering's, being now actually surrendered to other uses, they were fain to take refuge in the Mercantile Hall, in Summer Street, which, though not so cozy as the old place, proved not bad for sound, although it may doubtless be improved by closing the recess within which the instruments were confined and bringing the stage out into the room. There was a goodly audience in spite of the worst of nights for getting about. Here is the programme:

1. Quintet in E minor, op. 3; Introduction and Allegro; Allegretto; Finale, Adagio and Allegro: Nicls Gade. 2. Grand Piano Trio in B flat, op. 97; Allegro Moderato; Scherzo; Adagio; Finale, Allegro; Miss Fay, Messrs. Schultze and Fries: 3. Adagio for Quintet, arranged from the Serenade for Wind Instruments; (First time); Mozart. 4. Adagio and Rondo Finale, from the Clarinet Quintet in B flat, op. 84: Weber. 5. First Quartet in E flat, op. 12; Introduction and Allegro; Canzonetta Allegretto; Andante; Finale, Allegro vivace: Mendelssohn.

Gade's music, whether for piano, violins, or orchestra, always makes the same impression on us. It is always sea-shore music; it always has a watery, cool sound, with a something dreamy, shadowy, lost in the mist of ages, Ossianic. It has many of the characteristic turns of Mendelssohn; reflects him, perhaps unconsciously. It has also a peculiar hue of tenderness and romance; but it is pale and bloodless; it does not seem to live now, but only dimly to remember life or to foreshadow it. It gives you but the shadow of passion; it makes you think of Undine, that interesting kindred creature of the sea, that had no soul. In the same way this music interests us, and of course after a little while fatigues us or lets us drop asleep. Put a soul into it and you have — Mendelssohn. This Quintet was a graceful, pleasing reproduction of these past impressions of Gade; one of the most agreeable of his works; and it was very nicely, delicately played.

Miss MARY FAY is a very youthful debutante, whose extraordinary ease and fluency of execution of the most difficult piano-forte music, especially modern music, has for a year or two past been a theme of admiration in the houses of her friends. She surely followed unwise counsel in selecting such a composition as the B flat Trio of Beethoven for her first public performance. It was as if a boy of thirteen, some young Cherubino, perhaps less precocious, should undertake to play Hamlet. Such a work requires far more than execution; it requires imagination, soul, passion, deep experience, grasp of mind. Miss F. has a nice touch. The delicate passages were, for the most part, rendered with a clean facility — we mean the more melodic solo passages, together with the trills, &c. But for the large chord passages she lacked the strength. The breadth, the grandeur and the fire of Beethoven were wanting. Of course some allowance must be made for embarrassment; but we have never, among the dozen or more who have played that Trio here, heard that deep and grand Adagio played so tamely. The violin and cello partook of the same lifelessness; doubtless they were compelled to hold back in behalf of the pianist. The best rendered portion was the light and airy commencement of the Scherzo; but when it came to that dark and groping passage, so peculiarly Beethovenish, the thing was but mechanical. The fault was simply in undertaking too much. But it was clearly shown that this young lady has decided talent, has already acquired a very remarkable facility of execution for her age, or indeed for any age, and that, with study and experience (comprehending general culture), she may aspire to a high place among pianists. It is indeed good to see one like her turn aside somewhat from the mere brilliancies of Thalberg and the like, and seek acquaintance with immortal works. But such a Trio should, by one so young, be only wooed in private, as a model and a source of inspiration, and not be selected for the exhibition of what one can—and cannot—do in public.

The Mozart Adagio was a dainty bit of the clearest, happiest sort of writing; as to ideas, about the average level of Mozart, not striking or far-reaching, but beautiful and charming by the very necessity of his nature. What a marvellous melodist was Weber! Are there any melodies, which seem such perfect and perennial god-sends as those in Freyschütz? We remember in our boyhood, in the old Federal St. Theatre, during those semi-dramatic, semi-musical performances of it, to which our "Diarist" alludes in another column, to have experienced our first really deep and life-determining musical enthusiasm there. Could Ethiopian melodies, or Norma, or the Trovatore, have made a deeper impression then among Boston boys, or have been more whistled in the streets, than the "Hunter's Chorus," "Plain gold ring," &c.? So too, in this Adagio and Rondo for the Clarinet (how Weber loved the Clarinet one needed only the Freyschütz overture to tell him), we have a continual flow of the most fresh and fascinating melody; vigorous, wholesome melody, with a fine rich, fruity flavor, and not mere sentimental sweetness long drawn out, long after all the inspiration is exhausted, as in so much of the Italian, French and modern German Opera music! It was finely rendered by Mr. RYAN and his accompanists.

That early Quartet of Mendelssohn was played to a charm. Its most striking feature, and most readily recalled, is the Canzonetta, a movement to which he seems to have been partial, answering somewhat to the mysterious narrative strain called Romanza in modern operas. With Mendelssohn it seems to tell an antique story; some quaint old ballad of the people; a ballad in the German vein; a story as of some knight going forth on his adventures through the forest, and suddenly surrounded by a world of little elves and fairies; for his peculiar fairy flutter comes in here, too, after the graver measure has gone on awhile.

It was a delightful evening, and such music made its own place, so that the keen regrets for the old hall were partially forgotten.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. Last Saturday evening our musical world seemed at home again in its own place. The Boston Music Hall was decently well filled with really music-loving listeners to a Beethoven Symphony and works which commonly go with it. The night was unpropitious; so icy, wet and slippery as necessarily to keep many, who would otherwise have come, at home. But the twelve or thirteen hundred (apparently) who were there, had reason to be thankful.

Mr. CARL ZERRAHN is happy this time in the composition of his orchestra. Never, save on some festival occasion, have we had brought together in our local orchestras so much good material. Here were about fifty instruments, all of true temper and efficient. They were well balanced, too: seven first violins, five double-basses—in all, thirty of the string family—with the usual complement of wood and brass;—a capital first flute, capital bassoons, clarinet, oboe, &c., four good horns, and trumpets and trombones remarkably well civilized for this most rampant age of brass. Several times in the overtures the kettle-drum went off with too gunpowder-like explosiveness, but with that exception there was but little of the unruly element of noise to frighten Music's soul away.

The "Pastoral Symphony" led off—a concert in itself—indeed a whole long summer day. The great tone-poet waves his enchanter's wand, and we are at once transported out of winter into the heart of June. How it begins! A little phrase of melody escapes the violins, and it is as if a breath of summer air came wandering over the long grass, and rustling through the leaves, and with a dreamy, rocking motion it dies off in the distance; the native summer sense, deep down in the soul, is touched, and all develops naturally. There was a slight crudeness in the instruments at first; the reeds, &c. not having got quite perfectly attuned to each other in the outset; but presently all blended and flowed smoothly, and we had on the whole about the best performance of the "Pastorale" that we remember. The slow movement, "by the Brook-side," was beautifully rendered, especial recognition being due to the musing soliloquy of the fagotto. The storm episode came out uncommonly distinct and vivid. Yet, viewing it from an ideal standard, rather than by comparison with past attempts, we should say that the chief merit of this rendering lay rather in the vividness and freshness with which every line and tint of color was brought out, than in that fine and delicate fusion of all parts in one ideal whole, which might perhaps be realized after many rehearsals in some lucky hour. From the frequent and earnest signs of applause, we judged that our public has really grown in its appreciation of a fine Symphony.

The three overtures were well selected, for an opening, and for a general audience. The Freyshütz has been heard more than any other by habitués, but it is, as a matter of course, fit that younger listeners should not lack an opportunity to know this glorious overture. Splendidly played, as it was that night, it loses nothing of its charm with those who may have heard it hundreds of times. The overture to "The Huguenots," came out with far more brilliancy and power than in the Theatre, and was most effective. The operatic reminiscence made that interesting; and there was the same argument for introducing that to "Martha," which in itself we never much admired; but it recalled much which every one who heard the opera did admire. The happy, sunshiny little Allegretto, out of Beethoven's eighth Symphony, was played deliciously, and had to be repeated.

Those who anticipated a very high kind of pleasure were disappointed in the singing of Miss JULIANA MAY. She has a very clear and very powerful soprano voice; bright and penetrating high tones, very round and solid low tones, as low as A, and lower, and a middle register of plentiful volume, though not of an altogether agreeable quality; in truth a large voice, and one to cope with the fortissimo of any orchestra. But it lacks the sympathetic quality. Her execution shows training and persistent energy of will in mastering difficulties, but seems too mechanical. She sang the Seena and Aria: "Regnava nel silenzio," from Lucia; the air: "Jerusalem," from "St. Paul"; and "La Sicilienne" from Verdi's Vêpres Siciliennes:—this last a brilliant, taking melody, in which her peculiar powers found good play, and which she executed with a life and spirit that prompted a determined encore.

The next concert of Mr. Zerrahn will take place Saturday evening, Feb. 5, when we believe we are to have Mendelssohn's A minor ("Scotch") Symphony revived.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Indulging in a humor which we sometimes have of entertaining all sides of a question, we have copied from the Courier an elaborate article on Mr. STÖPEL'S "Hiawatha." This we have done for several reasons. First and principally because, with all its enthusiasm, which we think somewhat extravagant, it contains an excellent description of the musical contents of the work, prepared by one who has evidently studied it closely and with admiring eagerness; and because we thought so able an analysis would contribute to the better understanding and appreciation of the work when it is next performed, which we sincerely hope it will be soon. Secondly, because it asserts, and very ably and sincerely, too, the utmost claim that is by anybody made for Mr. Stöpel's composition—a claim far higher than we are prepared to admit, or think it possible to be fully satisfied of so suddenly, even if it were valid. We have already expressed the interest and pleasure we felt in this music, with our dissent from superlatives, and we are glad to give the other side a hearing. Thirdly, that our readers may consider how much reason there is in this writer's plea for the extending of peculiar sympathy and favor to a composition either on the ground of its being in some sense American, or of anxiety to recognize and hail at once the genius, or whatever merits, of an author. We confess we do not yet feel the force of those arguments; we think that criticism ought to be, like genius, of no country and no respecter of persons; that its first duty is not to the pride of country, nor to the artist, nor the author, but to Art. But we have no room to go into the argument here. Meanwhile, what we do urge is, that Mr. Stöpel's work should have a second hearing. We trust it will be given in the Music Hall, where the effect must be better than in the Theatre; and we trust all who heard it before, and all who have read what has been said about it, coldly or extravagantly, will go and give their best attention. We can at least assure them, that they will find a great deal to enjoy in it.

The many friends of Mr. JOSEPH TRENKLE—than whom no one was ever more esteemed and loved here as a gifted artist, as a conscientious teacher, and as a gentleman of singularly pure and beautiful character, will grieve to learn that his health is not benefited by his trip to Europe, but is on the contrary in so critical a state that he is obliged to leave his labors and go at once to a milder climate.

His brother artists mean to offer him, before he goes, a public token of their high regard, in the shape of a complimentary concert in the Music Hall,—probably next Saturday evening. Mr. ZERRAHN, with a large orchestra, Mr. KREISSMAN, with the "Orpheus," OTTO DRESEL, Mrs. HARWOOD, and others, will take part in it. A host of music-loving friends stand ready on all sides to lend "aid and comfort" to this hearty movement of the artists. At the annual meeting of the Harvard Musical Association, a few evenings since, the mention of the plan called out the warmest sympathy, and a committee of gentlemen was raised to co-operate with the prime movers in whatever way would serve to make it a successful and significant occasion. Particulars will be announced in a few days in the newspapers.

A very large company of ladies and gentlemen, a goodly representation of the best musical culture of our city, were present last Monday morning at a matinee given in Mr. T. Gilbert's Piano-Forte Rooms, by Señor LOUIS DE CASSERES, a pianist, of Spanish-African blood, a native of Jamaica, and a refined, intelligent and cultivated gentleman. He brings testimonials from the best circles in London and Paris, where he spent some time; and for some years he has resided in Halifax, bearing the title of pianist to his Excellency, the governor of Nova Scotia. He evinced on this occasion great facility of execution in the modern piano-forte music, and played especially a transcription from "I Puritani" by Prudent with much taste and finish; also a "Dream," and some variations upon Scotch airs of his own, which showed more than the average cleverness in that sort of work. His readings of Beethoven and Mendelssohn were less satisfactory, but showed earnest study and some mastery of classical as well as modern music. Altogether the occasion was a very pleasant one, and Señor Casseres won the sympathies and the respect of his audience. Mr. C. R. ADAMS added much by his beautiful singing of Adelaide, and of Balfe's "Maud" song.

Mme. BISCACCANTI, aided by Mrs. HARWOOD, Sig. BISCACCANTI, who is a fine violoncellist, and Mr. LANG, the pianist, gave a concert in New Bedford on Monday evening, which was brilliantly successful. Wednesday evening she was to sing at Worcester, and again at Portland; and some time next week, we are glad to learn, it is her design to give a concert in her native Boston. . . . A splendid opera house is nearly completed in Cincinnati, which is called Pike's Opera House; and Italian Opera is to be inaugurated in that city on the 14th of March, by the first of a series of representations under the promising auspices of STRAKOSCH.

ROSSINI, says the Courier de Paris, having returned to Paris for the winter, gave a grand musical party a few nights ago, at which four original pieces of his composition were executed. One was a grand scena, the Catalani, which was sung by Mlle. Mainienville, Rossini accompanying on the piano; a Saltarello, composed only a few days before, which Rossini himself performed on the piano; a duo, full of melancholy, called A Tear, which was executed on the piano and violoncello; and, lastly, a fugue for the piano. All these productions excited the greatest admiration.

Music Abroad.

London.

The last "event" in the world musical of London has been the production of Balfe's new English opera, entitled "Satanella," at the opening of the splendid new Covent Garden theatre, under the management of Miss Pyne and Mr. Harrison. The book is founded on the ballet Le Diable Amoureux, which the Athenæum thinks a poor book and a poor subject, with its "mixture of German diablerie, Italian coquetry and Eastern sensuality." The same writer continues: "Having said thus much with regret, we need only add, (seeing that the story is familiar to our theatrical readers,) that Miss Louisa Pyne is the Satanella, or she-devil, who falls in love with the somewhat wild Count Rupert (Mr. Harrison) after having been evoked by Arimanes (Mr. Weiss) to inveigle his soul into the toils of darkness,—that Miss Susan Pyne is Stella, that profligate and haughty Sicilian lady, to whom Count Rupert was betrothed; and who, in revenge at being slighted for Lelia (Miss Rebecca Isaacs), Rupert's German peasant foster-sister, wins all his property over the dice-box,—that Mr. G. Honey is Hortensius, the pedantic old tutor of Count Rupert,—and Mr. St. Albyn, Karl, the simple and unsuccessful peasant-lover of the peasant-heroine, whose forlornness in disappointment is as old as Opera. It was a real pleasure to meet again Mr. W. H. Payne, whose stolid cupidity, in the mute part of the Vizier, made for us the only merriment in the four acts.

"It would be lost labor to analyze Mr. Balfe's talent and facility in composition with any hope of their undergoing change or improvement. Wherefore he has chosen to hang half-way betwixt the Riccis of Italy and the Adams of France (possessing, nevertheless, the elements of a style of his own), it would be bootless now to inquire,—as fruitless to specify the qualities which must make the bulk of his music ephemeral.—Never had English opera composer such chances at all,—and there is hardly one of his works without some of those seizing traits or passages, which are worth their weight in gold,—now that Invention's leaden age is on us. Yet how small has been the real result!—It is impossible to overlook such facts during a period when some movement is being made towards the formation of English Opera,—and when Mr. Balfe's 'annual' seems to be the only piece of new stage-music which there is much chance of our hearing during any given twelvemonth.

"This time, as our readers may have gathered, Mr. Balfe has been set down to a task more bewildering than inspiring,—has been called on, moreover, (as in the gambling scene of the first act, and others,) to enter the lists against a complicate and calculator no less accomplished than M. Meyerbeer. Yet we are not sure that any of Balfe's previous operas contains more distinct indication of what he might have been than 'Satanella.'—There are some of his happiest thoughts in it,—a few of his happiest things:—these, by the way, not ballads. The instrumental prelude, after which the curtain rises, is good,—the Gold song is not, and not the Champagne song in the Devil's Tower on the Brockenberg (how German the fancy!)—but the melody for Satanella, at the close of the first act, with the voices supporting its burden, is tuneful, mysterious, and charming,—excellent stage music for the situation. In the second act an attempt seems to have been made to outdo the laughing trio in 'The Rose of Castille,' in the laughing quartet where Count Rupert puts on an enchanted hat, by way of unmasking Stella's hypocrisy,—and parts of this have vivacity and sparkle. The pirate music does not get beyond a pantomime introduction. The ballad for Satanella, begins well; but is impaired by the torment of certain modulations, which are virtually so much evasion of construction. There are good combinations in the second finale, where the bridesmaids' procession is darkened by the thunder-cloud announcing the doom of the Demon who personates the bride. In act the third,—utterly objectionable to our thinking as is the cudegel, or Cain comedy, of the duet already alluded to, and tremendous as are its words, the music is of clever comic quality. The quintet in the slave-market, "O woe! despair!" is excellent of its sort. More than one less effective movement has saved a worthless act in one of Signor Verdi's operas. Enough has been specified to show what we fancy there is to admire in 'Satanella.' It is significant, too, that what we like best (with the solitary exception of the love song) are not the displays laid out for principal soprano, tenor, or basso,—but certain pieces and fancies, where the musician has forgotten his words,—ceased to flatter his singers, thought of the stage, and dashed on alone.

In silence, sad heart, go,

The theatre was full,—the applause, in places, enthusiastic,—the encores were many,—the composer and singers were called for again and again,—but if 'Satanella' keeps the English stage like its composer's 'Bohemian Girl,'—and circulates abroad, as has done 'Les Quatre Fils Aymon,'—we shall be surprised.

From the Athenæum, Dec. 18, '58.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—After having made a second absence from England of some dozen years' duration, Madame Anna Bishop reappeared at Exeter Hall, on Monday evening, without the slightest change in her ways and means—her appearance and her accomplishments—being visible. Her voice is just what it was when she sang in 'Loretta'; effective in a few upper notes and toneless in the middle and lower part of its register,—her style musician-like, in a certain tastefulness and animation,—her execution fair, without any remarkable ambition,—her articulation generally indistinct, though not unrefined;—to sum up, she is an artist attractive for a while, and in certain phrases, but heard during the run of an evening, fatiguing. Nevertheless, supposing her to have kept up her practice in sacred music, Madame Bishop might be acceptable in oratorio, just now, considering the singular thinness of its soprano rank,—made up as it is of singers without voices, and of voices without singing power. For this, however, she does not apparently intend to try, having since her own concert figured nightly in the programme of M. Jullien, whose nights of promenade have now come to an end.—Signor Belleiti sang at Madame Bishop's concert;—of all concert bassi before our public not merely the most conscientious—but, also the best.

Mr. Ransford's Concert at the St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, was a "monster" entertainment. The Coldstream Band, the veteran Mr. Distin and his trumpeters, and Mr. E. Chipp on the organ (which by the way, turns out but a poor instrument), did duty in place of orchestra; and the singers were many. Had we an English opera (not an opera in English) Miss Ransford's place would be on the stage; since, besides singing well, she has that dramatic air which marks a vocation.—If Miss Laura Baxter can be prevailed on to lay aside that over emphasis and solemnity of delivery foolishly thought indispensable to a low voice, she may become a valuable addition to our contralto singers.—This, by this time, might have been headed by Miss Lascelles, in right of her unrivalled voice; but she disdains to work, and must be prepared to see less gifted sister singers carry away the honors.—Mr. G. Perren, too, should make more progress, for he has voice enough, and to spare,—and the dearth of tenors is notorious. Mr. Sims Reeves—who we hoped had beaten November—was singing excellently on Tuesday—to be again disabled on the following evening. Here, since some stir has been made in the matter of late (to which it is needless more particularly to allude), let us once for all protest against the fancy which some one appears to nourish,—that, whenever Mr. Sims Reeves is unable to sing, it means caprice. That there are some voices more liable than others to suffer from weather, is a fact obvious to every child; that there is no singer who prepares himself more assiduously to fulfil his public duties than Mr. Sims Reeves, we are satisfied. So long as the art lasts, however, there are people who will have a theme for nonsense.—A column more would hardly suffice to enumerate the other "component items" of Mr. Ransford's concert.

Mr. Hullah's concert at St. Martin's Hall, on Wednesday evening, was more than usually interesting. In the 'Lauda Sion' of Mendelssohn, was heard a new soprano, Miss Martin;—a young lady with a voice more strong than sweet, but extensive and well in tune. Her composure (this totally distinct from forwardness) was remarkable. Her occupation, we imagine, is marked out by Nature for brilliant display. Then a welcome variety to a choral concert was given by the performance of a Beethoven Symphony—the second, in D. Grand works of this kind have a proper place, as relieving performances mainly made up of vocal music,—and Mr. Hullah improves as a conductor of them. Thirdly, came Dr. Bennett's 'May Queen,' which made a more favorable impression in London than at Leeds. There it was somewhat swallowed up by the pomp of the Festival. Here, the soprano air (by Mr. Weiss) were encored, likewise the tenor song;—the last, greatly to the credit of W. Wilbye Cooper, who had, at a very short notice, to do duty for Mr. Sims Reeves, and who, on this occasion may have found the chance, which the adage says, arrives once in every man's lifetime. His voice, as tenors must go now-a-days, is low, and somewhat of the surplice hangs about it; but he sang thoroughly well, and should be encouraged by the recognition of this, to add to his style that which is wanting to it—something of lightness and flexibility.—Dr. Bennett was called for, and loudly cheered at the close of the concert.—On the same evening an interest was given to the concert of Mr. G. Russell, at Croydon, entitling it to notice here,—by his producing there some of the vocal and instrumental music of that deceased young English composer of promise, Mr. E. Bache.

On Thursday evening Mr. H. Leslie's Choir repeated Bach's Motet, and gave a selection of part-songs. We are glad to note that the programme of the evening brought out some of the music of Ferdinand Ries, whose 'Rheinwein Lied,' varied, is one of the most brilliant pieces of the kind existing;—and who suffered, on the one hand, from his frequent imitation of Beethoven (whose best pupil he was), and on the other from his having written too much "for the shops." But there is still too much music by Ries both for pianoforte and stringed instruments on every scale, too good and too individual to perish, and anything good and individual which takes our public out of the groove of fashion, be it classical or traditional, claims welcome.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
SICILIENNE. (With thanks, kind friends.) From "Les Vepres Siciliennes." Verdi. 40

This is perhaps the most sparkling gem that ever came from Verdi's pen, having been buried in an opera, which has been laid aside since the later operas of the great maestro have absorbed public attention. Miss May won with it such earnest and general applause last Saturday night, that it is to be hoped vocalists will not allow it to pass out of sight again.

COME AND ADMIRE. (Vieni a mirar.) Duo for Soprano and Tenor from "Simon Boccanegra." Verdi. 30

A capital little duet from Verdi's "very latest" opera, bearing in its outline a marked resemblance to the Prison Duet in "Trovatore." It is very melodious and will prove one of the strongest pieces in the opera. This is the first of a series of the Vocal Beauties from this opera which is now in course of preparation.

JOYS THAT VANISH. (Quale assalto.) Duo for Soprano and Tenor, from "Moses in Egypt." Rossini. 30

A well-known, beautiful duet, which has never before been published separately. This is a not over-difficult specimen of Rossini's florid and ornamental writing, and will answer very well as an introduction to the more difficult compositions of the old, classic Italian school.

GAILY SMILES THE EARTH BEFORE ME. I. Hart. 25

I LO'E NAE A LADDIE BUT ANE. Finlay Dun. 25

THREE FISHERS WENT SAILING OUT IN THE WEST. John Hullah. 30

This is a new musical version of Kingsley's widely known poem, by Hullah, who, as musical conductor, and originator of children's monster concerts, has won a continental reputation.

Instrumental Music.

HOME, SWEET HOME. Varied. A. Baumbach. 50

To the musical public of this city Baumbach's arrangement of this ever beautiful melody has been known for some time. During several concert seasons it has been the author's "piece de resistance" and the eagerness of piano-forte players to procure a copy of a composition, which is sure to delight and fascinate everybody has been steadily increasing.

COM'E GENTIL. Serenade in "Don Pasquale." Transcribed. G. A. Osborne. 30

An arrangement of medium difficulty, in this writer's pleasing and agreeable style.

EASY AND MELODIOUS STUDIES FOR PIANO-FORTE. By Franz Petersilea. 1.00

A most excellent series of studies, imparting habits of strict time, regular accentuation and rhythm. They are written in the legato style, as a supplement to "Study and Amusement," by the same author the use of the Metronome is here introduced in order that scholars may obtain correct ideas of the lightness and quickness with which music is to be executed, twenty years' experience having convinced the author that but few players have a true knowledge in this particular.

Hamlet at the Boston.

We sit before the row of evening lamps,
Each in his chair,
Forgetful of November dusks and damp,
And wintry air.

A little gulf of music intervenes,
A bridge of sighs,
Where still the cunning of the curtain screens
Art's paradise.

My thought transcends those viols' shrill delight,
The booming bass,
And towards the regions we shall view to-night
Makes hurried pace:

The painted castle, and the unneeded guard
That ready stand;
The harmless Ghost, that walks with helm unbarred
And beckoning hand:

And, beautiful as dreams of maidenhood,
That doubt defy,
Young Hamlet, with his forehead grief-subdued,
And visioning eye.

O fair dead world, that from thy grave awak'st
A little while,
And in our heart strange revolution mak'st
With thy brief smile!

O beauties vanished, fair lips magical,
Heroic braves!
O mighty hearts, that hold the world in thrall!
Come from your graves!

The Poet sees you through a mist of tears,—
Such depths divide
Him, with the love and passion of his years,
From you, inside!

The Poet's heart attends your buskined feet,
Your lofty strains,
Till earth's rude touch dissolves that madness sweet,
And life remains:

Life that is something while the senses heed
The spirit's call,
Life that is nothing when our grosser need
Engulfs it all.

And thou, young hero of this mimic scene,
In whose high breast
A genius greater than thy life hath been Strangely comprest!

Wear'st thou those glories draped about thy soul
Thou dost present?
And art thou by their feeling and control
Thus eloquent?

'Tis with no feigned power thou bind'st our sense,
No shallow art;
Sure, lavish Nature gave thee heritage
Of Hamlet's heart!

Thou dost control our fancies with a might
So wild, so fond,
We quarrel, passed thy circle of delight,
With things beyond;

Returning to the pillows rough with care,
And vulgar food,
Sad from the breath of that diviner air,
That loftier mood.

And there we leave thee, in thy misty tent
Watching alone;
While foes about thee gather imminent,
To us scarce known.

Oh, when the lights are quenched, the music hushed,
The plaudits still,
Heaven keep the fountain, whence the fair stream gushed,
From choking ill!

Let Shakspeare's soul, that wins the world from wrong,
For thee avail,
But not one holy maxim of his song
Before thee fail!

So, get thee to thy couch as unreprieved
As heroes blest:
And all good angels, trusted in and loved,
Attend thy rest!

On the Wear and Tear of Voices.

(Correspondence of the London Literary Gazette.)

Paris, 15th December.

I told you, in one of my recent letters, that there had occurred something latterly at the Conservatoire here, in the Professorial department, that called for notice. It is the very smallest fact possible, but it is a fact, — just as the rushing of all Paris to applaud Beaumarchais' Mariage de Figaro, which piece satirized implacably those who most applauded it, was also a fact, and a significant one. Of all the things that people in general society talk of most and know least about, there is none whereof more is said or less known than vocal music. The old and glorious art of "voice-building" is lost. Oh! for a musical Ruskin! How often have I, and the few who, like me, care for these things, had occasion to send forth that cry! "Why," said Rossini, to a friend of mine the other day, "Why should I go now to lyrical theatres? What should I go to hear? Singers who are gone-by now, and whom I have heard in their perfection when I was young? Or young singers who have not the faintest idea even of what a voice is, and who, if they have the rudiments of a good one, will have destroyed them in a few months?"

Alas! alas! it is but too true. It is worth while inquiring the cause of the one perpetual want felt in our days of singers who do not "go off" in an incredibly short time. "How very short a time singers last now-a-days!" is a phrase one hears for ever repeated, and the thing itself is true. A singer no sooner comes out, and is made much of, than he or she begins to show signs of a voice when the bloom is fading. Giuglini, who is a young tenor, full of good qualities, bears the marks of scratches already upon what I would term the enamel of his voice; Alboni sings below the tone constantly, (yet if ever nature made a perfect organ, hers was one); Bosio has inequalities, and her freshness is getting impaired. Take the tenors here, too: Roger is a man in the prime of life, yet is almost unbearable from the deterioration of his voice; Gueymard had the lungs of an ox, and the sonority of a trumpet, — he is quite young, but the voice is "used up;" Mario is only now reaching the age when Rubini first produced his great furor all over Europe! Yet Mario has now little else than defects, with here and there a beautiful note saved from the wreck! Compared to this, look at the past: Rubini's ten best years were from forty to fifty; Pisaroni, at sixty-seven, in private, sings still; Grassini, at seventy, had preserved all the truth of her intonation; Catalani, up to the hour of her death, had entire command over her vocal resources. The instances are too numerous to quote of the vocalists of old times who preserved their voices true and equal to a late age, yet our days have none such to show. Why is this? Singers being in incomparably greater demand than they had ever used to be, and the proportion of lyrical theatres being as ten or twelve to one of what they were eighty years ago, the question is a useful one. Why the singers of our day do not last? Because their voices are not formed, and they are totally ignorant of what should be done to form them. Evoke the shade of Malibran, and ask her what she underwent whilst her father, Garcia, taught her to form her voice. Summon the spirit of Rubini, and bid him enumerate his sufferings under Nozzari. Go back to the palmy days of Crescentini and the immortal conservatoire of Naples, when singers were few (as really excellent artists always will be), and it took many, many years to make one.

If Marchesi and Pacchierotti, and Davide (the elder), could arise from their graves and speak, they would tell you it is no joke to render a voice fit for singing, but they would also tell you that unless made thus "fit," it will break down at the first difficulty, and in an incredibly short space of time be a ruin, besides being a terrible ear-sore to us, who are condemned to listen to it during the gradual process of its breaking down.

Now-a-days, instead of there being few singers, and those being first-rate, Europe, and America too, are over-run with men and women, who are devoid of even an elementary notion of what their own voices are really capable of. But not only are there now no Masters as there used to be, but I am in some doubt, if there were any, whether singers would go to them. One common absurdity is to prate about the "natural voice." There is no natural voice. Nature gives a vocal enunciation for the purposes of speaking, calling, shouting, or screaming out loudly, if in danger; but she does not give a voice ready fashioned to the work that is not natural; she does not give a voice ready to execute violin passages, take flying leaps from one extremity to the other of its extent, or sustain the sonority of one note until it dies away like the vibrations of a bell. She does not, and never did all this; and there is no absurdity beyond that of supposing the existence of a "natural" ready-made voice for the purposes of singing. Go and fetch the best hack you can find in any gentleman's stables, or take even a really fine hunter, and without any "training" at all, put him to do the work of a "Toxophilite;" we all know what would be the result. Yet this is done every day of our lives in the vocal world, and untrained vocalists are every day turned loose upon the "stiff" ground of all but impossible vocal music, and told to "go in and win" — which, of course, they never do.

The three only singers of this day who bear marks of teaching or "training," are three who are past the middle of life; these are Mmes. Grisi, Frezzolini, and Tamberlik. Watch either of these three open their mouths, take their breath, or emit the sound of their voices, and you see at once you have an artist before you. I do not mean a musician (Grisi, for one, is not that), I mean a vocal artist properly trained.

Much has been said, I am aware, of the harm done to singers by the extraordinary instrumental (and not vocal) music they are required to sing. There is truth, too, in this; and Meyerbeer, Verdi, and some others have a great deal to answer for, no doubt; but the real cause of the mischief lies in the total absence of all due training. The singers of old times — who lasted — had to sing constantly Mozart's music, and Mozart, be it said, rarely writes commodiously for the voice; witness Donna Anna, and Don Juan himself, and the various parts of the Zauberflöte, and the Vitellia of the Clemenza, and the music of Zerlina and of Cherubino—to sing which properly ten years' practice would hardly be too much, they being, strictly speaking, violin, and not vocal music. Yet these parts were sung, and the singers lasted; but these singers were duly "trained."

Well, now I am coming to what regards the Conservatoire here. Singing is neglected in Italy, and there are no longer there any great schools for the vocal art. But here matters are far worse, for there is one. Worse than not being trained at all, the very little training singers get here is the very worst and most mischievous possible; and (except in here and there an instance, as with that admirably-gifted vocalist, Faure) the subjects who are sent forth from the Conservatoire are about the most pitiable of all; for the falsest principles are given them, and the teaching they have had has, in nine cases out of ten, worn them out before they arrive even at their début. One great cause of the inferiority of French vocalists in general is the detestable system still adhered to of the solfège. Anything so completely absurd can hardly be conceived. The first requisite for good singing being a proper emission of the voice, and its clearest possible passage from the phonic cavities to the outward air, is it not insane to persist in closing a door and placing a barrier before that passage? Yet this, and nothing else, is achieved by the solfège. Whereas the vowel q is the only sound by the emission or enunciation whereof the voice can be properly formed, the French system condemns sound to come forth obstructed by the enunciation of a consonant, and forces the unfortunate vocalist to filter his voice through the syllables Do, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La, Si, instead of pouring its full stream naturally forth, through the medium of its natural sluice-gate, the vowel a. No consonant is natural to the voice; but neither are the vowels e or i or o or u (whichever way pronounced). The other vowels and all consonants are to be enunciated much later when, the instrument being made, it learns to put words upon notes. This is a subsequent and separate study, (ask Porpora and all the Masters). Well, the first obstacle opposed to good vocal teaching in the Conservatoire here is, then, the persistent adoption of the solfège. Now, about a fortnight since I chanced to see lying on the pianoforte of a lady friend of mine, a little modest looking volume, in 8vo., entitled "Abécédaire vocal; a preparatory method, teaching how to emit and place the voice, and how to vocalize." As I have made the musical art the object of good many year's study, I was strongly attracted towards the little book, and opened it. I was delighted at every line. The author, Panofka (a name well-known to all students of the vocal science), in a few words establishes the fact of the injury done to the education of the voice by the solfège system, and the absolute necessity of forming previously the sounds which are to be made to bear other vowels besides a, and any consonants. I then and there devoured the book, and was rejoiced to find that one man, at least, had at last been found to declare loudly the French system an impossible one, when to my unspeakable surprise, what should I discover?—that the Conservatoire itself had "authorized" the volume, had "recommended" it, and declared it "excellent" as "a preparation for the solfège!"

Now, if ever there was an instance of people adopting what is their own condemnation, this is one. The whole professorial class in this country knows only how to teach by use of the solfège; if that be once exploded, where will be the teachings of these gentlemen, the consequences whereof are more deplorably manifest with each succeeding day? That the volume I speak of is super-excellent—of that there can be no doubt; but that the Conservatoire, with its traditions, should adopt it, is what I cannot comprehend. What I had read however, made me anxious to read more of an author so deeply informed upon a theme where ignorance is now the universal law. I accordingly procured a large folio volume entitled "L'Art de Chanter," and have with genuine delight read it through three times. At last, then, a real professor of the vocal art is to be found, reviving all the science of the old Italians, continuing their lessons, inventing, too, no little; for there are precepts and practices in this voluminous treatise of M. Panofka's for the "junction of the chest and head-registers of the voice," which are utterly new, and overcome what sometimes puzzled the doctors of other days. The "Art de Chanter" is a wonderful book, it is the work of a Master. The author, I am now assured, resided several years in London, and gave up, it seems, many years to the studies requisite for the composition of so valuable an addition to the musical literature of this age. One of the greatest theorists now living, one of the last genuine authorities upon these matters, Fétis, has, I am told, written something upon the work I speak of, and, as might be easily foreseen, has given it the meed of praise it merited, but which is doubled by the world-wide fame of the giver.

I do not apologize to your readers for so long a letter upon what some may call a "dry" subject, for I began by exclaiming, "Oh! for a musical Ruskin!" And I ask you whether any one would apologize to his readers, if he had suddenly fallen upon a yet unknown work of Ruskin's, and had been over-talkative upon it? This Panofka is a sort of Ruskin in the vocal art; and if I had the honor of his personal acquaintance, I would try and excite him to the preaching of a crusade against the heathens. Vocal art is becoming extinct, and at a time when fashion calls for a larger supply of professional vocalists every day. This is a false state of things, and one against which, whosoever loves music, or makes one of his pleasures out of the hearing of it, ought to lift his voice. That France should persist in her old absurd system should astonish no one. Le Solfège is a species of artistic "protection and prohibition." Its overthrow will be as difficult as the establishment of Free Trade.

The Conservatoire is as retrograde as everything else here; nevertheless, it has just now adopted what is the principle of a reform; and, like the society of old welcoming Beaumarchais, has welcomed its opponent.

Balfe's "Satanella."

Mr. Balfe is proverbial for his indifference to the merits or demerits of a libretto. To poets he is the most obliging and condescending of composers. Having undergone a severe course of Bunn, he might naturally be supposed to have qualified himself for overlooking any amount of librettorial inefficiency.

With all his amount of poetical apathy, nevertheless, it was to be wondered at that he did not shrink from the task of setting Satanella when it was presented to him. The new libretto, by Messrs. A. Harris and E. Falconer—poets of the Rose of Castille—is said to be taken from the once highly-popular ballet of Le Diable Boiteux—produced many years ago at Her Majesty's Theatre, for Fanny Elssler—written by M. Burot de Gurgy. There is no similarity whatever between the two works, beyond the incidents of the devil attending on the hero, and the latter being implicated with three ladies. In Le Diable Boiteux the hero, Cleofas, after encountering the three dominos at the Opera ball, gets into a row, and, in making his escape from his pursuers, clambers into an attic studio belonging to a necromancer. He overhears some strange noise in the room, and fancying it proceeds from the interior of a bottle, breaks it, whereupon out jumps Asmodeus, who has been imprisoned therein for ever so long a time by the arts of the magician. Asmodeus accompanies Cleofas through all his adventures with the three ladies, and finally persuades him to choose the most deserving. Here is a plain tale, and, allowing for the supernatural element, a perfectly consistent one. In Satanella there is no "concatenation accordingly." The primum mobile is not only supernatural, but every consequence arising from it is unnatural.

When the devil is evoked by Rupert, there is no logic in his being accompanied by a female fiend. Why does he come double? Could he not transact his own business single-handed? It was a shrewd thought of the poets, however, while everything else in the opera betrays the purely comic element, to make the arch-fiend, the prince of darkness, the, the—

"Oh, thou, whatever title suit thee, Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie"—

the only serious personage in the plot; a real hideous Apollyon, yelling, anathematizing enough to fright the soul out of Christian himself. Why did not the poets of the Rose of Castille transfer to their adaptation the fiend Asmodeus, a jolly, harmless, good-natured devil, full of fun and frolic, and with no more mischief or evil in him than becomes a born enemy of man? The crowning extravagance of the piece is the fact that the arch fiendness, who is employed by the arch fiend to ensnare the soul of Rupert, repents at the end, becomes virtuous, and is taken up to heaven. It is due, however, to the poets of the Rose of Castille, to acknowledge that, although the dialogue is strangely diffuse, the versification and style in Satanella shows an improvement on their first production.

With such materials, what could Mr. Balfe do? Fortunately, he possesses his own abstract notions of the poetical, and does not too closely examine the details. He was, therefore, but little trammelled by incongruities, inconsistencies and impossibilities. He caught the leading idea, or, in lieu thereof, conceived one for himself, and sprinkled his gold-dust over the doubtful matter. The music, indeed, is worthy of the name of Mr. Balfe, although here and there he has found himself unable to grapple with the story or its treatment, and has failed to do his talent complete justice. The exceptions to the general excellence, nevertheless, are few and far between, and, taking it altogether, the opera may be pronounced one of the most successful of the composer.

The opening chorus, "Donor of this lordly fête," with dance, is animated and taking, and was admirably sung throughout. The first ballad, "Our hearts are not our own to give"—sung by Miss Rebecca Isaacs in the character of Lelia—is after the old-fashioned pattern—almost stereotyped by Mr. Balfe—in which sentiment, putting on a melodious dress, assumes the form most likely to captivate the public. The gambling scene, in which Rupert is ruined by his betrothed, the Princess Stella—a startling incident, by the way—is bustling, but lacks variety and dramatic colouring. Moreover, it is strongly reminiscent of the famous play-scene in Robert le Diable, where Robert loses his whole fortune. The first encore was bestowed on the ballad by Karl (Mr. St. Albyn), "Oh would she but name the day," which is tuneful, and without the slightest pretension.

The duet following between Arimanes (Mr. Weiss) and Satanella (Miss Louisa Pyne), may be dismissed with the observation that Mr. Balfe does not seem to shine conspicuously in supernatural music, and, if he did, that the scene is hardly capable of being moulded to tuneful purposes. Mr. Harrison's first song, "The glorious vintage of Champagne," is certain to become popular, being exceedingly bold and catching, and written in the true bacchanalian vein. It was sung with immense spirit and energy, and unanimously encouraged. The next song—"The power of Love," sung by Satanella to Rupert in a dream—is the gem of the opera and cannot fail to obtain an equal celebrity with "When our lips" in the Bohemian girl, "The Convent Cell" in the Rose of Castille, or, indeed, with the most popular compositions of Mr. Balfe. It is eminently graceful and melodious, and, being sung to perfection by Miss Louisa Pyne, excited the enthusiasm of the audience to the highest pitch, and was redemanded by the whole house.

The second act opens with what, we may suppose, was intended to be the grand coup of the opera, namely, a scena of the requisite form and proportions for Miss Louisa Pyne, containing a recitative, and andante and allegro movements. As this scena has been withdrawn, being too onerous for Miss Pyne, we may simply state, that it indicated Mr. Balfe's thorough knowledge of the Italian method of writing for the voices, and that the andante was given with great expression, and the allegro with almost unsurpassed brilliancy. The next ballad for Rupert, "An angel form in dreams behold," of the ultra-sentimental kind, is characterized by much sweetness and simplicity, and was awarded the fourth encore. This will be another special favorite. The concerted morceau in this scene, "Behold she's here," in which Satanella discloses to Rupert a means by which he may discover the truth or falsehood of Stella's protestations—namely, by using his "beaver" handwise or headwise—is highly dramatic and effective, and obtained a success similar to the "Ha, ha" scene in the Rose of Castille—to which, no doubt, the poets had an eager eye when they concocted it. Its extreme length and repetitions, however, were rather inimical to its thorough appreciation the first night. The scene has since been considerably abridged, and now goes infinitely smoother and better. The next scene opens with a chorus of pirates, "Rovers, rulers of the sea," which, though pleasing, is somewhat common-place. The solo with chorus, which immediately follows, sung by Mr. H. Corri, as chief of the pirates: "My brave companions," is felicitous both in idea and treatment, and may be reckoned among the choice things in the opera. The ballad with recitative, "Let not the world disdain," another gem for the prima donna, and an undeniable candidate for popular favor, was given by Miss Louisa Pyne, with inimitable taste and the most refined delicacy. A slow cadence at the end, after the manner of that introduced into "The Convent Cell," was deliciously rendered. A chorus of male peasants, introductory to the nuptials of Rupert and Lelia (how that has been brought about the poets do not inform us) "Smile, oh, heaven," constituting a part song, as it were, is melodious and striking, and extremely well written for the voices. The accompaniment, however, is perhaps hardly in keeping with a gentle invocation. This was encoored with acclamations. The bridesmaids' chorus and dance, "To Hymen's love-crowned altar now," is pastoral in character, and very pretty, and leads to the finale, which is worked out with spirit, if not with power.

Act the third opens with a diablerie scene in the hall or cavern of Arimanes, containing an invisible chorus, "Upward from the nether world," and duet for Arimanes and Satanella, "Tho' the angry bolt has sped." As we have said above, Mr. Balfe has not entire command of his resources, when he is in the world of spirits. Give him only terra firma, or a well-built brig at sea, and no composer can go to his work with greater zeal and determination. This infernal music, in fact, should never have been written—never composed—never allowed to be sung. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Weiss did their utmost to render it effective; but the devil himself, and his imp, could do nothing for it. From the lower regions to Tunis is but a short step. The comic scene in which Hortensius (Mr. George Honey), Rupert's tutor, and Carl (Mr. St. Albyn), the old lover of Lelia, are about to cudgel each other at the instigation of the pirate, dramatically speaking, is better suited for a burlesque than an opera, but, musically considered, is exceedingly clever. A chorus and dance, "Merry Tunis," a merry tune is, and leads to the best concerted morceau in the opera. The bustle and stir of the slave market is capitally exemplified and skilfully treated. A quintet, "Oh, woe! despair," was so attractive and so admirably sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mr. Harrison, Mr. St. Albyn, and Mr. Corri, as narrowly to escape an encore. The air which Satanella sings, "Sultana Zulema," in order to fascinate the Vizier, is full of character and simple beauty. Still more attractive is the air, "Would'st thou win me," with tenor accompaniment, with which Satanella brings the Vizier to her feet. Both were delightfully warbled by Miss Louisa Pyne, who, up to this moment, it will be acknowledged, had executed considerably more than a prima donna's average share of the music. Nothing daunted, however, and apparently not in the least fatigued, the fair artist attacked the bravura, with which the act terminates, "Old man, thyself deceiving," and brought down the drop scene amid a hurricane of applause.

The fourth act is the weakest. With the exception of a serenade for chorus, "Haste, lovers, haste," and a ballad for Rupert—another effusion of sentiment for Mr. Harrison, but extremely taking withal—the act is devoted to a long and not particularly interesting trio, which forcibly recalls the last situations in Robert le Diable and the Huguenots, in which the multiplicity of the incidents is only surpassed by the impossibility of the motives. Suffice it, that Satanella repents of being a doomed sojourner in Hades, and accepts a rosary from Lelia, with which she keeps at bay "auld Clotic" and his minions, who come to take her home, and is straight wafted up to the skies, to the utter discomfiture of the father of all evil.

A few words must serve to chronicle the success or the opera, which was triumphant from first to last. At the end of the first act, Miss Pyne, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Balfe were recalled. A similar compliment was paid them at the end of the third act and the fall of the curtain. On the last occasion the enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 18, 1859.—ROBERT GOLDBECK has just started a new system of class teaching, after the style of the Conservatoire de Paris. He designs having three separate classes, the first of which, shall perform the works of such masters as Liszt, Chopin, &c. He intends to give at the end of every quarter a concert in which the pupils, assisted by professional vocalists, shall take part. A certain tenor singer, (well known in Boston,) has taken exception to his plan, and blames him for allotting to the members of his third and lowest class the accompanying of the vocalists—for accompaniment, he says is an art of which not more than a dozen players in New York are masters.

To judge from many specimens of accompanying that may be heard at concerts in this city, this remark is not far from the truth. I don't mean to say that the accompanists always lose their place, or commit any decided blunders, but they are generally fearfully mechanical and automatic in their performances. I have rarely heard a German who could accompany better than a street organ. The German musician may be very wise, and overflowing with Bach, and gushing over with Gluck, and gorged with Beethoven, and actually choking with Mendelssohn, but he is generally no more able to accompany elegantly, than is the elephant to leap gracefully from tree to tree.

ARTHUR NAPOLEON is one of the few good accompanists I have heard. He at once appreciates the composers meaning. HENRY C. TIMM is first class—in every respect, a model accompanist, but sometimes too nonchalant and careless. THEODORE EISFELD is much the same in style.

Talking about Arthur Napoleon reminds me that the little pianist—little only in size and age—gives his farewell concert on Friday, previous to starting for Albany, Troy, Hartford, and Boston. Last Sunday evening he presided, by invitation of the organist of the church, at the organ at Dr. Chapin's, in Broadway, and though the organ is not his instrument, he exhibited great skill in his performance. At this church they have adopted the system of congregational music, the children of the Sunday school taking the lead. They are carefully drilled every Saturday, learning the rudiments of music under the tuition of an able teacher. As the congregation is very large, and as they join in freely, the singing of such fine old tunes as "Old Hundred," "Dundee," &c., has a noble effect.

In a previous letter I gave an account of the FERNI Sisters, the Italian violinists, and told how a rich nobleman wanted to marry one of them, and blew his brains out into her lap because she refused. Now this was a very pretty, touching story, and bordered on the horrible; it therefore irks me to retract and inform you that the report was all a humbug, and that the sisters themselves deny its truth, and that the cautious and wary "Trovatore" was decidedly sold. But what says the Owl Book? I refer you to Paragraph XXXV, page 642.

However, the Ferni sisters are really in trouble now. They have a cherished young sister, who has also great musical talent, though she has not appeared in public. A few weeks ago, this sister visited Lausanne, on Lake Geneva, and in alighting from the rail-car, dropped a violin box. As she stooped to pick it up, the car started, and a wheel passed directly over her right arm, of course breaking it, and preventing the poor girl from pursuing her musical education.

Dear old Lausanne. What a glorious place it is! Situated near the head of Lake Geneva, amid most sublime scenery, with the Alps almost encircling it, there are few places surrounded with greater natural advantages.

It is free, republican, lively, and Protestant. There is a noble Cathedral overlooking the town, and near the Cathedral stands a castle, and a group of old houses surrounded by what was once a ditch, and is now a street. But the city itself stretched far beyond these limits. A mile to the rear is a mountain peak, —a sort of public haunt, whence you can see far off into Savoy, and gaze down upon Lausanne, and even catch a distant glimpse of Geneva. And then a little walk in another direction will lead you to the home of Rousseau, now occupied by an Englishman—and for a quarter you can take the little steamboat to Villeneuve, and so visit Chillon, and see the dungeon where Bonivard was confined, and walk about the "Seven pillars of Gothic mould.

In Chillon's dungeon, dark and old," where Byron's "Prisoner" passed his dreary life. Then, if so disposed, a couple of days journey will take you to the Pass of St. Bernard. But we will go no farther than Chillon at present. TROVATORE.

NEW YORK, JAN. 25, 1859.—ARTHUR NAPOLEON gave his farewell concert on Friday night, at Niblo's Saloon, but owing to a fearful storm, there were but about a hundred there, and the majority of these, belonging to that excellent class of people who should have inscribed upon their brows the explanatory words "CAPUT MORTUUM."

Of course the concert did not pay, though it was an excellent one, and Miss ANNA VAIL, a brilliant, noisy singer, with a rich, well cultivated voice, sang some opera selections. Miss CECILIA FLORES, a young lady of this city, who has recently returned from Europe, where she studied with Persiani, also took part. She sings sweetly, but lacks power. Arthur Napoleon played beautifully, as he always does, especially in a new Fantasia written by himself, on themes from the Huguenots. He has given five concerts here, four of which have been accompanied by violent storms of rain. Mr. Napoleon père says he has decided to visit New York again during some fearful summer drouth, and advertise a concert. It will be sure to draw rain if it does not draw an audience. Last night Arthur gave a concert in Albany, and is proceeding to Hartford and Boston.

The Mendelssohn Union had a meeting the other evening and put it to vote whether they should bring out STEEPEL'S "Hiawatha" music. Some old fogeys said "No! no!" but the majority were in favor, and so the society will go right to work at it. They will devote extra evenings to its rehearsals, and want to produce it on the 10th of February. I suppose Mrs. Steepel will do the reading.

CARL BERGMANN is giving orchestral concerts every other Sunday evening, with fair success. This is an experiment that has been tried before, and depends for its success upon our German residents, as few of our American citizens will go to a concert on Sunday evening.

There are occasional charity concerts, of mediocre musical attractions, but they do not amount to much — Mr. APTOMMAS, the best harpist in the country, gives a matinée on Thursday, where he will allow the audience to select from his large repertoire.

TROVATORE.

HARTFORD, CONN., JAN. 23.—I wonder why my "Dwight" did not come yesterday! I have missed it much to-day — the Berlin articles, the New York correspondence, &c., which I read with the liveliest pleasure. It is with receiving a newspaper regularly as it is with one's dinner; — when you make up your mind that you are to have it at a certain time, and it is not forthcoming, you are at once disappointed and aggravated — apt to say things which you would not say under any other circumstances. So it was with myself yesterday, — after going to the Post-office two or three times, up to a late hour in the evening, and not finding my Dwight, — nor has it yet made its appearance.

There has been a dearth of concerts for some time past — not a solitary instance since I last wrote. The only thing which has partaken of the nature of a concert was a musical gotten up by one of the best, if not the best, of our lady pianists, assisted by Mr. ALBERT WOELTZE, of New York. I am sorry to say that I was unable to be present. The programme was of the first order, the piano-forte selections being made up from the works of Kontski, Heller, Thalberg, Chopin, &c., with one or two compositions by Mr. WOELTZE. The vocal portion was composed of one or two selections from "Les Huguenots," "Il Bravo," &c. Mrs. CLARE HOYT PRESTON, was the principal lady singer — in fact, the only one, and her performances were highly spoken of, as might be expected. Messrs. WANDER, MAERKLEIN and GUNDLACH also acquitted themselves finely, as I learn from the best judges who were present.

All the high board fences about town are heralding the advent of the boy pianist, ARTHUR NAPOLEON

—a fine sounding name, and one which looks well in print, especially on the big, black posters which stare you in the face at every corner. I have a great desire to hear this prodigy, because I have an idea that he is really an artist—not only that, but a true musician. These prodigies usually spring up like mushrooms, and as suddenly disappear; their little heads burning out, like an over-heated stove, long before they arrive at manhood, and that is the end of them. I recollect of RUBINSTEIN's telling us one night in Leipsic how he, ten years before, made his début in London with ten other prodigies, all equally good and astonishing performers on the piano-forte, and of that number he knew of only one who had retained his fame, and that was ALFRED JAELL! Of course he might have consistently added his own name, for of all the most wonderful and astonishing players I have ever heard, Anton Rubinstein takes the precedence. He has lately been appointed, I notice, "chief-musician" to the Court of St. Petersburg. ARTHUR NAPOLEON was giving brilliant concerts in all the large cities of Europe four years ago, and the brilliancy of his career has not seemed to diminish. I understand that after his American tour he will return to Europe to perfect himself in composition.

The "Beethoven Society" are still at work getting up the "Seven Sleepers," by Loewe, and will probably bring them out, when fully awakened, some time this winter. The "clerk of the weather," however, as seemed determined to throw cold water upon the rehearsals for he has tipped his watering-pots bottom side upwards on almost every Friday evening, for one or two months past, thereby deterring a great number of singers from attending, as they would wish. Several other matters I had intended to write about, but I must desist.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for Soprano Solo and Chorus, by FRANZ SCHUBERT.

Annual Meeting of the Harvard Musical Association.

The return of this interesting anniversary was welcomed with unusual eagerness on the evening of Monday, the 17th inst., by all the members within hail. Indeed, the memory of the occasion in past years had grown so pleasant, and the report thereof so tempting, that no one kept away who could by any possibility be present. We met, as usual, in the sumptuous parlors of the Revere House, where there was nothing wanting, except fresh flowers (kept back perhaps for another festival the next night), to make the good cheer and æsthetic sentiment of the symposium perfect. Considering the filial relation in which this Journal stands to the Association, how generally read among its members, and how large an influence, direct or indirect, those members have of late years exercised in the musical movement of this neighborhood, it becomes us to make some record of those delightful hours, although of course it is impossible to seize and fix the life and sparkle of what was in its nature so impromptu. We can only briefly note what was done in the way of business, and add some few reminders of the supper table, which will be valued by those at least who were there, and possibly tantalize a little those who were not. But first, for the information of the uninitiated, let us briefly state what the Harvard Musical Association is, by recalling a paragraph from our last year's report.

The H. M. A. grew out of a little musical club of undergraduates at Harvard University, called the "Pierian Sodality." It was formed in 1837, on Commencement day, and was at first a union of actual and past "Pierians." The objects were partly social, partly practical. It was hoped that such a union would lead to a fuller recognition of Music among the branches of a liberal culture in the University; that funds might be raised in course of time for the foundation of a musical Professorship; that a Musical Library might be collected; but above all, that the mere association of educated men in such a cause would tend to rise the general respect for Music, at that time not by any means profound or hearty. The Professorship is still in the future, though Alma Mater has done something, has employed a teacher of singing in the College walls. The Library has become a notable and solid fact, as we shall see. But the chief fruits of the union are found in the social impulse which it has given to musical culture in the highest sense. Confined chiefly in its memberships to graduates, it has also added to its numbers not a few other gentlemen of musical, literary and artistic culture, and now combines a weight of character which cannot but have influence. By the exertions of its members our noble Boston Music Hall became a fact; in them this Journal of Music found its first enouragement; the first Chamber (Quartet) Concerts were given in Boston under their auspices; and constantly suggestions spring up at its meetings which lead to public action.

The hours from 7 to 9 P. M. were devoted to business. Reports of the Directors, the Treasurer and the Librarian, showed that the bantling had reached the age of manhood (twenty-one years), sound and vigorous and bidding fair to be a useful member of society, and ever mindful of his Alma Mater. Several new members were voted in, and the officers of the past year were re-elected, to wit:

President, H. W. Pickering.
Vice President, J. S. Dwight.
Cor. Secretary, Dr. J. B. Upham.
Rec. Secretary, Henry Ware.
Treasurer, J. P. Putnam.
Directors at large, } Dr. F. E. Oliver.
 } C. F. Shimmis.

A hearty vote of thanks was passed to our brother WARE, to whose unwearied care, discretion and good taste, the improvement of the Library for several years has been particularly due. And here we will insert, as a document likely to interest the friends of music generally, the Librarian's Report.

Since the last meeting of the association, the proposed arrangement with the Boston Athenæum, to which reference was made in my last Report, has been carried into effect, and now at last this Library, which for more than twenty years has been passed from hand to hand among those who were willing to shelter and care for it, exposed to many perils of fire, water and thieves, has found a secure resting place and constant oversight and care in an alcove of the Athenæum in Beacon street. * * * * The books have been arranged as conveniently as possible, in relation to their subjects, upon the shelves of the alcove assigned to us which in a few years, they will completely fill; they have been catalogued by shelves, and each volume properly numbered, so that each has its proper and permanent place. A complete card catalogue has also been prepared, giving the full title and description of every volume in the Library, and a copy of the printed catalogue has also been renumbered, which will be found at the Librarian's desk, and may be consulted for the purpose of finding any particular work. * * * *

The removal has also required a considerable outlay for binding, partly for the preservation of the books, and partly that their appearance should not discredit the general character of the books upon the shelves of the Athenæum Library. They are now in quite good order, but the somewhat hard usage that is inevitably given to all volumes of music, will in the future demand a somewhat larger outlay for binding, than we have formerly expended. The works of Mendelssohn are still in sheets, and I have not thought proper to remove them from my own custody until they shall be as far as their nature permits, well bound. A good deal of the imported music, scores, operas, &c, comes in paper binding, and comes to pieces the first time it is opened, and thus requires immediate and careful binding. The entire number of bound volumes is now about seven hundred.

The books are accessible at all times to the members of the Harvard Musical Association, whether proprietors of the Athenæum, or not, under the same general regulations as heretofore. They will be received and delivered, and charged by the Athenæum Librarians in a separate book, in the same manner with the books of that Library. They are also open for consultation by persons entitled to the privileges of the Athenæum, but can be taken out by our own members only. It will of course be absolutely necessary that the rules for the use of books should be observed with strictness, under the present arrangement, which is incompatible with the looser system that may be permitted when the books are constantly more or less under the eye of an individual; and all members using the books will confer a favor by replacing them carefully in the places where they belong.

A list of the additions of the last year has been printed (see below) and is here for distribution. With this and the similar list of last year, our printed catalogue is complete. * * * *

In former years the Library was indebted very largely to the donations of individual members for its increase, the number of volumes purchased being a very small proportion to those given by individuals. Of late years but very little has been done in this way, and I again bring the matter to the attention of the Association, as many members undoubtedly have what they could well and gladly spare, to be placed upon the shelves. The Library appropriation is expended mainly upon such works as are comparatively rare or costly, and not in the possession of individuals.

We have been indebted for six years to Mr. Nathan Richardson, for the yearly publications of the "Bachgesellschaft," of Leipsic, and we have now assumed the subscription which he has given up and shall for the future be enrolled among the subscribers to this great work. * * * *

In giving up the immediate charge of the Library, which has been under my care since 1857, I should acknowledge the pleasant intercourse and acquaintance which I should not probably otherwise have enjoyed, with very many members of our fraternity, and should congratulate them on the freer access that they can now have to our books, and on the good care that they will receive in their present resting place, where they will doubtless remain till, in some future time, they may possibly be given to the charge of our Alma Mater for the benefit of the Harvard Professor of Music.

The following appropriate Resolutions were then offered by Mr. Ware, in relation to the death of our much esteemed associate, FRANCIS LOWELL BATCHELDER, of Cambridge:

Whereas since the last meeting of the Harvard Musical Association, the hand of Death has taken from us one who had been closely identified with its interests and its pleasures;

Resolved, That we hold very dear to our hearts the memory of FRANCIS LOWELL BATCHELDER; that we recall with pleasure the recollection of his singularly pure and lovely Christian life and conversation; that we esteem it a privilege to have known and loved one who was in every way so worthy of affection and esteem, and that here especially and on this Anniversary which brings to mind the pleasant recollections of college days and college friends, we shall long recall to memory the face, the presence, and the conversation of him who has gone from among us.

Resolved, That we tender to his family our sincere sympathy for the irreparable loss that they have sustained and rejoice with them in the painless recollections of his blameless life and character, and that these Resolves be transmitted to them and entered upon the Records of the Association.

Before the Resolutions were passed, Dr. J. B. Upham spoke as follows:

It is with much hesitation, Mr. President, after the beautiful and touching tribute just rendered to the memory of our departed brother, that I rise and attempt to add a single word. But the relations sustained between Batchelder and myself were such and so intimate, while he was living, that I cannot refrain from giving some expression to my sorrow at his early death.

As is known to most present, he was, for many years, a member of this Association; and, whether in the capacity of private fellowship, or as one of its most faithful and efficient officers, he had always its best interests at heart. It was here and in this connection, as, likewise, in his capacity as clerk of the Boston Music-Hall Association, where he performed his duty most faithfully and assiduously, that my acquaintance with him began; an acquaintance always coupled with esteem and respect; which soon ripened into friendship and ultimately into intimacy and the strongest attachment. More particularly, during the last two years of his life, were we drawn together by the bond of sympathy in a common object and topic of interest—having relation, I mean, to that noble structure—the embodiment both of science and of art—the Organ which was his favorite instrument.

I have now in my possession, a ruler made from one of the keys of the old organ in Christ Church, in Cambridge, where our friend was accustomed to worship, and where he often officiated as organist in the three or four years preceding his death. This relic he gave me on the morning of my departure for Europe, a couple of years ago. The instrument from which it was taken, was, in itself, a curiosity, and in its day a valuable work—some of the incidents of whose history are most interesting and remarkable; it having been built so early as about the year 1760, by the famous John Snetzler, of London, robbed in the Revolutionary war, by the besieging army under Washington, of its six leaden stops (which were then put to a more practical use,) and taken down and exchanged for the present instrument some dozen or fifteen years since—an event (this last) over which Batchelder, in his gentle and refined taste, never ceased to mourn. I mention this anecdote, Mr. President, otherwise irrelevant, perhaps, at the present time, as indicating, in some sort, the appreciative and artistic tone which pervaded our friend's nature. And this it was, I can add my testimony, which characterized his whole life; a spirit of gentleness, and refinement and kindness and goodness of heart; a love for the picturesque and beautiful in Nature, and for Art in all its forms,—for Music especially. Add to this a cultivated mind, a well stored intellect, urbanity and affability of manner and of conversation, and do we wonder it has been said of him—he never had an enemy, he never lost a friend?

Mr. Batchelder was by no means demonstrative of his talents or his acquisitions. His voice was rarely heard in our meetings, though no one was more constant and punctual in his attendance. So it was elsewhere, whether in the business, the duties, the rational enjoyments of life. He did much, he said little. But by a certain something, more easily felt than described, one could not be with him much without acknowledging his excellence and his moral worth. And if we could see, as some believe it will be in our power one day to see, the shadows imprinted on the surrounding objects with which we come into proximity in our daily life—both publicly and in retirement—daguerreotyped, photographed as it were, we should read all around I am sure, in his case, the record of a beautiful and blameless life.

The last time I saw our lamented brother in health was on the occasion to which I have alluded. On my return home, a few months afterwards, he had gone South, to escape the severities of our New England spring. After a few months sojourn, he came back, and I visited him (in company with my friend, Dr. Derby,) at his quiet home in Cambridge. We found him cheerful and happy, and full of hopes of recovery;—for his disease, as you all know, was that mysterious and insidious, one which so simulates health, and steals onward so gradually in its fatal march, and is so almost invariably accompanied by courage and fortitude, and the persistent hoping against hope, that when its end comes, which is death, it appears sudden and surprising; thus, on the occasion of this visit, with our friend and brother; he was himself, as I have said, buoyant and hopeful; to us, however, his doom even then was plainly written in the lineaments of his face. We bade him farewell with well assumed cheerfulness, but with sorrowing hearts, feeling, knowing it to be for the last time.

He went a second time to Florida—like the Ponce de Leon, and innumerable multitudes since, in vain search after the fountain of life—where, in a couple of months, he died—in such manner and with such surroundings as, it seems to me, most fitting he should die, and as he himself, I believe, could most have desired;—in the genial air of Florida, near the coast, not without the presence of relatives and sympathizing friends—the winds blowing on him in cease from the breathing pines inland, and the voice of the sea which he so much loved speaking to him from the shore—and, floating all around him, the melody with which that delicious climate seems laden, in all seasons, summer and winter, in the day and in the night, throughout animal and vegetable life—where, as some poet has beautifully expressed it, even

"The mute still air
Is music slumbering on her instrument."

Thus he died—died as he had lived, patient and uncomplaining to the last; calm and happy, and peaceful and resigned; still trusting in God; in the exercise of a Christian faith, and in full hopes of a glorious immortality.

At 9 o'clock the folding doors were opened, and disclosed a table spread with nectar and ambrosia, and adorned with emblematic figures, fit to grace a banquet of sons of Apollo—a table so formidably grown in length since last year (between forty and fifty guests sitting down), that it needed such electric wires of song, speech, poetry, and winged wit, as were there in abundance, to bring us near enough together. Mr. President took the head, with distinguished guests on either hand, on whom he evidently had designs. There was Longfellow, with the poetic, genial presence, eloquent as words, and there was the "Autocrat," and there was Fields, and Prof. S. G. Brown, of Dartmouth, and Hillard, and many more choice spirits, a sure warrant that the "feast of reason" should not fail. The singing "mediums" had concentrated themselves at the lower end, near that galvanic battery of tones, a Chickering "grand," at which brother Willcox presided—determined all to make up by the warmth of song for such remoteness from the sunshine of the Presidential countenance. While all yet stood, the old English canon "Non Nobis, Domine," was sung. A short hour was spent in cheerful discussion of the good things furnished by mine host of the Revere. Then a toast to "our Association," and the practised eye of Mr. President, who also is an Autocrat on such occasions, and yet as suave and beaming with good fellowship as he is full of tact and ever ready, began to glance ominously along both sides of the table reading the secrets of the guilty; but we all knew where his lightning would first strike; for had not brother HILLARD arrived after all, when we were fearing that we should be deprived of that musical eloquence of his which always set the ball in motion—a little late, but evidently so glad to be with us, that his spontaneous little speech was as inspiring as Champagne. Vain, therefore, to arrest its sparkle, to give the manner and the life of it; but this was his text.

Mr. Hillard remarked that he had been unwell during the day, and at one time had determined not to come to the meeting; but he had reconsidered his determination, and was very glad of it. To find himself among his friends of the Association, to see their animated faces, to receive their cordial greetings, had had a restorative influence upon him; he had felt himself growing better from the moment he came into the hall. He advised his medical friends present to prescribe a visit to the Harvard Musical Association in certain forms of illness. He had attended many anniversaries of the Association, and beyond all question or controversy he was not so young as when he began to attend them. But somehow or other, he could not tell how it happened, the moment he found himself among his friends of the Harvard Musical Association, his years dropped away, and he felt like a boy once more. They must keep a fountain of youth somewhere on their premises. He could not make a set speech—he could only speak right on, a few words warm from the heart; and he was glad that he did not hear that foe to all spontaneous utterance—the scratch of the reporter's pen. He concluded with an earnest invocation of prosperity to the club and happiness to its members.

Dr. HOLMES of course was not the man to shrink when our President's eye fell on him. The muse had favored him; she always does. There was a tear too in his voice. Music and Harvard carried the poet's thoughts back to the old gable-roofed house, his Cambridge home, and he sang in verses musical and sweet the "Opening of the Piano," the new Clementi brought from London, and how "we children" crowded round the marvellous box, how "Mary" played on it, restoring quiet, and so on. It was a strain right from the heart; and as the voice ceased its tremulous music, a shadowy hand—of the "Professor"—reached from behind his chair and snatched the verses, so that we have them not; doubtless said Professor will return them some bright morning at that "breakfast table" of us all; but those who only read by day will envy us who heard by night. So too the FIELDS, though it was winter all without, grew musical as birds and running brooks, there in our charmed inner world; a witty, merry strain ran gurgling thence; but vainly sought we to entice the coy and laughing stream into these printed and prosaic channels. Wanting those two poems, where is the life, the two eyes, of our supper portrait!

We have no room nor power to tell what ringing glees were sung, what sentimental part-songs; or what speeches, grave, enthusiastic, humorous, and happy repartees, sprang up spontaneously and made short hours till morning, amid that genial company of doctors, lawyers, poets, artists, merchants, legislators, professors, &c. Some took the shape of practical suggestions and led to immediate action. Thus, counting up the rich and telling voices that there were among us, it was resolved to organize a Maennerchor or Glee Club within the Association, who should keep in tuneful practice for future occasions of this kind. Mention being made of the ill health and proposed journey to the South of that excellent and esteemed young artist, Mr. TRENKLE, and of the complimentary concert to be offered to him by his brother artists, the warmest sympathy was expressed and a committee of ten gentlemen then and there appointed to lend the aid of the Association to this project of the artists. Upon that committee the choir named Messrs. J. S. Dwight, Dr. H. I. Bowditch, James Sturgis, E. D. Brigham, Dr. J. B. Upham, and J. P. Putnam, Henry Ware, F. H. Underwood, George Hews and Eben Dale.

The elegant remarks of Prof. BROWNE, and other good things, some of which did not even find room at the table, shall have room in our next. For the present we must end with showing how the Chair led up the "Judge" and made him play upon the organ, and how well he played when once upon his pedals.

The President then called on the Treasurer of the Association, Mr. PUTNAM, to give some account of the new organ now building in Germany, for the Boston Music Hall, which he had seen during the past summer.

Mr. Putnam said that he arose under great embarrassment, for the President had completely deprived him of the opportunity of making the speech he had prepared. For four successive years he had been called upon, at these Annual Suppers, to make "a few remarks" in response to the sentiment of "Old Put." Whether there was anything in his appearance which reminded the President of that worthy gentleman, or whether the President supposed that because he bore the name of Putnam he must necessarily be one of his descendants he knew not. He was reminded of the story told of a criminal who had been successfully defended by the eloquence of a celebrated lawyer. After the acquittal, his friend said to him, "Now tell us, honor bright, did you steal that horse?" to which the other responded, "Well, I always thought that I did steal it, but since lawyer A.'s plea, I begin to think I didn't."

And so with him, the President had complimented him with that same toast so often, that he began to think, spite of his convictions to the contrary, that he was either a son or grandson of that distinguished gentleman; and so he had been "posting himself up" on his family history, and anticipating that he might be called upon this evening, in the usual manner, he had prepared himself with sundry anecdotes and scraps of history which it had been his purpose to inflict upon his hearers. He was prepared to prove that Gen. Putnam commanded at Bunker Hill, and that he led the choir in his native village, so that he had some claims to being remembered in this association. He reminded his hearers also, that by a singular coincidence this was the birthday-eve of "Old Put," that is, if he had lived until the morrow, he would have been just 141 years old.

He was happy, however, to see that the President had this evening "struck a new vein," and so his friends would be relieved for the present at least from the inflictions he had purposed to put upon them. He was thankful, for another reason, for the President had given him an opportunity to show that he himself had a fair claim to membership in this Musical Association. He had always insisted that he had no right to be there, except upon the lucus a non lucendo principle; for though his passion for music was great, he professed to have no great scientific knowledge of the subject; but now he was called upon to play upon the organ. Well, he could say a few words about it, and it gave him great pleasure to say to his friends, that during the past summer, feeling a deep interest in that work, and at the request of his friend, Dr. Upham, whom we all recognized as the "head and front" of the organ, he took letters of introduction to Dr. Hopkins, the organist of Temple church, London, who had taken a great interest in the building of this organ, and also to Mr. Walcker, of Ludwigsburg, in Germany, the builder of the instrument. And here he would say en passant, that if any of his friends should find themselves detained in London, over Sunday, they would hear at the Temple Church some of the finest church music to be found in that city. Upon reaching Ludwigsburg, which is near Stuttgart, he found it a quiet, retired place, with about 7000 inhabitants and 4000 soldiers, to keep them in order. This did not seem to argue great harmony in the place, but he found it was formerly a place of some importance, and that the soldiers were rather kept there for sake of appearances, than because the inhabitants were particularly revolutionary in their feelings. He found Mr. Walcker a highly intelligent German, a man of note in the place, and of the highest respectability, and character, and he could assure the gentlemen subscribers to the organ fund, that their interests in this particular, could not be in the keeping of a more upright and honorable man. Mr. Walcker expressed his great delight at seeing him, and Mr. P. said that he fully and duly impressed Mr. Walcker with a proper idea of Boston, and its citizens, and in particular with the character of its musical public. He informed him that "Boston State House was the hub of the social system," an idea which the honest German, owing probably to some organic defect in his mind, did not, at first, seem fully to comprehend, but which he, Mr. P. put to him in two or three different ways, so that he finally seemed to yield to the proposition, for he begged him to assure his friends in Boston, with a grip of the hand which told, that they should have an organ, which, with but possibly two exceptions, would be the largest ever built, and equal to any of them in quality. Mr. Putnam visited the manufactory, in company with Mr. Walcker, and then saw what he would call the "organic remains" of the instrument, did not that remark seem to imply that it had already been once completed. He would rather call them the "dissecta membra," (that was classical) of the organ; here a pipe, there some other portions scattered about. He was not "let down" into one of the pipes as his friend, Dr. Upham was into one of the pipes of the organ at Ulm, as into a deep well, but he would warn them that if the noise the pipes make, is proportionate to their size, the citizens of Boston, he feared, would imagine themselves living in the midst of a perpetual thunder storm.

Mr. Walcker had just completed a fine instrument for the cathedral of Ludwigsburg, which he had generously given to it, and he, Mr. P. had the pleasure of listening to it. He had also just finished a very superior instrument for the cathedral at Ulm, which he wished much that Mr. P. should see and hear, it being one of the finest organs in the world. Mr. P. went to Ulm, and passed some time in hearing, what he described as the finest organ which he had heard in Europe, and he had the opportunity of hearing many. He said that he never before fully understood what that noble instrument was, or felt its true inspiration until, at Ulm, he stood beneath the solemn arches of that grand old cathedral, (one of the six finest cathedrals in all Germany) and listened to that wonderful organ. He begged to assure gentlemen, that if Mr. Walcker furnished us an instrument at all comparable to that at Ulm, we should have one of which Boston and the country might well be proud. Mr. Putnam begged pardon for detaining them so long, but begged to be considered now as having some claims to membership, because he had "played upon that organ."

The "Hiawatha" Music again.

To the Editor of Dwight's Journal:

Dear Sir: It is so seldom that I fail to recognize the justice and fairness of all that appears in your editorial columns, that I am sure you will permit me to recall your attention to some remarks respecting Mr. Robert Staepel's "Hiawatha," which appeared in the Journal of last week, and in which I find a departure from the candor which I always look for from you. You speak handsomely of the work, and give the composer much credit; not so much as I believe he deserves, but enough to prevent me from making any allusion to your criticism, had it been merely upon a question of taste. It is some matters of fact which you have not sufficiently considered, that I desire to speak about; and even concerning these I should have remained silent, but for your endeavor, while uttering your own opinion, to throw discredit upon that of others, who, not without care and thought, have placed a higher estimate upon Mr. Staepel's composition than you appear inclined to do.

The remarks to which I refer, are contained in the following extract from the Journal, (Jan. 15.)

The testimony of the great majority of those who heard the work is much more warm, in many instances amounting to enthusiasm, and in some cases to the most desperate extravagance of praise. Newspaper critics riot in superlatives, as if they had discovered a new Shakespeare. They talk of its marking "an era in our musical history"; of "his infinite resources of counterpoint and imitation" (more could not be said of Bach or Handel); of "imaginative and creative genius of the highest order" (what is there left to say of Beethoven or Mozart?); of having "found no instrumental writing finer than this of Mr. Staepel's," and more ad nauseam. Let us, at least, avoid all such extravagance. Better for the artist that his work fail to meet due recognition all at once, or for a long time, than that it go forth coupled from the first with such pretensions. Never was any Beethoven or Mendelssohn, in countries where they do appreciate such efforts, greeted on a first production in such terms. The title to such epithets can only be established in the course of time.

Of the four quotations from notices by "newspaper critics," which you introduce, I have seen only one — the last, referring to Mr. Staepel's instrumentation. I do not doubt, however, that they are correct, although the one which I recognize is not fairly printed in your paper, an italicism (1) having been introduced, which needlessly intensifies the opinion, with a view, of course, to render the contrast between it and your own more marked. But assuming the quotations, let me ask what there is in them that indicates the desperate and nauseating extravagance of which you complain? First, "Hiawatha" is said to mark "an era in our musical history." You will hardly deny that of all musical works originally produced in this country, Mr. Staepel's is so incomparably the best that no other can be named with it. Hence it is right to assert that when such a composition, claiming comparison with those of acknowledged European masters, is written and first performed in America, an event which has never before occurred, an era (2) in our musical history is marked. Second, Mr. Staepel's "infinite resources of counterpoint" are spoken of — (it may be supposed that here, again, the word "infinite" is forced beyond its meaning by an italicism which the original writer did not employ) — to his praise. (3) I can only say that so far as this subject demands them, the composer's resources of counterpoint are without limit. In "Hiawatha" you will find on examination some contrapuntal writing which is perfect in its way; and sufficient to show how much farther the composer could have gone, had he chosen. By your allusion to Bach and Handel, who were masters of the fugue and little else besides, it may be supposed that you reject this claim of contrapuntal learning on the part of Mr. Staepel, because no fugues are found in "Hiawatha." Their absence is rather to be set down to his credit, since such effects would be wholly out of place in a piece of this character. I believe it is correct to suppose that the declaration of Mr. Staepel's resources of counterpoint are intended to apply solely to their employment in "Hiawatha," and as such discover nothing desperate or nauseating in it. If I thought they had any reference outside of "Hiawatha," I too would go beyond the record, and convince you that the composer has produced fugues as correct and learned as any by the masters you have mentioned, by sending you one or two for publication. As it is, I would prefer to confine myself to the consideration of "Hiawatha" only. Third, Mr. Staepel is said to possess "imaginative and creative genius (4) of the highest order," which you object to, because more cannot be said of Beethoven or Mozart. If I understand the term aright, in this connection, Mozart's

"imaginative genius" cannot be called of the highest order. He was so deficient in imagination that his music very often fails to express the meaning of the words to which it is applied, and sometimes exhibits an entirely opposite spirit; which, after all, does not interfere seriously with his claim to be considered the greatest composer of his age, and, in some respects, the greatest of all time. Beethoven's "imaginative genius" assuredly was of the highest order, but it does not appear that either of these composers attempted to illustrate a subject of such new and extreme difficulty as the one which Mr. Stöpel has chosen, and I very much doubt whether either would have succeeded better, in the specially characteristic portions of the music. Mr. Stöpel's means were unprecedentedly limited and unpliable; observe what he has effected with them. His extraordinary power of idealization, and, at the same time, preservation of the true spirit, of his theme, is what constitutes his claim to imaginative genius of the highest order. The assumption of the highest creative genius, I admit, in this case, too much. Mr. Stöpel has not shown it; but you will see, as indeed you have said, that in this work no proper opportunity is afforded for such display. Probably the critic's knowledge of other of the composer's writings caused this remark. I am willing to allow, however, that here the boundary of prudence was overstepped, and that Mr. Stöpel has not proved himself a Beethoven or a Mozart, so far as creative genius goes, at the first leap. Fourth, one says he has "found no instrumental writing finer than this"—a remark not hastily nor heedlessly uttered, but the result of careful examination, and comparison of the score, page by page, with works of the best orchestral composers. (5) No such judgment, thus formed, should be repelled, excepting after similar investigation, and I do not think, Mr. Editor, that, after investigation, you would have any wish to repel it. I am firmly persuaded of its entire justice.

In order that I may not be misunderstood in what I claim for Mr. Stöpel, let me say briefly what opinion I entertain of his work as a whole. I certainly do not place it beside the greatest compositions of Beethoven, Mozart, or Mendelssohn. At the same time I believe that it marks "an era in our musical history," as above explained; that it shows a musical learning surpassed by no composer of these days; that it indicates the highest imaginative genius, in its exquisitely poetic and artistic illustration of a peculiarly unmusical subject; that it contains specimens of instrumentation equal to any ever written; that most of its melodies are unique and beautiful; and that it is as perfect a portrayal of the subject as could be looked for. Of course, it is not all equally excellent, and has its weak points. Some passages—a very few—are commonplace; that is to say, the composer has made use of forms which are the common property of all composers. But altogether considered, it ought to rank as one of the most important musical productions of this time, and must stand as the most important ever brought out in America.

You must allow me to say, Mr. Editor, that I do not consider your arguments against the present recognition of "Hiawatha's" merits at all convincing. You intimate that this work should rather languish for a long time in obscurity, than go forth coupled with the "pretensions" which I have endeavored to sustain, because—Beethoven, Mendelssohn and others were not at first appreciated. This, certainly, is the idea that you convey—because the greatest composers of the world were not at first appreciated, Mr. Stöpel should not be; because they suffered from critical coolness during their lives, this gentleman, too, must wait for fame until the time when it can afford him very little satisfaction. (6) The "course of time" may be sure in establishing the title to eminence, but it is lamentably slow; and I believe that it is the duty of all whose influence can quicken its measured progress, and aid the struggles of aspiring genius, to heartily and sympathetically extend their encouragement when they may with justice do so. To come to particulars, I believe it is the duty of every writer on musical subjects, to closely examine a work like this of Mr. Stöpel, before rendering any opinion upon it, and above all, to respect such opinions as are based upon this principle, even when opposing them.

I feel myself justified in thus defending what has been said in commendation of "Hiawatha" against your gentle sarcasm, because it seems throughout your notice, that you have hardly viewed the composition from the right standpoint. You have treated it as a work of less dignity of purpose than it really is. (7) A single example will explain my meaning. You say, in speaking of "the Beggar's Dance, that 'the Indians must have known rum and white men before they danced to such tunes.' Here the misconception is palpable. We have nothing to do with tunes to which the Indians danced. The composer's idea was very far from that of reproducing the particular music which accompanied the wild dances of the Indians. He meant to give a musical picture of the gay scene at Hiawatha's wedding; a suggestion of the sports in which for the moment Pau-Puk-Keewis was the principal actor. The composer's intention was poetic and ideal; the one you attribute to him is vulgar and prosy in comparison.

I had intended to leave out of consideration everything that might be esteemed a question of taste, and I hesitate to dispute your assertion that "Hiawatha" is monotonous, for that reason. But after all, it is not exclusively a matter of taste. "Hiawatha" is composed of fourteen numbers, each one of which is different from the other in style, time, and rhythm. How then, can it be pronounced monotonous? (8) Had you said dull, I should have doubted, but in silence.

I need not assure you that my dissent from the views you express upon this subject does not conflict with the respect and esteem I entertain for the Journal of Music, and that my object in endeavoring to sustain my own opinions, and those of many others, is only to properly bring before the public the claims of a composer in whose genius and abilities I feel a deep trust.

Yours truly,

II.

NOTES ON THE ABOVE.

1. The italicism here, as elsewhere, was not intended to "throw discredit" on any one's opinion, but simply to direct attention to the unqualified character of the statement which we pronounced and still pronounce extravagant. We trust this removes the only shadow of a ground for charging us with want of "candor."

2. Many an event in this world's history, the birth of a child for instance—has, when looked back upon, been said to mark an "era." But it is a mind of rare prophetic insight that can confidently read the era in the very hour the child or the event is born. The consequences of an event must be somewhat unfolded before we common mortals can proclaim an era. Now we cannot deny, neither can we affirm that "Hiawatha" is "incomparably the best" work yet produced in this country, we not having heard some of the largest claimants. But even if it were, would that make it an event necessarily of any very great importance to the world? Wait and see what influence it will have, and whether it will shape or color much the musical future of our country: then it will be time enough to say it marks an "era." It may be very fine, nay, even a work of real genius, and yet fall far short of that. Therefore we would forbear (and that was meant to be the moral of our article) passing presumptuous judgments, and we must still regard this "era" talk as verdant, hasty, over-confident, extravagant.

3. These claims no doubt are honest, springing from sincere enthusiasm: but are they modest? Who is the man among us, unless we had a Mendelssohn or Beethoven, that is competent, on a few hearings, or a reading of a score, to pronounce a composer's contrapuntal resources "without limit"? One must have exhausted all the possibilities of Art to be able to say that S. can do all that Bach or Handel did! We should not dare say that at once of any man, even if he were another Bach; such candidates must wait examination of their peers. And he who says that Bach and Handel were "masters of the fugue and nothing else" (?) would, we seriously fear, be among the last to recognize a really great work should it appear among us. Again, correct writing, of fugues as of other things, is not enough to make a Bach, any more than it is to make a Shakespeare. There may be infinite distance, as to genius, charm, expression, meaning, &c., between fugues equally "correct."

4. To question Mozart's "imaginative genius" because his music means more than the trash of words to which he often wrote, or to attribute the highest order of such genius to Mr. S. because he has been happy in the musical illustration of a more difficult poetic subject, than Beethoven ever undertook, shows, in either case, a very superficial notion of "imagination," "genius," "creative faculty," &c. We have no room to discuss it. Mozart wanting in imagination! Much as we were pleased with Mr. Stöpel's music, we find more imagination in one of Zerlina's little songs than in the whole of "Hiawatha;" we appeal to mankind. But our critic seems to waver in the re-assertion of his own strong statement.

5. "No instrumental writing finer than this." Were Mendelssohn to say that, we should place some trust in the opinion. But who of us—nay how many, think you, even of our best musicians, are really competent, from simply reading score with score, to say of a new work, that it is equal to the best orchestral writing of the greatest masters! If a thing is so great as that, it must take time to find it out, at all events if it be something new in kind.

6. You mistake our meaning. We did not say that this composer ought not to be recognized at once, because greater men than he were not. We only sought to show, by great examples, that in the very nature of the case the highest kind of genius cannot be recognized at once, except perhaps by here and there an individual of the rarest insight.

7. You mistake us again. We did not mean that Mr. Stöpel's purpose was to embody real "live Indian" music in his "Beggar's Dance;" but to hint that the quick movement thereof sounded to our ears by no means original, and very like, almost identical with some common, far from ideal jig that white folks dance to.

8. A musical work, a play, a poem, anything, may be "monotonous," although its form and time should change at every step. Still it may leave a monotonous impression on the mind. A perpetual succession of new images is no safeguard, necessarily, against that; while on the other hand (to come back to our friend's peculiar stumbling block), an organ fugue of Bach (!) that changes not in tempo, stops, degree of force, or thematic phrases, from beginning to end of the longest, shall sound ever fresh and new to us.—Ed.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Mme. BISCACCANTI and Miss JULIANA MAY, give a "Combination Concert" in the Music Hall this evening, which certainly combines many elements of interest. It will be an opportunity which no Bostonian would like to miss of hearing once more Boston's most accomplished prima donna, after years of triumphs on the operatic stage in Italy, France, Russia, South America, &c., while it will afford a new chance to appreciate the merits of the younger artist more fairly. They will be assisted by Signor BISCACCANTI, violoncellist, MESSRS. LANG and BAUMBACH, pianists, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. . . . CARL ZERRAIN's second Philharmonic Concert will take place next Saturday evening, when the orchestra will play Mendelssohn's A minor Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, the Fackeltanz of Meyerbeer, &c., and a violin solo will be performed by M. COHEN. Perhaps also the German "Orpheus" will contribute some part-songs.

We have the programme of the closing soirée, for the past year, at Mr. E. B. OLIVER's excellent "Mendelssohn Musical Institute" in Pittsfield, Mass. This gentleman and his assistants, persevere successfully in the good work of inculcating a taste for truly classical music in their many pupils. The performances on this occasion were all by the young ladies, who are said to have done great credit to themselves and their instructors. The pianoforte pieces were a Rondo, (4 hands) by Clementi; Sonata Pathétique, Beethoven; Sonata in F, Mozart; Adagio (4 hands), Thalberg; Rondo brillante, S. Heller; Sonata in D, Mozart. The vocal pieces were Schubert's "Elogy of Tears"; Kücken's "Return of Spring," (two-part song); a song with guitar, "Miller's Maid," by Gould; and two-part song, "The May Bells," Mendelssohn. This is in delightful contrast with the usual dreary sentimentality and clap-trap of Seminary musical exhibitions. . . . They have capital programmes of orchestral music at the concerts of the "Classic Music Society" in New Orleans, under the direction of Mr. G. COLLIGNON. This, for the second of the series, Jan. 5th, could hardly be beaten: Part 1. Overture to Iphigenia, Gluck; Concert-Stück, Weber; Andante, Haydn; Overture to Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Part 2. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Music Abroad.

London.

(From the Athenæum, Dec. 25, 1858.)

At the last Musical Soirée of the Eighth Season of the Réunion des Arts, M. Wieniawski was the principal vocalist. He is associated with M. Julien in his coming "farewell" tour through England, which is to precede that triumphant, artistic, philanthropic, and scientific promenade round the globe,—to which allusion has been made in the Athenæum. It seems unreasonable, to the verge of absurdity, that so little chamber-music is possible in London before Valentine's Day. M. Sainton is about to take a short flight to the Continent,—Herren Molique and Pauer and Mr. Sloper are silent,—Signor Piatti and Pezze might simply be practising their violoncelli at home, for any noise of quartets and trios which reaches our ears. In fact, a strange Viennese, or Cremonese, or Parisian, who had alighted in our capital during the past month—so memorable for its darkness,—might have been excused had he gone home and printed in his book of travels that there was only one solitary instrumentalist to be found in London after "the House is up,"—that one being Miss Arabella Goddard. Verily, the inconsistencies in musical Art of the English are odd.

The list of operas to be produced during the coming French season at the St. James Theatre, is ample, and runs as follows:—"By Auber: Domino Noir, L'Ambassadrice, La Sirène, Le Maçon, Fra Diavolo, Les Diamans de la Couronne, La Part du Diable, Haydée, Le Philtre. By Herold: Pré aux Cleres, Marie. By Adam: Le Chalet, Postillon de Longjumeau. By Ambroise Thomas: Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été, Le Caïd. By Halévy: L'Eclair, Les Monsequaires de la Reine. By Boieldieu: La Dame Blanche, Le Petit Chaperon Rouge. &c. By Grétry: Richard Cœur de Lion, Zémire et Azor. A good list is the above; yet,—though in no respect "fish-like," something "ancient." There are little operas by composers like M. Réber,—("Les Papillotes," to name one), or by M. Messé—"Les Noces de Jeannette," (to instance another), which would be acceptable in London, and are especially adapted to a company such as the one about to open its accounts with the public on Wednesday. But the management, no doubt, speculates on the English love for that which is known—not to say well worn. In any event, we hope that its success will enable it to fulfil its intention, which is stated to be the permanent establishment of an Opéra Comique in London.

At the Crystal Palace Concert, on Saturday last, was performed the music of Mendelssohn's Operetta, known here as "Son and Stranger," by Mrs. and Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Wilbye Cooper as principal singers.

The Drawing-room Opera written by Mr. Palgrave Simpson and Signor Biletta, for a company comprising Mrs. Enderssohn, Mrs. and Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Patey, is now, we understand, ready to start;—and, on New Year's Day, will put itself bodily into railway-carriages with a van for stage and "properties,"—and commence its journey from town to town in the true old Thespian style. It is the wise intention of its members, we learn, to work themselves up to the most perfect finish in the provinces before attempting performance in the Metropolis.

The journals of the week have announced that Dr. Bennett's "May Queen" is the musical work commanded, according to usage, for the New Year's performance at Windsor Castle.

M. Rémusat's comic opera company began their proceedings on Wednesday evening with "La Part du Diable," in which the principal character was taken by Madame Faure. This lady, who has sung chiefly in the French provinces since her marriage, will be best known to the frequenters of operas by her maiden name as Mlle Petit-Brière:—and in that most remembered for the lively way in which she gave the couplets of the camel-boy in M. Auber's "Prodigal Son."

Madame Viardot is expected in London very shortly. Mr. H. Leslie's Biblical Cantata, "Judith," will be performed at St. Martin's Hall early in March, with herself, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti, in the parts sung by them at Birmingham.

PARIS. A new tenor, M. Montaubry, has appeared at the Opéra Comique of Paris, in a new opera, "Les Trois Nicolas," by M. Chapissou, with considerable success, both as actor and singer. The piece itself seems to be a poor one, and is built on incidents, which never happened, in the life of Dalayrac, the well known French composer. Correspondents in Paris state, that it will be premature to expect M. Meyerbeer's new opera, with only three characters and no chorus, for some months to come.

THE ITALIAN THEATRE IN PARIS.—M. Calzado, director of the Italian Theatre, lately brought an action before the Tribunal of Commerce against M. Galvani, one of the singers, to have his engagement for the season declared null and void. His advocate represented that Galvani had been engaged at a very liberal salary as primo tenore assoluto, but that he had made a complete fiasco in the first part which he played—that of Lindoro in the Italiani in Algeri,—and that he had been pronounced by some newspaper critics not to be at all equal to the position he had taken; and the advocate contended that every theatrical engagement was held to be void when the performer failed to please the public, in proof of which he cited various law authorities and precedents. M. Galvani, on the other hand, through his advocate, stated that M. Calzado had not engaged him until after he knew that he (Galvani) had sung with success in Italy, Germany, and Belgium; that foreign journals had spoken highly of his talent, and that it was on the express recommendation of no less a person than Madame Borghi-Mamo, a competent judge of singing, that M. Calzado had engaged him. He further said that on the first night he had been afflicted with a cold, but that nevertheless if some journals had spoken ill of him, others had spoken well. He produced a certificate from Duprez, who is now director of the singing school at the Conservatoire, to the effect that he had a veritable tenor voice, and he said that M. Calzado's reason for wanting to get rid of him was that, in addition to Mario and himself, he had engaged two other tenors, Graziani and Belard, and did not need four. Galvani therefore prayed that the action might be dismissed, and that M. Calzado might be condemned to pay him a month's salary, which fell due on the 1st of November last. M. Calzado's advocate begged that three experts might be charged to report on the extent and quality of Galvani's voice; but the tribunal, without noticing this request, decided that the engagement of a performer can only be put an end to when it shall be clearly proved that the public have received him with marked disfavour, and that M. Calzado produced no such proof with regard to Galvani. It therefore rejected his action "for the present," and ordered him to pay Galvani 2,571*fr.*, his month's salary, due on the 1st of November last.—Galvani's Messenger.

M. Borlioz, in his last feuilleton, speaks so emphatically in praise of Madame Barbot, the new soprano who lately appeared at the Grand Opéra of Paris,—that, once again, we will hope her success there to be a real success, in spite of the praise in the papers. It is certain, at least, that such favour as the lady has gained owes nothing to "puff preliminary." The project of re-building the theatre on the site of the Hôtel Osmond has been, wisely, abandoned; a less convenient situation (as has been already said) hardly existing in Paris. Miss Thomson, the young English lady whose promise attracted attention at a late Concert of the Conservatoire, has made her début at the Grand Opéra of Paris as Mathilde in "Guillaume Tell."

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
SONG OF THE SEA. Poetry by Mrs. N. Thompson. Music by W. R. Dempster. 50

A new song from Dempster's pen, with that melodious flow and spirit, which is one of the happy peculiarities of this popular writer.

WHEN THERE'S LOVE AT HOME. A Song for the Fireside. McNaughton. 25
A light, pretty ballad.

TELL ME, YE SOFTLY BREATHING GALES. Cavatina. L. A. Denton. 30
For mezzo soprano voice, demands fluency of style and smoothness of delivery. It is well adapted to please in small as well as in large circles.

HAPLY YOUR LORDSHIP. (Se vuol ballare.) From Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." 30
A graceful air in three quarter time, sung by Figaro in the first act of the Opera, and a capital light song for a baritone voice.

WILLIE'S ON THE SEA. Song. J. Ford. 25
An easy song in the sentimental style.

WHO SHALL BE FAIREST? SONG. Frank Mori. 25
An effective ballad, which has proved a drawing piece in the author's concerts in England.

LIKE A DREAM, BRIGHT AND FAIR. (M'appari tutt' amor.) From Flotow's "Martha." 30
Lionel's celebrated romanza, in the original key of F. Another version: "Flow so fair," &c, music two notes lower, (in the key of D,) was published some time ago.

Instrumental Music.

NEWPORT LANCER QUADRILLE. (With Fig's.) 30
This quadrille will be recognized by the visitors of Newport last season and the frequenters of the late state-balls at Philadelphia as a familiar one.

MARCH COSAQUE. Charles Wehle. 30
This piece, as the Berlin Correspondent of this Journal writes in one of his latest communications, is in the hands of almost every piano-player in Germany.

LE FLOT MELODIQUE. Valse élégante. C. Fradel. 30
A very taking waltz of medium difficulty. We predict a great popularity for this composition.

SILVER SPRING. (Silberquell.) Fritz Spindler. 4fi
A charming impromptu in the form of a modern study, much less difficult than the works of this writer usually are. The music fully justifies the propriety of the title, which promises silvery strains inexhaustible.

EVER OF THREE. Foley Hall's popular song, transcribed by Adolph Baumbach. 30
A nice arrangement of the now well-known air, adapted to the wants of the majority of piano-players.

AGUSTA POLKA. G. W. Stratton. 25

GENTLE RIVER WALTZ. " 25

KEARSANGE MOUNTAIN WALTZ. M. Clarioni. 25

ANNIE LAURIE SCHOTTISCH. W. C. Glynn. 25

SONS OF MALTA QUICKSTEP. Barrows. 25
Light and pretty dance music.

THE GOLDEN WREATH. A choice Collection of Favorite Melodies, designed for the use of Schools, Seminaries, Select Classes, &c. Also, a Complete Course of Elementary Instructions, upon the Pestalozzian System, with numerous Exercises for Practice. By L. O. Emerson. 30

This popular book has now reached its one hundredth edition, with a daily increasing sale. In fact, for many months past, the demand has with great difficulty been supplied, though several steam presses have been constantly at work to meet it. The present edition contains a large number of songs that have been issued since the first publication of the book, and have attained a popularity sufficient to call for their insertion in a volume which contains all the favorite melodies of the day.

Poems at the Burns Festival.

BOSTON, JANUARY 25, 1859.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

His birthday. — Nay we need not speak
The name each heart is beating, —
Each glistening eye and flushing cheek
In light and flame repeating!

We come in one tumultuous tide, —
One surge of wild emotion,
As crowding through the Frith of Clyde Rolls in the Western Ocean;

As when yon cloudless, quartered moon
Hangs o'er each storied river
The swelling breast of Ayr and Doon
With sea-green wavelets quiver.

The century shrivels like a scroll, —
The past becomes the present, —
And face to face, and soul to soul,
We greet the monarch-peasant!

While Shennstone strained in feeble flights
With Corydon and Phillis, —
While Wolfe was climbing Abraham's heights
To snatch the Bourbon lilies,

Who heard the wailing infant's cry, —
The babe beneath the shieling,
Whose song to-night, in every sky,
Will shake earth's starry ceiling. —

Whose passion-breathing voice ascends
And floats like incense o'er us,
Whose ringing lay of friendship blends
With Labor's anvil chorus!

We love him, not for sweetest song, —
Though never tone so tender, —
We love him, even in his wrong, —
His wasteful self-surrender;

We praise him not for gifts divine, —
His muse was born of woman, —
His manhood breathes in every line,
Was ever heart more human?

We love him, praise him, just for this;
In every form and feature,
Through wealth and want, through woe and bliss,
He saw his fellow-creature!

No soul could sink beneath his love, —
Not even angel blasted; —
No mortal power could soar above
The pride that all outlasted!

Ay! Heaven had set one living man
Beyond the pedant's tether, —
His virtues, frailties, He may scan,
Who weighs them all together!

I fing my pebble on the cairn
Of him, though dead, undying,
Sweet Nature's nursling, bonniest bairn,
Beneath her daisies lying.

The waning suns, the wasting globe
Shall spare the minstrel's story, —
The centuries weave his purple robe,
The mountain-mist of glory!

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

I.

A hundred years! they're quickly fled,
With all their joy and sorrow,
Their dead leaves shed upon the dead,
Their fresh ones sprung by morrow!
And still the patient seasons bring
Their change of sun and shadow,
New birds still sing with every Spring,
New violets spot the meadow.

II.

A hundred years! and nature's powers
No greater grown nor lessened!

They saw no flowers more sweet than ours,
No fairer new moon's crescent; —
If she would treat us poets so,
Would so from Winter free us,
And set our slow old sap aflow
To sprout in fresh ideas!

III.

Alas! I think, what worth or parts
Have brought me here competing
To speak what starts in myriad hearts
With Burns's memory beating;
A theme like this would Bryant choose,
Longfellow, Holmes, or Whittier;
If my poor muse can't fill their shoes,
Pray pardon her and pity her.

IV.

As I sat musing what to say
And how my verse to number,
Some elf in play passed by that way
And sank my lids in slumber;
And on my sleep a vision stole
Which I will put in metre,
Of Burns' soul at the wicket-hole
Where sits the good St. Peter.

V.

The saint, methought, had left his post
That day to Holy Willie,
Who swore; "Each ghost that comes shall toast
In brimstone, will he, nill he;
There's none need hope with phrases fine
Their score to wipe a sin frae; —
I'll chalk a sign, 'to save their tryin,' —
A hand U and Vide infra!

VI.

Alas! no soil's too cold or dry
For spiritual small potatoes,
Scrimped nature's spy the trade to ply
Of diaboli advocatus,
Who lay bent pins on the penance-stool
Where Mercy spreads a cushion,
Who've just one rule for knave or fool,
It saves so much confusion!

VII.

So, when Burns knocked, Will knit his brows,
His window-gap made scunter,
And said: "Go rouse the other house,
We lodge no Tam O' Shanter!"
"We lodge!" laughed Burns, "now well I see Death cannot kill old nature,
No human flea, but thinks that ho
May speak for his Creator!

VIII.

"But Willie, friend, don't turn me forth,
Auld Clootie needs no gauger,
And if on earth I had small worth,
You've let in worse, I've wager!"
"Na, nane has knockit at the yett
But found me hard as whunstone,
There's chances yet your bread to get Wi Auld Nick, gaugin' brimstone."

IX.

Meanwhile the "uncle guid" had ta'en
Their place to watch the process,
Flattening in vain on many a pane
Their disembodied noses;
Remember, please, 'tis all a dream,
One can't control the fancies,
Through sleep that stream with wayward gleam
Like midnight's boreal dances.

X.

Old Willie's tone grew sharp's a knife;
"In primis, I indite ye
For makin' strife wi' the water o' life
And preferin' aqua vite."
Then roared a voice with lusty din,
Like a skipper's when 'tis blowy,
"If that's a sin, I'd ne'er ha' got in,
As sure as my name's Noah!"

XI.

Sly Willie turned another leaf: —
"There's many here have heard ye,

To the pain and grief o' true belief,
Say hard things o' the clergy!"
Then rang a clear tone over all: —
"One plea for him allow me,
I once heard call from o'er me, 'Saul,
Why persecutest thou me?'"

XII.

To the next charge vexed Willie turned
And, sighing, wiped his glasses, —
"I'm much concerned to find ye yearned O'er warmly tow'rd the lasses!"
But David cried: "Your ledger shut,
E'en Adam fell by woman,
And hearts close shut with if and but If safe, are not so human!"

XIII.

Then sudden glory round me broke
And low melodious surges,
Of wings whose stroke to splendor woke Creation's farthest verges;
A cross stretched, ladder-like, secure
From earth to heaven's own portal,
Whereby God's poor, with footing sure,
Climbed up to peace immortal.

XIV.

heard a voice serene and low,
(With my heart I seemed to hear it,)
Fall soft and slow as snow on snow,
Like grace of the heavenly spirit;
As sweet as ever to new born son
The croon of new made mother,
The voice begun, "sore-tempted one!"
Then, pausing, sighed, "our brother!"

XV.

"If not a sparrow fall, unless
The father sees and knows it,
Think! recks he less his form express?
The soul his own deposite?
If only dear to him the strong
That never trip nor wander,
Where were the throng whose morning song
Thrills his blue arches yonder?"

XVI.

"Do souls alone clear-eyed, strong-kneed,
To him true service render,
And they who need his hand to lead,
Find they his heart untender?
Through all your various ranks and fates,
He opens doors to duty,
And he that waits there at your gates
Was servant of His Beauty.

XVII.

"The earth must richer sap secrete
In time, could ye but know it!
Must juice concrete with fiercer heat
Ere she can make her poet;
These larger hearts must feel the rolls
Of stormier waved temptation,
These star-wide souls between their poles
Bear zones of tropic passion.

XVIII.

"Her cheaper broods in palaces
She raises under glasses,
But souls like these, heaven's hostages,
Spring shelterless as grasses;
He loved much! that is gospel good,
Howe'er the text you handle;
From common wood the cross was hewed,
By love turned priceless sandal.

XIX.

"If scant his service at the kirk,
He paters heard and aves
From choirs that lurk in hedge and birk
From blackbird and from mavis;
The cowering mouse, poor unroofed thing,
In him found mercy's angel,
The daisy's ring, brought, every spring,
To him Faith's fresh evangel!

XX.

"Not he the threatening texts who deals
Is highest 'mong the preachers,

But he who feels the woes and weals
Of all God's wandering creatures;
He doth good work whose heart can find
The spirit 'neath the letter;
Who makes his kind of happier mind,
Leaves wiser men and better.

XXI.

"They make Religion be abhorred
Who round with darkness gulf her,
And think no word can please the Lord
Unless it smell of sulphur;
Dear Poet-heart, that childlike guessed
The Father's loving-kindness,
Come now to rest! thou did'st his best,
If haply 'twas in blindness!"

XXII.

Then leapt Heaven's portals wide apart,
And, at their golden thunder,
With sudden start I woke, my heart
Still throbbing full of wonder;
"Father," I said, "'tis known to thee
How thou thy saints prearest,
But this I see—Saint Charity
Is still the first and fairest!"

XXIII.

Dear Bard and Brother! let who may Against thy faults be railing, (Though far, I pray, from us be they That never knew a failing!)
One toast I'll give, and that not long,
Which thou would'st pledge if present,—
To him, whose song, in nature strong,
Makes man of prince and peasant!"

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

How sweetly come the holy psalms
From saints and martyrs down,
The waving of triumphal palms
Above the thorny crown!
The choral praise, the chanted prayers
From harps by angels strung,
The hunted Caneron's mountain airs,
The hymns that Luther sung!

Yet, jarring not the heavenly notes,
The sounds of earth are heard,
As through the open minster floats
The song of breeze and bird!
Not less the wonder of the sky
That daisies bloom below;
The brook sings on, though loud and high
The cloudy organs blow!

And, if the tender ear be jarred
That, haply, hears by turns
The saintly harp of Olney's bard,
The pastoral pipe of Burns,
No discord mars His perfect plan
Who gave them both a tongue,
For he who sings the love of man
The love of God hath sung!

To-day be every fault forgiven
Of him in whom we joy;
We take, with thanks, the gold of heaven
And leave the earth's alloy.
Be ours his music as of Spring,
His sweetness as of flowers,
The songs the bard himself might sing
In holier ears than ours.

Sweet airs of love and home, the hum
Of household melodies,
Come singing, as the robins come
To sing in door-yard trees.
And, heart to heart, two nations lean
No rival wreaths to twine,
But blending, in eternal green,
The holly and the pine!

The Diarist Abroad, No. 14.

My idea of what we mean by the term classic? Certainly. Simply this. Time was when the modern languages were uncultivated, and still in a rude, chaotic state. All literary labors, all state papers, all scientific works, all teaching in Universities, all was in the Latin language. The student then took the pains to learn to speak and write Latin correctly and with elegance, which he now bestows—or should bestow—upon his mother tongue. Certain books in Latin and Greek were universally acknowledged to be models of elegance in style, in depth of thought, in logical development of idea, in rhetorical form. Now, I have always supposed that these, being used as text books in the "classes" of the Universities (not classes, of course, in our American sense), came to be called "classic" or "classical."

As the modern languages grew to perfection, the works of great thinkers, if also distinguished for elegance of style, would naturally, as models for young authors, come to be called "classical" works in their respective tongues. All such terms are apt to be extended in their significance. So this term has been adopted also in Art, and we hear of the "classic" models of sculpture, painting, architecture, which Greece and Italy offer to the student of those arts.

In music the experience of two or three centuries has proved that certain forms of composition, certain modes of vocal writing and instrumentation afford the most permanent satisfaction. The works of the Raphael, the Phidias, the Michael Angelo, the Rubens, the Corregio of music, whoever they are, are the works which are most perfect, as judged by those rules and principles which experience has drawn from the study of millions of pieces of music of all forms and kinds. These works we offer to the student of music as models upon which he is to base his future reputation and success. The ephemeral novel of the day finds more readers than a volume by Emerson, Hawthorne, Prescott, or Macauley, of our time, or than any of those volumes of older date, which every scholar capable of judging decides to be the highest and noblest models for the use of the English language. So the last new waltz or polka finds a hundred purchasers where a Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven Sonata finds one. So too a flashy quartet or quintet from some ephemeral opera is sung by hundreds while the sextet in "Don Juan," which, according to Rossini, is the greatest thing of the kind in existence—the highest classic therefore—goes begging for singers. The best models from which to learn a language are not the most popular books, the best models in music not the most popular pieces. The works of certain old Italian writers, of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Beethoven, afford more or less examples in all departments of the musical art, in which one finds the highest perfection of form, of elegance of expression, of depth of thought, of skilful use of voices and instruments. The bad music of these great men is not classical just because they wrote it; their good music is, simply because it is good. That which is worthy of being studied by the student as a means of instruction, may be called classical. We are not obliged to write like Bach and Handel, even if we could; and yet only by making such as them our "classics," until we have caught their spirit, can we ever reach any great eminence in musical composition. A. W. T.

Mr. Fry on "Hiawatha."

We copy the following, from the New York Tribune, as one of the curiosities of criticism.

MR. ROBERT STOEPEL'S ROMANTIC SYMPHONY OF HIAWATHA.—It is not our usual custom to make a notice of any composition of music intended for large masses of performers and a public audition before it has been rendered in this City. There are reasons, however, why a work composed by a resident European or an American should receive superior, and even eccentric attention, inasmuch as its character has to be made here, and is not established already abroad; and the public, we are sure, are ready to receive not only the criticism on such a work but the work itself in a kindly spirit, and care nothing for names, provided they are pleased. It is only necessary that the composition of the music should be genuine, the quality of the executants good, and the persistence of the performances secured up to the time that the hearers are familiarized with the work. A new name in the circle of the muses ought to be welcomed, for the public ought to be weary of the endless praises of Handel, Haydn and Mozart; seeing that they find the Messiah an infernal bore, yawn through five-sixths of it, are only aroused by the Hallelujah Chorus, provided there is a colossal choir, and by two or three other portions of the work, and one-half of them leave the concert room wearied, as they did when it was magnificently performed at Tripler Hall, with an extra full vocal department, and the incomparable monster orchestra of Jullien; seeing, too, that they yawn through four-fifths of Don Juan, where the voice accompanies the orchestra, and not the orchestra the voice, and there is no climax of plot, and none of impassioned lyrical ecstasy; seeing, too, that the highest achievement of composition, the opera, alongside of which all else is easy, was never essayed successfully by Haydn, who, like Handel, accordingly took to the lower art of oratorio-writing—doing it nobly, however, but still a much inferior thing to that of the Shakespearian department of music for the stage; seeing, too, that the sense of honor is so squelched in mercantile rapacity and religious hypocrisy that the "American Academy of Music" of this City, whose charter was drawn up and passed by the Legislature for national lyrical purposes, for eliciting native compositions, for the end of elevating the taste of the people to an understanding of the intellectual value of domestic art, and its peership with literature, and even Congressional speeches, and not of pirating ready-made operas always and killing our own works—does nothing for native art, but everything against it. Seeing this and much more, we say a new name ought to be welcomed. Mr. Stoepel, accordingly, we mention in connection with his work. This musical production has been given in Boston. Of course the composer lost money by it—twelve hundred dollars—but that is a rule where a nation is wanting in duty to itself, as ours always is in everything relating to civilization which cannot be imported ready-made. Wherever we can take anything at second hand, we do it, like a herd of snobs. But Mr. Stoepel deserved a better fate, and is about to try again in Boston, and also in this City soon, assisted by the Mendelssohn Union.

We have not heard Hiawatha, but have read the full score. It is thoroughly artistic in the art performances, and illustrates modern art, which, of course, in many details is in advance of the classics—otherwise, why have flutes ten keys instead of two; violins a Paganini method instead of a Viotti; double basses, a Bottesini instead of a Dragonetti; music, ethereal forms instead of mechanical fugues; and so throughout the chapter. We mention this incidentally in reference to the ordinary braying about the classics. A word of criticism on this work: The first thing to look to in every composition is melodies. Poor melodies, like Handel's, may be backed up and sanctified by words from the Bible, but they are not the less poor; heard without the words, not even saints would listen to them. A melody is to be considered utterly dissociated from the words. Its rhythm, of course, must be imbedded in and shaped to the last azimuth of an accent by the words, but when cut loose from them it must stand superbly alone by its own beauty. Such melodies can be set to hand-organs; and if they cannot they are bad melodies. But, they may have a certain merit, acting and reacted upon by the harmony, and by the virtue of beautiful sounds in combination, by the loveliness or halowness of the words, and by the majesty and beauty of the singer. A composer, Mendelssohn for example, who could not make a salient melody for the public, may be very delightful in other relations—great finish of detail, nice sense of chromatic or coloristic qualities in the orchestra, and so forth. There is but one test of good melodies—their popularity, ultimately established after sufficient hearings. Some melodies are more slowly taken hold of than others. Some very vulgar ones become popular; but no melody that is really good will fail to please an audience if sufficiently often rendered. Of the memorable qualities of Mr. Stoepe's melodies we can say nothing, as only time and the public can decide; all we hazard is that they are intelligently written, with a beginning, middle and end, and lie easily under the voice. In the matter of accent he is correct. In form, where so much license is allowed, and none of the frenzy and condensation of the stage required which so multiplies the composer's difficulties, and lessens his chances of success, Mr. Stoepe is happy. "The Beggar's Dance" may be cited as a happy piece of grotesqueness and hurry-scurry; the introduction of the barbarous sub-seventh of the Highland pattern, particularly well founded. The address of the Great Spirit, accompanied by trombones, is a nice piece of recitation. There is a trio of a very naïf melody; and the finale is well worked up. The harmonies are varied and appropriate. Mr. Stoepe has had the good sense to leave out "learning" when not needed—his business being poetry and not pedantry. A composer who would listen for a moment to certain self-constituted critics, would be sure to have his work damned. We once heard every piece of a certain work, which was subsequently encored, condemned by a would-be musical authority—they were not "learned." The only difficulty was, they were too profound to be understood by people who affect to despise melody, and do not comprehend the higher mysteries of dramatic harmony. The instrumentation of Mr. Stoepe is excellent. He has a clear conception of orchestral divisions: of the art of not overlaying his voices: of knowing what he means to express, and expressing it.

We have written somewhat at length, for we believe in much revolution needed for musical composition, and much increased decency and patriotism on the part of the American public toward native works of art—not that the Americans care for a composition that stupefies them, no matter how venerable a name is attached to it; not that they will not listen gently, kindly, and enthusiastically, to a new work by a home-hand; but because they do not insist upon their own countrymen, by birth or adoption, having a fair chance in their own country; otherwise the American Academy of Music "would not, like a tall bully, lift its head and lie." Art of course is progressive, and the best composer is he who plagiarizes most from all who have preceded. That alone will constitute his learning, his universality, his humanity. When it is found that certain forms are alone graceful, it is the business of the composer to use them, even if they have been used before. When certain chords are terrible—unless he is going to make a new human nature—he must use them. When a certain instrument recalls memories or imaginings of war—of the chase—of idyllic life—of sub-mundane theology, of the middle ages—of chivalric life—of Catholicity—of Protestantism, of the sky, the trees, the flowers, the winds—the composer is bound by his allegiance to Art, not to use the contrary and be false in order to be original. As antecedents are multiplied upon a limited platform, of course the scope for originality is lessened. Some arts have come to a dead-lock as regards originality; this is not so as regards music, though the first thing that strikes every hearer, in attending the performance of a new piece of music, is its resemblance to other things. If it did not resemble them, the musical martyrs of the past ages would have sacrificed themselves in vain to their art. The inevitability of melodic progression; the unyielding laws of harmony; the properties of instrumentation; the canons of musico-verbal accent; the progressions of ideas and the eloquent structure of form, are all common property; and genius is simply the quality which takes these accretions and adds something to them delightful and memorable.

ANALYSIS OF Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

PART I.

This division of the Oratorio presents, first, the sufferings of the Israelites; then the plagues wrought upon the Egyptians; and, finally, the grand miracle of the Exodus, and the impression this made upon the believing people. The narrative of the incidents here embodied is comprised in the first fourteen chapters of the book of Exodus; but the texts employed are taken from the 105th and 106th Psalms, with some occasional passages from the 78th Psalm, and also from the book of Exodus.

Though the texts here chosen constitute a narrative, Handel has treated them dramatically, representing the events they relate as passing in present action before the auditor.

(1). Recit.—Now there arose a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph; and he set over Israel task-masters to afflict them with burthens, and they made them serve with rigour.

The commencement of a work of such grandeur of purpose, such magnitude of design, and such importance of character as the present, with so slight a means of fixing the attention of an audience as an unaccompanied Recitative, unpreceded by any kind of instrumental prelude, unaccompanied by a single chord of the sonorous orchestra to define the termination of the vague period of expectancy, and announce the presence amongst us of the composer,—this unique commencement is an example in Handel of rare confidence, and in itself, if regarded with artistic feeling, is more impressive than any of the effects known when it was written—perhaps than any yielded by the extended resources of the present much further developed state of the art could have been. The text of this Recitative, and of the following chorus, is purely introductory to the grand argument of the Oratorio, and these two pieces may be regarded as forming a kind of prologue to the work, of which the action opens with the succeeding Recitative; the object is, we may well suppose, to impress the hearer with a sense of the sorrows of the people of Israel,—to make us feel how deep a suffering of theirs induced the awful miracles that were wrought for their deliverance: the Recitative simply recounts the circumstances of their condition; aiming at no expression, but prompting us only with the cause of the heavy anguish that is depicted in the following movement. Any attempt to give expression to this plain narrative text would have been an extravagant squandering of means, exalting into undue importance a simply explanatory passage, and so taking from the effect of the subsequent appropriate employment of the artist's resources, where the most powerful expression is demanded: thus Handel, confident in his own manner of treating it, trusts his subject to the sympathy of his audience as their best preparation to receive it, and makes his tenor singer, in whom always he appears to have placed his chief reliance, stand forward not to excite interest in himself, but to direct attention to the intense interest of what is to follow.

(2). Chorus.—And the children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage, and they cry came up unto God. They oppressed them with burthens, and made them serve with rigour; and their cry came up unto God.

The elaborate, and, at the same time, pathetically expressive character of this piece, at once announces the profound earnestness of purpose that pervades the entire work, which is an equal demonstration of the masterly skill of the technical musician and of the passionate feeling of the poetical artist. We must distinguish the three elements of which the movement is composed, in order to trace them through their various and very ingenious combinations: first, the pathos embodied in the opening bars of Alto Solo, with the poignant and graphic rendering of the word "sigh'd," which constantly occurs with the repetition of this portion of the text by the body of voices; second, the ecclesiastical character conveyed in this Canto Fermo,— the theme upon which all the contrapuntal contrivances of the movement are grounded, and from the peculiar construction of which, formed as it is according to the Dorian mode of the Gregorian system, results the correspondingly peculiar character of harmony that prevails in this Chorus, save only in those places where the sighing of the sorrowing people is embodied in the inartificial progressions of our modern natural harmonic scale; third, the didactic, or, it may be, the imitative character contained in this passage,— which forms the chief counterpoint (or independent melodic accompaniment) to the Plain Song quoted above, and is possibly, it is not quite vain to fancy, designed to represent the weary restlessness of the Israelites toiling under the burthens with which their taskmasters oppressed them. I have only further to remark upon the singularly beautiful and very modern progression of harmony upon which the words, "And the children of Israel sigh'd," are first set for the choral voices,—which forms a striking episode in the stately gravity that mostly prevails throughout the movement.

(3). Recit.—Then sent He Moses, His servant, and Aaron whom He had chosen; these showed his signs among them, and wonders in the land of Ham.

He turned their waters into blood.

What has preceded may be considered as more or less analogous with the opening Recitative and the Overture in Mendelssohn's Elijah; and as the real action in that work commences with the first Chorus, so it does here with the present Recitative. This passage, like that at the beginning of the Oratorio, being plain narrative, is, with the same purport, set in the unpretending form of unaccompanied Recitative: the closing phrase, however, which tells the incident of which the effects are depicted in the next Chorus, is distinguished by having to be sung in definite rhythm, and it is connected with what is to follow by being in the same key; it conveys an obviously purposed expression, in the descent of the melody to the final word, of the especial horror that word suggests.

(4). Chorus.—They loathed to drink of the river. He turned their waters into blood.

Now that the fugal form has passed out of habitual use in composition, and is employed rather for the purposes of exercise than as the most familiar mould for the development of a musical idea, we marvel when we find an example of the very great dramatic power involved in it, and can scarcely credit that a vivid embodiment of a multitudinous emotion should be comprised in a rigid specimen of technical elaboration, which, apart from all merit of expression, is to be criticized by the severest tests of schoolcraft, and found wanting in nothing. Such is the case with the present Chorus; it is one of the most strict fugues Handel produced, and it is one of the most striking instances of musical expression extant. I will not specialize its many points of musically excellence, but with reference to its poetical merit I will adduce, first, the peculiar presentation of disgust and loathing conveyed in the progression of singular intervals composing the Subject,— and second, to the wide generality of this sickening sensation, conveyed in the successive entry of the several parts of the choir, and in the constant recurrence, always unexpected, always with some fresh variety of contrapuntal complexity, of the especially significant Subject.

The Subject of this Chorus is identical with that of the fugue in A minor in the set of Six Fugues for the Harpsichord of the same author, and many points in the conduct of the composition are similar; the present piece is, however, little more than half the length of the original, and in respect of constructive merit it is as greatly improved as shortened by the condensation. We have the right to assume that Handel selected this Subject for second elaboration because of its especial fitness to the words, to their just declamation, and to the perfect embodiment of their sentiment.

(5). Air.—Their land brought forth frogs, yea, even in their king's chambers.

He gave their cattle over to the pestilence; blotches and blains broke forth on man and beast.

One might suppose, from the evidence of the singular construction of this very unique work, that it had been the composer's first thought to present the entire series of the Plagues and the Deliverance in an unbroken chain of choral movements,—a grand conception, worthy the greatness of the subject to be illustrated; but, if we give a moment's entertainment to such a supposition, it can only be to make us reverence the more the profound judgment of Handel, that could induce him to reject so fascinating an idea when his sensitive appreciation of the susceptibility of his text discerned in the words of the present piece an inappropriateness to choral treatment as great as is the peculiar fitness of all the subsequent passages in this division of the Oratorio to the multitudinous rendering of them he has given: with admirable discretion, then, if ever he conceived such a thought, he abandoned it for the purpose of delivering the text in so quiet a manner as would embody the sense of the entire passage without obtruding the abstract signification of the separate words upon the sense of the hearer. The only apparent purpose of illustrating the words in this song is the fanciful imitation of the leaping of frogs by the skips of the two violin parts in alternation, which are imitated occasionally by the bass; these form an accompaniment to the voice at the commencement, — but ceasing with the change of words, have merely such slight occasional recurrence in the sequel as to give unity to the entire composition. Beyond this, the simple, unaffected declamation of the text is the sole means employed to render it emphatic. One incident of musical beauty, apart from any purpose of expression, is too striking to escape observation; I refer to the unexpected change of key that introduces the words, "He gave their cattle," which assumes especial prominence because of the else unbroken smoothness of transition that prevails throughout.

The beauty of Mendelssohn's organ-part to this song is peculiarly conspicuous; its sustaining through the broken figure of the string instruments, — its supporting the voice where Handel has left nothing but a bass part, — and its relieving this by some charming artifices of counterpoint founded on the suggestions of the meagre original score, all tend to carry out the composer's idea, and they realize for it an aspect of beauty which the slight skeleton he has left is quite inadequate to present.

(6). Chorus. — He spake the word, and there came all manner of flies and lice in all their quarters.
He spake; and the locusts came without number, and devoured the fruits of the ground.

From hence to the conclusion of the First Part, we have an unbroken succession of Choruses. There exists not, I believe, a parallel example of so long continuous an employment of the entire means at a musician's disposal, — so long continuous a disregard for popular effect in leaving ungratified the public craving for the personal interest of a Solo singer, for the concise rhythm and definite phraseology of a Solo composition: the master, manifestly, felt here the stupendous greatness of his subject — felt the total inadequacy of all conventional means to embody the grandeur of his conception; and, impelled by this feeling of a creator, wrote with the single consideration of the noble work on which he was engaged; he made the constant employment of his entire means, from whence a writer who wanted self-reliance might have apprehended monotony, yield the effect of ceaselessly accumulating power, and he makes such an appeal to the emotions of an auditory with any perception of the aim of art and its achievement, as must draw them with him, forgetful of the habitual exigencies of an exacting crowd, step by step in the gigantic course his genius alone could plan — his genius alone could accomplish. Such an auditory distinguishes the musical character of our time from that of the period when Handel wrote; and though we must be at least equally susceptible with his contemporaries of the charms of the lighter forms of musical composition, we have acquired what they possessed not — the power to revere, to watch with interest, and thus finally to appreciate, and even to comprehend the development of a design so mighty as the present; and hence the equivocal success that marked the original production of this Oratorio could not, I believe, have attended the first production of such a masterpiece before a now existing London public.

We have to notice in this Chorus, the imposing announcement of the divine commandment, the stern solemnity of which gives severity and dignity to the effect of the whole scene; the peculiar distribution of the voices in all but the declamation of the first four words, which, by their generally acute pitch, by their distinctness from the tone of the instruments, and by their change of harmony with each word, give singular distinctness to the enunciation of the text, and great prominence to the peculiar passages for the violins that accompany them; this constant motion of the violins, which suggests to our fancy with a graphic reality, at which we marvel the more, the more we admit it, the ceaselessly busy vitality of the innumerable multitudinous insect existence; and finally, the felicitous reserve of the continuous power of the bass instruments until the first entry of the words, "And the locusts came without number," when the introduction of their grave tones upon this ponderous passage, — suggests the thought of the darkness of the countless cloudlike coming of the winged host that veiled the face of heaven.

(7). Chorus. — He gave them hailstones for rain; fire, mingled with the hail, ran along upon the ground.

This wonderfully exciting Chorus is one of the most remarkable triumphs of extreme simplicity in perhaps the whole range of music, — extreme simplicity, the extreme of power in the hands of him who owns the power to wield it, who has that confidence in himself which proves his reason for such confidence — the sense of sublimity. With the simplest harmonies, with the simplest modulations, with the absence of all form of contrapuntal contrivance, and of all complication of vocal and orchestral combination, this prodigious inspiration produces an effect irresistible as it is unique. The idea first suggested to us is of the falling of single raindrops, which rapidly increases in rapidity and volume, until, at the entry of the voices, one might suppose the heavens to open and pour forth the torrent of Divine anger in a single sheet of water; then, at an unexpected transition of key, there breaks forth a cry of "Fire!" which is answered from side to side of the echoing choir, and speaks the terror with which the bewildered multitude are appalled on witnessing this new phenomenon of Omnipotent vengeance; next, the remarkable distinctness with which the words make themselves heard in this passage, so conspicuous for that peculiar cross accent which modern hearers are accustomed to associate with the idea of Beethoven: — mingled with the hail, ran a-long on upon the ground. and finally, the colossal force of the passage where the bass voices and instruments proceed in an uniform motion of quavers against the detached chords of the rest of the choir, that make us think of an immense stream of burning lava, and of the shrieks of the amazed masses, who stand as spellbound, gazing on the inevitable means of their own annihilation.

(8). Chorus. — He sent a thick darkness over all the land, even darkness which might be felt.

This Chorus conjures up the most terrible picture in the whole of the marvellous series, — a picture so supernatural, yet so truthful, that it at once identifies itself with our liveliest sympathies, and places us in a scene with which, but for this medium, it would be impossible for us to sympathize. We perceive in our imagination the darkness, not as the mere absence of light, but as a heavy tangible substance hanging like a pall over nature. The supremacy of music above the other arts as a medium of expression, is especially proved by this wonderful presentation of a vague, mysterious awe, such as the prodigious appearance the text describes would excite: language might catalogue the emotions of men thus confronted with the wrathful power of Deity under its most fearful aspect, the withdrawal of that light which is the constant pledge and token of its benignity, — painting might imagine the outward workings of these emotions, as they who suffered them were supposed to shrink within themselves in abject, hopeless agony, or to break frantically forth in the impotent ravings of desperation, — but this music proves that music can awaken the emotions in our own hearts, and make us feel the feelings it literally presents anew in its representation, so tempered however, by the medium of the ideal through which they are conducted, as to color even their terrible sublimity with the prismatic hues of beauty. The technical means Handel employed to translate his true inspiration to the world, are those since used with masterly power by Mendelssohn in his Elijah, and in his Greek tragedies, — the form, namely, of Choral Recitative; and we have not only to admire his perfectly successful anticipation of one of the legitimate resources of the art most recently acknowledged in the repertory of the musician, but equally to wonder at the extremely modern harmonic progressions that support this extraordinary piece of declamation, which give to the composition the prophetic character of having foreshadowed to a past generation the utmost to which music may ever hereafter attain.

(9). Chorus. — He smote all the first-born of Egypt, the chief of all their strength.

Here we have a fugue of a very free character, the fugal form being employed but to give the effect of multitudinousness to the expression, to which, and to the grand idea of Almighty power this Chorus most vividly realizes, other elements, also, are combined to conduce. It is constructed upon this Subject: — which is identical with that of the fugue in A minor in the set of Six Harpsichord Fugues, whence the composer has also borrowed in a former Chorus in this Oratorio; and upon this counter-subject, commencing on the third bar of the principal theme: — which is not precisely the same as that in the harpsichord fugue; and these two are worked with masterly fluency, displaying the powerful effects of Double Counterpoint (or Counterpoint that may stand in two ways, either below or above the Subject), and of the most interesting artifice in the development of a fugue, the Stretto (or the compression of the Subject by bringing in the answer at closer and closer periods, making the Subject to form a Canon with itself). This theme was, it should seem, selected, because of its excellent fitness to the words which it declaims with truthful and powerful emphasis; the conduct of the fugue entirely differs from that of the original. A most impressive effect is attained in this Chorus by the measured marking of the rhythm with massive detached chords, given by the chief and the most weighty power of the orchestra; and as much as we are impressed by this, must we admire the excellent discretion with which so individual a figure of accompaniment is occasionally discontinued for just so brief a period as to prevent its becoming monotonous, and to give to it still greater force on its resumption. Thus Handel suggests to his hearers the idea of the stupendous strokes with which the chief of all the Egyptian strength were smitten; thus he makes us comprehend the thought of the overwhelming power which crushed all the first-born as with a rod of iron; and while this Omnipotent might is dealing its inevitable blows of destruction, he presents to us, too, the image of the multitude, heaving like waters in its vastness, on whom the death-strokes fall.

(10). Chorus. — But as for His people, He led them forth like sheep: He brought them out with silver and gold; there was not one feeble person among their tribes.

A most marked change of character distinguishes this Chorus from all that has preceded it, and illustrates most powerfully the altered sentiment of the text. The frank, natural, hearty gladness of the opening vividly suggests the confident elation with which the liberated people issue from their bondage, and this expression rises by reason of its contrast to the representation of their sorrows with which the Overture commences, no less than of its opposition to the embodiment of the terror of the Egyptians suffering under the plagues. Then, in the tranquil, peaceful, pastoral character of the passage that follows, we have a charming metaphor of the loving tenderness of the Good Shepherd guiding his flock with fondest care to a refuge of sweet repose. The contrapuntal style, which so eminently prevails throughout this work, is not forsaken even in the present unstudied, unsought, fluently-written movement, of which the conception appears to have been spontaneous as is the expression; a closely-worked fugal development of this Subject, is the next incident in the conduct of the plan; and, after the recapitulation of the earlier themes of the Chorus, it is resumed with the felicitous device to enhance its interest of a most skilful Stretto. We may suppose this to picture the tumultuous gathering of the treasure-laden tribes, who throng exultingly from all parts of the detested land of their servitude. Finally, with an effect of power peculiarly Handel's own, the vigorous energy of the enfranchised host is made so truly present to our consciousness, that we feel a new strength within us excited by the stirring declamation of the passage; the iteration of the words "not one" is singularly emphatic, and the very simple and natural change of key at the repetition of the phrase is so striking, that no one, however unversed in musical technicalities, can be insensitive to its forcible impression.

(To be continued.)

How the Books were Secured.

A correspondent of the Transcript,—one whom many of our readers will gladly recognize,—writes from Berlin, the following account of the manner in which the library of old musical works was secured (as we stated some weeks since) for our Boston Public Library.

I wish to mention an incident which has an interest for all Bostonians, and signally for the musical student. I believe I am "within the rules" in relating, in this way, what is no longer a secret here,—and I will respond for the entire accuracy of the facts. There died in Vienna, some time ago, a distinguished Austrian General, Herr Von Koudelka, who, to his other titles to distinction, added that of a refined taste for and profound knowledge of music. His zeal for the accumulation of musical literature was proverbial, and his industry unexampled. A sketch of Herr Koudelka's life would, I think, greatly interest a large class of your readers, and perhaps I may give it to them at another time.

The library thus formed soon became noted in the musical world, and when its possessor died, an enterprising book-dealer of this city posted to Vienna, and by a promptness and perseverance more American than German, secured the prize. By the way, this spirit of enterprise, for which our countrymen are so eminent, exists in larger measure in Prussia, especially in Berlin, than in the other States of Germany, there being good reasons therefore, and very interesting ones, on which I hope to entertain you in some future letter. Our energetic, discriminating and wide-awake "Diarist"—the modest and disinterested "Mr. Brown"—gets scent of this rare collection, and the fever of desire burns in his veins. Not for himself, but for Boston, does Mr. Brown desire these the invaluable books: he sighs when he hears the price, and he writhes too, but unlike the slower German, he does not stop there. A hundred and fifty pounds sterling does not grow on every bush. Que faire? Those books must not be lost to Boston:—somehow they must be had. He consults friends; many sympathize, but nobody can aid. Time flies; they are now advertised to be sold by public auction. "Oh, misery, what can I do? Spirit of Beethoven advise me!" (This last is poetical, and not historical, but poetry is sometimes fact, and I am sure this must be an instance.) And a spirit, in his extremity, whispered: "Write to the liberal patron of letters in general, and of the Boston Library in special,—and ask him if he cannot divert a part of the fund already given to the Public Library into this narrow but deep-channel." Like all men of genius, Mr. Brown knew the physiognomy of an "Inspiration," and did not mistake it for a distemper of the brain. So he gave it cordial welcome, sat down and wrote a simple and straightforward letter to Mr. Joshua Bates, (which one of the firm of Barings characterized, in writing to me, as a "clever and excellent letter") stating the need, the opportunity and the way which had occurred to him of securing so desirable a possession for our beloved city. The best commentary on the good "Diarist's" letter, however, is its fruit. A prompt and gracious answer gave permission to draw on Baring Brothers & Co., for £150.

But Mr. Brown has also showed good business tact in this transaction, for he insisted on a rejection of all duplicates from the catalogue, and thus reduced the price to £130. Finding he could drive the price no lower, and being really in imminent danger of losing the collection, (for he had a competitor, and the auction day was approaching) he closed the bargain. After which he "put it" to the conscience of the book-seller, whether he was not entitled to a commission. This proposition rather startled our dealer, who perhaps thought that his customer, like some of our house brokers at home, was looking for a commission from both vender and vendee; but it ended in according our good friend some four or five pounds sterling, pretty hardly earned, as I know; and perhaps even some moralists will here think that Mr. Brown was a little morbidly conscientious, when I tell them that he would not consent to touch these twenty or twenty-five dollars, but put that, too, on the credit side of the fund.

I would not deny myself the pleasure of recording this fact, so honorable to our nature, though I have no authority for making it public; and I cannot, will not doubt, that the zeal and time and labor thus expended for our own Boston Public Library will meet with some adequate reward. We know a class of men who would say—"More fool you, for giving away five pounds which was your own, and which you needed"—and to such it would sound like barren sentimentality to say: "I was in some sense an agent, though not a paid one, and I chose to keep my hands clean of any profit at the expense of my principle." But let us hope, the Herald to the contrary notwithstanding, that we have many amongst us who would feel and act with the "Diarist."

Annual Meeting of the Harvard Musical Association.

(Concluded.)

We add here a few documents for which we lacked room in our last. First a sketch of the happy remarks, made in answer to a call from the Chair, by Prof. S. G. BROWNE, Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature at Dartmouth College, who is an honorary member of our Association, a true lover of the best in music; and whose stay in the city during the delivery of his course of Lowell lectures made his company available, as it was peculiarly welcome. He spoke as follows:

"I should hardly venture to respond, however briefly to your call, did I not feel bound to acknowledge my allegiance to your Fraternity, and to thank you for the kindness which has made me one of your number. You remember Sir Boyle Roche's equivocal invitation to an Irish nobleman: 'My Lord, I hope if you ever come within a mile of my house that you'll stay there all night.' I am sure that if it is ever my good fortune to come again within such distance of your annual gathering, I shall find it hard, if not impossible to resist the central attraction.

"But my mind rather turns to the graver aspects of the subject before us—to the educational influences of the cultivation of music,—especially its effect on the general culture of young men. I am sure we all have had occasion to recognize its healthful influence as a general recreation, as affording a stimulus, gentle and pleasing, to the sympathies and emotions, and serving as a powerful antagonist to the more gross and dangerous forms of amusement and dissipation, to which, for young men away from home and a good deal secluded from society, there is sometimes a strong temptation. Nor can we be unmindful of the fine intellectual results which may flow from that study and practice of this beautiful art, which is daily coming more within the reach of us all. I remember that one of the finest scholars and most devout of men, one who marched over the domain of foreign languages with the easy tread of a conqueror, and early consecrated himself to toil in distant and uninviting fields, for the sake of the good of others, once told me that he thought he owed his power of perceiving the delicacies of a foreign speech, the nice shades of meaning in words, the aroma which exhales from native, idiomatic expressions, more to his study of music than to any other means of discipline. May I refer too—I must, I cannot help it—to another name familiar to you all, of one who brought to science all the modesty and severe thoroughness of a sincere lover of truth, who ever rises before my mind as the image and impersonation of whatever is most pure, delicate and refined, as a model of a Christian scholar and gentleman. I mean the late Dr. Daniel Oliver, to whom music, as I know, was not only a delight and a solace, but an art to be studied as well as enjoyed.

"But to obtain these noble results of the study of music, at which I have barely hinted, or to obtain them in their best forms, is it not necessary that in our colleges and universities there should be some one to serve as a guide and master; who by lectures and instructions, by controlling the musical portion of the devotional exercises of the students, and in whatever other way might be found most convenient, should show the noble use of the art and demonstrate its value.

"I beg your pardon for these crude hints which may be too grave for the occasion, but I have understood this, or something like this, to be one of the objects of your association; and if you succeed in it with respect to the noble university so near us, there will be others who will rejoice in your success, and join with you in a Benedictus and Te Deum."

The next is something which we should have lost, were it not that our reporter was more vigilant than Mr. President in spying game. It is from a brother whose valued company we had missed for several anniversaries, so that Mr. P. very naturally had him not upon his list of victims. It comes to us in this shape:

MR. PRESIDENT. — Pshaw! I mean EDITOR, (I might say Vice, however)—the truth is I have hardly yet got my carefully conned speech out of my mind—Sir, you and the polite and genial circle in which we found ourselves the other night will never know what a shot came near being fired into it, unless I should save up the charge for the next Anniversary, or unless I now rush into print under your auspices.

I confess, Sir, that, having learned wisdom from experience, and knowing that there is no calculating whereabouts, at the supper-table, the chairman's lightning may strike, and having, moreover, been placed on my guard by the special admonition that no one was exempt from the liability to be drawn upon to make contribution to the general fund of entertainment, I had been prosecuting some researches concerning a certain musical instrument once of great importance, though now absolute, a specimen of which, one that had done good service in the choir of a country town not far remote for nearly a century, I had until the last moment expected to have brought with me for exhibition, as a curious relic of past time. Indeed, Sir, a bolt fell very near me, once or twice; but I was spared, I fear for a worse fate, that of being unprepared on some other occasion. Sir, however deferentially we might bow before the eloquence and genius of the orators, professors and poets with whom the President was surrounded at the other end of the table, I think between you and me, (and you won't forget that it was Mr. S. that sat between us) we had all the fun to ourselves, and if it would not have seemed too much like turning upon the Autocrat, and the author of Hiawatha, who sat directly opposite us, their own weapons, I should have embraced the opportunity, if any had happened to offer itself, to discharge certain reflections upon the forgotten instrument, whose name you will observe was derived from something which may be said to lie at the very foundation of music, something so indispensable to the musical performer, that until provided with it, neither choir nor orchestra could ever take a step, nor we, on the occasion in question, however skilled in singing, could by any possibility have harmoniously sounded the first note of the introductory Non nobis. Of course, I need not tell you that it was "my friend," the organist, who dressed up for me in presentable fashion these LINES TO AN ANCIENT PITCH-PIPE.

Under the shade of the "patulous fige,"

(For such is now the approved translation)

Tityrus did his hours engage

With these dulcet sounds that night well assuage

The griefs of that rusticus's vocation.

How well in our memory doth remain,

With boyhood's associations blent,

The pastoral and pleasing refrain.

"Begin, my pipe, the Maenalian strain,"—

Whatever a strain Maenalian meant!—

Ah! 'twas quite other strains, I ween,

Than such as solaced old Tityrus,—which,

When thou wert figuring on the scene,

In New England meeting-houses have been Begun with thee, oh Pipe of Pitch!

And methought 'twere meet ere Oblivion should wipe

Thy name out, and lay thy note on the shelf—

For we in our day take the key, oh Pipe.

From organs of very different stripe—

That we should make a brief note of thyself.

The good old leader — I see him rise
At the head of his choir, while iaily thus,
Every singer with ears and eyes
Intent on the sound thou utterest, cries
His dona nobis — the pitch give us!

Now the Trebles their Do roll full and free;
The Altos are firm on their Sols, and I hear,
When the Tenors have settled town on Mi,
The choir devoutly uplift Dundee.
Old Hundred, Coronation, or Mear.

And how oft, oh Pipe, have that chorus-host
Been swallowed up in some fugue's Red Sea,
Their Do's and Mi's all sunken and lost,
And their Sol's all hopelessly tempest-tost,
Till restored to their haven-tone by thee!

Oh Pipe of Pitch! though less known to fame
Than the Peace-Pipe, scarce less worthy, for if
That concord brought, didst not thou the same?
Like in effect as well as name,
There was much virtue in thy whiff.

Shakspeare, who saw with a prophet's sight,
Doubtless thy music had in view,
When he with melodious phrase did write
Of "sounds and sweet airs that give delight
And hurt not;" — words of thee how true!

And I bring thee this for my parting thought;
Henceforth oh never be thou reviled,
For the pitch which from thee the chorus caught
Was a pitch with no baneful influence fraught,
One forever might touch and not be defiled.

ERRATUM IN OUR LAST. — In the last of the Resolutions relating to the death of Francis L. Bachelder, the word "painless" was a misprint for priceless.

STUTTGART. — There is news from Stuttgart (in the Gazette Musicale) of an entire success lately won in the Opera-house of the Suabian capital, by 'Anna von Landskron,' the composer of which is Herr Abert, whom, some few years ago, on Stuttgart authority, the Athenæum mentioned as a composer from whom something was to be expected.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fourth chamber concert fell upon another stormy Friday (their fatality thus far); which did not keep a numerous audience from finding their way to the new hall of Messrs. Hallet & Cumston, piano-makers, in Washington Street, to which the Club were forced to resort for that night only.
It was a meeting in "an upper chamber" — but a pleasant one and very good for music of this kind. The programme was this:

PART I.

1. Quintet No. 1, in C minor. Allegro—Andante—Minuetto —Finale, Allegro: Mozart.

2. Recitative and Air: "Che farò senza Euridice," from "Orpheus; Gluck: Mrs. J. H. Long.

3. Tema con Variazioni, from the Notturmo from Quintet, op. 35: Spohr.

PART II.

4. Solo for Violoncello, on an Air of the Pyrenees from the 16th century; Offenbach: Wulf Fries.

5. Songs: "The Violet," Mozart: "Breath of Spring," B.
J. Lang Mrs. J. H. Loog.

6. Seventh Quartet, No. 1, in F, of the Razoumofsky set, op.
59. Allegro—Scherzo—Adagio and Finale, (Theme Russe,) Allegro: Beethoven.

This programme was rather below the average in interest; but that "Razoumofsky" Quartet of Beethoven was inspiring enough, — and would be, if we had heard it a hundred times — to compensate for any other deficiency. It was the best played piece of the evening, and was truly edifying. That first of Mozart's Quintets is not one of the most striking in the list. The Adagio and Allegro are fine; but the latter portion of the work seemed commonplace for Mozart. The variations by Spohr were elegant, but scarcely memorable; — perhaps, however, it was the fault of our own sleepiness, or cold in the head (that drizzly, miserable night!) that we do not now, as we write, remember them. Mr. WULF FRIES, by the lucky accident of mislaying or forgetting some music, offered a welcome substitute for the solo set down to him, in the shape of a beautiful slow movement from one of Mendelssohn's Sonatas for Violoncello and Piano, in which the 'cello part discourses prominently, exhibiting the performer's skill and feeling to much advantage.

Mrs. LONG's selections were choice, and she seems to have gained in fulness and richness of voice, as well as in largeness of style, and general ease and finish. We could not feel quite satisfied, however, that Che furò, though one of the best of songs, was just the best for her; yet the success with the audience was quite decided.
Mozart's melody to Goethe's little "Veilchen" song was pretty and naive; and Mr. LONG's setting of the little "Spring" song which we translated from the German in one of our numbers of last April:

O'er the garden hear the voices!
Birds of passage on their flight!
Spring is coming, earth rejoices,
Grass is springing all the night, &c., struck us as very felicitous. Truly a charming song and true to the spirit of the lines; a clear, simple, natural melody, if not marked by any rare individuality. The figures of the accompaniment, lying so natural to the easy play of the pianist composer's figures, were quite suggestive.

MME. BISCACCIANTI AND MISS JULIANA
MAY. — The "Combination Concert" given by these singers last Saturday evening, in the Music Hall, drew a large audience, and was a success.
Every piece sung by our accomplished towns-woman — weak as she was and nervous after long illness — was a signal triumph. We all knew before that she was one of the most highly cultivated sopranos of the day, and that she sings from a real musical passion; but the extraordinary finish and artistic refinement of her singing upon this occasion took us by surprise. Her voice, while it has natrally lost some of its power, makes up for it by the sweetness, purity and refinement of its quality. Marvellously fine it is in the highest notes; and she has the faculty of prolonging a high note for a remarkable length of time and with a sweetness, a perfection of crescendo and diminuendo, a purity of line, that surpasses almost anything. But here too her strength was her weakness. Where all else was so tasteful and so perfect we hate to notice one exception in point of taste: namely — the perhaps pardonable weakness of doing a thing which she could do remarkably well, too often. Once or twice in an evening that prolonging of a tone was very effective; to certain pieces it was suited; but out of place in others; in Schubert's "Serenade," for instance, the note was held and held beyond all reason, until you forgot its purpose and could think only of the feat of skill. Her most perfect effort, to our taste, was in the Romanza from "William Tell" (Sombre forêt), one of the finest melodies in any opera, which she sang in a most chaste, expressive, finished style. It was a luxury to hear that.

The quaintly tender cavatina from "Rigoletto": Caro nome, &c., was a consummate piece of soprano-ism; and here, in the peculiar conclusion of this love soliloquy, where the yearning soul of the maiden seems to float away in reverie, the long holding of the note had a poetic meaning and appropriateness. Schubert's "Serenade" was finely sung, with the exception above named.
Signor BISCACCIANTI accompanied with the sympathetic tones of his violoncello. In her last effort: Ah non credea, and Ah non giunge, from the Sonnambula, Mme. B. betrayed fatigue, but she put a deal of pathos into the cantabile melody, and of brilliant, joyous execution into the rondo.

Miss MAY sang Ernani, involami, which we were too late to hear; "The Last Rose of Summer," which she treated mechanically, emptying it of tenderness, and marring it with trills which seemed undecided on what pitch to settle. These be honest truths, and will not discourage the lady if she has the soul of music in her, capable of one day inspiring and subduing to finer impulses and meanings the clear, large, splendid voice which certainly she has. As yet mere execution is too paramount. Di piacer showed a good deal of that, yet crude. The Bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" was again her most successful effort; less so the brilliant Non fu sogno, from the Lombardi, with which she responded to an encore.

The Piano-forte accompaniments were played with skill and tact by Mr. BAUMBACH. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, strengthened by a double-bass, contributed the overture to Cenerentola, and an arranged song from Tannhäuser; and Mr. B. J. LANG, with Messrs. SCHULTZE and FRIES, played finely the Adagio from Mendelssohn's Trio in D Minor. But these things told rather feebly, of course, in that great hall.

Musical Chit-Chat.

CARL ZERRAHN holds out grand attractions to his second "Philharmonic Concert" at the Music Hall to-night. His noble orchestra will play the "Scotch" Symphony, by Mendelssohn—perhaps his finest work; the glorious "Leonora" Overture, by Beethoven; that blazing piece of brassy jubilation, the "Torch-light Dance," by Meyerbeer; and the ever popular "Tell" overture. The German "Orpheus" Club, under Mr. KREISSMANN, will sing that beautiful Psalm by Schubert (published some months since in this Journal): "The Lord is my Shepherd," and "She is mine," by Hærtel. Mr. LOUIS COENEN, an accomplished young violinist from Belgium, will play a solo by Spohr, and a Fantasia of his own. Mr. Z. wishes it understood that Complimentary tickets, issued for the first concert, will not admit to this.

Mr. TRENKLE left us last week on his way to Florida, seeking restoration of his health. A thousand good wishes accompany him. The Complimentary Concert, which his brother artists mean to give him, is now fixed for Saturday evening, Feb. 19th, that being the earliest evening when the Music Hall is unengaged. No pains will be spared to make it a successful concert of the highest order. Zerrahn's orchestra, the "Orpheus," OTTO DRESEL, Mrs. HARWOOD, and others, will take part. Every artist gladly would, were there but room for all... Mr. STOEPEL's "Hiawatha" is to be brought out in New York, with the aid of the Mendelssohn Union, about the 12th of February; after which Mr. S. will return to Boston and commence here new rehearsals for its second and more perfect performance, probably in the Music Hall, which will be much the best place for it.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY have reached the point of rehearsals with orchestra of Handel's "Israel in Egypt;" and it will soon be publicly performed—possibly on Sunday after next. This is a work which will most certainly re-pay more than a single hearing. It would be only next in general esteem to the "Messiah," could it be heard as often. To aid the understanding of the listener, we have commenced copying this week, a good descriptive analysis of it by Mr. Macfarren, of London, having already said our own word about it in this Journal a year since (Nov. 1857)... The next concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will take place next Friday Evening—we suppose at Mercantile Hall.... We are glad—and all our readers hereabouts will be glad—to learn that the friends of Madame BISCACCANTI intend to give her a complimentary Farewell concert prior to her departure for Australia. It will probably take place in the course of next week. The compliment is certainly most amply due, and it will be a hearty one.... We learn that Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, one of the most talented and classical of the pianists who have resided among us, and one of the ablest interpreters of the master compositions, young as he is, proposes soon to give a concert. It is time he should be heard.

We spent a delightful evening last week with our Teutonic brethren of the "Orpheus" in their own "den"—a perfect Ton-halle, or hall of harmonies, in spite of beer and smoke. Grouped around tables over all the room, with their glasses and their music books before them, Herr KREISSMANN presiding at a Grand Piano in the midst of all, there they sat and sang, the choicest music, with admirably blended voices. The tones seem to spring up all around you; to exhale from the very floor and walls and mingle like those wreaths of smoke. They sang a couple of beautiful part-songs by Schumann; another by Liszt, which happily seizes the humor of the "Student's Song" in "Faust;" a fine Mozart-like finale, (Trio and chorus of Soldiers) from Cherubini's Wasserträger; and many more fine things. The brothers Schraubstredter sang solos; and Messrs. Leonhard and Dresel played to them. That is the way to have good times.

The Worcester Palladium thus gives vent to its enthusiasm after BISCACCANTI's singing, at a concert in that city:

After listening to Biscaccianti's singing it was the remark of many, "this brings back old times! this is such singing as we used to hear!" It was true enough, and thus we explain it. After hearing prima-donna after prima-donna sing continually, little save the "gems" of Verdi—than which nothing can be more injurious to the best of voices, a voice like Biscaccianti's trained in a purer school of Italian music, comes with grateful significance. Then she is a true artist. Mark her singing of that romanza from "Tell"—its artistic shadings, the careful subduing of every detail to the complete whole. Or in her Italian cavatinas, how impassioned is her rendering of them, yet how pure! True artist that she is, she is satisfied with no half-way work; and so her German lied or English ballad is as true to the requirements of musical art as her most difficult aria.

A recent number of the New Orleans Picayune says:

At the opera we have had a performance of Verdi's "Jerusalem," of Anber's "Ambassadrice," of Meyerbeer's "Prophete," and of Halevy's "Juive." Tomorrow evening we are to have the so much talked of new comic opera of Maillard, (whoever he may be,) in which Mlle Bourgeois and Messrs. Bourgeois and Beance and M'me Vadé are to appear. This piece is said to have been performed at the "Lyrique" in Paris every night for three months.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 1.—The "Mendelssohn Union" is an off-shoot of the "Harmonic Society," and threatens to eclipse its predecessor. Mr. G. W. MORGAN, the organist of Grace church is the conductor, and Mr. BERGE, organist of the Roman Catholic church of St. Francis Xavier is the pianist. The society meets at the Cooper Institute. They have this season produced Mendelssohn's St. Paul, and last week gave us Rossini's Moses in Egypt. The performance took place in the large room of the Cooper Institute, one of the most remarkable concert halls in the world, because it is nothing more nor less than a large cellar, the floor thirty-five feet below the level of the street. The interior is painted white, and the acoustic capabilities of the establishment are good.

The solos in Moses were confided to various resident singers. Mrs. CRUMP, the soprano of the Episcopal Church of the Incarnation, sang the music of Esther; Miss HADLEY, of St. Francis Xavier, that of Nicanor; Mr. MIRANDA, of Dr. Macanley's, that of Osiris; while the other male soloists were Mr. WERNEKE, of St. Francis Xavier, and Dr. GUILMETTE. The work was very respectably given. Miss Hadley, whose delicious voice I have before spoken of, sang with pathos and earnestness, but is lacking in power for a large concert hall. There was no orchestra, and Mr. Berge accompanied on the piano. He is one of the few really good accompanists we have, and is not sleepy in his style of playing.

The Society now devote two evenings a week to the rehearsals of STOEPEL's Hiawatha music, Mr. Stöpel himself conducting. He pays the Society one hundred dollars for their services, and expects to produce his composition at the Academy of Music, on the evening of the 11th of February. Of course, an efficient orchestra will assist, and Mrs. Stöpel will read the explanatory portions of the poem. After Hiawatha has gone to the kingdom of Ponewah, to the land of the hereafter, the society will attack Costa's Eli, which they have hitherto performed.

In the meantime, the Harmonic Society is not inactive. They meet, as they have regularly done every week for the last five years, at Dodworth's room, and are rehearsing Handel's Israel in Egypt. It is proposed to give Mr. BRISTOW, who now acts both as their conductor and pianist, a complimentary concert, when, I understand the first part of Mendelssohn's Elijah, together with a variety of miscellaneous music will be performed. Mr. Bristow is a worthy recipient of such an honor. He is a solid, hard working musician, the organist of St. George's (Dr. Tyng's) Church, and the composer of that beautiful American Opera, Rip Van Winkle.

Miss DINGLEY, a good resident vocalist, gives her second annual concert this week.

PICCOLOMINI is to sing at the Academy of Music, at a matinée on the 12th of February, when she will appear for the first time here as Norina in Don Pasquale.

APOTOMAS, the Harpist, gave a successful harp matinée the other day, when he played the harp for two and a half hours. He is a second David upon that instrument. TROVATORE.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 25.—On Monday night of last week, Mlle. PICCOLOMINI died of pulmonary consumption, surrounded by an immense audience of sympathizing Philadelphians; but she arose on the following morning, in time to be off to Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, where she is said to have concertized before delighted thousands. The Opera habitué will readily comprehend how the above announcement is to be taken; of course, facetiously, to obviate the necessity of stereotyped phrases such as "Verdi's Traviata was performed on last Monday night,"—which mode of commencing musical correspondence seems as commonplace as the Libiamo itself. Piccolomini played the character of the lamentable Violetta with much effect; but sung some of the music as though her own lungs were half consumed; indeed, in the Sempre libera, she might have fiascoed but for the discretion of Herr Anschütz, who checked the orchestra suddenly, and rescued the pretty little cantatrice.

After the Traviata, came Meyerbeer's Huguenots. Verily this change seemed like laying aside a flashy "yaller-kiver'd" novel and taking up some finished and classical work, like Macanley's History of England.

The impresario evinced much liberality in the production of the varied mises en scene, and accessories; while the cast only lacked a competent tenor to render it unexceptionable. Its first representation drew an immense audience,—one of the largest ever congregated within the walls of the Academy. So, too, the third, while the second took place amid a storm, which rendered access to the building disagreeable, even in a closely secured cab, and the audience was therefore small, but highly appreciative. The imposing choruses, consummate orchestral effects, and the impressive, religious vein frequently pervading the music, produced a sensible effect upon the many-headed. So, too, the efforts of the individual artists. FORMES disarmed criticism by his perfect rendition of the Huguenot soldier, for even though his intonation at times proved unsteady, his portrayal of Marcel was so superb as to drive all thoughts of carping at such vocal defects, out of the heads of the public and the press-writers. Mlle. POINSOT made a very favorable impression, both as a vocalist and an actress,—and LABORDE threw the people into ecstasies by her singular flexibility of voice, fine taste, and perfect method of vocalization. Much interest prevailed to hear this finished cantatrice, prior to the first night of the Huguenots,—in as much as people still bore in vivid remembrance her triumphs here, ten or eleven years since, on the boards of the old Chestnut Street Theatre. I, for my part, can scarcely conceive of a higher point of musical education than that to which Laborde has attained.

We had more of Meyerbeer last night. Robert le Diable was given before a splendid audience, but was performed in a very careless manner. What with an incompetent Robert, (LONINI,) a wretched Raimbaut, (PICKANESER,) and a badly rehearsed chorus, even the superior deportment of Formes, Poinsot, and Laborde seemed wanting in proper effect. In the duo between Bertram and Raimbaut, at the commencement of the second act, Pickanesser sang so frightfully out of tune as to cause thousands to screw up their mouths and knit their brows with just indignation. MANRICO.

BERLIN, JAN. 5. — Happy new Year! to you, dear Dwight, and to all those of your readers, who, in process of time, have come to feel some degree of interest in "A. W. T." I hope during the year that has just closed that the number of these has materially increased, and that when 1860 comes, they will be doubled or quadrupled. I promise to do my best to this end. During the Christmas and New Year's holidays many of the places of resort here are of a charitable character, one of which is worthy a word or two. Very likely I wrote about it long ago, but it will bear repetition.

In one respect the Germans set us an example good to follow, if in no other, in matters of Art. I refer to their combining together — forming a sort of brotherhood — aiding each other in life and extending a helping hand to the widows and orphans of the deceased. The Architects have an association, which now has a noble range of rooms, fine library, courses of lectures in the winter, and, in fact, all that we can think of as being fitted to make them better artists and give them a position in the community. So too the painters, and so too the "Tonkünstler" — musicians. It has long been a subject of sorrow to me that there is no association of the musical men of Boston — the practical musicians and teachers, that is — with a club room and library, where one can see all the musical journals and meet with those, who, each in his own way, is working in the cause of music. Such an association, besides being of great use to every member, would be a severe blow to musical quackery, it would tend to elevate the standard of musical culture, make men, now almost strangers to each other, better acquainted, raise the tone of the profession, and give that force to it which can only be obtained by combination.

Once a year the "Association of Berlin-Artists" gives an exhibition of transparencies, accompanied by the delicious music of the Dom Chor. The exhibition, lasting an hour, is given twice each evening, from 5 to 6, and from 7 to 8, for some two weeks; admission, 25 cents of our money. This year the pictures are six in number.

Go with me. We enter the building built by Frederick II., I believe partly at the suggestion of Voltaire, called the Kunst, or Art, Academy, and up one flight, in a narrow hall, with seats for some three hundred persons, we take our places. At the other end of the hall is the curtain. At the hour, screens, by a single movement, cover all the lights, the curtain divides, and the first picture — the "Deity in Glory," the vision of Ezekiel — after Raphael — appears, and a "Gloria in Excelsis," by Durante, streams out to us from the room behind the picture. We sit in darkness, save from the light which lights up the picture and passes through it to us. With the last dying tones of the chorus, the curtain noiselessly closes, and the lights of the room are uncovered.

No. II. The Annunciation, after Rubens, with an anthem by Grell, "Gracious and merciful is the Lord."

No. III. The worship of the kings to the child in the manger, also after Rubens, with an "Adoramus te, Christe," composed by Bortniansky.

No. IV. Mary standing with the infant Jesus and the child John, Joseph in the background, after the well known picture of Raphael; and this gave me a better idea of the original than I ever before had. The music was an old choral by Eccard, not the less interesting to me, as it is given, not much changed, in many of our psalm-books.

No. V. Christ and the two disciples at Emmanus, after Rubens; music, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," by Mendelssohn.

No. VI. A very fine copy of the celebrated and wonderful picture of St. Cecilia, at Florence, by Rubens. I say of this, as of No. IV., that I never before had any clear conception of the marvellous beauty of that picture. How it is possible to imitate, in these transparencies, oil paintings so perfectly, is to me a mystery — but I am not a painter. The music is a "Sanctus," by Count Redern.

Now think a moment of the effect of such an exhibition. In the course of a few years very many of the finest pictures in Europe are made familiar to the public, as they could be in no other way, thus cultivating the taste and the eye, and at the same time the ear is delighted by vocal music of the highest order, sung as by no other choir on earth, with the possible exception of two or three in Russia.

As I sat there, I could not but think that it would be a grand speculation to take over some forty of the singers, and a score or two of the pictures which have accumulated upon the Association, and exhibit them in Boston and New York. I believe it would pay in the end for the city to pay a small sum per head to have all the school children have the advantage of the artistic culture, which a dozen such pictures and the accompanying music would give them.

As I mentioned the association of Architects above, here is a fact which shows to what good uses such an association tends. It makes the birthday of the great architect Schinkel one of its annual festivals. At the approaching one the plans of a new parliament house are to be examined, and a prize for the best to be awarded. The candidates for this prize must all be young men, who have just made their examinations, and the prize consists of — the best, in my opinion, that could possibly be offered — an annual sum sufficient to enable them to travel in Italy and other countries for some two or three years. From various sources similar prizes are awarded to young musicians, painters, and I believe to some others. When shall we see anything of the kind in America? Why cannot the city of Baltimore with its magnificent funds from Peabody set the example, and offer prizes of say $500 a year for two years to one young musician, one sculptor, one painter, and one architect? Why not?

In Stuttgart there appears to be another rising young composer. His name is ANERT. Like Laub and Moscheles, he is from Bohemia, studied at the Conservatorium in Prague, where at the fifty years' Jubilee last season, he produced a Jubilee overture, and now belongs to the Kapelle of the King of Wurtemberg. Three symphonies by him, I believe, have been published. Just now he is attracting attention by an opera, "Anna von Landskron," his first for the theatre — the scene of which is laid in 1273, during the time of the party quarrels in Basle. At the rehearsal it was highly applauded by the Stuttgart orchestra, and at the public performance, the audience confirmed the decision.

The name of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in der Oesterreichische Kaiserstadt" — Society of the Friends of Music in the Austrian capital — must be familiar to you. It was for this society, as well as for Boston, that Beethoven was to compose Bernard's oratorio "Sieg des Kreuzes" — Victory of the Cross. This Society is the grand dependence now of Vienna for classical music. It has a noble library, a fine museum of instruments, and the like. A recent report states that it receives from the government 3000 gulden — say $1,500 — from the Government, and 2,000 from the city. These sums, in addition to the 15,000 gulden bequeathed by Carl Czerny, have put it into so flourishing a condition, that a really fine, large new hall is projected. In the conservatory under its care there are now 211 pupils, of whom 127 are free and 84 pay half fees. Who of us will live to see the Handel and Haydn Society, the Harvard Musical and the Music Hall Associations acting together for the cause of music, and receiving some assistance from the city so that we can have a true conservatorium in Boston? If you want such a man as Laub to reside with us, it could be made in this way an object for him to come over.

It is almost wrong to announce it at the close of a letter, but better late than never — the fine collection of old works upon music, of which I have written you in such pathetic tones, both in private letters and for the Journal, is secured for the Boston Public Library. Now let the musical profession do something to the end of collecting the works of the great composers. More on this topic hereafter.

In my account of Radecke's concerts printed in the Journal of Dec. 4, I spoke, it seems, of "the Serenade composed in 1784." As in all probability several such works saw the light that year, it may be well for those who save their papers, to note on the margin that this particular work was by Mozart.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

ASPIRATION. (Sehnsucht.) E. B. Oliver. 25

A Poem by Schiller, well known among the admirers of the great German-poet. The composer has linked with it a simple, pathetic melody.

Instrumental Music.

KROLL'S BALLKLAENGE WALTZES, for Four hands. Lumbye. 50

A favorite Waltz, introduced first by the Germans. This Four-hand arrangement gives most of the peculiarities of the composer's orchestration, which must necessarily be omitted in an arrangement for one player only.

PRAYER IN "MOSES IN EGYPT." Transcribed by Osborne. 30

A fine arrangement of medium difficulty.

LA FIAMMINA. Mazurka élégante. J. Ascher. 30

The great popularity of this author is principally owing to the life and flow, which his dances have, aside from their often surprising melodious beauty. This mazurka ranks with his best efforts. It is dashing, effective, full of delicious hits of melody, and not over difficult.

SERENADE MILITAIRE. Charles Fradel. 35

An attractive "Bagatelle," moderately difficult, and differing, in a refreshing manner, from the general character of such pieces.

The Diarist Abroad, No. 15.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION WITH "JOHN."

[John thundering away in the next room upon his pianoforte and pedals, on an organ Fugue of Bach.]

Diarist. — John! I say, John!

John. — Halloo — Wha' yer-w-a-n-t?

D. — Come in here a minute. (enter John.)

J. — Well, what now?

D. — I want you to see what the saying means — "Happy as a king."

J. — Well, you do look tickled.

D. — Why shouldn't I? That book-case jammed full of musical Lexicons and periodicals, and there by the door that great heap of books for the Library — and, oh, John, just look at those piles on and under the large table!

J. — Well, who will ever care one copper for all these old books? What earthly use can they be to anybody?

D. — If of no other use, they are a sight to cure bad eyes — just look at that!

J. — I can't read it, — yes I can — the title at least.

"Aritmetica — (great music book this!) Geometria et Musica Boetii." It is an old thing, isn't it?

D. — Turn to the last page. There, read that. I'll read it for you. "Venetii Impressam Boetii opus per Johannem et Gregorium de Gregoriis fratres, &c. &c. Anno humanae restaurationis 1492, die 18 Augusti, &c." We shall not go much farther back than that, I think, after musical books! Now hand me that third book, on the third shelf, and we will see what Forkel has to say about it. Here is a little sketch of his life, by which it appears he was a Roman patrician, three times Burgomaster (!) at Rome, and one of the most important of the ancient writers of music, and so on. There are quite a number of editions, especially those of Venice, 1491–1499, and of Basle 1546–1570. So you see, this splendid specimen of old printing is one of the earliest — and of the year of Columbus's discovery. You see Forkel gives nearly two pages to the contents of the work.

Now look at this little thin quarto. "Flores Musice omnis cantus Gregoriani." Look at the running titles: De Alphabetis: De Monocordo. De Modis. De Tonis. And here at the end is the date — Anno M.CCCC.LXXX.VIII — 1488. You can see how Gen. Koudelka prized that book by its beautiful binding in fragrant Russia leather elegantly lettered, and with the date in big figures. Let us see what Forkel says, — What? How is this? Ha, ha, ha, Forkel did not know of the book!

J. — What are those eight great folio volumes there, unbound?

D. — Open one of them and see.

J. — (Reads) "Parafrasi Sopra Salmi." Procul este profani!

D. — The next is the title page.

J. — "Estro poetico-armonico," &c., &c., di Benedetto Marcello, Venezia, M.D.CCC.III. What a noble portrait! These are the splendid Marcello's psalms, you were talking about the other day.

D. — Yes. Don't they look good? And see what a splendid edition, large paper and all — I must have them suitably bound before sending them to Boston. When you get so you can write like that, you will do.

Look at those two large, thick quarto volumes. That is a book I have been looking out for this five years, — and never could find a copy for sale — "Allgemeine Geschichte der Musik," by J. N. Forkel. That is the book of which a critic says: "Forkel wrote a history of music, a splendid work, but ending just as the history of the art becomes interesting." The fact is he never finished his work. But I assure you I am glad at last to have secured a copy for a library at home. There's the great history — these three large quartos — "Storia della Musica" — by padre Martini! Some time, when you come to read Burney, you will know more about him. You remember how Mozart, when a little boy, went to see him — Holmes tells about it. This is another book we do not find in every antiquarian shop.

J. — What is this thick, fat small quarto, so capitably bound, as if Koudelka had thought it a treasure?

D. — What? That is the "Syntagma musicum," of old Michael Praetorius — the three volumes bound in one — a capital copy — the book which, with Kircher's "Musurgia" and "Phonurgia" — those folios there — is in a great measure the foundation of our knowledge of old instruments. Hawkins quotes half of Kircher almost. You see this was printed at the Wittemberg of Luther in 1615. Praetorius died at Wolfenbüttel, (where we visited Holle) in 1621. It is a most valuable book.

J. — What have you in that pile of little scamps — pocket volumes? Are they good for any thing?

D. — This one is the "Miramantisches Flölein," or, "Geistliche Schäferey" (spiritual sheepfold) of Laurence von Schmellis, "in which Christus, under the name of Daphnis, wakes the soul of Clorinda, sunk in the sleep of sin, to a better life and leads her in a marvellous manner and way to great holiness. Third edition, in which all the melodies are set in three parts, with ritornellos," and so on. It is not very old. Frankfort, 1711. Laurentius was a capuchin monk.

What the book is you will see by this paragraph from the preface. "This fluteling is composed of 30 elegies, each elegy of 20 stanzas, not in fact to be sung, because they are too long; but to please the lovers of music I have given to each elegy its own melody, and one fitting to the corresponding copperplate, reminding the reader, by the way, that in my Clorinda I mean no particular individual person, but every soul which is converted to God; and by Daphnis Christ is meant."

This little thing is a musical catechism, 1523, by a certain "venerable brother Bonaventura de Brixia;" it is all about the "regula musica," of tones authentic and tones plagal, and so on, in Latin and Italian.

These two little ones are monastic missals, 300 years old, badly worm-eaten, and quite useless. Here is another compendium of music. Venice, 1513 — not much value perhaps — but curious — at all events it belongs in the collection. But here is one I am mightily glad to get — a couple of small works bound together, — the "Musica Figurata" and "Von den Proportionibus," by Martin Agricola — the friend of Luther — two works which Forkel only knew from a mention made of them by Gruber.*

Now cast your eye upon the title page of this thin folio.

J. — (Reads) "Dialogo di Vincentio Galilei nobili Fiorentino della musica antica et della moderna. In Firenze. MDL.XXXI. Well?

D. — That, John, is a book by the father of the great Galileo. It is a sort of polemical work directed against Zarlineo, whose works you will find somewhere in the pile complete, and indeed there are two or three editions of part of them. Very valuable they are in the early history of modern music.

Here is something I am very glad to get complete. In the Dehn collection was only one volume, which I took at three thalers — a man was there at the time who would give five or six for it. I wish now that he had it, as it becomes a duplicate. It is Gerbert's collection in three vols, quarto, of "Scriptores Ecclesiastici de musica sacra," now rare and worth from 25 to 30 Thalers.

That will do for this time. If there is any body in England collecting as successfully for our Library, we shall soon cease to be under the necessity of voyaging 3000 miles to find musical books.

Speeches at the Burns' Festival.

BOSTON, JAN. 25, 1859.

SPEECH OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

(To the first toast: The Memory of Burns!)

Mr. President and Gentlemen — I do not know by what untoward accident it has chanced, — and I forbear to inquire, — that, in this accomplished circle, it should fall to me, the worst Scotchman of all, to receive your commands, and at the latest hour, too, to respond to the sentiment just offered, and which indeed makes the occasion. But I am told there is no appeal, and I must trust to the inspirations of the theme to make a fitness which does not otherwise exist.

Yet, sir, I heartily feel the singular claims of the occasion. At the first announcement, from I know not whence, that the 25th of January was the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Robert Burns, a sudden consent warmed the great English race, in all its kingdoms, colonies and States, all over the world, to keep the festival.

We are here to hold our parliament with love and poesy, as men were wont to do in the middle ages. Those famous parliaments might or might not have had more stateliness, and better singers than we, — though that is yet to be known — but they could not have better reason.

I can only explain this singular unanimity in a race which rarely acts together, but rather after their watchword, each for himself, — by the fact that Robert Burns, the poet of the middle class, represents in the minds of men to-day that great uprising of the middle class against the armed and privileged minorities,—that uprising which worked politically in the American and French Revolutions, and which, not in governments, so much as in education and in social order, has changed the face of the world.

In order for this destiny, his birth, breeding and fortunes were low. His organic sentiment was absolute independence, and resting, as it should, on a life of labor. No man existed who could look down on him. They that looked into his eyes saw that they might look down the sky as easily. His muse and teaching was common sense, joyful, aggressive, irresistible.

Not Latimer, nor Luther, struck more telling blows against False Theology than did this brave singer. The "Confession of Augsburg," the "Declaration of Independence," the French "Rights of Man," and the "Marseillaise," are not more weighty documents in the history of freedom than the songs of Burns. His satire has lost none of its edge. His musical arrows yet sing through the air.

He is so substantially a reformer, that I find his grand plain sense in close chain with the greatest masters—Rabelais, Shakespeare in comedy, Cervantes, Butler and Burns. If I should add another name, I find it only in a living countryman of Burns. He is an exceptional genius. The people who care nothing for literature and poetry care for Burns. It was indifferent,—they thought who saw him,—whether he wrote verse or not; he could have done anything else as well.

Yet how true a Poet is he! And the poet, too, of poor men, of grey hoddens, and the guernsey coat, and the blouse. He has given voice to all the experiences of common life; he has endeared the farmhouse and cottage, patches and poverty, beans and barley; ale, the poor man's wine; hardship, the fear of debt, the dear society of weans and wife, of brothers and sisters, proud of each other, knowing so few, and finding amends for want and obscurity in books and thought. What a love of nature, and, shall I say it? of middle-class nature. Not great, like Goethe, in the stars, or like Byron, on the ocean, or Moore, in the luxurious East, but in the homely landscape which the poor see around them,—bleak leagues of pasture and stubble, ice, and sleet, and rain, and snow-choked brooks; birds, hares, field-mice, thistles, and heather, which he daily knew. How many "Bonny Doons," and "John Anderson my jo," and "Auld lang Syne," all around the earth have his verses been applied to! And his love songs still woo and melt the youths and maids; the farm work, the country holiday, the fishing cobbles, are still his debtors to-day.

And as he was thus the poet of the poor, anxious, cheerful, working humanity, so had he the language of low life. He grew up in a rural district, speaking a patois unintelligible to all but natives, and he has made that Lowland Scotch a Doric dialect of fame. It is the only example in history of a language made classic by the genius of a single man. But more than this. He had that secret of genius to draw from the bottom of society the strength of its speech, and astonish the ears of the polite with these artless words, better than art, and filtered of all offence through his beauty. It seemed odious to Luther that the devil should have all the best tunes; he would bring them into the churches; and Burns knew how to take from airs and gypsies, blacksmiths and drovers, the speech of the market and street, and clothe it with melody.

But I am detaining you too long. The memory of Burns,—I am afraid, heaven and earth have taken too good care of it, to leave us anything to say. The west winds are murmuring it. Open the windows behind you, and harken for the incoming tide, what the waves say of it. The doves perching almost on the eaves of the stone chapel opposite, may know something about it. Every name in broad Scotland keeps his fame bright. The memory of Burns,—every man's, and boy's, and girl's head carries snatches of his songs, and can say them by heart, and what is strangest of all, never learned them from a book, but from mouth to mouth. The wind whispers them, the birds whistle them, the corn, barley, and bulrushes hoarsely rustle them; nay, the music-boxes at Geneva are framed and toothed to play them; the hand-organs of the Savoyards in all cities repeat them, and the chimes of bells ring them in the spires. They are the property and the solace of mankind.

SPEECH OF GEORGE S. HILLARD.

(To the fifth toast: "The Minstrels and Minstrelsy, of Scotland.")

A few days since I was asked by a friend if I could tell him why it was that the birth-day of Burns is so generally celebrated, both in England and America, and for so long a period had been so. Why is he among so many other poets and men selected for such peculiar honors? The answer to the question does not at once suggest itself, but it can be answered. It is certainly a remarkable fact that, at this moment in all parts of the world, on the Banks of the Clyde, the Thames, the Ganges, the St. Lawrence, the Mississippi—Scotchmen, Englishmen, and Americans are met together, to do honor to the memory of a man who was born a hundred years ago this day, in a clay cottage which his father had built with his own hands,—who made no discoveries in science, or inventions in art; who was not a great soldier or a great statesman, whose birth was humble and whose position through life was obscure, who died young, after having written a few poems, chiefly in the Scottish dialect. He was a singer, and nothing more. He fluttered into the light and warmth of life for a brief season, warbled a few songs, and then disappeared into the grim outer darkness, where no eye could follow his flight. Why is it that he has taken such hold upon the hearts of all who speak with English tongues and read the books of England? Why, among other proofs of this, are we here to-night?

It seems to me that this is due in part to his character as a man, and in part to the peculiar qualities of his poetry. His character was remarkable for its manliness, its sincerity, and its independence. He was too brave for disguises, and too truthful for affectation. In all his life there is no stain of meanness, of treachery, of cowardice, of hypocrisy. If he was vehement in his dislikes, and sometimes almost savage in the expression of them, he was also the most faithful of friends. We mark in him one sure indication of a noble nature—the warmth and constancy of his gratitude. The burden of obligation he wears like a jewel and not like a chain. He often yielded to temptation; but his errors are half atoned for and wholly forgiven by the frankness with which he confesses them. He was born in a very low estate, and reared in bitter, soul-crushing poverty; and this, too, at a time when native worth was less valued, and adventitious distinctions were more regarded than they are now. But in spite of this, his life was marked by a manly independence, sometimes pushed to a fierce and defiant self-assertion. The low-born peasant, whose hands were hardened and whose frame was bent by toil, stood in the presence of noblemen and gentlemen, of wits and scholars, unabashed, "pride in his port, defiance in his eye," as firm upon his feet, as when he strode behind his plough upon the mountain side. He never lowered the flag of genius before the flag of rank. Wherever he met a man's mind, he laid his own alongside of it, yard arm and yard arm, for a fair fight. He respected in others the claims of essential superiority—the God-given patents of nobility—and he exacted from them the same deference. In his life he put into action the sentiment of his fine song:

Is there, for honest poverty,
That hangs his head, and a' that!
The coward slave, we pass him by,
We dare be poor for a' that!
For a' that, and a' that,
Our toils obscure, and a' that;
The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that.

All the primal sympathies of the human soul recognize the power, the charm, of a character of such manly self-reliance, such lofty self-assertion. We follow with admiration the movements of the broad-shouldered, swarthy-checked, black-eyed peasant, who on all occasions and in all societies sustains himself with such simple dignity, who plants himself with such assured force on his worth as a man, and whose vigorous, untought genius beats down the feeble guards of commonplace cultivation and the thin defences of social rank.

There is another winning element in the life of Burns, arising from the fact that he generally acted from impulse, and that his impulses so often led him right. It is a striking remark of Coleridge's, that "motives imply weakness, and the existence of evil and temptation. The angelic nature would act from impulse alone." We may note another illustration of the same truth in the conduct of men and women. Women act more from impulse, and men more from motives. Thus women may make more mistakes than men, but when they do go right their actions have a higher grace, a sweeter flavor. All men, says Emerson, love a lover. There is a sympathetic charm in the bearing of one who is visibly and unmistakably under the guidance of a strong and natural emotion. The very follies and extravagances of a man thoroughly in love have a sweet and gracious aspect, and are never ridiculous. The life of Burns glitters with the beauty of fine and cordial impulses. They sometimes hurried him into grave errors, but as he himself has said, the light that led him astray was light from Heaven. Men who act always deliberately and from well-considered motives—who are always self-vigilant and self-distrustful—who never make mistakes—who never say or do anything they ought not to—may secure esteem, confidence, respect, but rarely inspire love. That we bestow upon characters in which the lights and shades are more strongly contrasted—which sometimes rise above and sometimes fall below the level line of prudence—in which beautiful actions and heroic sacrifices plead for excesses of temperament and the occasional riot of unruly blood; and of these Burns stands forth as the perfect type and representative.

But it is the poetry of Burns, far more than his character as a man, that brings us here to-night. He was a poet of the first order; but that is not all. Among all the poets endowed with a vision and a faculty so high as his, we recall no one whose genius is of so popular a quality. The lowliness of his birth, in some respects a disadvantage, was herein a help to him; for it gave him a comprehension of the common heart and mind of his countrymen which must have been denied to him had he been born in a higher sphere. Take, for instance, his immortal poem of "The Cotter's Saturday Night." Where can we find another poet with an imagination capable of so idealizing the subject, and yet so familiar with its details as to present a picture as true as it is beautiful? The poetry of Burns hits the heart of man just between wind and water; every line and every word tells. With the inspired eye of genius he looked abroad upon the common life of Scotland; and there found the themes of poetry—and the highest poetry, too—in scenes, in relations, in objects which to the prosaic apprehension seemed compact of hopeless prose. As in works in Florentine mosaic,—in which leaves and flowers are reproduced in precious stones—our pleasure is made up in part from the beauty of the material used, and in part from the familiar character of the forms represented. So in reading the poetry of Burns, we are not only charmed with the genius it displays, but thrilled with a strange electric delight in seeing the ordinary themes of every day life so glorified and transfigured. At his touch, the heather bloom becomes an amethyst and the holly leaf turns into emerald. Every man can comprehend, feel and enjoy the poetry of Burns; for this no other training is needed than the training of life. There are no learned allusions, no recondite lore, no speculations that transcend the range of average experience. To have seen the daisy blow and heard the lark sing—to have clasped the hand of man and kissed the lips of woman—are preparation enough for all that he has written. The sentiments with which the poor man reads him are compounded, perhaps unconsciously, of admiration and gratitude—gratitude to the genius which has poured such ideal light around this common earth; which has empanned with celestial roses the very turf beneath his feet; which has opened to him, the child of poverty and toil, the fairy world of imagination; which has held to his lips the sparkling elixir, the divine nepenthe, of poetry; which on its mighty wings has soared with him into regions where he could see the waving of angelic robes and hear the music of paradise!

The genius of Burns expressed itself most naturally and easily in that shape which is best adapted for popular influence. His songs are his best, his most characteristic poems; and in all British literature he is the first of song-writers. A song, as it is the ariest, the most subtle, the most delicate form in which the conceptions of a poet are embodied, so it is the most volatile, the most lightly borne, the most easily diffused. A song has wings but no feet: it darts from lip to lip, and from heart to heart. The empire of a great epic or didactic poet may be higher, but that of a great song-writer is wider. The reason of this is that a song is the growth of that part of our nature in which all men are alike. A good song may be defined to be one man's music and every man's experience.

The themes of the song writer are taken from the passions, the emotions, the sentiments of the common heart. They are found blooming by the side of that great highway on which humanity travels from the cradle to the grave. The mere literary merit of the songs of Burns can hardly be overstated, but their highest charm comes from their truth. Every line in them is vital; there is none of the cold and glittering beauty of frost work; they spring not from the cunning brain, but from the beating heart. There are many songs in the English language—and good songs, too; in which we can plainly see the marks of elaboration; the lines of the graving and chasing tools. But the songs of Burns are growths and not manufactures; as the fountain gushes from the earth; as the daisy springs from the sod; so they have sung themselves. The metre was but the mould into which the liquid heart was poured. We cannot conceive of a word in them ever having been any other than it is.

The greater part of the songs of Burns are love songs: and herein the life of the man is reproduced in his verse. Burns was always a lover; his temperament was so ardent and susceptible that he never saw a fine female face without falling in love with it. Love was with him no mystical sentiment, no ethereal tenderness, no airy rapture; it was not of that class of which some sublimated philosopher says that it is born with the first sigh and dies with the first kiss; but it was a passionate flame which ran like lightning through his veins, felt in the heart, felt in the pulse. His love poetry is informed with burning life; his love songs are the foam-flakes of a heaving sea of fire. This element of truth it owes to the fact that it was invariably the utterance of emotions actually felt. He wrote not from general imaginations, but from particular impressions. He had ever before him, in his mind's eye, some individual face or form; some Jean Armor, Mary Morrison, or Jessie Lewars; to inspire his muse. His biographers will tell you to whom belonged the rosy lips, the snowy bosoms, the golden ringlets, the "two lovely een of bonnie blue," that are immortalized in his verses. Alas, where are they now? The love poetry of Burns is also nearly as remarkable for its purity, its tenderness and sweetness, as for its passionateness and truth. He sometimes offends against decorum in his poems, but almost never in his songs.

Burns is thus the laureat of love. He is the best interpreter of that universal passion; that great magician under whose sway all men are, or have been, or are to be. Hence one chief ingredient in his popularity and power. His love poetry addresses the experiences or the recollections of all. Fervid is the non-day glow of love; pensive and sweet are its twilight memories. The old man, whose pulse has long been calm, will read with delight the songs of Burns, for they recall and renew those delicious days when a white frock and a pink sash were all that were wanted to make an angel of. But the highest charm of Burns's poetry is one which his countrymen alone can feel in its full extent, and that is its intense nationality. Scotland had had before him philosophers and men of letters of the first class, like Robertson, Adam Smith, David Hume, Dugald Stewart and Thomas Reid; novelists like Smollett; poets like Thomson and John Home, but, as Carlyle truly remarked, there was nothing in them that was Scottish, nothing that was indigenous. They did honor to Scotland, but they did nothing to make the peculiar characteristics of Scottish life and manners known to the world. There had also been writers imbued with this national flavor, like Ferguson and Allan Ramsay; but they were not first-class men. Burns was the first man who, with a genius of the highest order, found his inspiration and his themes upon the soil of his native land. He was a great poet and a national poet too. In his dedication of the Edinburgh edition of his poems to the noblemen and gentlemen of the Caledonian hunt, he says: "The poetic genius of my country found me, as the prophetic bard Elijah did Elisha, at the plough, and threw her inspiring mantle over me. She bade me sing the loves, the joys, the rural scenes and rural pleasures of my native soil in my native tongue." This is said with as much truth as beauty. Burns is a thorough Scotchman; the flavor of the soil can be tasted in everything he wrote. He was himself perfectly conscious of this feeling; he knew where his strength lay.

The rough bur-thistle spreading wide
Among the bearded bear—
I turned the weeder-clips aside
And spared the symbol dear.

The thistle was to him not a weed but a symbol: the poet spared what the farmer should have cut down. When we add to this that he has sung in vigorous and animated verse the praises of a haggis, it must be admitted that the force of nationality can no farther go. We outside barbarians admire the poetry of Burns heartily and honestly; we may flatter ourselves that we feel all its power and are thrilled by all its music: but beyond all question we are mistaken. There is an inner circle of apprehension and comprehension into which we cannot enter, into which no one can enter but he who has learned upon a mother's knee that sweet and expressive dialect which he used with such grace and such power.

Men of Scotland! countrymen of Burns! you do well to celebrate his memory with song and speech, with eyes suffused, and hand clasped in hand. You owe him a debt of gratitude which you can never repay. You are wiser than your fathers. God sent them this glorious genius, and they made him an exciseman, with seventy pounds a year, and allowed some pultry jack-in-office to tell him that his business was to act not to think. Alas! the pity of it! the pity of it! He has long been where cruel indignation can no longer lacerate his heart. You can only pour your vain libations upon his dust. This will not profit him, but it will profit you. You have a right to thank God in your prayers for the gift of Burns. Every Scotchman has a right to hold up his head higher from the fact that Burns was his countryman. For him every blue-eyed lassie that runs about your flowery braes or bathes her feet in the wimpling burn is a fairer object. For him every heathery hill glows in richer purple: every glen lies steeped in softer light: every mountain lake gleams with deeper blue. For him the wild rose burns with finer flame, and the thorn exhales a sweeter breath. His spirit hangs like a glory over your land; your streams are vocal with his name: the lyric lark sings of him whose music was sweeter than his own: of him your torrents rave: your winds murmur of him. The Scotland that he left was not the Scotland that he found. By him it was exalted, glorified, idealized; by him it was bathed in light that never shone on earth or sea—and until the rocks around your coast shall melt in the sun—until your hills shall pass away like the vapors that curl and play upon their sides, let not his image be banished from your hearts, let not his praise be silent on your lips.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

PART I.

(11). Chorus.—Egypt was glad when they departed, for the fear of them fell upon them.

Whether to prove his contrapuntal powers by showing his fluency in the severest scholastic form,—whether to exemplify the variety of the fugal style,—whether by introducing here a new element to distinguish the barbarous gladness of the Egyptians in their fear from the trusting joy of the Israelites in their faith,—whether either or all of these incentives, or any other, led Handel to adopt the style employed in this Chorus, may be surmised, but not determined; it is written according to the Phrygian Mode of the Gregorian system, and it shows more evidently than any course of reasoning could do, by means of its extreme harshness and unnatural effect, the entire inappropriateness of this obsolete, crude, artificial, and most arbitrary code to any but what may be classed as purposes of dramatic illustration among the uses of modern art. It is a masterly piece of writing, displaying perfect knowledge of the conventionalities of the school upon which it is formed, as perfect command of the resources of the same, and an amount of invention such as might scarcely have been supposed compatible with the limited means for its exercise; it is, in truth, an equal demonstration of the scholarship and the genius of Handel; and if such a production fail, as this does utterly, to elicit beauty and interest from the ancient ecclesiastical code, we may, with every deference to the motives that have impelled some distinguished men to attempt its resuscitation, honestly conclude that, being wholly unsympathetic with modern trained feelings, it is wholly unavailable to modern use. The chief Subject of the elaborate fugue under consideration,—

E - gypt was glad when they de - part - ed is first answered by inversion (having descending intervals for ascending, and the contrary), and it is given either direct or inverted, according to the exigency of the situation and the discretion of the author throughout the composition; when it has been developed at considerable length, this Countersubject is introduced:—

For the fear of them fell up - on them which is worked together with it till the conclusion of the fugue.

In this and several subsequent movements of the same character, the voices are at first accompanied with the organ only, the string and brass instruments being introduced considerably later to enforce some new entry of the Subject, which has the admirable effect, not merely of giving prominence to an important point, but of giving color and variety to the tone of the whole Chorus.

(12). Chorus.—He rebuked the Red Sea, and it was dried up. He led them through the deep as through a wilderness: But the waters overwhelmed their enemies, there was not one of them left.

The three ensuing movements are to be regarded as forming one connected piece of music, the inconelusiveness of the first two necessitating the immediate commencement of the one next following. The whole embodies the grand miracle of the passage of the Red Sea, depicting in its three divisions the several workings of that prodigious manifestation of Omnipotence—the utterance of the Divine command, the deliverance of the faithful tribes, and the destruction of their oppressors.

There is sublime grandeur in the broad solemn simplicity of the brief opening movement. The extreme brightness of the setting of the first phrase for the utmost instrumental and vocal power of the orchestra, and the subdued mystery with which the second is rendered for the whispering voices wholly without accompaniment, wondrously suggest the Almighty power of Almighty will, and the recoil of nature at the tremendous edict.

The second movement, though not a formally constructed fugue, comprises the most interesting elements of this class of writing. Its chief Subject,—

He led them through the deep, He led them through the deep as through a wil - derness is elaborated with great closeness, and combined with this singularly well contrasted counterpoint,—

as through a wil - derness

so ingeniously and so imaginatively, as could have been done by no one but a consummate master. Such are the means that under such treatment depict the steadfast progress of the tribes, to which implicit faith gives dauntless firmness, through the depths of the till then unfathomed waters, and the waves that divide before the enfranchised people, and ebb from the pathway their opening has formed; through the continuous motion of the Counter-point, the measured march of the Subject, with its long weighty notes, presents the passage through the deep,—and in our comprehension of the living picture, we should not regard as unworthy of esteem, since Handel thought it not unworthy to be used in illustration of his subject, the punning quibble upon the word "deep," of the long descending interval in the melody.

The last movement of the series is a terrible idealization of the great destruction that succeeded the great deliverance. The furious heaving of the excited billows fraught with God's wrath, of which they are the agents—the shrieks of the warrior host who are engulfed in their inevitable vortex,—these are the ideas from which the artist formed his marvellous conception—these are the images his genius presents to his hearers with an appalling truthfulness such as no power of art can transcend. In a previous Chorus, the iteration of the words "not one" was used as a means to enforce the idea of the total absence of physical weakness among the tribes who were spiritually strengthened by the conviction that they were championed by Heaven and their reliance upon Divine support: here the same words are again and again repeated, but with an effect different as the purpose; in this case the reiteration prompts a thought of the swiftness of Omnipotent purpose, and of the fixed necessity for His destroying agencies to fulfil it,—it is decreed that all the pursuing myrmidons of Pharaoh shall perish, and every separate wave seems instinct with a special will to select and to overwhelm its victim. This is the tremendous crisis to which not the present connected series of movements only, but the entire chain of Choruses, is the gradual and unswerving climax; I have spoken of the distribution of the plan of the work as yielding an effect of constantly accumulating power,—of such power here is the point of culmination.

(13). Chorus.—And Israel saw that great work that the Lord did upon the Egyptians; and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and His servant, Moses.

Here again we have two movements continuously connected—the first being, like the first of the previous series, entirely prelude. This is one of a class of movements of which the present work contains several examples, that derive from the extreme fulness of the harmony, the massive grandeur of its progressions, the solemn stateliness of the motion, and the peculiarly emphatic enunciation of the words that are declaimed with the broadest simplicity by all the voices with the same accentuation, a majestic grandeur that has perhaps no parallel. In the present instance, as in that of "He rebuked," and as in all those which are to follow, each harmonic transition amazes the hearer, and the effect of the whole conjures up a sense of immensity beyond what any mind could conceive without such wonderfully suggestive in this the employment of the harmony of the second bar is so singularly striking, and so new, that one marvels to associate it with the period at which the work was produced. The passage is repeated a fourth higher, and is rendered still more effective by the transposition.

Several of the phrases in "The Lord is a man of war," are taken from a Duet in C, also for two basses, to two words beginning "Quia fecit," in the Magnificat before cited; among others, that which I have quoted, but, as the harmony that gives to this the whole of its remarkable interest occurs not in the original, the entire beauty of the passage is there wanting.

(18.) Chorus.—The depths have covered them, they sank into the bottom as a stone.

Here we enter upon another chain of choral movements, not equal in constantly accumulating power and ever proportionate effect, but of such various and always striking character, whether from its descriptive force or from its scholastic elaboration, as ceaselessly to rivet the attention and perpetually to renew the interest of the hearer.

This opening movement of the group is one of those tone-pictures in which the present work is, above every other, successful. It represents the profound stillness of the mighty deep, no longer raging in the active immensity of its destructive power, but passively engulfing as a vast sepulchre the countless victims of its own terrible energy, to hoard them in the eternal sleep at the bottom of its never retraced abysses. The figure of the accompaniment, the phraseology of the voices, suggests the thought of an ever, ever-descending motion, gradual, solemn, funeral, and inevitable; and we think the while of the unruffled repose that, on the surface, marks the destruction it covers with such smiling serenity as teaches man to regard it as the symbol of peace, forgetting in its present loveliness all its terrors past.

(19.) Chorus.—Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power; Thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed to pieces the enemy.

How wonderful is the contrast between this and the foregoing movement, nothing but to hear the two in succession can make one comprehend. It bursts forth from the dreamy, indefinite, vague termination of the last Chorus like a young lion starting out of sleep, quick with impulse, vigorous with power to fulfil it, knowing no bound to his desires, feeling no bound to his internal means for their fulfilment. What a triumphant gladness, what a vigorous freshness does it embody, and what elasticity of spirit and thirst for action does it impart to us who hear it! There is no piece throughout the Oratorio in which the important resource of the double choir is employed with such peculiarly powerful effect as in this Chorus; the antiphonal responses resound from side to side like the tumultuous cries of joy of a vast multitude who have one impulse to their common exultation, and this floods the air with waves of sound that flow as from a single heart. I quote one passage—to facilitate the tracing of its ingenious working through the complicate imitations with which the several parts answer one another: but it is in the prodigious effect of the movement as a whole, more than in the minute beauty of its detail, that the transcendent excellence of this Chorus lies; feeling of its effect, not knowledge of the means of this, can alone enable us to comprehend, alone to appreciate it.

(20.) Chorus.—And in the greatness of Thine excellency Thou hast overthrown them that rose up against Thee.

Thou sentest forth Thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble.

An introduction and fugue constitute the plan of this Chorus. The expression passes from the jubilation of the last piece to profound awe,—a true sense of Omnipotence, and a feeling that they who now rejoice in the consequences of its demonstration are in its hands, and may, at the moment, become its sacrifice. This is succeeded by a more gradual transition to a religious or at least ecclesiastical regard of the burning vehemence of the Divine wrath, which is described with that severity we cannot but associate with the strict style of music used for the rendering of the passage; and the strangely ironical declamation of the final word at the close of the Chorus seems to speak a menace of the instantaneous annihilation that hangs as by a hair over all of us. The harmonic progressions of the brief opening are so remarkable, and their effect so astounding, that they demand the closest examination, requiring only to be made more and more familiar to become more and more prodigious in their impression:—

The fugue is an admirable specimen of mastery in this school of writing; it is formed upon this Subject:—

This is another important appropriation from the Magnificat that has furnished so much subject-matter for this Oratorio. A Chorus for double choir in that work, commencing with the words "Fecit potentiam," opens the same as the movement I have just described, and the conduct of the fugue for some considerable length exactly corresponds with it; the latter composition, however, much extended from the original, and the conclusion of this, which to an unschooled hearer will always be the most impressive passage in it, appears in this alone.

(21.) Chorus.—And with the blast of Thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.

Of all the singularly successful examples of objective imitation throughout this remarkable work, which is unique in its success in a province many deny to the art, and, even in the face of such success, will ever remain questionable ground for the propriety alike with the capacity of musical representation,—of all the examples of suggesting the effects of sight through the medium of hearing, none is so conspicuous for the peculiarity of its Subject and for the complete fulfilment of its purpose as the present Chorus. Here, as elsewhere in this Second Part, it has been the composer's design to portray, not a present terror on beholding the awful suspension of the laws of nature in active operation, but the indelible images the miraculous exceptions have left upon minds rendered especially impressionable by personal anxiety from personal participation in the events; so we must regard the Chorus under consideration, not as an expression of active feeling, but as one of a series of passive pictures. The breathing of Omnipotence is represented by the streaming, gradual, accelerated motion of instruments and voices with which the Chorus opens; the accumulation of the waters, by the close and constant imitations, in answers at the period of half a bar, of this concise theme, which are interrupted by this conspicuously contrasted phrase,— suggestive of the sudden paralysis in one rigid mass of the ever-moving fluid; the towering, inflexible, impassable wall of waters is depicted by the slow, measured, always distinct, monotonous enunciation, on a high note for whichever of the voices utters it, of the eight emphatic syllables, "the floods stood up-right as an heap:" opposed to this is the representation of extreme depth by the low note of the bass voices accompanied with the resonant tone of the open string of all the bow instruments and the deep pedal pipe of the organ, with which the following words are first rendered; the conclusion of the text is however too suggestive to prompt to Handel but a single image, so he repeats it on a phrase of successively descending intervals depicting the gradual sinking to the sea's centre, and again to the most wonderful passage in the whole Oratorio, in which the remarkable and peculiarly modern employment of the harmony on the G sharp bass is not to be noticed alone as a beautiful musical effect, but as a singularly felicitous interpretation of the sense that is still enforced by the tremulous iteration of the notes by the instruments, and the striking repose of the two succeeding bars where the voices are left with the accompaniment of the basses only, as happily illustrates the profound calm to which no storm can penetrate of the unfathomed depths of the ocean.

The only contrapuntal Subject in this Chorus,—that to the words, "The waters were gathered,"—is to be found in a Chorus in the Magnificat I have so often cited; this coincidence would be too insignificant for notice, but that the many more important ones with the same work prove the composer must have had it before him for constant reference and extract during the composition of this entire Second Part.

(22.) Air.—The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them: I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them.

This is the only piece in which Pharaoh is referred to as in action, and it is, therefore, appropriately different in character from the other music. It is by no means one of the most interesting compositions in the Oratorio, but it gives opportunity for animated and brilliant vocal display, so, if only as a contrast, it has its valuable importance in the plan of the entire work. It represents "the enemy" as fierce and impetuous, impulsively giving vent to his powerful anger in threats insignificant in proportion to their vehemence; and such may well have been the impression on the Hebrews of the Egyptian tyrant baffled in his purpose to arrest their flight.

(23.) Air.—Thou didst blow with Thy wind, the sea covered them; they sank as lead in the mighty waters.

Most striking is the opposition of this to the previous song as representing the infinite contrast between the perfectly calm serenity of Omnipotence which effects its greatest wonders in effortless tranquillity, and the irritated petulance of an incapable mortal whose fretful will is important to the accomplishment of his own design. Though describing a fearful event, the regarding it from this aspect divests it of its terrors, and the composer beautifully works out the design I ascribe to him throughout this Second Part in so embodying the text in the piece before us. The form of this song was suggested, obviously, by that in very common use a generation earlier than the time of Handel,—the carrying, namely, a Ground Bass (or an inflexible melodic phrase for the bass part which is constantly repeated as the support of constantly varied harmony bearing a constantly varied cantilena) uninterruptedly through an entire composition; but though the composer here practise this exercise of ingenuity as a means for all the good effect he can produce from it, to avoid the chances of the monotonousness that marks many a skillful piece of music so constructed, he occasionally breaks for a brief period the continuity of his Ground Bass, and so gives it greater interest on its resumption. Every one will be able to trace this characteristic theme:— to which the mellow resonance of all the tenor instruments in combination gives special individuality and prominence, through the diversified superstructure that is built upon it,—and to perceive in its flowing motion, in the bright, clear tone of the soft wind instruments that accompany it, and in the sustained phrases for the soprano voice that surmount the whole, a purpose to suggest the placid respiration of Deity whose effortless breath created and could annul the universe.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Licrezia Borgia," arranged for the piano-forte.

Concerts.

PHILHARMONIC. CARL ZERRAHN'S second concert, last Saturday evening, was a great success. The Music Hall was remarkably well filled. The orchestra of fifty instruments confirmed the good impression which they made before. Mendelssohn's greatest instrumental work, the Symphony in A minor, fraught with recollections of nature in Scotland, was rendered, perhaps not better than we have had it once or twice before, but for the most part satisfactorily and clearly, with spirit and with delicacy and in a way that brought its beauties and its continuous meaning out so as to rivet general attention, and excite spontaneous applause at the end of each of its four movements. We need not speak of them. Surely they form one of the richest and most well contrasted and consistent series of tone-pictures that the art affords. The Allegro is perfect in the working up of its fascinating and suggestive subjects; its complication and development are more like nature's growth than art; each change, each modulation, each amplification of the figure, each episodic surprise and return to the subject, seems to follow of necessity, in the very nature of the case; even that mighty storm passage, where the whole body of strings sweep like the wind through chromatic scales, swelling and dying away, comes in so spontaneously and naturally that you could not conceive of its being left out. It is a masterpiece of consummate treatment, while the ideas, the themes are true poetic inspirations. The Scherzo with its bright fresh colors, its piquant, saucy theme, and mocking answers, is always a favorite. The Adagio cantabile, in its two contrasted subjects, — the profoundly tender, pensive and religious cantabile, and the wild, responsive call of the low reed and brass sounds — is to our mind the acme, of all that we remember, of the peculiar genuine inspiration of Mendelssohn. The Allegro guerriero and Finale are a worthy conclusion. We doubt if a Boston audience ever enjoyed this Symphony so much before. Whatever blur there was in the rendering was chiefly perceptible in the first movements.

Greater still, and deeper, was the pleasure of listening once more to Beethoven's Overture to "Leonora" (No. 3, in C). We are tempted to say that it touches a deeper chord in us, and hence seems to embody a profounder life experience, with more poetic imagination, more dramatic fire and central passion, than any other overture. We never can hear it enough. It fills us and enlists all our sympathies, and still excites our wonder, stirring the feeling of the infinite as no work does, if we except the three or four grandest of the Symphonies. And then as to mere musical wealth, of ideas, of treatment, of marvellous surprises and effects of instrumentation, it is as brilliant and effective as any modern work. Think of its gloomy back-ground of chords suggesting the prison and starvation of a noble soul; its profound tenderness; the beauty and significance of the leading Allegro theme, full of the yearning of heroic love the breathless surprise at the sound of the approaching trumpet of deliverance; and then the outburst of joy and triumph, ending with that immense crescendo of the violins, worked up to grander and grander climax to the end! This is one of the overtures which do not grow hacknied. It was very effectively played. Why will not Mr. Zerrahn give us some time in one concert the four overtures which Beethoven wrote to his opera, one after the other, so that we may watch the progress of his ideas? It could not fail to be most interesting to all who listen earnestly and intelligently to music of this class.

The other orchestral pieces were of the brilliant and popular order; but of the finest of this kind. Meyerbeer's Fackeltanz ("Torch-light Dance") is a march, composed for some public occasion, built on the same model, essentially, with Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a smart, full-blazing strain of crackling brass harmony, pompous and heroic, alternating with softer strains, as if the procession were part military, part civic. It has some very energetic trombone work in it, which the players, red in the face, got through with famously. The last piece was the inspiring "Tell" overture, which is always a favorite, though there can be such a thing as hearing it too often.

The "Orphans Glee Club," — a delegation of some twenty of them — conducted by Mr. KREISSMANN, sung Schubert's Psalm: "The Lord is my Shepherd," — a composition of pure and spiritual beauty, which those who have a curiosity to know more nearly will find among the music printed during the past year in this Journal. OTTO DRESEL played the exquisite pianoforte accompaniment, which seemed, however, to require a "Grand" in that hall, and it was sung with good unity, and light and shade; making allowance for some disturbance of the euphonious impression by the straining of tenor voices in very high notes. The piece barely escaped an encore, and should be heard often. The pretty serenade, "She is mine," by Haertel, was sung with fervor, Messrs. LANGERFELDT, KREISSMANN and the brothers SCHRAUBSTAEDTER, doing justice to the bits of baritone and tenor solos.

In the virtuoso line we had a couple of violin solos by Mr. LOUIS COENEN, from Rotterdam, a member of the orchestra. In the Scena Cantata by Spohr, a sweet and elegant, but somewhat cloying composition, he showed a fine, pure tone, and much finish of execution, without great power. In the Fantasia on Suoni la tromba, by Coenen (his brother) — an absurd theme, it strikes us, for the violin — he plunged more deeply into the dazzling technicalities and difficulties of modern show-playing, and proved himself one of the adepts. But the piece itself is unmitigated trash, and was unworthy of a place in such a programme; besides that it was one solo too many.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. Last Wednesday the "Afternoon Concerts" were revived, — much longed for by the gay, sunshiny crowds, for pleasant memories lend magic to the name. But alas! there was no sunshine, and therefore no crowd. A few hundreds of people, braving the rain, were scattered about the Music Hall, and were treated to a fine performance of Beethoven's Haydn-like first Symphony, by an orchestra reduced to about one half of that of the Saturday evenings, — but quite an efficient one — four first violins, four second, two basses, and so on — led of course by CARL ZERRAHN. Also a good list of lighter pieces: — overture to Fra Diavolo, a Mendelssohn Song without Words, Waltzes, &c.

DEATH OF MADAME ARNOULT. Our musical and social world has met with a real loss. Madame Arnould, one of the most excellent teachers of singing, who has ever taught in Boston — a lady highly accomplished and esteemed in a large and cultivated circle of friends — enthusiastic and devoted in her art; generous of her time and counsel wherever she met with a fine natural voice and talent, without the means of procuring instruction, — she, to whom so many of our most successful vocalists owe the best part of their training, was last week relieved by that messenger that comes to all, after many long months of suffering. The funeral ceremonies took place at the Catholic Cathedral in Franklin Street, attended by a crowd of sincere mourners, and were deeply impressive. The musical service consisted principally of the Gregorian Chants, with portions of Mozart's Requiem, in which Mrs. Harwood (one of the pupils of the deceased), Mr. Schraubstaedter and Mr. Powers sang the leading parts. Great sympathy of course is felt for Dr. ARNOULT, the accomplished and gentlemanly teacher of the French language, who but a few years since was called to mourn a beloved and only daughter, and now mourns a wife.

Fine Arts.

Our thanks are due to the artist A. B. DURAND, for a copy of a fine steel engraving of his admirable portrait of the poet BRYANT. As a portrait, and as a specimen of the engraver's art, it is one of the finest ever produced in this country. It was engraved by Messrs. ALFRED JONES and S. A. SCHOFF, and published under the auspices of that genial set of Art-lovers and patrons, the "Century Club" in New York. In every house where Bryant's muse has made a home, this "counterfeit presentment" of the poet also should be seen. With the white and venerable beard surrounding the whole face, serene and delicate and full of sweetness and of strength, and with the high symmetric dome of the forehead, it is one of the noblest and finest heads in the world's gallery of bards and sages.

ARTISTS' RECEPTION. It was a capital thought in some of our leading Boston artists — Gerry, Champney, Willard and others — to institute here, as the artists have done so successfully in New York, a series of free and easy social gatherings of artists and the friends of Art. We attended the second reception, at Mercantile Hall, last week, and we know of no kind of evening party which could be more enjoyable. The hall was beautifully lighted and adorned; a superb chandelier of fresh flowers depended from the centre of the ceiling, and other masses of flowers were well disposed about the room. The latest pictures and sketches of our artists hung upon the walls, and offered not a little to admire. BALL's fine statue, the "Fisher Boy," was in front of the stage; behind it the large sketch of LEUTZE's Washington at Princeton — a powerful design. T. B. READ's "Spirit of the Waterfall," and BARRY's fine crayon drawing of the Autocrat's "School-mistress"; capital heads by WIGHT; landscapes by GAY, CHAMPNEY, BIERSTADT, GERRY; nice things by ORDWAY, and many more, repayed all the attention one could give them in the crowd. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club discoursed pleasant music, while the refined crowd of several hundred ladies and gentlemen, including many of our fairest and our most distinguished, and some guests of note, conversed in groups or circulated through the room.

LEUTZE was there, just arrived from Düsseldorf, having declined the offer of the directorship of the School there, in his strong desire to build up a worthy school of Art here in his native country:

Such reunions must inevitably further the interests of Art and artists in our city. They will turn the tide of thought and feeling more in that direction, and bring out latent sympathies, which lead to practical results, in those who love Art and can do something for it when they come to know each other better. The whole affair was admirably managed, and the artists surely have the thanks of all the guests when they made happy, and instructed too, that evening.

Le Retour de l'Hirondelle: Valse poétique pour Piano, by AUGUSTE MIGNON. Leipzig: F. Hofmeister.

"Poetic waltz" is a proper designation enough for that peculiar class of compositions in waltz rhythm, but more extended and more free in form, of which the so-called waltzes of Chopin are the most shining and most exquisite examples. They are as far off as the moon from waltzes to be danced to; as different as fairy dances from the conventional and set movements of a fashionable ball. They are fine poetic fancies borrowing the waltz rhythm to take an aerial whirl among the stars. Poetic in the finest sense are the waltzes of Chopin. This poetically named Auguste Mignon (the nom de plume, we understand, of a young Philadelphian of musical enthusiasm and talent) has evidently been moved to try a flight of the same kind, and hence he calls his work Valse poétique. It shows close study of its models, and genuine passion to pursue them, as one might be drawn upon the ice by the fascination, heartily appreciated, of a wondrous skater. It shows a considerable mastery of resources, both of musical structure and of the instrument. It abounds, perhaps super-abounds, with nicely weighed expression marks. After a few clever andante measures of widely dispersed chords, in B flat minor, the waltz sets off Allegro vivace, with a motive strongly suggestive of Chopin, and quite graceful in itself and in its ornaments. Then the key changes for a strain in octaves, which seems more labored and less happy. A third strain, (from G flat minor to D) is possessed with a restless trick of modulation at almost every step, and does not please us much; but the strain in B flat major into which it leads is graceful again, and really has a fine poetic sentiment. After another change (to six flats) those two pieces return again, and lead back, a little awkwardly it seems to us, the original waltz theme, ending with a graceful enough cadenza "il più presto possibile." This and the little B flat episode are the really happy and poetic parts of the work. As a whole, the labor of the effort is too apparent, as is natural in any young writer without the positive divine gift of genius. There is an excess of modulation in it, without in every case æsthetic result enough to justify. It strikes us that it would have been a better work if it had been simpler and less ambitious; while, without being strikingly original, it contains not a little that is pleasing and that shows talent and a refined feeling.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We omit many things to-day (and we have many communications on hand awaiting their turn) to make room for the extended analysis of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," which sublime work is to be performed by the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY to-morrow evening, in the Music Hall. It is announced for "once only;" but we are sure it would be a capital mistake not to give it several times, for the very reason that it is perhaps too great a work to make its full impression all at once. But let it be heard again and again, and it is as sure to be admired and felt, as are the mountains of New Hampshire in the long run, however much the mists may veil their grandeur and their beauties on a first approach. We have copied and have said enough about the grandeur of this oratorio, even superior in its choruses to the "Messiah," and in its descriptive or illustrative music putting to shame the pany efforts of men of "the Future" now-a-days. Mr. ZERRAHN has trained his forces thoroughly; the orchestra will be strong and efficient, and our best solo singers are engaged, giving us a union of our two most prominent soprani. Let no one stay away this time, and then perhaps the Society will give us opportunities to get familiar with this gigantic oratorio.

The Complimentary Concert for Mr. TRENKLE is progressing finely. Its success is already ensured.

There seems to be a general eagerness among our music-loving families to subscribe for tickets, and the musical artists, who give the concert, are prepared to make it one of uncommon interest. Besides ZERRAHN's orchestra, the "Orpheus," and Mrs. HARWOOD, four of our best pianists will unite in the performance of some pieces upon two pianos, which will have effect in the large Music Hall, namely: Messrs. PARKER, LANG, LEONHARD, and DRESEL. The Concert will take place next Saturday evening, the 19th.

CARL ZERRAHN's third Orchestral concert will take place on the 26th. . . . Do not forget the Wednesday Afternoon Concert at the Music Hall; next time we trust the sun will shine upon a crowd of happy listeners; the orchestra deserve it. . . . Mme. BISCACCANTI has left town for Canada, intending to return in about three weeks. The Concert in compliment to her will have to be postponed accordingly. She has been singing to overflowing and enthusiastic audiences in Portland. The Portlanders in fact lay claim to her as theirs; since there the memory of her mother is much cherished, and much of the girlhood of our prima donna was spent there. . . . Mr. STEPEL's "Hiawatha" is to be brought out in New York on Monday evening. . . . PICCOLOMINI, on her way through New York to Albany, Buffalo and the West, sings to-night at the Academy of Music in Don Pasquale, with FLORENZA, LORINI and MAGGIOROTTI.

WM. STERNDAL BENNETT is composing an oratorio for the next Leeds festival. The Athenæum knows of three other oratorios in English now simultaneously in progress. . . . Mr. H. F. CHORLEY has a volume of "Handel Studies" in course of preparation.

Music Abroad.

MILAN.—The Teatro della Scala at Milan is described as being once again on the very verge of closing. A comic opera by Signor Bottesini is about to be produced at the Teatro Santa Rodegonda in the same city; but the public there, if newspapers are to be trusted, seems disposed to occupy itself with other matters than music just at present.

LISBON. Letters from Portugal announce the complete success at Lisbon of Signor Vera's "Adrianna Lecouvreur." The principal singers were Madame Tedesco, Signor Neri Baraldi and Cresci. The opera is also to be given at Florence. A Naples correspondent announces the coming début of Miss Balfe in "Lucia," at the Teatro San Carlo, there.

SALZBURG. According to the Zeitschrift der Musik, a grand performance of Mozart's Requiem was given on the 12th of November, to commemorate the death of the last male descendant of the great composer, viz., his son, Carl Mozart, who died in Milan on the 31st of October.

LEIPZIG. The son of "Mountain Sylph" Barnett, has recently distinguished himself at a concert of the Conservatoire, by his playing of Beethoven's great Sonata Opus, 109.

We have had recently the following operas at the Royal Opera:—Fidelio, Freischütz, Tannhäuser, and Figaro.

DRESDEN. The female members of the theatre have been requested not to wear hoops, or "parentheses," as these garments are called in Berlin. The request has been made for the sake of "decency and morals." All the managers of the larger theatres in Germany seem to be disinclined to let their lady-members appear in "parentheses."

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, JAN 9.—Of the various firms here engaged in the business of publishing and selling music, but one only has ever given me the slightest aid in my vocation as correspondent of a musical periodical. To Herr Bahn, now the owner of the establishment known as the "Trautwein Book and Music Store," founded in 1822, I owe thanks for giving me opportunities of hearing excellent music, which otherwise, in part, I should have lost. In return, I wish to call the attention of the constantly increasing number of my countrymen, who come here for musical instruction, to him, and invite them at least to visit his place before deciding upon what particular firm to fix, of which to purchase the music they need. It is the custom, I find here, as with us, to make certain discounts to teachers and students. Mr. Bahn assures me he will do as well by any who will honor him with their patronage, as either of the other music dealers, and make the terms of his circulating library of music as reasonable. His place of business is in the Leipziger street—not so handy for such as live north of Unter den Linden, as Schlesinger's or Bote & Bock's, but quite in the neighborhood of those who should take rooms anywhere near to Kapellmeister Taubert or Hans von Bülow, the pianist.

To some few readers of the Journal of Music, I presume the name of Trautwein is a familiar one—they have seen it upon the fine large lithograph of Beethoven, upon certain of his Sonatas, upon Haydn's Quartets arranged in score, to the number of 82, upon some 40 or more of his symphonies arranged for 4 hands, upon Taubert's exquisite "Kinderlieder," &c. Mr. Bahn is also the publisher for Kullak; indeed his business is among the first in Berlin, in books and music. I am glad that for his politeness to me it is in my power to make this slight return, and hope that there are some friends, who read this, who will hereafter make his acquaintance. Speaking of music-stores, after the splendid establishments that one sees in our American cities—Ditson's, and Russell's, for example—those here seem strikingly small and inconvenient. The room into which a purchaser enters is hardly more than an office, the stock being kept, I hardly know where. I doubt if they keep so large a stock on hand as is usual with us. The business as a whole, is, however, immense; but I doubt if any firm in Germany prints one-half the number of pages of engraved music in a year that Ditson, for instance, does. People depend here more both for books and music upon circulating libraries; and, moreover, the number of purchasers in proportion to the number of music-sellers is nothing in comparison with the number in our country.

I had a pleasant hour or two recently of an evening hearing some Haydn Quartets. The first violin was played by Hans Dehn—son of the late professor—aged 13 years; second violin by Hans Einbeck, aged 15; the violoncello by young Barnewitz, aged 18; the viola by Herr Barnewitz, father of the latter, a member of the royal orchestra, and the boys' teacher. A little family party was gathered together on the occasion, and I do not know when I have been more interested. There was sadness, too; for the first quartet in the house, since the father's decease, had more of sorrow than joy, for us who knew and loved him. Once or twice the little fellow got out a little, but, on the whole, he went through bravely. His sister is a little more than a year older than he, and I heard them the other day practising a Mozart Sonata for pianoforte and violin together, for a children's party. They are no prodigies, but good examples of the manner in which those who really study music here go to work. As in their reading, writing, arithmetic, and so on, so in their music they are conquering its drudgery in childhood, and learning, even so young, to enjoy its highest delights.

Among the young musicians whom I knew three years ago here, was BERNARD SCHOLZ, a tall, fine looking young fellow, from Mainz—Mayence—or Mentz—as you please. He had come to Berlin to finish his musical education by a year or two of the strictest study with Dehn. As he lodged but a door or two from me, I had an opportunity to know much of him, and was invited to a private concert at Kullak's Institute, where nothing but his compositions were performed—sonatas, songs, and other chamber music. His success, I remember, was considered very encouraging. Scholz has now a place as music director in quaint old Nuremberg, and has just produced an opera in Munich—"Carlo Rosa"—the papers say, with a "favorable result." It is also stated that it is to be given at Wiesbaden.

Last Friday evening we had the third of RADECKE's Concerts. It opened with a very nice concert overture by Radecke himself, which, according to the blind man who reports for the National Zeitung, ended with a passage as much as to say—there, I have said all I wish, and now I am jolly. It pleased the audience—a very critical one. Did I mention in a previous letter that I had heard some choral music at a private musical party, by Radecke, which was very pleasing indeed? You must keep this young man in mind—this Robert Radecke. The second performance was a pianoforte concert by Mozart, in C, the solo by Madam OXFORD, of London. She plays nicely, but then in the second of these concerts we had CLARA SCHUMANN! and we cannot help contrasting.

Then Fraulein AGNES BUEY sang the air of the Queen of Night in the Magic Flute, and in the attempt to reach the key of F in altissimo made a break of it to the general hilarity of the audience. Then came LUDWIG STRAUSS, of Vienna, (one of the Strauss family?) and played an adagio and rondo by Molique, with a tone and execution, the like of which has this winter been heard here only from Laub. It was a most decided success. He played the other night at Leipzig; and Vaughn, an American musical student from that place, who is here on a visit of a few days, himself a violin player of great promise, assures me that the Gewandhaus audience accorded him, with one consent, a very high rank.

For the first time I had, then, an opportunity to hear the first finale of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Loreley. It equalled my expectations in all points but one—why did he score it with such an overwhelming flood of sound from the noisy instruments?

The second part of the concert was Schubert's symphony in C. It made the same impression it has made upon me before—stuff enough for two symphonies—and, as a whole, a little tedious—rather lyrical than symphonic.

Tunnhäuser continues to be given occasionally, and a few evenings since there was an orchestra rehearsal of Lohengrin, which has recently met with a sort of success in Vienna.

Now—news from BOTTESINI—the appreciation of whom as a virtuoso, like that of Bosio as a songstress—proves that we do not absolutely require an European reputation in an artist before we dare admire them. Both, you remember, came to us years ago unheralded and became favorites. My news is that at the Theatre St. Radegonda, in Milan, a new comic opera, "The Night Devil," by Bottesini, has been produced and "pleased extraordinarily."

There is at length, too, another German, who has the real vis comica—the only one since Lortzing. His name is JACOB OFFENBACH, and he is called a "Cologne-er," whether born there or only a music student there, I do not know. He is now music director at the "Bouffes Parisiens," in Paris, where he has produced a piece now given also in Berlin, under the title "The Betrothal under the Lantern," with great success. The last news from him is that he has given the world another very funny affair, "Orphée aux Enfers."

For the present until I can get time to write a private note, let an answer to certain questions be here given.

Mr. Blank plays pianoforte and organ and has been teacher of both, for years—I suppose, from what I formerly knew of him, that, at last, according to our American standard, he is a good musician. He now wants a period of rest, he feels, too, that he is dropping behind the best standard, he has labored long and now wants opportunity to enjoy fully that which so long has been a profession. He wants to give up everything else for a time and only hear and practice music. Good! A wise wish. One year, says my friend Blank, I will leave my pupils, throw off care, enjoy myself, and do something to make my instruction hereafter less like the blind leading the blind—if—if—the expenses can only be kept within reasonable limits. What if I go to Germany? will it be worth while, knowing nothing of the language?

Now, my friend, one language is universal—that of music. Should you come to Berlin, you know from letters, that this language at an expense of three or four dollars a week you can hear in every variety of its highest forms, almost daily for months together. So much you may expect beforehand to devote to hearing music. If you will take a German story book, or reader, and a German book or two on music, and with grammar and dictionary, work with some German of your town three or four hours a week, reading and translating, you can in three or four months lay such a foundation as would enable you to understand Haupt in studying counterpoint, or Löschohn, Kullak, Bülow in practising pianoforte. Whether you would learn so very much in one year, I cannot tell; but in your case, it would be more the reduction of what you already know to available order, than beginning anew. But every one wants some regular employment for his happiness—so that if you gained nothing else, you would feel contented, because employed. I do not see how the expenses of teachers and instruments in your case could amount to more than $12 or $15 a month. Let us say then, you come over in the pleasant season, June or July, in a sailing vessel to Bremen—in a German vessel, for the sake of the language, and for the sake of a month of good, hearty, delightful laziness, after years of hard work. Then for $75 you leave New York and reach Berlin. A Czernikow's or Taepfer's hotels, or the Hotel de Brandenburg, you will spend a day or two at perhaps $2 per day—may be less, while you hunt out some American to give you an hour or two in finding a room. Go to Gov. Wright and you can get the addresses of as many of your countrymen as you want.

There are all sorts of prices for rooms. John and I are particularly favored. We are in a two-story house, in a woodyard, right upon the great Friedrich St., within six or eight minutes of the opera house, on the lower floor. He has the large room, and I the two smaller. Our bills average at this season of the year, for rent, fuel, light, service, coffee in the morning with its etceteras, washing and (is this all?) $12 to $15 per month. Dinners we get at the hotels or restaurants, at a cost of 15 to 20 cents. Sometimes we feast—and then go up to 25 or even 30!

Really, I do not see why you cannot come here and stay a year upon $500, well. It you travel a little, that is not included. If music is your object, come here and devote yourself to it. For one who has music in his soul, and does not make it a mere money-making trade, as so many do, such a year will more than pay in the satisfaction and enjoyment he will have. I cannot tell you how Haupt's pupils respect that man for his learning, and love him for his goodness. You, my friend Blank, are not self-conceited. Those, who come here or go to Leipzig full of that delicious feeling, usually find, before any great length of time, if they are not enclosed in triple brass, that they are not phenomena.

One of the first scientific men in America said last year, that he envied me almost for my good fortune in being able to come over here again. He felt the absolute need of spending a year or two here in endeavoring to come up to the progress of science. If this was so with him, who spent years here formerly, and who, one supposes, might keep himself in advance by means of the new scientific publications, how much more a necessity is it for an artist in any sphere to come abroad now and then, and especially for a musical man, who never has had opportunity to hear great works save in very homeopathic doses, to give one year of his life to this one object, even though he does not study, but only hears music.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

GOOD MORROW. Song. Frank Mori. 25

An elegant parlor song.

MOTHER BAILEY. Song and Chorus. C. Lorenz. 25

A revolutionary reminiscence, done into nice rhymes, and provided with a good, singable tune. It is a piece which, from the interest of its subject, should become a household song.

IN THE STARLIGHT. Duet. Stephen Glover. 40

A new duet for two female voices from the pen of this most popular of duet composers, light and graceful in character.

SHE'S LAUGHING AT MY SORROW. (Ah! ride del mio pianto.) Duet. "Martha." 30

This is that charming duet between the Lady and Lionel in the second act, which every hearer of this excellent opera will easily recall to mind.

DAYS GONE BY. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 25

ONE WISH FOR THEE. Song. " 25

OH, FOR THE BREEZY SHORE. Song. " 25

Three pretty songs by this favorite author. The last with its monastery bell-like accompaniment will become an especial favorite.

LITTLE MR. BINKS. Comic Song. H. Walker. 25

RURAL COURTSHIP. " " " 25

Two gems for lovers of the comic by the arranger of that irresistibly funny travesty on "Traviata."

Instrumental Music.

GALOP DI BRAVURA. Charles Fradel. 30

Dashing and brilliant, although by no means difficult.

CORO DI ZINGARE. (Gipsy Chorus) in "Traviata," arranged by W. Berger. 25

An effective, if not brilliant, arrangement of a delicious bit of characteristic melody, which, from occupying an insignificant place in the opera, has not yet attained that popularity which it seems entitled to.

PICCOLOMINI POLKA. Rimn. 20

CLAIR DE LUNE POLKA. Zeffer. 25

ESTELLA WALTZ. P. J. Schreiner. 25

PROVIDENCE LIGHT INFANTRY POLKA. Almira E. Moore. 25

WALTZ QUADRILLE AND POLKA. Americus. 35

TEXAS POLKA. C. H. Rondeau. 25

New and pretty dance music for the parlor.

RIGOLETTO POTPOURRI, for 4 hands. F. Beyer. 60

This is one of that favorite set, called the "Revue melodique." It has, of course, the ever fresh "La donna e mobile" and the beautiful "Caro nome," besides other pretty airs. The Treble part (primo) is intended for the pupil, and easy; the Secondo for the teacher, and of medium difficulty.

PURE SICCOME, from "Traviata," arranged for four hands. Nordmann. 30

A pleasing arrangement of this plaintive air, in strict conformity with the original score.

Books.

THE BEAUTIES OF CALEDONIA; or, Gems of Scottish Song; being a collection of more than fifty of the most beautiful Scotch Ballads, set to music, many of which have hitherto been unpublished in this country; the whole arranged, collected and compiled from the very best sources, and latest revisions of the author's works. With a portrait of Robert Burns, $1. In cloth, emblematically embossed, 1.50

All admirers of pure Scotch Song will welcome this collection, made with unusual care and excellent taste and discrimination. A New volume of the same class is in preparation.

The Professor's Poem.

From the Atlantic Monthly, March, 1859.

And now you may read these lines, which were written for gentle souls who love music, and read in even tones, and, perhaps, with something like a smile upon the reader's lips, at a meeting* where these musical friends had gathered. Whether they were written with smiles or not, you can guess better after you have read them.

THE OPENING OF THE PIANO.

In the little southern parlor of the house you may have seen
With the gambrel-roof, and the gable looking westward to the green,
At the side toward the sunset, with the window on its right,
Stood the London-made piano I am dreaming of to-night.

Ah me! how I remember the evening when it came!
What a cry of eager voices, what a group of cheeks in flame,
When the wondrous box was opened that had come from over seas,
With its smell of mastic-varnish and its flash of ivory keys!

Then the children all grew fretful in the restlessness of joy,
For the boy would push his sister, and the sister crowd the boy,
Till the father asked for quiet in his grave paternal way,
But the mother hushed the tumult with the words, "Now, Mary, play."

For the dear soul knew that music was a very sovereign balm;
She had sprinkled it over Sorrow and seen its brow grow calm,
In the days of slender harpsichords with tapping tinkling quills,
Or carelling to her spinet with its thin metallic thrills.

So Mary, the household minstrel, who always loved to please,
Sat down to the new "Clementi," and struck the glittering keys.
Hushed were the children's voices, and every eye grew dim,
As, floating from lip and finger, arose the "Vesper Hymn."

— Catharine, child of a neighbor, curly and rosy-red, (Wedded since, and a widow, — something like ten years dead,) Hearing a gush of music such as none before,
Steals from her mother's chamber and peeps at the open door.

Just as the "Jubilate" in threaded whisper dies,
— "Open it! open it, lady!" the little maiden cries,
(For she thought 'twas a singing creature caged in a box she heard,)
"Open it! open it, lady! and let me see the bird!"

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Tomaschek.

Mr. Editor: — As Tomaschek is less widely known than he deserves to be, a slight sketch of his life and works may not perhaps prove unacceptable to the readers of your excellent Journal.

W. J. TOMASCHEK was born in the year 1774, at Skutsch, in Bohemia. He was educated for the bar, and was about receiving his final degree as Doctor of Laws, when Count Buguoy, one of the magnates of Bohemia, having accidentally heard the young lawyer's music to Bürger's "Leonora," thought it a pity such abilities should be lost to the musical world, and hence offered him a place for life in his service as "Composer." Tomaschek had thus time to devote himself entirely to Art, and, bringing the resources of a keen and cultivated intellect to bear upon the subject, he made the most severe theoretical and practical study of music, examining and comparing all known systems, from the earliest to the latest, and finally constructing one of his own, based upon the laws of nature, so rational, logical, simple, and condensed, that no student could avoid being struck by its beauty, and its superiority to all previously taught. Unfortunately, it was never published.

Tomaschek lived chiefly in Prague. With the Conservatorio of Music in that city he had no official connection, although the judgment of so excellent an artist was, of course, often consulted. His connection with musical associations was principally as follows; he was honorary member of the great Society of the Netherlands for the promotion of Music; Corresponding member of St. Ann's Musical Association, in Vienna; and honorary member of the great German National Association for Musical Art and Science, as also of the great musical Associations in Vienna, Insbruck, Pesth, Ofen, and Lemberg.

After a long, useful, and blameless life, Tomaschek died suddenly, in 1849, of a disease of the heart.

Although exacting and somewhat severe in his judgments, and impatient of all pretension and shallowness, he was a most delightful companion, with whom no man could associate without being directed toward all that is truly noble and elevating in life and in Art. As man and as artist he seems equally to have won the admiration of those who knew him best. He left behind him many works, some of which were published during his life, while others remain in manuscript to this day, if indeed they exist at all. The following list of his compositions is from memory, and by no means complete.

WORKS NEVER PUBLISHED.

Two Operas. The first, Seraphine, one of his earlier works, produced in Prague; the second, a far grander work, never produced.

Several Symphonies for full orchestra.

Several characteristic, dramatic, vocal and orchestral compositions, founded upon portions of Faust, Wallenstein, Bride of Messina, &c.

About seven piano Sonatas.

Numerous Songs, with orchestral or piano accompaniments.

WORKS PUBLISHED, NOT NOW TO BE OBTAINED.

One Quartet, for piano and stringed instruments.

One Trio, for piano, violin, and violoncello.

These works are said to be models of beauty of form and artistic treatment, but they are now out of print, and it is even feared that the plates have been destroyed.

WORKS PUBLISHED, STILL TO BE OBTAINED.

A solemn Requiem, vocal and orchestral, Op. 70.

A second Requiem, vocal, with accompaniment of double basses and violoncellos, Op. 72.

A solemn Mass, in C major, Op. 81, composed for the coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand, when crowned in Prague King of Bohemia.

Another orchestral Mass in E flat, never published in score, only in the separate parts.

Te Deum, for orchestra and chorus, Op. 79.

The Lord's Prayer, arranged for solos and chorus, with piano accompaniment, and ending in a fine fugue.

Many Songs. Lyrics of Goethe and other poets, with two sets of songs in the Bohemian language.

Two Overtures. One to Seraphine, Op. 36; One in fugue style, Op. 38. Both are arranged for four hands on the piano by Tomaschek himself.

3 Piano Sonatas.

3 Dithyrambs.

4 Books of Rhapsodies.

7 Books of Eclogues.

Tre Allegri copricciosi di bravura. Op. 52.

Tomaschek was the first who wrote in the four forms last mentioned.

Those desirous of acquiring a knowledge of Tomaschek's style and power as a composer, are directed especially to his Requiem, Op. 70, a noble work, challenging comparison with the two most renowned the world has known, that of Cherubini for full orchestra and chorus, in C minor, and that of Mozart in D minor. A patient and impartial student of the three, considering all things, science, melody, adaptation of music to words, and religious elevation and comprehension, would not, we think, long hesitate to which to award the palm. The following are also among his most characteristic compositions: — The Missa Solennis, Op. 81; Nos. 2 and 3 of The Allegri di bravura, Op. 52; 2 books, Op. 41 and Op. 110, of the Rhapsodies; and many, too numerous to mention, of his charming Eclogues.

These works are characterized by clearness and freshness, manly vigor and energy, tenderness, passion, and grandeur. However large or small the form, each whole is complete in itself. There is never a measure or a note too much or too little. Nothing can be slighted, for everything has a meaning. There is no wandering off into mere passages to fill up a vacuum in thought and hence these compositions require for their performance and proper appreciation, intelligent and conscientious artists.

So wide a culture as Tomaschek possessed of course preserved him from many faults of taste into which others in his day had fallen. We cannot avoid, as with Chopin, being continually startled by the wealth of invention and novelty of effects which he displays; and the mastery with which he moved through the most intricate contrapuntal mazes, remind us of Sebastian Bach's wonderful skill in the independent and flowing treatment of combined parts. (In our day, it is the successive rather than the simultaneous parts which are apt to be somewhat too independent.)

Tomaschek was eminently a self-conscious artist, aware of all he did and why he did it, intellect and feeling moving together; and his productions recall to us noble paintings of which we find every part dwelt upon with care and love, and each minute portion highly finished, although of course, with all proper subordination to the general effect of the whole.

This tribute to the memory of a great man has been drawn forth by a sense of the justice due to departed genius and worth. Let the world, if it must, ignore living greatness, but at least, after death, let "all these odds be made even," and the meed of praise bestowed where it is truly due.

Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

Part II. (Concluded.)

(24). Chorus.—Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the Gods? Who is like Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? Then stretched out Thy right hand, the earth swallowed them.

This Chorus opens with another, the last, of those grand introductory movements that not only give pre-eminent solemnity and emphasis to the portions of the text they declaim, but tend greatly to signalize the entire work with the peculiar character of dignity and majestic earnestness which I think renders it perfectly unique among all the productions of musical art.

The fugue, to which the last four words alone are set, I can but conjecture to embody an ecclesiastical regard of the awful manifestation of the might of Heaven, rather than a retrospect, through the vista of human associations, of its horrors, and that it conveys an analogous expression with that of the earlier Chorus, "Thou sentest forth," of a very analogous text, and maintaining the supposed design of withholding from this Part of the Oratorio all representation of the present effect of the tremendous incidents that are depicted as in actual occurrence in the First Part. The subject—is immediately combined with the counter-subject which commences in the third bar of the chief theme,

The earth swal - - - low'd them.

The earth swal - - - low'd them.

An admirable feature in the composition is the conspicuous figure for the violins introduced near the close:—

which is wholly independent of the vocal progressions.

This fugue is the most important, because the most unqualified, appropriation from the often-cited Magnificat of which it is the final Chorus; the only modification of the original the version before us presents is the addition of some notes of ornament in the counter-subject,—the entire conduct of the plan, to the precise number of bars, even the remarkable instrumental figure at the end, are the same.

(25). Duet.—Thou in Thy mercy hast led forth Thy people which Thou hast redeemed; Thou hast guided them in Thy strength unto Thy holy habitation.

Let us imagine in this mournful Duet the contrition that alone can propitiate for time to come the mercy which has wrought the redemption this entire Part is to celebrate,—a feeling of unworthiness of what has been, which makes benefits press heavier than chastisement upon the soul, but stimulates highest resolves for future deserving. The second sentence of the text is set with a stronger expression of confidence gathered from the sense of security these words imply.

I have here to make a last allusion to the Magnificat, whence so many of the leading ideas of this division of Israel in Egypt have been derived; in that there is a Duet, also, for tenor and alto, but in E instead of D minor, which exactly corresponds with the opening of the Duet before us; but, breaking off after the first ensemble, it is the only instance in which the unquestionable original surpasses in merit and interest as a composition, the subsequent piece that has been modelled upon it.

(26). Chorus.—The people shall hear and be afraid, sorrow shall take hold on them, all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away, by the greatness of Thy arm, they shall be as still as a stone till Thy people pass over, O Lord, which thou hast purchased.

This and the following piece constitute a most important episode in the grand theme the composer has chosen. The rejoicing and thanksgiving of the present, on account of the glorious wonders of the most recent past, are here suspended for the contemplation of the no less glorious if less awful wonders of the future, that Divine promise has assured to the enfranchised people. The happy goal of all their desire is but to be gained by means of the still further miraculous intervention of the same Power which has brought the Israelites thus far towards it; and their only prospect of the land of promise is through the idea of the total overthrow of the nation that now luxuriates in its rich fertility. The vague apprehension of a coming event is a remotely different feeling from the definite recollection of one we have witnessed, and the dreamy, mysterious foreboding is the feeling the composer here embodies, in opposition to the living consciousness he has realized in the foregoing development of his subject. The movement under consideration is in many respects the most remarkable, and, to my own individual appreciation, the most beautiful in the Oratorio; it is by far the longest; its design is the most comprehensive and extensive; it contains a greater number and variety of ideas than any other; its phraseology, its harmonic progressions, its modulations, are throughout conspicuous for their peculiarly modern character, for their peculiarly technical beauty, for their peculiar fitness to the unfolding of the master's great conception; and this conception—silence is the only veil for the utter inefficiency of words either to describe or to eulogize it: Handel must have concentrated the utmost power of even his transcendent genius upon this one point, to have surpassed Handel as he has done in its present marvellous manifestation. I shall best illustrate the purpose and effect of the extraordinary Chorus by cataloguing, without comment, the principal elements of which it is formed: the long-continued, anxious motion of the accompaniment; the gradual climax of the declamation of the opening words; the singularly graphic expression of this phrase,— coming as it does after the first emphatic enunciation of the words "All the inhabitants of Canaan," which expression is still further heightened by this further carrying out of the same idea,—

Shall melt a - way.

Shall melt a - way. &c.

All th' in - hab - i - tants of Ca - - the solemn stillness of the unisonous recitation of the low voices upon a monotone of the next following words; the multitudinous effect of the complicated elaboration of the phrase,—

Till thy people pass o - ver, O Lord.

which appears to exhaust all the resources of harmony; the terrible grandeur of the descending passage,—

They shall be as still as a stone.

with the impressive change of harmony and of key on the last note; and the great energy attained by the cessation of all motion and interweaving of the parts, and the single enunciation, wherever they occur, of the last four words. Without the dazzling accessory and brilliancy of effect which would have been wholly irrelevant to the situation, and would have always been felt to be so, this Chorus must ever make a thrilling and a deep impression on all who hear it with attention and with belief in its excellence, of which that impression will be the true metre. It is interesting to notice that the entire setting of the words "All the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away," is an interpolation (introduced by a sign of reference in the MS.) after the original composition of this Chorus, and as interesting to observe how indispensable to the completeness of the whole does this remarkable passage now appear.

(27). Air.—Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of Thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which Thou hast made for Thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary, O Lord, which Thy hands have established.

Looking now beyond the medium of sorrow and death, through which only the promised land is to be attained, the chosen people regard Canaan as in their possession, and they see in it an abode of peace that toil and sadness cannot enter, but where gentle love and continuous content will make up the tranquil sum of life. The composer has rendered this idea in a song which is not merely a most artistic contrast to the great Chorus immediately preceding it, but a piece perfectly distinct in character and expression from everything in the work, and so most true to the present situation, which is the only one where the placid calmness of hope relieves the ever-varying tumult of exciting emotions that—whether in the witnessing, or in the retrospect, or in the anticipation of the terrors of Almighty power—constitutes the entire matter of the Oratorio. He has rendered this idea in a definitely rhythmical, flowing melody, of such loveliness as no one has ever been better able than Handel to produce, which is the only one the text of Israel in Egypt gave him opportunity to write, and which draws yet additional beauty from its opposition to the gloom and the grandeur that surround it, as the rainbow's brightness is in proportion to the darkness of the cloud in which it is reflected. This, with the preceding movement, completes the episode of the anticipated approach to and possession of the promised home beyond the wilderness.

The Air before us affords another example of Mendelssohn's felicitous carrying out of the composer's conception, in the beautiful additions of his organ-part to the original skeleton score, which are again so completely incorporated into Handel's idea, that this must henceforth always appear incompletely expressed without them.

(28).—Chorus, Recitative, and Solo.

Chorus.—The Lord shall reign for ever.

Recit.—For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots and with his horsemen into the sea, and the Lord brought again the waters of the sea upon them: but the Children of Israel went on dry land in the midst of the sea.

Chorus.—The Lord shall reign for ever and ever.

Recit.—And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances, and Miriam answered them: Solo and Chorus.—Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea.

Now, it should seem, the assembled nation grow impatient of any theme that distracts their thoughts, while their feeling is unchangeable from the great rejoicing they are gathered in thronging thousands to celebrate, and their enthusiasm, stimulated anew by the happy prophecy conveyed in the last words, breaks forth in an exclamation of rapture that includes the past and the present with all time to come in declaring the eternity of the reign of the Lord. The unisonous announcement of the first strain of this Plain Song—

The Lord shall reign for ev - er, and ev - er.

The Lord shall reign for ev - er, and ev - er.

against the moving Counterpoint of the bass instruments, its repetition with the full harmony of voices and orchestra, and its continuation in the second strain with the accelerated motion of the instruments, have such broad and simple grandeur, and such continually accumulating power, as are not to be surpassed; and raise in us a sense of stupendous immensity that no human production can, in its effects upon the imagination, ever more than equal. One among the people, or, we may suppose, Moses, God's agent in their deliverance, recalls to them the recent destruction of Pharaoh, and they burst forth again in their exulting song of jubilant gratitude and praise. The High Priest's sister, with a far-reaching train of maidens glowing in healthful beauty, as pure in thought, dances amid the clangor of the joyous instruments they bear, to the front of the enraptured multitude; to the notes of the Plain Song that has just been poured out in an unanimous shout of fervor by the people, she repeats, as an exhortation, the words that opened this great solemnity, and the people answer her in tumultuous echo, phrase by phrase; and then, their capacity of excitement wrought to its utmost possible tension, they break into the general ebullition of transport with which the grand festival of the Exodus commenced, and they fill the air once more with their irrepressible praises of the glory of the everlasting King, whose triumph was not for the moment, but is eternally revered, eternally giving fresh tokens to his universal people of the greatness their universal praise can never equal.

It was an original, and, because original, a daring artifice to repeat this final movement, precisely from the beginning of the part, but we all are aware, the most no less than the least initiated in musical technicalities, how manifold the interest and the effect of a piece of music of any complexity of construction is increased by a second hearing, and Handel was as aware of this as we are; and thus knowing that nothing fresh that could be written would so powerfully impress his audience as that repeated which a recent hearing had enabled them to comprehend, he took advantage of the opportunity with which his text prompted him, and employed this artifice. The excellence of which, for the present purpose at least, is fully proved by its perfect success in exciting the auditory to the highest and the noblest enthusiastic exaltation, and by filling them with the sense of that Almighty greatness and power of which this colossal work is at once the celebration and the symbol.

The Charge of the Light-Kid Brigade.

BY UNISON.

"I am obliged to let Five Hundred Stockholders in for nothing" — Ullman's Works.

Down the street, up the street,
'Cross the street, onward,
Into the Opera House
Rushed the Five Hundred.
"Charge?" was the leader's cry;
"None!" was the proud reply;
On, on, to hear and see Fair Piccolomini,
Into the Opera House
Rushed the Five Hundred.

Dead heads the right of them,
Dead heads the left of them,
Dead heads the whole of them,
Ne'er a head sundered;
Stared at with opera glass,
Manfully in they pass,
Into the Opera House,
Filling orchestra stalls,
Marched the Five Hundred.

Flashed all their heads so bare,
Flashed all at once in air,
Under the chandelier;
Parquet and upper tier,
Balcony wondered;
Stared then the manager,
Counted their heads so bare —
Bald-heads, or heads of hair,
All of them dead-heads were — Counted with greedy glare,
Said he was plundered;
Firm and unmoved they sat,
Sat the Five Hundred.

Lorgnettes to right of them,
Lorgnettes to left of them,
Lorgnettes behind them,
Opened and wondered;
Stared at by wondering eyes,
Sat they without surprise,

Said they had built the house,
Sat then as mute as mouse;
Out rushed the manager,
All that was left of him —
Stayed the Five Hundred.

When can their glory fade?
O, the brave stand they made!
All the house wondered;
Honor the stand they made,
Gallant Light-Kid Brigade,
Noble Five Hundred!

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A Hint to Mr. Zerrahn.

My Dear Dwight. — I am a subscriber to Carl Zerrahn's concerts. Considering them eminently worthy of support, I subscribe on principle, and appropriate to my own use only a very small portion of the tickets I pay for. I imagine therefore that I have a perfect right to do a little grumbling if I feel like it, and have good reason. I am going to do a little now, and let me hope that your well known influence in musical circles may accomplish something for us.

Why, in the name of all that is reasonable or unreasonable will Mr. Zerrahn persist, year after year, in placing the Symphony first in the order of performance? There are forty good reasons why he should not, and for the life of me I cannot imagine one why he should. Such an arrangement is unmistakably a bad one, both for audience and orchestra. I consider it a mistake for an audience to be plunged suddenly into a classic Symphony, without having been in some appropriate way, prepared for it. The change from out of door life is too abrupt, and takes the audience at disadvantage. It is bad enough for the early comers, who take their seats leisurely and quietly, and who have an opportunity of composing themselves to a musical frame of mind; but what shall we say of those unfortunates (and the number is not small) who, belated, rush to the hall in hot haste, and all breathless and flustered, strive hopelessly to appreciate a Symphony of Beethoven's before they have recovered their wind? Any one who has ever tried this knows that it is positively atrocious. Not much worse indeed is it for those who unavoidably arrive half an hour late, and find themselves served to a most excellent course of side dishes and vegetables, the body and soul of the feast having already been discussed without them. These simply find themselves "choused out" of their share for which they paid in advance.

In writing upon this very matter in your paper sometime ago, I think you called the Symphony the "Piece de resistance" of the concert-room feast, and said it should be approached artistically and served after a few lighter courses. Precisely. A Symphony is to a concert what Bœuf à la mode or plum pudding is to a dinner; yet what man in his senses would ever think of beginning his dinner with plum pudding? Does a poor digestion count nothing?

Take the orchestra. As the classic Symphony is the best part of a concert, so is it the most difficult of performance, and requires the greatest accuracy in time and tune. With the most complete orchestras this accuracy is rarely acquired at the first start. It takes some little time for the performers to compose themselves into that state of perfect ease and self-possession which is so necessary to a perfect performance; some little time for the instruments to become well tempered to each other.

It is the same with every thing else; any artist, before undertaking a scientific performance, wants first to "get his hand in;" the painter always makes a few preliminary flourishes. Eminently is this preparation necessary where artists are combined as in a large orchestra.

Nobody pretends to dispute all this; the thing is as clear as the noon-day sun, and yet Carl Zerrahn won't see it. Can't something be done about it? Are we always to have the symphonies of Mendelssohn and Beethoven started out of tune? or supposing, even, that the Band commences in perfect tune, can not Mr. Zerrahn be made to understand that the tympanums and musical nerves of his audience, made discordant by the turmoil and hum of a busy day, require tuning just as much as his violins and drums?

Let Zerrahn lead off, then, with some richly harmonized and graceful overture, which shall settle both audience and orchestra well down to their work, and give subscribers who are belated, a little better chance. Then we can have the Symphony next, if you please, and what more appropriate finale can be desired for the First Part?

As to the afternoon concerts, where the same arrangement exists, I have nothing to say as I never attend them; but I think if the Symphony were played last instead of first, a good many who dine at two and half past two o'clock would drop in after dinner and hear it. I don't urge this point, however, because the freshness and vigor of an audience, — in its prime at the end of Part First — is apt to flag a little at the end of Part Second.

Far be it from me to rob Carl Zerrahn of one whit of the credit which is his due. We all know that his orchestra is as nearly perfect as can be. It is the very excellence of it which causes the blemish which I am writing about, to appear so flagrant; the more so as it might be easily rubbed out. DOUBLE BASS.

Foreign Correspondence.

BERLIN, JAN. 16. — A bit of a story to begin with.

In 1858, a good lady of Cincinnati, instead of waiting until Christmas or New Year, on the Fourth of July made her husband a present of another boy. Whether owing to the extraordinary amount of good music (!) which is always and everywhere to be heard on that particular anniversary, or to some other of the various causes, which might be studied out, time permitting, the history saith not — but the entire musical talent of the family centred in the little celebration of Independence. The family afterward settled in Cleveland, but upon a visit to Cincinnati, which the boy made when some fourteen years of age, he received from a kind friend, of all presents in this world — the right one, a violin. Of course father and mother did not wish young Independence to turn out a fiddler! What parent could? Still, they had no objection to his amusing himself that way better than loafing with bad boys. He however had somehow become impressed with the idea that fiddling for amusement was not enough; that he ought to study the violin, which is a very different matter. How to accomplish this? Yes, how? He was now fifteen — a little fellow, but with the right material in him. His father published one of the Cleveland papers, and the carriers could earn $1.50 per week. Good! Young Independence, through all one long, dreary winter, rose every morning at four o'clock, folded his papers, and started off on his round through the city, facing old Boreas, who used to come sweeping down from the icebergs of Hudson Bay, across the frozen plains of Upper Canada, sharpening his frosty breath by a little extra dampness as he skimmed the surface of Lake Erie, and then, as if maddened by the sudden resistance to his course, which the high lake shore presented, rushed with all fury into the still silent streets of the city, and venting his ire upon the few solitary individuals he found, — newspaper boys, and milkmen and the like. Sometimes the cold old wind amused itself by heaping the snow upon the steps and thresholds of the houses, and the boy had to spend the long weary morning in brushing it away, door after door, at least so far as to admit of his thrusting his paper beneath, and so he earned his $1.50 per week.

This money went immediately to a German, who gave him two lessons a week upon the violin, and for the remainder some instruction in the German language. And all this time the boy spent his six hours daily in the public school, without neglecting his studies. By the time he was 17 he had proved that his taste for the violin was not a mere childish, transient passion, but that real devotion, which is one at least of the proofs of a true vocation. The boy too, had made such progress as to play in a concert with (I suppose) "tremendous applause."

He was already a victim of the Germany mania; but the means for its cure were wanting. His old Cincinnati friend, he of the violin gift, had not forgotten him, and now came forward with a proposition to send him to Leipzig to David for two years. Many were the pros and cons about sending the youth 3000 miles away among strangers, foreigners, temptations, and all that. But wise counsels prevailed, and the decision was, to let the instinct of his nature determine his profession.

In New York, where he came to take ship, he visited Ole Bull, and played to him, who encouraged him after this manner: "This," pointing to his own head, "is all right," and "this," pointing to his heart; "but you play shockingly," and so on; and gave him a letter to David. In September, 1855, he reached Leipzig, and the next month entered the Conservatory.

Of the three years since, one was lost by a severe attack of disease, but the other two have been nobly employed. The young man has been with us for a few days, and has let us hear him in Sonatas by Beethoven and Bach, and in show pieces by De Beriot, and Vieuxtemps. Last evening he played at Gov. Wright's, our minister, making a very marked impression. His tone is superb, his execution fine, but above all is the feeling with which he plays. An Adagio by Beethoven was given with exquisite tenderness, and at another period in the evening, Vieuxtemps' Yankee Doodle, he deviled with such comic effect that the audience might have sat for a daguerreotype of 'Broad Grins.'

MORAL.

HOWARD VAUGHAN is now just in the position of a Cambridge law student, who, having won high honors and taken his degree, finds it necessary to go into an office for a year or two to get the practical knowledge of his profession. So this young violinist, having gone through his regular course, needs one more year to make up for that which was lost, in which to gain that musical experience, to enjoy and benefit by those observations of performers, to hear and study all styles of music, and to practice himself in composition, — which are offered him nowhere on such terms and in such profusion as in the German cities. He should spend some months in Berlin, visit Prague and Vienna; in short, it would be well could he make the grand tour. This is however not in his power, and hence at present his great aim is to spend a year here studying with Lamb, and improving the daily opportunities offered of perfecting his musical education in the highest sense of the term. His taste is for the best music — not despising however that of a more showy character if good of its kind. The impression left upon all his auditors last evening, is, that we have in him a young man of very high promise; one who we may reasonably hope will prove an American artist, of whom we may yet be proud. If my testimony is of any value to him in his struggle to gain yet another year of instrumental and contrapuntal study in this best of all schools, I give it cheerfully, gladly, and of my own motion.

The events of the week have been Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris," and his "Orpheus and Eurydice," on Tuesday and Friday; the "Creation" by Stern's Singing Society on Thursday; Bülow's Concert of Music of the Future, on Friday; and a Symphony Soirée of the Royal Orchestra on Saturday, — a somewhat rich succession of evenings. There was also a concert of Salon music by the Brothers Ganz — not Garoz as it was printed before — but I forgot it and spent the evening elsewhere.

The "Creation." I have often enough spoken of Herr STERN, in former letters, as one of the best if not the best of directors for a choral society, I have ever known, to be under no necessity now of adding anything on this topic. The old readers of the Journal too, know how much I have praised the perfection with which the Society as a body bears its part in all grand performances, — indeed, whether upon the whole its chorus singing is not the most satisfactory in all respects I ever heard, I am not quite decided. As I listened to the choruses of the "Creation" the other evening, a great many things occurred to me to write, more particularly to certain country readers of the Journal. Some of them I remember still.

The persons of both sexes who compose the principal Choral Societies here, the 'Sing Akademie,' that of Stern, and several others, are all such as have a musical education, which would be thought in many cases quite remarkable with us. Most of them know something about the common rules of harmony, at least so far as enables them to understand the part, which their own tenor, soprano, alto or bass, as the case may be, has to play in the general effect. The music given them to sing is made a matter of study; they expect to find difficult passages, such as will require a great many efforts on their part to fully conquer, and they are ready and willing to work upon them. Such a society here is not composed of mechanics, men who support themselves by manual labor, but of the upper middle classes of a state of society quite unknown in our country. Many members will perhaps be professional musicians, — or if not, still persons, who have made music in its higher forms a matter of regular study. You may look upon the society in question (that of Stern), as composed of individuals who no longer need a teacher, a master, and who do not come together to be taught this, that or the other great work. But they wish for the pleasure of singing Oratorios — of course there must be a large number to do this with effect. The principle of the thing is this, that many musical people, having a similar desire to study certain grand works, club together, and pay a certain definite sum for the season to pay expenses, and in particular to hire the services of a thoroughly competent director. Having hired him they allow him to criticize them to any extent; they are no longer individuals, but members of a chorus, and the end aimed at is that the chorus sing well. Now Stern is not merely particular that the part go in time and time. The singers must pronounce their words alike, must notice the minutest points of expression, must sing each with the same care in his choral part, that he would in a song or solo. All do this gladly — have they not employed him to look out for all this? The result is chorus singing almost in absolute perfection.

Now, what is true here in Berlin is true also in other and smaller German cities. There is everywhere here, in towns of 20,000 or more inhabitants, among the educated classes — not among the common people — quite a number of people, who have made music really a study. In Breslau with its 75,000 population, about a hundred such persons formed a choral society, with the university professor of music at their head. But this hundred were picked men and women. Frankfort-on-the-Maine has its "Cecilia" society, and so all about you find them.

We can show nothing of the sort in our country. There is no distinct educated class in the sense of the term as used for Germany. We must look to men and women who labor with their hands for the materials from which to form musical societies, and with these materials as they may be found in New England, I verily believe, as splendid performances might be in the end attained as any where in the world. But to attain this something more is necessary than we have yet had.

First, I never yet attended a singing school either as pupil or visitor, where the instructor went a step beyond the mere reading of simple notation. The school was taught nothing about music — it was only taught to sing psalmody, a few anthems, glees and songs. And this for the very good reason that the teachers had never fitted themselves to go beyond this. I see as well as any one, that an attempt to teach harmony in a common singing school would be laughable. But surely we may have a generation of teachers able to call attention to harmonic effects, to the results of different combinations and successions of chords, able to show their classes what we mean by a fugued movement, by plain chant and florid song; in short, teachers able to get at least a step beyond the 1, 2, 3, and the do, re, mi.

Second. Having at length found a singing teacher able to go a step higher than the old ones were able to go, we must find a set of pupils who are willing to take hold of singing in earnest, are willing to work a little in the faith, that an adequate reward will follow in the new delight which music will open to them hereafter. We have the voices, we have the talents, we have the education, among the shoemakers and farmers and mechanics of Braintree and Randolph, and Holliston and Natick, — everywhere in New England — everywhere where the common school and the meeting house flourishes. Can these voices, these tastes, these talents, not be cultivated? It is absurd to suppose this. Let those, who take delight in singing, unite, married and single, and have their weekly meeting year in and year out, not minding a little extra expense, and employ as a director some one of the new class of teachers, that is gradually rising, I am happy to say, if what I saw last summer at North Reading gives not false hopes.

Third. In Germany, almost every town of a few thousand inhabitants has its official music director — with us there is nothing of the kind, and the musical class must depend upon its own resources. Now, no small town in Massachusetts, for instance, four to six thousand in population, can well give business enough to a music teacher of the right sort to support him. What now? Remedy simple. Suppose five or six towns in easy connection by railroad, for example, Milford, Holliston, Framingham, Natick, Ashland — associate in this manner, to wit — as Justice Bacon would say — viz: In each a musical society is formed. Each members of both sexes — for what cost, nothing is apt to be valued the same — depositing in advance annually a certain small sum for necessary charges; all these societies agree to employ the same music teacher and director, and to practice the same music; there being five towns thus associated, each takes a different evening for its meetings, so that there shall be no interference. Once or twice a year there shall be a general meeting of all the societies in each town, by turns, to have a festival performance of the music thus learned.

Now, as Mr. Weller remarked upon a certain occasion, the "advantages of the plan are hobvious." Here is at the very beginning a certain sum secured for the services of a director for a year, giving him employment five evenings a week. This is at once a strong inducement to a man of real musical culture and attainments to settle in one of the towns of the association, as he will naturally expect among the many persons with whom he is thus brought in contact, to find more or less who will wish for private lessons; and it might soon be found well for the interests of the association to pay out of the common fund for the special instruction of a few individuals of greater talent as solo singers. At all events such associations would soon be strong inducements to young men of talent to take particular pains in their musical studies to fit themselves for the place of director.

Again, besides the new musical enjoyments opened to the societies as a whole, opportunity will be given to young men and women to cultivate their musical tastes, and develop their voices. I heard voices last spring in Natick, which, if cultivated, would be worth $150, to $300 a year to their possessors; just such voices as are so much sought in choirs, but now of no value at all except as means of amusement to the singer himself.

Again, I see in such an association a great step toward what has so long been to me an object of most earnest desire—the elevation of singing in the churches to—music. Instead of spending $50,000 in building ten little ugly wooden meeting houses, each just large enough for a family party, I would have two or three large noble ones, so that the children as they grow up may have some idea of the grandeur of what the Bible calls the great congregation! Instead of half supporting ten clergymen, I would have a pastor and a teacher, as in the good old Puritan days of Boston in each church. Instead of little boxes of whistles in the little meeting houses, I would have noble organs. Instead of half a dozen or a dozen untalented singers, I would have all the musical talent of the congregation in the choir, with a capable director. I would have the Psalmist's descriptions of the glorious music of the temple reduced to experience here as far as possible. And twice or thrice in each service, I would have some familiar choral song in grand unison by choir and congregation, while the organ rolled out its grand Bach and Handelian harmonies. But as I cannot have all I could wish, give me at least that improvement in taste and the execution of common music which the musical societies above proposed could not fail to produce, and that too in a very short time. Did it ever occur to you what an immense sum of money in the aggregate the erection and support of the half dozen so-called orthodox societies, which are almost within a stone's throw of the State House in Boston, for buildings, preaching, music, and all the other expenses, have cost, and still cost?

If the object in building little churches is to make the societies small bodies of exclusives—little family parties, to which none but 'our set' are to have admission, it is well enough; for a poor man cannot afford to take a pew in them. The Catholic understand this matter. They put up grand churches where all may come, and can afford to come. But this is very wide of the mark—3000 miles away from Stern and his singing Society!

Well, then, at this Society's performance of the "Creation," the other evening, chorus singing was heard in a degree of perfection, of which few of my country readers can form any adequate idea. But perfect as it was, delightful as it was, both to the singers and the hearers, almost if not quite an equal excellence might be attained at home, by persevering effort; and the course to be pursued to attain it, as indicated above, is the result of many years of observation and reflection upon this very topic. Can anybody suggest a better? If so, please write immediately to the Journal of Music about it. Let us have discussion. Let us have the opinions of others. Let us know what people think.

Friends, you who have never gone beyond the Fast day or the Thanksgiving anthem in vocal music, you have no idea of the feelings which come rushing up from your heart of hearts, as you take part in the mighty flood of tones in the "Hallelujah," or the "For unto us a child is born," "Lift up your heads," and so forth in Handel's "Messiah." After walking three miles and a half to and from the Handel and Haydn Society, once a week in rain and snow, mud and water, facing the cold winter winds for three months together—when all was ready, and the public performance came, that one evening's sensation more than made up for all the toil and study and labor which it had previously cost.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Israel in Egypt.

Mr. Editor.—Was Handel the most sublime of all writers of music for the voice, or has the world been mistaken for these past hundred and fifty years? One might suppose from the tone of criticism in the Boston newspapers upon Israel in Egypt that his fame was all a mistake. Even the Courier, whose musical notices we generally read with great pleasure, thinks that "any complete work of Handel is too severe an infliction for an audience at the present day." That due allowance should be made for a difference of musical feeling in individuals I am well aware. No reasonable person can expect his raptures over any particular form of music to be shared by all his musical friends. We are differently constituted in this respect. The sense of melody is predominant and almost exclusive with some. In others the sense of harmony is most developed. The rhythmical faculty in a cultivated musical nature is led captive by the form of fugue when used by a master. But there are great works in every form (classic, if you please) which stand out boldly from the mass of ordinary composition and vindicate themselves to every musical nature. To this class, it appears to me, belong the oratorios of Handel, and preëminently his "Israel in Egypt." How one can listen unmoved to such sublime description seems to me as strange as an insensibility to the works of Michael Angelo. But the full force of either cannot be felt at once. To the casual glance a modern landscape, glittering in sunlight, and all the cheap effects of gaudy color, may be more attractive than a Salvator Rosa. Smooth and burnished water may please the eye more than the resistless roll of the ocean. Do we not find in the latter a type of the majestic fugues of Handel. His mighty genius is more fully recognized in the world at the present time than ever since his works appeared. Their popularity in England goes on increasing every year. Hardly a week passes without one or more of his oratorios being performed in London, while in the great cities of the north of England they have formed a taste which has made the chorus singing of Birmingham world renowned. In Germany as well as England Handel is fully recognized as one of the very few great masters. Even now all musical England and Germany are astir with preparations for festivals in his honor. Shall we in Boston pretend to put him aside as our newspaper critics recommend? Have our Handel and Haydn Society labored in vain for forty years? X.

HOW MEYERBEER GUARDS HIS NEW OPERAS.—"Dinorah" is the name of a new comic opera, by the illustrious Meyerbeer, shortly to be produced at the Opera Comique. The Parisians, who are incorrigible laughers at everything, do not hesitate to turn into ridicule the weak points of the great composer. They say:

During the rehearsals of the "Prophet," Meyerbeer had double doors put to the rooms in which the artists studied their parts, and only gave them these parts by piecemeal—a scrap at a time. The windows and shutters were kept rigorously shut. The watchman on duty had his ears stopped with cotton. The director of the theatre himself did not know a note of the score. During six months' preparation, the artists were not permitted to go out, except accompanied by sworn guardians; and, finally, before giving the artists their parts entire, they were assembled on the stage, at dead of night, and surrounded by red fires, required to take an oath, their hands grasping the blade of a tin dagger, not to reveal what they were studying.

In the strong room of the Opera Comique, there is, they say, an iron chest of formidable dimensions. This chest has a double lock, with two tremendous keys. One of these keys is carried by Meyerbeer; the other by Roqueplan, director of the Opera. In the chest lies the score of "Dinorah," reposing upon a crimson velvet cushion with gold fringe. Eight guards, armed to the teeth, relieving each other at intervals, keep watch day and night before the chest, with orders to fire upon anybody who refuse to keep his distance after being commanded so to do. At noon, the company of the theatre is assembled and solemnly marched past the sacred chest, each participant prostrating himself before the relic, as practiced in China before the head of the Celestial Empire. After this ceremony, there remain in the apartment only three persons; Meyerbeer, the manager, and the sentinel who dies but surrenders not. This veteran is ordered to go into a corner of the room, with his face to the wall, so that he may not witness what is to occur. All the preliminaries being satisfactorily settled, Meyerbeer turns his key, the manager turns his, the pondrous door of the chest opens, and the two extracts such portions of the manuscript as may be required. Meyerbeer then gives Roqueplan a formal receipt; Roqueplan gives Meyerbeer another; then the chest is carefully closed, the sentinel resumes his post, and the two chiefs carry away the precious bits of music, which are taught upside-down to the artists, in order to prevent any possibility of theft or plagiarism.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — This week we give the last four of the forty pages of SCHUBERT's beautiful and brilliant Cantata: "Miriam's Song of Triumph," for Soprano Solo and Chorus, with pianoforte accompaniment, as originally written. It will be found a capital piece for a short oratorio performance, or for practice in choral societies and clubs; and it will have an interest just now as being another and more modern treatment, by a man of genius, of one of the same grand themes illustrated in Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

We wish here to add that we are indebted for the translation of the German words to HENRY WARE, Esq.,—a fact which we forgot to acknowledge, as we should have done, under the title of the piece.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The following was the Programme, as announced, for the fifth Chamber Concert, which took place at Mercantile Hall, on Friday evening of last week.

1. Quartet in D. No. 10: Mozart.
2. Piano Trio, in B flat, (dedicated to Mendelssohn: Reissig Messrs. Daum, Schultze and Fries.
3. Adagio and Fugue from the Quartet in F. No. 48: Haydn.
4. Selections for Piano: Song without words, in A flat, No. 6. Book III: Mendelssohn. Impromptu, in A flat, op. 29; Chopin: Mr. Daum.
5. Quintet in E flat, op. 20: Beethoven. (Arranged from the Septet by the author.)

An accident (the injury of his arm by a fall) deprived us of the performance of the new pianist, Mr. HERMANN DAUM. But reliable substitutes were furnished at short notice. Instead of the Trio, the Club repeated a couple of movements from that "Rasonnowsky" Quartet of Beethoven (No. 1, in F.) which gave such delight in the preceding concert, and which we always count clear gain. For the smaller piano pieces we were compensated by the fine voice of Mrs. HAWWOOD, who sang to great acceptance Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," and Sig. BENDELARI's Ave Maria, (the composer accompanying at the piano), which proved remarkably well suited to the voice, and to her voice.

The Quartet by Mozart is one of the most interesting of the set, and was well played. A little of Haydn, too, seldom comes amiss. Beethoven's Septuor, in the original shape, with wind instruments, &c., would really be an attraction; but arranged as Quintet for strings alone, beautiful and graceful as it is, it had begun to be, we fancy, a little over-familiar and unstimulating to the musical sense of most habitués of chamber concerts. Parts of it, however, gave great pleasure. Why can we not hear more of the later works of Beethoven; a large part of the best of him is still unknown to our audiences.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The Music Hall presented a gay scene at the second Wednesday Afternoon Concert. The attendance was numerous, and we saw unmistakable delight in many faces throughout the exquisite movements of the well-known E flat Symphony of Mozart, and the fresh, stirring green-wood melodies of Weber's sparkling Overture to Preciosa; while those, who found their own conversation more interesting than the Symphony, took frequently their turn to listen during the lighter items of the Programme.

Israel in Egypt.

This sublime Oratorio of Handel was brought out on Sunday evening, by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, before a large audience, but not large enough to save the Society from loss. The chorus was powerful, although the seats were not full. Unfortunately there are always some in such a Society who do not take genially to the laborious study of so great a work, and who will not try to appreciate it; these drop away from the rehearsals, and of course lose the power and the right to participate when it comes to a public performance.

On the whole, the great mountain chains of choruses came out more clearly and appreciably than we had dared to hope. Some parts were roughly treated; now and then one of the four parts timidly failed to come in at all in a fugue passage, leaving it to orchestra and organ to sketch out the figure; and there was a failure always to realize anything like a pianissimo, where such was needed for the sake of contrast. But most of the grand pieces moved superbly, and were intensely enjoyed by many, if not by all. The solos—whose very quaintness of an old style gives them a charm of freshness after the hacknied sentimental sameness of the current opera melodies and cavatinas, although it is fashionable, —perhaps natural, to call them “ungracious,” “artificial,” “antiquated,” &c., were on the whole remarkably well sung; especially those by Mrs. HARWOOD and by Mr. ADAMS. The duet between Mrs. LONG and Mrs. HARWOOD, was a very successful achievement; and that for two basses: “The Lord is a man of war,” by Messrs. POWERS and WETHERBEE, even stirred up those who called the Oratorio dull. The orchestral parts, and Mendelssohn's Organ accompaniments, played by Mr. PARKER, lent efficient support; and surely nothing was, or has been wanting, on the part of the zealous and laborious conductor, CARL ZERRAHN. Yet many persons found the Oratorio “monotonous,” “heavy,” “too learned” for their comprehension, &c., &c.,—as if the “Messiah” were not quite as learned. And so what with the fear of losing money, and distrust of the public, fully confirmed by the newspaper critics, the Society seem quite indisposed to let us hear the “Israel in Egypt” times enough to learn to appreciate it and to have a right (critics and all) to offer opinions, or anything more than diffident impressions, about it.

We need not here repeat our own deep feeling of the interest and greatness of this work, which we have already explained and justified in full. For the present we refrain from all criticism or argument (simply referring those who care to take the pains to find out what there is worth attention in a work esteemed by all intelligent musicians as one of the half-dozen greatest works the art of music has produced, to Mr. Macfarren's excellent analysis), and ask our readers to content themselves to-day with the perusal of the following delectable “criticisms” from some of our Boston newspapers. They will at least serve to show the great advance which we have made, just here and now, upon the artistic taste and judgment which has hitherto made the opinion of the world. And that their brilliancy may shine out the more boldly, we add to them by way of foil the opinions of certain “old fogies” who were once supposed to know something, and to love beauty, nature, truth, even more than they loved learning.

(From the Boston Courier.)

Handel's oratorio, “Israel in Egypt,” was on Sunday evening sung by the society. The work belongs to a class which, although valuable to the musical student, is on the whole unsuitable for public performance. Detached fragments, illustrating the musical manners of the times in which such works were written, might be heard with advantage, and often with interest; but the undivided performance of even the best of Handel's oratorios is an infliction too severe for an audience of modern tastes to endure. As “Israel in Egypt” is not the best of Handel's oratorios, it follows that it must inevitably fall with fatiguing weight upon the ears of listeners, however anxious they may be to enjoy. The music does not fulfil the musical want of the public. Generally considered, it has neither sentiment, grace, nor vitality. Of course, there are certain noble exceptions among Handel's works, such as a few airs in “Samson” and “The Messiah,” and some choruses in “Solomon,” &c.; but it unfortunately happens that “Israel in Egypt” is unusually deficient in those qualities which charm or rouse the multitude. It contains no memorable airs, the few that relieve the ponderous masses of choruses being all in the meaningless style of rough roudade which composers in Handel's time uniformly followed—and the choruses themselves are simply an uninterrupted succession of figures of the strictest, and consequently the least attractive, character. The greatness of Handel's choruses, in their way, is not to be disputed, but is a greatness like that of the Pyramids, which impress us by their colossal magnitude, but leave no memories of grace and beauty upon the mind. And so, of the figures of which these choruses are mainly composed, it may be said that they resemble the intricate passages which penetrate the Pyramids, among which the unskilled traveller wearily wanders, vainly struggling for light, and stumbling distractedly through each new opening that presents itself, in endless and agonized confusion. For musicians, these fugue studies have a distinct value; but for the masses they are simply wearisome and unprofitable. It is difficult to find among the vast number of choruses of “Israel in Egypt” more than two or three calculated to produce any sort of popular emotion; and these owe their effect to the abandonment of the fugue, and introduction of a style of harmony in advance of Handel's age. Some of the choruses are composed according to the barbarous Phrygian and Dorian modes of the Gregorian system, and of course affect the ear unpleasantly, although the reason why is generally unknown. We are persuaded that the performance of such works as “Israel in Egypt,” entire, adds nothing to the development of artistic feeling in the community, and that the labor and expense bestowed upon their preparation is a waste of means, which ought to be lamented rather than encouraged. The public really care nothing for them, and refuse to sustain the enterprise which produces them. Now, might not that enterprise be better and more successfully applied?

(From a facetious grumbler in the Transcript.)

ISRAEL IN EGYPT. What could possibly induce the Handel and Haydn Society to turn body catchers and snatch this decently interred thing from its well secured repose? Has a recent perusal of Champollion, Bunsen or Lepsius kindled an antiquarian spirit, and on this score they desire to give their own notes to the public? Why not let these poor old Egyptians and Israelites rest quiet in their sarcophagi, instead of exhuming their musty remains and forcing us to hark from their tombs a doleful cry of their plagues and sorrows? Why force them all to become wandering Jews, to be marched out and handled in such a way? The whole tribe is called on to the stage, and their troubles rehearsed in base words, the tenor of which is increased to treble force in mouths unpracticed in the lugubrious tones of the defunct Hebrews. The miserable Egyptians grope about in the midst of flies, lice, hailstones and darkness, and we hear of the first born, until we are inclined to smite the parents themselves to teach them not to whine in such dreary tones. We certainly sympathize in one thing, for we are “glad when the Israelites had departed.” They go through the deep and the wilderness; and a deep wilderness it is, a howling wilderness, into which the poor people get, for the travellers run about every way but the right one.

Among the most particularly oppressive influences is that produced by the unfortunate victims who are thrust forward singly to bewail their fate. One youthful Jewess arises, and in a dreary strain as soggy as their own swamps, tells of certain frogs which had the impertinence to thrust their big noses into the king's bedchamber. Now a hap with such a Jewess must have been no small gratification to even an Egyptian gallant; but at such a prolonged croak as those frogs emit, even a negro's “har” would stand on end, and we long for a brisk stave wherewith to beat time over their stupid heads.

Two Israelitish matrons sally forth and insist that the “Lord is their strength,” and a garrulous pair they are, for neither will let the other make the assertion without instant interruption; and judging from the amount of breath expended on the same remark, the Lord must certainly have endowed them with strength of lungs, at least. Whether their endurance would outlive that of their hearers we cannot say.

Then two stalwart fellows arise to endeavor to prove that the “Lord is a man-of-war.” We can't say what the Hebrew idea of identity was. We have heard it proved that Jeremiah King was a Mango:—thus—Jerry King, Jerkin, Gherkin, Pickled Cucumber, Mango!—but how the Hebrews could make a man-of-war resemble Deity is a question Cahen must settle. Nevertheless these two Israelites imagine something, for they run up and down in the most stupid manner, as though they were in a white squall. But whatever the weather be, it is beyond their powers to induce people to see any likeness to the great spirit of beauty in such a worn out old hulk as they have left their shrouds to halloo in.

A little Rabbi starts up to state that the “enemy said he would pursue.” Now the enemy must have found it uncommon difficult and not particularly amusing, to pursue anything that ran in such a style, as a method of delivery. If any of Adam's race tries to cross such bars and leap such spaces, without accidental slides, at no very long intervals neither, he must be double sharp and very flat footed, if ever he expects to rest after it.

When this little Rabbi disappears on the run, there comes forth a lovely Jewess, who affirms that the “Lord did blow with the wind,” and a pretty long blow it was, and a strong one, too. What else but the wind the Lord could blow with, she could not suggest; but it is blow up and blow down, and blow over and blow on, till the blow becomes so heavy that the hearers are themselves inclined to blow out. It is certainly a head wind, directly in the lady's teeth, and may be a trade, for it crosses more than one line, and then crosses the audience. If it should blow on such a scale often, it would tend, in a measure, to make people quaver at its crochety turns, and shake at the sound.

One grand announcement made by the whole tribe is that “the people shall hear, and be afraid.” Here is a certain fact! For those who hear these lugubrious sorrows of fly-bitten Egyptians and itinerant Israelites will surely be mortally afraid to hear them repeated. Let them rest in peace! Only think of reviving those respectable old people to be reminded of their extensive use of fine-toothed combs, and the digs they gave their cutaneous troubles thousands of years ago! Think of exploring the post-pliocene deposits of Egypt, to unearth the buried batrachians which disported themselves among the defunct king's gaiters and unmentionables! Let the ancient worthies rest undisturbed in their pitch! Seek not to inoculate the life of 1859 with the blotches and blains which bother the whole medical faculty of Egypt, who wrote stylish prescriptions without pen or paper. Let us re-inter the exhumed antiquities. Let us occupy our quires with words of thanksgiving for their departed worth! 8.

(From the Atlas and Bee.)

The Handel and Haydn Society commenced their 43d season, last evening, at the Music Hall, by giving entire Handel's oratorio “Israel in Egypt.” The hall was fairly filled, but the receipts could not have been sufficient to meet the expenses. This oratorio consists almost entirely of choruses; the solos, a few in number, are of an indifferent, unattractive character. Several of the choruses are extremely grand and majestic; for instance, Nos. 7, 18 and 39 in the printed programme. These will be attractive at all times, but we doubt very much if the oratorio will be considered of sufficient interest to be again performed. It has been shelved long since by the sacred musical societies of Europe, and now only a chorus or two is ever introduced into the oratorio performances. The Handel and Haydn Society probably intended to follow the examples of the English societies.

(From the Boston Journal.)

We must confess that the early hearers of this work formed a correct opinion of its merits, nor do we wonder that they were so readily cloyed with its monotonous series of choruses. The bare idea of twenty-eight choruses in thirty-nine numbers—eleven of which follow in regular sequence, with no pause for a solo, and these of such a character that the voices are constantly upon a strain—is enough to cause ennui; we think that will be admitted.

The only approach to a solo, that had distinctive outlines, was the duet (excuse the Hibernicism) between Messrs. Wetherbee and Powers, entitled, “The Lord is a man of war,” and as it came about midway in the programme, the audience received it with unction, as a herald of something more brilliant—or at least less monotonous—to follow.

The Society were wise in announcing but one performance of this work. Where an audience with patience to sit through so much blatant vocal music, or lungs for the performance of it can be obtained, we are ignorant.

(From MENDELSSOHN'S Preface to the Score of "Israel in Egypt," as edited by him for the Handel Society in London.)

"The Council of the Handel Society having done me the honor to request me to edit "Israel in Egypt," an Oratorio which I have always viewed as one of the greatest and most lasting musical works, I think it my first duty, to lay before the Society the Score as Handel wrote it, without introducing the least alteration, and without mixing up any remarks or notes of my own with those of Handel. In the next place, as there is no doubt that he himself introduced many things at the performance of his works which were not accurately written down, and which even now, when his music is performed, are supplied by a sort of tradition, according to the fancy of the Conductor and the Organist, it becomes my second duty to offer an opinion in all such cases; but I think it of paramount importance that all my remarks should be kept strictly separate from the Original Score, and that the latter should be given in its entire purity, in order to afford to every one an opportunity of resorting to Handel himself, and not to obtrude any suggestions of mine upon those who may differ from me in opinion.

"The whole of the Score (excepting my Organ Part and Pianoforte Arrangement, which are distinguished by being printed in small notes) is therefore printed according to Handel's manuscript in the Queen's Library. I have neither allowed myself to deviate from his authority in describing the movements in the Score, nor in marking Pianos and Fortes, nor in the figuring of the Bass.

"... With these exceptions there is no deviation whatever in the Score from Handel's manuscript, which I found to be more correct and accurate than the printed editions, in spite of the great haste with which Handel used to write down his works.

"As for the Organ part, I have written it down in the manner in which I would play it, were I called upon to do so at a performance of this Oratorio. These works ought of course never to be performed without an Organ, as they are done in Germany, where additional wind instruments are introduced to make up for the defect. In England the Organist plays usually ad libitum from the Score, as it seems to have been the custom in Handel's time, whether he played himself, or merely conducted and had an Organist under his control. Now as the task of placing the chords in the fittest manner to bring out all the points to the greatest advantage, in fact of introducing, as it were, a new part to compositions like Handel's, is of extreme difficulty, I have thought it useful to write down an Organ part expressly for those who might not prefer to play one of their own. * * * * The descriptions of movements, metronomes, pianos and fortes, &c., which I would introduce had I to conduct the Oratorio, are to be found in the Piano-forte Arrangement. Whoever wishes to adopt them, can easily insert them in the Original Score, and he who prefers any other is not misled so as to take my directions for those which Handel wrote himself.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLODY.

London, July 4, 1844.

MOZART'S OPINION OF HANDEL.

Mozart regarded Handel as the highest among all composers. He was as intimate with the chief compositions of this master, so unsurpassed in his particular field, as if he had long been the director of the London Academy for the preservation of ancient music.

When the Abbé Stadler, after Mozart's death arranged his musical manuscripts, he found many proofs of his constant study of Handel's works.

Mozart said, "Handel knows best what produces effect. Where he wants it, he strikes like a thunder-bolt."

Mozart's predilection went so far, that he composed a great deal in Handel's manner; of which, however, little has ever been printed. According to Stadler, he used also subjects from Handel's works in his famous Requiem: thus the theme to the Requiem and to the Kyrie are taken from him.

He went farther than most of our present amateurs, he valued and cherished not only Handel's Choruses, but many of his Airs and Solos. He says, "Although Handel sometimes suffers himself in them to go on in the manner of his times, yet they are never without meaning."

Even in the Opera of Don Giovanni, Mozart wrote an air in Handel's manner, marking it thus in the score: this air, however, is always omitted in the performance.

Handel's greatest cotemporary, John Sebastian Bach, said of him, "He is the only one, whom I should like to see before my death, and whom I should like to be, if I was not Bach!" When this was told to the greatest composer after him, Mozart, he exclaimed, "Truly, I would say the same, if I could have a voice where they are heard."

(From Schoelcher's "Life of Handel.")

This oratorio is now sung constantly and everywhere. It is included in Mr. Hullah's repertoire at St. Martin's Hall; and each time that I have attended its performance there, the one shilling pit was filled with a compact crowd of persons, among whom I have noticed many who were following the score with small octavo editions. The popularity of such a transcendent work is an incontrovertible proof of the high point to which musical education has arrived in England. * * * * *

The lyrical Beethoven called him "the monarch of the musical kingdom. He was the greatest composer that ever lived," said he to Mr. Moscheles. "I would uncover my head, and kneel before his tomb." Beethoven was on the point of death, when one of his friends sent him, as a present, forty volumes by Handel.

He ordered that they should be brought into his chamber, gazed upon them with a reanimated eye, and then pointing to them with his finger, he pronounced these words, "There is the truth."

MUSIC IN PROSPECT. — We need not remind our readers of the Complimentary Concert to Mr. TREMLE, at the Music Hall, to-night. There is every assurance of a full hall, and an admirable concert. For particulars of programme, &c., see advertising columns. . . . Another AFTERNOON CONCERT next Wednesday. . . . MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB again next Friday evening, Mr. ADAMS, tenor, and Mr. LANG, pianist, assisting; a Quartet by Schubert, Quintet by Beethoven, Capriccio by Bennett, Songs by Franz, &c.,—best programme of the season.

ZERRAHN will have a fine concert for his third (Feb. 26), when he will give us the grand old C minor Symphony, the overtures to Tannhauser and "Seige of Corinth," a Polonaise from Meyerbeer's Struensee; singing by Mrs. LONG, and a Mozart Pianoforte Concerto, by Mr. LANG. Zerrahn has the Choral Symphony in preparation! . . . Report speaks highly of the rehearsals, under the direction of Mr. J. R. MILLER, of the cantata: "The Haymakers," by G. F. ROOR. He has a finely trained chorus, and a strong force of soloists. See Card.

Musical Correspondence.

WORCESTER, FEB. 14.—Seldom, if ever, has there been in our city such a dearth of music — good or otherwise, as we have experienced this season. A few artists have visited us, but their reception was not brilliant enough to attract others. From "native talent," of which we used to talk much during the "hard times" — musically and financially — of last winter, we hear little. The Mozart Society has given three of a series of four concerts; the first two with superior programmes and small audiences; and the last with an inferior programme, and an audience proportionably large.

Some notice has already appeared in your columns of the successful establishment in this city of an Academy of Fine Arts. Within several months, its principals, Misses ROBINSON and GARDNER, have added a new department — the French Institute, where the branches usually pursued in academies are taught in the English and French languages by native teachers of the highest ability. The first public examination took place on the 1st inst., and the large audience assembled must have been convinced of the sterling worth of the school as they listened to the intelligent and prompt recitations of the pupils. The remarkably pure pronunciation of the junior classes in French — classes of children between five and twelve years of age, was a matter of general surprise. The school made a novel appearance — "more European than American," as more than one spectator remarked. The young "French Cadets" appeared in their neat uniform with tri-color decorations, and the misses wore silken sashes of the French national colors. Vocal music, under the direction of the teacher, Mr. A. STOCKING, added grace to the occasion; and the happy pupils, their happier friends, in the midst of scenes made beautiful by Art — such scenes as Ruskin tells us all school-rooms should present, furnished a picture worth seeing, and, by your leave, worth recording. On the evening of the succeeding day, the rooms of the combined institutions were opened, and the pupils welcomed their friends to the number of a thousand or more, to the festivities of a social reunion.

HARTFORD, CONN., FEB. 6. — In my last letter I spoke of the "comming," as the large posters had it, of the wonderful boy pianist, ARTHUR NAPOLEON, who was to have given a Concert here on the Thursday evening following; but owing to the non-arrival of a "Chickering Grand," which was expected from Boston, the entertainment was postponed until Saturday evening, — but only to disappoint the artist again, from the same cause, and oblige him to perform upon a "Chickering Square" after all; for which casualty we may well be thankful, as it gave us two opportunities to hear him play, instead of the "one only" which was advertised — it being at once announced that the concert would be repeated on the next Tuesday evening, on which occasion the tardy "Grand" would be used. But where is ARTHUR NAPOLEON! — "grand," "square," "upright" — we are anxious to see the wonderful prodigy, if not to hear him under the best advantages. Shouldn't blame him if he didn't make his appearance at all before such a thin house! Ah! there he comes, with a one-sided, nervous gait — pale, delicate countenance and slender form — long, dark hair carelessly pushed behind his ears, and black, Spanish eyes, well contrasted by the very paleness of his face, — now putting one hand on the edge of the piano, he bows briefly and takes his seat. But what nonsense to say that that mere boy, scarcely taller than the instrument at which he sits, — equals Thalberg in all the force and delicacy of his playing, — don't believe it! There! he has commenced. — those religious tones of "Luther's Choral," in a fantasia on the "Huguenots," composed by himself. Who ever heard a square piano sound like that before in a large hall — rich, firm, and distinct? See! with what astonishing execution he is encircling that glorious old tune with a delightful halo of sound — piling up the difficulties as he advances, like an orator with his theme, — and this is just where Arthur Napoleon excels all other pianists I have ever heard, not excepting Clara Schumann, i. e., he is an orator as well as an eloquentist, and it is in the combination of these two, and only two, important qualities that our great players fail, as you may very well know.

Onward he pushes, like the great Napoleon, conquering difficulty after difficulty, as he takes up the different subjects from the opera, and finally closes with the bold, opening chorus, Piacet della mensa, which he works up in a most masterly manner, bringing forth enthusiastic applause as he leaves the stage.

I am almost tempted to burn this letter, because I feel as though I could not speak of this marvellous youth as he deserves. "Trovator" has written of him, and I can endorse all that he has said, and a great deal more.

The next piece which he performed, was that difficult Polonaise of Chopin's, opus 51, and which he dashed off from memory! Any one who has ever played it, may vouch, I think, for the octave difficulties in the left hand. It was splendidly delivered. Then came two most exquisite morceaux, by Pauer, "La Cascade" and "La Chace." Who could have touched that instrument more delicately and conveyed more expression than did that child of fifteen?

I need not go further than to add that the concert was a magnificent success; for the feeling came over all at its close, that it was the finest pianoforte playing that had ever been listened to in Hartford, without any exceptions; and that must be the verdict wherever he goes. Arthur Napoleon was assisted by Miss ANNA VAIL, and Mlle. CECILIA FLORES. The former is a fine singer, without saying much for the natural sweetness of her voice, — executing her cadenzas, trills, &c., with remarkable ease and grace. Of the latter I must say, that the beauty of her face found more admirers than her singing; which is nothing strange, I am sure! She is of Spanish descent, and a young lady of refinement and education.

At the Second Concert, on a "Chickering Grand," young Arthur played, with telling effect, Thalberg's "Somnambula;" a "Nocturno," by Chopin, Opus 9; Konski's "Carnival de Berlin; his own "Caprice on the Huguenots;" Thalberg's "Home, Sweet Home," and the "Prayer from Moses." The house was again thinly attended, — which, with a severe cold which he had, must have materially affected his playing — as he afterwards remarked.

If people read "Dwight's Journal," or even any other musical paper, regularly, they would be saved from making themselves quite ridiculous by asking such questions as — "Is Thalberg a singer?" or "Who is Arthur Napoleon?" — Not knowing whether he be a "banjo player," or a "dancer on the tight-rope," — and this will explain why the hall was not better filled on the two evenings above named.

Napoleon has given two concerts in New Haven, and is now on his way South, where he will doubtless be greeted with all the warm-hearted enthusiasm for which the Southerners are proverbial.

Aside from his Piano-forte precocity, Arthur Napoleon is a remarkable youth — playing chess quite as wonderfully as he does the piano, — reading and speaking with ease, the Spanish, French, German and English languages — discussing various authors in the above dialects — and even writing novels for his own amusement, — modest withal, and gaining heaps of friends wherever he is, by his most agreeable affability and politeness. CINCINNATI, FEB. 5. — Will you allow me to say a word by way of correction in reference to a statement I have seen once or twice in your paper — made by some correspondent, I believe, to the effect that a young lady we hold in high regard in this city, where she is well known, Miss HENRIETTA SIMON, of whose talents and promise you speak in deservedly commendable terms, was a pupil of Madame LAGRANGE. This is certainly a mistake. Miss Simon, who first began to appear in the world at this place, was not a pupil of Madame Lagrange, and acquired what proficiency she possesses quite independently of that distinguished lady. She is indebted for those excellent qualities you very justly acknowledge her to possess, to altogether another source.

You must know that we have out here in the West a Master of Music of rare competency and uncommonly fine attainments. A very superior man in many regards; and a teacher of music of the most accomplished qualifications. Himself a singer, — let me say, with a full comprehension of the weight of my words, — equal within the range of his fine baritone voice, to any singer now known on the stage — he knows experimentally the chief requisites of a cultivated singer, and how to develop the natural capacities, and give them force, purity and activity. It is to this man, I wish to say, — to CORRADI COLLIERE, whose musical abilities are only surpassed by the genuine excellence and modesty of his character — Miss Simon is indebted first and last, allowing for her fine natural qualities, for her present attainments, and her prospective promise as a vocalist. It is easy to make this clear to any questioner, but as Miss Simon herself gratefully acknowledges the claims of her real teachers, this simple counter-statement by one who knows whereof he affirms, may be sufficient.

I shall send you in a day or two, a sketch of the state of music in this place, with some mention of two or three juvenile celebrities — locally speaking — of whom you and the world will yet hear something. For, having produced some world-renowned pictorial artists, we are not to be behind. We are encouraged to think, in musical ones, as I will illustrate by and by. Meanwhile we are to have here a grand opening of a grand new Opera House; a really fine affair; scarcely second to the New York Academy, and built by the same man, with many improvements on his previous performance. This elegant hall is to be opened with a civic festival on the 22d inst. The Operatic opening, with the Strakosch Troupe, is fixed for the 17th of March; of the particulars of which event also, I will endeavor to take care that you are properly informed. For the preliminary festival, dance, or whatever it may turn out to be, there is nothing now to be said, but it is to be a dashing affair, overflowing with gaiety and mirth, music and feasting, the whole to be illuminated by some 1200 jets of gas, and enlivened by the wit and beauty of the State. Of the Opera, we may hope there will be something to say, when it comes, of more consequence. Till then farewell. LEPORELLO.

CHICAGO, ILL., FEB. 10. — We have formed a society here, on the plan of the Maennerchöre, to practice part songs with male voices.

The nucleus of our organization was composed of a few gentlemen who, having for some time been in the habit of meeting and singing at the rooms of our present conductor, had formed a strong relish for the kind of music which we have since determined systematically to cultivate. Opportunity seeming to favor, we took the first steps toward a permanent institution, and very soon found a sufficient number of gentlemen ready to take hold of the enterprise in earnest, and who became more interested with every rehearsal. We found too, that although the absence of the ladies must take away somewhat from the ordinary attractions of a singing circle, yet the suggestions (not to say the reproach) of our director could be made much more explicit and pointed, without danger of wounding sensitive feelings, which are said to abound where soprano voices predominate. We find no practice better fitted to give a perfect ensemble, and a correct intonation than just these songs for male voices. Our officers for 1859 are: President, HENRY JOHNSON; Secretary, J. S. COKE; Treasurer, S. WADSWORTH; Conductor, A. W. DOHN.

SALEM, N. C., JAN. 24. — Several months ago you gave us the letter of a correspondent of yours, in one of the South Western States — wherein he very amusingly, and, no doubt truthfully, portrayed the "musical" taste prevailing in that part of the country. That your friend's description is applicable to a large portion of the interior of the Southern States, my own experience and observation compel me to admit; but to show you that we have occasional oases in these musical deserts of ours, I enclose you the programme of a concert given a few weeks ago by the "Musical Society" of this place. You will perceive that, with the exception of the first piece, the music is purely classical; yet, notwithstanding its high character, it was well appreciated, and appeared to be heartily enjoyed by our audience. Overture, "Crown Diamonds": Anber.

Chorus from "Paul," "Oh, great is the depth": Mendelssohn.

"Hark! Hark! the Lark!" Four-part Song: Kuecken.

Solo and Chorus from "Lauda Sion," "Sing of Judgment": Mendelssohn.

Parting Song, Male voices: Mendelssohn.

"Sun Chorus," from the "Seasons": Haydn.

"Waldvöglein," Four-part Song": Mendelssohn.

"I waited for the Lord," From "Lobgesang": Mendelssohn.

"Farewell!" Male voices: Mendelssohn.

Chorus from Mass. in C., "Kyrie": Beethoven.

First day of Spring, "Come balmy Breezes," Four-part Song: Mendelssohn.

Chorus, "Great is the Lord": Mozart.

Our Society consists of about 30 vocalists, and an orchestra of about 14 instruments.

With one exception our members are Americans, and all but one or two are natives of the place. Our village has a population of 1200 or 1400. B.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The old Hearthstone. Song. L. Heath. 25

A pleasing, easy ballad on a subject which will never fail to call up agreeable recollection is.

There's somebody waiting for me. C. W. Glover. 25

A nice parlor song, with a catching melody, of that bright and cheerful mood, which has made the author's "Little Gipsy Jane" the pet of all sprightly little singers.

My heart is sad without thee. E. Falk. 25

A song after the German fashion, touchingly plaintive.

Lost, proscribed, a friendless pilgrim. (Solo, profugo, rejeito.) Duet from Flotow's opera of "Martha." 25

This is the much admired, introductory duet between Lionel and Plunkett, in the 2d act, in the original key. Arranged as a solo, in a lower key, and with a different English version, "Since the time of earliest childhood," it has been formerly published.

The Ruler's Daughter. Sacred Song. Mrs. Dana. 25

This favorite song of the gifted poetess and composer is issued separately from the "Southern Harp."

The Power of Love. Cavatina for mezzo soprano from Balfe's opera of "Satanella." 30

This exquisite gem from the "latest, best and truest opera of Mr. Balfe," as the London Times has it, "will command the admiration of even those, who from their familiarity with former happy efforts of the composer, are led to expect much from a work which has been so extravagantly praised."

Instrumental Music.

Grand Juggernaut March in the Play of "The Cataract of the Ganges." T. Comer. 80

This march will be remembered by the many thousands who witnessed this unprecedentedly successful spectacle, as a characteristic and pompous piece of martial music.

Selections from "Martha." Thomas Ryan. 35

Introducing the duet, "Solo, profugo, rejeito" and two of the charming chorus airs. The arrangement is within the reach of ordinary players.

If I were a bird. Rondo. Bock. 25

An easy piece for first beginners, carefully fingered.

Les Hirondelles. Song by Felicien David. Transcribed and varied. Streich. 75

A piece of great brilliancy, which during the last London concert season has created a furore and become an established favorite. It is a composition for small as well as great players, since its showers of runs and trills are all within easy reach.

Books.

CZERNY'S STUDIES IN VELOCITY. (30 Etudes de La Velocité.) Preceded by nine new introductory Exercises, and concluded by a new Study on Octaves, (composed expressly for this edition,) for the Pianoforte, with Notes. By J. A. HAMILTON. New Edition. In Nos. 50 cts. Complete. 1.25

These studies are calculated to develop and equalize the fingers, and to insure the utmost brilliancy and rapidity of execution. In them the author (more particularly in the nine new ones) would be discernable, even if his name were not affixed to it; his expressive style, fullness of harmony, and peculiar skill in adapting music to the character of the instrument, are distinctly marked in every page.

Ode on the death of Prescott, the Historian.

"You know I go at autumn to my patrimonial acres in Pepperell, which have been in our family for two hundred years, to sit under the old trees I sat under when a boy."—[Wm. H. Milburn's interview with Prescott.]

I.

It was the Spring time mild,
When earth to heaven smiled
With green leaves laved in light and violets blue;
The birds with songs most sweet,
Spring days with hast'ning feet,
So joined their hymn in praises greatly due;
It was that crescent time of earth
Wherein high hopes for sacred work have birth.

II.

A child, with glance full bright,
Played in the misty light
On old worn acres of th' ancestral dead;
The young heart of the boy
Filled with an unknown joy
As Nature shade and sound upon him shed;
It was her voice, inspired of God,
That called him forth to ways of work before untrod.

III.

Long years have fled away,
It was the summer gay,
That filled the fields with golden fruit and grain;
The elms in sheltering mood
Around the old house stood,
O'er the flecked earth the slow sun drew his train;
Still Nature uttered mystic speech
Through shadowy grove and midday heat and murmurring beech.

IV.

A strong man list'ning there,
Amidst the noontide air,
Still heard the Mother's voice with yearning heart;
But the young eyes were dim,
Veiled was the earth for him,
And darkness taught him with her sombre art;
The trees their shadows casting down:
So Nature offered her obedient child a crown.

V.

By her, the mother, taught,
Had he, th' historian, wrought,
'Till distant nations spoke his name with praise;
His was the storied page,
His was the wisdom sage
That showed how worth can walk in history's maze;
The light of the young spring, the voice
That called him up to unsought ways of God's own choice.

VI.

The "sacred thirst" for gold,
The Aztec temples old,
In lands where Might assailed a nation's Right;
Pizzaro's cohorts strong,
And Cortez's chartered wrong,
All writ in history graced with justice bright;
The ruined nations' anthem'd song,
That raised to God brings nearer Freedom's festive morn.

VII.

The secret ways of kings,
Of life the hidden springs,
Whence flowed the strength of Holland girt with seas;
The dark Escorial halls,

The Inquisition's walls,
Wherein all hope the faithful prisoner flees;
So painting life, where'er he trod,
That from the fearful picture gleamed the face of God.

VIII.

It was a winter day,
On earth the strong snow lay,
And the hoarse wind amongst the branches rung;
The low sun's slanting ray,
The old house clad in gray,
The sea, tossed with the breeze, its anthem sung;
No work is on the land to-day,
The flowers lie longing for the advent of fair May.

IX.

Within a city room,
Filled with no sad'ning gloom,
Lies the worn laborer, Spring still in his heart.
His work has been well done:
Winter to him has come,
It brings clear light, so long from him apart;
Let the wind sing no song of night
Midst the old trees that loved him, song of fadeless light!

X.

So the young eyes are clear,
May-time for him is here,
In the great year that God appoints for man;
So the world's eyes are clear,
For that his home was here,
Ere that he entered light no eye can scan:
So the world holds her mystic way,
Led by her great sons into light of endless day!

NOTES.

I. I have rarely read an article with more pleasure than that of "Civis," copied from the Courier into Dwight's Journal of Jan. 1. At last—at last—after half a dozen years of protest against our Boston public's thinking it has ever heard and seen grand opera, one gentleman is found, who can speak with knowledge, experience and observation, and who fully confirms what I have so long been attesting. The "Huguenots," as given here, would not be—could not be satisfactory—to one who became acquainted with it in Paris, and whose familiarity with the French language, with the French stage and French music, would naturally give him those feelings of preference for opera there, which I have for it in German here. Moreover, the principal parts are sung here by singers who (mostly) have passed the age of fresh voices and sympathetic singing. But the public is familiar with their excellencies and their defects,—they should be, periods varying from 10 to 25 years of service can give familiarity—and they excuse the latter—they forget them, as we do the peculiarities in pronunciation of our daily companions. "Civis" would therefore, on these grounds, be much dissatisfied with the "Huguenots" in Berlin.

But there is another reason why he would be dissatisfied, if the history of the production of the opera here in 1842, as I have heard it, be correct. "Civis" says "Gli ugonotti" is not "Les Huguenots." And rightly. "Il Franco Arciero" is not "Der Freyschütz"—German or French opera translated into Italian is no longer the same, and demands to some extent a translation—so to speak—of the music. Now Meyerbeer took the entire direction here when the opera was studied in 1842, and directed the first three performances. The text was translated into German, which is the composer's mother tongue, and (as I have understood) he made such changes in the music—particularly in the recitatives, as fitted it to the new language of the text. Such changes would grate harshly on the ear of "Civis," just as passages of the work as given at Paris, would grate upon mine,—he would have the French text in mind, I, the German. We then stand upon the same "platform" in so far as an imperfect representation of the work in an Italian dress goes, and hence the great delight with which I have read those columns of plain truth from his pen. The announcement of Ullman that the Boston public should "see this work as well given as in any city in the world," is simply absurd and ridiculous to anybody, who has seen it even in a second-class house in Europe. Where is the orchestra to be obtained? Where the chorus of 80, 100, or 125 voices, which has been practising the music perhaps for months? Where the unity of performance among the leading singers, which a common language and years of singing together in all sorts of opera, alone can give?

In one respect Meyerbeer is like Gluck—every note from the feeblest singer, from the most insignificant instrument, belongs to the general effect, as it is to be felt by the auditor in front, who is at the same time supposed to be looking at the scenery, sympathizing with the feelings of the actor, and almost taking part in the situation. Place the most exquisite bit of stage scene painting, which ever left the studio of Crocius, in a picture gallery, it would but be laughed at; put it upon the stage, and when the curtain rises, two thousand spectators burst into loud applause. You may say that certain music by Meyerbeer has no value. True, if judged from the "standpoint" of classical concert music. But to say it is not effective and great music in its way, until it has been heard accompanied as the composer intended by certain scenic and stage effects, is to talk of what one knows nothing about. Scenic music must be "scenically" heard.

II. I see ARTHUR NAPOLEON is coming to Boston. He was here and first played in concert (in Berlin) at Kroll's establishment, Jan. 31, 1855—four years ago, where he was engaged for several nights. He was then not quite eleven years old. To give an idea of an evening at Kroll's, I copy the advertisement on that occasion. It will show how great a variety of amusements—to say nothing of the beer drinking, the shooting with spring guns, the bagatelle boards (if that is the term), and other things which go on in the basement—is offered to the public there.

KROLL'S ESTABLISHMENT.

Wednesday, Jan. 31, 1855. In the King's Hall. First Concert of the Piano-forte virtuoso, Arthur Napoleon.

PROGRAMME.

1. Overture to Oberon, Weber.
2. Sonata by Beethoven, performed by Arthur Napoleon.
3. Thuringian popular song, sung by Herr Prellinger.
4. Le Papillon by Ascher, and Sonnambula by Prudent, performed by Arthur Napoleon.
5. Sextet from "Lucia", sung by members of the Opera, (Kroll's.)
6. Fantasia on motives from the opera "Moses," by Thalberg, performed by Arthur Napoleon.

Previously, "The Art of being Beloved," a drama with songs, in one act, freely translated from the French by Ferdinand Gumbert. To begin at 6 1-2 o'clock.

At the close, grand concert in the Roman Hall. Prices (in American money) 25, 37 1-2 and 50 cents.

On succeeding evenings he played "Andante Rondo Capriccioso," by Mendelssohn; Thalberg's "Huguenots," Fantasia; "Reverie and Gouttes d'Eau," by Ascher; "Fantasia on motives from Oberon," "Polka-Mazurka," composed by himself; Schulhoff's "Carneval," "Sonata Pathetique," Beethoven, "Notturmo," Doehler, "Cracovienne," by Wallace and the like.

I did not hear him; for very good reasons the many splendid concerts of that winter given by virtuosos, Vivier, Schulhoff, Arabella Goddard among them, were mostly lost to me. From the papers however, I formed a very high opinion of the boy.

One said: "After what we had heard of the success of this young virtuoso in Lisbon, London, Paris, &c., we had a right to expect great things of him. And yet were we in the highest degree surprised, to see this gentle child in his fascinating ingenuousness, with his childlike, innocent, and again so strangely spiritual expression, exhibit his artistic powers. His mechanical execution, however eminent in all directions, so far as his bodily strength admits, soon retired into the background before a something higher, which, alas, is so often wanting in adults,—the expression of an artist-tone, which in one so young is absolutely wonderful. How many virtuosos have we heard play the C sharp minor Sonata of Beethoven, and how few have known how to equal this child in playing the Adagio," and so on. Finally this: "In a word, nature has surpassed herself here, and we have only to wish that this blossom be not crushed beneath the deadly monotony of our modern concert productions, but may be developed to a point equal to our great and just expectations."

At that time it was said that the boy was poor, and that his object, or that of those who thought for him, was to collect a capital which should enable him to devote several years to thorough musical study.

In most cases these "wonder children" are never anything more. Travelling and being the pets of thousands gets them into habits, such that, application to anything but their daily pianoforte practice becomes impossible. It is no longer possible for them, so used to appearing before the multitude, and to the increase of applause, to withdraw into private life and work upon dry rules and theories. They pretend to study,—get a superficial knowledge of composition, and then write—write—write—as if the great aim of existence now were to cover so many thousand sheets of paper within a given time. Rubinstein was to the full as great a wonder in childhood as the young Napoleon is now; but all his compositions show the superficial student. Unless he learns by experience slowly, what he might have learned quickly under a competent teacher, I fear his chance for immortality is small. There is no way to develop the genius of a Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, or even of a Hummel, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, but by the thorough contrapuntal studies made by all these masters. The most one can venture to say of childish or youthful genius,—in science or in art, is, there is that to which it is worth while to give opportunity for extraordinarily hard study. Ninety per centum of genius consists in uncommon aptness for study—the other ten per cent, only, is the imagined power of doing things without study.

Mozart said himself, that one great reason why he stood higher than most composers of his day, was because he had studied so much more than they. Just at the close of life he found something that he did not know—namely, in Bach's vocal music, and immediately became a student again.

Read musical history, and you will see that no one has left long-lived works who did not base them upon severe contrapuntal studies under the famous Italian and German masters of the old school. Show music dazzles, but it gets out of fashion. But the most brilliant music, if it has the right foundation,—mere dances and virtuoso pieces, such as Handel, Bach, Mozart, and so on wrote—such as Chopin and Mendelssohn have more recently given us, have the elements of life in them.

Rather a long note,—but where to get time for an article?

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Francois Adrien Boieldieu.

(Translated from the German.)

This world-renowned musician, whose "La Dame Blanche" and "Jean de Paris," need only to be mentioned, to remind us of all that is lovely, fine and charming in Art, was born at Rouen, on the 15th of Dec., in 1775. His father was secretary in the chancery of the Archbishop, and he himself was created chorister at the Metropolitan church, where he received the first instructions in music; then he was placed under the guidance of the organist, Broche, an intelligent but severe man, who treated him so badly that in despair he fled from Rouen to Paris. It is also said, that, like Haydn for Porpora, he was compelled to perform for Broche the lowest acts of servitude. The theatre however, which he was passionately fond of, offered him an indemnification for all his hardships; all his small savings he applied to procuring as often as possible the enjoyment of operatic representations; at times of pecuniary want he even resorted to trickery, stealthily entered the theatre at early day and concealed himself until the beginning of the performances. It will appear, that his highest aim must have been to come himself before his townsmen with an opera; and really there was found in Rouen a poet, who, like Boieldieu, was tortured by a thirst for publicity, and they jointly wrote an opera, the name of which the composer himself afterwards forgot, and which was received with applause. Nothing now could stay the youthful composer; he must go to Paris, the place where all French talents first became accredited. Travelling on foot he arrived at Paris with thirty francs, and his partiture in his pocket, but with many hopes in his breast and melodies in his head.

In the meantime, he had to be content with a considerable shortcoming of his brilliant expectations; he had not doubted that they would perform his opera at the Opera-comique; notwithstanding the intercessions of the cantatrices, who found the young man to be "très interessant," the direction had no idea of giving the work of an unknown musician and poet. Until he succeeded in obtaining a text from one of the more known librettists, he had to support himself by giving instructions and even by Piano-tuning; yet he never lost courage, and vigorously struggled to advance. The house Erard, already at that time (1794) celebrated for its pianos, was the rendezvous of all artists, and Boieldieu was also introduced there; besides that the chefs of the house assisted him by counsel and dealt with the greatest amiableness, and sought by their influence to aid him; it was of an essential value to him, to be able frequently to be with the best musicians of the time, and to draw information from the productions and remarks of Garat, Rode, Mehul, Cherubini, &c. Herebefore his studies had by no means been of a deep and serious kind; a tolerable execution on the piano, and a knowledge of the most essential parts of harmony, was all that he had brought to Paris in this relation; he now began to feel that he must penetrate deeper into the mysteries of the art, and that much was wanting in him to its complete mastery. After he had obtained a sort of vogue by several successful romances, as "Le Menestrel," "O toi que j'aime," &c., which were first introduced by Garat's inimitable delivery, Fievée undertook to write a one-act opera, "La dot de Suzette," for Boieldieu, taken from his romance of the same name. It was given in the year 1799; and the grace of the subject, the fresh music, as well as the elegant and spirited acting of Mme. Saint Aubin, won for the little opera an uncommon success. The track was now beaten, and in the following year B. wrote "La Famille Suisse," which likewise was well received, owing to its naiveté and grace; then in 1797 "Montbreuil et Meriville," but which met with no success on account of its disgraceful text; and in the same year, on the occasion of the peace of Campo-Formio, "L'heureuse nouvelle." But it was the opera "Zoraine et Zulnare," (given in 1798, but composed several years previously) in which his talent began peculiarly to display itself, and which first truly gave surety for that which might be expected of him in the future.

Several instrumental pieces for piano, harp, violoncello, &c., which he had composed in the meantime, were generally admired; and these were the cause of his reception into the conservatory among the corps of Piano-professors. B. was not exactly suited to this post, for he was occupied by far too much with other things to take any interest in the dry piano-mechanism; nevertheless, his lessons were interesting to his pupils by his spirited remarks, and criticisms of art and artists. From this time until the year 1802, he composed the Operas: "Les Méprises Espagnoles," "Beniowsky," "Caliph of Bagdad," received with such tremendous applause, and which it is said in a short space of time received not less than seven hundred representations, and the charming "Ma tante Aurore," which was severely censured by the public at first on account of its vulgar third act, but afterwards, when contracted into two acts, pleased greatly.

In 1802, Boieldieu had the misfortune to marry the celebrated danseuse, Clotilde Auguste Mafieuroy, better known by her name of Clotilde. This connection caused him many sad hours, and a call to Petersburg as imperial Kapellmeister came very opportunely, whither he went in 1803, without his wife. He remained in the Russian capital until the latter part of the year 1810, and during this time he wrote, besides a great amount of military music, and the choruses to Racine's "Athalie" (one of his best works),—the operas "Rien de trop, ou les Deux Parvenus," "La jeune femme colère," "Love and mystery," "Abdikan," "Calypso," "Aline, Queen of Golconde," "Les voitures versées," and "Une tourde Soubrette." Many of these operas are very lightly worked, and Boieldieu himself considered Calypso the best of them; we may mention that the composer was very rarely inspired by his libretto, and the faute de mieux, which were frequently very unmusical, were transformed from vaudevilles into operas; on account of a scarcity of libretti, he had often to compose his music to those which other composers had made use of; such was the case with "Aline" and "Calypso," both of which had been previously set to music, the former by Berton, the latter by Lesueur.

After his return from Russia, he found the sceptre of the Opera-comique in the hands of Nicolo Isuard; and the first work (in 1812), which he opposed to the popularity of the last named, was "Jean de Paris;" this charming creation has lost none of its freshness to this day, although it does not show B. to have been a hero in counterpoint and fugue; in fact, he was not a learned musician, as he himself very readily admits. After "Jean de Paris," came the "Nouveau Seigneur de village," (1813), several minor operas written in connection with other authors, as "Bayard à Mézières" with Cherubini, Catel and Nicolo Isuard, "Le Bernais" with Kreutzer (1814), then "La fête du village voisin." Two years had passed by, and Boieldieu did not bring an opera on the stage, until, in the year 1818, he caused his "Chaperon rouge" to be produced, the work in which he, as it were, apparently desires to prove his right to the membership of the academy, into which he had been taken after Mehul's demise. His incessant labor, and particularly at this opera, provoked a serious disease, and he felt the want of repose. In consequence he retired to a lately acquired country seat, merely living for his health. This time of retirement continued pretty long, only interrupted by his instructions in composition, which he as the successor of Mehul gave at the Conservatory, (but now gave at his house on account of the condition of his health), by his participation in writing the operas "Blanche de Provence" and "Pharamond," and by retouching his "Les voitures versées"; not until the December of 1825 did he come out of his retirement again in good earnest, and this with his masterpiece, "La Dame Blanche." The success of this opera was immense; the name of its composer was in every mouth. His music was to be heard in every parlor, and was the subject of manifold arrangements. Boieldieu's last opera was "Les deux Nuits," text by Bouilly, but which met with little favor, principally on account of the libretto. This opera was produced in May 1829, and after this time Boieldieu's health began rapidly to decline. After the July revolution, pecuniary embarrassments were added to this misfortune; his pensions, which had been granted him by the last dynasty, were withheld, owing to the new situation of things. Not until he was able to enjoy them only for a short time, were they again granted to him; his disease grew more critical each day; and from Bordeaux, which place he had reached on a tour to the baths of Southern France, he had to be taken home again to Jarcey, his country seat, (a previous visit to Italy had been of no benefit to him), where, after a few days, he expired, on the tenth of October, 1834, in the arms of his friends and relations. After the death of his first wife, Clotilde, in 1826, he again married, a cantatrice by the name of Mlle. Philis. His progeny consists of one son, who possesses his father's name and a good musical talent.

H. J. W.

Dr. Faustus in France.

If "Faust" be too metaphysical in its bearings and suggestions, when the subject is fully wrought out, to be eligible as an acting play, the skeleton of the legend seems to us to offer difficulties in still larger amount to any one desiring a good theme for music. The hero's character, like that of Hamlet, is too full of chameleon-shapes, varieties, indications, to bear the expressive clothing of a sister art. When stripped of these, it is vulgarized. So, too, we hold that that most complex, but most brilliant of existing female creations in drama, Shakspeare's Cleopatra, has been made intractable for opera by his immortal genius. Again it has been truly said, that "irony is impossible in music." Denude Mephistopheles of his irony, we have but the old opera-stager with horns and a tail. Elsewhere has been quoted by us Goethe's dictum, that no one lived who was capable of treating the subject in music save M. Meyerbeer. The world has since seen in what form M. Meyerbeer conceived himself able to present on the stage the group of Maiden, Lover, and Demon. It is one thing to write voluptuous ballet music to the scenes in the ruined cloister of Saint Rosalie; it is another to bring into tangible, visible, auricular prominence, the stupendous "Dies iræ," with the despair of the unvedded mother, and the incitements of the Demon at her ear, or the agony of the parting in the dungeon. These are scenes of emotion, we submit, too mighty and complete in themselves for Music to grapple with. But when they are withdrawn from the poet's tale, merely a dry and commonplace goblin-story is left. Yet, like other themes, though impossible, seducing, the story of "Faust" has been tried often and again. There is, first, the music which the Prince Radzivil wrote for Goethe's tragedy—music with a Berlin reputation: which amounts to little, since the excellent and accomplished amateurs of that critical city have always been able to work themselves up into an enthusiasm (comically combining "hot and cold") for certain works, produced under peculiar conditions,—and have habitually leaned to the side of Art and Literature, by the analytic comprehension of which they could prove their own sagacity. Thus Prince Radzivil's accessories to Goethe's noble play have no such universal existence as Beethoven's to "Egmont" or Mendelssohn's to "A Midsummer Night's dream." The next illustration, of course (and first in the list as regards our art,) must be cited the "Faust" of Dr. Spohr: an opera [vide Athen. No. 1290] remarkable for its audacity,—for it was written ere Weber's "Der Freischütz" was dreamed of—yet more remarkable for the feebly-correct mannerism of its execution—containing two of its composer's best single songs, but no good stage music—none so comparatively good as that of Dr. Spohr's introduction to "Jessonda";—an opera, in brief, which exists, but does not live. Then there is a "Faust" by Lindpaintner, which has "died and made no sign." We fancy that the list of German operas might reveal other works on the story, as laborious and obscure as the opera of the honest Kapellmeister of Stuttgart. As to France,—next to Don Juan,—there has been no "being of the mind" (during late years) talked of, with such incessant reference to the stage and the romance, as Faust; ever since the shallow yet prescient description of the drama by Madame de Staël—weighted by her versions of Goethe's sublime scenes of "Margaret in church" and "Margaret in prison"—attracted Parisian attention to the legend. It is only in the nature of things that there should have been musical attempts on the story; and, accordingly, we have had the Cantata by M. Berlioz, who, let his means be what they may, is among the most magnificent and poetical in his aspirations, of men living. In "Faust," too, are some of his best melodies. The Round of the Villagers,—the "Flea Song,"—the Serenade of Mephistopheles,—and the elaborate chorus and dance of the Sylphs,—have all a flow without forced singularity which is too seldom present in his ingenious compositions. But that the subject required an admixture of what was familiar, to bring down its mysteries to the level of popular musical apprehension,—even M. Berlioz (of all living conceders, one of the most niggardly) virtually conceded by introducing "The Hungarian March" at the end of the first act—a rhythmical taking tune. On the other hand, his music to the frightful ride of Faust and his familiar, and the gibberish chorus of Pandemonium, are within the boundaries of burlesque,—whilst his Easter music and his double chorus of soldiers and students, however elaborate, fail to be effective.

Meanwhile, it would seem to be an understood thing in France, that "Faust" must be "done," from time to time, at the theatres,—now, as a ballet at the Grand Opéra,—now, as that vulgarized melo-drama, which a year or two since a management was mistaken enough to import into Oxford Street,—more lately still as that spectacle, with its countless number of tableaux—with MM. Dumaine and Rouvière as its heroes, and Mdlle. Nelly as Sulphurine (a she-devil grafted on the original legend), which has been drawing all Paris to the Théâtre Porte St. Martin. Hence it is not to be wondered at, that M. Gounod (a French musician, but not without a turn of German mysticism) has—partly to meet the national taste, partly in compliance with his own instincts—been drawn within the magic-circle, and consented to try his hand where so many predecessors have failed. How far this temerity (for temerity it is) has been wise, or otherwise, we may attempt in course of time to tell. Some such preface to the tale as the above is, however, next to indispensable.

The Works of John Sebastian Bach.

(From the Revue et Gazette Musicale.)

It is now something more than a century ago that a man, with an organization and existence which must, now-a-days, appear rather fabulous, departed this life; that man was named John Sebastian Bach. He was endowed with sublime genius, and one of the most fertile imaginations it is possible to conceive, but, as he lived nearly always isolated in little towns, where he filled the modest position of organist or school-master, Art existed for him only in himself.

Possessing no audience, no appetite, and no fortune, he worked merely for the pleasure he found in what he created, and received no reward for what he did for music except that which he derived from the art itself. His warm soul and vast brain were able to create, at their leisure, immense combinations swayed by grand ideas, without his worrying himself about their external effect, and their effect upon any assembly. At that time very little music was printed in Germany. Nothing of what Bach produced was destined, therefore, to see the light of day; at least, so he believed. Each creation of his genius was put away in a cupboard, and, when finished, followed by a fresh one. There were, consequently, no restrictions, no considerations of success, no formulas of fashion. Hence those unheard-of instances of daring and invention which overflow in his Passion on the text of St. Matthew; in his Mass in B minor; in the Psalms; in more than a hundred sacred cantatas, adorned with perfectly original instrumentation; in a prodigious quantity of instrumental music of all kinds; and in an immense number of pieces for the organ—pieces as yet unequalled. Of all that has been mentioned, the only things known of John Sebastian Bach, at the conclusion of the eighteenth century, were a few stray copies of pieces for the organ and harpsichord. When he died in 1750, he was acknowledged to be the greatest organist that ever existed, but that was all which was known about him. At the commencement of the present century, there appeared, at Leipsic and Zurich, editions of the works of this great man for the harpsichord, especially of his immortal collection of preludes and fugues, entitled Le Clavecin bien tempéré. It was only then that the artists of all Europe began to have some slight knowledge of this musical giant, but twenty years more elapsed ere Zelter, Dehn, Mendelssohn, Mosevius, and some few other erudite musicians, discovered at Leipsic and Berlin, in the Royal Library, in the Joachimsthal Gymnasium, and in the archives of the Royal Academy of Singing, the colossal works of which I have just spoken. Germany was moved; solemn performances were given of some of these works, and struck with astonishment and wonder the audiences summoned to hear them. The scores of the Passion and of the Mass in B minor were published. Griepenkerl brought out, in eight volumes, the compositions for the organ; a new, and much more complete edition, in ten volumes, of the work for the harpsichord saw the light of day at Leipsic. Dehn and Rietsch rescued from the dust of the libraries fifteen concertos for one, two, three and four harpsichords, with orchestral accompaniments, and gave them to the world; twelve other concertos for all kinds of instrumental combinations likewise issued from the press. But all these constituted but a trifling part of the works created by Bach's genius.

At last, several enthusiastic artists and amateurs of Leipsic, Berlin, Dresden, Breslau, and Vienna, came to the resolution of publishing a complete edition of the works of one of the greatest masters who ever lived—one more astonishing than all the rest by the strength of his creative powers and the modesty of his life—and of bringing it out with a correctness and degree of typographical magnificence worthy of the subject. The enterprise has been continued for eight years, with a zeal and perseverance beyond all praise, and with pecuniary sacrifices on the part of all associated in the task, for no other purpose than to erect an imperishable monument to Art. Now, once allow the perpetual copyright claimed for works of art by the descendants of J. S. Bach's twenty children, and such publishing enterprises, which cost much more than they produce, would become impossible.

The Best Place for the Symphony. — Another View.

MR. EDITOR. — I saw you at last Saturday's concert and suppose you were as agreeably surprised as all of us at the full house. I happened not to look at the programme; but I confess to a much greater surprise (of a different kind though) at hearing the opening triumphant call of the Fidelio Overture. Was the experiment proposed by your correspondent, "Double-Bass," in the Saturday's issue of your paper, already carried out? What was my dismay, when I saw the grandest symphony Mozart ever wrote at the end of the programme. My next idea was to leave the hall and wait patiently till 9 o'clock. Dove sono, the Air from "St. Paul," the two pieces by those eight skilful hands, and "Oberon," however, carried the day, or rather evening, much to my discomfiture, as I found when the Fugue began.

Why had the Symphony that evening a harassing, tiresome, wearying effect on me? Why just the reverse at other times? How can just this Symphony, so splendid and sweet in the first and so grand and strong in the last movement, with its climax in the last part of the fugue as bracing as the mountain air and as sublime as the view among the giants of the Alps, with occasional pleasant vistas down into sunlit valleys — how can just this Symphony exercise an influence of just the reverse character, on one who not only is perfectly familiar with it, but is accustomed sometimes to spend quite a number of consecutive hours in the study and enjoyment of music. The answer is very simple; Because it was offered to nerves that had been impressed by preceding musical influences, that were fresh no longer, that wanted rest, and, consequently, would not cheerfully yield to an excitement, that demands fresh energies. For a good symphony requires fresh energies; the genius of a composer soaring aloft into the world of tones of his own creating takes us up with himself into the blissful realms of rapture, sharpening all our sensations and leaving us happier and better beings.

And therefore the Symphony should be the first piece on any programme. At the start we are freshest, we are ready to climb up the paths the composer's imagination has prepared for us. But a fugue and a fugue with four subjects, however beautiful and natural its flow, walks on steeper paths still, and wearied limbs are apt to lag behind. This was precisely the sensation I had the last half hour of Saturday's concert.

Individual experience may be at fault; idiosyncracies may mislead. Such experience is strengthened, however, when it is shared in by many or at best a few very competent persons. You will readily agree to call Mr. Zerrahn a very competent person. What did he do?

There is a repeat mark after the first part of the first movement of the Symphony; there are similar marks after the first and second parts of the fugue. None of these repeat marks were heeded. Had Mr. Z. overlooked them in a Symphony placed at the head of a concert programme, he would have been inexcusable. There is a symmetry in the parts of any piece written in Sonata form, which requires absolutely the first part to be repeated. And so, excepting the ninth Symphony by Beethoven, it is required to be done in all symphonies. In the latter Beethoven fully preserved the symmetry by the arrangement of the movement.

And yet Mr. Z. was right. The Symphony came too late; it would have made the concert too long to have performed it as it ought to have been. He knew his hearers were weary. But who can afford to lose the repetition of melodies as sweet as the two in the first movement, or as strong as the four in the fugue, in all their skilful intertwining and their graceful magnificence?

No, Mr. Dwight, it was a mistake, a very great mistake, to place a Symphony at the end of the list. May this attempt have taught a lesson!

Your correspondent "Double Bass" addresses some reasons why a Symphony should not be the first piece, and refers to an article by yourself which I confess to have entirely forgotten. Let us consider those reasons in the reverse order of his statement.

"It takes some little time for the performers to compose themselves into that state of ease . . . so necessary to a perfect performance!" Has Mr. Double Bass never been in the room for the performers before the concert? Never heard the various, multifarious scales, chords, chromatic and enharmonic modulations each of the fifty instruments is made to give forth so as to prepare the nerves and fingers of the performers for the performance? Artists familiar with the work they are to perform, hardly need more preparation than fifteen minutes employed in the way mentioned above. This is the way musicians "get their hand in."

The greatest master in Symphony writing has done something to strengthen Mr. Double Bass's position. Beethoven's first, second, fourth and seventh Symphonies begin with Adagio or Sontenuto movements, and the first sixteen measures of the ninth with their dim vibrations of fifths and only occasional melodic preparations for the theme are enough to put us in the right frame of mind. The master would doubtless have done so in all his symphonies had the themes required it. But he has not done so. And in his as in our time the Symphony took the lead.

Symphony — "boeuf à la mode, or plum pudding." We emphatically disagree. Every simile limps, is an old adage, but this won't go at all. A symphony might be compared to a very substantial piece of roast-meat, but boeuf à la mode or plum-pudding — pshaw! We protest, there is not the slightest similarity in the two pleasant occupations of assisting at a sumptuous dinner and listening to a concert. Our experience warrants us to state, that it never required any effort at all to swallow and digest a good dinner. It may be exciting, especially where there are libations to good and jolly old Bacchus added to the entertainment. Perhaps Lord Guloseston might be raised to a higher level of mental (?) enjoyment by an artistic diné. We are conscious of two utterly different levels at which we arrive by the feast of palate and that of the ear and the soul. The eating of a dinner is said to make us better men; the listening to good music certainly does make us better, and certainly does elevate our taste. No, because a Symphony is the "pièce de résistance" let it be attacked with fresh powers. Ask the successful heroes of the battle field. Do they lead their tired and heated troops, or the fresh ones, to the storming? If we can have it, let us have the principal attack first.

Getting late to the concert-room is a misfortune. We never are late at a concert, if we care to be there first. It may be different with others. But we protest, why should people be put into a state of mind, not intended by the composer, by the performance of an overture before the Symphony, an overture which may be a good preparation — but who warrants us the selection of a suitable overture in all cases?

No, Sir, we require to be perfectly free from all musical impressions, in order to be in the right frame of mind for a gigantic tone-poem, such as a good Symphony is.

Late comers are badly off, if they are hurried and flushed, and ought to be pitied accordingly. But what are those poor people to do, who come from the suburbs, or sometimes ten to fifteen miles away, come early, just to hear the best part of the concert first and, find they have to leave just at 9 or 9 15 P. M. when the Symphony began last Saturday?

That was an unpleasant surprise to more than a few, Mr. Dwight, and whoever had the making of that programme, he does not deserve our thanks.

I am not a stickler for old habits — might be twenty years hence. But I do stick to the time-honored custom of having the Symphony first for reasons stated above.

An illustration might be added more suitable than the plum-pudding one. Lovers of Art in picture-galleries are sometimes in the case of finding the picture, and that takes the strongest hold on them, after looking at other pictures for an hour, or two. Whoever was in a similar situation, will remember, that he went away at once, to come back next day and to find his way first of all to his favorite picture.

This is the case with the Symphony. It is the chef d'œuvre and we want fresh senses to enjoy it. So let us have the Symphony neither second nor third, nor last, but first.

G. A. SCHMITT.

Cambridge, Feb. 21, 1859.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. — The following prophecy concerning this immortal genius appeared in "Kramer's German Magazine of Music," 1783: —

L. V. B., a boy eleven years of age, with very promising talents. He plays the piano well, and with considerable power, reads well from sight, the proof of which is that he plays Bach's Clavier bien tempéré, which Herr Neefe has lent him. He who knows these preludes and fugues will at once perceive his talent. Herr Neefe has given him also, in the interval from business, some instructions in il-rough-bass. He is now working him on composition, and, to encourage him, has allowed him to publish his nine variations on a March. The means to travel ought not to be wanting for this young genius. He will certainly be a second Mozart, if he goes on as he has begun.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, JAN. 20. — It is winter and icy. This perhaps is the reason that in my last letter, when under full headway, I tripped and slipped, only bringing to when 3,000 miles away, among the singing schools, and meeting houses, and singing people of good old Yankeeedom. Well, be it so.

Having praised STERN and his Choral Society sufficiently, I may add only that the solos were no better executed than we are used to hearing them in Boston. As to Fraulein AGNES BURY, who four years ago used to be advertised as chamber songstress to Queen Victoria, (if I remember rightly,) and who sang the principal solos this evening, she seems pretty thoroughly worn out as a singer, and sang shockingly flat more than once during the evening. A young pupil of Stern, Malvina Strahl, with a clear, penetrating voice, sang very well. Liebig's orchestra played finely. Stern took most of the tempos slower than we are used to.

Is it not an "Owl Book" that "Trovator" keeps? That number of the Journal in which the fact is announced to an admiring world is lent or mislaid, or "something," and I cannot refer to it. In that book has he already embalmed this receipt? "To kill a concert, make it the fashion." Time was when the New York Philharmonic Society rehearsed and gave its performances in a small hall to the few who loved grand orchestral music. The time came when it was the fashion to attend. Sometimes I have a sort of nightmare, and then I am carried back to the Philharmonic, after it became the mode, and endure again the horrors of that musical pandemonium, in which, I remember once the noise of the "fools who there did congregate" became so intolerable that good-natured Eisefeldt — thank God, he lives! — was obliged to announce that it was impossible to go on with the rehearsal under such circumstances! When this nightmare comes over me, it causes "all my bones to shake," and the words of Mercutio come in place,

"At which he starts and wakes,
And being thus frightened, swears a prayer or two,
And sleeps again."

Friend Trovator, how is it in these days?

Formerly I attended more than one performance in the hall of the Sing-Akademie, at which the number of performers was, by count, greater than that of the audience! But now these concerts are the fashion, and some poor musical individuals are driven almost crazy.

You must remember that the hall hardly seats 800 auditors all told, that to accommodate as many as possible the benches are pushed as near together as people can sit, that the seats are all numbered, and at such a performance as that of "the Creation" all are taken — because it is the fashion.

I go to hear the music — hence go early. Stern gives some ten minutes extra for people to get their places, but at length gives the signal, and Haydn's "Chaos" — the musical one — begins. It begins with an obligato chaos in the audience. About twenty persons who, of course, have selected the seats most difficult of approach, come in, timing their entrance so as to continue the rustle of silk and crinoline as long as possible. There is that fat woman. She marches along up the central passage, stopping at some half a dozen benches as though one of the empty seats upon it was hers — of course the one at the farther end. The eight or ten persons already on each bench, in turn, turn pale with mingled wrath and apprehension, expecting that that mass of crinoline is to crowd its way through. It is but common sense to suppose that the feelings of all these people correspond precisely to the music, being very chaotic indeed. At last she finds the place to enter. All the incumbents of the bench rise, which is pleasant to the rows of people all the way back of them to the door, and the good old lady literally works her way through. She comes to the vacant seat, but alas, her place proves to be on a side bench, so she has the comfort of disturbing about two rows more. There come two girls, they walk all the way up to the choir, stop and discuss matters, not finding their numbers, and go slowly back again to the door to inquire. At this moment the recitative begins, "And God said," — "Fifth bench from the front, right," — this makes good sense enough, but you find by the text book (for which you pay 6 1-4 cents,) that these are not the words which Haydn has set to music. By the time Uriel in his first air comes to the words "disorder yields," that fop who always comes late, has just entered with two women, and to the words "and order fair prevails" causes eighteen people just in front of you to rise, while he and the two crinolines, press along. One of the latter catches on the corner of the seat, and makes it slam on the floor, the poor fellow who sits at the end loosens its hold; crinoline's owner utters an audible "Thank you," and as she crowds by, the chorus shouts out your own feelings exactly: "despairing rage," — and you mentally ejaculate: Oh, that those crinolines were involved in that "rapid fall!"

And so it goes on — it did on that evening — actually two-thirds through the first part. But these were not all the results of the oratorio having become the fashion. Such whispering — for that matter, almost loud talking — as I have not heard for a long time. The talk of the two women who sat next me was more provoking than edifying. Not the slightest attention to the music. They did not come to hear the "Creation," they came to say they had heard it. At the end of the first part I was put to flight — the original division of these parts is here preserved — and made my way up into the balcony, where on a vacant back seat, in the heat, which was stifling, and quite out of sight of the stage, I listened in peace. But when Raphael declared that "God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good!" the desire was very strong to rise and inform the said angel that however true that might have been 4,000 and odd years since, when Adam and Eve comprised the entire human population of the earth, late comers and talkers at concerts now-a-days form notorious exceptions. If any power declares them "good" without the words "for nothing" immediately following, I must beg leave to differ.

The next evening after Stern's concert we had one arranged and conducted by HANS VON BÜLOW, with the following extraordinary programme:

PART I.

Overture to Byron's Corsair: Berlioz.

Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; op. 18 in G: Beethoven.

Air from Benvenuto Cellini; Sung by Frau von Milde: Berlioz.

The Ideal; Symphonic poem after Schiller: Liszt.

PART II.

Introduction to Lohegrin: Wagner.

Prayer of Elisabeth, from Tannhäuser; sung by Frau Milde: Wagner.

The Love Fairy: concert piece for violin with small orchestra solo; played by Ludwig Strauss: J. Ralf.

Song to sing on the water, "Mitten im Schimmer," &c.; by Stolberg: Schubert.

Lorely by Heine, for voice with pianoforte; sung by Frau Milde: Liszt.

Overture to the "Behmriehtern": Berlioz.

Mostly, as you see, "music of the future" with a vengeance.

The first overture I liked better than anything else I have heard from Berlioz. It was not quite so raging as usual, and more like what we of the school of Haydn and Mozart call music. The concerto for pianoforte is perhaps one of the least interesting of Beethoven's works of the kind — though of course beautiful. Bülow played it magnificently. He is undoubtedly the first now of the Berlin pianists. By the way I believe I made a mistake about his appointment in my letter a few weeks since. He is pianist to the Prince of Prussia — now regent — not his son, the husband of young Victoria.

The air from Cellini was not to me specially interesting — nor, as it appeared, to the audience. But Frau Milde is decidedly the finest singer we have had here this winter. Our friend A, who sat near the stage, was exceedingly pleased. The voice is not perhaps the finest, but she shows the benefits of a true cultivation. She sang the Schubert song delightfully.

Then came Liszt's Symphonic "Dichtung," poem. In the text book — price 2 silver groschen, (5 cents,) — is this note: "This musical composition, exactly following Schiller's poem, after the introduction, is divided into three principal strophes; 1. Soaring upward, (Aufschwung). 2. (Enträuschnng). 3. Employment, (Beschäftigung) — the motives of which are wrought up as they return toward the close into an Apotheosis of the past."

I will call this piece by no hard names — will simply say, that, where I have the poem before me as in Spohr's "Consecration of Tones" I find no great musical enjoyment; how much less then could I draw any satisfaction from music, which following closely all the ideas of a poem not known to me, attempts by mere bits of melody and combinations of instruments to convey those ideas — or the feeling aroused by them — to the auditor. I am so old-fashioned in my feelings, that where there is no regular theme musically wrought out, I soon become weary. Hence the show pieces of virtuosos cause me nothing but weariness, as soon as my mere curiosity is satisfied in regard to the men and their execution. Hence all picture music, such as Weber's overtures, famous as they are, palls upon my taste after a time.

Of all the overtures constructed on this principle, that to Rossini's "Tell" is my favorite. It is a succession of lovely "tunes," with no attempt at "working up" — the most beautiful of "pot pourris." Now in the piece in question by Liszt, we have not even the tunes, and I could not find myself at all at home in it. Still I had no objection to hearing it, being willing to prove all things. At length the piece closed, and an occurrence followed, which I fear will have painful consequences for Bülow. It was this. A few individuals in the hall (scattered here and there) applauded. This called out at once an almost universal and loud hiss! Bülow, who had nearly reached the back of the stage, turned and hurried forward and addressed the audience. Some understood him to say words to this effect: "Such a proceeding is not the style here, I beg you to omit it" (es unterlassen.) If these were his words, one feels inclined to judge him kindly, as the piece was by his father-in-law, and as it was well known beforehand what sort of music Liszt writes.

But I understood him, as did many others to say words to this effect: "Hissing is not the style here, I ask the hissers to leave the hall," (den Saal zu verlassen.) I have never seen during the four winters of my acquaintance in the musical circles of Berlin, an excitement equal to the one which these words have called up. At the moment people seemed struck dumb, and, in fact, the rest of the concert passed off quiet as concerts usually do here. But since that evening folks are gradually finding out that they have been insulted, and seem ready to pour out vials of wrath upon the man's head.

NEW YORK, FEB. 14. — We have had a little snatch of opera — a season consisting of one night and one day performance. On Friday evening PICCOLomini sang for the first time here, Donizetti's pretty little opera, Don Pasquale, and in Norina found a part eminently suited to her capabilities. Her acting was charming and spirited, the contrasts of assumed bashfulness and boldness being strongly marked. LORINI sang pretty well, and MAGGIOROTTI and FLORENZA were just bearable. The orchestra was small, and as a whole the opera was given in a very inferior manner. I understand it is the intention of Ullman to give this opera in every city that Piccolomini visits, and as it requires no more scenic preparations than the smallest theatre possesses, and has but one chorus, that can be easily omitted, it is the very thing for an itinerant concert troupe. No costumes are required either, beside those which every lady and gentleman wears, and there is no reason why it should not be an acceptable treat to small towns. But for a metropolitan opera house like ours, Don Pasquale, as given by the present Piccolomini troupe, is hardly up to the mark.

The opera was repeated on Saturday, and the receipts for the two performances were $6,500.

Saturday evening the Philharmonic gave its third concert of the present season, the programme including a symphony by Haydn, another by Schumann, and the Triumphal March of Ries. Mr. WILLIAM SAAR, a young pianist of considerable talent, and Miss COURAN, the first soprano of Rev. Dr. Bethune's Church in Brooklyn, were the soloists. The lady is young and has a good, well cultivated voice; she sang with good effect "O mio Fernando from Favorita, and will prove a very valuable concert singer.

The Harmonic Society will give next week a complimentary benefit to their leader, Mr. GEORGE BRISTOW. The German Liederkrantz, and the Harmonic Societies of Williamsburg and Brooklyn will take part. The concert will take place at the Academy of Music and promises to be an attractive one.

Mr. STÖPEL's Hiawatha is announced for performance next Monday evening. He paid the Mendelssohn Union one hundred dollars for their assistance, and they have been rehearsing faithfully, but up to a few days ago, there had been no orchestral rehearsal. They want, also, to get some more tenors, in which department the Mendelssohn Union is weak.

These two projects oblige the societies to postpone their rehearsals of Israel in Egypt and Eli.

No other musical items at present. New York is dull, as regards music. There is a rumor that the "Gipsy's Frolic" opera, written by an amateur, Dr. WARD, will be produced at the Academy of Music, with DE WILHORST as the heroine; but it is so far, only a rumor. TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, FEB. 14. Our musical opportunities have of late been of rather spasmodic occurrence. Two or three weeks of almost complete stagnation have been succeeded by a flood of concerts, &c., dammed into the bounds of five or six days. The beginning was made by MASON & THOMAS's third Matinée, which took place last Tuesday. The programme was, as usual, excellent, though some of the compositions were perhaps not the fairest representations of their authors. Schumann's Sonata for piano and violin, op. 105, is too complicated to be well judged of at a first hearing; and the Quartet by Haydn, in which was played D minor, No. 43, did not strike me as being in the happiest style of the great master. Possibly this was caused by my not being as familiar with it as with some of its brethren. An Etude by Rubinstein, played by Mr. Mason, seemed immensely difficult and fatiguing, and elicited a vehement encore, to which the pianist replied with a Galop Fantastique, hardly less difficult, of his own. These pieces, from their very nature, brought out more spirit than their performer showed in his rendering of the Sonata. The concert ended with Mendelssohn's beautiful posthumous Quintet in B flat, which I had the pleasure of hearing from your Quintet Club, last Fall. This, as well as the Quartet, were exceedingly well played, and in consideration of the fact that "all's well that ends well," I think I must pronounce the concert, as a whole, to have been a satisfactory one.

On Thursday evening an entertainment of a miscellaneous character was given at the Academy by some of "the powers that be," for the benefit of "Little Ella," whose fame has probably ere this reached your ears. For the benefit of those who are not acquainted with this youthful candidate for public favor, I will state that she is a little one of but four summers, the child of a respectable, well educated widow, in limited circumstances, who (the child, not the mother) has a very remarkable memory and talent for elocution. Her mother, being unable to secure for her the education she would wish, has caused her to read and recite in public; she has been patronized by upper-tendom, (reading at their houses, &c.) and some members of this potent body, judicious enough to see that these public exhibitions would in the end be the child's ruin, arranged the above mentioned benefit for her, by which they hoped to effect the mother's object at once. I regret that indisposition prevented my attending it, as, not having heard the child elsewhere, I cannot give you my personal impressions of her. The house was crowded from top to bottom, and the proceeds must have been very satisfactory; I am told that the little creature's performance was equally so. It must be curious to hear Collins's "Ode to the Passions," Chaucer's "Dream," &c., from such childish lips. It would be painful and unpleasant were the little maiden not perfectly healthy and robust, and a complete child in every respect but one — lively, frolicking, mischievous, and I hope naughty sometimes, whenever her peculiar talent is not brought into requisition. Miss BRAINARD, and Messrs MASON & GOLDBECK, kindly gave their services for the occasion, and won their deserved applause.

At the Philharmonic concert last Saturday, we had the rather unusual treat of two Symphonies, and two more thoroughly contrasted ones could not have been chosen. They were No. 2 in D, by Haydn, and op. 120, in D minor, by Schumann. The first, so limpid, clear and lovely, with its simple, childlike melodies, flowing along like a peaceful meadow-brook; the second so grand in instrumentation, so bold and vigorous in melody, so startling in its harmonic modulations and effects. Like a modest village maiden, with simple, rustic manners, but with her soul's purity and beauty reflected in the sweet serenity of her features, the first stole its way deep into the heart; the other, like a heroine, courageous, strong, her noble beauty enhanced by the fire of enthusiasm and ambition, which, however, does not smother the more tender womanliness in her breast, rouses all our admiration and sympathy, and excites us into following her footsteps with an ardor and devotion almost equalling her own. This Symphony by Schumann has been played here but once before, and though exceedingly difficult, repays, in its final effect, all exertions in practise. It is the finest of all the master's work of a like kind, and though very complicated, must impress even the uninitiated by its vigor and gorgeous coloring. Peculiarly beautiful and very original is the Trio of the Scherzo; one of the most graceful little things ever composed, — it sounds like the flowing and gurgling of water. I regret that my time and space do not admit of entering into a more detailed analysis of all the parts of this splendid work. The third orchestral piece was a Festival Overture by Ries, which was not particularly interesting, and in which the March which ended it, with the thin instrumentation and the drum and fife of a mere military band, did not seem to me to merit in the least the title of "Triumphale," which it bore. The solos were performed by Mr. SAAR, the pianist, who was known to our public as a boy-artist some years ago, but has since studied in Europe; and Miss COURAN, a debutante, who would have done better to remain in obscurity a while longer. She has a very fine voice, but sings very false, and needs much more cultivation. Mr. Saar played two movements of Chopin's piano-concerto in a creditable, but by no means exciting manner; he has but little force, and not as much neatness as he might have. A Notturmo, by Field, suited his style better; while in the Etude by Rubinstein he played with far less vigor than characterized Mr. Mason's performance of the same piece.

NEW YORK, FEB. 21. — I am glad to have an opportunity of giving you some farther account of our pleasing young pianist, Madame ABEL. She gave two concerts last week, one here, and one in Brooklyn. The first, owing to the weather, as well as its not having been sufficiently advertised, drew a lamentably small audience, but those who were present had their double share of enjoyment. A small, cozy room like Chickering's (or Dodworth's, which would have been better, as not being so near the street) is just the place to hear this lady to advantage. There is a delicacy and refinement in her playing which seems better suited to a more private performance than to a large concert hall. This is, however, mere conjecture; when we have heard her, as I hope we shall ere long, with an orchestra, I can judge better of her powers in that line. She played, on Tuesday evening, one movement of a Trio of Mayseder, with Messrs. MOLLNHAUER and BERGNER, Chopin's Etude in A flat and Mazurka in B minor, Beethoven's Violin and Piano Sonata in F, with Mr. Mollenhauer, and Gottschalk's "Last Hope." Besides these, in answer to encores, Chopin's waltz in A minor, and La danse des Fées by Prudent. Of all these the gem was the Sonata. The piano part was most exquisitely rendered, and no less so was the violin played. Indeed, Mr. Mollenhauer showed himself in quite a new light. Accustomed to hear him play none but light, tricky, unmeaning solos, I should never have supposed him capable of entering so truly into the spirit of higher music. But I rejoiced to find myself mistaken, and that he sustained Mad. Abel most ably, so that the blending of the two parts was indescribably beautiful. The fair pianist's remaining pieces were done equal justice to; she brings out so distinctly the individuality of every composition, and gives each style its full value. The "Last Hope" and the Danse des Fées were models of neatness and facility of execution. But though this is the case, one cannot doubt what music she prefers. Her face, her whole manner show it plainly. It is interesting to watch her when she is playing a Sonata of Beethoven, for instance; to observe how her whole form becomes more dignified, her otherwise almost childlike face more mature, and how every trace of a slightly troubled and anxious expression which circumstances have imprinted on her features, disappears. Some call her playing cold — I cannot understand it; to me it is full of soul and feeling. She is not a Clara Schumann, by any means, nor has she as much force as some of her sister-artists whom we have heard here, but her playing speaks an exquisite taste and refinement, and a degree of womanliness, in fact, that is rarely found in a public performer of her sex. Messrs. Mollenhauer and Bergner played each a solo on Tuesday evening — the latter has only recently commenced to perform in any but concerted music, and gives the public reason to regret that he has hidden his candle under a bushel so long. In his quick passages alone, there is room for more softness and smoothness. A Miss LUNAN, a very young and evidently timid debutante, represented the vocal element of this concert. She has an uncommonly clear, powerful voice, which still needs, however, a great deal of cultivation and polish. I understand that she is preparing herself to be a public singer, and should therefore advise her not to risk her reputation at the outset, by "coming out" before she is fitted to do so.

Madame Abel's concert in Brooklyn was much more successful, the Athenæum Hall being well filled, in spite of the execrable weather. I hope my colleague "Bellini," was present, and will give you his account of it. I don't quite like to trespass on his ground, but as this is probably the only Brooklyn concert I shall ever have occasion to mention, I cannot refrain from giving you my impressions of it, for Mme. Abel's sake. That lady was assisted by Messrs. APTOMMAS, MAYER, MOLLNHAUER, and SCHREIBER. With Mr. Mollenhauer she played a duo of Osborne and de Bériot on themes from "William Tell," and the Andante and Variations from the "Krentzer Sonata," the latter I cannot express to you how beautifully! Chopin's Grande Polonaise, Op. 22, Thalberg's Moïse, and, as an encore piece, the Lucia Fantasia of Prudent, completed her share of the performance. The Polonaise was exquisitely rendered; in Moïse, however, she showed, for the first time, that its style was not exactly adapted to her powers.

The solos of the three instrumentalists were like a hundred others which they have played, if I except Mr. Schreiber's arrangement of the Ave Maria of Schubert, which showed his instrument to great advantage, and was finely played. Mr. Aptommas, after his last piece, was encored with a vehemence that gave me no very favorable idea of the manner of a Brooklyn audience. The ladies were beginning to fear a serious disturbance, when the clamor was put an end to by the announcement that Mr. Aptommas had already left the house. Mr. Mayer sang, very beautifully, three German songs: "How can I leave thee," Schubert's Barcarole, and, last, but not least, the exquisite "Gute Nacht" of Robert Franz. If he succeeds in making the songs of this composer popular in New York, I, for one, shall be grateful to him all my life.

Madame Abel thinks of making a trip to Boston ere long, when I hope your public will give her a warm reception, and you can judge for yourself as to her powers.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the opera "Lucerczia Borgia," arranged for the piano-forte.

The Complimentary Concert to Joseph Trenkle.

Seldom, if ever, in our city has so genuine, so beautiful and so substantial a tribute been paid by artists to a brother artist, as that last Saturday evening, in the Music Hall, to Mr. TRENKLE. And our whole musical public seemed most heartily to share the spirit of the occasion; all had made it a point of duty and of feeling to be there — duty to Art, which in that well-planned, heartily prepared programme, was to have so rich and pure an expression, as well as duty to those sympathies and that respect which superior character and high artistic prospects, overtaken in life's Spring by dangerous disease and suffering, always must inspire. There were about two thousand persons present — an audience of the most cultivated and appreciative, the most agreeable to be surrounded with, that Boston could assemble. It was a true and a successful tribute in all respects: — a generous and a beautiful act on the part of the performers: — Mr. ZERRAHN, with his Philharmonic Orchestra — nearly the whole fifty; Mr. KREISSMANN, with his Orpheus Glee Club; Mrs. HARWOOD, the admired soprano; and the four brother pianists, the ablest whom we have among us, all coöperating of their own impulse and with a will, eager to do their best; then the number and character of such an audience, the rare perfection of the programme, and successful execution of its every piece; then the substantial result, the "material aid and comfort" which it was one, though not the foremost, object of this concert to extend to a suffering brother. May the news of it, when it reaches him in Florida, conspire with the genial influences of nature there, to turn the ebbing tide of life and restore him strong and glad to Art and friends.

The programme of the concert was so choice, so uniformly high in quality, yet novel in some respects, and wholly free from dullness, so happy in its contrasts, in the way that one thing succeeded another, each present enjoyment heightened and supported by a sense of the best of all, the Symphony, to come at the end, that we record it here in full:

PART I.

1. Overture to "Fidelio," - - - Beethoven.
2. Air from St. Paul: "Jerusalem, thou that killest," &c., Mendelssohn.

Sung by Mrs. Harwood.

3. Duo for two Piano-fortes (8 hands) - - Moscheles.
Andante con moto — Fugue — Finale, Alla Siciliana.
Played by Messrs. Parker, Lang, Leonhard and Dresel.
4. Chorus from "Œdipus," - - - Mendelssohn.

Sung by the Orpheus Glee Club.

PART II.

5. Overture to "Oberon," - - - Weber.
6. Air from "Figaro": "Dove sono," - - Mozart

Sung by Mrs. Harwood.

7. L'Invitation à la Valse, arranged for two Pianos (8 hands)
Weber.
Played by Messrs. Parker, Lang, Leonhard and Dresel.
8. Four-Part Song, - - - Mendelssohn.

Sung by the Orpheus Glee Club.

9. Grand Symphony ("Jupiter") in C major, - Mozart.
Allegro vivace — Andante cantabile — Minuetto — Finale,
Allegro molto (Fugue with four subjects).

The Orchestral pieces were rendered remarkably well, especially the exquisite overture to Oberon, which left a more delicately clear and perfect tone-picture in the mind than ever. Beethoven's overture, the last of the four he wrote to Fidelio, abandoning the themes and motives common to the first three, is less familiar to our public than the third and greatest of them, that in C, commonly called Leonora, and therefore had the charm of freshness, while it lacks nothing of the fire or depth or tenderness of Beethoven. The Symphony, too, was well played, and generally very much enjoyed; although it suffered somewhat from its late place in a feast of sounds so rich already, and prolonged a great deal by encores, so that there was some disturbance by persons hurrying for cars and omnibuses, and doubtless weariness in many who remained. The worst, too, was that this enforced a shortening of some of the movements by omitting the usual repetitions. Still in such a concert, where all else had tended to refresh, to cherish and sustain one's musical enthusiasm, it was pleasant to go home with the crowning impression of Mozart's great Symphony. A friend, in another column, complains bitterly of this arrangement. He was unfortunate; we, and some others, counted it a part of our good fortune all that evening, that, while all was so near perfect, the most perfect was to come. Yet we would not, as a rule or custom, plead by any means, that the Symphony should end a concert. What with the chance of weariness in one's self, and with the certainty of weariness in others, with their uneasiness and hurrying out, there is in most concerts too much danger that the true impression will be lost or much disturbed. Nor do we think the best place for the Symphony is at the beginning. We fully sympathize, as to that, with the suggestions of "Double Bass." It is too true that neither orchestra nor audience get musically attuned, nor fall into sympathetic true rapport before the chill, as it were, has been taken off, by some moments of enjoyment of good music first. There is always a best moment in each spell of musical enjoyment, — a moment when the "fits of easy transmission" and reception are most perfect; when the sense, the brain, the soul is taken at the top-wave of ecstasy and clear perception. The same experience we have in every mental occupation, in periods of reading books, of talking, writing, enjoying nature, and all else. The difficulty is, that this best moment is not always simultaneous with all persons in the company. But, when you consider the heterogeneous conditions in which minds and nerves and senses enter a concert-room; when you consider the distraction of talks unfinished, and of persons entering late, it is evident that the best chance of the average best listening state for all is some time after the beginning. At the close of the first part, or at the beginning of the second part of the concert, we fancy that the Symphony would, as a general rule, be better played and better heard and felt, than either at the beginning or the end.

Mrs. HARWOOD's selections were admirable and were finely sung, the last with piano accompaniment by Mr. DRESEL. The Orpheus never sang in better tune and voice; the "Œdipus" chorus, with its glorious climax, made a great impression and was encored. But the characteristic and peculiar feature of this concert was the performance of the pieces for eight hands upon two superb Chickering Grand pianos. We usually anticipate little but confused noise from such combinations. But in this case the quality of the four artists (Messrs. B. J. LANG and OTTO DRESEL at one instrument, and H. LEONHARD and J. C. D. PARKER at the other); the perfect unity, precision, vigor and delicacy of the execution; the rich and satisfying body of tone; the intrinsic interest of the compositions; and in short, the complete and triumphant success of the experiment made it just the fittest kind of tribute that could have been offered upon such an occasion. Nothing could have so feelingly suggested the pianist absent, as those four friends and pianists thus artistically united. The piece by Moscheles is full of interest. Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," a perfect resumé in music of all the finest sentiment and poetry of the waltz, was absolutely glorified in this superb arrangement, (which was made by Mr. Dresel for an occasion in which Jenny Lind took part some years since in New York.) It was splendidly played and most enthusiastically redemanded.

And so passed off an occasion honorable to all who took part in it, as well as to the esteemed young artist for whom the tribute was intended, and which, although with sadness, will be treasured among the richest musical memories of all who were present.

Musical Chit-Chat.

To-night another grand feast of orchestral music! ZERRAHN's third Philharmonic concert, when our friend Schmitt will be gratified by hearing the Symphony played first; and when we say it is the C minor Symphony of Beethoven, we know that this hint is enough for every music-lover hereabouts. The splendid Tannhäuser overture, and Rossini's to the "Siege of Cornith," and a brilliant Polonaise by Meyerbeer, and a Piano Concerto by Mozart, played by so accomplished a pianist as Mr. B. J. LANG, add rich attraction, further, to the instrumental portion. For singer, Mr. Zerrahn has succeeded in securing Mrs. LUCY ESCOTT, one of the first reputations among the American sopranos, who have had training and operatic experience abroad, and who, since her return, has not yet sung in Boston. The good things which Zerrahn, and which his noble orchestra have done for us in their last concerts, and especially in that for Mr. Trenkle, ought to insure a crowded house to-night, and many nights to come. We cannot but believe that the musical enthusiasm of Boston received a new impulse last Saturday night, which shall redound to-night and hereafter to the advantage of Zerrahn's labors in our cause.

At the last Wednesday Afternoon concert, the first Symphony of Beethoven, which so many did not hear that first stormy afternoon, was repeated. Herold's Zampa overture, reminiscences of Wagner, an arrangement from Wallace, a Strauss Waltz, &c., filled out the programme. We hope the orchestra will consider the suggestion of "Double Bass" of playing the Symphony last in these concerts, so that it may not cost real listeners their dinner, and so as to allow the butterflies to get their share, and fly away, if they wish, before the serious work comes on. . . . Mr. MILLER postpones his performance of "The Haymakers" from the 2nd to the 9th of March, that he may do it better. . . . The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing Neukomm's "David" — rather a come-down from Handel's sublime song of Miriam! . . . BISCACCANTI has had great success in Montreal.

Music Abroad.

London.

In England, "St. Paul" was probably never better relished than by the crowd in Exeter Hall yesterday week; — certainly, has never been before so well performed. The excellence of the orchestra accompaniments must be expressly dwelt upon. The chorus, too, which has much ungracious work to do — this fact of itself, in our estimation, marking the wide difference betwixt Mendelssohn's first and second oratorio — was, on the whole, good. That heavenly funeral strain, "O, happy and blessed are they" (which we commend to such folk as deny the existence of genius to its composer) went admirably. The solos, too, were excellently delivered. Signor Belletti had a cold, and his voice did not always answer its owner's will; but his reading of the music was, what Signor Belletti's reading always is, great, grave and dignified. Madame Rudersdorf sings best in oratorio, and by much the best when the music calls on her to subdue herself, as she proved yesterday week. The quartet was completed by Mr. Sims Reeves, whose voice was in excellent order — and by Miss Dolby. Such a tenor and contralto are not to be found within the limits of the German speech, from Königsberg to Presburg. Most careful had been the study of this fine and thoughtful work by all concerned, — and the performance of it, we repeat, was a memorable one. It is to be given, a second time, on Friday next.

"The Creation" was Mr. Hullah's Wednesday Oratorio at St. Martin's Hall, given to a very large audience, and in its main points well given. In the third part, Miss Martin sang for the second time in public, and confirmed the good impression made by her first appearance: also the idea that Nature has destined her for brilliancy rather than expression. Her voice, at all events, is a sound and veritable soprano, which seems to answer its owner's call easily. Mr. Thomas and Mr. Santley were the basses. Mr. Sims Reeves was singing very finely. Are we never to hear him again in "Jephtha"? The part of Jephtha, too, would thoroughly suit Miss Kemble, as it calls for a singer young and dramatic. Mr. Hullah's next performance is to consist of a repetition of Dr. Bennett's "May Queen," and Beethoven's "Choral Symphony." A journal could be filled with reports of choral performances and oratorios up and down England.—Händel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn furnishing the programmes,—from which, it is instructive to observe, the name of Dr. Spohr has vanished almost as completely as if his "Last Judgement" had not been in great vogue a quarter of a century since, when an infatigable critic coolly tied up "St. Paul," and Mr. Perry's "Folshazzar's Feast," in the same article, and, of the two, found the latter the finer musical work! Yesterday evening, "The Seasons" was to be given in state by the new Choral Society at Manchester; which has the advantage of an established orchestra such as, we are assured, has never been collected in the provinces.—Athenaeum, Jan. 22.

Miss Arabella Goddard has left the metropolis for a provincial tour of a few weeks; but before doing so she gave a morning concert on Saturday last, in which she provided her usual irresistible attractions for lovers of the most classical style. It was given at St. James's Hall, and the audience was both numerous, and, at times, enthusiastic; in fact, considerable disposition was evinced to demand an encore of a part of a Sonata by Weber, for clarinet and piano; but, of course, Miss Goddard, with her usual good sense, did not respond to the appeal, and the concert proceeded.

The programme included the following:—

Trio in F major (Op. 65), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello: Dussak.

Grand Sonata in C major (Op. 53), dedicated to Count Waldstein, for pianoforte solo: Beethoven.

Sonata in E-flat (Op. 45), for pianoforte and clarinet: Weber.

Suite de Pièces in F major (Suites Anglaises, No. 4), for pianoforte solo: J. S. Bach.

Quartet in C minor (No. 1. Op. 1), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello: Mendelssohn.

Miss Goddard was assisted by Herr Louis Ries (violin), Mr. Doyle (tenor), Signor Piatti (violoncello), and Mr. Lazarus (clarinet)—all of whom proved themselves worthy assistants of their talented principal. The last especially distinguished himself in the beautiful Sonata of Weber, which he performed in conjunction with Miss Goddard, a delicious composition, full of striking melody, and of which the andante and rondo are peculiarly fine, and in Weber's best style—the former intensely soft and elegant—the latter correspondingly brilliant and lively.

Next to this Sonata, which may be considered as the principal feature of the matinée, we must refer to the Beethoven Sonata as the most remarkable performance, not only on account of the intrinsic beauty of the composition, but of the wonderful ease and facility with which Miss Goddard dealt with the extraordinary difficulty of the work, written as it avowedly was, for the purpose of exhibiting the great talents and brilliant execution of the leading pianists of his day. The Rondo in particular—a light and very rapid movement, with some remarkably difficult passages—showed off most admirably the wonderfully even and perfect mechanism which Miss Goddard has attained upon her instrument.

The Suite de pièces, by Bach, was also a fine performance. It is a rather unusual, and dissuaded form of composition—six short movements, all in the same key, but differing in time and subject, in the same way as the movements of a sonata—but played with less interval and following more consecutively to one another. They all show very strikingly Bach's peculiar style, especially the Gigue, a schmerzhaft movement, which was played in the most elegant and graceful style. The quartet and trio were not quite equal in interest to the usual selections made by Miss Goddard for the stringed instruments. Dussak, though graceful and smooth, is in great danger of being underestimated when placed side by side with such a work as the Sonata of Beethoven, and the Quartet of Mendelssohn, though it is extremely interesting as being the "Op. 1" of that great composer, and composed by him when he was only 14 years of age, does not very perceptibly show the peculiar style which he afterwards impressed upon every work which issued from his pen. Both however were good, and were excellently played by all the performers. Only one hint, however, we would venture to make to Miss Goddard. Does she not still (as we have before remarked) overrun the strings occasionally in her determination to keep up the vigour and energy of the quick movements? We mention it, not as a decided fault, but rather the evidence of a plethora of power in the performer. But, as we have said on a former occasion, "she is a great creature," and well merits the success which she has met with, at this and many previous concerts.—Mus. Gazette, Jan. 22.

From the London Athenaeum, Jan. 15.

PARIS.—We read of the success, at the Opéra Comique, of Mlle. Breuille,—a young singer—in M. Aubert's "Les Diamans." Private letters from those who should know, tell us that Miss Thomson keeps her ground at the Grand Opéra: no easy matter for a novice, and an Englishwoman:—the first, we believe, of our "perfidious" race who has ever sung there. Should she really equal description, there is occupation enough and to spare for her, whenever it pleases her to come home. The debut of M. Lebat, who has been promised as about to out-tenor all past tenors, may shortly be expected. The concerts of the Conservatoire have set in. The first of those by the Société des Jeunes Artistes (far fuller of hope and interest to all persons weary of iteration) will have our excellent townsman, Mr. Saintin, as solo player. Then, too, will be introduced a new Overture by M. Féis. There is a new four-act opera coming at Marseilles, by M. Morel, the Director of the Musical-School there, with the unrepresentable title of "Ingenium et Dieu"—a less pretentious one-act novelty, "La Perle de Frascati" (by whom it is not stated), at one of the theatres of Rouen. Every rumor of the kind is welcome as tending to weaken that centralization, or exclusive dependence on the metropolis, which makes travelling in the provinces of France so "stale and unprofitable" to lovers of music and drama.

GERMANY.—From the first number of a new, or rather enlarged, Viennese musical and theatrical journal, "Revisionsen und Mittheilungen," promising well, we gather a few odds and ends which illustrate the present state of taste in Germany—that great land of many lands, once so bounteous in creation. Something is, surely, told in a list of works given, or to be given, at the Vienna opera, "Don Juan" with recitatives—"Iphigenia in Tauris"—a treat to be enjoyed—"Euryanthe,"—so far so good; Herr Wagner's "Lohengrin," concerning which there may be two opinions,—and, after the above German standard works, and this one German novelty, "The Midsummer Night's dream" of M. Thomas, M. Halévy's "Jewess," "Martha" (the ubiquitous and insipid), "Masaniello," and M. Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," "Robert," and "L'Étoile." The repertory of concert music in the Austrian capital has included choral works by Haydn (to whom the Viennese are justifiably constant), and the choruses of Mozart to "King Thamos,"—which, if we mistake not, he afterwards arranged as Motets, known in England. Why, by the way, should not the series of them be assembled so as to form a sort of whole for some sacred performance? Besides these, there have been revivals of sacred music by the last great Viennese composer, Schubert; whose "All Souls' Litany" is said to have made a deep impression. Madame Sehmman's concerts at Vienna have been apparently popular. Among the part-singing Societies of men we find traces of songs by Herr Dürmer, a composer, as our readers know, long resident at Edinburg, and who has only just missed taking a place among the best modern German composers. Thus much from the South, in which sympathy and memory, rather than life, seem to be living. When we get northward, to Leipsic, in the winter concerts of which town there is still enterprize—we read of church-music by Herr Hauptmann—of Herr Joachim's admirable violin playing; of a new Cantata, "Frühlingsbotschaft" ("Spring's Message"), by Herr Gade, who seems resolute to circumscribe his invention within the smallest possible limits,—Aurora borealis, primroses, moorland scenery; are all good matters of inspiration; but the artist who rests exclusively among such themes must remain (as Herr Gade seems to do) vaporous, cold, and pale. The great men of old were not content without trying variety, by way of escaping from the monotony which inevitably besets those who are fertile in production. Dr. Liszt has resigned the Directorship of the Opera at Weimar. He was prompted to this decision by the decided fiasco of a new opera, "Der Barbier von Bagdad," composed by one of his pupils, Herr Peter von Cornelius, and conducted by Dr. Liszt himself. The public entirely forgot its customary roof breeding, and gave vent to its displeasure by hissing.—London Athenaeum.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per curve. This applies to all orders under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment. Te Deum laudamus and Jubilate Deo.

E. Howe, Jr. 60

This will prove a very acceptable addition to the small number of pleasing, effective and moderately difficult Te Deums, which are now in use. Whether it was one of the "rejected" or not, we cannot say; evidently it is a composition that Mr. Howe should be proud of.

Children. Words by Longfellow. Music by W. R. Dempster. 50

Dempster's reputation is such, that his musical version of Longfellow's charming and genial poem will at once find hundreds of lips ready to sing it, and hundreds of ears willing to listen to it. It is, as Dempster's songs always are, eminently singable and melodious, exhibiting a refined taste and nice understanding of the poet, that will be readily discovered and admired.

Daybreak. Words by Longfellow. Music by M. W. Balfie. 25

Bright and effective. One of the best little songs of the industrious and popular composer.

Fairy Songs I'll sing to thee. E. H. Hime. 25

Really something of a gem for little singers, graceful and sparkling. Since the "Will you love me then as now?" this author has written nothing, which seems more likely to obtain the same popularity.

Nelly is forever singing. Song. J. H. Kohl. 25

An easy parlor-song for medium voices.

Life's sunny hours. Ballad. Joseph Calkin. 25

Much in vogue in England. Sweet music and nice words.

The glorious vintage of Champagne. Ballad. M. W. Balfie. 25

A splendid song for a baritone voice, bold and catching, which never fails to bring down the house at the performance of the Opera in London.

Instrumental Music.

Galop from "Vêpres Siciliennes." Brilliant amusements. Albert W. Berg. 30

Teachers will find this a very acceptable piece for moderately advanced pupils. Its bold rhythm and striking melody cannot fail to take at once hold of the fancy of a young player. It is worked out very cleverly and furnishes ample material for passing instructive remarks and development of velocity.

Twenty-Four New Studies. Op. 90. Book I. Stephen Heller. 1.50

It has been often asserted, that in the whole immense range of musical literature, intended for the technical advancement of the young piano player, there is nothing which can compare in artistic value with Heller's Studies. Each study is a tone-poem, finished in itself. Introducing all the peculiar difficulties in modern piano playing, the author is never dry or dull. Of his former studies, many are played and appreciated as "Songs without words." The present series comes in point of difficulty next to the easiest, viz. op. 47. It contains even more gems than that. The first book is now ready; the second will follow shortly.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL FOR THE PIANOFORTE. By Charles Czerny. No. 1, from the works of Haydn. No. 2, from the works of Mozart. No. 3, from the works of Beethoven. 1.25

The above is a collection of the most spirited passages and sentences from the works of the great composers—a selection of their happiest musical thoughts. Each of the melodies form a complete subject, and, consequently, an entire, though short piece. Those who would study music with profound attention will, in them, become acquainted with the genius of the great masters without being compelled to possess the whole of their voluminous works.

NOTES.

I. A friend lends me an "Independent" or two. I find in a communication the following:

"What great events from trivial causes spring! Here is a man journeying on horseback from Paris to London. In his saddle-bags are a few books, for the traveller is a dear lover of books. He has pouch and girdle; inkhorn and pen, and a Greek Testament are at hand; as he rides, he reads and marks; as he rests, he reads and marks; thus for many days; and so on that journey, chapters and verses to the New Testament were devised, by Robert Stephens, scholar and printer, in the year of Grace, 1551."

As to the verses, I suppose this is correct; as to the chapters, let us look into these two Bibles, which I have just bought, one German and the other Latin.

"Biblia, Das ist die gantze Hellige Schrift, Deudsch." Folio, with a large number of wood engravings. All divided into chapters—both Old and New Testaments. Turn to the last page: "Gedruckt zu Strassburg bey Wendel Rihel und vollendet am ersten Tag des Herbstmonats, im Jar MDXXXV." (Printed at Strassburg by Wendel Rihel, and completed on the first day of the Autumn month, [September,] 1535.

"Biblia cum Summariorum apparatus pleno," &c. Octavo; a most exquisite specimen of old printing, both Testaments fully divided into chapters. Turn to the last page. "Lugduni [Lyons] in officina Jacobi Mareschal, anno domini, decimo nono supra millesimum." That is, 1019—a mistake of 500 years, as is noticed in Baumgarten's "Nachrichten." The true date is 1519.

A large portion of the communication above quoted, and an article referring to it in the succeeding number of the "Independent" relates to the necessity of using a "paragraph" edition of the Bible in order to read understandingly. How happens it that the excellent one arranged by "T. W. Coit, D. D., Rector of Christ Church, Cambridge," (Mass.), and printed there in 1834, is not mentioned? From Dr. Coit's preface, I quote the following in relation to chapters and verses.

"The division was not made till the middle of the 13th century, or about A. D., 1250. An individual, bearing a title not very attractive to Protestant and republican ears, a cardinal" (in a note "Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro") "was the author of this arrangement. The division into verses (at least as respects the Old Testament) has not so good paternity as even this, judging from the estimation prevalent among numerous Christians. It was introduced into the Hebrew Bible by one Athias, a Jew of Amsterdam, in his edition of it in 1661; many years after the oldest college in this new world had been established."

Dr. Coit says in a note, that this division had existed earlier in English Bibles, but when first made he did not know. According to him, referring to Henry, Michaelis and Horne, Stephens was on a journey from Lyons to Paris, not from Paris to London, when he divided the New Testament so wretchedly into verses.

II. At the coffee house the other evening, I noticed in the London Athenaeum, that Lord Somebody had been struck with the legal knowledge of Shakespeare, and has prepared a pamphlet on the subject. This is spoken of as something so wonderful and new!

No doubt to Englishmen. Every American scholar, however, will tell the Athenaeum that the idea is an old one, and will point to some articles in an American magazine, arguing that the poet went up to study law in London, based on this very legal knowledge, that Lord Somebody has just remarked. But how can the London Athenaeum or Lord Somebody, be expected to look down so low as to an American publication! Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Can any American know anything about Shakespeare, Goethe, Handel, or Beethoven, that has escaped the wonderful men of the London Athenaeum? Can American magazines possess any claim to their notice?

III. JOHANN WENZEL TOMASCHKE, born April 17, 1774, at Skutsch in Bohemia, lived in Prague and died there, April 3, 1849. I find him for the first time spoken of "as a giant, second only to Beethoven, in all that rendered Beethoven truly great," &c. His works, among which are sonatas, symphonies, concertos, variations, masses and other church music, one opera, a cantata or two, pianoforte trios and quartets, &c., amount to perhaps a hundred in number. He was quite a famous teacher in Prague, and his autobiography is a pleasant sketch, with its many anecdotes of famous men, Beethoven, Woelffe, Steibelt, and others. Of his greatness I certainly never dreamed. Moscheles once spoke of him to me without conveying any such impression, and I find it rather singular that, with the exception of two or three performances of symphonies in Leipzig, long ago, I find no account of any of his secular compositions having been played out of Prague and Vienna, where apparently they are all now forgotten. I know no notices of him in the musical journals from 1798 to 1850, which lead one to the idea that he was above and beyond the standard of an average good musician.

IV. A Query. What is the meaning of "rendition?" Mr. D., what does the great new Dictionary say? I have been writing for you since the second number of the Journal, and have never had any occasion to use the word, to my knowledge. Perhaps I have missed a great deal. Please tell me the meaning of it.

V. "Oh! Lo'd a' massy!" as uncle Sam Lawton used to say, with the emphasis on the last word—what will the readers of Dwight's Journal say now? Here, in this number of January 8th, is a man asking seriously of an edition of the Holy Bible, if it be—a "vanity!" What blasphemy! The criminal acknowledges everything, but suggests that what he desired and still desires to know from some one better informed on the point than he is, is this;—is that particular edition of the Bible a RARITY? The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher on Organ-Playing.

(From the Independent.)

The Organ, long expected, has arrived, been unpacked, set up, and gloried over. The great players of the region round about, or of distant celebrity, have had the grand Organ Exhibition; and this magnificent instrument has been put through all its paces, in a manner which has surprised every one, and, if it had had a conscious existence, must have surprised the Organ itself most of all. It has piped, fluted, trumpeted, brayed, thundered; it has played so loud that everybody was deafened, and so soft that nobody could hear. The pedals played for thunder, the flutes languished and coquetted, and the swell died away in delicious suffocation, like one singing a sweet song under the bed-clothes. Now it leads down a stupendous waltz with full bass, sounding very much as if, in summer, a thunder-storm should play above our heads. "Come, haste to the wedding," or "Money-Musk." Then come marches, galops, and hornpipes. An organ playing hornpipes ought to have elephants for dancers.

At length a figure is to show the whole scope and power of the instrument. The theme, like a cautious rat, peeps out to see if the coast is clear; and after a few hesitations, comes forth and begins to frisk a little, and run up and down to see what it can find. It finds just what it did not want, a purring tenor lying in ambush and waiting for a spring, and as the theme comes incautiously near, the savage cat of a tenor pitches at it, misses its hold, and then takes after it with terrible earnestness. But it has miscalculated the agility of the theme. All that it could do, with the most desperate effort, was to keep the theme from running back into its hole again, and so they ran up and down, around and around, dodging, eluding, whipping in and out of every corner and nook, till the whole organ was aroused, and the bass began to take part, but unluckily slipped and rolled down stairs, and lay at the bottom raving and growling in the most awful manner, and nothing could appease it. Sometimes the theme was caught by one part, and dandled for a moment, when, with a snatch, another part took it and ran off exultant, until unawares the same trick was played on it, and finally, all the parts being greatly exercised in mind, began to chase each other promiscuously in and out, up and down, now separating and now rushing in full tilt together, until everything in the organ lost patience, and all the "stops" were drawn, and, in spite of all that the brave organist could do,—who flew about and bobbed up and down, feet, hands, head, and all—the tune broke up into a real row, and every part was clubbing every other one, until at length, patience being no longer a virtue, the organist with two or three terrific crashes put an end to the riot, and brought the great Organ back to silence!

Then came congratulations. The organist shook hands with the builder, and the builder shook hands with the organist, and both of them shook hands with the committee; and the young men who thought it their duty to know something about music looked wise, and the young ladies looked wise too, and the minister looked silly, and the parishioners generally looked stupid, and all agreed that there never was such an organ — no, never! And the builder assured the committee that he had done a little more than the contract stipulated; for he was very anxious to have a good organ in that church! And the wise men of the committee talked significantly of what a treasure they had got. The sexton gave a second look at the furnace, lest the church should take it into its head now, of all times, to burn up; and he gave the key an extra twist in the lock, lest some thief should run off with the organ.

And now, who shall play the organ? is the question. And in the end, Who has not played it? First, perhaps, a lady who teaches music is exalted to the responsibility. Her taste is cultivated, her nerves are fine, her muscles feeble, her courage small, and her fear great. She touches the great organ as if she were a trembling worshiper, fearing to arouse some terrible deity. All the meek stops are used, but none of the terrible ones, and the great instrument is made to walk in velvet slippers every Sabbath, and after each stanza the organ humbly repeats the last strain in the tune. The instrument is quite subdued. It is the modern exemplification of Ariadne riding safely on a tamed leopard. But few women have strength for the mechanical labor. It ought not to be so. Women ought to have better health, more muscle, more power, and one of these days doubtless will have.

Next, an Amateur player is procured, who was said to have exquisite taste and finished execution. A few pieces for the organ he knew by heart, a pretty way of varying a theme, a sentimental feeling, and reasonable correctness in accompaniment.

Next came an Organist, who believed that all this small playing, this petty sweetness, was a disgrace to the powers of the instrument. He meant to lead forth the long pent-up force, and according he took for his first theme, apparently, the Deluge, and the audience had it poured upon them in every conceivable form,—wind, rain, floods, thunder, lightning, with all the promiscuous stops, which are put in all large organs to produce a screeching brilliancy, full drawn, to signify universal misery and to produce it. That man gave the church their full money's worth. He flooded the house. The voices of the choir were like birds chirping in a thunder-storm. He had heard that the singing of a congregation should be borne up upon the music of the organ and as it were floated, and he seemed to be aiming, for the most part, to provide a full Atlantic ocean for the slender choir to make its stormy voyages upon.

A fortunate quarrel disposed of him, and the Organ went back to the tender performer. But before long a wonderful man was called, whose fame, as he related it, was excessive. He could do anything—play anything. If one style did not suit, just give him a hint, and he would take on another. He could give you opera, ecclesiastical music, stately symphony of Beethoven, the brilliant fripperies of Verdi, the solemn and simple grandeur of Handel, or the last waltz, the most popular song, (suitably converted for the purpose)—anything, in short. The church must surely be hard to please, if he could not suit them. He opened his organ as a peddler opens his tin boxes, and displaying all its wares, says, Now, what do you want? Here is a little of almost anything!

He took his turn. Then came a young man of a true and deep nature, to whom music was simply a symbol of something higher, a language which in itself is but little, but a glorious thing when laden with the sentiments and thoughts of a great heart. But he was not a Christian man, and the organ was not to him a Christian instrument, but simply a grand gothic instrument, to be studied, just as a Protestant would study a cathedral, in the mere spirit of architecture, and not at all in sympathy with its religious significance or uses. And before long he went abroad to perfect himself in his musical studies. But not till a most ludicrous event befell him. On a Christmas-day a great performance was to be given. The church was full. All were musically expectant. It had been given out that something might be expected.

And surely something was had a little more than was expected. For, when every stop was drawn, that the opening might be with a sublime choral effect, the down-pressing of his hands brought forth not only the full expected chord, but also a cat, that by some strange chance had got into the organ. She went up over the top as if gunpowder had helped her. Down she plunged into the choir, to the track around the front bulwark of the gallery, until opposite the pulpit, when she dashed down one of the supporting columns, made for the broad aisle, when a little dog joined in the affray, and both went down toward the street door at an astonishing pace. Our organist, who, on the first appearance of this element in his piece, snatched back his hands, had forgotten to relax his muscles, and was to be seen following the cat with his eyes, with his head turned, while his astonished hands stood straight out before him rigid as marble!

But in all these vicissitudes, and in all this long series of players, good playing has been the accident, while the thing meant and attempted has been in the main, a perversion of music, a breaking of the Sabbath-day, and a religious nuisance. The only alleviation in the case was, that the general ignorance of the proper function of church-music saved the Christian congregation from feeling what an outrage they had suffered. But, we must try this tropic once more, before we can get it fairly finished. *

The Sisters Ferni.

From the Vienna Blatter für Musik. Translated for the London Musical World.)

"Du hast wohl Recht: ich finde nicht die Spur Von einem Geist, und Alles ist Dressur." *

Reckoning by the enthusiasm which, for some time, has been rolling its gigantic waves through the Italian periodical press, concerning this pair of violin-playing sisters, which waves have now advanced to the banks of the little Vienna stream, certainly astonished at such a deluge, we could not help, at the very least, picturing to ourselves artistic phenomena in whose ten fingers there must be more geniality and masterly skill than in ten Milanollos put together.

After daring to hazard the audacious opinion that, from what we heard, saw, and experienced at the first concert of these young ladies, in the Theatre an der Wien, both the Mesalles. Ferni could very well find room in the dreamy Theresa's little finger, we run the risk, probably, of being knocked down by the foam-crested billows of enthusiasm, which, however, as yet have only forced their noisy way as far as the standing places in the pit; but they cannot shake the rock of criticism which is accustomed to breakers.

Both in their personal appearance, and in their playing, the fair artists possess a great many points of attraction. The first is a matter of taste, and, therefore, of no account here; concerning the latter, we will explain our opinion by a few observations.

Whatever the so-called French school has collected in the way of affectation, piquancy, over-sharpness, and glimmering dast to throw in people's eyes, and by which it has succeeded in thoroughly banishing all truth and nature from Art, is exhibited, with exhausting completeness, in these two young ladies' playing. In the latter is mirrored, with frightful fidelity, artistic Vandalism, clothed in the most modern and refined form, such as is now in full bloom on the banks of the Seine, and it is not till any one has heard Mesdemoiselles Ferni play that he can believe in the possibility of a degree of demoralization in the conception of Art so great that even a Berlioz was not deterred from the blasphemy of which he was guilty towards the score of Weber's Freischütz.

The playing of these young ladies, however calculated to dazzle the great masses, and even, in many particulars, to gain the approval of professionals, must fill the real friend of Art with deep regret, nay, with pity, because he perceives that a couple of young girls, apparently artistically endowed by nature, have been subjected to the most refined system of false education, which has not only robbed them of freedom of individual development, as well as independence of feeling and sentiment, but deprived them of the remotest consciousness of such mental qualities.

Their artistic taskmasters have not allowed these young ladies to express the smallest emotion of their souls as they felt it. With the scissors of the school they have pitilessly nipped off every blossom, which dared to sprout forth out of the impulse of an inward plastic power. They have succeeded, by force of cultivation, in changing into a smooth-shorn wall of leaves the fresh, free forest, with all the variety of its naturally sturdy trees, with the magical and mysteriously romantic charm of its gloom, with the smiling friendliness of its glades, with the refreshing joys of its shade, and the vivifying murmurs of its little brook.

From the way of holding the violin and bow up to the most brilliant passages, and down again to the simplest cantilena, nay, even to the production of each separate tone, everything in the playing of these young ladies is affected by mannerism, the inevitable result of a course of scholastic subjection, carried out with an anatomical minuteness, which breaks the structure of natural sentiment into a thousand pieces, for the purpose of producing out of them, according to the erroneous architectonic system of this method, a brilliantly colored caricature. We never hear a warm and really natural tone; the pathos is hollow; the sorrow feigned; the joy false; the bashfulness affected; and the resolution cowardice.

This applies especially to Caroline, in whose dreamy eye we feel inclined to believe there is a world of deep feeling, while, as the event subsequently proved, her glance really expressed nothing but complete apathy. Her sister, Virginia, on the other hand, appears to have rescued some fragments of original natural feeling from the conflict with the persons who have killed her soul; her strain is fuller, and warmer, although the instrument she uses is inferior in strength and melting character of tone to that of her sister. Her bearing, which is less constrained, as well as the fact that she glides with momentary nonchalance, as well as with greater lightness and fluency, over many passages, which, from her technical skill, she would be capable of executing in a perfectly irreproachable manner, are, for the reflective observer, characteristic signs of the existence of undestroyed traces of individuality. Virginia's playing can be influenced by her frame of mind; she may fail to-morrow in what she has succeeded to-day, while Caroline is infallible, and, in consequence of the complete absence of animation from her soul, can never change. She is the prototype of a carefully regulated piece of mechanism, which, with absolute certainty, hits the same point a thousand times running. In spite of this, we much prefer Virginia's playing with all its disregard of the influence of the moment, for it possesses one feature in common with mankind, namely chance, while infallibility is either above or below humanity.

A further proof of the artistic passivity of these brilliant examples of methodical art-gardening, is furnished by their repertory, which would otherwise not be intelligible, if we reflected, on the one hand, with what an endless variety of artistic productions they must have come in contact during the course of their career, and, on the other, if we remembered that these young girls are of an age which might enable them to judge of the value of the pieces in their list. But the want of freedom in their artistic education, the consequence of which must be the inability to form an opinion in musically æsthetical matters, would be alone sufficient to explain this phenomenon, even without the fact that, as pupils of Beriot and Alard, they have been educated merely to hawk about the tin-pot concert wares of those gentlemen. We do not, in the slightest degree, blame the young ladies for this, since, in consequence of the above circumstance, their horizon was necessarily bounded by the compositions with which their masters deigned to present them; nay, we rather think it a piece of negative good fortune for Art that this is so, for we cannot help shuddering at the thought: Suppose the notion of laying hands on the modest creations of a Beethoven, Mendelssohn or Schumann, were to enter their heads!

But—we may make our minds easy on this score; such a thing will never happen. The young ladies will never play anything except what their masters have arranged for them atom by atom, and indelibly impressed on them; nay—however exaggerated it may seem—we can scarcely keep ourselves from assuming that, beyond Alard and Beriot, they have not the least idea what kind of an art music is, and—if more nearly questioned on this head—would be capable of returning an answer somewhat resembling that of Berlichingen's little son, of which the worthy Götz remarked: "The boy is so learned, that he does not know his father's name."

Yet, despite all this, we have no intention of blaming the Mesdemoiselles Ferni, for, as we have already said, they are, in an artistico-moral sense, irresponsible beings. But we certainly do intend to pronounce the most decided censure on a school, which, shallow in principles and hollow at heart, thinks, from its high-stilted and obscure, foggy self-conceit, to look down upon German Art, which, serious and dignified, is enthroned high above it on a pedestal of granite.

The public, more properly so-called, pays less attention to considerations of this kind, and is, therefore, perfectly justified in feeling attracted by the young ladies' elegance; excited by their uncommon, brilliant, and crisp style of execution, lighted up by a variety of brilliant tricks of fence; astonished at their manual skill, overcoming all difficulties with ease and certainty; pleased by the purity and comparative force of their tone, and, lastly, entranced by the way in which the performance of each fair artist blends, even in the most trivial details, with that of the other. We ourselves, however, do not know, in truth, whether we more admire the gigantic industry which must have been required from them both for so comprehensive a material victory, and the subjection of their individuality, or regard as unintelligible the perseverance with which they have gone through the process of mental transubstantiation to the utter sacrifice of their own identity.

But, however any one may think on this head—the sisters Ferni are worth going to hear.

L. A. ZELLNER.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Zerrahn's Programme's Again.

My Dear Dwight,—In writing you my first letter on this topic, it was partly with a view to discover some good reason, if there happened to be any, why the Symphony is always placed first on our programme. I have been unable to find one, however, in the communication of Mr. SCHMITT, which appeared in your Journal of last Saturday. I do not see indeed, that we differ, substantially.

The ground I took in my letter was, that the place for a Symphony is neither at the beginning nor at the end of a Concert, but that it should stand No. 2 on the list; or, what is pretty much the same thing, at the end of Part first; for an Overture and a Symphony must be considered nearly, if not quite, enough, for one Part. Mr. Schmitt wishes it to be played first, in order that he may hear it before his energies flag. We only differ then as to a matter of ten or twelve minutes in time, which would be required for the performance of an overture; and what reasonable man would do your correspondent the injustice to suppose that his energies are in danger of flagging in ten minutes?

The "poor people who come from the suburbs" would have no reason to complain if my suggestions were carried out; for by placing the Symphony at the end of the first Part, Mr. Zerrahn would give to those who desire to leave early, an opportunity of doing so, and enable them besides to carry away with them, fresh and unalloyed, the impressions created by the Symphony. A decided advantage, I think.

"Mr. Double Bass" has, many times, "been in the room for the performers, before a concert," and has always been under the impression that the mysterious discords heard there were caused by tuning the instruments, and were not produced solely to enable the musicians to "get their hands in." It is true that the artists manipulate a little and make all sorts of diabolical noises, mixed up with chromatic roulades from the oboes and flutes; but they don't play anything together. It seems to me there is a marked difference between tuning a violin in a private room and playing upon it afterwards in public. I think it will be conceded, that there are few artists, who do not sometimes experience more or less nervous excitement on appearing before an audience; and it must be conceded that, as a general rule, a player not only gains confidence, but enters more and more into the spirit of his music as his performance progresses. I do not see how Mr. Schmitt can get over this.

Again; I cannot perceive how this tuning of instruments in a side room is going to help the audience at all; for upon this question touching the propriety of tuning up an audience, so to speak, Mr. Schmitt must excuse me if I differ from him. It is no doubt true that professional musicians, who naturally keep their senses always tuned to a "concord of sweet sounds," are fully prepared for a Symphony at any time, so it does not come too late. But it is quite different with a majority of the audience who may be supposed to have been "knocking round" all day out of doors, or boxed up in counting rooms "down town." To these, I think your correspondent will admit that the ascent to a "gigantic tone-poem" should be somehow or other graduated. To such as these, a fine overture (of course Mr. Zerrahn is not going to give us a poor one,) is a positive benefit, while it cannot possibly be a disadvantage to anybody.

At any rate let us have my plan tried before we condemn it; and I heartily agree with Mr. Schmitt in considering Mr. Zerrahn a competent person to decide this matter, and only hope that his attention may be drawn to these communications and that they may receive his favorable consideration.

DOUBLE BASS.

P. S. I am sorry your correspondent does not see the force of my gastronomical simile. He takes umbrage at Bœuf à la mode, but thinks "roast meat" might do. Chacun à son goût—roast meat let it be, so the principle remains the same.

Mr. Fry's Lecture in Philadelphia.

(From the Evening Bulletin, Feb. 25.)

Mr. William H. Fry delivered a lecture on Music, last evening, before the Harmonia Society, the audience being a good one in point of numbers and intelligence. The lecture was extemporaneous, and was of a discursive character. Its length, too, would forbid any attempt to give even an outline of it. Mr. Fry regards Music as the highest and most pervading of the arts, and in expressing his worship of it, he became enthusiastic and often eloquent. He described and analyzed the diatonic and chromatic scales, and, with Mr. Cross's assistance on the organ, illustrated a variety of chords and modulations. Owing to want of time, he did not attempt a historical sketch of Music; but he mentioned the Chinese accounts of it, antedating all other accounts, and he introduced specimens of Chinese and East Indian airs, harmonized by himself and sung by the chorus of the Harmonia Society. As an example of very superior writing he introduced Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, which was also well sung. The lecture contained frequent allusions to the inadequate encouragement and protection of Art in this country, all of which were expressed earnestly and warmly, and were received with sympathy by the audience. There were a great many good things in the lecture; much sound philosophy, but much also that was mere rhapsody; a great deal that was original and striking and amusing, but much that was simply grotesque. The peroration was spirited and impressive appeal in behalf of American Art. Although the lecture was more than two hours long, the audience did not weary; for Mr. Fry is never common-place or tedious.

The Boston Courier gives an extract from a private letter describing the same performance:

"The audience was not large, but good-humored and made up of our brightest people, and the absence of the grim, and determined, and defiant, and investigating faces of the regular lecture-goers was refreshing. Fry lounged upon the stage at 8 o'clock, made up in a strange and not severely æsthetic manner. Dark coat and vest buttoned up to the throat, and a pair of very loose and lazy-hung pantaloons—his hands encased in immaculate kids. He spurned the pulpit—'stand,'—they call it—that had been provided for his use, and took a clear stage, and no favor, and no notes, except some irregular scribbles on an old card which he produced every few minutes from one of his waistcoat pockets. For two hours and a half did he talk brilliantly, quaintly, convulsingly, learnedly, buttonholedly, prophetically, half-inspiredly, whimsically, conceitedly, bravely, truly, about everything—and music. Now he made us squirm with fun; now he dazzled and lifted us by some unexpected soar of eloquence; now he set us on ecstasies with some bold, bright scoff at snobbishness and stupidity. Now he opened our admiring eyes to some rare poetic vision. His peroration was a noble appeal for art in this country. I believe the people would have sat delighted till midnight. But after threatening to stop half a dozen times, the brilliant fellow switched off, and shuffled away as if, for all the world, he had been doing nothing particularly clever all the while. Blackberries in February are not half so scarce as Fry's speeches, and not half so succulent and piquant. Get him to do it in Boston."

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, JAN. 26.—I think von BÜLOW is of importance enough, or will be hereafter to excuse me for giving a couple of paragraphs from the papers here in relation to the affair.

1. From the Voss'sche Zeitung. (Communicated.)

"Hans von Bülow, on Friday, regaled the Berlin public with an Ollapodrida of Music of the Future, in the hall of the Sing-Akademie. Among other horrors, the concert-giver brought to performance a work by Franz Liszt; 'Die Ideale Sinfonische Dichtung nach Schiller,' explained by H. von Bülow in his programme to this effect: that the piece is in three divisions, 'Aufschwung, Enttäuschung und Beschäftigung, die schliessliche Vereinigung dieser Motive eine Apotheose Schiller's Bilde.'" The public appears to have heard in this musical waste only the 'Enttäuschung' and opposed the small clique of applauders after the 'Apotheosis'—which doubtless would have made Schiller turn over in his grave—with decided hissing. H. von Bülow came before the audience like an angry lion, and said, 'Hissing is not the style here! I desire the hissing to leave the hall!'

"As to this we can assure H. v. Bülow in the name of the public; 1. That hitherto it has not been the style here to use the Sing-Akademie for the production of musical nonsense; and, 2, that it has not hitherto been the style to order the public, which has purchased the right of criticism for a thaler, to leave the hall. This much we remember, through a period of 40 years, that the hall of the Sing-Akademie has never been so dishonored.

Unus pro multis."

The man of the National Zeitung excuses himself in a paragraph, for not having in his notice of the Bülow concert given the particulars of the scene. He says: "Before coming to the topic of the day, we must refer to the much talked of occurrence at the concert of H. von Bülow on Friday, which is quite without precedent in Berlin concert history, and has awakened universal disapprobation. Our report of this has been deferred until now, because before the breaking out of the storm of Liszt, we had withdrawn into the most distant corner of the Loge, where we could not understand the words of the speaker." The story is then told again with the following remark appended: "Partly to the coolness, partly to the surprise of the public, thus in corpore insulted, owes the equally blustering and uncalled for Censor his thanks, that he, at that very time and place, was not driven back into his proper sphere."

I remember, when a boy, that one of the neighbors sued the Boston and Worcester Railroad Company for damages to his water power. Lawyer Mellen argued the case for him, and then, for the first time, the poor man found out how excessively he had been injured. I remember he cried while the neighbors laughed. Our public seems, now that three or four days have elapsed and the critics have had their say, to begin to find that poor Hans von Bülow has committed the unpardonable sin.

But enough — perhaps too much — of this.

The introduction to 'Lohengrin' is a taking, slow movement, away up in the upper violin regions, made understandable by a couple of pages of programme, all about the sacred "Gral." This, it appears, was the cup used by Jesus at the Lord's Supper, and in which, afterwards, his blood and water, when the soldier pierced his side, was caught — according to some old Catholic legend. Haupt, who sat by me, said the music sounded to him just like a pupil's exercise in three-part counterpoint, and it seemed to me much like a reappearance of familiar strains from the "Tannhäuser." We shall hear it again soon in the opera house.

The violin piece by Raff, played by Strauss most exquisitely, was but a weak affair — fairly music after the Mendelssohn pattern, for the orchestra, and a violin solo, of no great musical value.

I do not know whether you have ever had Berlioz's Overture to the "Vehmrichtern." If not, I hope your orchestra will not waste valuable time in studying it — unless it be for the fun of the thing. The stuff was so abominably bad, that we got over our disgust and had a hearty laugh — "we," that is, nearly all the auditors near me. One cannot describe it — in fact, it is not worth description with its drums and clashing of cymbals, and ridiculous trash generally.

Music of the Future enough for this winter!

The only claim of such things to the name of compositions seems to be the fact that they really are compounded — a set of heterogeneous short musical passages strung together on the thread of the intellectual idea of some poem. But as it is impossible to convey intellectual ideas in mere musical tones, so the thread of connection is one, which, if you keep in mind, causes you to lose the music; if you keep the music you lose the thread. If you lose the thread the music all falls apart, and you might as well call twenty consecutive pages of the philosophy of Martinus Magnus — the Great Tupper — a poem, as these disconnected phrases and chords a symphony or an overture. Perhaps I do injustice to the Great Tupperian Philosophy. I never read it. No judge has as yet sentenced me to three years State's prison, four days solitary, and a hundred pages of Tupper.

BERLIN, FEB. 4. — Was not my last notice of a concert one in which the extravagances of orchestra run mad was the theme? Eight days later (Jan. 22) we had one of which the principal pieces belong (at least in style) to a period before there was any orchestra — when music was written for voices alone — nay, for men's, or men's and boys' voices only. It was the second concert of the Dom-chor. The ranks were pretty full; I counted 58 boys, trebles and altos, and 31 or 32 men, tenors and basses.

One or two points, minute but not therefore insignificant, are worthy of notice. The choir is arranged in four slightly curving lines, each line just enough raised to sing freely over the heads of that in front, and affording every individual a clear view of the conductor, who, of course, stands in the centre. The result is the highest precision, as every one takes his own time directly from the baton, and the greatest blending possible of voices. Again no one, not seated close to the choir, perceives when and how the pitch is given. There is no sounding of a pitchpipe, or pianoforte, no audible tone given by the conductor. Each has his own music, makes himself perfectly ready, while sitting. Then, at a slight sign all rise together and the music "streams" forth. Again, the ancient music sung, with its long-drawn tones, æolian-harp-like melodies and harmonies, gives the singer opportunity to pay attention to the character of the tone which he is producing, his thoughts not being occupied with runs, and trills, and passages. Consequently, we have a body of as pure vocal tones as the natural powers of the singers will admit of. We all know the effect, when a fine organist closes a piece, raising finger after finger from the keys from the upper octaves downward until at last a single grand pedal note vibrates through the church. This effect, and far more powerful in its workings upon the feelings, we have given us by the Dom-chor, the deep bass voices being heard, like a pedal note, vibrating through the hall for a moment when all else is still.

But to the programme.

1. Ave Regina, by Vittoria; — born in Spain, 1560, kapellmeister to the church of St. Apollinare, at Rome, in 1585; later, singer in the Pope's chapel; in 1594 called to Munich. His works comprise all sorts of music for the Catholic church service, masses, psalms, motets, and so on, in from four to twelve parts.

2. Kyrie, for men's voices, by Giovanni Mattheo Asola; — flourished at Verona, 1565–1596; wrote much and well.

3. Offertorium, by Fioroni; — born at Paris, 1704 died as kapellmeister of the cathedral at Milan, in 1779; one of the greatest church composers of the last century.

4. Clavier Concerto, in Italian style, by Bach, played by Hans von Bülow. A piece for the pianoforte solo, with so much beautiful melody that it is not necessary to be a "Bachist" to enjoy it. The only criticism that I heard upon Bülow's noble performance of it, was that he took up the last movement a little too fast, so that the audience was more likely to wonder at the performer's execution, than to fully comprehend the greatness of the music.

5. "Adoramus te, Christe," by Benelli; — a great singer, and one of the greatest teachers of singing of recent times. He was born at Forlì, in the Romagna, Sept. 5, 1771; studied with those two great masters, Padres Martini and Mattei; 1790 was first tenor at Naples; 1798 engaged in London; 1801 at Dresden; 1823 came to Berlin as professor of vocal music, where he had the greatest success; 1829 fell into a controversy with Spontini, through certain articles, which he had printed in the Leipzig Allg. Musikalische Zeitung; retired to the neighborhood of Dresden, and died August 16, 1830.

6. Choral, the programme says by Eccard, a German composer, born at Mühlhausen, in Thuringia; pupil of Orlando Lasso (Roland de Lattre); 1599 kapellmeister in Königsberg; 1608 ditto in Berlin. This choral is, in fact, what is known in our older singing books as "Luther's Judgment Hymn." I have seen it in books printed before Eccard was born; so that he can only have the credit of having harmonized it; as Claude Goudimel did our "old 100." If ever I get time to write my "Psalmic Sketches" for the Journal, there will be more said about this choral.

7. Lamentation, (for men's voices) by Melchior Franck; — born in Silesia in the second half of the 16th century; 1603 kapellmeister to the Duke of Coburg; died there June 1, 1639.

(The motet here given is from Lamentations CV: 15–17.)

8. Adagio and six variations, op. 34, Beethoven; played by Bülow, in his most exquisite style.

And finally,

9. Lobgesang, by Mendelssohn — not the Song of Praise Choral Symphony — but a "Glory to God in the highest," &c.

I can say nothing new about such music. I can only repeat that no reader, who has never heard the like, can form any due conception of it, either in regard to the style of the music, the effect of the boy choir, or the perfection of the performance. The first hearing of a full orchestra or a grand Handelian chorus with two or three hundred singers, is not more new to a country lover of music, who has previously never gone beyond the village band, or choir than one of these motets would be to the most experienced singer of our Handel and Haydn Society. Why can we not have something of this kind in Boston? I will stake my character for truth on the assertion that our city can furnish as good materials for such a choir as Berlin. If it was not for the impossibility of finding men and boys with time, patience and perseverance to go through the needful course of study and practice, we might have such a choir. But here is just the trouble!

Jan. 21st, I attended the Zimmermann Quartet concert. 1. A quartet, by J. J. Koerner, of St. Petersburg, not very great, but very pleasing. 2. Quartet by Haydn in G, of course delightful. 3. do. op. 127, Beethoven — quite beyond me, on one hearing.

At OERTLING's soiree, a novelty to me was a Quartet by Spohr, in G, in three movements, which I liked much. I heard also, for the second time, one by Schubert, in D minor, the opening of the Adagio reminding everybody most forcibly of the second movement of Beethoven's 7th Symphony. If you do not know this work in Boston, I pray you get it.

At another concert of a very different order were a few things to be noted; such as, a Festival Overture by HUGO ULRICH, of whom I must at some time have written. He is one of the rising young composers; I think among the first here. Some years since a prize was offered (at Brussels?) for a "Sinfonie Trionfale," and he gained it. He has been for two or three years in Milan studying; and the story is that the Royal opera has accepted a new work for the stage by him. The overture in question pleased me much better than it did some of the newspaper reporters. I liked it. There were three pieces declaimed, or rather read by some of the best of the "Theater personnel" of both sexes — not of particular interest, however, to us.

A couple of young women from Vienna sang; Frauleins Sofia and Kraus, wiggly-voiced women to the most shocking degree; neither gave a smooth, sustained note from beginning to end. One of them sang the song by Schubert: Meine Ruh ist hin, mein Herz ist schwer. I could not imagine from her appearance that her peace really was destroyed or that her heart was very heavy, but I shuddered to think how true it would be of me, if condemned to hear such a wiggly-voiced woman often!

DAVID, the violinist, Mendelssohn's friend, was here from Leipzig; and performed a concerto from delightful old Viotti, who, forty or fifty years ago, was the great violinist in London. Do you remember in the Handel and Haydn collection: "See the leaves around us falling?" That melody was taken by Gardner from one of Viotti's violin pieces. That one specimen is sufficient to show what exquisite music he wrote. David also played variations on a Russian song.

But who do you guess played us a piece or two on the pianoforte? None other than fat, jolly, giant-muscled, multitudinous-fingered LEOPOLD DE MEYER — the veritable Leopold — himself, just as he used to be, — a little older, of course, but evidently just as ready as ever to give his certificate of the excellence of anybody's pianofortes.

He played a Souvenir d'Italie, made the melody sing itself almost to sleep, and then waked it up again, and everybody else. It was positively delightful to have something of the sort by way of piquant sauce to all the great music, which had been stirring up the depths of the heart, in so many concerts. I like him far better than Thalberg. He is like Jaell, such a "jolly cock," you cannot suppose he ever had a dark day in his life; and in his music, from the utmost delicacy to thunder, you feel that he is enjoying himself, and you enjoy it too. Being called out again, he played a little queer thing, ending nowhere in particular, and dressing every face in smiles. I like him.

Last night RADECKE gave the first concert of a new series. It opened with a concert overture by Rietz of Leipzig; I liked it better than any other works by him. But what made the occasion most enjoyable to me, was two choral works by Beethoven: the "Elegischer Gesang," op. 118, "Sanft wie du lebst hast du vollendet, &c., and the "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt." So delicious! Ah, when shall we have concerts, with such works on the programmes? David again played. He gave Mendelssohn's Concerto for the violin, and an Andante and Scherzo of his own. His greatness as a violinist, I think no one can deny. Crystal purity of tone, wondrous execution; but he does not touch the heart; herein Joachim to me surpasses all.

The closing piece was Rubinstein's Symphony, entitled "Ocean." The opening movement reminded me of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture. The result of the whole only strengthened the impression made by other of his works, that he is in too great haste to compose. Musical creative talent is certainly there; thorough musical training just as certainly not. His works affect one as crude, wanting in logical connection, too much of the picture-music order. Pity, a great pity!

But many thanks to Radecke for giving it.

NEW YORK, FEB. 28. — I was interested in reading in your last number, what the "Diarist" had to say about ARTHUR NAPOLEON. He is indeed a wonderful boy, and one of the few prodigies that stand anything like an intimate acquaintance. Apart from musical ability, he is a rarely gifted youth, well read, in English, French and German modern literature, a good linguist, and an excellent chess-player. Yet with all these accomplishments, he possesses an unpretending modesty that is, after all, his greatest charm.

At present Arthur Napoleon is in this city, quite ill. The climate is rather severe for one who is accustomed to more southern countries, and Arthur will travel south as soon as possible. An amusing caricature of this little pianist, has recently been published by Schubert & Co. It represents him with his piano astride of a telegraph wire, playing with fingers that cover several octaves, various selections from Liszt, Thalberg, Beethoven, &c. The features, though of course, exaggerated, are in the main faithful, and the little round velvet coat that Arthur always wears at his concerts is accurately represented. In a telegraph station house at the left hand is seen his business agent, Mr. Ties working the wires by the usual telegraphic operating machine.

During his recent trip to Albany, Troy, Hartford, &c, Arthur kept a little diary, amusing for its laconic brevity. Here for instance is an entry:

Feb. 15th. Came to Troy, a quiet little smoky town. Gave a concert. Burned my fingers with sealing wax." As yet Arthur Napoleon has not been appreciated as an artist in this country, but he will be.

We have had an amateur operatic performance, at Dodworth's Hall. It was a private affair, and fearfully select. No lady was admitted except in full dress, and if a gentleman ventured to appear in anything short of white kids, he was expelled at once from the sacred spot. Newspaper people were entirely too plebeian to be invited, and only one of our city papers has a word to say about it, and that favored journal describes the performance as "amusing." The opera was Donizetti's Lucia, a Miss Tryon singing the music of the heroine, and a Mr. Boughton that of Edgar.

The plan of performing Dr. Ward's "Gipsy's Frolic" at the Academy of Music by a gang of fashionable amateurs is abandoned. The composer refused to allow his opera to be cut down at all, and the would-be performers thought it too long. So it is probable that Don Pasquale will be substituted. Miss Secor, a first rate singer will take the principal part, if it be ever played by the amateur gang. She is a young lady of excellent musical education and distinguished social position. Her father is a rich merchant, and the daughter has sung at charity concerts with effect. Handsome proposals were recently made to her, to sing in a series of concerts recently given here by a first class solo pianist, but though the lady herself would not have objected very much, the "stern parient" interposed, and Miss Secor is a flower wasting her sweetness on the desert air—a singer singing only to a private circle of fashionable friends.

Mr. STEPEL'S Hiawatha has given here last week with deserved success. The Academy of Music was fairly filled, most of our musical professors being present. The able criticisms already published in your paper on this work, render any critical notice of it in this letter superfluous. The most successful piece was the Harvest chorus, which was encored. Your Boston solo singers did not please our audience over much. The cantata is to be repeated this week.

A complimentary concert to GEORGE BRISTOW is to take place on the 7th of March, at the Academy of Music.

BRIGNOLI, I hear, is so pleased with this country, that he has no idea of returning to Europe. He gets with Strakosch, $1500 a month, a vast deal more than is ever got on the other side of the ocean. He has in his possession several hundred love letters sent him by infatuated ladies in the various cities he has visited. At first he used to answer these, but they came so plentifully that he now contents himself with reading them, feebly laughing and adding them to his collection. When he shows them to a friend he does it with quite a Don Juan air, and hums Leporello's song "Il Catalogo e questo." At Havana he sang better than ever here, because the people hissed him a few times, and he got a little frightened.

AMADIO waddles about the West with as glorious a voice as ever. He is a jovial fellow, and leaves hosts of friends in every city he visits.

TROVATORE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., MARCH 1st. — Absence from the "City of Churches," for some time, with matters of business, have prevented me from giving you any items of news of late.

The second season of our Philharmonic Society has been conducted with great success, and the interest remains unabated. The fourth concert of the season comes off on Saturday of this week, a notice of which I will send you next week.

We are now soon to have a new Music Hall, or, as some call it, an "Academy of Music," but this latter name is rather too pretentious, as the amount to be raised is only $150,000, which will be hardly sufficient to give us a building with the necessary necessities, worthy to be called an "Academy of Music."

At the last meeting of the Stockholders, the Committee announced that all but about $15,000 of the sum required, was either subscribed or pledged, and that the Committee had determined that the enterprise should not fail for the want of the necessary means to complete it; and more than that, they were also determined that the building and ground should be delivered to the stockholders in perfect completeness, entirely free from debt.

Our beautiful city certainly has reason to be proud of the enterprise and liberality of his citizens. Within a period of two years, the work of supplying the city with pure, wholesome water, has been projected, and successfully carried out; a Public Library—called the "Mercantile Library Association of the city of Brooklyn," has been established with an expenditure of about $15,000, which receives the hearty and cordial support which it richly deserves; a Philharmonic Society second to but one in the country, is now closing a second, and highly successful season; our lectures are better attended than any. The saying of the loquacious Mrs. Malaprop about comparisons, comes to mind just in time to prevent, what I fear, might have been a serious breach of propriety and good manners.

There was a largely attended Concert given last evening at Plymouth Church, in aid of two charitable institutions of our city. Financially, the concert was a splendid success; but as much cannot be said of the programme offered. There were some good things however, but the best of all was the Septet by Beethoven, led by Mr. NOLL. Such music, however, is far more enjoyable in a smaller room, with a select and appreciative audience, though on this occasion it was well received, and I am sure gave great pleasure to many.

I have been both amused and gratified at your treatment of the different criticisms in the Boston papers of the late performance of "Israel in Egypt." They certainly cannot say you are wanting in liberality, or that you fear to let your readers know what they have to say; they must be satisfied with your course in this respect. But it does not seem to me that you meet their objections, and adverse criticisms, in your usual, and thorough manner. Beethoven might highly esteem, and even venerate the works of Handel, without considering them adapted, or suitable for the masses. In fact, it seems to me, the opinions you cite and refer to as sustaining your position, can be used more effectively against you. When you can educate the people to love, appreciate, and enjoy best, that which Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn found it necessary to study, and from which they derived so much delight in so doing, you will not find newspaper critics to deprecate the performance of Israel in Egypt.

What was profound, and deeply learned in Handel's time, is much more likely to be so considered now, than what was then considered elegant or beautiful, to be so considered now.

To discuss this as fully as I would like, would make this letter entirely too long. More anon.

BELLINI.

SALEM, MASS., FEB. 24. — I send you the programme of a very successful concert given in our city last evening under the direction of Mr. FENOLLOSA; because I think that the artist, to whom we are indebted for this and many previous musical favors, amply deserves an honorable mention in your columns. Mr. Fenollosa has become one of the institutions of Salem, and one which we could ill spare, for no one has ever done more than he for the cultivation of music in our community. The soil of Salem is poorly adapted for the growth of the true musical seed. John Endicott and Roger Conant ploughed and enriched it for another sort of crop, and their descendants have hard work to supply the deficiency which the old culture has caused. Mr. Fenollosa has been with us some fifteen or twenty years, digging about and pruning and cherishing our weekly tree of Art, and he now has the satisfaction of seeing it bear healthy fruit, and reaps the additional reward of a firm place in our esteem as a musician and a gentleman. Besides all that he has done for individual pupils, he has made large classes familiar with the best masses of Haydn and Mozart. He has also shown the audiences at his concerts how Rossini stands head-and-shoulders above all other modern Italian composers, and he has given them a taste of deeper and purer draughts than were ever mingled in Italy.

Here is the programme :

PART I.

- | | |
|---|---------------------|
| 1. Quartet & Chorus, from "Moses in Egypt." | Rossini. |
| 2. Trio, "Beatrice di Tenda." | Bellini. |
| 3. Song, "Winged Messenger." | Fesca. |
| 4. Fantasia, "The Siege of Corinth." | |
| Piano & Violin. | Labarre & DeBeriot. |
| 5. Recitative & Romanza, "Romeo & Juliet." | Vaccaj. |
| 6. Duet, "Barcarole." | Kücken. |
| 7. Cavatina, "Semiramide." | Rossini. |
| 8. Trio, "The Faded Wreath." | Stevenson. |

PART II.

- | | |
|--|-------------|
| 1. Quartet, from "I Puritani." | Bellini. |
| 2. Song, "Kathleen Mavourneen." | Crouch. |
| 3. Trio, "The Distant Chimes." | Glover. |
| 4. Sonata—Piano & Violin, op. 12 in D major, | Beethoven. |
| 5. Trio, "Oratorio of Eli." | Costa. |
| 6. Scena & Prayer, "Der Freischütz." | Weber. |
| 7. Trio, "Donna Caritea." | Mercadante. |
| 8. Quartet, "Tancredi." | Rossini. |

Partly good, as you see; and in part indifferent and common-place. For the latter, necessity is the apology. You will readily understand that in one of our audiences there must be many weak stomachs, which require water to be mixed with the wine. The babes are growing, however, and if Mr. Fenollosa keeps on in his good work, he will soon be able to feed them entirely with the strong meat which is fit for men. Even now, we crave a larger modicum of Beethoven and Weber. We are grateful for the taste which we had last night, but in future concerts our stimulated affections will, like Oliver's, ask for more. Mr. Fenollosa rarely appears to better advantage than in the violin part of a Beethoven Sonata. On this occasion he was ably seconded at the piano by Mr. Breed, whose modest and retiring disposition has hitherto been too apt to keep in the shade a rare artistic taste and sensibility.

It is hardly fair to notice the amateur performers, but the ladies will perhaps pardon you for mentioning by their initials, Miss A., of Beverly, whose delicate soprano has become indispensable at our musical parties and semi-private concerts, Mrs. S. and two Misses S. of Salem, whose varied accomplishments do credit to the honored name they bear, and a second Miss A., of Beverly, with a face like a sweet melody, and a voice fit for its accompaniment, — all of them pupils of Mr. F.

The audience was attentive and appreciative, and by their hearty applause gave Mr. F. earnest encouragement to do for them other and still better things. Verily ours is becoming a city of harmony, as well as of Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. Friday evening, Feb. 25, at Mercantile Hall. The programme of this sixth Chamber Concert was by far the finest of the season; and so too, in the rendering of the various pieces, there was more felicity, more life and delicacy than usual.

PART I.

- | | |
|--|-------------|
| 1. Quartet in A minor, | Schubert. |
| Moderato—Andante—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro. | |
| 2. Cantate: "Adelaide," | Beethoven. |
| C. R. Adams. | |
| 3. Capriccio in E minor, with Quintet accompaniment, first time, | S. Bennett. |
| B. J. Lang. | |

PART II.

- | | |
|---|--------------|
| 4. Andante and Finale Presto, from the Quartet in E flat, op. 12, | Mendelssohn. |
| 5. Song: "Welcome, fair wood," | R. Franz. |
| C. R. Adams. | |
| 6. First Quintet, in E flat, op. 4, | Beethoven. |
| Allegro—Andante—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro vivace. | |

The feature of greatest interest, alike from novelty and from intrinsic merit, was the Quartet by Schubert. It is a thoroughly beautiful composition; remarkably clear, complete, concise, symmetrical in form; every movement happily rounded and just long enough; and thus uncommonly free from Schubert's usual fault, excessive length of treatment, — in his case a mere fault in form, in the art of mastering unusually rich materials. For it is clear that, since Beethoven, no composer's brain has teemed with such a wealth of wonderfully strange and exquisite ideas; nor has any one seemed so haunted and urged on by irresistible and restless inspirations. More quiet and more smoothly, simply beautiful than usual in this Quartet, Schubert still betrays in it that peculiar vein of restless individuality, that wild, heroic, solemn, summoning, exulting martial rhythm, which seems always leading his soul away as to some noble strife and victory. Beethoven's early Quintet, full of life and love and zest for all things high and beautiful, one of his golden promises, ere he had opened up his deeper vein, made a very fit counterpart and balance to the Schubert piece, so that one carried fresh and exquisite impressions home with him.

Mr. Sterndale Bennett, whom we have known hitherto only by his "Naiades" overture, and by some nice songs, German in their style and spirit, has long stood as the foremost of the English classical composers; — continually reminding you of Mendelssohn, yet not an imitator. This Capriccio is very brilliant and sparkling in the piano, forte part, full of arpeggio, and taxing execution, to which Mr. LANG proved fully equal. It was a facile, clear and bright performance. But the quintet accompaniments seemed to us empty and uninteresting, as if their share in the development of the ideas of the composition was not from the birth, but only an afterthought.

Mr. C. R. ADAMS is much the most satisfactory tenor singer now before us. His voice, essentially musical and sweet in quality, is evenly developed and has gained in manly strength; and if he lacked the fire and peculiar fervor for Beethoven's Adelaide, yet he sang it with more taste and purity and finish than we have heard for a long time. The exhilarating wood song of Franz was an excellent selection, and was sung with spirit, quickening the audience.

CARL ZERRAHN'S THIRD PHILHARMONIC CONCERT. — Saturday Evening, Feb. 26, Boston Music Hall. There is a certain inspiration in a great storm, an unexpected exhilaration, which old concert-goers have known often enough, to anticipate it in the performance of a Symphony or other great work, when it falls on such a night. Thin audience of course; but then it seems as if the very braving of the elements by the musicians and the few real music-lovers was rewarded upon such occasions by the rare luck of the concert in a musical point of view. Such, judging from the glowing reports of the most appreciative (although the newspaper criticisms are bewilderingly contradictory of each other) was the experience with the glorious old Beethoven Symphony in C minor, as played last Saturday, by Zerrahn's orchestra. We infer that it scarcely ever went so grandly here in Boston. A snow-storm would not have robbed us of that pleasure; but the evil genius, taking the form of headache, was too powerful.

The other orchestral pieces were the overtures to Tannhäuser (which we heartily admire, without despising "Israel in Egypt," oh ye one-sided critics, who reject the everlasting youth of genius when it meets you in an old dress) and to the "Siege of Corinth," by Rossini; a strange, fantastical Polonaise by Meyerbeer, from Struensee; and a Piano-forte Concerto in E flat, by Mozart, — a delicious piece, played with fluency and spirit, (so we judge from a rehearsal) by young Mr. LANG, with the addition of a nicely made elaborate cadenza, in the place usually left for such things, of his own.

The singer, Mrs. LUCY ESTCOTT, made, from all accounts, a highly favorable impression. Judging from the rehearsal, in which she husbanded her voice, we should say she had a voice of musical and sympathetic quality, not very powerful, nor altogether fresh; but flexible and well trained; and that she sings with fervor, sings as if she loved it.

Zerrahn's next concert will not take place until the 26th, to give time for thorough vocal and orchestral rehearsal of the Ninth or "Choral" Symphony of Beethoven. That will form a part; the other will be Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont," with reading of the play. Truly a great concert; worthy of that anniversary of the composer's death!

ORCHESTRAL UNION. — The last Wednesday Afternoon concert brought with it sunshine, large audience, and an uncommonly good selection of pieces. Beethoven's lovely Symphony in B flat, No. 4, was rendered with great delicacy and warmth by Zerrahn's select orchestra. The Don Juan overture went well too; the richly instrumented duet (arranged) from Rossini's "Tell" (we are thankful for a taste from that) not quite so smoothly; but bassoon and clarinet sustained the voice parts well. A flashing waltz by Gungl, and other varieties of that sort, pleased the young folks; but the Symphony got excellent attention over the whole house. Encouraging!

ACCOMPANISTS. — In the following communication we cannot but recognize a fair refutation of our friend "Trovator's" wholesale slander against German accompanists.

NEW YORK, MARCH 1, 1859. — "Trovator" is amiable, good natured, &c. These are virtues and graces. But "Trovator" also commits sometimes amiable blunders. Thus in his letter, Jan. 18, 1859, occurs the following, viz:

To judge from many specimens of accompanying that may be heard at concerts in this city, this remark is not far from the truth. I don't mean to say that the accompanists always lose their place, or commit any decided blunders, but they are generally fearfully mechanical and automatic in their performances. I have rarely heard a German who could accompany better than a street organ. The German musician may be very wise, and overflowing with Bach, and gushing over with Gluck, and gorged with Beethoven, and actually choking with Mendelssohn, but he is generally no more able to accompany elegantly, than is the elephant to leap gracefully from tree to tree.

ARTHUR NAPOLEON is one of the few good accompanists I have heard. He at once appreciates the composer's meaning. HENRY C. TIMM is first-class — in every respect, a model accompanist, but sometimes too nonchalant and careless. THEODORE EISENBERG is much the same in style.

And what country produces good accompanists? Where shall a man go to obtain the art of accompanying? There is a German now living, Jules Benedict. Jenny Lind is a tolerably good singer. Will "Trovator" be kind enough to inquire of said singer, whether Mr. B. is a good accompanist.

We have in New York a Mr. H. C. Timm, who has accompanied most of the celebrated vocalists and stars who have appeared here within the last twenty years. Will "Trovator" be kind enough also to inquire of some of them.

But it is not so much with individualities that we have to deal, but with the assumption that "German Musicians rarely accompany better than a street organ." History itself is a perfect refutation to such a premise.

In "Trovator's" letter, dated Feb. 1, speaking of the Mendelssohn Union, occurs also the following:

Mr. Berge accompanied on the piano. He is one of the few really good accompanists we have, and is not sleepy in his style of playing.

Now I shall pitch into a German accompanist. Have we to learn that to thump and crash on a Piano the accompaniments of Mendelssohn, varying his (M's) magnificent piano scorings, so as at times entirely to obliterate the idea of Mendelssohn, is good accompanying? I am ready to testify to this in hearing the said Berge play the accompaniments of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm. Some of the members of the Mendelssohn Union do know this perfectly well, and spoke of it with regret. "Trovator" calls this "really good accompanying." It is true "he is not sleepy in his style of playing," but sleep itself would be a great relief. Mr. B. has energy and plays with earnestness, but he must confine himself more strictly to the text; and although doubling and trebling the parts might be desirable with a full chorus, yet the harmony itself should not be subject to sacrilege. There are some German accompanists in New York, who can teach "Trovator's" beau ideal how to accompany. S. L.

Israel in Egypt again.

Our Brooklyn correspondent thinks we failed to make out our case in citing the opinions of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., against the flippant condemnations of Handel and his masterwork by some of our newspaper critics. He thinks these great men might have admired "Israel," without considering it a fit work for "the masses." We thought we were careful enough to make it clear, that these authorities endorsed not merely the ingenuity, the "learning," but the beauty, the sublimity, the poetic inspiration, in short the music of the work. Do you suppose that men like Beethoven and Mozart could pronounce that a great work of Art, which had no other value than its learning? Do you suppose they looked at nothing but the form, the technical structure, the scientific part, that could be learned, acquired; or that any amount of such learning could make them indifferent to the absence of inspiring genius, of the soul of beauty, of imagination, of ideal meaning and divine expression? Be assured, such works as "Israel in Egypt," live by virtue of their music and not of their mathematics; their poetry and not their grammar; their human soul-to-soul-speaking Art, and not their learned complication; their meaning and their beauty and their godlike utterance, and not by their dexterous handling of square and rule.

Not fit for "the masses"! No really great thing is at first; all great things are in the long run, — sure to take hold of the general heart more and more as we grow familiar with them. Israel is admired, is vastly popular in England; and it delights many here, whom it repelled or failed to interest before they made a real effort to become acquainted with it.

Some of the critics, especially in New York, since the production there of Mr. Steepel's "Hiawatha" music, finding themselves pleased with it, are so absurd and childish as to raise an issue between that work and "Israel in Egypt"; and to throw out wise hints that the to-day's success of the last new wonder is to push the works of Bach and Handel, et id genus omne (would that we had in our day a little of the genius of that genus, dry and learned as you think them) into merited oblivion. They would run native Indian, as it were, against what is to them Egyptian darkness! Will not the very issue raise a laugh in all really musical regions? Like "Hiawatha" as much as you please — we also like it — but what in the name of Past or Future has that to do with "Israel in Egypt"! How can the success or failure of the one at all affect the other? Here is Fry, for instance, in the Tribune; he is speaking of "Hiawatha":

We consider it a valuable addition to the music of the Concert-room, and, the subject being picturesque and varied, it and other such works ought to take the place of the obsolete oratorios. One of these, by the way, we characterized as a supreme bore — and we are glad to find that the most intelligent of the Boston press, no less than four of them, having found the ice broken for the first time in regard to these Handelian periwig nuisances, are now for the first time saving a true æsthetic word in regard to them. The Boston Courier is closely logical; The Boston Transcript absolutely witty on the awful infliction of Handel's Israelites in Egypt, with its plagues of frogs, lice, and other delicious materials for music; about as lyrical as bootjacks and old clothes. This dismal rubbish set to twenty odd fugues, more or less, very skilful, and as lyrical as the multiplication table, is the sort of stuff that the rubricates would render eternal. But we are in America, not England; neither a George III. nor an Archbishop of Canterbury here can indorse a whole pile of crude musical forms, filled with much of the barbarism of the day, without even a good melody; wanting in essential logical progress; and with only occasionally a redemptory passage to fit it to modern ears. Mendelssohn may edit and may indorse it, and a due reverence for what is vast is essential to music as to politics or religion; but there is a point beyond which human endurance cannot go. Besides, Mendelssohn wrote for the English people, and placated duly Church and State. But his knowledge of effective dramatic vocal music never entitled him to play the supreme critic. He never had the force to write an opera, and so he took to the easy art of composing oratorios; oratorios based — shade of Pindar! — on prose extracts from the Bible, which, metreless, defy association with a single melody worth listening to.

On the subject of the choice of words there is no criticism, hence the ignorance of taking prose words helter skelter from the Bible, and supposing that anything really fit to be sung can be evolved therefrom. The radical Bible oratorio theory is false. It has no solid lyrical facts to sustain it. There are occasionally good pieces — some sublime; but the standpoint of such work is false. If music be metrical, the words must be, and the great mass of the words taken by oratorio writers from the Bible are not good. So think the public, who yawn under the infliction; and so think many of our best musicians, but they have not the courage to say so.

This is mere wayward freak and paradox. No man in his senses, surely, expects to be held seriously accountable for such talk as this. It may do a little momentary mischief; it may flatter the vanity of a few shallow-pated would-be amateurs and critics, the blind leaders of the blind. But it is answer enough to it to say, that it throughout proceeds upon the capital error of confounding form with substance; it judges Art mechanically. This is its argument: Because the means, the instruments, the forms of music have become improved somewhat, therefore the old masters necessarily wrote poorer music than we now write. As if genius were not genius in whatever form, or limits it may work. Handel with few instruments, within strict forms, wrote what inspires the world to this day. Berlioz, Liszt, and others, with enormous orchestras, and free to follow every tempting method of effect, still fail to give us music, fail to produce that which is edifying, that which the listening soul can love. Fry, if we mistake not, has had like experience in his own practical attempts at musical creation. The real criticism on his voluminous and rapidly produced scores has been, not that they were not learned, not that they overstepped old models and conventions, but that, whether with or in spite of their peculiar form, they lacked originality, lacked the vital charm of beauty. Were Handel writing here in our day, even on an Indian subject, free from the trammels of the fugue, and with all instruments at his disposal — writing Operas, or Symphonies, or Cantatas, or only songs, think you he would fail to breathe the breath of genius into them, and to charm with the same means by which those who scout him fail?

Musical Chit-Chat.

There will be no Afternoon Concert next Wednesday, the Music Hall being preoccupied. The next will take place Wednesday, March 16th. . . . The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB offers rare attractions for next Friday; among which Beethoven's Piano-forte Trio in D, op. 70, famous for its mystical "Geister" Adagio, to be played by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER; a Haydn Quartet; and a novelty — of course it will be good, being by Schubert — in the shape of a Quintet written with two cello parts.

A writer in the Boston Journal speaks very highly of Mr. Root's Operatic Cantata, "The Haymakers," which is to be produced on Wednesday night at Tremont Temple, under the auspices of Mr. J. R. MILLER. The work is no mere juvenile affair, but one of really quite highly pretensions, "needing only the addition of orchestral accompaniments to entitle it to the name of an opera." There will be a fine choir, fine solo-singers, Mr. LANG, as pianist, and the composer himself as conductor.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass, in G, has been performed in Albany, with great success, by a choir of over one hundred voices, and an orchestra of twenty, under the direction of Mr. LLOYD. The solo singing by Miss TERRY and Miss LILLIE BROWN is highly praised. . . . A Burlington, Vt. paper, while in ecstasies about BISCACCANTI's concert there, speaks of Mr. Wm. H. DENNETT, who sang Non più andrai, and other things, as "a basso only second to Formes." . . . The classic Music Society in New Orleans gave this capital programme recently: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, Beethoven; Overture to "Leonora" Beethoven; Aria from "Jerusalem," Verdi; Scherzo from Schubert's Symphony; Romanza; Overture to Freyschütz.

Of Pike's new Opera House in Cincinnati, a correspondent of the Philadelphia Journal states, that it is built over stores which will pay an annual rental of $20,000. The writer adds:

The interior is very fine, and very much in shape like Burton's Theatre, New York, and is, in fact, very elegant and spacious; but here we must stop, as the stage is not to be compared with either Boston, New York, or Philadelphia for a moment. The lobbies are narrow, being not over five or possibly six feet in width.

There are only three entrances to the house, and they are all to the same part, there being no gallery or upper tier, as in all the other houses before alluded to. These entrances are all on Fourth street. The centre or main one is twelve feet wide; the other two, eight feet each. These stairs are very steep, (for you must know that this "half-million" house is up stairs, and above the bazaars, or stores before mentioned,) difficult of ascent, and, in case of a crowd, would be exceedingly disagreeable, not to say dangerous.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY. — The second performance of St. Paul, on the 28th ult., was attended with fully the same success as the previous one, of which we had occasion to speak so highly. The only change in the executants was in the substitution of Mrs. Sunderland for Madame Rudersdorf in the soprano part. The Yorkshire songstress well sustained the reputation which she so justly earned in the Messiah, and her general rendering of the music was marked with a degree of intelligence which showed her thorough knowledge of the composer, while her fine voice told throughout with a very perceptible effect upon the audience. We would especially mention the air, "Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" and the recitative and air, "I will sing of Thy great mercies" (part 2). It was with difficulty that the attempted applause was suppressed in compliance with the Exeter Hall regulations which "taboo" any demonstration of the kind. This was equally the case in more than one instance with Mr. Sims Reeves's singing, which, despite the hoarseness he was evidently labouring under, was magnificent; and it was no wonder that the audience, roused to enthusiasm, broke through conventional etiquette, and gave vent to their feelings in an unmistakable manner. Signor Belletti and Miss Dolby, in their respective parts, were admirable; while to Mr. Willbye Cooper who sang some of the tenor recitatives, all praise must be awarded for his careful and artistic rendering of what was set down for him. The choruses were, if anything, an improvement upon the last time.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The fiftieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's birth-day, which occurred on Thursday—Mendelssohn having been born February the 3d, 1809—was celebrated by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, with a performance of Elijah, under the direction of Mr. Costa. The hall was crowded in every part. The occasion offered a satisfactory plea for the occasional disregard of the rules interdicting applause at these performances. And so the conductor seemed to think. A colossal bust of the great composer, modelled by Mr. Calder Marshall, was exhibited on a pedestal in front of the orchestra. The general impression conveyed to those who knew the composer was favorable. At all events the bust stood out in grateful contrast to the full length statue in the vestibule of the hall, the removal of which is desired by every lover of art, and which, were we iconoclasts, we should forthwith break in pieces. Among the principal solo singers were Madame Raders löff, Misses Dolby and Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Belletti.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A performance of Handel's Messiah took place, on Wednesday, January 26th, in the Lower Hall, Exeter Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss E. Hughes, Miss Hæk (her first appearance), Mrs. Dixon, Mr. Dyson (of St. George's Chapel, Windsor), and Mr. A. Thomas. M. Tolbecque was the principal violin; and Mr. Pettit, violoncello. The rest of the band and chorus consisted of friends and members of the Society, who deserve credit for giving a highly respectable performance of the oratorio. The orchestra and the hall were both full, and many went away unable to gain admission. Mr. Surman conducted.

PARIS.—Correspondence of London Mus. World, Jan. 22.—The revival of Rossini's Semiramide has been the only noticeable feature of recent occurrence at the Italiens. That Grisi should have abandoned one of her grimest impersonations—if not her grandest—in favor of Madame Penco, naturally surprised the public. No reason has been assigned; but it is just possible that Grisi may have objected to the new Assur, Signor Budiali, who, though an excellent artist and a good florid singer, is as little suited to the Assyrian usurper as to the Spanish libertine of Mozart. Semiramide, nevertheless, has had an immense success, principally owing to Alboni's reappearance in Arsace, which seems to have delighted beyond measure the subscribers to the Bouffes, who, after her alleged resignation of male characters, never expected to behold the great contralto again in this one of her most funous parts. Surprise, therefore, heightened the pleasure of hearing her sing those delicious strains with which she first enraptured the ears of the London and Parisian audiences. Alboni, it will be remembered, made her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera, as Arsace, in 1847, and the same season made her début at the Italiens in the same part. Although received on her entrance with marked frigidity by the Parisian public—ostensibly to exhibit their distrust of English favoritism—she had not sung a dozen bars of the opening air, "Eccomi in Babylonia," when she threw the audience into a ferment, and her reception throughout the entire performance was a perfect ovation. From that night Alboni became one of the greatest favorites that ever trod the boards of the Italiens. When she gave up her contralto parts, certain popular operas had to be laid aside altogether, among them, several of Rossini's finest—Semiramide, and La Donna del Lago, to wit.

Arsace is undoubtedly the most important part ever written for a contralto, and is as undoubtedly Alboni's most consummate achievement. Not only in the florid music with which the part abounds—and which no other living artist can sing like her—but in the grandeur and breadth of phrasing, so imperatively demanded in the first air and elsewhere, and in that freedom and largeness of style, too frequently incompatible with bravura singing, without which no artist could attempt the part, does Alboni prove herself transcendent. No wonder that such a performance, resigned for years, and never again anticipated, should have thrown the Parisian public into ecstasies. Such a crowd was not remembered at the Italiens as that which congregated the first night of Semiramide. Alboni was hailed with a perfect tempest of applause on her entrance, and the opening recitative of the air, "Eccomi in Babylonia," so eloquently breathed and so exquisitely modulated to the very tone of melting pathos, irresistibly carried away the audience and made them applaud in spite of their desire to listen. The two duets, that with Semiramide, and that with Assur—as far as Alboni was concerned—were both masterpieces of florid and energetic vocalization, and were received with manifestations of intense delight. In fine, Alboni's Arsace may be accepted as a great fact in the Italian Opera. It brings back the most accomplished of modern singers in her most consummate part, and it will tend to restore to the stage some of the too-much neglected masterpieces of the greatest of modern masters.

Madame Penco's Semiramide seems to have pleased many, and to have dissatisfied a few. All agree that she sang well; but the tragic grandeur and impetuosity were wanting. Signor Belart made his first appearance this season—rather late for so popular an artist, we opine—as Idreno, and made quite a hit. In Rossini's music, Signor Belart is invariably at home.

Martha has been revived, with Madame Frezzolini in the part of the heroine, vice Madlle. St. Urbain, and the rest of the characters as before, by Signors Mario, Graziani, and Zucchini, Madame Nantier Didiée, &c. Madame Frezzolini is a great improvement on Madlle. St. Urbain in Martha. She is a more brilliant and practised singer, and acts with far more point and tact. The Irish air, "The Last Rose of Summer," most sweetly sung, was enthusiastically applauded. Mario was as fine as ever in the part of Lionel. Signor Graziani, as usual, found infinite favor in the eyes of the audience, and Signor Zucchini was more energetic than amusing as the amorous old Viscount.

Feb. 5.—Rossini's Matilda di Shabran has been revived at the Italiens, with Madame Penco, as Matilda; Madame Nantier-Didiée, the Page Edoardo; Madame Cambardi, the Countess d'Arc; Signor Belart, Conradino; Signor Zucchini, Isidoro; and Signor Corsi, the Doctor. This admirable work has been received with great enthusiasm, although the remembrance of Bosio and Ronconi was not effaced by Madame Penco and Signor Zucchini. Signor Belart was scarcely equal to the ferocious man-harper Corradino, but he sang the florid music with wonderful skill, and was greatly applauded in the opening air. Madame Nantier-Didiée is admirable in Edoardo, and Signors Zucchini and Corsi are both excellent as the poet and the doctor. In consenting to undertake so small a part as that of the Countess d'Arc, Madame Mathilda Cambardi has set a good example to all the artists in the establishment. Although of talent deemed equal to Elvira in Ernani, this lady does not think it beneath her to accept a subordinate character in one of Rossini's operas. The début of Mademoiselle Sarolta was looked for with great curiosity, the lady being represented as possessed of singular personal attractions. The wisdom of the management was not displayed in selecting the part of Leonora, in the Traviata, for the fair Hungarian, who, with a great deal of talent, and much physical power, is not yet sufficiently accomplished to essay so arduous a character. Her youth, nevertheless, turned the scale in her favor, and she was received with favor. Mr. E. T. Smith has secured Madlle. Sarolta for his approaching season of Italian opera. The Drury Lane manager, however, must take a hint, and select a part better suited to her than Leonora.

The friends of M. Sainton will be delighted to hear that his success in this capital has been triumphant. He played at the first concert of the Jeunes Artistes, and on Wednesday gave a concert, with full orchestra, at the Salle Herz, which was crowded with some of the most notable amateurs and connoisseurs in Paris. This eminent violinist played, by special desire, Mendelssohn's concerto, which was so eminently successful at the Jeunes Artistes, besides several works of his own composition—"Romance," "Tarantella," and "Fantasia, on Rigoletto." Both as executant and composer M. Sainton was greatly admired, and each of his performances listened to with rapt attention, and received with unbounded applause. M. Sainton was more than once recalled. He was assisted by Sig. Gardoni and Mad. Anna Bertini, as vocalists. The band was under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. M. Sainton, according to the Orphéon, was "the laureat pupil of the first class of old Habeneck."

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

In silence, sad heart, go. Cavatina in Balfe's opera of "Satanella." 50

A pathetic and impressive strain in the form of a song. The instrumental prelude to this piece, which is printed entire, has been much admired in London. Soprano voice.

Luleanna. Song and Chorus. L. V. H. Crosby. 30
Sung with applause at the entertainments of Morris Brothers minstrels.

Come to me, gentle dreams. W. T. Wrighton. 25
A sweet song of easy performance, for voices of little compass.

Sweet Eve of Rest. Song. S. Glover. 25
Pretty and taking, like most of this author's songs.

I know not why I love thee. C. Gustave Fitze. 25
An agreeable parlor-song.

O sing to me that gentle song. J. H. McNaughton. 25

Farewell. Song. J. F. Duggan. 25

Norah and Barney. Langton Williams. 25
Three decidedly pretty songs, the two first of a sentimental, the last of a light and semi-comical cast.

Instrumental Music.

Impromptu. Theodor Hagen. 40

Allegro agitato in four-four time. Highly interesting. It is written for a solid school of playing rather than in the modern parlor-style. The author is well known by a long literary career (as musical critic) partly in Europe, connected there with the Leipsic Musical Journal "Signale," and more recently in this country, connected with both the New York Musical Review and the Philadelphia German musical paper. The piece is dedicated to William Mason.

L'Andalousc. Grand Valse brillante. E. Wolff. 35

A highly effective piece, a chain, as it were, of the most sparkling, taking melodies in waltz time. Of medium difficulty.

L'Eclair. Nocturne. Joseph Ascher. 40

An elaborate transcription of that celebrated Romanza from the above-named opera by Hælevy, in Ascher's inimitably graceful style. Not difficult.

STUDIES FOR THE PIANOFORTE. For the further perfecting of advanced pianists; consisting of 24 characteristic pieces, in the different major and minor keys: with fingering, and explanatory remarks upon the object and manner of performing each. By Ign. Moscheles. Op. 70. New edition, improved by the author. In two books. Book I. 2.50

This work has the merit of being the fruit of long experience and much study. The author does not pretend to have made a work entirely new; but, after a deep study of the compositions of the great masters, after becoming imbued with their principles, he has given free course to his own thought, without imposing on it any guide except the knowledge of the instrument, whose resources seem to him unlimited. He does not design this work for persons who have only acquired a moderate degree of power on the piano, but for those whose talent is formed by the productions of the best masters, and who are much at home upon the instrument. To profit by these exercises, therefore, it requires not only previous studies; it requires, besides, that kind of execution, which results from taste and sensibility: for it is not so much the end of the author to perfect the mechanism of the fingers, as to address the imagination of the pianist, and enable him to express the sentiments and passions with all the delicate nuances that characterize them: in a word, to give him all the qualities which we are accustomed to designate by the collective term, style.

Beethoven.

Alp in the realm of tone! to that false soul
Who seeks to exalt himself, while lauding thee, —
With vain display of critic mystery
Obscuring thine oracular thunder-roll, —
Thy heights sublime in truth no more unfold
Than windy plains that blow him every way,
Paths that his feet perplexed lead far astray,
And crags that blind him with their scurful cold.
But he who seeks sincere thy sovereign fane,
Walks with the mountain spirit's majesty;
For him, dark clefts their hidden flowers contain;
And from some peak divine, he, blest! may see,
Beyond the verge of this low sensual plain,
The spreading wonders of infinity.

Letter of Rev. Habakuk Lot to the Editor of the Journal of Music.

POPTOWN, FEB. 28, 1859.

Honored and respected Sir:

I presume that the poetic ability of my townsman, Mr. Anserus Esel, class leader and exhorter, as exhibited in the poet's corner of the Poptown Illuminator, cannot fail to have attracted your notice. You must have been struck by the beauty of the versification and the delicacy of sentiment, which pervades all his compositions. But above all is the vein of true religious feeling, which runs through all the productions of his genius. You may perhaps remember the piece, which went anonymously the round of the country newspaper press, and will need no farther testimonial to Mr. Esel's talent, when I inform you that it was from his pen. I refer to the following:

SUMMER CLOUDS.

Oh summer clouds, why fly ye so?
Why won't you wait a bit?
The wind doth rise, away ye go.—
So earthly pleasures flit!

Oh Summer clouds, how bright ye are,
A-sailing to and fro!
You're naught but fog although so fair—
Our earthly joys, jest so.

Oh Summer clouds, ye shine an hour
And then your beauty fades,
So clouds of sorrow on us lower,
And sinners go to Hades.

The schoolmaster objects to the last word, on the ground that it should be pronounced in two syllables. But if f, a, d, e, s, spells fades, why should not H, a, d, e, s spell Hades? Still, if the schoolmaster is right, we can make the last line,

"And sinners flit like shades."

But to the object of this letter.

Having had proofs of the great literary ability of Mr. Anserus Esel, class leader and exhorter, I have availed myself of it to carry out a long cherished idea, one which, in the pressure of my pastoral duties, and through distrust of my poetic abilities, I have been unwilling to undertake alone. To explain myself more clearly, it is proper to state how the idea originated.

I was formerly in the habit of devoting many of my winter evenings to the business of teaching singing school, — and, as I flatter myself, with no little success. I noticed that many of the most popular tunes among my pupils, in the "Holy Banjo," the "Sacred Jewsharp," the "Religious Bagpipes," and other collections, which we used, were "arranged from the works of the greatest masters;" and some, which were especial favorites, were the profane strains of operas baptized, so to speak, with Scripture names and sanctified to the use of the church by having sacred words placed under them. Having afterward turned my attention to theological studies, it occurred to me that a great service might be done to the church by arranging poetry for her use, as the singing book makers have done with music.

At first my idea went no farther than thus to arrange the sublime thoughts of Milton and Young, of Pollok and Tupper; but meeting somewhere the admirable remark, variously attributed to Wesley and Whitfield, that "there was no reason why the devil should have all the good music," I felt at once that there is just as little reason why the devil should have all the good poetry. I therefore extended my plan, so as to include in our collection of "Hymns, arranged, &c." pieces adapted from Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and other dramatists, intending these, particularly, to be sung to tunes arranged from operas, and arranging them in metre and rhythm accordingly.

I flatter myself that the combined labors of Mr. Esel and myself, during which we have spared no pains nor expense, will be found upon examination to have produced a collection of hymns and sacred songs, utterly unrivalled for variety, for good taste, for rhetorical diversity, for elegance of expression, for depth of religious sentiment, in short, for every quality which should distinguish the poetry of the church.

When we consider that the essence both of music and poetry — that which makes words to be poetry, and concordant sounds music, in any high sense — is the expression of feeling and sentiment, it is clear, that arrangements and adaptations in both cases stand or fall upon precisely the same grounds. Now, as the practice of all sects — or nearly all — from the Catholics of Vienna and Paris with their operatic Masses, to the humble worshippers of the backwoods village or the plantation, with their popular melodies — sanctions the stealing of the devil's music, I contend that we are doing God service in stealing also his poetry.

Our first volume is now ready for publication, containing 976 hymns and sacred songs. Upon consultation with Mr. Esel and the elders of our meeting, we concluded, that in the present dearth of good hymns and hymnbooks, there would naturally be a great competition among publishers for the honor and profit of publishing this book, and that it would be best to give some public notice of our work and await proposals from various leading firms in the large cities.

After receiving a bare pecuniary remuneration for the time, labor, and expenses which we have incurred, whatever profits thereafter may accrue will be devoted to building up the waste places of Zion. I am preparing also a book of tunes to go with the hymn-book, consisting entirely of arrangements. Hence I have thought proper to make my first announcement of our collection of hymns in the Journal of Music.

I will only add a single stanza from two or three of our poetic arrangements, as specimens of the elegant manner in which Mr. Esel has solved the problem entrusted to him.

450. IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

8 line L. M.

Arranged from ADDISON.

It must be so — 'tis reasoned well;
Else whence this pleasing, fond desire?
Or whence this dread of death and hell,
Which does the trembling soul inspire?
Why on herself thus shrinks the soul,
All startled at destruction dire?
Thus Heaven itself doth us control
And point us to a somewhat higher!

&c., &c.

771. THIS WORLD AND THE OTHER.

9s and 8s metre.

Arranged from GAY.

How happy could I be in either
Were t'other dear charmer away!
But while they invite me together,
I know not which voice to obey.
Sing Glory, Hallelujah, &c.

801. HYMN FOR A TEMPERANCE MEETING.

8s and 9s metre.

Arranged from GOLDSMITH.

The words of the preacher come down
And show us that drinking is sinful;
Nevermore from the sole to the crown
Of liquor will we have a skinful.
Repenting, we give him our pence,
And turn from our grog to religion,
And feel of new joy such a sense,
As Noah felt seeing his pigeon.

With a glory, hallelujah, &c.

That is, when the pigeon brought the olive leaf — which fact is to be stated in a note, at the bottom of the page, Mr. Esel not succeeding in bringing into the line the idea of the said olive leaf.

Although, Mr. Editor, I can but admit that the thought of "filthy lucre" has been sometimes in my mind during the preparation of this volume, and the idea that its sale may possibly enable me to swap my old white horse, for Deacon Abram's 240 sorel colt, yet my principal satisfaction arises in view of the vast amount of spiritual and everlasting good to my fellow mortals, which I am destined to effect. My feelings, at times, are too great for utterance, and can only vent themselves in the words of the sweet singer of Poptown, thus: —

653. WEALTH AND GOODNESS.

C. M.

Arranged from Goldsmith.

Dwell not my heart on outward show,
In goodness go it strong.
Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long!

In conclusion, Mr. Dwight, should you incline to aid us in circulating our book, by looking over the manuscript, and suggesting such alterations as may, perhaps, notwithstanding all our care, be still advisable, we are willing to make such compensation as is right and proper.

With all due respect, your devoted servant,

Rev. HABAKUK LOT,
Pastor at Poptown.

Musical Legislators.

(From the New York Tribune, Jan. 29.)

There is a very rare quotation from Shakespeare which some of our erudite readers may have chanced to meet once or even twice, and which distinctly asserts that music has great power in soothing the savage breast, and that it is in fact the sovereignest queller of passions ever invented. This, we admit, has, up to this time, been regarded as a fanciful speculation or a pretty theory, as our Orphic signors, signoras and signorinas have preferred drawing dollars into the treasury of the Academy—dollars speedily and remorselessly reclaimed—to trying their head, throat and chest-notes upon our forests and our quarries. But what, in this practical age, is even the divine Art of Music—some call it a Science, and some call it both Art and Science—worth, if we cannot reduce it to plain, positive and indisputable utility? Something of this we have already accomplished. There was the screaming, yelling, howling, phthisical, demoniacal and altogether dreadful emissions of the Railway Callopie, which, to the apprehension of dislocation, added the actuality of deafening, and kept us in mind of our latter end. There were the brass bands which enable our glittering and gorgeous warriors to sustain, without any devastating mortality, that awful Anabasis from Union square to the Park, and which are, to our veteran regiments, what the bag-pipes were to the callow Highlanders in the Indian campaigns. There are the hand-organs—organs, indeed, of a judicious Providence, which, through such instruments, inculcate the beatitudes of patience and long-suffering. There is the accordeon played by weak-minded youth at the open casements on midsummer nights. There is your neighbor who, late in life, has commenced the study of the fiddle, under the impression that he had nothing to do but to buy a Cremona made last year, a box of strings, two pounds of rosin, the treatises of Spohr, Kreutzer, De Beriot and Rode, in order to make himself the cynosure of all concert-rooms and the rival of Viouxtemps and Sivioli. There is the amorous young gentleman who does Nicholsonian variations upon a silver-keyed flute presented to him by his grandmamma, and who gives us the most wonderful and involuntary double staccato. There is the young woman, with the seven-octave piano-forte, who is so prettily pp. and so furiously ff., who alternately feels softly the keys and then fights them, and who plays Thalberg's "Moses" quite as well as she plays the first lesson in Bertini. There are artists who affect the Jew's harp (or jaw's harp, as it should be written), and artists who finger disconsolate banjos, and artists who favor us in the stilly night with gems from the African Opera, or even from the resonant haunts of the Italian Academicians, and who whistle what they cannot sing. These nuisances, like all earthly nuisances, have their uses, and from these seeming evils we may still educe good.

But, it is in that far off and almost fabulous land known as "Down East," whence come washing machines and the whole century of inventions, that Music is employed to some purpose indeed. There the Legislature has taken up the matter in earnest. We learn that the Senators and Representatives of the State of Maine now assemble in the Capitol, and, before proceeding to their graver duties, sing sacred music together for an hour. We notice this latest artistic and political novelty, because we do very highly approve its introduction, and consider it a most commendable innovation. We have it upon the authority of an ancient poet, whose name has escaped us, that there are none so rare as can compare with the Sons of Harmony; and it is not to be supposed that, after these melodious recreations, when the leader has left the chair to Mr. Speaker, that, in the most fiery or in the most fussy debate, the tenor will call the basso no gentleman, or give the lie to the soft-voiced ally who has just so nobly sustained him in alt. After a strict attention to musical measures, will not the patriot be fitted for political measures? Will he not more accurately understand the value of a crochet? Or will he, as some may think, be more likely to quaver, when in the dilemma of the Yeas and Nays?

For our own part, we think so well of this musical idea, that we should like to have it tested for a single session in Washington. Why should not Mr. Speaker intone the House to order? Why should not gentlemen give notice of a resolution in a chant, or ask leave to make a motion con dolore? Most of the speeches are so bad said that they certainly would be better sung. Many and many a time have we seen, when a fiddle-bow in the hands of the presiding officer would have been quite as impressive as his hammer. Many and many a time, in the House, we have felt that the immediate introduction and plentitudinous play of forty bands of brass, would bring a comparative silence like the silence of Sahara. Why should not the "Yeas" vote in full chorus? Why should not the "Nays" bellow responsively? He would be but a poor captor verborum who should object that we cannot sing through the eyes and should not sing through the nose. How beautifully might the business of the House be arranged by Mr. Fry or some other American composer who understands both politics and music! How easy would it be to adapt the Italian melodies to Jefferson's Manual. First reading, largo; second reading, andante; third reading, prestissimo. First debate, grave; second debate, allegro ma non troppo; third debate, fugato; as nothing new would be sung, fourth debate, forzando; fifth debate, a la militaire; sixth debate, con fuoco rapidamente sempre crescendo, and then, if members must break each other's heads, there would be a fair chance that they would do it tenderly and delicately. The motion for final adjournment might be given in the melody of "Home, Sweet Home," and how would the people thunder back "Gloria in Excelsis!"

But one difficulty presents itself. Who, save Meyerbeer, could write music for the President's Annual Message? And how many years would it take that unwearied, patient, and most industrious master to marry Mr. Buchanan's platitudinous elongations to immortal music?

Peeps in Italian Papers.

No. I.

BY TROVATORE.

In a country where so much attention is devoted to operatic affairs as Italy, operatic newspapers are a necessity, and in all the large cities such journals—usually weeklies—are published. Operatic newspapers, I call them, and such they are—not musical, but operatic papers. They are filled with little notices of what this egregious soprano is doing at Florence, and what that incredible tenor is occupied with at Rome. From every little city and town of Italy they gleam some scrap of operatic intelligence, and while they never enter upon learned or even intelligent criticism, they form an agreeable melange of operatic items. The expressions are often curiously hyperbolic, and the importance with which very insignificant bits of information are paraded in their columns, is really amusing to those familiar with the large English and American newspapers. At Florence several of these musical papers are published, being invariably four-page quartos. At Turin, Il Trovatore, the prominent semi-weekly musical journal contains a page of illustrations à la Charavari, which are not confined to musical subjects. For instance, in a recent number, there is depicted the "stratagem that must be used by the readers of the Tuscan Monitor, to peruse that journal after its contemplated enlargement; the picture represents the newspaper stretching over a vast expanse of ground, while several horsemen are galloping over it, leaning down and reading as they scurry along. This is not a bad hit on some of our own "blanket sheets."

I purpose sending you, semi-occasionally, bits of operatic gossip, from my Italian files, and as almost every operatic singer of reputation has visited or expects to visit this country, their doings may prove of interest to some of your readers. And so I would at once have you look over my shoulder, through American spectacles, at my Italian newspapers.

There is a tenor with the queer name of Irfé—Signor Irfé—who has been singing at Trieste, the streets of which are more like those of London, than any city on the continent. His admirers have presented him with a service of plate, with the inscription: "To the distinguished merit of the valiant tenor Ettore Irfé, from a few citizens of Trieste, January, 1859."

At Catania, Verdi's Simon Boecanegra has met with great success.

It is the custom in Italy to name the theatres after some distinguished literary or musical personage. There is a new Ristori theatre at Verona and they are now building the Niccolini theatre at Sesto, a little Tuscan town.

At Vicenza, a city of palaces built almost entirely by Sansovino, the architect; a Signora Amalia Fumagalli has created a sensation in Sonnambula.

At Piacenza, a little Lombard town, that beautiful creature Vestvali has been singing in Trovatore.

At Rome, Verdi's Giovanni di Guzman, Donizetti's Elisa Fosco (to the music of Lucrezia) have been played at the Apollo theatre with Madame Jullienne as prima donna. Beaucarde, a six-footer, and a glorious tenor, for whom Verdi wrote Trovatore, has appeared at the Valle Theatre in Don Pasquale. A critic says of Jullienne, that she debuted in Buondelmonte, and that the timbre of her voice is stupendous; that she has extraordinary power and compass, and a correct method, of the best school.

At Naples, Donizetti's Maria Padilla, a work quite unknown here, has been played with but moderate success; indeed, it seems a precursor of the oblivion to which Donizetti's works will be, in time, consigned, to hear this opera described by Neapolitan critics, which cannot longer please, because musical taste is changed, and the music of Padilla is not suited to our times. The same opera has recently failed at Palermo.

At Nice, that splendid artist, Boccabodati, the finest Linda I have ever seen, has been singing with acceptance in Don Pasquale. Boccabodati is a wonderful artist and would create a sensation here.

At Genoa, Donizetti's Don Sebastian is meeting success. At its first production there, the first act passed in silence; the second brought applause for the prima donna, Lamaire; while the third, fourth, and especially the fifth, secured the success of the piece. Parepa, (who sang last season in London,) had appeared in I Lombardi and Lucia, with Limberti. This Limberti is a fine singer. He has a high, sympathetic tenor voice, and is a good actor. Often have I heard his penetrating voice at the opera in Florence, and wondered why he was not better known. He seems gradually working his way north, and may in time, reach Paris, London, and even Boston and New York.

At Brescia—how well I remember it, with its quiet, sleepy streets, its neat little museum, built amid the ruins of an old Roman temple, its grass grown walls, and its picture-gallery with one cabinet picture, savagely claimed to be a genuine Raphael — at Brescia, Pacini's Stoffo is being played.

At Florence, in the fashionable theatre, La Pergola, Mercadante's Giuramento is the attraction. At the popular Teatro Ferdinando, commonly called the Pagliano, after its owner, a successful quack doctor, Il Barbiere is on the boards. Pacini's latest opera, Saltimbico, in which a baritone, Rossi-Ghelli, finds great success, has also been produced at La Pergola.

Prati is a little shabby town, about fifteen miles from Florence. Like all cities of Italy it is surrounded by huge walls, though there is nothing in it that is worth walling up. The new railroad from Leghorn to Florence has obliged the citizens to make a huge gap in their wall, and there is something suggestive, if not poetic, in the iron horse thus forcing for itself a passage through massive blocks of stone, that have stood unharmed for centuries. They have a little theatre in this little town; and a little prima donna named Papini-Steller, is singing in Ernani.

Forlì is a horribly stupid place, near the centre of Italy. The present Pope was once Bishop of Forlì, and Orsini, the would-be assassin of Napoleon III., was born there. They have a good opera-house in Forlì, and Donizetti's Linda was the attraction at latest dates, a Signora Rebusini being prima donna. Sonnambula and Scaramuccia (by Ricci) are the other operas of the season.

At Madrid, Giuglini is singing with Elisa Kennett, a beautiful English girl, as the prima donna. I have before written to the Journal about this lady. She sang last year at Florence, and with a rich voice and careful regard to stage requirements is winning a good reputation.

Rimini is a glorious old place. Indeed there are none of the smaller towns of Italy that surpass it in general interest. Once the resort of philosophers and authors, the seat of a singularly refined court, it was in the fifteenth or sixteenth century the most attractive city on the south western coast of Italy. To be sure it is rather a forlorn place now, and the faithless Adriatic, that once washed its very walls, and formed a harbor for its fleet, has now retired a distance of nearly a mile, leaving a dismal marsh between its waters and the city. Yet they are not all asleep in Rimini, for the beautiful new opera house, built in '57, is a proof of unexpected go-ahead-iveness. Now a Signora with the preposterously long name of Ruggero Antoniolio is exciting the good folks of Rimini in Traviata, an opera, which in Italy is usually known by the name of Violetta.

Sketch of the Life of Beethoven.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

(Greatly extended, by the writer (for the London Musical World) from an article in the Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography.)

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, the illustrious musician, was born at Bonn, 17th December, 1770, and died at Vienna, 26th March, 1827.

A groundless rumor for some time prevailed that he was the natural son of the King of Prussia; but, at considerable pains, he proved himself to be the lawful child of Johann Beethoven, a tenor singer in the chapel of the electoral prince in his native town, in which establishment his grandfather, after whom he was named, and who was also a composer, sang bass. For the memory of this latter, although he died when the boy was but three years old, Beethoven, in after life, had a high veneration, and he treasured his portrait as a most valuable relic. The feeling of the grandson may be accounted for by the intemperate habits of his father, who could thus elicit no respect; and his strong sense of reverence having no present stimulus, attached him to an ideal, of which he could not recollect the original.

He had an elder brother, Ludwig Maria, who died in his infancy; and two younger, Casper Anton Carl, who became a teacher of the pianoforte, and Nicolaus Johann, who followed the trade of a druggist.

Whatever the professional ability and personal irregularities of his father, the position of this choir singer was such as to give Beethoven the advantage, enjoyed by all the greatest musicians, of becoming familiar, in his earliest infancy, with music, and receiving his first impressions from it: his organization had thus immediate opportunity for development, and he at once gave tokens of a strong natural disposition for the art he conspicuously advanced.

His father, hoping to improve the slender means of the family by the display of the child's ability, was the first to undertake his technical training; but dissipation rendered him an unfit instructor. The boy's studies were, however, assisted by Pfeiffer, an oboe player and director of a military band, to whom in after years he made the kindest acknowledgement of the obligations he owed him. He evinced so remarkable a talent, as to attract the attention of the reigning elector, the Archduke Maximilian, at whose charge he received lessons of Van der Eider, the court organist, and, at his death, of his successor, Neefe. Beethoven's restless disposition rendered steady practice irksome to him; and his father's impatience at this increased his distaste for application. He, however, progressed so rapidly, that at eight years old he was already remarkable for his playing of the figures of Sebastian Bach.

His three sonatas, written when he was ten years old, prove his early acquaintance with the principles of musical construction, and show a fluency of thought, which, though rendered in the idiom of the time, is not without indications of originality. These interesting productions, as well as some songs and piano-forte variations, were printed in 1783. Sterkel, a pianist of some repute in his day, on seeing the variations, questioned the ability of their author to play them; whereupon Beethoven not only executed his printed piece, but improvised upon the same theme, in imitation of the manner of his sceptical critic, proving at once his agile finger and his prompt invention. This is the earliest anecdote of his marvellous extemporaneous power, which afterwards became one of the most remarkable manifestations of his genius, and which he often exercised with still more pointed pertinence to the occasion than in the present instance.

Coincident with his progress on the pianoforte and in composition, was his practice of the violin, which, if it led to no notable proficiency, enabled him to write most effectively for string instruments throughout his career.

His father's dissolute life seems to have excluded the best domestic influences from his home; but he found a circle of true and genial friends in the family of Breuning, one of whom, Stephan, his boyhood's playmate, remained his attached friend through life, watched his last moments, was appointed his executor, and died very soon after him. This friendship had occasional raptures — one caused by rivalry in a youthful love affair; but it was too full of the fond associations of their early times to be ever permanently broken. For Leonore, Stephan's sister, Beethoven also entertained a brotherly affection, and her husband, Dr. Wegeler, was one of those to whom he wrote at periods of his residence at Vienna with implicit confidence. His first connection with this family was in the capacity of teacher, the duties of which he always discharged with the utmost repugnance. The whimsical pretences which, many years afterwards, he was wont to make to evade giving his lessons to the Archduke Rudolf were prompted by the inveterate dislike to teaching which thus early proved itself; he would often go to the Breunings' house with the purpose of attending to his pupils, when his resolution would fail him, and he would leave some excuse at the door, deferring his appointment till the morrow. The widow Von Breuning not only forgave his constant dereliction, but, with parental kindness, encouraged his companionship of her children, amongst whom he became familiar with literature, and so made up for the scanty education he had received at the free school.

Before the completion of his fifteenth year, the elector appointed Beethoven organist of his chapel. In this situation he played off one of those practical jokes for which, to the last, he had an especial relish, in contusing a singer who chanted the Lamentations in Passion Week, by changing the key in the accompaniment during a sustained note of the voice; the compromised chanter complained of this trick to the elector; but the young organist had too good a friend in his patron from childhood for him to punish this offence, further than by an official reprimand, which was rather a compliment to his talent than a disgrace of his abuse of it. The genial humor, which is one of the most prominent characteristics of Beethoven's writing — such as we find expressed in the scherzo of his pianoforte and violin Sonata in F; in the last movement of his Pianoforte Concerto in G, and of his Solo Sonata in the same key, Op. 79; in that of his Symphony in F; and in many other instances — showing a love of fun and a capacity for witicism that has rarely been, and never so fully, embodied in music — is powerfully illustrated by this personal trait of the composer, which stopped not at practical jesting, but led him to indulge in every kind of facetia that presented itself to his vivacious fancy. We can well suppose him — whose conversation abounded with bons mots and repartee, who exulted in mock-heroic grandiloquence, and who would risk a friendship rather than forego a banter — absolutely laughing aloud as he set down on paper some of the movements that have been cited, and chuckling over them with an unctuous enjoyment as absorbing as the glowing rapture in which he revealed his loftiest inspirations.

He had at this time another patron besides the elector, in Count Waldstein — to whom he subsequently dedicated his Sonata in C, Op. 53 — at whose instance it was that the elector gave him the appointment, which, as his talented teacher, Neefe, was still in the full exercise of his powers, and so had no need of an assistant, was but the graceful pretext for paying him a salary, and so relieving his limited circumstances.

Beethoven wrote the music, of which the count had the credit, for a ballet represented by the nobility at the court; but he was more than repaid for this act of youthful self-denial, by being, at his patron's instigation, sent in 1787 on a mission to Vienna, where he became acquainted with Mozart, and indeed received some lessons from him. The great musician promptly perceived the indications of extraordinary power in his young disciple; but he had not the opportunity to benefit him further than by his illustrious example, and by the emulation that induced, in consequence of Beethoven's early return to Bonn, occasioned probably by the illness of his mother, who died in this year.

For her he had a fond affection; and in the grief of the moment, which was aggravated by pecuniary embarrassment, Franz Ries, the violinist — who, with Bernard Romberg and himself, was engaged as chamber musician to the elector — showed him such timely sympathy as he could never forget: — "Tell your father," said Beethoven, to the son of his old friend, when he brought him at Vienna an introduction from the violinist, "that I remember the death of my mother." We may suppose that from their various characters, in his intercourse with his parents, he made the experience of both affection and contradiction, which, only, could have implanted the tenderness and the fretful irritability which were afterwards as conspicuous in his personality as in his works.

M. Schindler has a story of Beethoven's writing a cantata for performance at a breakfast given to Haydn, by the members of the Electoral Chapel, on this composer's "return" from England, in 1790. The discrepancy between the date and the occasion referred to it — (Haydn came to England in 1790) — is sufficient to invalidate the anecdote; further than this, the biographer naively states that no vestige of the cantata remains, and that Beethoven himself knew nothing of the composition or of the occurrence.

Shortly after the completion of his twenty-first year, through the liberality of the elector, Beethoven made his second visit to Vienna, where he found so many advantageous opportunities that his return was repeatedly deferred, until he decided to make the Austrian capital his permanent residence. His father died in this year, and he was now launched in the world, with no care but for his art and for his own progress in it. Mozart was no more; but his influence was perhaps stronger than when he was personally present to exert it; thus the highest class of music was in general esteem, and the most aspiring genius found ready recognition and cordial encouragement.

The Baron von Swieten — who engaged Mozart to instrument the Messiah, and who furnished Haydn with the text of the Creation — had, at this time, frequent musical performances, in which Beethoven constantly participated; and the Prince Liechnowsky was ever ready to receive him as a guest, and to create opportunities for the display of those brilliant abilities, which it was no little merit in him to appreciate. Further, the prince settled upon Beethoven an annuity of 600 florins, to be continued till he should obtain an official appointment; but this was only one among countless services that his truly noble family rendered to the artist, which Beethoven acknowledged, in his dedications to him and to his brother, Count Moritz, of several of his most important works. The prince proved, indeed, a most cordial zeal for the musician, in his tolerance of the countless caprices of his client, who bore his favors so gracelessly, as often to dine at a tavern rather than submit to the restraint of dressing, and of punctual presence at the prince's table, and to give many other such whimsical tokens of independence.

Another distinguished patron of Beethoven, during his first years at Vienna, was Count Brown, a gentleman of Irish extraction, but of Russian birth, and a functionary of that government. To him, and to his wife, are dedicated several important works; among others, the pianoforte sonata in B flat, Op. 22. One of the acknowledgments the Count made to the composer for these compliments, which secure an enduring immortality to his name, was the gift of a valuable horse. Beethoven, for a short time, took great pleasure in this present; he then neglected it, and would have forgotten it entirely, had not his servant, who had continually let the horse on hire for his own advantage, one day brought him a long bill of arrears for fodder.

A Plea for the Ravels and for Fun.

(From the Cincinnati Gazette.)

Whoever loves fun, real genuine unmistakable fun—whoever enjoys whatever is grotesque in situation and absurd, and illogical and contradictory—whoever believes in the necessity and use of nonsense—let him not fail to see the Ravels.

Ever, since 1830, or thereabouts, the Ravels—fathers, brothers, uncles, wives, wives' brothers and connexions of one degree or another, have been making the universal Yankee nation laugh. What imminent dyspepsias have they averted! What numberless legions of Blue Demons have they put to flight! For there is nothing like a hearty laugh to put these Demons to flight, and keep the gnawing wolf of dyspepsia from the vitals.

As a nation, we don't have fun enough. We say fun; for the Americans have the only satirists living (vide North British Review) and that malicious wit, which is pointed and barbed, and venomous, we have enough of, and to spare. But of that fun which has no purpose but gratification, we have little. Physical sport we don't understand. A dozen men can't go rowing about the river for the sake of rowing. They must have a rival boat to race with, a set of colors to win, a siver pitcher to contend for. Look at the exercise of our boarding schools; melancholy young women or straight-laced boys, trooping like a funeral procession over the dustiest and least picturesque road in the region, walking a mile and back from "a sense of duty!" There isn't a sadder spectacle this side of the chain-gang! What we need is something that shall amuse. We think too hard and too incessantly. And we resort to all manner of pernicious stimulants to keep our brain constantly vigorous and keen.

So we grow dyspeptic and die young, or live invalids till our life becomes a misery to others and ourselves. Just that which is wanting is Fun—that indescribable offspring of Humor which we all recognize, though we can't name his features. We need—

"Sport that wrinkled care derides, to walk over this broad land and alternate with speculation and deep-browed thought and restless ambition, in the attention of our people. Puritanism, Asceticism, are all very well in their way and their day, but their way and their day are not forever, and everywhere. When the great temporal or spiritual interests of men are endangered, it is very well to be grave and sedate and deliberate, till the battle is fought out. But we must not forget that the greatest of reformers was one of the jolliest of men, and that his opponents say that "all Luther's table-talk was about wine and women." Of course that statement is an exaggeration. But a caricature fixes a truth, sometimes, more closely than a didactic and accurate proposition, and though the grim earnestness with which some men fight is terrible to the foe, the most dangerous fighting animal now-a-days is your Zouave, who runs up to the cannon with a song in his mouth, and is equally ready to play a part in a comedy or storm a fort.
And Laughter holding both his sides."

Man is the laughing animal! Some naturalists say he is the only laughing animal. Others say that the dog alone, of all man's subjects, possesses this trait of his master. Be that as it may. Man laughs. He has muscles which were designed for no other purpose than laughter. And it is a crime not to use every faculty which our Maker has given us. Therefore do we appeal in behalf of the much neglected risibles. "Laugh and grow fat," says the maxim. Laugh and do your duty, say we.

Physiologists will tell you that one great evil in men and women is the faulty oxygenation of their blood. We breathe too much through our nostrils and clenched teeth. The broad, hearty laugh throws the mouth open wide, gives the lungs great capacious draughts of air and consequent oxygen, and everybody who has ever tried it, knows very well that after laughing heartily he feels younger, fresher, brisker, and a great deal better fitted to attend to the "serious business" of life.

How refreshing to find the Latin Secretary of Cromwell, the writer of that magnificent plea for the unlicensed liberty of printing, where the language is as stately as the step of Truth, the author of Paradise Lost;—how refreshing, we say, to find him bursting forth into this most jolly of supplications:

"And if I give thee honor due,
MIRTH, admit me of thy crew."

Think of it! John Milton invoking Momus. Think of it, careful New Englander, with a mind given to the differences between the subjective and objective, idealism and realism. Think of it, hurried western man of business, occupied with the prospect of future Chicago speculations, in Cairo or Emporium. Think of it, most sanctimonious of men, who believest the garment of Religion to be the robe of a nun, or the vesture of a hermit. Think of it, most delicate and refined of women, who findest humor vulgar, and never laughest above the faintest smiles! Here is John Milton, so fair and beautiful that when he slept of a sultry afternoon beneath Italian trees, a fair lady kissed him, as Hyppatia might have done the Apollo Belvidere—John Milton, whose desire to justify the ways of God to man gave us the English Epic—John Milton, whose memory was the store-house of all the wisdom of the ancients—John Milton, whose words were always for liberty, the statesman's thoughts clad with the poet's grace,—this John Milton goes down on his knees to old Mirth and humbly, apologetically—"if I give thee honor due"—distrustful, it would appear, of his own ability to honor him with the honor due so exalted a personage—asks to be admitted to his crew.

We never expect to write the twin speech to Arcopagitica—we are rusty in our Latin, and couldn't write dispatches for Cromwell, provided he were alive and wanted us to do it—we gave over some time all thought that our great Poem would have a niche in the Temple of Fame, anywhere near that which the "Paradise" occupies; but in one particular we will follow Milton—nay, rather, we will be his peer—we will honor MIRTH; and we shall be proud to be of his "crew."

To honor Mirth, and return "to our muttons" together, let us go back to the Ravels.

Let us state what, perhaps, is not generally known, hereabouts, that Mr. T. Barry, among his great services to the amusement-loving, was the first American Manager to bring out the Ravels. That appearance was at the old Park Theatre, of lustrous memory, some twenty-five or thirty years ago.

Let us state further that while the cholera raged in New York, the Ravels played, and that when they were on the point either of leaving the city or shutting the theatre, we forget which, the then Mayor of Gotham and other most respectable citizens came with petitions that they would continue playing, and urged as a reason that their performances were regarded by the physicians as instrumental in checking the spread of the Asiatic scourge. Could volumes speak more for the salubrity of fun, and the ability of the Ravels to create it?

Since then various fortunes have been encountered by the Troupe. There has been changes, marriages, deaths. But here are two of the brothers as young, as mirthful, as inimitable as ever, though their united ages could not be spanned by a century.

They have with them an efficient and well-trained company. They are themselves, we say, inimitable. For they are men of genius, and their long practice has made them perfect artists. Their fun has this distinguished quality: It is at once so palpable that the dullest may see and enjoy it, and so delicate that the keenest and sharpest sighted are the best satisfied.

May their days be a thousand years, and their purses always full!

MENDELSSOHN COMMEMORATION. — What a people we are growing for commemorations! One year of Handel — one month of Burns — one week of Mozart, — and on Thursday last of Mendelssohn, who would then have been aged fifty had he lived: — ten years younger than were Gluck and Handel when they began to enter on their career of lasting musical glory. Yet a dozen years have passed since his masterpiece, "Elijah," not merely proved his progress so as to silence all English cavillers, but established his reputation, as one, to which reference must ever be made, as next to that of Handel, when Oratorio is spoken of. Never did Fame more immediately reward desert than in his case. It seems as if it was only yesterday that, before going into the Birmingham Town Hall to preside in the orchestra on that memorable occasion, he said, laughingly, to one whom he honored with his regard, "Stick your claws into me! Don't tell me what you like, but what you don't like" — only yesterday, that after the Oratorio was over, he escaped from the noise and the fever of triumph (what a triumph it was!) and with that whimsical humor of his, which endeared him to every one, by way of calming himself, chose to take what he called "a beautiful country walk in Birmingham,"⁴ pacing backwards and forwards, for a beat of some four hundred yards, by the side of a sunken canal, under the shelter of heaps of coke and cinders. Remembrances like these, already clustering round one so lately full of life and spirit, so sweet-hearted and so bright-witted, must make the heart full, be it ever so dead, ever so worn. But how have the ploughshares of time and change passed over Mendelssohn's world since "Elijah" came to light at Birmingham in 1846! Of his own immediate "kith and kin," as distinct from children, but one is left. Of the many singers, again, who took the first parts in "Elijah," Mr. and Mrs. Lockey and Madame Bassano are the only ones still before the public, and those of late sparingly. "Sic transit!" — but that thought, and gratitude, and reality do not pass, the celebrations of Thursday were a speaking attestation. Fraught as they were, to some present, with that regretful yearning, which overpasses the boundaries of the "dark river," there was in them something better and more cheering — a new impression of England's old device of love and loyalty — "We do not forget." The French are now beginning to discover Mendelssohn; the Germans (as was said on the occasion of the revival of "St. Paul") to be ashamed of the ingratitude shown to his memory when no more service of heart and brain was to be got from him! Neither Mr. Hullah's morning orchestral concert, on Thursday, at St. Martin's Hall, nor the Sacred Harmonic Society's "Elijah" in the evening, claims any minuteness of report. Both went well. At the former Herr Pauer, whom we hear too rarely, performed the Concerto in D minor with great fire and brilliancy. At the latter the principal soprano was Madame Rudersdorff, — the bass, Signor Belletti. — London Athenaeum, Feb. 5.

About Pianos.

One of the embarrassments of house furnishing is that of procuring a pianoforte. Unmusical persons, particularly, however smoothly they may have advanced to a certain point in the details of furniture, find themselves quite at fault when called upon to select this necessary appendage of the modern drawing-room. They know neither where to select, nor how to select. We have lately had an experience of this ourselves. But in the course of our investigations we gained some little information on the subject of piano-fortes in general, which simplified the matter very much to us, and may prove of service to those of our unmusical readers, who may chance to be subjected to the same embarrassment.

We find that a piano-forte, after all, is nothing more than a horizontal harp. It is, virtually, that most ancient of instruments laid upon its side, under cover, the strings being struck by hammers instead of being plucked with the fingers. Any one can see this by opening a pianoforte and observing the shape of the mechanism. This fact, however, makes it evident that the case of the piano can have very little to do with the intrinsic merit of an instrument. We have ascertained, moreover, that the mechanism of itself, in all sound and well-constructed pianos, must cost the manufacturer a certain pretty definite amount. This, then, reduces the instrument, so far as the mechanism is concerned, to an appreciable value. No manufacturer can sell it for any price which does not cover this essential outlay, without actual loss.

Satisfied on this point, therefore, the purchaser may be sure that the additional expensiveness of the instrument is caused by the case; and of this case—which is only so much work in rosewood—the purchaser is as competent a judge as the manufacturer, or any decidedly musical person.

The first requisite in the purchase of a piano, then, is to make yourself sure of the interior mechanism; and to this end application should always be made to a perfectly responsible and reliable manufacturer—one of whom you feel confident that he would put no work into an instrument that was not honest and thorough. For there would seem to be manufacturers of cheap pianos, here and there, the only merit of which is a certain showiness of case, without any of the intrinsic qualities of a fine instrument. Such productions are called by the trade green pianos, and are traps for the unwary. An inferior class of German artisans is generally employed; they work at low wages, with very poor material, the wood being quite unseasoned, and, when put together, the instrument is a good pine box—not much more—covered with deceptive veneering and ornament.

A certain characteristic of a piano, which is not appreciable by an unmusical person, is the distinctive quality of tone peculiar to the various manufacturers. This difference of tone is caused by a certain treatment of the mechanism—one manufacturer paying special attention to the felt which covers the hammers, another to the size of the strings, another to the arrangement of these strings as to the intervening distances, another to the shape of the sounding board. One manufacturer will give you a delicate tone—too delicate, perhaps, to wear well. Another will give you a good honest tone, which is as durable as the instrument itself. But these distinctive qualities of tone are too subtle a thing for any but trained ears to detect and decide upon. And, after all, the difference between standard manufacturers in this respect is every year lessening—each copying the excellent points of the other, and bringing all instruments of the best makers to a certain approximation. Some difference there will always be; but however important this may seem to professional persons, it is slight to the world at large, and ought not seriously to embarrass any ordinary purchaser of a piano-forte, whose use for the instrument is altogether private and amateur.

To purchasers, then, we would say, beware of cheap pianos, and go only to the standard manufacturers. Decide what scale of instrument you want; that is, whether six and three quarters or seven octaves—for this, of course, makes a difference in the price—and then be guided by your own eye, and the capacity of your purse, as to elegance and costliness of case. But, having decided these points, request the dealer to select for you the best toned piano of that particular class you have chosen—a selection which, in all respectable houses, will honestly be made.—New York Evening Post.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8.—MR. BRISTOW'S Complimentary concert was a success, though the programme was long and somewhat dreary, as you will see by its personal:

PART I.

1. Overture (William Tell).....Rossini.
Harmonic and Philharmonic Societies.
2. Rec. and aria (O Lord, Thou hast Overthrown Thine Enemies), and storm chorus, (Thanks be to God), from the Oratorio of "Elijah.".....Mendelssohn.
Miss Coleman, Mr. P. Mayer, Harmonic &c.
3. Polka Song (Gaily Smiles the Earth Before Me), words and music by Miss Imogene Hart.
Miss M. S. Brainerd.
4. Movement from the Jullien Symphony.
G. F. Bristow.
Philharmonic Society.
5. Aria (Sound an Alarm).....Handel.
Mr. D. Miranda.
6. Grand Duo Concertante for two pianos.
Robert Schumann.
Messrs. H. C. Timm and Wm. Mason.
7. Song (Twilight Hour), from the opera of "Rip Van Winkle.".....Geo. F. Bristow.
Mrs. H. Westervelt.
8. Grand double chorus "He gave them Hailstones), from "Israel in Egypt."....Handel.

PART II.

1. Overture to Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale."
G. F. Bristow.
2. Song (Uberall Du)—Thou Everywhere. Lachner.
Mr. Philip Mayer.
(With horn obligato by Mr. Brannes.)
3. Grand duo concertante from Violin and piano (Don Pasquale)....Goria and Herman.
Messrs Joseph Burke and Richard Hoffman.
4. Valse de Milibran.....De Beriot.
Madame Caradori.
5. Grand double chorus and solo (The Horse and his Rider), from "Israel in Egypt."
Handel.
6. Inflammatus from "Stabat Mater."...Rossini.
Miss M. S. Brainerd and chorus.
7. Grand fantasia (National Airs) for harp.
Aptommas.
8. Hallelujah.....Handel.

Mr. Bristow's overture to "A Winter's Tale" was the feature of the entertainment. It is a fine work, with some very curious and interesting instrumentations, and considerable melody. After its performance, the composer was called out, bowed and departed. The applause continuing, he came out again and began a rather confused speech in which he had great difficulty in repeating the word "re-iterate." The drift of the address was that he was very much obliged to the audience, and if he had done anything to advance the cause of music he was happy, &c., &c. The latter part of the concert was more successful than the former, and the encores were frequent. The house was very well filled, so that Mr. Bristow must have made a very good thing out of it. There should have been, however, more of his own works on the programme.

Mr. STÖPEL'S Iliavatha, after being advertised for a repetition was withdrawn, owing, it is said, to the professional engagements of Mrs. STÖPEL. If repeated, it could, with the prestige of the success attending its first production, draw an immense audience.

A letter from ARTHUR NAPOLEON informs me of his success in Norfolk, Va., where he has given a couple of concerts. He will prosecute his southward journey as far as New Orleans.

There is little else stirring in the musical world.

TROVATOR.

BERLIN, FEB. 9.—The other evening I had one of the old questions forcibly brought up again, and it has been running in my thoughts more or less ever since. As the Germans say, "I must give it air." The occasion was this: Madame ZIMMERMANN is a famous and long experienced teacher of singing, down in Wilhelm Strasse, in this city of Berlin. She has had a great many pupils, and has them still. Once a week they meet (they are girls and young women only) at her house, and sing together. That capital young rising musician, RADECKE, is conductor. A grim friend of mine, not too misanthropic however to do a kind act to anybody, made me acquainted with Madame Zimmermann, and I was invited to attend some of these music meetings. I went last Friday evening. The chorus was smaller than usual, as it was not the regular evening of meeting.

DAVID, the violinist, BARGIEL, a young teacher and composer, a couple of old gentlemen and myself, constituted the audience. Some fifteen young women and girls formed the choir.

The music was Psalm 13, for women's voices. Solos, duets, choruses, composed by Radecke. There is so little music for female chorus, that he is supplying the deficiency for Mad. Z.'s pupils. This psalm is beautiful. It reminded me a little in style of Schubert, but is easier to sing. What is wonderful in these days, Radecke is not afraid of the Diatonic Scale! The piece was sung charmingly, delightfully. Then a Christmas song for female chorus, also charming. Fraulein Friedlander, who sang at Laub's concert, gave us 'With Verdure clad,' and another young lady, a mezzo soprano, gave a beautiful song by Radecke.

David was formerly Radecke's master, and I suppose we had so much of his music on this account. The professor was evidently pleased with these specimens and proofs of his pupil's progress.

DAVID then played with Radecke the violin and piano-forte Sonata of Beethoven, op. 30, No. 3; and old Tartini's famous 'Devil's Sonata,' with Joachim's accompaniment. I said of David's playing the other day, that it left me cold; now, it was not so; I could desire nothing better. For the first time these sonatas opened to me the depths of feeling, jocose, fiery, pathetic, which lie in them, and I sat wondering how I could have found David cold! But playing before a large critical audience in Concertos, and in a small circle in such Sonatas, are very different things.

So much for the occasion. The question is, upon instruction in singing.

All careful observers, who have traveled much in Europe, and may be supposed able to judge, are beginning to admit the truth of my statement in the Journal of Music six or seven years ago, that America affords as fine voices, and as large a proportion of them, as any country in the world. That there is as much native talent for music among us, as well as talent for painting, sculpture, literature, as any where else, is also now admitted. But all who have had opportunity to know, agree that no class in our country corresponds to the educated classes abroad in cultivation of the sense for the beautiful, and in artistic development in any direction.

Farther, it is painfully felt that the attainments made by those who devote themselves to Art, and especially to music, are seldom equal to those of corresponding persons in Europe. One grand reason for this is obvious enough, viz: that no one in our country lives in an atmosphere of Art; we have no galleries of painting and sculpture; no architecture; no regular opera; no high-class church music; and except in large cities very few concerts. These points have however been so often discussed that we only now pass them over.

Now why is it that we really produce so few singers? Of the many reasons that might be given, here is one: Pupils do not study rightly. Learning to sing is learning to use a certain set of muscles, so as to produce certain effects; just as learning the piano-forte is cultivating the muscles of the fingers, or dancing those of motion. This training of the muscles forms the foundation; a similar training of the muscles of the throat and mouth is the foundation of learning to read well; for the first thing is proper pronunciation. Afterwards comes in that mental and æsthetic culture, which enables the singer, the pianist, the reader, the actor, the dancer, to make what he has learned of his art the medium for the expression of feeling and sentiment. Hear Jenny Lind, Clara Schumann, Johanna Wagner, Fanny Kemble; see Taglioni or Fanny Ellsler!

A century and a half ago women were not allowed to appear upon the stage, and female parts were sung by the artificial sopranos and alti, which the Catholic church and Italy alone were degraded enough, except Turkey, to produce. These men had nothing to live for but eating, drinking and singing. The foundation of their musical studies was the magnificent music of the church, with its long drawn tones, its wondrous harmonies, its extraordinary effects of light and shade. The first object was to acquire full command of the lungs, so as to expend the breath most economically. And this was so important a point, that in the height of their fame, when astonishing audiences night after night by their execution of the most difficult passages, their daily practice was in singing scales of long drawn notes—rising and swelling and dying away, to an inaudible sound. Gardner somewhere speaks of a man who was annoyed by the sound of the wind, giving day after day these crescendos and decrescendos, but which proved to be a great singer's tones, in his vocal exercises. Such practice is like the practice of scales by the pianist. When Liszt was making his first triumphal tours in Europe, he had an octave or two of keys fitted with stiff springs, and this always traveled with him in his carriage, that no time should be lost in the constant exercise of his fingers, which he deemed necessary.

Those old castrati began young, when the vocal muscles were tender, and by long and patient exercise made them not only obedient to their will, but made singing a second nature to them. Consequently, once perfected, their organs never failed them until the general decay of the system through age was felt. Think of men singing for thirty or forty years, with no loss of power! To those men Europe was indebted for the so-called "Italian school of singing," which, according to Rossini, exists no longer.

But their principles of instruction became the common property of Europe; and any competent teacher, whether in London, St. Petersburg, Berlin, Rome, Paris, New York or Boston, will exercise his pupil in delivering his voice to the vowel sounds in all the languages of these respective capitals, in precisely the same manner.

The sounds ah, o, e, i, oo, &c., are the same in all languages, though the letters representing them are different. Take the a in "father"—ah, the tone is to be given everywhere the same; and all good instructors will teach it in the same manner. The principles of the old Italian school are then at the foundation of all good instruction. Attention has been more than once called in the Journal to the fact, that many of the greatest singers of the last hundred years never had instruction from an Italian, and never sung a word of that language until after their fame was made. Look at these names (if I am wrong in any one, pray correct me) Mr. Billington, Cecilia Davies, Harrison, Incledon, Braham, Simms, Reeves, Formes, Mad. Unger, Sontag, Jenny Lind, Duprez, Roger, Sophia Cruvel, Staudigl, Madame Ney, Schroeder-Devrient, Johanna Wagner, Mara, and many more. These names occupy as large a place in the history of music as any names of vocalists to the same number, ending in i and o, and coming from South of the Alps. These names do not perhaps occupy as large a space in American newspapers, and in letters from London and Paris, as some others; but, then, London and Paris are not all the world! Now such singers were properly taught, this cannot be denied. The Mara was probably the greatest of all these female singers; she had German instruction. The point then is to be taught well—not to learn of any particular person—be he of Spanish origin as Garcia, or of German origin as Goetze.

More to-morrow.

A. W. T.

(From an old friend.)

BERLIN, FEB. 15.—It is a long while since my pen last aimed at you, with music to give it impulse. The many good reasons for this long silence, I will reserve for another occasion, because I am not in the apologetic mood to-night. It is now 7½ P.M., Don Giovanni is being sung at the Opera House, 7 minutes walk from my room, the weather is good, I am well, and not bankrupt; then why, in Heaven's name, ask you, am I not there instead of here? Thereby hangs a tale, which shall be wrought into this pot-pourri, for such I design it to be,—a mere breaking of the long silence above adverted to. It occurred to me, on my way home, just now, that the experience of one day in Berlin, to wit, this 15th day of February, 1859, might make an entertaining column in the Journal of Music; and the thought having come to me, I thus turn it into a deed, partly, no doubt, out of gratitude for the pleasure your pages have given me this P. M.

The day has had quite a thread of Home running through it. Awoke with a head-ache at 8—(an undeserved headache, having taken no "oysters" late last night.) Dressed and went to breakfast, by previous appointment, at the house of a fellow-countryman. Now, if you are hungry and in good condition when you read this, the "Diarist" and his witching slanders will rise up before your imagination, and suggest Wurst, Gänse-brust, caviar, onion-salad and the other delicacies of the German cuisine. "Mark now, how a plain tale shall put you down!" Buckwheat cakes, syrup, fried hominy, good white bread, without caraway, beefsteak and fried potatoes, cooked ham (cold), tea and coffee! This is no dream, though I must confess it has often been one, but a sweet reality. During the discussion of these dangerous exotics, a package of the New York Tribune is brought in, all fresh, not yet opened—dates to the 29th January. Every body reads out a paragraph; one on the Thorndike will, whose author has achieved immortality; another (two at once) on H. W. Beecher's noble letter, giving fresh assurance, which we sometimes need in these days, that manhood has not fallen out of the world. An hour spent over breakfast and the news from home, and then a walk to the post-office—where I find a letter from home, and one from CHARLES SUMNER—from which I will quote a sentence, as our friend is not quite a private person, and many readers of the Journal hear with interest all that concerns him:

"Since I left you I had a relapse which left me, for days, a wreck, and made me for a while despair; but I have followed with the greatest fidelity the prescribed medical treatment and have led a life of perfect tranquillity. The morning begins with dry-cupping for half an hour; not pleasant, but after five quite tolerable; then moderate, very careful exercise, avoiding fatigue; repose on my sofa or bed 15 hours out of the 24; pills of bella-donna and capsules of Terebenthine. I mention these details because—wrote me that you had expressed an interest in knowing them. The eminent physicians in Paris and those here who have made themselves acquainted with my case, preach caution."—Speaking of Mr. Parker's illness, he says, "Thinking of his calamity, I hesitate to turn to my own condition, which is now brightening, so that I feel perfect assurance of the future."

He concludes thus: "As the session of Congress will be soon over, there will be no public duties to claim me till next December, when I hope to be ready for any labor." Three cheers! "Meanwhile, having given three solid months to my treatment, I propose, in a week, to go to Nice, where I shall be a few days; perhaps thence to Rome."

This was a very hopeful and enlivening letter, by this time headachè had flown; read Wilhelmina de Bai-reuth's memoirs till half past one; walked to the "Diarist's," whose room merits description, and shall have it, some other time. I saw his head peering over a pile, 4 feet 6 in depth, of "Ancient Musical Literature." His pen was travelling, as usual, at telegraph speed. I bade him go on, took a volume of Dwight's Journal, and concluded the Life of Mendelssohn, commenced in a previous visit, but made slow work of it, as there was rich food for another sense inviting all the while. What was this? Only "John," in the next room, a thin door between, practising Bach's fugues, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, 4 hands, another American aiding. Then, all of a sudden, comes a clear, strong chord, and a brilliant run on the violin, breaking, or subsiding, rather, into one of the variations of the Kreutzer Sonata! How can a man read Mendelssohn or anybody's son, with such distracting sounds assailing his ears in the next room?

But soon dinner breaks this up, the steady smooth sailing of the fugue resumes sway, and I get on a little with my story. The Diarist rises, gives a fond look round about on his "scattered treasures," says he must dine (in a tone as of unreconciled conformity to a custom of very doubtful utility) and leaves me in possession; saying, as he closes the door: "There are two 'Dwights' you have not seen," (at which the thought arose, "I should like to see one Dwight!"), and I am alone with the books and stove and von Humboldt's statuette, and manuscript sine fine, and Mr. Brown's spectacles, which I incontinently don, as more convenient than my eyeglass (I now have on my own and know how you will miss his focus!) and thus I go on and finish that sad story—sad in its close, but not sad as a career. (I am here tempted off my track but will resist.) I put bound-Dwight on the shelf again, loose-Dwights into my pocket, and start through "John's" room, who good-naturedly rises from his pedal-piano, through which, a moment ago, he was driving J. S. Bach on all fours (his "fours," not Bach's). "Well, John, will you go to the Concert?" "Thank you, no; I must have my organ lesson for to-morrow learned." "What's the Symphony this afternoon?" "Seventh, I am sorry to say"—and a look of ineffectual longing crossed his expressive face,—but behind it is that unmistakeable background of resolution, which belongs to genius, and which can always say: "Get thee behind me, Satan," when the true divinity beckons forward. So I leave John and go out of the gate to the sound of Fugue.

I wend my way, reflecting on the Art-talent of "Young America," cross the Weidendammer-Brücke, and soon enter with the crowd into the "Ton-Halle." It is ½ past 3 and the concert commences at 4, yet it is with difficulty that I find a seat, at a table with two soldiers and three other youths; and now I take out my "Dwights." Almost the first thing my eye meets is the account of the annual meeting of the dear old Harvard Musical Association, and with very varied emotions did I read it; still, the chord which was touched most deeply and which would continue to vibrate after the voices of all else had died away, was that of our great and enduring bereavement. FRANK BATCHELDER! What would the Harvard Musical seem to me without him! I sympathized with Ware's and Upham's earnest and tearful words, and wished that I, too, might have been present, to say only a few words, they would have been but few, and I may say them here. Who has ever passed an hour with that rare young man, without feeling that all pursuits, music as well as graver ones, were elevated and dignified by his association with them? His gentleness, his refinement, his pure tastes, his charming disposition, are justly eited and dwelt upon; but to me, his predominating grace, the atmosphere, so to speak, of the man, was transparent integrity. I knew no man, I know no man, whose presence was in the same degree magnetic. I often had the feeling, when hearing him converse on Art, on social life, on domestic calamity, and even on the dryest details of professional and other business, that no man could confer with him without being somewhat better therefrom. Unobtrusive, ay! undemonstrative to a remarkable degree, yet "a virtue went out from him," wherever he appeared. It has been most truly said, "He had no enemy." Of whom else can we say this?

That list of "officers" looked so home-like! The Buckwheats not more so; (excuse the homely comparison.) Putnam 'on the organ' was delicious—a perfect 'Haupt' in his way. But I must go on. Hark—"sh—sh—&c—&c—"Liebig's baton is in the air—"Jewesses—sh—sh—I say! Kelluers, walk 'a tiptoe'! teaspoons, be still; Overture to "Leonore" "No. 1"—Beethoven; To continue the Programme: Sonate, F dur, Mozart, arranged for Orchestra by Streit. Now look out! Fest overture upon two American National Airs, (Lieder) by J. B. André; (who is he?) 'Hail Columbia' and 'Yankee Doodle,' of course; and very well worked up, too. To my surprise, a hearty encore, some counter hisses, which mean here, as at home, nothing more than "No." Renewed claps—renewed hisses; the claps have it, decidedly—but Liebig goes on to 'Scherzo from Summer-night's Dream, Mendelssohn; (John, you have never heard this played as yet—no, never!) Overture, 'Tannhäuser'; 7th Symph. Beethoven. Entrance 5 sgr. (12½ cts.) Ends ¼ of 7; and I start for the opera; without a ticket however. Don Juan! Arrive at 7, just in time! "What tickets?" "Only Fremden-Loge and Avon-Scenes," the highest price places. Well, here goes—it being Don Juan; for I was 'ut particularly pleased with its performance the last time. "Give me one Avon-Scene;" why it just exactly empties my pantaloons pocket, but I shall want one groschen for a programme; there is a five and a one Thaler in my vest; let us pay with the bills; price 1 Thaler 10 groschen. Hand goes to vest, no bills—changed my vest to go a little more elegantly to eat hominy and buckwheats; no matter, I can go without a programme. I know all the performers; and as for coat money, why I'll wear my coat into the opera; "there, there's just 1.10;" "Nein, Meinherr, bitte; da ist nur 1, 7½;" and, sure enough! Well, what then? Can a gentleman pledge his watch or his boots or coat for 6½ cents? For that was exactly my deficit. In the beginning of this letter, I say, "I am not bankrupt," this was hardly true, was it? So no matter, I'll go home and write my day's experience to Dwight, who'll be gainer in every way, for I know the 'Diarist' is there, John too; now is this not a homelike day for a BOSTONIAN?

P. S. Getting sleepy, though the carriages keep up an incessant rattle on the four sides of the great Gens d'Armes Platz. The Royal Schauspiel-Haus has long since put out all its lights, but long lines of gas-lamps define the flag stones which stripe the square in all directions. My love to the H. M. A. and the B. M. H. A. I was obliged to give Ludwigsburg the go-by, as I had six ladies in tow and one boy! I don't however despair of inspecting the "disjecta membra" of old Put; that is to say, of the great Organ. I'm sure that ought to be written with a big O, whether in German or English. I heard fine organs this summer at Fribourg, Basle and Berne. One word more. When "John" gets home there will be no more desecration of the Organ, by operatic flights and negro jigs, as at Tremont Temple!" Adieu.

JOURNAL OF FEBRUARY 19. Any person having a copy of this paper of February 19, and not desirous of preserving the same will confer a favor on the publishers by forwarding it to this office.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—In order to make the opera Luciezia Borgia (pianoforte arrangement) complete within this present volume of the Journal, we let it occupy our music pages this week and the next, leaving our Classical Choral selections to await their turn a little longer. But we have good things of that sort in store.

Concerts.

There have been two during the week past: one a private concert in Mercantile Hall, by invitation; the other a very public one.

The first was one of those choice, delightful little sings, for the pleasure of their friends, by the Club of amateurs, under the direction of OTTO DRESEL. They now number about eight voices on each part, the soprani and contralti forming a remarkably fresh, clear, refined and musical body of sound; and the whole trained to perfect unity and purity of execution. This was displayed to great advantage in an elaborate Motet by Bach, (No. 5), in which the same Chorale reappears some five times with wonderful beauty and variety of harmony; interspersed with choruses, a very swift and labyrinthine fugue, and quaintly interesting trios and quartets. Such music is sure to be loved, after some familiarity, in spite of its antiquity. How genuine it is! how deep and earnest, full of devotion to Art with a single, religious aim to the highest! The expression of a great, profound life, that courted no publicity, and cultivated none of the modern artifices of effect. The other pieces were the Soprano solo and Chorus, by Mendelssohn: "Hear my prayer," whose exquisite melody in the last part, "O for the wings of a dove," seemed alike perfectly adapted to the words and to the voice that sang it; Schubert's "Miriam" Cantata, (both of these last two pieces have been published in this Journal); and three or four of the beautiful part-songs by Robert Franz.

The very public occasion was the performance, at Tremont Temple, on Wednesday evening, of Mr. G. F. ROOR's Operatic Cantata, "The Hay-makers," by a select company of ladies and gentlemen, organized, and for a long time very carefully trained by Mr. J. R. MILLER, whose enterprise in the matter was abundantly rewarded by a far greater crowd of would-be auditors than the Temple would contain. Not prepared for this, we failed to find a seat, and strength held out only for the hearing of the first Part.

The affair was very pleasantly and perfectly arranged. There was scenery representing a hay-field, farm-house, &c.; the singers were in costume and equipped with implements; and the various movements of hay-making operations, mowing, spreading, raking, &c., are so rhythmical in themselves, as to lend themselves admirably to musical purposes. Each Part illustrates an entire day's life: the morning call and devotions, the field labors, the nooning, afternoon work, evening and rest. There is a little thread of private romance running through it, a pair of lovers; also a touch of the comic in a "green" youth from the city; there are choruses, songs, quartets, piano interludes, &c., most of which are simple, melodious, pleasing, and suggestive, although common-place, and appealing to the sympathies (which they got in full measure) of the masses of uneducated music-lovers. These were connected together by rather a liberal allowance of recitative, which was not very effective.

On the whole, taken as it should be, as a composition of no high pretention, but just the working out by simple, easy means of a natural and pretty thought, it seemed to us singularly perfect in its way. What it chiefly lacked was some wealth or substance of instrumental accompaniment. The mere piano, with the facile little silvery embellishments improvised (apparently) by Mr. LANG, soon grew monotonous. There was a flute, occasionally, which was very skillfully and gracefully interwoven with a vocal melody; and a guitar in the serenade duet, which was delicate and graceful, and most charmingly sung by Mrs. LONG and Mr. ADAMS. Miss WHITEHOUSE also had some effective melodies, which she sang with fine voice and taste.

The Choruses, by about a hundred voices, were sung admirably; fine ensemble of tone; remarkably fine diminuendos and effects of distance (to enhance which illusion, cricket chirps, &c., were introduced). The mowing scene was quite amusing, and the melodic movement of the chorus went well with the scythes. Very pretty too was the chorus of maidens, who in their turn crossed the stage, "spreading" with forks; and the union of the two movements was a happy and ingenious effect. Prettiest of all, however, was the "raking" chorus, with its double hitch in the rhythm. In the larger choruses, like the solemn one at evening, the Organ furnished background.

We should have been glad to have heard the rest of it, had our aching head and weary limbs allowed. Doubtless it will be repeated; and we congratulate Mr. MILLER, as well as the author, who conducted in person, on so successful an attempt to introduce, with simple means, a very pleasing, popular, and in some sense quite artistic, entertainment of a semi-dramatic musical character. It should lead to good things. Perhaps it opens a path which one day genius may enter.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We need not remind our readers of the Farewell Complimentary Concert to our townsman, Mad. ELISE BISACCANTI, which takes place this evening. Her friends are more in number than would fill the Music Hall, and all will be eager to join in this tribute to her distinguished talent, on the eve of her departure for Australia and the other remote dependencies of the realm of music. Her own exquisite singing will be the artistic attraction; but curiosity will also be gratified by the first hearing of Mr. DENNET, of whom as a basso, great things are reported. Signor BISACCANTI, with his violoncello, and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, also, will assist.

CARL ZERRAHN is making ample preparation for his fourth and last concert (on the 26th), which will be all BEETHOVEN, in honor of the anniversary of the master's death. It will be such a concert as we have not had for years. The Choral Symphony will be performed entire; the choruses by the Handel and Haydn Society, and the quartet of soli by Mrs. HANWOOD, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. ADAMS and Mr. POWERS. Then, for an interesting novelty to Boston ears, will be given all of Beethoven's music to the tragedy of "Egmont;" and Mrs. BARROW has been engaged to read the play. We trust it will excite as much enthusiasm as Mr. Miller's "Hay-Making."... The AFTERNOON CONCERTS will be resumed next Wednesday... Mr. MILLER means to make hay while the sun shines; i. e. the Operatic Cantata will be repeated several times.

An admirable book is BASSINI's "Method for the Baritone,"—by far the most common, and therefore the most important of male voices, and the most liable to go wrong, left without method and without master. Sig. Bassini's well-known first work has proved itself, we think, the most sensible and practical of all the many "methods" for the voice in vogue. We believe the same of this for the Baritone, and mean to speak more fully of it. It is published by Wm. Hall & Son, New York... Messrs. O. Ditson & Co. have issued, under the general name of "Choral Classics," an edition of the admirable pieces for chorus with solo, &c., which have appeared from time to time in Dwight's Journal of Music. Each piece is neatly done up separately; and the whole together may be bound into a volume, which will form a choice little repertoire for choirs and clubs and choral societies. Among them are pieces, of from eight to forty pages in length, by Mendelssohn, Schubert, Bach, Gluck, Mozart, and the like.

The Philadelphians have had a goodly variety of music lately. Especially a "Grand Symphony Concert," under the direction of CARL SEITZ (who also leads the weekly afternoon "Germania Rehearsals"), at which Schubert's great Symphony in C, the "Egmont" overture, Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto (pianist, Herr BONNEWITZ, who is much commended), a cello solo by our old friend JUNG-NICKEL, and a Maennerchor chorus, were performed. The Handel and Haydn Society, with 200 voices, gave a mixed concert, part sacred, part secular, from Mozart, Haydn, Anber, Flotow, &c. And CARL GAERTNER has given two classical chamber Concerts in the foyer of the Academy.

"Would a congregation rise and leave the church before the benediction is pronounced?"

This rebuke, (says "Stella," in Worcester,) came to mind as we saw the unmannerly "stampede" made from all parts of our great hall last Tuesday evening just as the Mozart Society commenced singing the "Rain Chorus" from "Elijah"—the concluding piece of the evening. Was "the laving of the thirsty land" so well depicted that new broadcloth and stiff crinoline feared a drenching?

The following, going the rounds, is news, and too good to be true:

Rossini composes more and more, the older he grows. He produces with astonishing rapidity, songs, choruses, sonatas, trios, quartets, and symphonies—which are usually performed at the maestro's soirées.

This, too, is news, especially the part italicized: We clip it from a Western paper:

A new method for the piano-forte has just appeared in Leipzig, and calls for special notice, as it is by JULIUS KNORR, a citizen of Minnesota or Iowa, (!!) the well-known and intelligent teacher and author of some of the best instruction books for the piano which have been published.

NEW ORLEANS is at last favored by Mr. Ullman, who announces the first appearance there of Mlle. POINSOT, and Mme. Laborde, Carl Formes, the prime basso, Signor Florenza, the fine baritone, Mlle. Berkel, (contralto,) Gustave Satter, the eminent pianist, and Carl Anshutz, the chef-d'orchestre and conductor, at Odd Fellows' Hall, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 23. PRECOLOMINI is to appear there early in March in four operas.

A project is on foot in that city for building an opera house on a large scale, similar to that of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Cincinnati, which has long been a desideratum in New Orleans, a place always famous for the love of music.

BROOKLYN too, is to have a Music Hall. A meeting of citizens interested in the project was held last week, and the preliminary arrangements were made for the erection of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is proposed to build a hall capable of seating two thousand persons.

Viva Verdi has become a political cry in Italy. This is an ingenious anagram made up of the first letters of each word of the sentence, Viva Vittorio Emanuele Re d' Italia. Live Victor Emmanuel King of Italy.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE. — Hérol's Pré-aux-Clercs was produced on Saturday last, and, everything taken into account, was not the least satisfactory performance of the Opéra-Comique. Madame Fauré, more than ever, displayed her remarkable capabilities, and exhibited, perhaps in a less degree than usual, those faults we have been compelled to criticize. The music of the Countess Isabelle suits this lady. Auber's music sparkles more than Hérol's — not to institute further comparison — and greater fluency is demanded for its effective execution. Madame Fauré, at any rate, was so successful in her part, that it is likely the Pré-aux-Clercs will become one of the favorite operas of the season.

The Pré-aux-Clercs, the last work of its composer, was written a short time previous to his death, and produced at the Opéra-Comique, in December, 1832. Hérol died the following month, not having completed his forty-second year, and leaving his Ludovic to be finished by M. Halévy. The Pré-aux-Clercs achieved a decided success, and was considered by many Hérol's chef-d'œuvre. It is, perhaps, a more equal work than Zampa, and abounds everywhere with genuine melody.

In addition to the Isabelle of Madame Fauré, we may name the Niece of Mademoiselle Celine Mathieu, and the Mercy of M. Berger. The lady acted with liveliness but sang out of tune; the gentleman has some intelligence but no voice, and therefore cannot be expected to sing. The other performers call for little praise.

Last night Le Caid was repeated, after which was produced the opera of Le Châlet, by Adolphe Adam.

"But his name liveth for evermore!" is one of the most touching phrases of our greatest Protestant 'Requiem,' — the funeral anthem for Queen Caroline, written by Handel. This phrase (the notes of which are said to have been transferred from Carissimi,) has been brought back to our thoughts by a circular announcing the formation of yet another Handel Choral Society, at the Foundling Hospital. To this institution the greatest master of Music bequeathed — as we know — such privilege and preference in the performance of 'The Messiah' as the loose legal usages of his time enabled him to do. While we do not yet see what special place yet another choral society is to fill in London — save as illustrating the vast growth of musical life in this metropolis — we perceive the graciousness and the propriety of such a formation at such a place, in such a time as this year of Handel commemorations A. D. 1859.

The next Oratorio given by our Sacred Harmonic Society is to be Handel's 'Solomon.'

PARIS. — (Correspondence of London Musical World, Feb. 12.) — Rossini's "Saturday Evenings" are among the most interesting re-unions of the French capital. The illustrious composer throws his doors open to his friends one day in the week, when his salons are crowded by some of the élite of the artistic world. Music, of course, constitutes a special feature of these soirées; but nothing is set down — all is extemporized. On Saturday last, among others who attended, were Grisi and Mario, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, Sjr. Badiali, and the celebrated Taglioni. Grisi and Mad. Borghi-Mamo sang the grand duet from Semiramide, "Ehhen a te ferisci;" Mario the gondolier's song from Otello, and Grisi the "Song of the Willow" from the same opera. The trio for male voices from Guillaume Tell was next sung by Mario, Signor Badiali, and an amateur. Mario seemed inspired, and made many in the room shed tears. The trio was universally redemanded. Mad. Borghi-Mamo concluded the performances with two Neapolitan chansons arranged by M. Braga, the violinist. An incident which occurred at the end of the soirée, as the guests were departing, is worth relating. Madame Taglioni approached Mario, and, after complimenting him on his singing, said to him: "I am sure you do not recognize me!" — "Ah! diva!" he answered in a reproachful tone, "You sing," exclaimed Terpsichore, "as in your earliest days; as for me — I dance no more!" "Yes," replied Almariva, bowing graciously, "but you have carried away the Dance along with you." I forgot to mention, perhaps, the most interesting moreaux of the musical performance — a cavatina and a song, written expressly by Rossini for Madame Borghi-Mamo, and sung by that lady.

At the Grand-Opéra, Félicien David's Dernier Jour d' Herculanum is in active preparation, and will, it is anticipated, be produced about the end of the month. The delays and disappointments of the Académie Impériale de Musique et de Danse, however, are notorious, and the new opera, in all probability, will not be ready until the middle of next month. M. Félicien David's work excites much curiosity, and while many auger for it a great success, others remain sceptical, entertaining doubts about the dramatic capabilities of the composer of Le Désert and Les Perles du Brésil.

At the Opéra-Comique, the rehearsals for Meyerbeer's Dinorah engage the whole attention of the management. Mad. Cabel, MM. Faure and Saint-Fov, will sustain the principal characters; Mdlles. Brenille and Bousquet, MM. Warot and Barrielle the subordinates. A new opera by Meyerbeer must needs excite intense curiosity and interest, and so the entire Parisian world is swayed by one feeling of eager desire to hear the celebrated composer's forthcoming work.

The only novelty at the Italiens has been the reproduction of Prince Poniatowski's opera Don Desiderio, which met with an average succès d' amis.

Haydn's oratorio, The Creation, was performed on Sunday last, at the third matinée of the "Société des Concerts." The soloists were Mlle. Dorns, daughter of the celebrated flautist, MM. Sapin, Belval, Stockhausen, &c., &c. Mad. Nantier Didiée has accepted an engagement at the Grand Opéra. M. Vivier has for awhile relinquished the musical in favor of the dramatic art, and brought out a new piece at the Gymnase, entitled Un Mariage dans un Chapeau, which achieved a decided success. The friends of M. Vivier, from this little work, prognosticate for him a prosperous career in his new pursuit.

For the following information we are indebted to the Morning Post: "The grand musical festival, which will assemble in the Exhibition Palace of the Champs Elysées, 7,000 Orpheonists, from all points of France, will take place on the 11th, 12th and 13th of March next. Eleven choruses will be sung by the united societies, viz: the 'Veni Creator' of Besozzi; the 'Départ des Chasseurs,' by Mendelssohn; the 'Mystères d'Isis,' by Mozart; the 'Jour du Seigneur,' the Septuor of the 'Huguenots,' by Meyerbeer; the 'Fragment du 19ème Passame,' by Marcello; 'Les Cimbres et les Tentons,' of Louis Lacombe; the 'Génies de la Terre,' of Samuel David; the 'Chant des Montagnards,' of Kucken; the 'Marche des Orphéons,' of Mlle. Nicolo; and the 'Retraite,' of Laurent de Rillé. The 'Salut aux Chanteurs de Province,' will be executed by the Orpheonists of Paris." The above programme, it will be owned, is more showy than substantial.

The news from Paris — besides the above programme and the important "sundries" added this week to M. Meyerbeer's approaching opera — have still more promise in them. Two new singers, trained by that remarkable person, M. Duprez, are mentioned: — one, Mlle. Monrose, the name dear to all familiar in the French comedy, who is to sing at the Opéra Comique, — the other M. Raynal, a baritone, who is to have a part, they say, at the Théâtre Lyrique, in M. Gounod's 'Faust.' At the Grand Opéra 'The Last Days of Herclaneum,' (originally, as we know, 'a Last Judgment') is coming out at last, towards the Ides of March.

MILAN. — The manager of the Scala, having received intimation from the authorities of the city, that they would hold him accountable for the effects of any disturbance resulting from the enthusiasm excited nightly by the performance of the war chorals, "Guerra, guerra," in Norma, has withdrawn the opera.

ST. PETERSBURGH. — Flotow's Martha has been produced at the Imperial Opera with brilliant effect. The principal executants were Mesdames Bosio and Meric Lolande, Signors Mongini and Everardi. The receipts on the first three nights averaged 3,500 roubles (14,000 francs).

MONUMENT TO MOZART AT VIENNA. — "It is now," writes the Revue et Gazette Musicale, "sixty years since Mozart died, and the monument, which should have been erected to his memory, is hardly finished. The very place where he was buried is still unknown, and, in all probability, the question will never be decided. In this emergency, the following expedient is contemplated: — the pedestal to the monument is intended to be so large that it will cover the different places where the remains of Mozart are supposed to be deposited. A basement, eight feet high, in bronze, supports a figure in the same metal, representing the muse Polyhymnia in the attitude of affliction. The portrait of Mozart is represented on the four faces, in bas-relief, with suitable inscriptions. The monument has been executed from designs by M. Hans Gasser."

MUSIC BY MAIL. — Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Tally-Ho. W. H. Morris. 25
A new hunting song, with a striking air, and well defined, bold rhythm. Excellently adapted for a gentleman's voice.
- Time its veil is weaving. Song. E. Folk. 25
- The voice of God. " 25
- Just as I am. J. R. W. Harding. 25
Sacred melodies of much beauty, and not difficult.
- Oh! canst thou forget. Mrs. S. B. Cooper. 25
- Kind words and kind echoes. F. Shrivall. 25
- Tell us, Fairies. Song. G. W. Stratton. 25
From Stratton's operetta, Fairy Grotto. A catching song, which will make its way into public favor.
- Dearest name. (Caro nome.) From Verdi's "Rigoletto." 35
Cavatina for soprano voice, replete with beautiful passages. When sung well, it will keep any audience spellbound. This piece will probably maintain its place in the repertoire of great singers longer than anything else which Signor Verdi has written. It is one of the favorite songs of Mme. Biscaccianti, which fact in itself is a sufficient recommendation.
- Pretty Fay, why away. J. W. Cherry. 25
Light and graceful. The young folks will admire this song.

Instrumental Music.

- Sylphide. Romance. Charles Fradel. 25
The gift of melody is so rarely to be met with among the modern writers for the piano, that a composer, who like Fradel, possesses it in a remarkable degree, and knows how to clothe it in an always fresh, and interesting form, must become a favorite. The "Sylphide" is an expressive, tender air, in 6-8 time, moving restlessly onward in the midst of a light and airy accompaniment, principally for the right hand. Not difficult.
- Amelia Waltzes. H. C. Lumbye. 50
This celebrated set of Waltzes, always the delight of dancers, is here printed entire, for the first time. As the Introduction and Finale introduce Lindblad's charming melody, "Birds blithe are singing," (one of Jenny Lind's favorite songs), nothing short of this complete copy will prove acceptable to those who desire to own a pianoforte arrangement of these waltzes.
- Pas Espagnol Waltz. G. W. Stratton. 25
An old acquaintance (Cracovienne) in a new and fashionable dress.
- Rose Schottisch. H. L. Grebe. 25
- Violette Waltz. " 25
- Lily Mazurka. " 25
- Rural Life Galop. Landleben. 25
- My heart's delight Polka. Hupfer. 25
Good and easy Dance Music.

- ROMBERG'S VIOLONCELLO SCHOOL. A complete Theoretical and Practical School for the Violoncello, with Illustrations. By Bernard Romberg. 2.50
This is a standard work by one who is a complete master of the instrument. It is reprinted from the most recent European copy, and having passed through a careful revision in all its parts can be recommended as the most thorough and useful course of study on the violoncello obtainable.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 363.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1859.

VOL. XIV. No. 25.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Diarist Abroad, No. 18.

BERLIN, FEB. 15. — The principle of the thing is this:

The public tacitly agrees, through its acts in ten thousand other cases, to reward such as devote themselves to its service, the amount of this reward being in inverse ratio to the value of the service. Those who merely amuse receive the highest rewards. A Taglioni, or an Ellsler, devoting all the energies of her immortal soul to the cultivation of her legs, rolls in wealth. The man of science, whose works mark eras, is happy if after long years of study, a year's labor of his brain will produce him as much as a few hours' labor of the dancer's legs.

It is a fortunate circumstance for the public, that under despotic governments provision is made to enable the enthusiast in science, learning, art, to pursue his labors free from the danger of actual starvation. Thus in many of the great universities of Europe, or connected with her great museums, libraries and scientific collections, are nominal professorships, almost sinecures, to which are attached salaries sufficient at least to afford the necessities of life, and to which are appointed men, whose labors and studies are of too much value to the world to be lost for the want of a little public aid. This is one reason that Europe does, after all, possess the real fountains of learning.

So too with Art. The governments, as representatives of the public, see to it that the really great artist, in whatever department, shall live.

Yet there are lives devoted to some particular object, where the love of the labor alone affords that perseverance, that untiring industry, that courageous wrestling with difficulties, without which nothing great can be accomplished. Men who devote themselves to the history and illustration of some particular art, are often of this class. The great public cares little for them or the subjects of their studies; governments can hardly make such specialties the objects of their care.

In these cases the student is forced to turn from the community as a whole to that small public, which, for various reasons does, or ought to, sympathize with him in his pursuit, and rely upon it for the means of making the results of his years of labor public. And this is the object of many publishing clubs, as they exist in England, of our Historical Societies, of the Bach and Handel Societies in Germany.

It is the appearance of the first volume of the publications of the German Handel Society, which has led me into this train of thought.

The name of Dr. FREDERICK CHRYSANDER is known to the readers of the Journal already.

Here is a man in the prime of life, who is one of the exceptions in Germany to the general depreciation of HANDEL. He loves and honors that great man's music, as did Mozart, Beethoven, Thibaut. While admitting the greatness of Bach — feeling it as do few — he will not go with the multitude here in placing Bach's greatest contemporary so far below him. Years ago he determined to do what might be in his power to make Handel known and duly appreciated among his countrymen, and so by degrees this has grown to be the work of his life, at least for the present. First he made himself a thorough musician — Doctor of Philosophy though he was — able to read and understand scores, equal to the task of deciphering the old music of past centuries. Supporting himself in part by all sorts of literary jobwork, writing for musical periodicals, editing musical works, all his spare time and money were given to the great work. He leaves his family for months together, that he may delve in the field of the old music preserved in the Libraries of the German cities, that he may hunt up every remaining trace of Handel in Halle, Hanover, Hamburg. At last he goes to London, and there gives his days and nights to the study of Handel's scores.

Chrysander soon found that no edition of any one of the great master's oratorios had been printed correctly. Indeed no editor had had the advantage of using the conducting scores, as they were supposed to be lost until SCHOELCHER so fortunately heard of and obtained possession of them. With the results of his extraordinary knowledge of the music of the age immediately preceding Handel, to which DEHN had most willingly contributed from his immense lore, fresh in mind, Chrysander set about the wearisome task of preparing a correct edition of Handel's works. Even the editions of the London Handel Society, so loudly trumpeted, are very faulty — under the circumstances of their preparation, astonishingly so. I have seen a copy of Arnold's edition of the "Hercules," with the new corrections — it is sadly marked up.

Meantime Prof. GERVINUS and a few others began to feel that Handel was worthy of being made known, as he is, in Germany, and that it would be a shame if Chrysander's long and zealous labors should be lost, or if not lost, that they should not be rewarded. There is too little interest felt in Handel, there are too few who can afford to purchase a long series of folio volumes of music, to make it for the interest of any publisher to undertake such an edition as Chrysander is able to prepare. Hence, the origin of the German Handel Society. The intention is to publish 3 volumes per annum, the subscribers paying therefor 10 thalers, or $7.50.

This is one of the cases where the labors of long years must be lost to the public unless the public comes to the support of the undertaking. It is a case, too, where a large sale cannot be anticipated, as few except musicians and musical societies, public libraries and institutions, can afford to find it worth while to purchase such volumes.

Thus the question is reduced to this; here is a man, who has done the work; the results of his labors can only be given to the public through the press; will musical societies and musicians enable him to print?

The first volume is before me. There are two editions, one in German, one in English.

"Susanna, an oratorio by George Frederic Handel. Printed for the German Handel Society." 216 pages folio in full score, with a pianoforte arrangement, by Julius Rietz, added.

PREFACE.

Previous attempts to bring out a complete edition of Handel's works yielded convincing proof of the difficulty of such an enterprise. And though an edition emanating from Germany has its peculiar obstacles to surmount, yet, at the commencement of our labors, many circumstances also happily concur to secure to this new edition a greater intrinsic perfection than can be attributed to any one published before. With regard to the sources at our disposal, we are placed in a favorable position, as compared with our predecessors. Whilst our most presumptuous wishes only extended to the inspection of those original manuscripts and other subsidiary aids, whose existence was already known, and which had been at the disposal of the previous English editors, a perfectly new source was unexpectedly opened to us by the conducting scores of Handel's works becoming known.

The sources hitherto known, that could be consulted for a critical edition of Handel's works, were the original manuscripts of almost all his works, and the beautiful copies of the oratorios taken by Handel's amanuensis, John Christopher Smith. Of both these collections, which have been for nearly a hundred years in the possession of the English Royal family, we were most liberally allowed to make the freest use, through favor of her gracious majesty the Queen of England, and of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort.

The existence was known likewise of the Handelian manuscripts, which, by some now forgotten circumstance, came into the hands of Lord Fitzwilliam, and have for years become accessible to the public, as forming a part of his rich musical collection in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. These had however been but little used. They comprise seven volumes and contain mostly sketches or occasionally inserted movements. They have yielded some fruits for all the three issues of our first annual publication.

These sources might have sufficed in case of need for the formation of a reliable edition. However, Smith's copies, as well as the concert editions, exhibit manifold deviations from the original manuscripts — deviations, which in themselves may claim to be authentic, but which could not be properly accounted for from the existing materials. Hence the loss of the separate vocal and instrumental parts, which were used at Handel's performances, was greatly to be deplored; and, since such fragments as these as had come to light, yielded but little information of the loss of the old conducting scores, was still more a subject of regret. But they were not lost. When no one conceived the possibility of their having been preserved by Smith's descendants, they were offered for sale by a bookseller at Bristol in the year 1856, and thus came into possession of M. Victor Schoelcher, one of the most zealous members and supporters of our society, by whom they are as carefully preserved, as they are liberally held open for any scientific purpose.

This increase considerably augmented the labor: for the conducting scores were found to be full of remarks, alterations and additions, which were often only to be sifted by most careful investigation. But we may certainly regard it as fortunate, that the preliminary steps for the great undertaking of the German Handel Society happened to coincide with a state of things, which, for the first time, rendered a completely satisfactory edition possible.

During the construction of the authentic score from the above mentioned sources, a multitude of rough drafts and varieties of reading, of historical and practical remarks, has been gathered together. The publication of these however, would have swelled the volumes considerably beyond their just limits. Another reason for not publishing this matter at present, was, that the majority of the members wished in the first instance to possess only the music capable of performance. The committee of management, therefore considered that they were administering the still slender funds of the society most wisely by publishing at first only the works themselves. But, in order to satisfy those, who wish to penetrate into the Master's workshop, into the genesis of his compositions, and to be just towards the author himself, we are collecting all the information yielded by the manuscripts, or otherwise bearing reference to the works in question, and hope to publish it occasionally in additional volumes, when an increase in the number of members shall render this possible.

Here ends the general preface. I will not copy that which relates to the "Susanna" alone. The work is beautifully printed, and "John" and I, after playing and humming it through, have both concluded that it is worthy of the author of the "Messiah" even.

Now, dear reader, what can we do in America to aid this undertaking? Have we so much love for HANDEL, any of us, as to subscribe, if only for a year or two? Or, have we influence in any society, or in the management of any library, which can be brought to bear, not to pay my friend Chrysander for his years of labor, but to enable him to give us their results? I always boast of the love felt for Handel in our country; of the success of his oratorios; how Boston people in one winter furnished an audience of 1200 to 1500, thirteen times, to the performance of "Samson"; and that the last time I heard it in Boston, the "Messiah" filled our music hall with more than 2000 auditors! Can we not prove that we love Handel well enough to aid the publication of this edition?

I need not say what a sensation would be made here if 500 copies of the "Susanna" should be ordered!

Please think of it.

Sketch of the Life of Beethoven.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

Settled at Vienna, Beethoven placed himself under the tuition of Haydn; but, on showing some pieces the master had revised to Schenk, a creditable composer, who pointed out errors in them which Haydn had overlooked, he formed the idea, which he never relinquished, that he received lessons, but not instruction from him. Under this impression, he refused Haydn's proposal that he should style himself his pupil on the works he printed. His irritable temper was further excited against the venerable symphonist, by Haydn's advising him, with worldly prudence, not to publish the third of his first set of trios—that in C minor—which Beethoven considered, and posterity confirms the judgment, the best of the three. It is not to be supposed that Haydn, of all men, ignored the merit of this composition, but, rather, that he deemed this a probable hindrance to its favorable reception, and so thought the young author would be indiscreet to stake his reputation upon it. Beethoven, however, with his constitutional independence, must have felt himself offended, as a man, by the proposal of what he may have considered as a compromise, if not wronged, as an artist, by what he may have esteemed as the depreciation of his music. He dedicated to Haydn, however, the next work he printed, and so paid a worthy homage to the genius of the master, without committing himself by unjustifiable acknowledgments. Though he had previously published several works, and had written many that have never appeared, the trios were the first to which he affixed a number; and we may infer from this that he chose to date his career as a composer from them.

Now, and for some time later, all he wrote bears the impress of his time; and even when we feel it most to be Beethovenish, this is but because we fail to identify in it a marked characteristic of Mozart (powerfully evinced in this master's Pianoforte Sonata in C minor), which seems to have especially fascinated him, and in the development of which may be traced much that is generally accounted peculiar to our author. In the trio, named above as his favorite, this manner is particularly apparent.

It may have been among his causes of dissatisfaction with Haydn, that this master thought more highly of him as a player than as a composer; and so sanctioned an opinion, repugnant to his self-esteem, that was then prevalent. His playing may well have raised the enthusiasm of all who heard it; for though wanting in mechanical finish, and even, occasionally, in accuracy, it had a charm, from its deep expression, from its fiery energy, and from its highly-wrought character—from, in fact, the thoroughly artistic spirit it embodied, which has never been surpassed; and we have little to wonder that the less appreciable talent of composition should have been at the time partially eclipsed by one so dazzling.

Beethoven was glad to take the opportunity of Haydn's second visit to England in 1794, for breaking connections with him; and immediately placed himself under Albrechtsberger, with whom he went through a course of contrapuntal study. A superficial observer of his works might apply the composer's comment upon his late, also to his present master; for though it appears, from his taking every occasion to introduce it, to have been his particular ambition to excel in fugal writing, it is in this style that he is less successful than in any other. His counterpoint has an effect of stiffness and effort, singularly opposed to the spontaneous freedom that characterizes everything else he wrote; but this results, not from unskilful training and insufficient knowledge; it is rather because the nature of his ideas renders them insusceptible of this kind of treatment; and crudity is the consequence of forcing them into uncongenial development. There are, indeed, some grand exceptions from this generalization—the last movement of the Eroica, above all others—but there still exist too many examples to justify the remark.

In 1796 he first began to suffer from that dreadful malady—the worst evil to which he of all men could be subject—which embittered his life, which influenced his character, which excluded him from society, and which cannot have been without its important effect upon his music—the loss of hearing. Space will not permit the recital of the many painful incidents that sprang from this calamity; but it must be noticed that it made him irritable in temper, violent in manner, and suspicious to the last degree; detesting to play or even to appear in company, and distrustful of every one, even of those most zealous in his interest. It is needless to trace the course of the disease through thirty years, which, baffling the greatest medical skill, and proceeding by degrees, ended in almost total deafness. Nothing can be more pathetic than the manner in which Beethoven speaks of his affliction in his letters to Dr. Wegeler, to Bettine von Arnim, and others; but it cannot require his own words of complaint to make us estimate the misery it occasioned him. Let it not be thought profane to mention here one whimsical consequence of this misfortune. It naturally led Beethoven to seek, in the light periodical literature of the day, the resource which others find in conversation, and his love of drollery fixed his attention upon the perverted expressions common in facetious writing, which, unaware of their peculiarity, since incapable of testing them in social parlance, he adopted in his ordinary speech, and thus his language, abounding in epithets that had no reference to the occasion, became extravagant, if not unintelligible.

In 1797, Beethoven made his only artistic tour, visiting Leipzig and Berlin, at which latter city he played several times at court, received a handsome gift from the king, and wrote his first two violoncello sonatas, to perform with the then popular Duport. In the Prussian capital he met with Prince Louis Ferdinand, the friend and pupil of Dussek, who warmly appreciated the rare merit of the remarkable young musician, and thus proved his right to Beethoven's acknowledgment of his deep feeling for music.

Shortly afterwards, in Vienna, a fashionable countess gave an entertainment, to bring this famous dilettante and artist together; when she greatly incensed the latter by not assigning to him a place at the nobility's table in the supper-room; for which, however, the prince made some amends by seating the composer on his right, and the countess on his left hand, at a dinner of his own; but Beethoven had already resented the indignity put upon him and his art, and thus given the first proof that is recorded of the republicanism which was his indomitable political principle. Strange as it may seem that, surrounded by the admiring aristocracy of the country, and fostered with a truly fraternal fondness by them, he should have nourished such a feeling; his proud independence was unswerving, and he would have sacrificed the highest worldly advantages rather than suffer this, in the slightest degree, to be compromised.

Of all the great musicians that have been, no one has shown such a continual development of his genius as Beethoven, and so great was this, that critics have classed his works in three separate styles, corresponding with three periods of his life; but although his mind was in an incessant state of progress, and the productions of each epoch are manifestly distinguished from those of the other two, this distinction must be understood to refer to style and not to merit, since in his latest years he wrote bagatelles and other pieces of the lightest, nay of the most trivial character; whereas in this early time he produced some of his greatest, if not his most individual masterpieces, such as the Sonata in E flat, Op. 7, the Quintet in the same key, and the Sonata Pathétique.

It was now that Beethoven took lessons, professedly in dramatic composition, of Salieri, his connection with whom is acknowledged in the dedication of his first three violin sonatas. Whatever he may have expected, "he received lessons, but not instruction," from this fashionable composer of his day; for the grand dramatic power which marks his writing was not to be taught him, and the conventionalities of the lyric drama are totally absent from his few theatrical works.

At this time the famous quartet party, of which Schuppanzigh was the first violin, first met at the residence of the Russian ambassador, Count Rasumowsky. For Beethoven to witness their remarkable performances was for him to be incited to write for them, and he accordingly now produced his Quartet in D, which was rapidly followed by the other five published with it. (Op. 18.) He was closely connected with this eminently artistic association to the end of his life, and wrote all his works of that class with a special view to their performance; his transcendent excellence as a quartet writer is thus, in some sort, a consequence of the excellence of this party; for though he had been urged by Count Appony, in 1796, to compose for string instruments, his trios and his first quintet were the only result, until he became concerned in the Rasumowsky meetings.

His general habit of composition was to set down every idea as it occurred to him, and afterwards to amalgamate these into complete movements; he would even modify a phrase in many different forms upon paper, before he was satisfied to incorporate it into a work; and thus he employed his sketch book, as Mozart did his memory, making it the crucible in which he moulded his creations into maturity. He frequently pondered in this manner for very long upon a composition, and would sometimes have several in progress at once; but, on the contrary, he would occasionally produce a work with the promptness of improvisation; and so, when a lady at the opera lamented to him the loss of some favorite variations on the air "Nel cor più," then being sung, he wrote his piece on this theme, and sent it to her the following morning. Again, the Horn Sonata, which he wrote to play with the celebrated Punto, had not a note on paper the day before the performance, and both executants had to read from the author's manuscript. The same was the case some five or six years later with the Violin Sonata, Op. 47, composed for Mr. Bridgetower, the English violinist, and himself to play; for he called up his pupil, Ries, at four in the morning of the concert, to copy the first movement, while he was writing the Andante, with variations.

In 1799 he wrote the ballet of Prometheus, of which the merit of the overture makes us regret the difficulty of obtaining the music of the action. One can scarcely conjecture in what manner Beethoven, with his powerful dramatic feeling and his exalted reverence for his art, can have met the exigencies of ballet music, fulfilling the necessities of the stage, and carrying out his own idea of dramatic illustration.

The so-called first period of his career may be considered to close with the symphony in D, which he wrote in 1801, and of which he made three entire scores before he was satisfied to dismiss it. In regarding the productions of this epoch, we must notice the strikingly original conception of the Scherzo, as it appears in the septet and in the symphony in C, a germ that greatly expanded itself into the maturity of after works; besides this, however, the most candid examination of the compositions in our master's so-called first style, can trace in them little that is individual to him beyond their excellence, which is, however, such as to rank them with the greatest things that had preceded them. We have here a powerful illustration of the truth that originality consists, not necessary in an exceptional habit of thought, but may be progressively developed from external impressions, which, in the case of Beethoven, were the seeds that ultimately ripened into the most original individuality that has ever appeared in music.

Beethoven was of a most inflammable nature, and is reported to have entertained as many ardent passions as he met with objects to inspire them. At the beginning of the present century, however, he found a lady who made a deeper and far more lasting impression upon his heart than any of the others; this was the Countess Giulietta di Guicciardi, to whom he dedicated the "Sonata quasi Fantasia," in C sharp minor, to whom so late as the summer of 1806 he wrote three letters, expressing all that words can reveal of the intense feeling this wonderful creation embodies, and whom, notwithstanding their discrepancy of rank, he, four years afterwards, seriously proposed to marry. She it was who, in 1801, lured him for a time back into society, from which the embarrassment of his deafness had already exiled him; who gave him renewed confidence in himself, and reliance on the world around him; who was his constant object of most anxious interest, his constant source of brightest inspiration. The fastidious M. Schindler, with a reserve less delicate than unaccountable, avowedly suppresses the circumstances of this connection, which was perhaps the most important to Beethoven's artistic career of any that he formed; and we have, therefore, little evidence of its effect upon his heart and mind, beyond what is revealed in the impassioned character of his music, of which it must always be regarded as the key. M. Lenz, with a more genuine reverence for his subject, quotes a passage from the conversation book (that Beethoven, on account of his deafness, used as a medium of communication with his companions) which bears upon this interesting episode. It occurred in 1823, when the composer, having occasion for reference to his score of Fidelio, had commissioned M. Schindler to procure the loan of it from Count Gallenberg, the then director of the imperial theatre, to whom the Countess Guicciardi had been some time married. The extremely equivocal French written by Beethoven, renders this discourse very obscure; but thus much is evident, that the musician expected from his friend's visit to the lady's husband to learn some tidings of the object of his old romantic passion. What follows may admit of this conjectural interpretation, namely: that the Countess, perhaps from motives of interest, had, after her long intercourse with Beethoven, deserted him for an aristocratic alliance, and upon her marriage with Gallenberg had spent some time in Italy; returning to Vienna, she again encountered and once more encouraged her artist lover, but she had lost her power over him, or else, to avoid its influence, he forebore to renew any connection with her. His words, indeed, allude disparagingly to her, and still more so to her husband; but they have the character rather of being written to mask his feelings than to express them, perhaps even to disguise them from himself, and I cannot but infer, from the entire passage, that he still retained a deep interest in the heroine of the C sharp minor Sonata.

In 1801, he received Ferdinand Ries as a pupil, who was his constant companion for the next few years, and was devoted to his interest ever afterwards. At this time his brother Carl came to reside at Vienna, and his intercourse also with his brother Johann became much more frequent than it seems to have been in previous years. The closer connection with his family, to whom he was unalterably attached, aided little his personal comfort, less his worldly interest, and nothing his artistic progress; but, on the contrary, always embarrassed him with unavailable advice, inconsiderate remonstrance and other uncongenial interference, besides a continual drain upon his pecuniary resources.

In 1802 he had a severe illness, that left him in one of those fits of deep despondency to which, without such additional aggravation, his isolated situation rendered him subject. In this state he wrote a will bequeathing all his possessions to his brothers, and exhorting them to deal tenderly with his memory, urging his infirmity in extenuation of the eccentricities with which they habitually reproached him.

A Letter from Deacon Malachi Abrams.

POPTOWN, MARCH 14, 1859.

MR. DWIGHT,

Respected Sir:—It is my privilege to sit under the ministrations of the Rev. Habakuk Lot, and to endeavor to hold up his hands in every good word and work. Mr. Esel has lent me the last number of your valuable paper containing our beloved pastor's letter, and has requested me, as a pillar in the church, to add the weight of my testimony in its favor.

It seems to me, Mr. Editor, that them hymns are call'd to sell, and to hasten the day when choirs shall be banished from our land, when our pews shall be furnished with tune books and the great congregation unite in the songs of Zion.

My daughter Gerusha, Mr. Editor, is a great admirer of the Rev. Habakuk Lot. She says she hangs on his lips in "wrapt attention mute." I caution her against "man worship," but suppose that at her age, (she was thirty-five last November) it's natural to be enthusiastic. She attended during one term the Poptown Literary and Collegiate Institution, and always takes notes of Mr. Lot's discourses. I copy the following burst of eloquence from his sermon of last Sunday morning.

"My brethren," he says, "let us anticipate the day when from this vast congregation one mighty ocean of praise shall arise, surging upward to the empyrean vault of heaven."

As our congregation numbers about sixty souls, small children included, you can imagine how grand will be the effect of so large a chorus when we get the new "tune book."

As I was going home from the sewing circle the other evening, I found in the road a manuscript, containing one of Mr. Esel's new tunes. With his permission I send it to you. He wishes me to say that in Congregational tunes, all should sing the air. He has arranged one of the "Devil's favorite pieces," "The Prima Donna Waltz," to the beautiful hymn, "Ye Summer Clouds," &c. It has been printed in sheets, and distributed among the congregation, and is to be sung on the next Sunday after a discourse by our Pastor on the Sin of Dancing.

SALERMA, C. M.

With tenderness.

Oh, sum - mer clouds, why fly ye so? Why won't you wait a bit? The wind doth rise, a - way ye go - So earth - ly plea - sures flit, flit, flit; So earta - ly plea - sures flit.

I know but little about music myself, but my daughter Gerusha has taken lessons two quarters on the Piano of Miss Tinkle, and is considered quite a prodigy in Poptown. I copy from her note book a criticism on the tune which I send you.

"Observe," she says, "how wonderfully descriptive is the music of this hymn. In the first line, what a tone of expostulation pervades the music, changing in the second into entreaty; and in the third, how admirably is represented the rising of the wind, and the disappearance of the gauzy clouds floating in the blue ether! In the fourth the repetition of the word "flit," enforces the idea of the poet, while in the last line the pause on the first syllable of the word "pleasures," admirably pictures the reluctance with which mankind relinquish their grasp of sinful delights."

One word, Mr. Editor, in regard to my sore colt, alluded to by Mr. Lot. If the hymn and tune book should not take with the public, he will not be able to take the colt; in which case, I should like to trade horses with any gentleman who may wish to swop, or to purchase a first-rate animal, warranted sound and kind.

Yours with great respect,

(Deacon) MALACHI ABRAMS.

The Motives and Themes of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

MR. EDITOR.—The approach of the 26th of March, being the 32d anniversary of Beethoven's death, and the intended celebration of the same in a manner worthy of the master, by Mr. Zerrahn and his orchestra in the fourth Philharmonic Concert, remind the undersigned of his duty to complete the analysis of the ninth Symphony. In the VIII vol., No. 23, of this paper you were kind enough to publish an analysis of the first movement, to which I would refer for particulars. As it might be convenient to have all the motives together, those of the first movement are inscribed here.

gloomy and truly awful character of that Coda with the inexorable 1st theme, ending as it began the movement, the preponderance of sad themes, almost bordering on despair in various places, finds its proper answer, truest to the human character, in this wild reckless movement.

Eight ff measures of introduction lead to the first part, which from m 9—76 is occupied with No. 13, beginning pp, the instruments succeeding each other in pronouncing the theme five times, every fifth measure. Parts of the theme and finally the theme itself are repeated ff. In m 77, No. 14 is sounded by the reeds, like a thoughtful voice of admonition. The next motive entering in m 93, marked No. 15, is much softer than the first (No. 13), as if the warning voice of 14 had quelled in some degree the storm. This No. 15 reminds in some degree of 4, prepares for 16 and has some affinity to the theme of the Hymn to Joy. The exciting first measure of 13 is met with everywhere as accompaniment, or in the principal parts, and its second measure closes in various arrangements ff the first part in m 142. An interlude similar to the introduction leads back to the repetition of part first. After the repetition, m 151 to 176 lead from pp to ff in the manner of the first introduction to a still more passionate and exciting treatment of No. 13. The rhythm, then of 4 measures, eight constituting the melody, is shortened to 3, six making up the melody. As a natural consequence the principal rhetorical accents return oftener, rendering the melody much more restless and violent. The 1st m of 12 stands at the beginning of the rhythm to m 205, when it is suddenly removed to the 2nd of the three measures. In 234 the rhythm of 4 measures enters again, almost every measure beginning the theme afresh. In 247 a Dominant 7th chord extending over 4 measures, held out by the strings pp, seems to calm the excitement; but after eight more measures of sustained chords crescendo the whole orchestra bursts forth in m 271 with the theme in a still more exciting arrangement full of fierce, defiant, frantic enjoyment. This is interrupted by a melody sublime in its simplicity, reminding one of the Gregorian chants—another of the same kind with No. 14, but holier in its expression. It consists of F, F, G, G, A, Bb, Bb, A, each tone occupying one measure, and is followed after two measures of significant rest upon Bb by three repetitions of No. 14 followed in m 330 by 379 by No. 4—being a repetition of m 92—142 of the first part. M 379—387 and Coda m 388—399 being made up of No. 15 first measure, as all the preludes and interludes of this movement, lead back to a repetition of the second part. After it m 400 to 425, played in the place of m 387—399, introduce the Trio in two parts.

The melodies of the Trio represent a more cheerful, quiet joy in strong contrast to the bacchantic character of the first two parts. Melodies 16 and 17 take the largest place in the Trio to m 542; m 508 to 542, the closing part, are completely taken up with motives from 17. After m 542 closing with these sad tones: (541) G, D, A, G, (542) G, Bb, A, G follow the first and second part m 8—407; and then the last Coda, bringing in parts of theme 13 and 16 and 17, closes this wild movement (in m 571) which although commonly called Scherzo was not designated so by the master. The last measures No. 19 (once before occurring m 424 and 425) are almost as cheerless and unsatisfactory as the close of No. 1, though much more violent and passionate.

THE THIRD MOVEMENT.

Adagio molto e cantabile in its first, and Andante moderato in its second theme, presents the next phase—a soul earnest in its endeavor to grasp and solve the great problems in the life of man. The first theme has a devotional character. With its repetitions of snatches of melody by the reeds and horns, and its Coda (from m 18—24) played by the same, it sings peace and longing devotion as with angel voices to the troubled soul. This theme is followed in the same measure, 24, by the Andante, a melody full of the warmest expression of a loving and trusting heart. It is purely human in its sweetly flowing and winning tones.

M 42—64 contain a variation of No. 20 followed by No. 21 played by the reeds to m 82. An interlude of a meditative character, made up of motives from No. 20 in constant imitation, leads back to another variation of 20 from 98—120, in which measure the unisono call, No. 22, seems to summon the soul from its sweet and quiet devotional mood to some more energetic action. In m 123 this call is answered by No. 23 like an humble confession of weakness, and this succeeded by a flowing variation of motives from No. 20 to m 130. In m 130—138 the same feelings are expressed in a similar manner. From 139—146 the variation sings itself out in more distinct, short and sweet melodies, followed by the 6th measure of No. 20 and five repetitions of the 7th measure. After some runs in m 147—148, the thankful melody 24 extends over two measures, and in m 152 the movement closes with No. 25, which strongly reminds of motive 9, only that it is here soft and quieting with its sweetly drawn out horn accompaniment. With the 16th measure of No. 20 closes this movement in the 157th measure. It ends sweetly, serenely, and leaves the hearer in a mood quite different from the end of the first two movements. None of them satisfies the mind, however; the first oppresses with its gloomy grandeur, a tragedy in itself; the second leaves a yearning for something better than the frantic, tumultuous whirl of pleasure represented by it; and the third lacks strength to satisfy the longing soul in full proportion to its sweetness and grace. It requires energetic action to counterbalance the gigantic grandeur of the unhappiness expressed in the first movement. This we shall find in the fourth movement, of which we will speak next week.

G. A. SCHMITT.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, FEB. 10. — I said that pupils do not study rightly; and this I say because I believe the end, the aim of an American in learning to sing should be to learn to sing English. It is nonsense to talk about any particular school in the mere culture and development of the vocal tones. The organs of a human being, whether born on the Tiber, the Thames, the Spree, the Hudson, or the Charles, are alike. They produce tones alike, and, the improvement of those tones is acquired by precisely the same processes of study and practice. But to sing German, Russian, Swedish, English, French words, with the various sounds, guttural, labial, nasal peculiar to each — requires in each respective case, after the vowels are conquered and the voice has become manageable and purified of its bad tones — a different course of study. And this is what hearing Madame Zimmermann's pupils the other evening set me to thinking of. I remember my pleasure once in Goetze's class at Leipzig, in hearing him exercise Pratt, and Wilson and others in giving pure vowel sounds, introduced and ended with the ruggedest German consonants. I recalled to mind, too, Stern of this city, as I heard him practicing a class of young women upon some airs of Mozart; how he made them sing scales, and picked out the hard words, not satisfied until they could give each word distinctly, clearly, without losing the pure tone, to which they had attained when singing the same notes solfeggio.

On this evening I noticed how clearly and distinctly the girls sang the words of Radecke's psalm, and this carried my thoughts to the recent performance of the "Creation" by Stern's Singing Society, and I remembered how clearly and distinctly all the words, recitative, solo, chorus, came out:

"Die Himmel erzählen die Ehre Gottes, Und seiner Hände Werk
Zeigt an das Firmament.
Dem kommenden Tage sagt es der Tag,
Die Nacht, die verschwand, der folgenden Nacht," &c.
("The heavens are telling," &c.)

Now no language, which I have heard sung, offers so many obstacles to the singer, it seems to me, as the German; owing to the great number of words with guttural sounds. Yet of the list of great singers given above, a large number learned to sing in their native tongue. Who that heard her, does not remember the great scena from Der Freyschütz as sung by Sontag, in German, of course — and how many rubbed their hands in ecstasy, at the beauty of such Italian singing! Now, I ask how many singers who have made a certain impression upon their first appearance in our concert rooms, after a course of studying airs from "Sonnambula," "Ernani," "I Puritani," and the long list of pupil songs, have really made any lasting impression, have held out more than three or four seasons? They have mostly hurried — most haste worst speed — through a certain course of exercises, and then by dint of constant practice have learned half a dozen show pieces, with which they appear in the concert room and sing ad nauseam — constantly reminding the old concert-goers of how Lind, Sontag, Alboni, Biscaccianti sang them, and making him groan at the difference. True, they are highly praised by our marvellous critics, but generally with a reservation: "magnificent, superb, splendid, pretty fair (as the Frenchman had it) for a beginner." Well, the young lady has made a hit, and Signor This or That gets half a dozen new pupils on the strength of the show made by our young lady. Now she is engaged to sing in oratorio. "Oh dear, what a horrid language English is to sing!" Very true, perhaps, my lady, but you have never learned to sing it. How can you tell? "But it is so different from those dear Italian airs — just hear me sing one of them!" Very different indeed, my lady. In those airs you know nothing of the language, hence you never felt any necessity of singing with expression — that is, with the expression of any feeling of your own; and then too the constant vowel sounds reduced what you sang almost to the level of a solfeggio exercise. Here the case is different. If you have any feeling at all, you cannot sing "Come unto me," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "With verdure clad," and the like, without having it aroused and wishing to express it. But you have laid no foundation for singing your own language. You must begin anew in your practice of consonants, and work your way alone. The short, hurried course of study, which you have made, the great end of which was to accomplish half a dozen airs of difficult vocalization, has most likely affected the delicate muscles of the throat, as all overwork will affect any other set of muscles; and before you have succeeded in conquering the difficulties of singing your own language, your voice is giving way under the strain, and a new candidate, perhaps half a dozen, have crowded you off the track. Here and there is one, who studied singing her own language long before she took a foreign tongue. All that she now learns she can reduce to practice in her native speech. She sings for years and ever better. You, alas! —

But what would you have? say you.

I would have the same system pursued at home which has made such great singers in Europe of so many who never saw Italy and who never sang Italian, until their fame was so great, that they were called to sing in that language at Paris, London, nay on the stages of Italy itself.

The great triumph of a singer, as of an orator, is in the moving of hearts. The moving of hearts is only to be effected by one whose own heart is moved. Words, texts, only affect the heart when understood. What I would have, then, is the cultivation of our fine American voices by the study of music written to English texts, just as here, the Sontags, Maras, Cruvels, Kösters, Wagners, learn to sing in German. If one cultivates his or her vocal powers upon a difficult language, there is no fear that an easy one will present any difficulty.

Whenever a teacher of singing is required in any institution, the very first test I would apply in examining a candidate for the place of instructor, would be his reading, both of prose and poetry. He should prove that he can pronounce well and enter into the spirit of what he reads. Then the question naturally follows, whether he understands vocalization and the art of teaching. Whether he has a voice and can sing delightfully himself, is a secondary consideration. That has little to do with teaching. As for your mere do-re-mi men, with their steps and half-steps, and all sorts of nonsense, running through term after term, of a Normal School, for instance, I would banish them at once.

No, give me a man, who, while he can and will teach the simple reading of music, is at the same time a man of culture, both in music and other things — one who can teach the young ladies not only to read and sing a simple psalm tune, but can lead them on to the glorious music of Handel, and Haydn, and Mozart, and Schubert.

If, on the other hand, I would make the most of extraordinary talent, with a view to the concert room, I would put its possessor under the care of one, who could lay a solid foundation for the future performance of music to English texts. The pupil should not be hurried, but should have time to labor and practice until the organs had made it their second nature to sing; and all extraneous ornamentation should be the last thing. Let the architect know how to plan his building so as to attain grandeur of effect and nobleness of proportion; he can add the ornaments at leisure.

It seems to be quite the fashion to laugh at the idea of an English school of singing. Let folks laugh. Those who do so only show their utter ignorance of musical history, or prove that they do not know what constitutes a school of Art.

The laws of light and shade and color are fixed by nature and immutable. The human form is essentially the same everywhere. The art of drawing, grouping of figures, laying out a landscape on canvas, is essentially the same everywhere, and all schools of painting recognize the same fundamental rules as correct. The differences in the old Venetian, Roman, and Florentine schools of painting, were not differences which went down into the essentials, as everybody knows. Precisely so with schools of singing. On the basis which nature herself has laid, the German teacher works out a system of instruction under which the pupil learns to sing music imbued with the German spirit, so pronouncing the words, so laying emphasis, accent, cadence as to touch the poetic feelings and sympathies of the audience. German music, like German poetry, has its national peculiarities. To express these we have a German school of singing — but this school does not go, I repeat it, back to a difference in the foundations of singing, for they are laid by nature. Again, to sing in French for Frenchmen, requires a different training of the pupil after the voice is once developed. So of English singing, so of Italian.

There is Mr. Jones, for instance. Of his two daughters, the one has a remarkable talent for the stage, the other for singing. He determines to have one educated for the Boston Theatre, and the other for the Boston Music Hall. Is it any more ridiculous for him to send the young actress to Paris to learn to declaim Racine through the nose, as a preparation for her future performance of Ophelia, Desdemona, Miranda, Rosalind, than to send the singer to a country where she will educate her organs to sing only the words of a foreign tongue, will learn only foreign emphasis, cadence, and other means of expression? The boys in the great English schools formerly learned to spout whole pages of Greek and Latin, with great effect, but could not read a page of English decently.

The idea of an English school of singing to be laughed at? Has the laugher ever read of Beard, that grand bass for whom Handel wrote such mighty airs? Has he never heard of that long succession of vocalists which filled up the space from Handel's days to our time? Has he heard Braham, Incledon, Henry Phillips, Mrs. Wood, Anna Bishop, Pyne, Hayes, and others whom I might mention, not because they are England's great singers, but because they have visited America? Simms Reeves, Miss Dolby and others never fear to meet at the great English Festivals the greatest singers Europe can supply. Nor need they. They sing their own language, the grand strains of Handel, the music of Mendelssohn, cantatas and oratorios in general, in a style that compares with the best that German, French, and Italian artists in their own languages can show.

The death of young Pratt, a few years since, just as he had returned from his long and zealous studies in Leipzig with Goetze, was a great loss to us. He would have laid at least a foundation — interested as he was in our schools, both Normal and public — for the development of English singing among us. Who can take his place? Under whose instruction shall we see the young women in our Normal schools and female academies singing Schubert's, Radecke's, Mendelssohn's music for the chorus of women's voices?

I am sorry to have developed my ideas so crudely in this letter. But I actually have not time to make it shorter and more to the point. A. W. T.

HARTFORD, CONN., MARCH 14. — No first-class concert has been given here since I last wrote, — the train of brilliant scintillations which Arthur Napoleon left behind being as yet unbroken. We are expecting, however, a great treat next week in the "first appearance" of our "BEETHOVEN SOCIETY," which is to give a grand sacred concert at the Centre

Church on Monday evening, with orchestra, organ, &c. I will endeavor to write you about it.

Reading in a German book, entitled "Grosses Instrumental Concert," I find the following, which may be interesting to some of your readers, in relation to MOZART. As to the manner in which he composed, it says:

"When Mozart received the words or text for a voice composition he did not set himself at work immediately, but deferred it for a length of time, revolving the sentiment in his mind, in order to excite the activity of his phantasie. Then he played it over in full upon the pianoforte, and afterwards wrote it down; during which time he never had recourse to the instrument!"

The Overture to Don Giovanni is a remarkable example of the rapidity of his writing. The opera was finished. The singers had already learned their parts; everything was in readiness but the overture. The opera was to be performed the day after the morrow, and the full rehearsal was over. The manager, Bondini, had told Mozart, imperatively, that the oratorio must be finished! "I will write it this afternoon!" said the little man; but instead of that, took a long walk! His friends were filled with the deepest apprehensions, and the more anxious they became, the more reckless did he appear! At last, on the evening of the day before the first performance, after having shaved himself, and imbibed pretty freely of wine and punch, ("beraucht von Wein und Punsch,") towards midnight, in his own room, he began to compose; but was so sleepy that he was obliged to lie down. He told his wife to awake him in an hour; but the dear woman, finding that he slept so soundly, allowed him to sleep still another hour before she aroused him! In two hours, therefore, she awoke him, made him some punch and set it near him, and, in order to cheer and keep him awake, told him all kinds of funny stories, until the tears ran down his cheeks with laughter! He continued to write, but by every exertion could not refrain from sleepily nodding the while. One can well imagine this singular circumstance, in the following peculiar point of the overture:

In a few hours, this wonderful master-piece was finished, and at seven o'clock, A. M., the copyists came, as by appointment,—who labored hard through the day to get the parts ready for the evening's representation. The manuscripts were still wet with ink when distributed to the musicians; and this celebrated overture to "Don Juan" was splendidly performed, for the first time, without rehearsal, by the fine orchestra in Prague!

The question, then, naturally arises, from the above, whether Mozart premeditated and played through the overture upon the "Clavier" before he sat down that memorable night to write it for the different instruments in score, or whether it was a spontaneous burst of inspiration, jotted down amid his successive "noddings"—too powerful in itself for even sleep to overcome? For why should he try upon the piano-forte whatever he composed in his mind for the voice in particular, and not that which he intended for the orchestra? Perhaps it was to "hum" over the aria to himself, that he might better judge of its effect.

I have written thus much upon this subject, because I was asked the other day—"How did Mozart compose?"

Since writing the foregoing, the concert by the "Beethoven Society" has come off with fine success. Of course, there were many things in this first performance which were hardly up to the Boston standard; but as a general thing the society, as well as the city of Hartford, may well feel proud in such a successful début. The concert was given in the Centre Church—Dr. Hawes'—and was literally crammed—some 1500 being present. The chorus was made up of about seventy voices, assisted by a nice little orchestra of seventeen instruments under the lead of MR. J. MAHLER, the whole conducted by MR. J. G. BARNETT,—MR. G. E. WHITING presiding at the organ and piano-forte. That you may judge of the style of music performed, I append the following programme:

PART FIRST.

1. The Transient and the Eternal, Romberg.
2. Hear ye Israel—Aria from Elijah, Mendelssohn.
3. By thee with Bliss—from the Oratorio of the Creation, Haydn.
4. Samuel's Evening Prayer and Chorus of Angels, M. Costa.
5. The Heavens are Telling—from the Creation, Haydn.

PART SECOND.

1. Of Stars the Fairest—From the Creation, Haydn.
2. Hear my Prayer, Mendelssohn.
3. Cujus Animam—From the Stabat Mater, Rossini.
4. I Love the Lord—From the Mt. of Olives, Beethoven.
5. Inflammatus—From the Stabat Mater, Rossini.

I have not time to particularize,—for in fact there was nothing, with one or two exceptions, but what I might speak well of; nor do I think it would be fair to make a close criticism of a first performance—where an orchestra has rehearsed but little with the singers, and where the performers would naturally wear a restraint from a fear of non-success. MRS. STRICKLAND sang as usual, with sweetness and expression—especially in that trying Aria from "Elijah,"—"Hear ye Israel,"—which was a good deal marred, I am sorry to say, by the harshness of the organ. MR. and MRS. HUNTINGTON acquitted themselves with much credit, and MR. FOLEY would have pleased much better had he sung in a more connected manner. "Samuel's Evening Prayer" is a beautiful composition, and was rendered with appropriate simplicity by MRS. RISLEY—who has one of the purest contralto voices in the State. The duet, "Of Stars the Fairest," was one of the best things of the evening—sung by MRS. HUNTINGTON and MR. MAERCKLEIN,—the chorus being highly effective. "Hear my prayer," however, was the gem of the concert—the sol being deliciously sung by MRS. CLARE HOLT PRESTON, full of expression, and one of the most satisfactory performances I have ever listened to. I hardly dare to speak too highly of MRS. PRESTON or MRS. STRICKLAND, because they are "rare birds" of song, and I am afraid that they may become known to "outsiders," and be enticed away to some larger city. We have them now, however, in our possession, and shall keep them caged as long as possible!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 19, 1859.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—We give this time the concluding page of the music, together with title page, and introduction, of the opera Lucrezia Borgia, as arranged for the piano-forte.

In our next number, which will close the present year (and Fourteenth Volume) of the Journal, we shall give no music, but devote the four pages instead to an Index, Title Page, &c., of the two volumes of the year from April 1, 1858, to April 1, 1859.

Choice and interesting selections of music, as heretofore, are in preparation for the first numbers of the new volume.

Mr. Zerrahn's Beethoven Night.

One of the most important and most interesting events which our musical world has known for years, will be the fourth and last Philharmonic Concert of next Saturday evening, the thirty-second anniversary of the death of BEETHOVEN. On that occasion, thanks to the energy of Mr. Zerrahn, we shall at last have realized the long deferred hope of hearing his great crowning work, the "CHORAL SYMPHONY," performed entire, as it was eight years ago by the "Germanians," only more thoroughly studied, better sung, better rendered in every way now than it could be with us then. The want so keenly felt in our otherwise memorable Beethoven Statue inauguration, when this Symphony was played, curtailed of the last or choral movement, will now be made up and that sin atoned for; and the statue will be there, the finished score in hand—our noble and lamented CRAWFORD's noble statue—to add a new significance to all we hear and feel.

Previous to the Symphony, with its sublime and universal "Joy" hymn—what could come after it?—Mr. Zerrahn will give us one of the same composer's great works of which only the Overture has been heard here before, to-wit, his music to Goethe's historical drama, "Egmont." It consists of an overture, the two songs of Clärchen, entr'actes, marches, music accompanying Egmont's vision in the last scene, &c. To make the intentions of the music clear, Mrs. BARROW has consented to read selections from the play.

Here is a programme worth the while! Very seldom, anywhere, is so much that is exciting and inspiring in the highest and best sense compressed into one artistic festival. In our next number we shall bring together what we can to prepare the mind for the better appreciation of the Ninth Symphony. Meanwhile, for the benefit of those who study works of this kind, our friend Mr. SCHMITT, of Cambridge, has prepared a technical analysis of its various movements, noting the themes and motives and their various recurrences, of which we give so much as relates to the three purely instrumental movements now, reserving the remainder for next week.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The Seventh Chamber Concert (Friday evening, March 11) was distinguished alike by the beauty of the selections, and by the smoothness, the nice ensemble and expression with which everything was rendered. They were "in luck" with their instruments that evening. Here is the bill:

1. Quartet in A, No. 60, (first time,) Haydn.
Allegro—Adagio cantabile—Minuetto—Finale, Vivace.
2. Piano Trio, No. 1, in D, op. 70. Beethoven.
Allegro vivace—Largo Assai—Finale, Presto.
3. Tema con Variazioni, from Nocturne for Quintet, op. 35, Spohr.
4. Andante from the First Clarinet Concerto in C minor. Weher.
5. Grand Quintet in C, op. 163, for two Violins, Viola, and two Violoncellos, (first time). Franz Schubert.
Allegro non troppo—Adagio—Scherzo, Presto—Finale, Allegretto.

The Haydn Quartet proved itself one of the most agreeable and appetizing of that elegant and genial master's. It took its right place, as a relish, an inducer of the receptive mood, at the beginning of the entertainment. Beethoven's Trio in D—the next in interest to that in B flat—was played quite artistically, yet a little coldly, by our friend J. C. D. PARKER; the chill, however, was taken off with the rising inspiration of the second and third movements. Is there anything, in this form of music, more mystically imaginative, more weird and spiritual, than that slow movement, with its profoundly sad and earnest melody, and its soft vapory accompaniment, like a thin, palpitating visionary light! The greatest novelty, and no less satisfaction of the evening, was in the Quintet by Schubert, in which the second violoncello part was very ably sustained by a young amateur, Mr. BURNS, of Charlestown. After Beethoven, we scarcely know of any work of chamber music so original, so imaginative, so searching to the depths of the listener's soul, as this is, especially in its Adagio, and the Trio portion of the Scherzo. It is all full of rare thoughts, set forth with dignity and power; and the total impression is one of marvellous beauty. The Club will do well to repeat that Quintet.

COMPLIMENTARY TO MME. ELISE BISCACCIANTI. The Tremont Temple was well filled Monday evening (the storm on Saturday having caused a postponement) by an appreciative and enthusiastic audience. The concert was one of the finest of its kind, and left an impression which hundreds wish to have repeated. Our fair prima donna herself looked fresh and lustrous, and sang with rare fervor,—of course admirably. All we could say would be but a repetition, with emphasis, of what we said when she sang in the Music Hall. Her voice and style are cultivated to the last degree; and fervor, real warmth of nature, makes up greatly for what of strength is lost by a frail and long suffering physique. It was eminently artistic. The Romanza from "William Tell" was, as before, her best piece. "Sweet home," in answer to an encore, was sung from the heart; but the simple charm of the thing suffered from the tawdry ornamentation of the piano accompaniment. For the rest, we only heard the scena from Linda, which she rendered exquisitely.

Mrs. LONG sang Ernani, involami in a finished and effective manner; and Mr. W. H. DENNETT, a young New Englander, who has studied two years in Florence and elsewhere, and has very quietly dawned upon our concert world now a year after his return, displayed in Non piu andrai a really superb bass voice, of musical and unctuous quality, and an easy, genuine Italian style, with good expression, overdoing nothing. We were sorry not to hear him also in the "Porter Song" from Martha. He is refined and modest in appearance.

In the absence of Mr. LANG, Mr. SCHULTZE, with Mr. HAUSE, the pianist of the evening, treated the company to a singular potpourri, (the joint work of Vieuxtemps and Wolff) of themes from Don Giovanni. The thunder tones of the statue: Don Giovanni, a cenar teo, &c., were a strange theme for a violin solo to start with; but themes more human and melodious followed, and parts of the thing were beautiful, as it was all finely executed. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, strengthened by a double-bass, and a flute, sketched out a pleasant reminiscence of Rossini's overture to L'Italiana in Algeri, and some other pieces; and the crowd dispersed with the feeling that they had had a charming and successful concert, and with renewed regret that Mme. BISCACCIANTI's voice will be heard here no more, before it has gladdened the cities of the Western and the Southern States, South America, Australia, and all those far-off places that we read of. Success go with her!

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—Mendelssohn's fourth, or "Italian," Symphony came very opportunely, Wednesday afternoon, after our recent hearing of the "Scotch." It is far less striking and profound,—at least in its first movement—than that; but it has a fascination of its own. The sunny buoyancy and freedom of the first part; the quaint, pensive, sombre, antique air of the Andante, chanted by low reed tones; the exquisite grace of the Minuet and Trio (the loveliest part of the whole); and the concluding Saltarello, hurried into the more delirious Tarantella, afford fine contrasts. An overture by Kreutzer, the "Papageno Polka," the romance from "L'Eclair," for flute and English Horn, (played by Messrs. ZOEHLER and RINAS), with other popular tit-bits, made out the programme.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We have just received a letter from our friend TRENKLE, dated St. Augustine, Florida, March 10, written on receipt of the news of that beautiful complimentary concert. As we know it will interest his many friends here, we venture to make the following extracts:

.... "I take the liberty of asking you to return, through your Journal, my heartiest thanks to those who so kindly coöperated in the concert given in my behalf, and especially to the members and committee of the Harvard Musical Association, whose influence in the matter must have contributed largely to ensure success.

"From what I have heard through your beautiful notice in the Journal, and through minute accounts from home, the concert must have been such that I cannot help feeling a little proud that it was given in compliment to me. By this I do not mean to monopolize the claim of its success; I well know that the same combination of artists and so charming a programme must at any time attract a good house. But it is the quality of the audience—the whole arrangement and atmosphere of the concert—the memory of which I always shall cherish with pleasure.

"My stay here has thus far only in part benefitted me. I have improved somewhat in strength and much in spirits; yet my chief trouble, asthma, clings to me, and it seems to require some element, not to be had here, to rid me of it, though I dare not attribute any fault to the climate; for this is truly beautiful, and even so exquisite that no terms can be exaggerated in describing it. . . . The air is filled with the fragrance of orange-blossoms, and the gardens show flowers of all kinds in full bloom. The thermometer ranges from 75 to 80 deg. in the shade; and the difference between morning, noon and night temperature, is seldom more than 3 to 5 degrees.

"Inviting as all this certainly is, I would willingly exchange and prefer to breathe our Boston air, if there was a possibility for me to live. But such as I am now, I feel but little encouragement, and in all probability shall have to remain till the middle of next summer,—part of the time perhaps at Aiken, Va.,—with how much success the future will tell."

There will be no Afternoon Concert next Wednesday, on account of the Hall being occupied by the Fair for the Channing Hospital for the Incurable. . . . The Mendelssohn Quintette Club will repeat that Schubert Quintet at their next and last concert, next Friday evening; when they will also play Mozart's lovely Clarinet Quintet, a Quartet by Mendelssohn, &c. . . . Messrs. ROOT and MILLER continue to make hay and the sun continues shining.

We are glad to see such signs of musical activity in Cambridgeport, as we find here reported in the Cambridge Chronicle of last week:

CONCERT OF THE CAMBRIDGE AMATEUR ORCHESTRA.—A large audience was collected on Thursday evening at the concert given in the City Hall. The programme was admirably selected, overtures and lighter instrumental pieces being alternated with songs, trios, quartets, and cantatas for chorus and orchestra. The orchestra played with great spirit and precision, and agreeably disappointed those of their friends who know the difficulties which attend a successful performance, even by professional performers. The solos and the beautiful trio introduced some of our favorite vocalists, and gave great satisfaction. The double quartets, by a club from Old Cambridge, were warmly applauded; and the choros showed that we have no little resident talent. To answer a question often asked, we would state that the "Cambridge Amateur Orchestra" is just what its name imports,—a society of amateurs who meet weekly for the performance of instrumental music. For the purpose of lending variety to a concert which they proposed to give to their friends, all the vocalists who took part, volunteered their aid; and, although from the lateness of the season, there was hardly time enough for a sufficient number of rehearsals, the concert was given, and was perfectly successful. Our City Clerk, Mr. Jacobs, wielded the manager's baton with a grace that even Max Maretzek would appreciate. The orchestra purpose giving before long a second concert of instrumental music, in connection with a similar club from a neighboring town, when they will together number some thirty or forty performers.

A new opera (at least out of Germany) was performed a few weeks since at Chicago, under the direction of JULIUS UNGER. It is called "Prince Eugene, or the Siege of Landau"—a grand romantic opera in three acts, by Gustav Schmidt, music-director of the Stadt-Theatre, at Frankfort-on-the-Main.

The French Commission on the "pitch," or "normal diapason," have ended their labors; and their report, drawn up by M. HALÉVY, recommends a standard one quarter of a tone lower than the present concert pitch. . . . A monument to BELLINI is soon to be erected in Catania, Sicily, his birth-place. . . . GAZZANIGA has been presented, in Havana, "with a silver lyre with golden strings, and with a golden crown. These she will use in the rôle of Sappho."

M. TROPLONG, the President of the Senate and Chief Justice of France, has written an elaborate article on Gluck's "Armide." It seems M. Troplong's physicians forbade him study, and to amuse his time, he studied Gluck's scores.

PICCOLOMINI has been charming the Cincinnati-ans; from there we trace her shining path through Louisville, St. Louis, Memphis, &c., to New Orleans.

New Orleans seems to be revelling in music. Here is one morning's report from the Picayune, (March 6):

The opera and the theatres have been well attended during the week, as they should have been, for the attractions have been of a high order. At the Theatre d'Orleans, we have had a performance, by the regular company, of "Les Dragons de Villars," "Robert le Diable" (for the benefit of Mr. Taste,) and "La Favorite." Besides these, there have been two performances of "Les Huguenots," Mlle. Poinot and Carl Formes appearing as Valentine and Marc; and one of the "Norma," with Laborde as Norma, Mme Berkel as Adalgisa, Sig'r Tamaro as Pollio, and M. Dubreil as Oroveso.

Well! We are to have a first class opera house. It is all settled. It is to be located on the corner of Toulouse and Bourbon streets. Mr. Boudonsquie is to be its manager. It is to cost something like $200,000, and is to be ready to be opened by the last of the coming October. Mr. Ullman and Mr. Boudonsquie have entered into an arrangement which secures to us thirty nights of Italian Opera in the next season.

Music Abroad.

England.

MANCHESTER.—The Athenæum speaks of a performance of the "Messiah," given lately to the "working classes," by the gentlemen of the Choral Society.

M. Halle, — who is aiding so far as the presidency and energy of an admirable musician and honorable man can do, to make Manchester one of the centres of European music—conducted. The solo singers were, Mrs. Snnderland, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Montem Smith, and Signor Belletti. But the audience was the thing. To quote from the Manchester Guardian: "No fewer than 4,200 tickets were subscribed for and distributed amongst employés of various classes; and it is believed that about this number of persons were present. The noble hall was crowded in every part with an assemblage consisting mainly of the working classes, and nothing could be more admirable than their quiet, orderly deportment during performances occupying nearly four hours! Judging by their earnest and rapt attention, their quiet and subdued demeanor, their manifest delight, bursting forth into enthusiastic and uncontrollable plaudits, this great experiment on the influence of the grandest music, enunciating the loftiest and holiest themes ever announced to mortal eye or ear, must be regarded as a complete and splendid success." Before the performance began, the Rev. Dr. Hook, of Leeds, delivered the address, in the best taste. We especially approve the terms in which he spoke of the concert. His remarks, without any arrogance of condescension, were virtually coincident with Dr. Johnson's large-minded recognition of some pleasure as the right of all persons, however modest be their fortunes, when the Lexicographer tersely said, "Life is a pill which none of us can swallow without some gilding." In another point of view, Dr. Hook's address, as coming from an earnest clergyman, is especially to be remembered. He introduced the performance of "The Messiah" as "an innocent and rational amusement." He then gave a few such particulars of Handel's life and works as were calculated to interest his audience; and not the least welcome clause in his discourse was one intimating that the evening's popular festival at Manchester might, probably, be reproduced at Leeds. Other informants confirm the statement in the Manchester Guardian, that the performance was musically first-rate. "It was a grand sight," writes one, "and would have gladdened your heart." Rumor says, that there may be another of these performances at Manchester; in fact, that the money for such a capital purpose has been offered already.

LONDON.—From the Athenæum of Feb. 19, we take the following items:

At the Crystal Palace Concert on Saturday, Madam Hayes was the singer. We perceive that she will take the leading soprano part in "Solomon," on Friday next, at Exeter Hall.

On Monday evening there was a Popular Concert of Mendelssohn's Chamber Music, at the St. James's Hall, at which the singers were those of the previous week. This pleased so much more than such miscellaneous collections of inanity as the pieces of ballad-work, chiefly hitherto given at the St. James's Hall on Monday evenings, that on Monday next the selection is to be taken from Mozart's music; and we hear that Handel and Bach are to have their turns. Why not an Italian evening, too,—with Corelli, Geminiani, and Scarlatti to furnish the instrumental part of the treat? On Monday, also, was given a concert of the Amateur Society, at which, among other music, one of Mozart's Concertos was performed by that excellent amateur pianist, Mr. S. Waley.

The programme of Herr Pauer's Second Soirée at Camberwell included a trio, in B flat, by M. Rubinstein.

The scheme of Mr. Hullah's Wednesday Concert was made up of Dr. Bennett's "May Queen" and Beethoven's "Choral Symphony." The concert attracted so large an audience that the English and the German work are both announced for repetition, at St. Martin's Hall, on the 1st of March. The singers were Miss Banks, Miss Martin, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Santley. Dr. Bennett's Cantata suits Miss Banks thoroughly; and she seems to have been studying of late for refinement of articulation. Miss Martin, as so young a singer, merits no common praise for the steadiness with which she went through the tremendous part of the soprano—the epithet is no exaggeration—in the "Choral Symphony." On the whole, the music went very well.

Mr. Henry Leslie's programme, on Thursday evening, for the Fourth Concert of his choir, included an act of music by Bishop. Five of the seven pieces in it were the best known of those glees, with choruses, which were the nearest approach permitted him, by the unmusical managers of his period, to opera fi-n-ales. There are some twenty more as good as those given, if less familiar; and among Bishop's glees, without accompaniment, are several superior to "The Fisherman's Good Night" and "Beam of Light"; to name but one, his setting of Joanna Baillie's lyric, "Up, quit thy hower." There is no modern English music which will displace Bishop's; none so fresh in melody, so clear in style, so legitimate in effect. The other part of the concert was made up of pieces which have been performed with approval on former occasions, varied by Herr Pauer's pianoforte playing.

It is now stated that Mr. Smith is about to give English operas at the close of his Italian season; and that before Miss L. Pyne and Mr. Harrison vacate Covent Garden Theatre for the Southern, the "Rip Van Winkle" of Mr. Bristow, an American composer, will be produced by them. They should be tired themselves, we fancy, of singing nothing but Mr. Balfe's music, since this week, when something else than "Satanella" had to be given, the alternative has been "The Rose of Castille," an opera worn threadbare months ago.

For the second concert of the Musical Society, we perceive, are announced, as novelties, Herr Gade's "Highland Overture," a concert piece, for pianoforte and orchestra, by M. Silas; and a vocal Scena, by Mr. Henry Smart.

Letters from Berlin announce that the agreeable mezzo-soprano singer, Mdle. Jenny Meyer, whose promise impressed us so favorably at last year's Whitsuntide Festival at Cologne, intends to visit London, among the other concert-guests of 1859. The Vienna journals mention the production there of Mr. Balfe's "Rose of Castille," without success. The arrival of Herr Joachim in England may be shortly expected.

Paris.

The musical season was never duller than at present. No novelty at the Grand-Opéra; none at the Italiens; none at the Opéra-Comique. Meyerbeer's forthcoming opera, Dinorah, and the grand Festival to be given in March, at the Palace of Industry, absorb all attention. Mr. Gye, I hear, has secured Dinorah for Covent Garden, and it is rumored that Meyerbeer will go to London to superintend the rehearsals. It is to be hoped that he may be satisfied with the performance of his new work at the Royal Italian Opera. M. Litolf lately paid a flying visit to Paris, and has returned to the country to finish his five-act opera. Rossini keeps up his "Saturday evenings" with unflinching courage. The week before last was devoted to literature. Last Saturday was entirely musical. Not, however, so attractive a soirée, as that which was graded by the presence of Grisi, Mario, Taglioni, and Mad. Borghi-Mamo. A new Russian pianist, Madlle. Starck, who, of course, has played before Rossini—pauvre Rossini!—has announced a concert to take place at Herz's Rooms. The début of Madlle. Dorus, to which I alluded last week, has been attended with signal success. It took place on Sunday last, at the third concert of the Conservatoire, when Haydn's Creation was performed. I have already told you Mademoiselle Dorus was the daughter of the eminent flautist who bears her name. I may now add—which I forgot before—that she is the niece and pupil of Madame Dorus-Gras, the celebrated cantatrice, whose name is intimately associated with some of the most brilliant passages of the Académie-impériale de Musique et de Danse. The fair débütante was extremely nervous at first; she was, however, so kindly received and so warmly encouraged, that she soon regained self-possession, and convinced her hearers that, in endowments and acquisitions, she was no ordinary person. The voice is a pure soprano, of average compass, agreeable in quality, and slightly veiled. She phrases well, executes well, and her style is simple and pure. Altogether she created an unusual sensation, and left the room overwhelmed with applause. I may mention en passant, that Haydn's Creation had not been performed in Paris for fifteen years.—London Musical World, Feb. 19.

The correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune furnishes the following items of operatic and dramatic intelligence:

Our last theatrical year was one of the most profitable recently seen, no less than 13,878,499f. having been paid into the theatres' treasuries. We had 215 dramatic authors and 50 composers, for the pieces and operas played—there were only 199 of the former and 39 of the latter year before last—and there were 237 new operas and pieces played. I shall not give you a detailed list of the number brought out by each theatre, but I select the principal theatres; the Grand Opera gave us only two new productions, an opera, "La Magicienne," and a ballet, "Saeontala;" the Opera Comique gave us seven new operas; the Odeon, nine new pieces; the Theatre Lyrique, the same number; the Vaudeville, ten; the Varieties, fourteen; the Gymnase, thirteen. I have purposely omitted the French Comedy to speak of it particularly. In 1851, it played ninety-one pieces in all, of which eleven were new; in 1852, eighty-five, of which eleven were new; in 1857, eighty-three pieces, of which five only were new, the prodigious success of "La Fiammina" keeping it in possession of the stage for a long while, and excluding new pieces. This last year, 1858, we had there seventy-eight pieces, nine of which were new. The authors most played were Molière and M. Scribe. The former had eleven pieces played, and they were played 129 times; these pieces were "Amphytrion," played 5 times; "L'Avare," 11; "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," 31; "Le Dépit Amoureux," 15; "Don Juan," 22; "Les Femmes Savantes," 15; "Georges Dandin," 2; "Le Malade Imaginaire," 13; "Le Médecin Malgré lui," 2; "Le Misanthrope," 8; "Tartuffe," 18. M. Scribe had nine works played 143 times; these were "Bataille de Dames," which was played 12 times; "Bertrand et Raton," 1; "La Calomnie," 7; "Une Chaîne," 8; "Les Doigts de Fée," 55; "Fen Lionel," 30; "Oscar on le Mari qui trompe sa femme," 9; "Valerie," 12; and "Le Verre d'Eau," 9 times. A good many play-wrights have complained of the manager of the French Comedy for not giving enough variety! What would they have said in 1803 when the French Comedy played 122 old pieces and only nine new ones, and among these pieces were thirty-five tragedies, a good many degrees below the zero of Addison's "Cato."

Prince Poniatowski is to bring out a new opera at the Italiens' and a five act opera at the Grand Opera next season. He acted as president at the distribution of prizes at the Sacred Music School recently, and in the course of his speech, said: "There is no such thing as German, Italian, French music; Rossini says, and he is the greatest authority in musical matters, believe me, there are but two sorts of music, the good and the bad." I told you in a recent letter how beautifully "Semiramide" is sung here. I have met since I wrote you a Frenchman's description of M'me Alboni; it is droll enough and just too: "Alboni looked like a fireman who had just gotten home after a large conflagration and had time enough to slip on a dressing gown, but forgot to take his helmet off his head. She don't look much like a young warrior who has just crushed the Scythians, unless, indeed, she crushed them by sitting on their army." You know M'me Alboni is an enormous woman, and I dare say remember the epigram made in America to the effect that Alboni was greasy and Grisi all-boney. M'me Tedesco has been engaged at the Grand Opera at $12,000 a year. M'lle Sophie Cruvelli sang last week at a charity concert at Turin; it was her first appearance in public since her marriage to Baron Vigier. The letter which has been going the rounds of the American newspapers as being from M'me de Lagrange turns out to be a hoax.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

O ruddier than the cherry, Handel. 30
Celebrated bass or baritone song from the Serenata: Acis and Galatea.

O yes, I do remember. Song. Francis Woolcott. 25
Easy and pleasing.

O come to me over the Sea. Ballad. J. H. McNaughton. 25
A pretty and taking melody, which will be received with favor by young singers.

With Guitar Accompaniment.

Minnie Clyde. Song by Crosby. Arranged by C. J. Horn. 25

Gentle Hattie. Song and Chorus by St. John. Arranged by T. B. Bishop. 25
The first of these songs has long been a favorite with the public, and a Guitar-arrangement has often been called for. The second song is just now beginning to obtain a wide circulation. It is one of those melodies which will wander over the whole country, taken up and carried onward by bands of minstrels and serenaders.

Instrumental Music.

Ever of thee. Reverie Tremolo. Charles Fradel. 25
An arrangement of very moderate difficulty, mostly in the favorite Tremolo style, and distinguished by the nice taste, which the public now begin to appreciate in the works of this composer.

Persian Polka. Chas. D'Albert. 30

Soldiers' Polka. " 35
Both of these polkas are enjoying an immense popularity in England. Edition after edition is struck off, up to the eightieth edition of the Soldiers' Polka, but still the demand is steadily increasing. This is good news for the dancing public, with whom a new, pretty Polka never comes amiss.

Maud. Valse chantante. Henry Laurent. 25

The principal airs in this pretty waltz are borrowed from Balfe's well known musical version of Tennyson: "Come into the garden, Maud."

Song of our native land. Irish melody. Varied by W. V. Wallace. 60

An excellent arrangement, which needs no recommendation.

Venzano Valse. Luigi Venzano. 50

A brilliant, sparkling Waltz, composed originally for the voice, and, next to the Ricci Waltz, the most celebrated bravura-piece of great songstresses. Mrs. Es-cott has lately performed it in Zerrahn's third Concert. The original arrangement with words. Italian and English, has also been issued in a new edition by the publisher.

KNORR'S METHODICAL GUIDE. For Teachers of Pianoforte Music. Translated from the German edition, by G. A. Schmitt. 50

"Having published a complete Method of Piano Instruction in which is embraced every essential requisite for the Pupil's understanding of the subject, the author issues the present volume for the more especial use of Teachers. In it they will find hints that will assist them in imparting to their pupils the true artistic piano touch, which requires perfect independence of the joints, not only of the hand, but of each finger; an independence which cannot be obtained without that position of the hand which I have herein, as well as in my revision of A. E. Müller's method, laid down as the true one. JULIUS KNORR."

Richard Wagner's Programme to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

It is a difficult matter for any one, not intimately acquainted with this wonderfully significant work of Art, to understand it on the first hearing. Hence it may be permitted to offer some aid to that considerable portion of an audience, who find themselves in this predicament; not indeed with a view to imparting an absolute understanding of Beethoven's masterpiece—since that can only come from intimate personal study and insight—but simply with the hope of furnishing some hints illustrative of its artistic arrangement, which in the great peculiarity and entirely unimitated novelty of the work might escape the observation of the unprepared and easily confused hearer. Taking it for granted that it is the essential problem of the higher instrumental music, to express in tones what cannot be expressed in words, we think we can approximate to the solution of an insoluble problem by calling in the aid of words of our great poet GOETHE. These, to be sure, stand in no immediate connection with Beethoven's work, and can in no wise indicate the meaning of his purely musical creation with any thoroughness. Yet so nobly do they express those higher moods of the human soul which lie at the foundation of this Symphony, that in the impossibility of any fuller understanding one may content himself with identifying these moods, so that he need not go away from a hearing of the music without at least some apprehension of its purport.

FIRST MOVEMENT (Allegro ma non troppo, D minor.)—A most sublimely conceived conflict of the soul, struggling after joy, against the pressure of that hostile power, that stations itself between us and all earthly bliss, appears to lie at the foundation of this first movement. The great main theme, which at the very outset steps forth from a gloomy veil in all the nakedness of its terrible might, may perhaps, not altogether inappropriately to the sense of the entire tone-poem, be translated by the words of Goethe:

"Entbehren sollst du! Sollst entbehren!"

[This in most of the translations is rendered: "Renounce! Thou must renounce." But the word entbehren does not signify "renounce." The meaning of the phrase is, (for it cannot be given in a word), that it is the destiny of man always to have wants which cannot be satisfied.]

Opposed to this powerful enemy we recognize a noble spirit of defiance, a manly energy of resistance, which to the very middle of the movement rises to an open conflict with the adversary, in which we seem to see two mighty wrestlers, each of whom leaves off invincible. In isolated gleams of light we may discern the sweet sad smile of happiness, that seems to seek us, for whose possession we strive, and from whose attainment we are withheld by that maliciously powerful foe, who overshadows us with his nocturnal wings, so that even to ourselves the prospect of that far off grace is dimmed and we relapse into a dark brooding, which has only power to rouse itself again to new defiance and resistance, and to new wrestlings with the demon who robs us of true joy. Thus force, resistance, struggle, longing, hoping, almost reaching, again losing, again seeking, again battling—such are the elements of restless movement in this marvellous piece of music, which droops however now and then into that more continuous state of utter joylessness, which Goethe (in his "Faust") denotes by the words:

"But to new horror I awake each morn
And I could weep hot tears, to see the sun
Dawn on another day, whose round forlorn
Accomplishes no wish of mine,—not one;
Which still, with froward captiousness, impairs
E'en the presentiment of every joy,
While low realities and paltry cares
The spirit's food imaginings destroy.
And then when falls again the veil of night,
Stretch'd on my couch I languish in despair;
Appalling dreams my troubled soul affright;
No soothing rest vouchsafed me even there," &c.

At the close of the movement, this dreary, joyless mood, growing to gigantic magnitude, seems to embrace the All, as if in grand and awful majesty it would fain take possession of this world, which God has made—for Joy!

SECOND MOVEMENT. (Scherzo molto vivace.) A wild delight seizes us at once with the first rhythms of this second movement: it is a new world into which we enter, in which we are whirled away to giddiness, to loss of reason; it is as if, urged by desperation, we fled before it, in ceaseless, restless efforts chasing a new and unknown happiness, since the old one, that once sunned us with its distant smile, seems to have utterly forsaken us. Goethe expresses this impulse, not without significance perhaps for the present case, in the following words:

—"The end I aim at is not Joy.
I crave excitement, agonizing bliss," &c.
—"In depths of sensual pleasure drow'd,
Let us our fiery passions still Enwrapped in magic's veil profound,
Let wondrous charms our senses thrill!
Plunge we in time's tempestuous flow,
Stem we the rolling surge of chance!
There may alternate weal and woe,
Success and failure, as they can,
Mingle and shift in changeful dance;
Excitement is the sphere for man!"

With the headlong entrance of the middle-subject there suddenly opens upon us one of those scenes of earthly recreation and indulgence: a certain downright jollity seems expressed in the simple, oft-repeated theme; it is full of naïveté and self-satisfied cheerfulness, and we are tempted to think of Goethe's description of such homely contentment:

"I now must introduce to you
Before aught else, this jovial crew,
To show how lightly life may glide away;
With them each day's a holiday;
With little wit and much content,
Each on his own small round intent," &c.

But to recognize such limited enjoyment as the goal of our restless chase after satisfaction and the noblest joy, is not our destiny: our look upon this scene grows clouded; we turn away and resign ourselves anew to that restless impulse, which with the goading of despair urges us unceasingly on to seize the fortune, which, alas! we are not destined to reach so; for at the close of the movement we are again impelled toward that scene of comfortable indulgence, which we have already met, and which we this time at the first recognition of it repulse from us with impatient haste.

THIRD MOVEMENT. (Adagio molto e cantabile, in B flat major.) How differently these tones speak to our hearts! How pure, how heavenly soothing, they melt the defiance, the wild impulse of the soul tormented by despair, into a tender and melancholy feeling! It is as if memory awoke within us,—the memory of an early enjoyed and purest happiness:

"Thee would celestial love, with holy kiss,
Come o'er me in the Sabbath's stilly hour,

While, fraught with solemn and mysterious power,
Chimed the deep-sounding bell, and prayer was bliss."

And with this recollection there comes over us once more that sweet longing, that is so beautifully expressed in the second theme of this movement (Andante moderato, D major), and to which we may not unfitly apply Goethe's words:

"A yearning impulse, undefined yet dear,
Drove me to wander on through wood and field;
With heaving breast and many a burning tear,
I felt with holy joy a world revealed."

It seems like the longing of love, which again is answered, only with more movement and embellishment of expression, by that hope-promising and sweetly tranquilizing first theme, so that on the return of the second it seems to us as if love and hope embraced, so that they might the more entirely exert their gentle power over our tormented soul. It is as when Faust speaks, after the Easter bells and chorus of angels:

"Wherefore, ye tones celestial, sweet and strong,
Come ye a dweller in the dust to seek?
Ring out your chimes believing crowds among."

Even so seems the yet quivering heart with soft resistance to wish to keep them off: but their sweet power is greater than our already mitigated defiance; we throw ourselves overpowered into the arms of this gracious messenger of purest bliss:

"O still sound on, thou sweet celestial strain, Tears now are gushing,—Earth, I'm thine again!"

Yes, the bleeding heart seems to be getting healed and re-invigorated, and to be manning itself to that exalted courage which we think we recognize in the almost triumphant passage, towards the end of the movement. Still, this elevation is not yet free from the reaction of the storms survived; but every approach of the old pain is instantly met with renewed alleviation from that gentle, magic power, before which finally, as in the last expiring gleams of lightning, the dispersed storm disappears.

FOURTH MOVEMENT. The transition from the third to the fourth movement, which begins as it were with a shrill shriek, may be pretty well indicated again by Goethe's words:

"But ah! I feel, how'er I yearn for rest, Content flows now no longer from my breast."
—"A wondrous show! but ah! a show alone!
Where shall I grasp thee, infinite nature, where?
Ye breasts, ye fountains of all life, whereon
Hang heaven and earth, from which the blighted soul
Yearneth to draw sweet solace, still ye roll
Your sweet and fostering tides—where are ye—where!
Ye gush, and must I languish in despair?"

With this beginning of the last movement, Beethoven's music assumes decidedly a more speaking character. It quits the character, preserved in the three first movements, of pure instrumental music, which is marked by an infinite and indeterminate expression. The progress of the musical invention or poem presses to a decision, to a decision such as can only be expressed in human speech. Let us admire the way in which the master prepares the introduction of speech and the human voice, as a necessity to be expected, in this thrilling Recitative of the instrumental basses, which, already almost forsaking the limits of absolute music, as it were with eloquent, pathetic speech approaches the other instruments, urging them to a decision, and finally itself passes over into a song-theme, which sweeps the other instruments along with it in its simple, solemn, joyous current, and so swells to a mighty pitch. This seems like the final effort to express by instrumental music alone a secure, well defined, and never clouded state of joy; but the untractable element seems incapable of this limitation; it foams up to a roaring sea, subsides again, and stronger than ever presses the wild, chaotic shriek of unsatisfied passion upon our ear. Then steps forth toward the tumult of the instruments a human voice, with the clear and sure expression of speech, and we know not whether we shall most admire the bold suggestion or the great naïveté of the master, when he lets this voice exclaim to the instruments:

"Friends, no more of these tones! rather let us sing together more pleasant and more joyful strains!"

With these words it grows light in the chaos; a definite and sure utterance is gained, in which we, borne upon the subdued element of the instrumental music, may hear now clearly and distinctly expressed, what to our tormented striving after joy must seem enduring, highest bliss. And here commences Schiller's

"HYMN TO JOY.

"Joy, thou brightest heaven-lit spark,
Daughter from the Elysian choir,
On thy holy ground we walk,
Reeling with ecstatic fire.
Thou canst bid in one again
All that custom tears apart;
All mankind are brothers, when
Waves thy soft wing o'er the heart.

CHORUS.

"Myriads, join the fond embrace!
'Tis the world's inspiring kiss!
Friends, yon dome of starry bliss
Is a loving Father's place.

"Who the happy lot doth share,
Friend to have, and friend to be—
Who a lovely wife holds dear—
Mingle in our Jubilee!
Yea—who calls one soul his own,
One on all earth's ample round:—
Who cannot, may steal alone,
Weeping from our holy ground!

CHORUS.

"Sympathy with blessings crown
All that in life's circle are!
To the stars she leads us, where Dwells enthroned the great Unknown.

"Joy on every living thing
Nature's bounty doth bestow,
Good and bad still welcoming;—
In her rosy path they go.
Kisses she to us has given,
Wine, and friends in death approved;—
Sense the worm has;—but in heaven
Stands the soul, of God beloved.

CHORUS.

"Myriads, do ye prostrate fall?
Feel ye the Creator near?
Seek him in yon starry sphere:
O'er the stars he governs all.

"Joy impels the quick rotation,
Sure return of night and day;
Joy's the main-spring of Creation,
Keeping every wheel in play.
She draws from buds the flowerets fair,
Brilliant suns from azure sky,
Rolls the spheres in trackless air,
Realms unreach'd by mortal eye.

CHORUS.

"As his suns, in joyful play,
On their airy circles fly,—
As the knight to victory,—
Brothers speed upon your way.

"From Truth's burning mirror still
Her sweet smiles th' inquirer greet;
She, up Virtue's toilsome hill
Guides the weary pilgrim's feet;
On Faith's sunny mountain, wave,
Floating far, her banners bright;
Through the rent walls of the grave
Flits her form in angel light

CHORUS.

"Patient, then, ye myriads live!
To a better world press on!
Seated on his starry throne,
God the rich reward will give.

"For the Gods what thanks are meet?
Like the Gods, then, let us be:
All the poor and lowly greet
With the glad some and the free;
Banish vengeance from our breast,
And forgive our deadliest foe;
Bid no anguish mar his rest,
No consuming tear-drops flow.

CHORUS.

"Be the world from sin set free!
Be all mutual wrong forgiven;
Brothers, in that starry heaven,
As we judge our doom shall be.

"Joy upon the red wine dances;
By the magic of the cup
Rage dissolves in gentle trances,
Dead despair is lifted up.
Brothers, round the nectar flies,
Mounting to the beaker's edge.
Toss the foam off to the skies!
Our Good Spirit here we pledge!

CHORUS.

"Him the seraphs ever praise,
Him the stars that rise and sink.
Drink to our Good Spirit, drink!
High to him our glasses raise!

"Spirits firm in hour of woe—
Help to innocence oppressed—
Truth alike to friend or foe—
Faith unbroken—wrong redressed—
Manly pride before the throne,
Cost it fortune, cost it blood—
Wreaths to just desert alone—
Downfall to all falsehood's brood!

CHORUS.

"Closer draw the holy ring!
By the sparkling wine-cup now,
Swear to keep the solemn vow—
Swear it by the heavenly King!

Animated, warlike sounds approach: we fancy that we see a troop of youths marching up, whose joyous, heroic spirit is expressed in the words:

"As his suns, in joyful play,
On their airy circles fly,—
As the knight to victory,
Brothers, speed upon your way."

This leads to a sort of joyful contest, expressed by instruments alone; we see the youths plunge boldly into battle, of which the crown of victory shall be JOY; and yet again we feel prompted to cite words of Goethe:

"He only merits liberty or life,
Who daily conquers them."

The victory, of which we doubted not, is won; the exertions of strength are rewarded by the smile of joy, which breaks forth jubilant in the consciousness of bliss newly earned by conquest:

"Joy, thou brightest," &c.

And now in the high feeling of Joy the expression of the universal Love of Man bursts forth from the swelling breast; in sublime inspiration we turn from the embrace of the whole human race to the great Creator of all things, whose benign presence we declare with clearest consciousness, yes—whose face we in a moment of sublimest transport imagine we behold through the blue opening ether:

"Myriads, join the fond embrace!
'Tis the world's inspiring kiss!
Friends, yon dome of starry bliss
Is a loving Father's place."
"Myriads, do ye prostrate fall?
Feel ye the Creator near?
Seek him in yon starry sphere:
O'er the stars he governs all."

It is as if now revelation justified us in the beatific faith: that every man was made for Joy. In the most powerful conviction we respond to one another:

"Myriads, join the fond embrace!"

and:

"Joy, thou brightest," &c.

For in the league or communion of divinely sanctioned universal human love, we may enjoy the purest joy. No longer merely in the thrill of the sublimest imagination, but in the expression of a directly revealed, sweetly inspiring truth we may answer the question:

"Myriads, do ye prostrate fall?
Feel ye the Creator near?"

with:

"Seek him in yon starry sphere," &c.

In the most confiding possession of the happiness vouchsafed, of the most child-like susceptibility to joy regained, we now surrender ourselves to its fruition: innocence of heart is restored to us, and with benediction the soft wing of Joy is spread over us:

"Thou canst bind in one again
All that custom tears apart;
All mankind are brothers, when
Waves thy soft wing o'er the heart.

To the mild beatitude of Joy succeeds now its jubilee:—jubilant we clasp the world to our breast; shouting and revelry fill the air like the thunder or the cloud, like the roar of the sea, which in everlasting motion and beneficent agitation quicken and sustain the earth for the joy of Man, to whom God gave it that he might be happy thereupon.

"EMBRACE, YE MILLIONS! IS NOT THIS THE
KISS OF THE WHOLE WORLD? BROTHERS,—O'ER YON STARRY DOME MUST A DEAR FATHER DWELL
—JOY! JOY, BEAUTIFUL SPARK OF DEITY!"

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Motives and Themes of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

(Concluded from last number.)

THE FOURTH MOVEMENT.

The last and grandest movement of this greatest work of the master (his Missa solennis, Op. 123, in D major, perhaps excepted) consists of seven smaller movements. In all except the first the human voices unite with the instruments. The music is set to thirty-six out of the ninety-six lines of Schiller's poem: "An die Freude" (To Joy.) The poem consists of eight trochaic stanzas of eight lines each, each followed by a chorus of four lines. From these words the master chose the first stanza with its chorus, the second, the third with its chorus, and the chorus to the fourth stanza. These seven smaller movements will be designated as Parts A B C &c.

The seven parts express the emotions caused by a series of ideas logically and psychologically following from each other in this connection.

The opening of the first Part (A.) gives vent to the misery of the human soul, which, after having proposed the eternal questions of human destiny, after having passed through all the different degrees of passion from sadness, to despair (1st movement), from gentle emotions to the wildest frantic enjoyment (2d movement);—after having felt sacred influences of ideal repose and the warmer, yearning swellings of the human heart (Adagio and Andante), finds itself still without a real and lasting consolation. There is one idea which contains this consolation, an idea which is the polar star of all human aspirations: "HUMANITY;" human happiness, brotherly love to all men. This great idea is pronounced in the chastest and grandest manner possible by the orchestra and in Part B. by the human voices and the orchestra. Part C encourages man, in most magnificent numbers, to run his course like a hero on his way to victory. Nervous energy pervades the whole movement, and the thrilling grand chorus repeats the apotheosis of Humanity by an invocation of its tutelar deity: JOY.

In the grandest manner the union of all mankind in a common brotherhood is consecrated in Part D. In sacred awe the millions acknowledge a common Father, dwelling above the stars mysteriously.

Part E is devoted to the celebration of the two ideas of Love to all men, and thanks to Joy, who makes all men brothers. The devotional feeling of the nearness of the Creator, almost too big for human utterance, changes to a confident belief in the "beloved Father above the stars."

In the next part, F, all the humanistic ideas of the preceding parts are repeated in a more elated and happier mood than before; the enthusiasm of joy and love, the fervor of the feeling of an universal common brotherhood, reaching its crowning climax in the 7th and last part of the movement, closing as a grand majestic jubilee celebrated by all men in the sanctuary of HUMAN HAPPINESS.

We will now examine the seven parts consecutively.

A. In strange contrast to the peaceful close of the Third Movement, opens this part, with this most expressive dissonance; A—b flat—d—f—b flat ff. The key-note has not been found yet that sets all the noblest chords of the human heart vibrating; the tune has not been struck yet that irresistibly, in triumphant numbers, bids all mankind march on the same path in the same steps. The above dissonance opens a dialogue between the reeds and brass instruments on the one hand, and the Contra-Bassi and Violoncelli on the other. The first eight measures, expressive of the bitterest woe, are answered in a Recitative by Contrabassi, and Violoncelli, full of impatience, softened down to grief at the close, (m 8—16.) Exceeding all recognized bounds, the master makes these expressive instruments sing out what until then had been entrusted to the human voice alone. More fiercely (m 17—25,) on a diminished-seventh chord, the reeds and brass instruments repeat their complaint and are answered in a strong and manly strain of assurance by the Bassi m 24—29. Some ray of hope, confidence of ultimate success, breathes in these tones, which are the introduction to a series of tableaux, we might say, that are to pass before man, to see perchance if one of them be the golden isle of bliss with the spring of life gushing forth in its vales elysian.

First is introduced theme No. 1, in m 30—37. But the Recit. m 38—47, full of disappointed expectation, and ending in saddest tones, tells us, that no hope has dawned as yet. Quite another rejoicing answer do the Bassi return in m 56—62, to the theme of the second movement, No. 13, stated in m 48—55, the second half of the theme being in a cheerful key, F major. The Recitative, however, joyous as it is, expresses a doubt, closing as it does in the form of the musical question. This is answered by the first two measures of the religious theme, No. 20. The following Recit. seems to enter into this mood, it being of a devotional character, in m 65—72, when it suddenly awakes and in tones of angry impatience, (m 72—75) renounces this emotion. Not devotion alone can make us happy, it seems to say, but more is wanted. An active religion of good works to all men being the leading idea of all the subsequent parts, the motive of the Hymn to Joy is now stated. As if yet uncertain, it appears over the Dominant Seventh instead of the Tonic-Chord, which would make the statement too positive. With eager joy the Rec. makes answer, (m 81—91), consisting of the same tones in the main, as the one opening Part B, in which the Baritone Solo invites the human voices to sing pleasanter tones, more full of joy. And now the right answer is going to be pronounced, the gospel of the new covenant, the glad tidings of Joy, the apotheosis of "Humanity."

Allo assai. ($\text{♩} = 80$.)

This chaste, simple melody, not exceeding the compass of a fifth, in the song form, the simplest of all musical forms, and expressing as it does the highest idea for man as man, is another proof of the axiom, that the greatest artist uses the simplest means to attain the grandest results. This theme is repeated by the strings singly, and then by the whole orchestra to m 187, followed up by a Ritornello to m 207. This ritornello in Parts B & C always follows the above melody, it being restricted then to four measures.

The instruments have scarcely ended the Hymn, when suddenly returns the first Rec. (m 1—8) in m 208—215. Their angry and passionate call is answered by the Baritone solo singing the fifth Rec. (m 80—90) in m 216—236, some matter being added in the middle to these words: "O friends, not these tones! But let us strike up pleasanter ones and tones more full of joy."

B follows without interruption first repeating m 76 to 80; and then the voices sing to melody 26 the following stanzas. The last four lines of each stanza are repeated by the Chorus, and the Ritornello comes in at the end of each stanza. (The words which are repeated are indicated, by this mark † being put before them:

First stanza: "Joy, beautiful spark of the Gods, daughter from Elysium, intoxicated with heavenly fire, we enter, a Heavenly one, thy sanctuary. † Thy charms unite again, what etiquette had sternly separated; all men become brothers, where thy gentle wings are hovering."

Second stanza: "To whose happy lot it falls to be the friend of a friend, who has won for his portion a sweet wife, let him join us with rejoicings;—† yes, who only calls a single soul his own on the globe of the earth. And he who never has succeeded, let him steal weeping out of our union."

From m 297—330 extends a variation of No. 26, inclusive of the Ritornello, which this time is accompanied by the voices in solemn chords repeating the last six words of the Third Stanza: "All beings drink joy at the breasts of Nature; all men good and bad follow her rosy path. † Kisses gave she us and grapes; a friend tried in death; rapture was given to the worm, and the Cherub stands before God."

C is a magnificent variation of 26 in 6-8 time, Allegro assai vivace: Alla Marcia. The words in this part are the chorus to the fourth stanza of the poem:

"Joyously, as his suns are flying, through the gorgeous plain of heaven, run your course, O brothers! gladly as a hero to victory."

This last line inspired the master to this variation in the rhythm of a march.

This part has three subdivisions. The first extends from m. 331—431, including the Ritornello from m 423, and is set to the above words, the theme being, as stated in No. 27. The second subdivision (m 431—516) has for its theme 28 (being a variation of 27 or 26) and is purely instrumental; and the third resumes No. 26 in m 542—594 to the words of the first stanza. The first subdivision is sung by Tenore Solo and Tenori and Bassi Coro, the last subdivision by the full united choir.

It will be noticed that the rhythm of 27 is similar to that of the first measure of No. 13, while that of 28 is similar to that of No. 13, second, third, and fourth measures. It is accompanied by the rhythm of 27.

The second subdivision presents a very complicated treatment of No. 28, evidently rendering the words: "Run, O brothers, your course." Each of the principal instruments takes up the nervous energetic theme No. 28, which is shortened to two measures from m 462; afterwards a passage in one measure is formed from it. Very frequently one instrument will begin the motive on the 1st, and the next on the 4th eighth-note of the measure, making it intensely excited and agitated. In m 511—516 a passage derived from it leads to the single tone f sharp, which is repeated for 8 measures, in various octaves; and in the remaining 4 measures is repeated in the rhythm of 27, on the same degree. After those billows of stormy harmonies, these 12 measures, containing only one tone, act like oil on the troubled waters, calming the hearer, and preparing the sweet sounds of 29, being the first three tones of No. 26. Two repetitions of the four measures f sharp and of No. 29 close this interlude (m 517—542) and lead over to the ff Chorus of all the voices contrasted by a very bold figural accompaniment of the strings, while reeds and brass play the melody in-unison with the voices.

D is devoted to the most solemn expression of the most sublime emotions the human heart is capable of feeling. In three grand melodies (the first of which appears in 30), breathing a spirit sacred and primordial, the master sings these words:

Chorus to first stanza: "Be embraced, ye Millions! this kiss to the whole world! Brothers, above the starry canopy a beloved Father must be dwelling."

Chorus to third stanza: "You fall down, Millions? Dost thou feel the Creator, world? (Ah-nest du, &c). Seek him above the starry tent. Above the stars he must be dwelling."

Andante maestoso. $\text{♩} = 72$.

The second melody extends from m 611—626, and is of a monitory character, to the words, "Brothers, etc." The third is of a strictly devotional character, (Adagio non troppo ma divoto,) to the words: "You fall down," extending from m 627 to 654, closes with mysterious eight measures on the chord of the minor ninth, A—c sharp—e—g—bb, the bassi vibrating A, and the other strings the rest pp, similar to the vibrations and undulations of light.

E. The text is these words: "Joy, beautiful spark of the Gods," &c., sung by one set of voices, the other set singing: "Be embraced, ye Millions," &c. The melodies are Nos. 26 and 30.

The two other sets of voices accompany with two melodies derived from the principal ones and sing the same two texts, all going on simultaneously.

The movement is Allegro energico, three quarter notes being equal to 84. The reeds play the melody against a rich figural accompaniment by the strings.

The vastness of the ideas and emotions led the composer to employ the counterpoint, in order to state the union of sentiments in the strongest and most animated manner. This contrapuntal treatment extends from 655—729. From here to 745 harmonies are wanting, all the voices singing in unison with the reeds and strings the following words: "Dost thou feel the Creator, world?" We should have said they are stammering those words in abrupt tones, and bold, awe-inspiring transitions (No. 31.) Yet these transitions proceed very regularly (a Sixth followed by a whole and a half step). Measures 737—741 are the same as m 638—642 of Part D, where they were harmonized.

From here to the end of Part E to m 762 sweet and soothing chords and progressions in Sixths and Thirds are set to the assuring words: "Brothers—above the starry canopy a beloved Father must be dwelling."

F. This part contains all the parts of the poem relating to Joy and man's universal brotherhood. Thus the themes are selected from all those melodies and motives that have a similar character. As if to give a chance to all voices and instruments to sing the same joyful themes in the greatest variety of melodious and harmonic changes, the greater portion of this part is written in the form of the Canon (catch). The motives are all intensified by being shortened, as will be seen from the original themes printed underneath. No. 36 alone makes an exception, being almost as slow as the original.

Four measures introduction (32) bring in No. 33, both themes alternately extending from m 763—783, where the Canon, No. 34, begins, and goes on to m 805, when No. 35 comes in, derived from the solemn No. 30. This is followed by a beautiful close, poco Adagio, in m 809—813, derived from No. 21 in the same manner as No. 33. All these motives are again derived from No. 1, measure 19, a very strong motive, which takes a very large share in the composition of this symphony. The canon No. 34, No. 35 and the close, this time lengthened by variations, are repeated from m 814 to m 838, where No. 36, derived from m 35 of No. 21, closes the part in m 842.

G. This part is introduced by eight measures (m 843—850) merely repeating the tones a—b increasing in tone and time from pp to ff, and from poco Allegro to Prestissimo, and forms the Finale of the Symphony. The excitement and rejoicing reach their highest possible degree. Instruments and voices go for the most part unisono. Only one new derived motive appears in m 861, taken from m 98 and 99 of No. 26. The orchestra begins with a motive derived from No. 30, the others being repetitions of those used in part F. The movement is Prestissimo, a half note equal to 132. The voices sing this selection of words:

"Be embraced, ye Millions! this kiss to the whole world. Brothers, above the starry tent a beloved Father must be dwelling. Be embraced, &c." These last words are sung in solemn chords and modulations, although very fast. "Joy, beautiful spark of the Gods, daughter from Elysium. Joy, beautiful spark of the Gods."

The last six words are sung ff in 3-4 time (the rest of the movement being in Maestoso, one quarter-note being equal to 60, in m 916—919. The voices join the instruments (which begin m 843 with the introduction) in m 855, keeping with them to m 920. From m 920 the instruments finish the symphony in m 940. They begin in m 920, with No. 32, the strings playing it twice in the time the reeds play it once. After eight measures of shouts of joy the reeds close with three measures of unisono runs and in m 939 a motive closes, strongly resembling No. 19, only that the four tones a are kept in the same octave.

Thus ends the triumphant, gigantic close; a worthy Finale to the wonderful and grand tone-poetry, which makes up this grandest of all Symphonies.

The orchestra is gradually enlarged from the simple and ordinary dimensions which it has in the first, second, and third movements, excepting the Trio to the second. In this Trio, Tromboni, Tenore, Alto and Basso are added, but omitted afterward to Part No. 4. In the fourth movement (A) a Contra-Fagotto is added, and in B two horns to the two already in the orchestra. In the March Variation Flauto piccolo, triangle, cymbals and big drum are added. In the solemn part D those solemn and grand instruments, the three trombones, appear again: the other instruments added before being omitted. In F two more horns are used with the three trombones, and in G, adequate to the overwhelming joy of the Finale, the orchestra presents the following magnificent dimensions: Violini 1mi and 2di, Alto-Viola, Violoncelli, Bassi; Flauto piccolo, Flauti, Oboi, Clarinetti, Fagotti; Corni 1mi and 2di, Trumpets, Tromboni Tenore Alto and Basso; Kettle-Drums, Big Drum, Cymbals and Triangle.

Sketch of the Life of Beethoven.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

In April, 1803, he produced the Mount of Olives. This oratorio, to be rightly estimated, must not be classed with those that have been written for England, which, embodying a totally different sentiment, are cast in as different a mould, and produce their effects by as different means. In accordance with the spirit of his church—for Beethoven, though a free-thinker, was imbued with the formulae in which he had been reared and by which he was surrounded—it represents the personal agony of the Saviour, and in the truthfulness of this representation, in its dramatic personality, lies its chief merit. Throughout the work we have proof, as ample as in "Adelaide," and in "Ah, perfido," of the feeling for true vocal effect which has been denied to the composer, and hence we must account, by other causes than the want of this, for the unvoiced character of some of his latter writings. It may be allowable to speculate, that these causes lay in his defective hearing, which disabled him from testing the effect of what he wrote. In suggesting this, no concurrence is yielded to the unmusicianly supposition that Beethoven's ideas, or his forms of development, owe any of their peculiarity to his physical infirmity. Having acquired the power of thinking music, he no longer depended upon his outer sense for the exercise of this faculty; and there is no reason to conjecture that, had his external organization remained perfect, his internal capacity could have manifested itself in any respect otherwise than it did. The art of orchestration, however, whether for voices or instruments, demands constant experience, and the comparison of every effect with its means. A musical idea is born of the imagination and needs not experiment for a midwife; but the coloring of this idea, though conceived coincidentally with it, must always depend upon habitual familiarity with the quality and the strength of the various characters of tone combined to produce it, not to be an abortion of the artist's purpose. If this speculation be admitted, it may serve to explain some rare failures of instrumentation in Beethoven's scores, no less than his unsuitable treatment of the voice; and I, for one, am equally confident that he would occasionally have changed the distribution of his parts, had he heard their effect, and that he would have left the matter and the construction of his movements unaltered had he heard them fifty-fold. As examples of the miscarriage of the master's intention in the effect of orchestral coloring, that are generally familiar, I need but refer to the point of imitation between the brass and the wood instruments in the minuetto of the Symphony in F, where the preponderance of the former annuls the response of the latter; and again the passage of demisemiquavers for the double-basses (the last variation of the theme), in the Symphony in C minor, where the accompaniment of the entire orchestra renders this insufficiently supported figure indistinct, if not wholly unaudible.

Bernadotte, then ambassador at Vienna, suggested to Beethoven, in the course of 1803, the composition of a grand instrumental work in honor of Napoleon. His republican feeling caught fire at the proposal, and he entered upon the task with the determination to produce a masterpiece, that should stand in art, as its hero does in history—the sun of a system. He spent the greater part of a year upon the composition, and wrought in it the first great manifestation of his individuality, fulfilling to the utmost the highest intention he could have formed with regard to it, and constructing in it a monument to his own genius that can never perish. The noblest and best that belongs to music, characterizes this colossal effort; and if the greatness of Beethoven, as an artist, were to be epitomized in a single work, this work would represent it all. The completed score was about to be forwarded to the First Consul; the title-page was headed "Bononaparte;" at the bottom of the leaf was written "Luigi van Beethoven;" and the author was considering the form of words that should link these extraordinary names, when he learned that Napoleon had assumed the crown of the empire. Enraged at this, as though at a personal grievance, so entirely had he identified himself with the subject, he tore the intended title-page in pieces, threw the manuscript of his outraged imaginings upon the ground, and would not for many months allow the work to be named. It was subsequently purchased by Prince Lobkowitz, at whose residence it was first performed, and now it was that it received the title of Sinfonia Eroica, with the superscription "Per festeggiare il sovvenire d'un gran uomo."

His next great work was the opera of Leonore, which was produced in November, 1805, but seven days after the entry of Napoleon's troops into Vienna. Its non-success was the natural consequence of the political excitement of the time, of the absence from the city of the principal lovers of music, including the Lichnowsky family, and of the theatre being attended almost entirely by French officers, who probably did not understand the language, and certainly could not comprehend the music; and it was accordingly, withdrawn after the third performance. The opera had been written under engagement to the manager of the theatre, who provided Beethoven with a lodging during the time of its composition, which being, however, as distasteful to him as three others he rented at the same time (this matter of residence was one about which Beethoven was especially capricious), he wrote the work at the village of Hetzendorf, and it was now produced with the first overture—that published after his death, as Op. 138, and commonly known by the name of "Leonore Fidelio."

Fortunately for art, the English theatrical custom of regarding original non-success as total failure, prevailed not in Vienna, and the opera was accordingly reproduced in March, 1806, with some advantageous modification of the libretto, when it was well received; but in consequence of disputes between the composer and the manager and singers, it was again laid aside after three representations; in the interim, since the first production, the great overture in C (known by the name of "Leonore"), as well as the second overture (Op. 139), which is a sketch for this, had been written, and it was with this grand composition that the opera was reproduced.

When Prince Lichnowsky returned to Vienna, one of his first cares was for Beethoven's opera. Accordingly, a meeting took place at his house to discuss the remodelling of the work, when the composer was, with extreme difficulty, persuaded to omit a duet and a trio, in which the love of Marzeline for Fidelio, and jealousy of Jaquino were exhibited—probably, to rewrite the songs of Pizarro and Florestan, to insert the march—and to compose the fourth overture—that in E, known by the name of "Fidelio.") The libretto was now reduced from three into two acts, the name of the opera was changed to Fidelio, and in this altered form the work was again reproduced in 1807, to meet with that success which has stamped it a classic of the lyrical stage. On this occasion, Mesdames Milder and Marconi personated Leonore and Marzeline, and MM. Röckel and Meyer, Florestan and Pizarro. To describe the merits of this master-piece would greatly surpass the present limits; the chief are its all-powerful dramatic character, and the gradual growth of the intensity of its expression with the progress of the action. It is rendered difficult of comprehension to a general public by the minuteness of the expression, which necessitates in the hearers, not only a knowledge of the broad sentiment, but of the very words of the text, each one of which has its meaning illustrated in the music. This quality, which induces the very perfection of Fidelio as a work of art, has had the baneful influence, upon recent productions, of suggesting a corrupt style, in which the principals of composition are sacrificed to the pretence of expression, and music ceases to be music to become mere declamation. Whoever would exalt this style, by referring it to the work under consideration, must be insensible to the technical beauties of that work, which transcend even the beauty of its expression, and forget that means are essential to an end.

In 1806, while he was corresponding with the Countess Guicciardi, Beethoven wrote the Symphony in B flat, the epitome of a happy love in the many phases of its enthusiasm, finding, in this indulgence of his innermost feeling a relief from the vexations occasioned by his opera, by his uncertain health, and even by his deafness.

In the year following the final production of Fidelio, he wrote successively that glorious manifestation of will and power, the Symphony in C minor, and that musical idyl which truthfully tells us how deep was his love of nature, the Sinfonia Pastorale. He had already, in his overture to "Coriolan," and in each of the overtures to his opera, proved the power of music, independently of words, to embody a definite expression, as distinct from the undefined, if not undecided sentiment of the instrumental works of previous composers; and in the Sinfonia Pastorale, where the character is didactic instead of dramatic, where the expression is of his own feelings, not of those of the persons of his story, this power is evinced with equal success. In these two symphonies an important originality of form is to be noticed, as conducting to the effect of unity in an extensive instrument work—the conjunction, namely, of several movements.

In like manner as the scherzo and the last movement are linked together, in the Symphony in C minor; and as the scherzo, the storm, and the finale, grow each out of the preceding in the Sinfonia Pastorale; so, in the grand pianoforte Trio in B flat, are the two last movements joined, and a similar construction is employed in several other works; but the most remarkable instance of its application is in the violin Quartet in C sharp minor, in which the entire composition proceeds from first to last without any break whatever. Much as may be urged, as to the æsthetical merit of this arrangement—and the admirable effect of the examples that have been cited is powerful evidence in its support—it must be owned that nothing less than the genius of Beethoven could retain the attentive interest of the hearer, without the relaxation of a moment's silence, throughout a succession of such elaborately developed movements as he has thus combined; the power of his genius is, however, especially manifested in the employment of this construction, the result of which is, where he applies it, to increase the excitement of the music, and thus to augment its interest and to rivet the hearer's attention.

No. II.

By TROVATORE.

I find in Il Trovatore of Jan. 29, the following article about Pacini's new Opera, "Saltimbanco":

"The most fertile and pertacious of the Italian composers of the present century, is Pacini. Who would think that he had commenced to compose contemporaneously with Rossini, who for twenty years has lain aside the pen. Pacini saw without fear himself eclipsed by this great sun, and on a par with Donizetti, Mercadante and Coccia. Even when the star of Bellini suddenly illumined Italy, drawing all souls by its melo-dicholous influence, Pacini did not think himself vanquished; he only retired a moment to meditate, and soon reappeared with his masterpiece, Sappho, which, after twenty years, beams with so much freshness and youth! So Pacini recommenced his career, where Verdi first began his; and he has thus contended with those three contemporaneous giants of music, — Rossini, Bellini and Verdi; and if he did not eclipse them he was at least a valiant rival.

"That Pacini has been, of all these composers, the most fertile, the great number of his operas proves, which from the time he first gave to Milan, in 1813, his first musical farce Annetta e Lucindo, until 1853, when his last work, Linda di Brusselle was produced at Bologna, number eighty-eight, exclusive of fourteen never published; and cantatas, airs, romances, choruses, and symphonies, that have been heard all over Italy.

"This Saltimbanco, produced the other night at the Teatro Reggio, in Turin, is his third from last opera, and was produced for the first time last year in Rome, with a brilliant success, that led to its speedy reproduction in other cities.

"It would be ungenerous, to condemn the effort of the Nestor of Italian maestri, the unwearied discoverer of so many beautiful melodies, and how much worse when this opera has received such spontaneous and universal praise; and when the author was called, at its first production in Turin, twenty times before the curtain. If any wished to find fault with the music, they could not say it was sleepy, but rather overcharged with an almost spasmodic vigor. Yet such is the brilliancy and the power of this work, that it cannot fail to meet everywhere an overpowering success."

This is the style of criticism [?] that the Italian papers award to a new opera. Now here is a genuine, thoroughly Italian musical correspondence:

"OUR MILAN CORRESPONDENCE.

"After the unhappy failure of Vasconcello, the unfortunate opera of Villacis, after the triumph of Marchisio in Semiramide, I awaited with anxiety, this enigmatical Boccanegra of Verdi, about which there are so many conflicting reports. The Milanese have agreed with the Venetians and Florentines, and dissented from the verdict of the Neapolitans. Simone Boccanegra bowed its head the first evening at La Scala, and did not raise it the next; the fault of the obscure, flat and miserable libretto for the execution was unimpeachable. In my opinion this opera of Verdi is replete with many beauties, but lacks the much desired theatrical effect.

I would add, that Bendazzi yelled, shrieked and howled, in a horrible manner. You will hear him next year in Turin, and woe be to those who do not provide themselves with cotton to thrust in their ears. Sebastian Ronconi might do if he did not shout so. The only one to sustain the unlucky production was the egregious tenor, Pancani, who in every phrase, nay, every note, showed himself insuperably glib. But he was not enough, and while saving himself from shipwreck, he could not prevent the others from being submerged.

Yours,

A CHILD."

Verdi, last season, was the most popular composer of Italy. In the peninsula are 93 theatres opened for opera. Verdi has been this year the most fortunate, his operas having been repeated in 38 theatres. With Trovatore were inaugurated the openings of the theatres of Naples, Trieste, Florence, Venice, Nice, Ferrara, Verceili, Sassari, Savigliano, Capua, Campobasso and Aversa; with Traviata, Messina, Verona, Pistoja, Legnano, Rimini, Soreto, Osimo, Pergola and Medica; with Ernani, Palermo, Prato, Camerino and Saluzzo; with Lombardi, Genoa, Leghorn, and Pisa; with Rigoletto, Bergamo and Novara; with Nabucco, Fabriano and Urbano; with Attila, Mortara; with Aroldo, Piacenza; with Due Foscari, Sarteano; with Luisa Miller, Foggia; with Giovanna di Guzman, Rome. Next to Verdi comes Donizetti, whose operas opened 15 theatres; Linda at Forlì and Empoli; Polinto (I Martiri) at Spoleto and Forni; Don Pasquale at Rome (Valle theatre); Don Sebastian at Cagliari; Desireux at Udine and Salerno; Lucia at Volterra; Lucrezia at Cuneo; Fausta at Venice; Gemma di Jergy at Reggio and Modena; Parisina at Turin; Maria di Rohan at Gubbio; Favorita at Crema. The operas of Bellini opened only four theatres, Beatrice di Tenda at Ancona and Ravenna; Norma at Florence (the little Goldoni theatre); Puritani at Lodi. Pacini also opens four theatres; Bondelmonte at Pesaro; Saffo at Brescia; Medea at Cosenza; Stella di Napoli at Foligno. Rossini opened only three; Barbiere at Florence (Pagliano theatre); Cenerentola at Siena; Italiana in Algeri at Naples. Petrella opened also three theatres. Meyerbeer, two; the Huguenots at Turin, and Robert at Bologna. All the other theatres at Milan, Vicenza, Modena, Bari, Lucca, Arezzo, Cesena, Bagnacavallo, Ostiglia, Treviso, Oneglia, Barletta, Caltagirone, Catania, Girgenti, Noto, Reggio di Calabria, Syracuse, Trapani, and Lecce opened with operas by Ferrari, Rossi, and other less popular composers.

When a singer does not please the frequenters of an Italian theatre, they do not hesitate to let the unlucky artist, whether male or female, know it; and when a singer is hissed off the stage, he is called protestato. Rosa di Vries, (who once sang here with Maretzek) was, with the tenor, Stecchi-Bottardi, protestato last season, at the theatre of Palermo. At Marseilles, the opera of Galatée was recently given for the third time, but the tenor, including the sixth tenor that had failed in pleasing the people, was hissed off the stage. Six tenors were thus protestati at Marseilles in one season.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME. — With this number we complete the Seventh year and Fourteenth Volume of our JOURNAL OF MUSIC. Subscribers will receive with it, in lieu of the usual four pages of music, a title page and Index for the two volumes of the year.

With our next issue, April 2, we enter upon our FIFTEENTH VOLUME, with more encouragement and ampler means of carrying out our purposes than we have ever had before. Give us a helping hand, good friends, send us in the names of new subscribers, and thus do your part to enable us to make at least a Journal worthy of the Art we love and cultivate.

Mr. Zerrahn's Beethoven Night.

We close our journalistic year on an auspicious day, — the anniversary of BEETHOVEN's death, which will be made the celebration of his immortal life and genius this evening, by a concert, in which two of his greatest works will be performed. For the preparation of the hearer for the better understanding of those works we have already published somewhat, especially on the ninth Symphony; perhaps the real danger is of saying too much; therefore only a few words now.

THE MUSIC TO EGMONT.

Goethe's heroic tragedy was a fit subject for a tyrant-hater like Beethoven. It offered him a kindred theme with his "Fidelio" and his "Heroic Symphony." In the "Egmont" music, he illustrates a drama whose subject is that reign of terror, which Phillip II of Spain, through his stern instrument, the duke of Alva, established in the Netherlands, and the fall of a hero "whose blood became the seed of liberty and freedom from the tyrant's yoke." The music consists, with the exception of two little songs in the charming part of Clara, of a series of instrumental pieces foreshadowing the events, characters and passions of the several acts, or tinged with the impressions of the scenes just passed, — and in the last instance accompanying the action.

First we have the overture, in the dark key of F minor, so well known in concerts. This is a marvellous compression into one brief, intense expression of all the elements of the tragedy. You feel all the gloomy background, the vague apprehensions of that reign of terror; while a ray of heavenly light, of maidenly purity and sweetness, an intimation of the love of Egmont and Clara, crosses and relieves the gloom; and the heroic will, the spirit of liberty, blazes out in glorious triumph at the end. Of the following pieces we reprint a description, by the "Diarist," from an old volume of our Journal:

At the close of the overture the curtain rises and the music is silent until the scene in which Clara appears, and, radiant with happiness and pride in her noble lover, sing her soldier song:

No. I.

"The war-drum is rolling, high soundeth the fife;
My lover, all harnessed, commandeth the strife;
He holds the lance proudly, he orders the army.
My heart throbs aloud—how kindles my blood!
Ah, if as a soldier beside him I stood,
From hence would I follow with courage and pride,
Wherever he led me, I'd fight by his side;
The fœmen would shrink as we charged on the van;
O heaven! what pleasure, were I but a man!"

The simplicity and beauty of the original is but slenderly preserved by him who translated this exquisite song of Goethe. Still one may form some idea of the young girl, who, from her low social position, looks upward with love and veneration as to a god. Of all soldier songs that I know, that in the "Daughter of the Regiment" included, there is none the music of which to me is so full of emotion and simple beauty as this. It is the beauty of the German popular song, and must be judged from that standard—a style of music as distinct and national as that of the Scotch.

No. II. This is the short musical introduction to Act II. It begins with an Andante, in which Beethoven paints the grief of the constant Brackenburgh over his unhappy love for Clara, referring especially to the words: "Could I but forget the time when she loved me, or seemed to love me! And—and now? Let me die! Why do I hesitate?" The Andante is followed by an Allegro con brio, in which is painted the restlessness of the citizens of Brussels under the Spanish yoke, and the constantly increasing excitement among the people.

No. III. is the introduction to the next act, and paints the warnings and presentiments of the Prince of Orange, with the replies of the joyous, careless, Egmont—their farewell, to which these words are the key:

Egmont. What! tears, Orange?
Orange. To weep for one who is lost is manly.

No. IV. is the song in which Clara speaks her longing for the presence of her lover. Clara sings:

"Cheerful and tearful, unwilling or fain,
Longing and mourning in passionate pain;
Joy to feel keenly, or anguish to prove,
Happy alone is the heart that can love."

No. V. Introduction to Act IV., consisting of echo of the love scene between Egmont and Clara; Clara at Egmont's feet—"So let me die; the world has no joy after this!"—march of the soldiers of Alva into Brussels, and closing with indications of the feelings of the citizens, as expressed in the works of Jetter: "I felt it badly the moment the Duke came into the city. Since that moment it seems to me as if the heaven was covered with a pall, which hangs so low that one must bow himself not to touch it. I sniff the odor of an execution morning; the sun will not appear—the mists stink."

No. VI. Introduction to Act V. Egmont's feelings when Alva orders him to surrender his sword; the warning words of Orange again rise in his memory; Clara's emotions upon learning of her beloved's arrest; her attempt to arouse the citizens to his rescue; and finally, her resignation and determination not to outlive him.

No. VII. Clara's death. "I draw nearer and nearer the blessed fields, and the delights of peace from that world already breathe upon me. I have conquered; call me not back again to strife."

No. VIII. Melodrama. Egmont sleeps and dreams to the sound of what Shakespeare would call "still music." He sees his beloved appear in the form of Liberty, proclaiming victory to the people; her hero falls, but in his blood is the seed of freedom.

No. IX. is a repetition of the close of the overture, the triumph of the people over the power of Spain, and the expulsion of Alva.

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY.

This great work needs only that one become somewhat familiar with it, to be as clear and unmistakable in its intentions as any other Symphony. It is a thoroughly consistent and organic whole, all things throughout tending to one conclusion: JOY, realized in universal HUMAN BROTHERHOOD. This musical creation is as organic in its structure as a product of any of the natural kingdoms; and therefore such a close and literal examination of it as Mr. Schmitt has made in this and last week's paper, such an enumeration of its contents, such a tracing of its themes and motives through their various modifications, combinations and whole working up, must be as instructive in its way to any student who will follow it patiently, score in hand, as the naturalist's minute and microscopic observations on the organism of a bird or fish. Even to those who cannot or care not to so study it, it will be no little help in hearing the Symphony to have its various little motives and marked phrases, which continually reappear in it and give it at once variety and unity, fixed beforehand in their minds. You watch any procession, of harmonies as well as of men, as it passes by you, with more interest when you recognize the personages that move in it.

Were we to raise any question about our friend's enumeration of the themes and motives, it would be, whether in the First Movement he does not find too many themes? Has it not after all, according to the usual type of a Symphony Allegro, just two leading themes or subjects which we call theme and counter-theme, and are not all the others either transformations of those, or transition passages leading in and out to them, or incidental phrases of subordinate importance?

The moral and poetic meaning of the Symphony is truly set forth in Richard Wagner's parallels of its various movements with passages from Goethe. In truth it is the same problem, the great life problem, which the poet in his "Faust" and the composer in his Symphony attempt to solve. First comes the feeling of the emptiness of life, expressed in the very opening of the Symphony by that strange rustling of empty, barren Fifts (Quintengeflüster the Germans call it), and upon this the strong relentless Fate theme (No. I in S's analysis) is pronounced with startling energy; and the sweet human reed instruments pour out their pleading strain (a little melodic figure that seems to be the tune of the "Joy" chorus in embryo); and sun-gleams and shadows mingle and chase each other, ideal hopes and shadows of despair; and yet the soul's enthusiasm burns unquenchable in spite of Fate; and the at once pleading and inspired motive No. 5, (properly the Counter-theme) comes, with its light tip-toe tread of double-basses,—a passage very Beethovenish, which gives you the idea of one treading upon air as if drunk with the possession of some glorious secret; and the great storm and struggle comes of light and darkness, Joy and Fate, stirring up all the depths of harmony in tumultuous billows, the double-basses stepping wide in intervals of octaves or more, and giving breadth and grandeur to the picture; and the human pleadings and the sweet ideals come again, and all seems to tend to light and serene harmony; but for the present, for the actual conclusion, the inexorable voice, that first rang through the void, prevails, and the first movement closes with the first theme again sounded by the whole with terrible three-fold emphasis. And is this the conclusion? The conclusion of the actual, but not of the ideal. It is in this first movement that one feels the pledge and prophecy of something grand, extraordinary, that is yet to come. We know no music which seems so pregnant with a future as this, teeming with more than it has means to utter, and foreshadowing a solution, such as came to Beethoven in that fourth or Choral movement. It is this first Movement that requires and justifies the last and finds its explanation there.

The Scherzo movement, with its strong joyous pulse of ceaseless three-four measure, so light and tripping, yet with such breadth of crowded harmony, as if one wild, reckless impulse tingled in every nerve and fibre of a whole world thus possessed and demonized; — and then its quaint pastoral episode in 4-4 time, where the bassoon toys merrily with the horn — suggests the vain attempt to find true joy in the whirl of superficial pleasure and excitement.

Then comes the Adagio Cantabile, serene and heavenly, the very opposite to that wild mood of sensual joy. How like holy bells in a still night the notes of the first chord fall in one by one upon the ear, leading in that sweet, slow, solemn psalm, with echoed cadence to each line! and how the strings palpitate with blissful agitation, as the time changes and the soul is rapt in deeper bliss by the new theme in D that enters,—most lovely, warm and comforting of melodies! What music ever written is more full of deepest feeling! Then with what exquisite delicacy and subtlety of fine mellifluous divisions, winding and throbbing in and out, the theme is varied by the violins, and by the warmer instruments! And what is there comparable to that pure height of ecstasy, of reverie in which the soul is more than ever conscious, lost to time but waking in eternity, where, while the theme, modulated into a strange key, as it were refracted through a visionary light, is pursued by the wind instruments, the strings now here now there, in all parts of the orchestra, emit as it were little electric sparks of happiness, in those pizzicati which only seem so promiscuously timed! Then the slow horn, as if inspired with an involuntary eloquence, indulges in a florid passage quite beyond its ordinary powers! Then the wonderfully expressive drooping back, as with a sigh of too much bliss, into the old key and the old theme; and still more exquisite refinement on the melody by the violins! And when the conclusion must come, the bold trumpet strain of exhortation from on high, the voice which seems to summon the whole soul to highest action; then a brief relapse into the celestial melody, and the dream gently fades away.

But it is not enough; the solution is not here. This we have in the fourth or Choral part. How wonderfully the transition from pure instrumental into vocal music is prepared! First a sort of shriek of despair from the orchestra; then a recitative, that almost speaks, from the double-basses and 'celli, uttering the soul's question and complaint. A wilder shriek (diminished seventh), and more recitative of basses. Then the rustling Fifts of the first movement are suggested; the basses answer: No, it will not do! The Scherzo theme is tried: No, again, with more impatience. The heavenly Adagio is touched, for a few bars; and the bass soliloquy this time is of a subdued and sweeter melancholy, but ending still with restless sense of want of satisfaction. Then a new light sweetly streaks the dark horizon; the theme of the Joy Chorus is just hinted by the mellow reeds, and the basses make eager, hopeful answer: Aye, that's the tune! and in a low, quiet voice, these basses hum through, as it were, the simple melody of the chorus, conceived in the style of the simplest people's tune; they repeat it, and the bassoon plays around it with a quaint accompaniment, as if free now to indulge in any innoent fancy; then the violins come in; then the full force of the orchestra, with trumpets, with the richest harmony, and all manner of melodic figurative phrases, the whole so exciting as to lift one on his feet. It is splendid, it is divine, but still the utterance is not complete! The cry of despair comes once again, and now a human voice sings: "Friends, no more these mournful strains," &c., and the Chorus comes in in full tide to the words of Schiller's "HYMN TO JOY." How this is worked up to a sublimer and sublimer pitch, reaching its climax in the religious strain of long notes, with the thrilling star-like vibrations of the orchestral accompaniment, at the thought of "the Father who dwells above the stars," and how it all grows more and more exciting to the end, we have no room, if we had power, to describe. If performed as well as we have ample reason to expect it will be, it will make its meaning felt to every listener.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We are happy to learn that Mme. BISCACCANTI yields to the general entreaties and will before departing give another concert here, on Wednesday evening next. . . . The announcement by Señor CASSERES, of a concert at Mercantile Hall next Saturday evening, is worthy of attention. This gentleman, a native of Jamaica, of Spanish-African blood, gave such proof recently, in a matinee at Mr. Gilbert's rooms, both of his ability and taste as a pianist, and of a refined, gentlemanly, modest tone of character, as to win friends at once. The material of his concert is attractive, and we wish him a full house. . . . The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY will publicly revive the once popular Oratorio of "David," by Neukomm, on Sunday evening, April 3. . . . We are glad to hear that our excellent tenor singer, Mr. C. R. ADAMS, who has so commended himself to Boston audiences by his earnest and successful culture of a fine natural gift, and equally by his modest and agreeable deportment, intends to go to Europe for his further musical improvement, seeking what not only Italy, but Germany and England have to offer. There is a movement among the musicians to give him a good concert in aid of this laudable design.

A "School for Organists" — not a hook, but a school — is certainly a great desideratum in our musical world. Mr. JOHN ZUNDEL, organist of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., who has returned from Germany, and who is one of the most learned and accomplished organists in this country, has established such a school (see card), where pupils will receive daily lessons on the Organ and in Thorough-Bass, with weekly lessons in the art of tuning and doctoring refractory instruments. An excellent idea. . . . Who is "John," our Diarist's and Berlin correspondent's "John"? The Portland Advertiser claims the honor of him for that city. He is the son of the late well-known music-dealer, and JOHN PAINE is his name. He is now studying in Berlin, working away hard at Bach; we hope, with our correspondent, that "when 'John' gets home, there will be no more desecration of the Organ by operatic flights and negro jigs as at the Tremont Temple."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 19. — One of the most charming concerts of the season was MASON & THOMAS' Matinée last Tuesday. The programme, owing to the absence of Mr. Thomas, with Ullman's troupe, was more miscellaneous than usual, and contained a couple of vocal numbers. I subjoin it:

Sonata in C minor. Opus 90, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violin; Beethoven: Messrs. Wm. Mason and J. Mosenthal. "Ab, mein fi!," Le Prophete; Meyerbeer: Mrs. J. M. Mozart. Variations Concertantes, for Violoncello and Piano Forte. Opus 17; Mendelssohn: Messrs. C. Bergmann and Wm. Mason. Andante for two Pianofortes, opus 6; Reinecke: Messrs. J. S. Jameson and Wm. Mason. Elegy of Tears; Schubert: Mrs. J. M. Mozart. Quartet in E flat major, opus 47, for Piano, Violin, Viola, and Violoncello; Schumann: Messrs. Mason, Mosenthal, Natzka, and Bergmann.

The Sonata, in which Mr. MOSENTHAL made his debut as a solo player, is, in my opinion, the finest of its kind, not excepting the Kreutzer Sonata, which is so much more celebrated. It was exceedingly well rendered. Mr. Mosenthal played his part so beautifully, with such true feeling and comprehension, that all who heard him cannot but hope that he will follow out the new path he has entered upon. He is a most earnest and thorough musician, with the true artist feeling, whose great modesty alone prevents him from occupying in our musical world as high a place as many another who is less worthy of it. As great a treat in their way were the lovely variations of Mendelssohn, very finely interpreted by Messrs. MASON & BERGMANN; and no less satisfactory was the beautiful quartet of Schumann. How exquisitely fresh and vigorous and sparkling it is. In the fourth number, the second piano was taken by Mr. JAMESON, a son of the lady singer of that name, a very young man, hardly more than a boy, with a most prepossessing exterior and modest, pleasing demeanor. He acquitted himself exceedingly well, evincing great firmness and power, and, altogether, did ample credit to his master, Mr. Mason. The piece which they played was so entirely out of the common line, that it was difficult to judge of it at once. I hope we shall hear it again.

You will see from the programme that the singer of the occasion was one of your own warblers, who has become a bird of passage, and emigrated to our clime. A great responsibility has this Mrs. MOZART resting upon her, in striving to do justice to the honored name she bears. She has a beautiful voice, sings well, and is pleasing in her appearance. A slight cold seemed to slightly impair her powers on Tuesday, but not enough to prevent the audience from welcoming her as a valuable addition to our collection of singing birds. In point of weather, poor Eisfeld's mantle seems to have fallen upon this quartet party this winter; their concerts are sure to fall upon the worst of the many disagreeable days we have had this winter. This last time, however, the audience was not very much diminished by this circumstance, and the performers did their best to reward those who were present for braving the storm, by playing with a spirit which they have never before surpassed.

Next Thursday evening, Mr. C. JEROME HOPKINS will give a concert at the Church of the Messiah — probably for the purpose of bringing out some of his compositions. On Monday after next, Wagner's Tannhäuser will be given entire at a little German theatre in the Bowery! As to how it is given, I may be able to tell you in my next. — t —

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 22. — After a Symphony concert by the popular SENZ, two classical soirées by CARL GAERTNER, and a superb entertainment by the Handel and Haydn Society, there ensued a dead calm in our latitude of the sea of harmony, until last night, when the so-called New Orleans English Opera Troupe opened at the Walnut with Cinderella. Moreover, Wm. H. FRY has repeated his quaint, rambling musical lecture, at the Concert Hall. Circumstances precluded the possibility of my attendance there, but several literary friends, on whose judgment I am wont to repose unlimited confidence, pronounce the effort to have combined a vast amount of musical information, strangely leavened with random allusions to irrelevant subjects, e. g. woman's rights, postal reforms, tariff, Kansas, etc. The lecture occupied two hours, without any signs of weariness on the part of the audience, who found themselves alternately edified, and entertained by the adroitness wherewith the distinguished critic managed to interweave so many heterogeneous subjects with his theme.

Two youthful pianists, named HERBERT and HANVEY, (the latter a violinist besides), announce a grand concert for to-morrow night at the Musical Fund Hall. They have engaged a charming vocalist, named M'Ille. ANNA WISSLER, who several years ago attracted marked attention at the Harmonia concerts, — then made a temporary sojourn in Paris, where she placed herself in the hands of first class teachers, — and now returns to us a very finished vocalist. The Evening Bulletin termed her "one of the best singers we have had here for a long time," after her achievements at Gaertner's second soirée. There are rumors here of a forthcoming season of Ullmanic Italian Opera during the second week of April, but I can trace them to no reliable source. On dit, furthermore, that the "little Napoleon" has leased our Academy from August next onward. At present, Mrs. D. P. BOWERS, an actress of considerable repute in this latitude, furnishes farce and comedy upon its ample stage, to houses which are thinning nightly to such an alarming extent that the close of the season has been announced next Saturday. MANRICO.

CINCINNATI, MARCH 13. — Having seen no report from our city in your Journal lately, I will give you a short account of the doings of our home Societies this winter. The "Cecilia" Society have given a concert once a month, and their excellent leader, Mr. RITTER, continues his endeavors to bring out as much of the best class of Music as is feasible. The chorus is not as large and good as in former years, owing partly to a marrying mania amongst its members, but does its best under these aggravating circumstances. Parts of the "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Gade's "Comala," &c., have been sung lately, and probably some one of these works will be brought out entire shortly. Mr. Ritter has also composed recently a sort of cantata, or oratorio, called "Pensacola," the words by Miss FANNY RAYMOND, based on an Indian story. Parts of it have been performed at the last concert of the Society. As I was prevented from being present all the evening, I must postpone an account of it; but may say, that it has been very favorably reported in our papers.

The Philharmonic Society have given two concerts and two public Rehearsals, this season thus far; the programmes embracing the fourth Symphony of Beethoven, the seventh of Haydn, Overtures to "Euryanthe," by Weber, several by Auber and Rossini, and the one to "Tannhäuser," by Wagner. The Orchestra, under the efficient lead of Mr. BARUS, continues to improve very much; and at the last concert particularly played remarkably well. The "Tannhäuser" overture was rendered for the first time and with great effect, and elicited much interest from the audience.

This week the opera season will commence in our splendid new opera house, with Strakosch's troupe. X.

"MR. BROWN'S" DEN. — WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY IN BERLIN.

BERLIN, FEB. 23. — DEAR DWIGHT. — You may take the above for a caption or a date, for it is both. "Herr Teer ist fort," is the response I just received from the little "Italienerin" as she is now called, from my christening, and as I consider her a part of the Diarist's establishment, (don't be alarmed, our æsthetic friend has no "responsibilities"! I suppose the little dairy-maid ought to be described. But we will pass her by for the present. "Nehmen sie Platz, bitte," says the pretty nymph — and so I will or have — and, awaiting the proprietor's return, will now try to fulfil a promise made in a recent letter to you and describe the workshop of the old Titan. Am I mistaken in thinking that many of the Journal's readers will feel an interest in the "local habitation" of Mr. Brown? — the laboratory where so much of wit, pathos, sentiment and common sense is wrought into shapes of beauty and use for their hearts and minds?

We sometimes mistake in judging others by ourselves — yet what better standard have we? For my part, it is always of the highest interest to me to know how the habitual working place of a favorite author or a dear friend looks. Let me be accurate and pace the room — 17 x 9 — window at one end, door leading into bed-room at the other; half way of the length, a second door, conducting into "John's" room, through which the world passes to get at the Diarist. John is portly and a goodly porter, for his open and cordial smile is a fit preparation for the severe presence of the deity of the inner temple. But come, let us go on with the "temple" itself. In the corner next the window is a French secretary, (not an amanuensis, my friend, or he surely would not be of that nation, but) of satin-wood. The lid is down and discloses contents in most artistic disorder — not that chaos which preceded creation, but that which co-exists with and helps it on! Let us glance at the contents without handling. Sundry newspapers, (please not read this "Sunday"), pamphlets, a package, which I guess contains tea; cover of a very old book. Cheek by jowl with the secretary, following the north wall towards "John's" door, is a low bureau, contents unknown, top covered with files of "Dwight's Journal," huge piles of Beethoven and Liszt, and Handel's "Susannah;" a ream of letter paper, copies of N. Y. Tribune — handy for use, but nothing final in the arrangements.

Near the centre of the room, but approached to the sofa, which is against the wall opposite said bureau, is the table — a sofa-table, as we call it in America, $4\frac{1}{2} \times 3$ feet — of satin-wood, (material discernible on digging a hole, by the Artesian principle, in the superincumbent masses, — literally,) but an inventory would carry me too far; let us, however, pick out a few items, "leading articles," so to speak: Inkstand — not a practical one, but then we all have our inconsistencies — it would kill me in a week, and if this letter is very dull, lay it to the inkstand: — imagine the Diarist, if you can, friend Dwight, writing his charming letters from an English patent, spring-top, travelling inkstand — one of those ingenious things, known to most modern travellers, especially ladies, so ingeniously contrived not to spring open till fairly imbedded in your white kids, handkerchiefs, best vests and photographs! — spectacles, wafer-box, of porcelain, representing a miniature couple, in dramatic costume, dancing a minuet; pin-cushion, quills, every variety of book, pamphlet, journal, manuscript and blank paper, &c., &c. The entire contents of this table suggest to the mind of the imaginative observer, the "bursting up" of a neighboring antiquarian establishment, a section of which has blown in through the window and thus reached its destination; three chairs, a good sofa — very comfortable looking, — books perching on the arms thereof. Beginning now at the window on the south side of the room, the first object, and a conspicuous one, is the library proper — shelves from floor to ceiling, say 5 feet long and a little more than full, so that you see sundry piles on the floor, which look as if they had several times tried to climb up, but, finding no room, had fallen back discouraged and hurt themselves too much to have strength for any very picturesque arrangement below. Starting at this base, a row of dignified tomes, which cannot be suspected of any such unseemly friskiness, "measures its slow length" on the floor, under the window, till it gains the secretary first mentioned.

At the opposite end of the sofa is a handsome mahogany clothes-press — (almost tempted, in defiance of all rules of propriety, to peep in, merely to see if that, too, don't contain books.) There is, however, still a space 2 feet wide between it and the bedroom door — let's look and see what is there — voyons! Upon the honor of a gentleman, a pile of quartos four feet high and very ancient! On the opposite corner of the room, a German porcelain stove of a Brown color, with a sort of oven therein, in which sundry good things are doubtless sometimes browned. A little four-legged table 18 inches square. And now for the walls. A bust-chen of von Humboldt in plaster; large looking-glass over bureau; a framed engraving of Leonardo da Vinci's "Heilige Abendmahl" and, as a pendant, a sheet, similarly framed, containing 14 little semi-comic engravings, 7 to the left, representing "Les Plaisirs," and 7 to the right, "Les Désagrémens of a "Promenade." On the window seat, by way of variety, books. Unoccupied space of room, not adapted to crinoline navigation! Outlook — you see the Friederich Strasse across an area, 80 feet deep of dimension, stone ready for building, and a symmetrical pile of wood. Oh! I omitted to notice two things, under the table a carpet and on top of the secretary, books!

Now, in spite of all this detail, as minute as if I were preparing a schedule for an auction sale of premises and contents, I feel that I have given no graphic impression of the "locus in quo" of Mr. Brown's thoughts and works. I am sitting with my side to the window, at one end of the table, in the proprietors's absence; my paper rests upon the back of Marx's life of Beethoven, looking, as on a former occasion, through the "Diarist's spectacles; but the tableau is not complete nor beautiful, until the genius loci is there, in that grey coat, on the centre of that sofa inditing "copy for Dwight," and occasionally looking up with most startling suddenness, as if he saw flames proceeding from his bureau. You start, too, but it is only; "By Jove; I must have that old edition of Squampunkius" — glances wildly into space, but seeing no funds there, relapses, with something between a sigh and a grunt into silence. But the Squampunkius has disturbed the current of his idens. He speaks no more aloud, but — (I am peeping at him through my fingers) he is scratching his head and evidently murmuring betwixt his teeth a non-reconcilement with the order of Providence, wondering if any special Providence will award him a copy of the author aforesaid. Ah! he is a philosopher. See how transient this scepticism is! His brow clears and his eye says: "Whatever is, is right." Let's try him! "Brown, what are you writing about at this moment; just a freak of curiosity I have?" "Well, why do you ask? — oh, I was just saying something funny to Dwight." "Well, but what was in your mind a minute ago?" "Oh, nothing, Ex nihilo nihil fit, you know." "Nothing fit to be told, you mean?" "Pshaw! it's Latin; I thought you understood Latin!" "Yes, that's always the way with you scholars; you fancy everybody knows everything just because you do." "Why, surely, my dear fellow, I heard you one day quote 'integer vitae scelerisque purus,' &c." "Oh yes, to be sure, but that was only to let Joe see that I was not to be put down by his 'fas est et ab hoste doceri,'" and I was much encouraged in finding what a hit I had made — for his countenance fell decidedly; it is true, I felt like exultation when I afterwards discovered that he didn't know what his sentence meant any more than I did mine — but, it wants ten minutes of dinner, "prandio qui abest" — what is it? why, my vein is too silly for a Journal of Music, Art and Literature, so, dear D., au revoir!

Yesterday was the 22d February, and WASHINGTON's birthday was celebrated on Prussian soil by a very handsome dinner at the American Minister's. The venerable HUMBOLDT was present and 78 of our countrymen and countrywomen. The occasion merits a description, but here and now I have only time to say that Massachusetts carried off the honors decidedly, in the person of the "Diarist" — whose toast was: "Von Humboldt, the king of science, the latchet of whose shoes common kings are not worthy to stoop down and unloose!" There was no end to the applause, and the venerable sage looked really pleased as if he thought it just and the right thing to be said. The utmost good feeling prevailed between North and South, and Virginia said some very cordial and handsome things of Massachusetts. The dinner was good, elegantly served, the wines various and of the best quality; and the occasion a decided success. The most modest speaker, who said but a few words, almost inaudible from emotion, was the dauntless horse and zebra tamer, Rarey.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by O. Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The gift from over the sea. Ballad. S. Glover. 25

A sentimental little song, which would prove an excellent addition to a young lady's musical album.

The Strawberry girl. Howard. 35

This is one of the ballads, which "Little Cordelia Howard," the gifted and interesting child, whose personification of the little Corn girl is fresh in the memory of many thousands, has made famous. The title-page of this new edition of the song is adorned by an excellent likeness of Little Cordelia.

Heaven may to you grant pardon. (Ah! che a voi perdoni Iddio.) Quintet for Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and 2 Basses, from Flotow's opera of Martha. 40

Everybody who has heard the opera recollects the splendid Finale of the second act, in which all the characters of the play participate, with the tenor as dominating part. The melody is so pathetic and impressive, that it seems almost impossible to forget it. This new edition is complete, as sung now by the Italian opera troupes. It is a highly valuable piece for the concert-room.

Gently he passed away. J. W. Turner. 25

A simple song in the author's sweet style.

The Song of the shell. A Greek composition. W. J. Wetmore. 25

Pretty and pleasing.

Instrumental Music.

The Opera at Home. Traviata. 2 nos., each containing 6 of the principal Airs, each Albert W. Berg. 60

These arrangements of Mr. Berg, as those of a musician, whose fair reputation, both as pianist and teacher, warrants the nicety and usefulness of the selections and arrangements, will recommend themselves to the general playing public as the best handbook of the opera out. Each air is treated independently, and may form a separate piece, at the pleasure of the performer, or all may be connected by short and appropriate interludes. They are not difficult.

La Truite. Song by Schubert. Transcribed by S. Heller. 40

Heller's celebrated arrangement, which needs no recommendation.

Rataplan March. Fred. Beyer. 25

Embracing four of the favorite martial airs in the "Fille du Regiment" among which is the famous Rataplan. This makes one of the most pleasing marches that has been arranged for the piano.

WOODBURY'S ELEMENTS OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The Elements of Musical Composition and Thorough Bass, together with Rules for Arranging Music for full Orchestra and Military Bands. By I. B. Woodbury. 50

This work was undertaken at the request of several teachers and professors of music. Simplicity has been a principal object regarded. All technical phrases, not readily understood, have been, where it was possible, avoided, and the science of Music rendered so clear and plain as to be easily comprehended by the student.
